What we can do, instead of whining and complaining, is come forward with initiatives like western economic diversification, which provides some much-needed variety in those areas. We can come forward with this enabling legislation, which is the subject of the debate today. The farm income protection act legislation will enable the entering into of agreements for GRIP and NISA for the participating provinces and will provide the kind of long-term permanent safety net which is required out there. This will provide some much needed certainty and predictability for Canadians producers. That is something that is real and concrete. It is not a matter of wishes, it responds to a need and I encourage all members to support it.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak for a few minutes on Bill C-98, and particularly to Motion No. 4 which stands in the name of my colleague from Moose Jaw—Lake Centre.

I understand the minister and the government side are encouraged enough by the committee hearings and by the debate to accept my colleague's amendment which will at line 23 on page 3 of C-98, the words: "the program should encourage the long-term social and economic sustainability of farm families and communities."

It is obviously the kind of wording that is important in this kind of enabling legislation because enabling legislation is a process that allows for an agreement to be developed and to come afterwards. We do not really know what the final nature of the agreement will be that comes from Bill C-98, and that is one of the chronic problems with this kind of enabling legislation.

The government members keep saying that there is going to be certainty and predictability for those farmers and those farm families who make use of this legislation and these programs in the years to come. However, when one takes a close look at C-98 one does not find that kind of certainty and predictability and accuracy to which farmers are looking with increasing interest and need.

Other members have touched on the problems being faced in the grains and seeds sector particularly. We all recognize that the ongoing subsidy wars between Europe and the United States and others is making it very difficult for the sustainability of the Canadian farm as we know it. But there is another issue we have to address on the floor of the House today, that is adding the kind of wording suggested by my colleague from Moose Jaw—Lake Centre. It gives some direction to this enabling legislation so that those ministers, bureaucrats and others who will be negotiating future instruments and future amendments have some idea of what the intention of the House was.

As I understand it, members on both sides are going to be supporting this. It is important to have some idea of why this kind of wording is so important because we have seen in recent years, not only what my colleague touched on, but also the galloping nature of our national debt. It was less than $200 billion when the present Prime Minister came to office and, in June of this year it is going to exceed $400 billion. We see the time clock ticking away. The growth rate of the debt is on television regularly.

There are very few farm families in this country who also do not know the nature of debt and what kinds of problems come with it. My colleagues from Saskatchewan have touched on a number of both young and old who are being forced to leave the farms, not just on the prairies but also in areas such as the constituency that I represent, which is about one-quarter of British Columbia. It does not have the huge grains and seed acreages that one finds in the Peace, or in Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba or other areas of the country, but there are farms and there are significant cattle producers and others in the area.

Don Knoerr, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has appeared many times before the committee studying this legislation. I think it it is fair to say that he, like I, is concerned about giving the government carte blanche to do what it likes without really knowing what the final plan is going to be like and whether or not it will provide, what all members of this House would like to see, legislation and farm programs with long-term social and economic sustainability.

We have seen in recent years the closing down and the loss of a lot of federal institutions that have long been an important part of both rural and farm communities: the post office, train stations, branch lines and community grain elevators. We have seen a loss of much of the infrastructure which people who live in larger towns and cities take for granted, the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker disappear. All the different shops that were traditionally part of all of those small, rural communities have disappeared.

To an enormous extent, it has been as a result of uninterest and inactivity by federal governments year after year, government after government. They have not provided that little bit of additional financial and economic input that is required in a rural farm community to keep all those things going.

Once we lose a certain number of local enterprises, whether it is the person who provides seed or farm machinery or who fixes equipment or maybe does all those various things, we lose the critical mass.

Increasingly, on the prairies and in farm communities we are seeing a ghostly veil as more businesses close and more of these small communities wither on the vine.

As we see the problems on the international scale with the value that we are getting for our international commodity sales, we recognize as previous speakers have said that about 80 per cent of our grain sales are to offshore markets.

If we are not getting enough in terms of the costs of production, it means that those farms become less and less competitive and viable. The debt grows. More and more local businesses do not get paid, and it becomes a bit of a self-fulfilling prophesy.

That is why wording such as (b.1) proposed by the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre is so important as a guiding principle. If there are going to be certain things built into the agreements and amendments made in this five-year period before the Minister of Agriculture has promised that there would be another review, here is a guiding principle.

The bureaucrats, in particular, will be asking: What if we change this for this part of Saskatchewan? What if we changed it for this particular aspect? What would it mean in terms of the long-term social and economic sustainability? It is a very important principle to have in there.

As I said earlier, I am very pleased that it is going to be in the bill because there are many other problems which are threatening the long-term sustainability of the family farm in this country. Even the recent problems emanating from game farming, as you would know, Mr. Speaker, are a very serious threat not only to our existing cattle operations but also to our wildlife populations in our national parks.

I have seen in recent days, for example, that a bred cow elk which had to be slaughtered because of a positive test for TB can bring a game farmer $7,000 under the federal pay-out scheme. The most one can get in this whole country for a cow, regardless of whether it is a Sementhal, a pure bred Angus or whatever breed that has to be slaughtered because of a positive test, is $1,500.

It does not matter whether the cow is worth $10,000 or $20,000. That is all you can get for a cow. There are special arrangements and agreements being made in relation to the game farming industry that also need to be looked at. They have not been looked at very carefully by this government.

All over the country, there are issues such as this cropping up for either the federal Crown or the provincial Crown. They have not been doing an adequate job of evaluating the impact and the problems of imports.

The hon. member for Mackenzie very recently raised the possible problems that could come from bringing in honey queens from Hawaii. We heard from the Minister of Agriculture that a group of investigators went to Hawaii to check and make sure that there were not mites and other problems with the honey queens coming.

How come you are wiggling your finger like that, Mr. Speaker? You are interested in knowing about Hawaiian honey queens. I recognize in the Peace district near where you live in Edmonton there is a need for additional bees. Many of them come from New Zealand and other areas. We are facing a shortage of bee queens.

As the hon. member for Mackenzie pointed out, the government seems very quick in wanting to bring in bees from Hawaii. We are facing chronic problems with infections in buffalo and elk. All of these things are threatening the traditional and important livelihood of our the farm economies, whether it is beef, grain, seed or dairy.

• (1300)

These are important things that the federal government should be doing to both monitor and evaluate before the problems become too severe.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 4 agreed to.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): moved:

That Bill C-98 be amended in clause 5 by striking out line 48 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"be considered appropriate to carry out continuing review of the operation of this act and the agreements and report to the minister periodically and at least once a year on its recommendations on the administration of the agreements this act and any amendments it considers advisable;"

He said: Mr. Speaker, I believe there will be agreement to change this a bit at line 2 on page 5. We do not have the reprinted bill with the amendments that were made at committee. We therefore are referring to the pages on the bill as it was originally printed for the original reading.

It would then change paragraph (b) on page 5 to read:

(b) the powers and duties of the committees, including a continuing review;

The remainder of the amendment would follow on from there.

I would like to make some comments, but I assume you, Sir, have to get agreement first.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there agreement of the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): So carried.

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, this is a very important amendment to the bill. From the witnesses who appeared before the committee, there was almost unanimous consent that this type of review committee be put in place a little more clearly than the bill originally had stated. All parties that have discussed this bill understand that it is very complicated and very important. Since we are dealing with a complicated industry such as agriculture, it will be necessary to continually review this at all times so that it can, when and if necessary, be changed in order to hopefully improve it.

The Prairie Pools and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture were two groups in particular that felt very strongly on this, as did many of us from this side of the House. I stress this to the government today and urge that it accept this amendment to the bill, which I think will strengthen it. It will strengthen the confidence that the producers and the agrifood industry will have in this bill in assuring that there will be a committee appointed and assuring that there will be ongoing continuous review with an opportunity for the committee to make recommendations and recommended amendments to the minister and therefore to the House at any time in order to help make this bill a stronger one than ever.

I will leave my comments at that and hope that the government will approve this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 5 agreed to.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): moved:

That Bill C-98 be amended by adding immediately after line 19 at page 5 the following new clause:

"5.1(1) The minister shall cause to be laid before Parliament every agreement made pursuant to section 4 within thirty days of it being made, or, if Parliament is not then sitting, not later than the thirtieth day thereafter that either House of Parliament is sitting.

(2) An agreement laid before Parliament pursuant to subsection (1) shall be automatically referred to the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Agriculture."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment has been modified by adding words before that printed on the Order Paper today. Before the paragraph that starts "5.1(1) The Minister shall", we would add the words "with the concurrence of provinces party to the agreement".

I wonder if I could just propose that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Foster: This amendment proposes to amend the subclause 5.1 by making a provision for the Minister of Agriculture to table agreements within 30 days of when they are signed and when there is agreement from the participating parties, that is the provinces that are party to the agreement.

The original amendment was that it would simply be tabled in the House and then stand referred to the parliamentary committee. Well, of course, if there was no agreement from the provinces, there could be legal repercussions in that regard.

Even though everybody in the agricultural community thinks that we are somehow or other approving the GRIP and NISA agreements and setting out what the premiums and benefits will be, in fact all we are doing is passing legislation which allows for these agreements. To that extent, legislators in this whole process are at least one step, and maybe more than that, removed from the actual program that has been offered to producers, certainly corn producers in Ontario and wheat producers in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta, and so on.

At least this places the whole arrangement for GRIP and NISA back in the agreements as they are made with the participating provinces. It allows them back on the floor of the House of Commons, allows them to be referred to the standing committee for their consideration. Otherwise, we would not only be passing legislation which enables these kinds of deals to take place, but there would be no requirement that the government ever table them, ever have anything to do with the Parliament of Canada. I suppose you could always say there is provision, the estimates have to provide for the funding, and so on, but the actual details would not be there.

This amendment really provides for that. The agreements will be tabled within 30 days of the concurrence of the provinces concerned, and will be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture for its consideration and advice.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, this proposed amendment requires the minister to place the federal-provincial agreements that are signed before the House within 30 days of being signed so that Parliament will have a chance to oversee what those agreements contain.

This is a second-best choice in terms of parliamentary overview of what is going on in the country. This body has the responsibility by tradition and by law to be responsible for the expenditures and the final decisions on how we tax ourselves.

Those decisions have gradually been eroded by practice over the last decade or so. Sometimes I fear we are getting almost to the point where responsible parliamentary government started, when parliament in the United Kingdom wrested power from the absolute monarch and began to take power unto itself so the people could decide where their tax dollars were coming from and where the money was to be spent.

We are coming perilously close to going back to those days with the very strong prime minister's offices that have developed over the past two or three administrations. This is definitely a second or third best option. It is only a requirement to have the government of the day report the agreements it has made beyond this Chamber back to the House. It would be much better if Parliament could pass legislation that would provide much clearer guidelines as to how those agreements should be made and what would be required, but that is not the choice of action in this particular era.

I would like to put on the record that I still find this reprehensible in terms of responsible government. It makes the job of all backbenchers and parliamentarians extremely difficult and frustrates the role they have traditionally had to play by having such open-ended kinds of legislation to deal with where, in effect, Parliament says to the executive branch of government: "Here, do whatever you like. Come back and report to us 30 days after you have done it".

I do not like that particular principle, but having the government report is better than not having it report, and that is basically what we are down to with this particular amendment. If this is passed, at least the government today and future governments will have to eventually report what agreements they have signed behind closed doors with the various provinces that will affect producers right across the country and will affect all taxpayers at both the federal and provincial levels. It will force those facts to come out eventually.

As I have said, I deplore the principle we are establishing with these kinds of legislative proposals, but they have been around now for eight or ten years and it is going to be a great struggle on the part of all parliamentarians and the people of Canada to bring those powers back into this Chamber, instead of leaving them in the cabinet room.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, I believe, wants to say a few words.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I will try and keep it to a few words.

I am pleased to make a few brief comments on Bill C-98, legislation that allows the government and, in this particular case the Minister of Agriculture primarily, to enter into agreements between the federal and provincial governments regarding agriculture support programs, in particular GRIP and NISA, which we have heard a great deal about already.

I want to support Motion No. 6. It is a very straight forward amendment and most definitely one that will continue to enable and open up the legislative process and opportunities for parliamentarians and in so doing for all Canadians to participate and learn a great deal more about how we govern ourselves. That is what we are talking about here, an opportunity to learn how the Government of Canada works with the provinces in administering these programs.

I would like to give two examples where we did get support from the government for an initiative like this and in another case where we have had some difficulty and likely there could be more improvement.

Let us do the good news first. The good news was legislation called Bill C-74, fisheries legislation we had before this House prior to Christmas. There was generally support from all parties for that legislation because its job was, among other things, to increase penalties for destruction of our fisheries habitat, east and west coasts and also in fresh water situations.

The argument we put to the government in committee, to which it eventually agreed in this Chamber—although opposed to the proposal in committee it did come to an agreement in this Chamber—was for a very specific section of that legislation that called upon the government to issue an annual report, to table in this House a report on one particular aspect of the legislation. That was with respect to habitat protection, the number of fines assessed and the progress that those charges have made.

That is not a federal—provincial agreement, but it is a pretty clear example, in this particular case, of the government supporting an initiative that certainly will go some distance toward giving us a clearer indication of where we are with regard to that most important matter of habitat protection.

That is some good news, and I hope that the government would see the logic it accepted in this Chamber for that particular amendment to Bill C-74 and to agree to that logic in this particular case, which is all it is calling for, for any agreements signed to be tabled in this House, and—the second part of the amendment—to be referred to the standing committee.

You know as I do, what that does for us. If we see that particular report, we then have the information in front of us on this particular program. Then it is our obligation and duty, if we have questions and want to pursue that information further, to raise that matter here or in committee.

I think the important thing is that the information is made available. We have had some difficulty with the government in another particular section of legislation. It has to do with forest agreements. The government has been less than co-operative in providing a lot of information on forest agreements between the federal and provincial governments. We have tried to make some efforts in that regard in terms of Bill C-29, now passed.

There has been debate in this Chamber and elsewhere about just how effective this government, and in some cases other governments—particularly provincial governments—have been at trying to negotiate those agreements. It has been difficult at times to get information from governments on just how we have progressed in that area.

I cite those two examples, the latter one being an example of why we need an amendment like this, and the first example being an example of some good news where the government accepted, to a certain degree, the logic of providing more information.

I hope that the members opposite will support this amendment. I think it is a good one. I know that in attempting to have a better Parliament and more open government, they will support this amendment.

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the mover of the motion would agree that perhaps there is some concern with the numbering on 5.(1), that perhaps it should be 5.(5).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Algoma, is it 5.(1) or 5.(5)?

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, when I put the amendment, I stated that it would be the page number referred to in the original printing of the bill for the numbering now, and that should be carried over. It may change because we have moved by consent yesterday afternoon to report stage of the bill before we actually had the reprint of it. I think that covers it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is 5.(1). It will be changed.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, it should be the bill reported to the House by the chairman of the standing committee. It would amend that particular version of the bill and perhaps that would change the number. I see the hon. member opposite nodding in agreement. Perhaps that will be checked by the Table.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All right, the Table will check it to make sure that it is right.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak to Motion No. 6. As it is laid out, it is an important motion because it once again gives Parliament an opportunity to have a review process and to look at this legislation.

I think that this is avery important and very fundamental motion, in that it is a fundamental nature of Parliament. There is a real problem these days—certainly it is a perceived problem—that Parliament is becoming irrelevant due to the fact that we seem to be governed as much by executive as by the legislative body of government. This is particularly true in situations of majority governments. When we have majority governments as we have had for the last two terms, it sometimes becomes quite frustrating for parliamentarians on both sides of the House in that they sometimes feel that they do not have as much input as they might have.

Certainly the perception in the rest of the country is exactly that. It is important that Parliament indeed progresses. It does not always progress in these matters; it sometimes in fact regresses. That is the ongoing debate these days with respect to the Standing Orders. The government wishes to make changes to the Standing Orders which many members in the House feel is going to detract from the ability of parliamentarians to perform their legislative duties.

Motion No. 6 is in the same line or the same tenor. It would require the minister to place before Parliament any agreement made pursuant to clause 4, and of course clause 4 is one of the key clauses in Bill C-98. It is the clause under which the government is given authority actually to enter into agreements with the provinces. With Bill C-98 being only enabling legislation, it authorizes the government to enter into agreements with the various provinces. That is outlined in clause 4, that is the authority given. It also sets out some of the principles and so on the government must comply with.

Once the agreement is entered into, once the agreement has been signed and so on, then clause 5.(1) or 5.(5) is important because it will require the minister to lay before Parliament every agreement made pursuant to that clause within 30 days of it being made or, if Parliament is not sitting, the thirtieth day thereafter that Parliament is sitting. That is fundamental. Some other motions will be coming up later on dealing with the same idea of making sure that Parliament has a role to play in this agreement.

We must not forget that this bill is dealing with hundreds of millions of dollars. Canadians today are concerned with how Parliament is spending that money. When we only have an executive controlling a majority government and ruling from its executive position, that causes concern. When we are dealing with a bill such as this one—and, as I say, it is about hundreds of millions of dollars—it is very important, and I think most Canadians would agree that it is important, that Parliament should have some role. In fact the historical reason for Parliament in the first place was to deal with the control of money. We seem to have lost that completely.

I think all Canadians would certainly agree with the direction of a motion that causes Parliament to have more input and certainly more knowledge into exactly how the government is spending its money.

The motion, as other members have said on this side of the House, is fundamental. We would certainly hope and be pleased if government members would support it. I am sure some of its members would agree with it. I would hope that the government sees fit to let the motion stand because it is an important, integral part of the bill.

The motion will allow the bill to be more fully developed, will allow fuller input and a more rational, logical review, understanding, and knowledge of this particular piece of legislation and the agreements with the provinces that flow from it.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I support the motion of my hon. friend, the member for Algoma. The motion before us poses something that is really fundamental to this institution. I think we all recognize that much has to be done and certainly much can be done to improve the public perception and the relevance of the Parliament of Canada and, more specifically, the House of Commons itself.

This motion, which is a very thoughtful motion, simply reads:

> The Minister shall cause to be laid before Parliament every agreement made pursuant to section 4 within thirty days of it being made, or, if Parliament is not sitting, not later than the thirtieth day thereafter that the either the House of Parliament is sitting.

It continues with what I think is a most thoughtful initiative:

> An agreement laid before Parliament pursuant to subsection (1) shall be automatically referred to the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Agriculture.

We recognize that the bill itself requires almost exclusive decision making when it comes to these agreements in support of agriculture being made by the executive and, in a sense, being made by the minister and not before Parliament.

This motion suggests that members of Parliament, at least after the fact, bring in these agreements when they are in fact signed and lay them before the House. Ideally I suppose we would like it to be before the fact, but it sort of makes a small gain in terms of requiring the minister and the government to be accountable to the people of Canada for their actions. That automatically enables all members of Parliament representing all people of Canada to have access to the details of the agreement.

Not only does it do that, but in a sense it provides an element of accountability. The government is saying that it is quite prepared to recognize that these agreements are legitimate, that they have been thoughtfully negotiated and prepared by the various provincial governments and that it has confidence that they will withstand this scrutiny of members of Parliament. That in itself would justify this initiative.

• (1330)

The second part of the motion would then automatically have the agreement laid before the House transferred for examination, analysis, and consideration by the Standing Committee on Agriculture. This makes even more sense because we have members of Parliament who are involved personally in the pursuit of agriculture, who are certainly knowledgeable of the agricultural sector, and more often than not who tend to represent agricultural areas. I look across the way at my hon. friend from Swift Current who for years has played an active role in agricultural issues. I look to my hon. friend from Humboldt. We could go around the House. These are people we all appreciate and recognize to be not only interested but on the whole very knowledgeable about the agricultural sector and the various initiatives that the government brings forward. They bring that special expertise.

What this motion says is that these special agreements will simply be tabled in the House and referred on to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture. There they can be examined.

In the event there was a problem that perhaps the negotiators had not considered or perhaps the provincial negotiators had overlooked in terms of an implication for the country as a whole or for the national government, we would expect members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture to identify those problems. While it may be after the fact, it would be at least a chance to rectify a serious error or problem which might be implicit or inherent in the agreement being considered.

I speak not only in support of but quite frankly enthusiastically in favour of this motion. I would simply like to thank the member for initiating this. I look forward to, again a small step, the House of Commons being relevant in terms of examining important negotiated settlements among provincial and federal governments.

This is agriculture. My hon. friend who represents Prince George—Bulkley Valley has made equal observations in other resource sectors, primarily in his particular areas of interest: forestry and fisheries. Whenever possible we have to ask the government, even after the fact, to be accountable, be up-front, not be afraid to reveal all elements of an agreement, and be able to explain in the standing committee the reasons for particular provisions and so on.

Therefore, with enthusiasm, I support Motion No. 6.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 6 agreed to.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) moved:

That Bill C-98 be amended in Clause 7 by adding immediately after line 27 at page 7 the following:

"(1.1) A producer participating in a net income stabilization account program must be a Canadian citizen or permanent resident."

He said: Mr. Speaker, Motion No. 7 makes a provision in the NISA agreements that require that the producer participating in a Net Income Stabilization Account program must be a Canadian citizen or a permanent resident of Canada.

This is a program that would be judged by some people outside agriculture to be a very generous program. It is designed, I believe, to be a rainy day fund for producers who have a reasonable level of income, are able to put money into the Net Income Stabilization Account, and to receive support from the government not only in matching that contribution but in allowing them to put in a certain amount of funds over and above it to the extent of 20 per cent.

If we take the example of a farmer who has $500,000 worth of eligible production and there were two parties to that production, a husband and wife, then they would be eligible under the NISA program as I understand it. We do not actually have the agreements in front of us, but we have seen some of the publicity and the planning for it. Each one of those would be able to put into that account some $5,000, which would be matched by the government. Then the government would pay prime of commercial rates on the portion that the government puts in and would provide prime or a commercial rate of interest plus 3 per cent on the $5,000 that each spouse put into NISA. This is assuming that they have eligible production costs of $500,000.

On top of that, producers can put in an additional 20 per cent. That means if they had the money—and not many farmers today would have it—they would be eligible. As the hon. member from south western Ontario said, they could borrow the money. They could put in an additional $100,000 and invest it in NISA at prime.

Let us assume that prime right now is 12 per cent. They would be paid 15 per cent by the government. On a $100,000 NISA, over and above the regular 2 per cent that they can contribute, they would be able to contribute another 20 per cent. If commercial or prime rates were 12 per cent or 15 per cent, they would be earning $15,000.

This is designed to provide stability over the long haul combined with the Gross Revenue Insurance Program. For many of the horticultural crops it will probably be extremely difficult or perhaps impossible to develop a plan that will qualify for GRIP. NISA has that advantage.

The other advantage is that even though the government says in its preamble to the objectives of the legislation that it is going to be acceptable in international fora, I do not know of anybody who really believes that the revenue guarantee part of GRIP will not be subject to attack by the Americans.

We have already seen this morning a report from one group, Wharton Economics Forecasting Associates. It is projecting a 10 per cent increase in cropping. Of course it is always a sore point with the Americans that we have support programs but we do not reduce our acreage.

The revenue guarantee side of GRIP, I believe in the long haul, will be subject to attack by the Americans. They attack everything that we do, whether countervail or some other activity, especially if it threatens their producers. That is one of the advantages of NISA. It probably would not be subject to that because it is neutral with regard to production and so on.

Mr. Speaker, I just walked you through a program that can be very beneficial in stabilizing producers' incomes. Some would say very stable. However, the question is: Do we want to extend that benefit to non-citizens and non-residents of Canada?

If we have a couple farming in North Dakota and farming in Saskatchewan, are they to be given this program which can be very beneficial to Canadian farmers and paid for from the Consolidated Revenue Fund? Do we want to extend that to non-residents and non-citizens of the country?

It seems to me that many Canadians would say this is a program that is very beneficial, it provides prime plus 3 per cent, it provides a fund where a farmer can put 20 per cent, plus 5 per cent if the funds are available, that this kind of program should not be extended beyond permanent residents or citizens of Canada.

I hope that the government sees the wisdom of trying to keep this support and assistance available primarily to permanent residents and/or citizens of Canada, as my motion proposes.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): I rise to support the motion proposed by the member for Algoma. It applies to the NISA or Net Income Stabilization Account, and it would add a new subclause to clause 7. With the new numbering system that would become 7.(2).

This particular proposal would require that a producer participating in the Net Income Stabilization Account program must be a Canadian citizen or permanent resident.

It seems to me that this makes eminent sense, not only for the reasons spelled out by my hon. friend who just completed speaking, but it would reduce the liability of the taxpayers of Canada for making viable the incomes of farmers who may not even live in Canada but in fact operate south of the border, or perhaps other combinations. We are aware of some of these kinds of situations.

The other thing it does is assure Canadian taxpayers, who are going to be financing this particular program quite substantially, that their dollars are being recycled to Canadian citizens or permanent residents of this country.

The program at issue here sets up two accounts, an A account and a B account. At the end of each tax year a producer has the option of contributing up to 2 per cent of his net revenue for that year into an A account. The government will match those funds in the B account. The producer has an additional option, if he so chooses, to put an additional 20 per cent of his net revenue for that year into his A account; however, the Government of Canada will not match that contribution in the B account.

For purposes of administration, these two accounts are then effectively combined and any interest accruing to that account becomes the property of the participating farmer. That interest is guaranteed by the agreements to be prime plus 3 per cent. So it is a fairly enticing rate of interest that this combined account will bear, and that interest will be paid by the Government of Canada out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

In this program, from what we understand of the agreements that are being reached, it would be possible, according to the witnesses we had from the department, for a married couple to set up two NISA accounts for their farm—one for each, husband and wife.

In a multiple ownership operation, either incorporated or organized under a co-op charter or under a communal charter, as some of the Hutterite colonies and church organizations are, there could be up to five participants for GRIP and other stabilization purposes. As I recall, this applied as well to the NISA account. I do not recall if five couples were involved whether they could divide the NISA account twice at the family level for each couple, but I believe that would be possible.

The amount of funds Canada is guaranteeing under this particular part of the program, which is only a third or a quarter of the total bill as the rest of the bill deals with a GRIP account which is the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, whereby farmers purchase insurance subsidized by both provincial and federal taxpayers, to guarantee a 15-year moving average price for products or, we are led to believe, a price guarantee that is based on some formula for cost of production, using a Quebec or British Columbia model. There has been no apparent agreement under that particular part of the proposal, so we have nothing we can talk about under that particular option.

The third option is for those products covered under tripartite, such as beef, pork and, I believe, mutton. A few field crops will eventually be transferred under GRIP, but at the moment that particular group of producers is getting two-thirds of their premiums paid by federal and provincial governments combined.

There is a considerable amount of liability on provincial and federal taxpayers and I think it only makes sense, and the people of Canada would consider that it made sense, to only give that kind of assistance to people who are permanent residents of the country and/or Canadian citizens.

I commend this to the House and hope that we will get passage of this particular motion.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, previous speakers have already explained in detail how the NISA account works, so I am not going to go into that.

As I understand this motion, it was introduced out of respect to taxpayers, both at the provincial level and at the federal level.

Remember, when it comes to NISA and to GRIP, there are three separate partners. There is the federal taxpayer, the provincial taxpayer and the producer. When it comes to NISA, I think it would be fair to say that it is a fairly generous plan and those producers who can use it will get a reasonable return. But we do have to be responsible. We have to show respect for the other players in this arrangement, the provincial taxpayers and the federal taxpayers. I think they would be saying something like this: "Yes, we want to help farmers. We want to go to the limit in helping farmers, but there is a limit and we would draw the line"—and I am now alluding to these taxpayers—"at Canadian citizens or residents. In other words, if you are not a resident of this country, sorry, but this NISA account will not be available".

As the previous speaker said, this makes a lot of sense and again, I think it shows prudence on this side of the House. That is all I have to say.

• (1350)

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise this afternoon to speak to this motion. This is a good motion put forward by my colleague from Algoma, which calls upon this House to place some limitations on the possible spending that may occur under this bill.

A number of motions have been put forward dealing with that very issue. It is an issue which is of concern to Canadians, the idea of taxation, the idea of a deficit and the idea of the national debt. We must remind Canadians and we must remind our colleagues on the other side of the House that we are dealing with a very large program which deals with hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars.

The very last thing we would want to do, I would suggest, is to allow a non-Canadian citizen or someone who is not a resident of Canada to somehow take advantage of this program. That would not be useful or serve the purpose of any Canadian anywhere in this country. This motion is an attempt to limit this.

The motion is particularly concerned with the NISA account. As we know, the NISA account is designed as an individual account for the individual producer, so that in years when his or her income drops below a given level, the producer will be able to access the account.

The idea behind this account is that the government will provide matching grants up to a given level. That is encouraging for a producer in itself, but an even more encouraging factor is that producers will receive interest 3 per cent above the going rate. It will give the producer an extra incentive to put money into this account. It will end up being a savings account for the producer and an account that the producer can access at any time.

As the government puts money into the individual producer's account, that is the producer's own money, in essence. He or she is restricted in their access to that fund by a number of factors. As I said, the annual income of the farmer must be below a given level before they can access the account. They also have access if they quit farming or if they retire. They have access to that account which can help with respect to retirement.

It would be most unfortunate if non-residents or non-Canadian citizens were able to acquire that type of fund for their own purposes. In fact, there are ways potentially that this could be taken advantage of in a unfortunate fashion. Under this account, if a farm is incorporated, for example, and the company has shares owned by various individuals, that company will have a NISA account. It is very easy for a company to simply dissolve itself. Of course, if the company dissolved itself, the money in that NISA account would then be divided among the shareholders of the particular company.

If that should happen, then that account is dispersed among the shareholders. Certainly if there are shareholders who are non-Canadians, they will be able to take advantage of that program.

There is also another possibility. Most people are honest people, but there are those who are not.

There are ways to take advantage of it. If there is a way for non-Canadians to take advantage of it that would be especially tragic. An individual producer cannot access that fund unless their income drops below a certain level or, they simply get out of farming. That is the only way they can access that account.

A corporation has a much bigger advantage, which is, as I said, that it can dissolve itself. Therefore, a farming corporation can acquire money into the NISA account, simply dissolve, take the money out, pay it to the shareholders and then turn around and form another company. There is a potential for some unfortunate advantages to take place in this. It is something that the government, I hope, is going to do something about. Certainly if there are non-residents who are involved in that company, this motion would certainly address that concern.

I think this is part of the larger concern of the need to have reasonable taxation and reasonable spending by the government. What we want is a government that is going to deal with the people's money with some care. Certainly the government is always making much of the fact that it is very fiscally responsible and a good financial manager. Well, this is a motion that the government would want to accept and adopt because it formally puts in place legislation that is going to block that particular loophole.

In various provinces throughout this country there have been concerns with foreign residents and non-Canadians involved in agriculture. It is an important principle that we try to keep agriculture for Canadians. In supporting and promoting rural communities and farm families, which the government agrees is important, it is certainly important it excludes support and promotion of foreign residents or non-residents and non-Canadians.

I would like to say that I support this motion. I do hope that the government can also support it. I think it is commendable that the member for Algoma has brought it forward. It is a good motion and I would certainly urge the government to support it because if we are going to maintain some credibility in this country it is motions like this that must be passed. It is important that we keep that in mind, after all we are the servants of the Canadian public and if we are going to do service to the Canadian public we have to certainly keep account of proper spending and proper policies.

I think my time goes to two o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I am wondering how much time I have before two o'clock. I see Mr. Speaker holding his hand up. I do have more comments to make, but—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If you would like me to put the motion you have about 30 seconds.

Mr. Laporte: I would just like to conclude by saying that this is an important motion and should not be taken lightly. I have noticed that there have been no government speakers on this motion. I would like to see someone speak on it and indicate the importance of it and the fact that it is a valuable addition to this piece of legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt will have the floor after three o'clock.

DORVAL INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise in the House today to recognize the special efforts of Transport Canada and the Minister of State, my colleague from Anjou—Rivière-Des-Prairies.

On Monday, March 18, 1991, the minister announced a $10 million environmental protection project at Dorval's international airport. The airport has experienced some problems relating to the contamination of run-off water containing glycol. This substance, which is used to de-ice the aircraft before take-off, is necessary for aviation safety.

Unfortunately, it can have an impact on the environment, in this instance involving the Bouchard Creek, which drains into Lac St-Louis. The solution announced by the minister calls for the construction of a catchment basin for the surface water and a pumping station for drainage infrastructure. This project is concrete proof of our government's commitment to improving Canada's environment in Dorval and on the shoreline of Lac St-Louis in Lachine. Bravo, Department of Transport.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, today we join with the Canadian Ethnocultural Council to mark United Nations International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, which commemorates the 1960 Sharpville massacre in South Africa, when peaceful demonstrators against apartheid were wounded and killed.

To promote greater racial harmony, the Canadian Association of Broadcasters has launched a massive national campaign under the slogan "On Air for Racial Harmony." The many faces and voices that are our reality must be seen and heard on the airwaves and behind the scenes if the richness of Canada's true multicultural and multiracial population is to be reflected.

The campaign revolved around a series of dramatic radio and TV spots in both official languages, that asks the question: Racism, if you do not stop it, who will? The British Columbia Association of Broadcasters created this vital project, which has won the Media Human Rights Award from B'Nai Brith Canada and today the government's highest honour for initiatives of excellence to promote race relations.

Canada's diversity is its strength and by respecting and appreciating the expression of many cultures, our vision for a strong, united Canada, capable of leading the world toward a more human global village, can and shall be achieved.

RURAL REVITALIZATION DAY

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, today, on the third anniversary of Rural Revitalization Day, a day proclaimed by Rural Dignity of Canada, I rise to reaffirm the commitment of my caucus to the revitalization of our rural communities.

Rural Canadians from across this country, whether in Saskatchewan or Nova Scotia, are losing their communities, their services, their livelihood and their way of life. Rural communities have lost transportation services, education facilities, health care services, post offices and economic opportunities. Successive Liberal and Conservative governments have turned their backs on rural communities and have placed fishing, farming, forestry and single industry towns at great risk.

The gutting of Via Rail, post office closures, cuts to the CBC and removal of support to community newspapers have had a negative impact upon rural communities.

I call upon this government to recognize the negative impact its policies are having on rural Canada, and to reverse those policies before they completely destroy our rural communities. I further call upon this government to treat rural Canadians with the respect and dignity they deserve.

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, we live in a country that is the envy of most of the world, but today, in spite of that, we are risking it all by telling each other that it has to be our way or the doorway.

Who speaks for Canada in this debate? Mr. Speaker, that is your job, that is my job, that is the job of every Canadian who truly loves this country. I believe that real unity is not going to be found in reason, or in logic, or in a new constitutional arrangement or even, for that matter, in a break-through in understanding. Rather, it is going to be found in the hearts of Canadians themselves, especially in a return to our traditional Canadian attitude, an attitude that some describe as disinterested tolerance and benevolent ignorance, but otherwise known as live and let live.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in this House to urge a full public and comprehensive investigation into Monday's tragic collision of a Canadian Coast Guard ice-breaker, the Griffon and a local fishing trawler, The Captain K near Port Dover in my riding.

Further, I urge that if a criminal investigation is required, it be undertaken by a group outside the purview of the Canadian Coast Guard. People in my riding feel that there is a perceived conflict of interest in this case by having the Canadian Coast Guard undertake a criminal investigation into an accident to which they were a party.

I urge today that the Minister of Transport take this under investigation, come back to this House at his earliest convenience and explain what procedures he is going to take in this investigation.

INTERNATIONAL DAY FOR THE ELIMINATION OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, March 21 is no longer a day like any other. Here and in other countries, it has become the International Day for the Elimination of Discrimination, to commemorate the tragic incident in which so many people were killed 31 years ago.

Just because this incident is now history and took place thousands of kilometres away does not mean we should not feel concerned, every one of us.

Although Canada enjoys a reputation for openness and tolerance, we are not immune to racism, far from it.

We must look at the facts. There are Canadians who do not enjoy the same opportunities as everyone else for the simple reason that their skin is not white. This is nothing new.

We cannot undo mistakes made in the past, but we can do something about the future. It is up to each and everyone of us to do what is necessary to banish racism from our society. We must learn to know and understand each other, and we must deal with this problem together.

NATIONAL SUMMIT CONFERENCE ON TRANSLATION

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, a National Summit Conference on Translation in Canada which was to have been held in Ottawa in May has been abruptly scrapped by the Secretary of State.

Budgetary restraint has been given as the excuse. However, tens of thousands of tax dollars have been wasted in cancellation costs. A rescheduled date for the conference remains in limbo.

This conference was to have brought together the leading figures in the field of translation in order to help the profession prepare to address the problems of fiscal restraint and to plan for a future where spending cuts, lack of graduates and increased demand are the reality.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I therefore join the Canadian Union of Professional and Technical Employees in asking the minister to reconsider his decision and defend official bilingualism. I ask him to allow the summit to proceed as scheduled.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, it has been said that in politics, perception is reality. That being said, the words from the CBC Journal of March 19 are inexcusable.

The CBC created the impression that the United States is pressuring Saddam Hussein into humiliating ceasefire conditions.

It is time to clear the air.

First, it was the United Nations Security Council that drew up the conditions of the ceasefire, and not the United States. It was the United Nations resolution 686 of March 2 that called on Iraq to comply with the terms of the ceasefire.

Second, surely the terms are not humiliating nor are they inappropriate considering the actions of Hussein. It was Saddam Hussein's aggression that caused the loss of innocent life and destruction of property in Kuwait and Israel. It was Saddam Hussein who senselessly set aflame over 500 oil wells and poured millions of barrels of crude into the gulf.

Therefore, the CBC should be ashamed of its careless journalism and misleading statements.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, the House has already been informed that today, March 21, is a special day. It is the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination and an occasion to recognize positive accomplishments in the campaign against racism.

Last year, the minister's awards for excellence in race relations were established to pay tribute to individuals, organizations and corporations which have demonstrated innovative and exceptional achievements in combating racism. On behalf of the Government of Canada and indeed the people of Canada, I want to say how proud I am to recognize this year's award recipients: The British Columbia Association of Broadcasters; The Canadore College of Applied Arts and Technology; The Halton Regional Police Service; Dr. Frances Henry; The Vancouver Youth Theatre; Mrs. Dorothy Abike Wills; Dr. Fred Wien; and La Commission Scolaire Sainte-Croix.

I want to express my thanks to these individuals and organizations and to the many hundreds of others whose achievements all too often go without recognition. Their efforts represent a profound commitment to the values of our society. Together we can stop racism.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have been in this House for along time and I never thought I would live to see this: Canadian children giving their piggy bank savings to the finance minister to reduce the deficit while Canada's biggest and richest corporations looked on. Bay Street speculators, corporate free loaders and their sponsors in Ottawa have transformed Canada into a corporate welfare state by not paying their fair share of taxes.

Yesterday on the same platform as the children was Tom D'Aquino, chairman of the organization representing Canada's largest and richest corporations. His membership includes those who are paid up to $60 million in government commissions to sell government bonds. Also on the platform was the president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, and this is what he said yesterday: "Ever thought why a new born baby cries? They're cold, they're wet, they're hungry", and I might add they cry because they are born in Brian Mulroney's Canada.

KELOWNA, BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to thank Chatelaine magazine which in this month's issue has proclaimed what constituents in Okanagan Centre have known for many years. It has declared Kelowna, British Columbia, as the best city in Canada to live in. It cited the balmy weather, great recreational activities and community festivals as the main attractions and there is certainly much more.

It is also interesting to note that the top six most desired cities to live in are all represented by government members.

I would like to take this opportunity to invite all Canadians, and especially all hon. members, to come and visit us in Kelowna and find out why Chatelaine has declared us number one.

POLAND

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, Poland is grateful to the United States and the Paris Club of Nations to forgive large portions of her international debt.

Yesterday, Lech Walesa was told by the U.S. President that 70 per cent of the Polish debt owed to the United States would be forgiven. Canada, on the other hand, stands firm on its own Polish debt plan. The federal government will not write off any of the Polish debt owed to Canada outright, but will window dress by adjusting interest rates.

Since the Nazi occupation of Poland, followed by the oppressive occupation of the country by the communist regime, Polish citizens and their economy continue to suffer. As other defeated nations received aid after the Second World War through reconstruction funding under the Marshall Plan, Poland was left out in the cold.

Surely, Poland, our faithful ally and the first country to overthrow the communist regime in eastern Europe, is owed a debt for its long and hard struggle for democracy.

I say Canada should be doing a better job in helping Poland adjust to its new-found freedom. Poland does not want a hand-out. Poland needs a helping hand.

EDUCATION

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, very few Canadians would disagree that education is the foundation for a civilized and prosperous society. In our search for national strategies to address social and economic goals, it seems compelling that we should also have a national strategy on education to help us reach those goals.

There can be no doubt that education is a provincial responsibility. Yet there is a national strategic interest. Already the federal government makes large contributions to Canada's educational system in a number of ways. More recently, in fact, the federal government has received increasing criticism that its contributions are insufficient.

In the context of these considerations, I intend to encourage our federal government to seriously examine the prospect of consolidating its present educational activities and budgets into a new department, one that will also develop and nurture a national strategy for education.

Existing commitments in areas such as science, technology, manpower training and minority languages would hopefully be enhanced in such a specialized milieu and more important, there would be a new national dimension to Canada's quest for education.

Oral Questions

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, two years ago 44,000 tonnes of crude oil spewed into the environment from the Exxon Valdez, creating North America's worst oil spill.

There was never any accounting of the death and devastation this caused to animal and plant life. No amount of money will ever bring them back.

Today in Vancouver, a citizens' group, "Call for Inquiry" is demanding the Prime Minister implement the recommendations of the government's own Public Review Panel on Tanker Safety.

The report calls for the double-hulling of oil tankers, upgrading Coast Guard operations, including tanker inspection and policing waters to enforce compliance.

The price tag for implementing all 107 recommendations in the report, after a levy on marine oil product transport is $600 million, less than half of what Exxon just said it would pay to avoid a criminal trial for just one spill.

The government said no to studying our coastal environment to understand the impact of spills, but is paying an American company to do exactly that off the Persian Gulf.

I call on the government to protect our future and bring forward a plan to implement the recommendations of the report.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, last year the Prime Minister said that the CBC would reach "new heights of accomplishments" under the guidance of Gerard Veilleux and Patrick Watson. Here is a comprehensive list of those so-called accomplishments.

Accomplishment No. 1—The elimination of the national unity clause from CBC's mandate during Canada's worst constitutional crisis.

Accomplishment No. 2—The closing of two television stations in Matane, Quebec, and in Goose Bay, Newfoundland.

Accomplishment No. 3—The elimination of eight local television broadcasts which include Sept Iles, Rimouski, Toronto, Windsor, Calgary, Saskatoon, Sydney and Corner Brook, Newfoundland.

Accomplishment No. 4—Putting 1,100 employees of CBC out of work.

Accomplishment No. 5—Cutting the CBC budget by $108 million with the possibility of a further $50 million cut.

Accomplishment No. 6—The elimination of French local newscasts and programming for francophones in southern and northern Ontario.

It is indeed quite a list of accomplishments and the only that is left to complete is the resignation of Veilleux and Watson and the Prime Minister. But even if that was to happen, I am afraid there would be no media to broadcast it.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Whatever the details of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission's final report may be, the constitutional agenda will be a real challenge for Canada. The Allaire report has already been released, and the formula involving first ministers meeting behind closed doors has been discredited. From day to day, the Prime Minister seems to be improvising on issues as basic as a national referendum. Furthermore, the Special Joint Committee, the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee, does not have the right to examine anything beyond the amending formula. Throughout the country, people are beginning to despair of our ability to stay together.

When will the Prime Minister give Parliament a chance to examine thoroughly all our constitutional alternatives?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has appointed the Spicer Commission, and we also appointed Beaudoin-Edwards, the joint committee which is doing important work on a vital issue, namely the amending formula. It was also agreed that we would wait for the Allaire report and the Bélanger–Campeau Commission's report which will be released very shortly.

Meanwhile, the Liberal caucus is doing its homework. The Leader of the NDP has made some important speeches, I have made several myself, and we are getting ready for a broad debate on this question. We would greatly appreciate any specific ideas the hon. member might have.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, this is not an issue for political partisanship. This is an issue for Parliament.

• (1420)

Whatever their political stripe, Canadians could not help but to cry out last night and this morning when they heard the tones of desperation emanating from the Spicer commission. Canadians are losing hope in our ability to survive as a country. What they desperately want now is democratic elected national leadership. Canadians do not want a closed door process to replace the work of Parliament.

I ask the Prime Minister once again, cognizant of the limited mandate of Beaudoin–Edwards, which is only allowed to look at the amending formula, will he give the Parliament of Canada the right, the chance, and the responsibility to examine all constitutional avenues in a manner similar to that which has been adopted by many provincial legislatures?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, obviously there is concern and dismay in Canada as there often is in all industrialized democracies. No government ever gets it perfect. There are hills and valleys in the evolution of the life of a nation, and there are moments of great challenge and moments of great opportunity.

For not the first time Canada is facing an important constitutional crisis, which is why we began the process by trying to improve on the situation that governments had used in the past, namely quite intimate consultations with provincial premiers. To open up the process with the Spicer commission, that was point number one.

Point number two was to deal with a fundamental flaw in the Constitution that we inherited, namely the amending process, which is why that important part of the work had to be done by Beaudoin–Edwards.

We indicated that we would be waiting for Belanger–Campeau and for the Allaire report. That period of time has not precluded the leader of the NDP or myself or a number of others from making what we believe are perhaps constructive contributions to the national debate.

I have already indicated, in response to the member on previous occasions, that when this is in we would look forward to an opportunity of providing Parliament with a greater and perhaps more structured opportunity to participate directly in this kind of a debate, which is a nation building exercise of the highest importance.

There were nine opposition days available to the opposition leading up to this where members of the Official Opposition could give us the benefit of their views on this, using some of these opposition days. I think that would be a major contribution to the process regarding the unity of Canada.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, with respect, we are not talking about the hills and valleys of the government; we are talking about the survival of the country. I think this is one area where all political parties can set aside their political labels and work for the survival of Canada.

The Prime Minister must realize that we do not have much time. The constitutional time bomb is already ticking. I would like to know when he intends to announce a specific policy here in Parliament that will give all elected representatives in the Parliament of Canada a chance to set a constitutional agenda for saving Canada. When will he table his plan for the Parliament of this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already asked the hon. member to provide her own ideas and suggestions, and I already said that following the Bélanger–Campeau Commission's report, the Allaire report and other commissions' reports, we would find a parliamentary formula that would—

Some hon. members: Answer the question!

Mr. Mulroney: The Liberals want an answer. I am trying to answer, Mr. Speaker, but they keep interrupting me. I am trying to answer an important question that was put by the Leader of the Opposition.

The hon. member should not let herself be traumatized by deadlines and agendas set by others. We have a country. That country is Canada. We are all Canadians, whether we are francophones or anglophones, and no legislature or national assembly, and certainly no political party of any stripe, is going to say that after such and such a date, Canada is finished. That is not true. Canada will survive because we are going to work together to make it survive.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): My question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday the minister of trade said that the inflated level of the Canadian dollar was largely the result of foreign investment in Canada. However, the Minister of Finance knows that four-fifths of the foreign capital flowing into Canada is simply seeking higher interest rates. Only one-fifth is direct investment.

Will the minister now recognize that the inflated level of the Canadian dollar, which is so damaging to Canadian exports, is a result of the government's own monetary policies, and that those policies, contrary to yesterday's claim by the minister of trade, have actually undermined real investment in Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to deny that the monetary policy of the country has an effect on the Canadian dollar, the level of the Canadian dollar.

However, I would point out to the member that in the last eight months there have been a number of changes in monetary policy which have resulted in a 4 per cent drop in interest rates, as well as a narrowing in the interest rate spread between the United States and Canada from a peak of 5.5 per cent to the current level of about 3.75 per cent on the 90-day commercial paper rate.

There have been significant changes in monetary conditions. These have been translated by the market into a drop in interest rates.

My hon. friend says that he would like to see a lower level of the Canadian dollar, but the market is operating in a way that is contrary to his wishes. Unfortunately his wishes cannot always be reflected in what the market does.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): I have to assume, Mr. Speaker, from the minister's answer that the market is not responding in the way that he would wish either.

It is really the government's high interest rate policy that has resulted in the situation Canada faces today. That is the real reason for the gap between U.S. and Canada interest rates which has led to the situation where a growing portion of our national debt is now held by foreigners. Canada, as a result, loses a degree of freedom in its interest rate policy.

How does the minister propose to close the interest rate gap with the United States and to achieve that export led growth that he spoke of in the budget when an increasing amount of our debt is held by foreigners?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take issue with the conclusion that my hon. friend just drew about what I said in my first response.

The point I was making is that there are many other factors affecting the level of the Canadian dollar than simply the interest rate spread between the United States and Canada or a certain level of in-flow of capital. Many other factors are taken into account here, and that is what sets the level of the Canadian dollar.

My hon. friend says that we have an increasing amount of foreign debt or debt to foreigners. The level of the federal government debt to foreigners is in around the 17 per cent to 18 per cent level. In fact, as the exchange reserves have built up in recent months, we have been paying down the level of foreign debt, debt to non-residents that is denominated in currencies other than the Canadian dollar.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Because of a lack of leadership on the part of the Prime Minister and this government, the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, the Parti Quebecois and the Quebec Liberals are setting the whole country's constitutional agenda with their deadline. This round of constitutional talks must succeed.

Could the Prime Minister tell the House today what he will do to reach a consensus that would include Quebec, the West, the Maritimes and all other regions of this country, before this deadline?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I already told my hon. friend that she should not make any hasty assumptions. On my way here, I was told that the "consensus" in the Quebec National Assembly remained fragile and uncertain.

So I don't know whether what we read in the newspapers yesterday and today will turn out to be a correct estimate. I have no idea. This is one commission of inquiry among several that are going to report. It is an important commission, I agree, but there are commissions sitting in other provinces, for the same purpose.

So, how are we going to maintain the unity of this country? Well, we intend to involve parliamentarians and other Canadians in a vast dialogue and debate, while of course emphasizing the benefits that all francophone and anglophone Canadians have enjoyed by being part of Canada this wonderful country, as Mr. Bourassa said for 123 years. Canadians want to stay together. They also want changes, some of them sweeping, some less so. However, if you give Quebecers a real choice, a choice between independence and Canada, they will choose Canada, ten times out of ten!

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I agree with the Prime Minister that what we want to do is to see the results of the many commissions that are going on across Canada. At the same time, it is the responsibility of the Prime Minister and of this government to create a Canada that people want to belong to, that people want to participate in. Clearly there has been a feeling of exclusion for many Canadians in various regions of this country.

We know what the position of the Government of Quebec is. It has made it very clear. I ask the Prime Minister today to give us the position of the Government of Canada. Canadians have a right to know what the Prime Minister's thinking is on this issue and where the Prime Minister stands for bringing about national unity, given that the Government of Quebec seems to be supporting a date of 1992 for a referendum in Quebec.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I had a position that would satisfy all Canadians and guarantee the unity of the country, I would give it to my hon. friend and that hopefully would end the debate that has been going on for 123 years.

A hundred years ago, Sir Wilfrid Laurier stood in this House and predicted at that time that he feared that Canada would not last another month because of regional problems, linguistic tensions, and challenges to minorities of various kinds. Sir Wilfrid anticipated the early demise of Canada. It did not happen because of the will of Canadians to live together.

There are all kinds of Canadians—a couple in this House—predicting the end of Canada, and they are going to be as wrong as they were a hundred years ago.

There but for the grace of an indexed pension we would have a unanimous House.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I think many of us in this House and all of us in this party are in agreement with the Prime Minister that we want to see this country stay together, that we want to make this country a home for everyone—anglophones, francophones, aboriginal people. Surely Canadian unity is more than just the Constitution. It is the kind of equality that people feel in the economy, in the social agenda, in the environmental agenda.

Yesterday the Prime Minister was talking about a possible referendum, but surely a vote on the future of this country is more than just a vote on the Constitution.

Can the Prime Minister commit today that Canadians will have a chance to vote in a national election before the Quebec deadline, because that is determining the future of the country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the NDP is urging me for an election. Could it possibly be because she is declining swiftly in the polls and would like me to get it over with before the decline is total?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Now I have to wait for a while before they change.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has made some very eloquent speeches in asking for a strong central government. Surely she would not want a strong central government and yet ask me to concede to the provincial legislature of Quebec the right of setting our next election date.

BANKRUPTCIES

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday the government released devastating figures concerning business and personal bankruptcies for the month of February. As a direct result of this government's economic mismanagement, bankruptcies are up a record 68 per cent: in Ontario, Canada's economic heartland, 2,383 bankruptcies; in Quebec, a province already devastated by this recession, 2,061 bankruptcies.

Since the Minister of Finance continues to accept no sense of responsibility for these economic casualties, will the Prime Minister recognize the human tragedy behind these figures? What measures will he introduce to stop this tidal wave of bankruptcies, and stop it now?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what the recent budget is designed to do. We have put in place a number of policies designed to get interest rates down, and down on an ongoing basis, whether it is the legislated spending caps, the wage policies that we are following, the policies to get the deficit down and to take pressure off interest rates, or the inflation targets which will lower the rate of inflation and, as the rate of inflation comes down, so will the rate of interest.

These are policies that all work in a very integrated fashion to address the precise problem my friend is raising in the House today, and that is to get interest rates down because that is the best way we can help people avoid a bankruptcy.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, those comments are cold comfort to the seven individuals or companies that will go bankrupt today during the hour in which we have Question Period.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In the 392 days since this minister was appointed over 64,000 companies and individuals have gone bankrupt. That is more than 165 bankruptcies per day. All of this is happening under an antiquated Bankruptcy Act that offers little or no protection for workers' wages, pensions, and benefits.

When will the minister stop paying lip service to this very, very, very serious problem and introduce in this House the much awaited, much heralded new bankruptcy legislation?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I will ascribe this error to the hon. member's youth, but in fact his party tried three times to introduce a new Bankruptcy Act, and it failed every time. I may add that the last few months I was busy consulting with all—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I spent enough time during the past few months, trying to obtain the broadest possible consensus—

Mr. Plamondon: How much did it cost?

Mr. Blais: —in the business community and in labour circles. We met just about everyone in this country to ensure that the amendments we introduced would be in direct response to the needs of Canadians as they relate to the Bankruptcy Act. I hope that when I table a bill in the weeks to come, you will be the first to make a commitment, on behalf of your government, to support it, on behalf of—

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It too concerns record bankruptcies, this time in the trucking industry.

The minister is well aware that the industry which employs over 600,000 Canadians is fighting for its very survival. Over 1,400 Canadian trucking companies have gone into bankruptcy since 1988, the year this government introduced deregulation of the trucking industry.

Will the minister now protect the remaining trucking companies and trucking jobs in Canada by completely rejecting American cabotage, thus allowing American trucks to operate freely and fully in Canada, something which would drive our Canadian trucks right off the road for good?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the issue of cabotage by American truckers came up last spring. We conducted, along with Canada Employment and the province of Ontario, extensive blitzes on cabotage to see if it was in fact taking place. There were perhaps one dozen charges laid, but there was no evidence that cabotage was taking place in Ontario and Manitoba to any great extent.

I appreciate what my hon. friend says. There are difficulties in the trucking industry. We have a series of some eight or nine studies presently under way in conjunction with the trucking industry and the major stakeholders. They are all on the striking committee. I think it is well in hand and we are making every effort to address the problem.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. He is considering the introduction of cabotage not only on the air side but also in the trucking industry. I return to the same minister. He will know that both the Canadian Trucking Association and Freight Carriers Association of Canada have stated to him very clearly and emphatically that Canadian trucks are unable to compete head on with American truck carriers.

Given that Canadian trucking companies face higher labour, operating and tax costs compared to their American counterparts, why does the minister persist in putting our Canadian trucking industry on a fatal collision course? Have we not lost enough companies and enough Canadian jobs as it is?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will know that trucking regulation is basically a provincial matter. We stepped into it last spring in an effort to assist the trucking industry. We are working in co–operation with the stakeholders in the industry to take a hard look at the issues facing the industry.

I have told my hon. friend that the studies are under way. When they are available in May, we will make them public. We will know what the issues are and how to address them.

My hon. friend hasn't any more better ways of fixing the trucking industry than he did in 1983 when he helped Maislin Transport.

VISIBLE MINORITIES

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

This government has no mandate to speak for ethnocultural groups who were completely excluded from past constitutional negotiations, so the Prime Minister perhaps should start thinking about an election.

On this International Day for the Elimination of Racism, in view of the inadequate representation and the inadequate promotion of visible minorities and native persons in government departments, including in the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship where there are no managers and few permanent staff who are people of colour, I want to ask the Prime Minister if his government will now introduce mandatory employment equity legislation to end this systemic discrimination against persons of colour?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is aware that the government has had in place since 1983 a very full program. It is in operation and has been improved by us. We have set aside $90 million and 2,115 person-years have been authorized to bolster employment equity for each of the four groups.

There are difficult problems, of course, but one decision we have taken within the administration, which I believe will have some impact, is to tell managers that their evaluations in the future will take this into account in a much greater way.

JAMES BAY AGREEMENT

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in committee this morning Chief Billy Diamond served notice that the James Bay Cree Nation intends to separate from Quebec in the event that Quebec separates from Canada. It was a virtual declaration of independence.

Chief Diamond also gave notice that beginning this spring the Crees will dismantle Hydro Quebec's power poles and transmission lines if Canada and Quebec continue to refuse to respect their obligations to his people as spelled out in the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement.

Will the Prime Minister now recognize the urgency and the seriousness of the aboriginal rights issue and take steps immediately to involve Canada's aboriginal peoples at the highest levels in Canada's constitutional discussions?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, we are quite aware of the concerns of the Cree and Quebec. I am proud that the Cree people want to stay within Canada, and believe in the future of Canada. We will continue to take their concerns into consideration.

ENVIRONMENT CANADA

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Twenty-eight of the thirty scientists now in training at Environment Canada will be declared redundant, just four weeks before they finish their nine-month course in meteorology.

When the government does not have enough money for health programs, education, research and development and social programs, how can it justify wasting hundreds of thousands of dollars and the precious time of these 30 young Canadians, when we don't even have the jobs for which they were trained?

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as all members of this House know, Canada today faces a national debt of nearly $400 billion and an annual deficit of some $30 billion. Unlike the member opposite, everyone in this country knows that the origin of this debt lies very clearly in the foolish and unnecessary spending of that party when they were in government in the 1970s.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Clark (Brandon Souris): I would also like to indicate to the hon. member that the meteorologists in training to whom she has referred will not in fact be without employment when they graduate this spring. They will be given other employment opportunities within the Atmospheric Environment Services and they will be given opportunities as meteorologists as soon as vacancies occur.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. These 28 meteoroligists are only a few of thousands of employees for whom the only protection available against immediate termination is the personnel restructuring policy. Since this policy expires ten days from now, does the minister intend to extend the policy until a new policy is negotiated? Or does he intend to have no policy at all for employees whose employment will be terminated?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will be glad to hear that we are involved in intensive negotiations and that in a few days I will probably have some very good news for her.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Earlier this week, the Canadian Human Rights Commission declared that our most pressing human rights problem was the plight of Canadian aboriginal people. Ironically, this week the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development cut $20 million of social services money destined for aboriginal people in Manitoba.

Will the Prime Minister stand up and stop this nonsense and show a commitment to the aboriginal people by reinstating that $20 million destined for Winnipeg's poorest people?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, the changes in the funding to Manitoba for Indian people off-reserve is something that has been under discussion now for some 18 months with the province of Manitoba. There is no intention to immediately cut the funding off. We are in negotiations with the province. The funding that will be taken from those dollars will go to aboriginal people on reserve, which is our responsibility and we intend to make sure that the money goes there for their welfare.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister.

That answer cuts corners in the most amazing way. First of all, the minister from the provincial government describes the so-called negotiations as "a heavy-handed approach to this issue", and finds it to be "totally inexcusable".

Second, the money is not to stay in Manitoba; the money can be spent anywhere across the country.

Manitoba has been under attack from this government for the last six years. It has lost money in the core area initiative, it has lost money in the northern development agreement. When is this government going to stop attacking native people in Manitoba and give them a chance to independence and dignity?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, we are not attacking the Indian people in Manitoba or anywhere else in this country. We are working very hard to ensure that there is an improvement in their living conditions. Moneys will go to the Indian people of Manitoba who live on reserve. It is not a heavy-handed approach. For 18 months the people in Manitoba knew this was going to happen. We have been asking them to discuss it further with us. We are still willing to sit down and talk with them about their concerns.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): My question, Mr. Speaker, is for the Prime Minister.

The Spicer commission reports that Canadians "have lost faith in the political system and its leadership". We can see why when economic equality has decreased under this government, 430,000 people have lost permanent jobs in the last year, and in Toronto the number of people needing to use food banks is up by 60 per cent.

Will the Prime Minister admit that the leadership crisis in Canada is in large part a result of his failed economic policies?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the federal government, I will certainly accept my share of responsibility. I know my hon. friend in fairness will want to impute the rest of the responsibility to the government of Ontario, because these are all shared joint approaches to these various problems. That is the way it works.

We have come through a recession. We are on our way out. Interest rates are down by 4 percentage points. In our first five and half years Canadians created in the environment created by this government 1.6 million new jobs. Of the new jobs—

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Now gone.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. subsidized friend from the NDP from Edmonton says—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: This, Mr. Speaker, is perfect sanctimony.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is somehow typical that the Prime Minister should start out trying to give us an answer in which he suggests the need for co-operation and then turns it into a partisan attack.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Langdon: A partisan attack, I might say, Mr. Speaker, from somebody who is getting his housing for nothing.

Let me put my question for the Prime Minister. He suggested that interest rates are coming down. In fact, we see that the bank rate today has stayed virtually the same, moving one-tenth of a percentage point. No change is significant.

I ask this Prime Minister if he is prepared to stand up and say to the country that there will be a significant drop in interest rates in this country to get people back to work, to stop the bankruptcies across this country and to see to it that our economic problems start to reap some solution.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the guarantee my hon. friend seeks.

The NDP campaign, for example, in another jurisdiction in Ontario with a whole fleet of promises, guaranteed they would be implemented in a matter of months. Now it says that cannot be done. Why would my hon. friend hold us to a standard of perfection when he lets NDP governments get off with something less?

Can I guarantee it? Of course, I cannot guarantee it. Interest rates have come down 4 percentage points. If the federal government contains its expenses, drives its deficit down and keeps it down, and if all provincial governments, particularly the large provincial governments, resist the urge to spend money and start to cut down on their deficits, they will contribute to low interest rates and my hon. friend will have the jobs he wants.

CITIZENS' FORUM ON CANADA'S FUTURE

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

In the interim report of the Spicer Commission today, despite the fact that everything in it is not good news, there are two statements that shine through to me and give me great encouragement.

The report says that there is very clear consensus in all parts of the country about the individual and social values which define Canadian society. The report also says that there is a widespread consensus inside Quebec and elsewhere on national values.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he expects the Spicer Report to be delivered on time so that its recommendations and observations can be incorporated into the draft of our constitutional proposals.

An hon. member: There is a tough one.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): That is a good question.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Is the answer written out?

Mr. Mulroney: In fact, I just happen to have—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the right hon. Prime Minister can tell us what he has and then send it over to his colleagues.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I could go either way. I could quote them from here or they are etched in my memory.

In point of fact, my hon. friend makes an extremely valuable point that is shared by almost all members of this House. Canadians generally are bound together by some fundamental values and common principles, chief among which is the fact that most Canadians understand and fully appreciate the magnificence of what we have accomplished together over 123 years as a civilized, democratic and prosperous nation.

Most Canadians, understanding that, want to work together to build, not to destroy. Because in doing that, we can pass on the magnificence of our heritage to our children and grandchildren.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

On this International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, this government says it is committed to cultural and ethnic diversity in Canada. At the same time that one government department increases immigration targets, the Department of the Minister of State continues to underfund groups and programs which promote understanding among races.

Would the Prime Minister please explain this dichotomy in government policy?

• (1500)

Would he tell this House when his department will really begin to address the issue of racism in Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I am surprised at my hon. friend: when will the government begin to address the problem of racism in Canada? Racism in Canada is not a problem that can be solved only by governments. It is a problem that ought to preoccupy all citizens. Racism is an illness that must be driven from our society. It requires vigilance and constant attention, not only by governments, but also by all members of Parliament.

My friend, the Liberal member from Halifax, says pretty words. She was not here when this government rose in the House of Commons to propose to correct one of the ugliest incidents of racism in the history of Canada, namely, the blot against the citizenship of Japanese Canadians.

We rose, we received the unanimous support of the House of Commons, to correct something that had been neglected for over 40 years. This was done by this government and a prior House. We have begun to address another blot against society, namely, the treatment of Italian Canadians that went uncorrected for 40 years. This government is in the process of dealing with it.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): My supplementary question is to the Minister of Justice. Yesterday the hon. minister told the House that work is proceeding on many changes to the Human Rights Act. Can the minister please tell us what her priority amendments are, and if the recommendations dealing with aboriginal peoples are on her short list.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the review of the Human Rights Act to bring forward a comprehensive proposal of amendments, does not involve a set of priorities. It is a comprehensive approach that I hope will bring forward a very broad range of amendments to that act.

I cannot say I have set priorities in my amendments. I think they are all important. Each one goes in as a small tile in the mosaic of a Canadian structure for a free and accessible society. Therefore, I would not wish to draw any priorities among the amendments that I will be proposing to the act.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with my point of privilege, I wonder if I might ask the question of the Government House leader with regard to House business for tomorrow and next week.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as soon as we get to Government Orders this afternoon, we will proceed with report stage on—it seems a lot of Liberals need to clear their throats. Go ahead, I will wait for you.

As I was trying to say, we will proceed this afternoon with report stage of Bill C-98, the farm income bill, and hopefully get third reading so that that can be in place for the farmers of Canada by the start of the fiscal year, April 1.

I would like to declare tomorrow an allotted day, a supply day, and engage in discussions with my colleague as well as other colleagues in terms of other business.

If we were to proceed with Bill C-98 today, it would be my intention to have the last allotted day on Monday, followed by two days of discussion on the rule changes on which we have all been working co-operatively, I might add, for some time, which will improve the efficiency and effectiveness of this House. Then I propose to have an adjournment, after which the government would return with a Throne Speech in the early part of May. That, of course, requires certain consents and agreements. I look forward to our productive discussions in that regard. Should these not come about, of course, we will be back on April 8.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I was going to give leeway to my House leader, but I am sure he will get up in a few minutes.

The government House leader indicated his plan to seek the adjournment of the House toward the end of next week and not have the House sit in April and for the early part of May.

I wonder if he can give some guarantee to those thousands of Canadian families who are waiting for legislation on the northern tax. I wonder if the government has any intention of introducing that legislation in the next three days.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I have just been talking to my seatmate who has informed me that the drafters of this legislation have several significant welts on their backs and will have the legislation in a position where through agreement we could take care of it within the time frame I have just mentioned.

Of course, this would require the approval of the opposition parties to do that, but I know the hon. member will have no difficulty at all convincing his very co-operative caucus to agree to quick passage of those.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, perhaps while the government House leader is speaking to his seatmate, he could also ask that same seatmate if the legislation that the minister tabled and distributed before the House came back is ready to be presented to the House. He has distributed that legislation to thousands of Canadians. Presumably he could also distribute it to the House of Commons.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on this point of the northern benefit legislation, the draft legislation is out. The Department of Revenue is administering the legislation on the basis of the draft legislation. There will be forms available for taxpayers in early April so that they will be able to take advantage of the changes that are proposed in the northern benefits legislation.

The point that my colleague has just made about passing the legislation is that we will be including this as part of another bill so that if we are going to have this available for the House to deal with at a time before we rise, then we need to have an indication from the opposition parties that that is the way we are going to deal with it. We cannot do this at the last minute.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you would want me to draw your attention and that of the House to the presence in the gallery of the distinguished theologian, Dr. Henri J. Nouwen, who was the speaker at this year's annual parliamentary prayer breakfast.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House of the list I am looking at so that we can see the best way to go through it.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has a question of privilege, and his ranks ahead of others.

The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has a question of privilege.

The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona has a point of order.

The hon. member for Churchill has a point of order.

The hon. member for Kamloops is rising. I will hear the hon. member for a moment.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): I have two quick points before we get to hearing the points of order.

I think it is appropriate to indicate clearly that if the Minister of Finance brings forward a bill regarding northern benefits, he can certainly count on the expeditious movement of that legislation on behalf of this party.

Also, my hon. friend the government House leader indicated a certain sequence of events and that if those events occurred in that order, we would possibly rise next Wednesday until some time in May. The order of events that he laid out is something that at this point we cannot accept. Therefore, I think we will have to say that we will be back on April 8 to continue working.

Mr. Speaker: Keeping in mind the way these matters have come to my attention, I will now hear the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

PRIVILEGE

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the question of privilege of which I have given you notice, given my colleague the Minister of Finance notice, as well as the opposition House leader for the New Democratic Party.

• (1510)

I wish to deal with a serious matter, contempt of this House, a matter which under our proceedings as described in Maingot's Parliamentary Privilege in Canada, Chapter 12, is properly brought before the House as a question of privilege.

On October 10, 1989, you, Sir, stated in Hansard at page 4461:

> I want the House to understand very clearly that if your Speaker ever has to consider a situation like this again, the Chair will not be as generous. This is a case which, in my opinion should never reoccur.

Well, I am saddened to say that this situation has recurred. On March 16, 1991, in newspapers across this country there appeared a government ad for "Canada's Plan For Economic Recovery". I have this ad here which I wish to table with the House and undoubtedly, Mr. Speaker, you will want to review it prior to making your adjudication.

I ask for the indulgence of the House as I outline some important historical points which I believe, and hopefully you too, Sir, are vital to the question I raise today.

On September 25, 1989, the then Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, rose on a point of privilege to protest the use of objectionable ads placed in newspapers across this country in late August 1989. In his able presentation, the then Leader of the Opposition made two substantive points. The first was that the ad prejudiced the proceedings of this House because the issue of the GST was still under debate in committee and the ad presumed the outcome of all parliamentary deliberations.

The second important issue raised was that of contempt of Parliament based on the point that these ads diminished the authority and yes, Sir, the dignity of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, you ruled that the arguments on prejudicing the proceedings of this House did not constitute a breach of privilege based on a thorough analysis and a definition of privilege found in Erskine May and other procedural authorities. However, Sir, on the question of contempt, the Chair stated on page 4460 that it was "in a quandary".

The claim that put the Chair in a quandary was, and I quote from Hansard again at page 4458:

> —the advertisement is a contempt of Parliament because it infers that the House does not have any role to play in the passage of the tax and that it misrepresents to the Canadian public the procedures employed by Parliament in adopting legislation.

You, Sir, succinctly and precisely identified two items in the claim of contempt: namely, intent and content. As regards intent, your doubt was dispelled by the Minister of Justice at the time who at page 3821 of Hansard said that the ads were for informational purposes. This follows the tradition in this House that we accept the words of hon. members' explanations.

However, the Chair found that, with respect to content, and I quote from page 4461 of Hansard:

> —the content was obviously drafted in a cavalier manner; there is an element of confidence, if not boldness—

The Chair concluded its remarks by sending a strong message to the Public Service and in particular, the Department of Finance. The message was that this country is a parliamentary democracy with the House of Commons at the centre of its deliberations. The ad was indeed ill-conceived and did a disservice to the "great traditions of this place".

With those five words "great traditions of this place", we on this side of the House certainly concur.

The responsibility of the Crown's ministers to inform the public, a long-standing convention of parliamentary democracy, ought to be practised on the floor of the House of Commons and not on the pages of national newspapers.

Today, I wish to raise several points as regards the latest ad campaign to sell the budget and, of course, to sell the Minister of Finance.

I wish to present the arguments of the Minister of Justice in September 1989, which might be used today with the present application of contempt of the House. I do this because the situation is more serious procedurally today than it was in September 1989. The Minister of Justice argued in 1989:

> The Finance Committee unanimously recommended to publicize details of the tax if the government were to proceed.
> The budget had already been approved stating the government's intent to implement the GST by January 1, 1991.
> That the Finance Committee was studying the issue and no case could be brought forward to show that it was being impeded.

That was in 1989. Those arguments cannot and ought not to be made in this particular case here today.

First, the finance committee has not unanimously agreed on the contents of the budget. Second, the budget has not been approved by the House and in point of fact, it is still under debate and we are not certain whether or not there will be a vote on the budget before we prorogue in May. Third, the finance committee is not dealing with any of the substance of the budget in this particular case.

The Department of Finance, in placing this advertisement in newspapers across the country, acted as if the House had already passed the budget. It is again a cavalier, deliberate approach contravening the proceedings of this House. Some would call it absolute arrogance in light of your ruling, Mr. Speaker. And not only did the ad presume that this House had passed the budget of February 26, it misrepresented the budget document tabled in the House of Commons by the Minister of Finance.

In September 1989, the then Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra said, and I quote:

> A government that wastes millions and millions of dollars on newspaper ads not even a canary would want to see on the floor of its cage, and keeps saying that it is trying to cut spending in order to reduce the deficit—that government is both hypocritical and utterly ridiculous.

Those words ring clearly today as we discuss this particular issue.

I refer the House to the 19th Edition of Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, page 145 under the section of Constructive Contempts, subsection of the Publication of False or Perverted Reports of Debates, and I quote:

> Analogous to the publication of libels under either House is the publication of false or perverted, or of partial and injurious reports of debates or proceedings of either House of committees of either House or misrepresentations of the speeches of particular members.

In the ad, under bullet point no. 2, the government states that it will, and I quote: "channel all GST and privatization revenues to a Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund". I wish to refer you, Mr. Speaker, to the budget document itself tabled by the Minister of Finance, page 78 in the English version, the last two paragraphs, to show this House and Canadians how the Department of Finance and the Minister of Finance have misrepresented his own words in this particular ad, and I quote for you, Mr. Speaker, from page 78 of the budget document, the English translation:

> The Prime Minister has given a commitment that any above-projected revenues from the GST will make a contribution to deficit reduction rather than provide the leeway for an expansion in discretionary government spending. To implement this commitment, the government will introduce legislation to establish a specified purpose account, to which will be credited net GST revenues and from which will be debited public debt charges.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I table that for your subsequent reflection in making your adjudication.

In the minister's speech on page 13 he did suggest that all the revenues from the GST would go to the new debt servicing and reduction fund, but it is on page 78 in the details of the budget that the minister says what he really plans to do. That is where we learn that only above projected GST revenues would go to the proposed fund.

At page 78 the Minister of Finance even cites the Prime Minister of Canada, his own words on the subject matter. The ad's assertion that all GST revenues will be committed to the proposed debit servicing and reduction fund is completely inconsistent with the details of the budget document. Further, this assertion leaves the distinct impression with the reader that this fund, whatever its precise nature, already exists.

This is simply not true. In fact the legislation that the Minister of Finance proposes in his budget has not only not been adopted by this House, not only not been debated, but it has not even been introduced by the government. In addition, the advertisements claim that direct program spending increases to the unemployed will result from the budget is also not supported by the document tabled before this House. Not only is there no new program for the unemployed, there is in fact a cut in the Canadian Jobs Strategy, a program which supposedly benefits the unemployed.

Any increase in the federal government's spending on the unemployed this year will not be a result of the 1991 budget, but rather a requirement on the part of the Government of Canada under the Unemployment Insurance Act passed by this House some decades ago.

It is obvious, sir, the intent and content of the framers of this ad. The government did not take seriously, Mr. Speaker, your words, the protector of minority rights in this Chamber, on October 10, 1989. Perhaps they thought you would forget over time, Mr. Speaker, but the chair specifically asked the Department of Finance and other departments to study its ruling.

No member of the Crown can be taken seriously this time if he or she tries to sell the information argument. I can hear the Minister of Finance shaking his head over there. He of all people knows that this government is in big trouble. This government is responsible for eroding the dignity of the House of Commons.

You concluded your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on October 10, 1989 by saying the following: "This ad is objectionable and should never be repeated". Those, Sir, were your words on October 10, 1989. Unfortunately for all Canadians it has been repeated.

I am prepared to move a motion that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be empowered to examine the question of government advertising concerning budget and other legislative proposals prior to their enactment. This would give members a needed avenue to study in depth this recurring issue.

Although a precedent is not needed on the issue of contempt, you made an historic one on October 10, 1989, Mr. Speaker. That is the reason why I rise today to defend the fundamental principles of this, the highest court in the country, over which you, Sir, preside.

Parliament is the heart of our democracy, but its very authority stems from the esteem in which it is held by the government, by the ministers of the Crown and, more important, by the people of Canada.

This government and this Minister of Finance are not only in contempt of this House, but they are in contempt of you and your ruling of October 1989, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to respond directly to the statements that the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has made.

I might say, as an opening comment, that I fundamentally reject what he has said both in terms of the attitude of the government, as well as the specifics that he has set out in his far-fetched approach to trying to deal with this issue.

First of all, let me comment briefly on the purpose of the advertisement and the tabloid that is the subject of this question of privilege.

The purpose of the tabloid is to ensure that people right across this country have an opportunity to read and understand the directions that the budget has taken and get a better understanding of how this fits with the government's economic policy.

We know that budget documents are complex. They are lengthy and difficult to read. Canadians are not always going to take the time to read these documents. We felt that something that is condensed into eight pages of fairly direct language will help people gain that understanding. I might say that there is a very great demand for this information.

As an example, in the goods and services tax, the Consumer Information Office has sent out five million documents related to the goods and services tax. That gives us some sense as to the demand on the part of our voters for this type of information.

The advertisement that my hon. colleague refers to does make reference to this tabloid but it do so in a way, as it says, federal budget highlights. It is not intended to carry the entire content of the tabloid document.

Let me first cover the specifics that my colleague has raised. First, he points to page 78 where it says the following about the commitment of the Prime Minister:

To implement this commitment, the government will introduce legislation to establish a specified purpose account, to which will be credited net GST revenues and from which will be debited public debt charges.

Mr. Speaker, if you refer to page 94, you will see the calculations of this. It shows that the GST revenues, privatization proceeds, et cetera, are in their entirety credited to this fund. The word "net" is used because the proceeds are net of the GST credit. But because the GST credit is an integral part of the GST system itself, it is those net revenues that are credited to the fund.

As my hon. friend has pointed out, in the budget speech on page 13 of this document I said that we will ensure that all GST revenues are allocated solely to this fund. I think it is quite clear revenues that will be directed to the fund are all of the GST revenues net of the GST credit, which is an integral part of the tax.

The accounting is clear. The words are there to state exactly what we are intending to do, and I believe there is no uncertainty about that.

Let me comment on the advertisement. As I indicated, the advertisement itself is a very succinct document. It refers to federal budget highlights, and those highlights are identical to the highlights that are on the second page of the tabloid document itself. Immediately next to the highlights is a short note from me as Minister of Finance, outlining what is in this document. I quote here, and this is a very important quote: "The budget proposes far-reaching initiatives."

The tabloid goes on to say on page 7, relating to the GST debt servicing reduction fund: "Legislation will be introduced to establish the debt servicing and reduction fund into which all GST revenues will go".

Mr. Speaker, I think we have followed very closely the directions that you gave us. I indicated that "the budget proposes" and that legislation in relation to this particular matter will be proposed. I believe that is quite clear and consistent with the ruling that you made some months back.

The final point that my colleague has referred to is on page 6 of this document. "The advertisement", he said, "directed program spending increases to the unemployed, the elderly and farmers in difficulty". This refers specifically to an item in the tabloid which says: "Who will get extra help this year?" I will not give you all the words here, but it says: "That is why program spending will increase by 6.9 per cent this year. Nearly 80 per cent of the $7.5 billion increase will go to assist the elderly, the unemployed and farmers in difficulty". The point here is that this is a specific factual statement, not as my colleague tried to interpret it.

If you refer, Mr. Speaker, to that item on page 6, I think you will see that it is precisely that and not as the interpretation would suggest.

In conclusion, I do believe that what we have set out here in the advertising is highlights or headlines, if you will, to the specific items that are in the tabloid. The tabloid clearly says that 'the budget proposes" and "legislation will be introduced". These and all the aspects of the ruling that you made previously on the GST advertisement a year and a half ago do respect fully the directions that you wished us to take.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I must say I am grateful to my colleague, the House leader of the Official Opposition, for having brought to the attention of the House the contemptuous nature of the expensive and misleading advertising campaign which promotes the economic policy of the government, which misrepresents the budget that is before this House, which prejudices the decision of this House on the budget and which prejudices debate on this issue. Once again I compliment my hon. friend on his very thoughtful presentation to you, Mr. Speaker, on this very critical matter.

Before I begin, I want to say simply to my friend, the Minister of Finance, that I recall the GST mailings in terms of the evaluation that followed that, how effective that campaign was, and informing Canadians on the importance and the intricate nature of the GST. As to whether they understood it better as a result of receiving this documentation, I think the overwhelming evidence was that that was not the case. I suggest that the need to have sent out five million documents in response to inquiries simply points out the confusion that surrounds the implementation of this new form of taxation.

In light of the comments and arguments made by my hon. friend, the House leader of the Official Opposition, I have really only a few comments to make. With your indulgence, I will focus on only two brief points: first, the wilful intent behind this advertising campaign and the fact that it exacerbates the contempt that we are presently discussing and, second, the attempt to deny this House its conventional and historic rights to pronounce itself on the budget.

I must say that this advertising campaign is not only part of a carefully designed media strategy but is part of a deliberate flaunting of the dignity of this House and its role and authority to permit the implementation of budgetary policy. I am afraid we have been reminded that this is not the first time members of this House have had to voice their concerns about zealous government administrations eager to put their spin on the matters before the House.

Fundamental to this whole issue is the question of why we are here. We are here because hundreds of years ago someone had the good sense to say no, to say that kings and other despots did not have the right to spend our money, to raise our taxes, unless and until we gave them that right. It does not matter whether it is a king or a prime minister or a deputy minister of finance who tries to usurp that right; this House and each of us in it must fight to defend that principle. You, Mr. Speaker, are of course the standard-bearer in that fight.

My colleagues have argued that the information distributed to every Canadian doorstep misrepresents the budget laid before this House. I support your arguments, Mr. Speaker, and the arguments we have heard earlier today. My concern is equally focused on the purpose behind this media campaign. Why did officials of the Department of Finance choose to give each Canadian household a copy of this flyer? Why did they choose to send it before the House had pronounced itself on the budget? Were they, as my hon. colleague has pointed out, not listening to you when you told them on October 10, 1989, and I quote:

> I expect the Department of Finance and other departments to study this ruling carefully and remind everyone within the Public Service that we are a parliamentary democracy, not a so-called executive democracy, nor a so-called administrative democracy.

Let us look at this recent history to which your comment refers. In the summer of 1989 the government launched an advertising campaign in support of the goods and services tax. When the House returned that fall, the former Leader of the Official Opposition raised with the Speaker the contemptuous nature of those advertisements. While you, Mr. Speaker, did not find that there was a prima facie case, you offered some very stern warning to those who implemented the campaign to which the opposition took offence. You said you had to ponder the intent of the offending advertisement as compared to its contents.

In light of the Minister of Finance's assurances that the intent was to inform Canadians and not to diminish the dignity of the House, you found that there was no contempt.

However, Mr. Speaker, you concluded with the comments:

> I expect the Department of Finance and other departments to study this ruling carefully and remind everyone within the Public Service that we are a parliamentary democracy, not a so-called executive democracy, nor a so-called administrative democracy.

I emphasize that particular comment of yours, because it should be remembered that today's offensive advertisement was drafted by that same department that you had specifically warned in December 1989.

I submit that the publication of which we speak contains a number of errors. In terms of the goods and services tax it says:

> All revenues from the goods and services tax will flow into a debt servicing and reduction fund.

I give creativity marks to my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, who has tried to explain that. While the budget proposes to channel only net revenues, this certainly implies something contrary to that notion.

Also, the statements in this document say that the budget will cut the cost of government including salaries, and yet the government's own estimates show that it will actually spend more money this year than last.

It says that the budget will direct program spending increases to the unemployed. We all know that the unemployed can rely on the self-financing employment plan. Of course we see no new programs and have actually had the announcement that the Canadian Jobs Strategy will see $100 million cut from it.

In closing, I want to say that the Minister of Finance and his officials knew the rules, and they understood your ruling. They could only have been deliberately disregarding this House and the role that I, members opposite, members beside me and you, Mr. Speaker, play.

I might add that the Minister of Finance and his officials also knew that there is no obligation to bring a budget before the House at this time but, having done so, the House has many rights over that budget. This is my final point. These include the right to debate the budget, to decide on the budget, to defeat governments on the basis of the budget, and to withhold passage of legislation based on the budget until a decision has been made.

Why, then, did the Department of Finance not wait until the budget debate had been concluded and the final budget voted upon?

Why did they not correctly reflect the material in the budget? I say that this is a wilful contempt of the House, a wilful contempt of your ruling of October 10, and deliberate disregard for the dignity and authority of this House.

On examination of this issue a number of questions are raised. I submit that the officials in finance did not wait for the budget debate to be concluded because they knew it would not be concluded. They knew that this House would never have the opportunity to vote on the budget. What greater prejudice to the proceedings of this House can there be than to do away with these proceedings?

It would appear, even by comments made earlier today, that the government does not plan further debate on the budget motion.

I have not been able to find a single previous incident where the House has been denied the right to pronounce itself on budgetary policy once it had been introduced. Last week I asked the government House leader when he would be introducing a bill to legitimize the collection of the increased taxes on cigarettes and tobacco. He ignored the fact that the tax is currently paid basically on a voluntary basis by Canadians and will be until the budget is approved, the ways and means motion approved, and the tax bill passed.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I ask you to review our arguments and the facts before you. I suggest you will find that there is a prima facie case of contempt based on the following: the clear and deliberate ignoring of your ruling of October 10, 1989; the clear intent to incorporate incorrect and misleading material contained in the advertisement; the clear intent to promote the budget policy before the policy had been approved by this House; the clear intent to deny the House the right to decide on the budget; the clear intent to degrade the rights of all members of this House by denying them the right to debate and to presume support where no vote had actually taken place.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, a very short reply. I have the points I think pretty well digested and I am very grateful to the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond in putting his points so succinctly. I will hear him shortly.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, just so there is no misunderstanding in my remarks I did not make reference to the tabloid. I made reference to the particular ad which I filed with the Clerk so that there would be no misunderstanding by yourself or by my colleagues across the way or to the left. It is not the tabloid I made reference to. It was the particular ad which has appeared in the newspapers across the country.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to consider carefully the arguments that have been put forward both by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, the hon. Minister of Finance, and the hon. member for Kamloops. I will, of course, keep in mind the comments that I had to make some time ago. I know the hon. member will be sure that I get a copy of the ad. The hon. Minister of Finance made reference to the tabloid and I would appreciate a copy of that too. I will try to report back to the House as quickly as possible.

We have, as I indicated, a number of matters and I would like to move on as fast as I can and I know that hon. members want to assist the Chair. The hon.

member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has a question of privilege and I ask him to address the Chair.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from the business of a committee. This occurred earlier this morning.

Of course, Mr. Speaker would be tempted perhaps to remind me that under our traditions committees are masters of their own business. While that is generally true I want to remind you of citation No. 569.(1) of Beauchesne's, fifth edition, which says:

> Committees are regarded as creatures of the House and are governed for the most part in their proceedings by the same rules which prevail in the House with exception as to seconding of motions, limiting the number of times of speaking and the length of speeches.

It further says under 569.(2):

> Committees receive their authority from the House itself and that authority of the House overrides that of any committee.

Mr. Speaker, I am bringing this issue to your attention for the following reason. The committee this morning was meeting under Standing Order 108(2). I bring to the attention of the House, and perhaps I could table the following, although it is available to officers of the House, the convocation asking members to attend the committee which states as follows: "Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, pursuant to Standing Order 108(2) consideration of the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future." Very clearly, the committee was meeting under Standing Order 108(2) this morning to consider the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future as the notice published for us by the clerk indicated.

When the committee met this morning, it became aware of a certain report of the Citizen's Forum on Canada's Future. That report, which was made public last night, was later upon the motion of a member of the committee, duly moved and seconded. The report in question was tabled with the committee.

When hon. members immediately afterwards attempted to question the witness on the report itself, the chairman of the committee ruled that members could not ask a question about a public report, and at that a report which had already been tabled before the committee in question.

Mr. Speaker, the point I am making to you is that if that authority does not exist within the House itself, and I remind Mr. Speaker of what he has told us on several occasions in the past, that members in this House should be permitted to ask questions in a manner which is unhindered, providing of course that the Standing Orders and our rules and forms are adhered to. If that is the principle which guides us in this House, I fail to see how that principle can be overridden in one of our committees by a committee chairman.

Recognizing the authority the committee has to be master of its own business, nevertheless a committee or a member of a committee, in particular a chairman, cannot exceed an authority in the committee which Mr. Speaker cannot exercise in this House here, or does not exercise in this House here.

I am not expecting an immediate ruling on the issue. I conclude my remarks by asking Mr. Speaker to review the transcript of the committee in question and to rule on the issue in question.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I think that after reviewing the information I just brought to your attention, you will agree that the customary procedure of this House, as indicated in Beauchesne's and in the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, was not followed this morning. I think parliamentarians have a right to ask questions about a public report, a report that was tabled before our committee and that was under consideration by the committee, pursuant to Standing Order 108(2).

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. In my capacity as chairman of this committee since last Monday, I am directly concerned by the question raised by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Perhaps the following information will help clarify the situation. The committee met for the first time last Monday. It had not met for some time. That is when I was chosen to be chairman of the committee. The committee then went on to consider the Supplementary Estimates tabled by the government which we were to examine, preferably before Thursday this week, with emphasis on the item concerning the Citizens Forum, also known as the Spicer Commission.

From the outset, Mr. Speaker, we realized in committee that we were faced with a situation that was truly unique. The committee was asked to consider the votes allocated to a royal commission or a commission of inquiry via the Privy Council, a commission mandated by law or established by a constituent act, and a commission or forum, all of which basically have an arm's length relationship with the government.

Furthermore, by the very nature of this mandate, the commission or forum must enjoy a certain degree of independence vis-à-vis the government and thus Parliament and the committees of Parliament that bestow this mandate. This was and stil is an absolutely unique situation.

At our organization meeting on Monday, it became clear to members and the committee chairman that in our examination we had to make a distinction between substantive questions relating to the commission's mandate and questions arising from the commission's administration. That was the gist of the debate we had last Monday. In subsequent meetings, Mr. Speaker, which took place Tuesday, Wednesday and this morning, the Chair always stressed the fact that a distinction had to be made between these two issues. Although it may not always be apparent, Mr. Speaker, there is a distinction between the subject matter dealt with by a commission of inquiry and issues relating to the expenditure of public funds. That was more or less the situation.

This morning, the hon. member and his colleagues raised the following question: They said or claimed that since the Spicer Forum had produced an interim report, that altered the decision we made on Monday. This morning's decision, Mr. Speaker, was a matter of common sense. It was based on the fact that the forum as such had not interrupted its task since our committee had been considering their votes. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the forum continued its work on Monday and Tuesday and produced an interim report.

Perhaps I may add, Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of this House and of all Canadians, that I too regretted the fact that the Spicer Forum decided to produce an interim report the day before our meeting with Mr. Spicer. I don't think it did so on purpose—Mr. Spicer gave us an explanation—but to be perfectly frank, as chairman I too felt that this was perhaps not the wisest thing to do in the circumstances.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if the Chair would examine the committee's proceedings, not only today's but also Tuesday's, Monday's and Wednesday's, to get a clear picture of a question that I believe, creates a precedent for this Parliament, so that in future, you could provide some guidance for hon. members when we are faced with a similar situation. I am sure this kind of situation will recur.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this morning, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell could have done what is often done by members, which is to appeal the decision of the committee chairman. All he had to do was move a motion to reverse the decision made by the chairman of the committee.

However, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not move a motion to that effect this morning. He preferred to raise a question of privilege in the House. My point is that in any case, and further to my other arguments, the recourse available to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell was available to him this morning, but he chose not to use it, and therefore, his recourse has expired with respect to—

Mr. Boudria: Careful, Jean, that might backfire!

Mr. Charest: —the proceedings of the committee.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have extended a great deal of patience to members on this matter. I do so reluctantly, but I wanted to listen carefully to the point. I have never said that there might not be an occasion when a Speaker might, depending on circumstances, have to intervene in a committee.

Whatever circumstances may eventually be, I have to accept for the argument that has been brought in front of me, the hon. member for Sherbrooke's position, which is that there are other things that can still be done in the committee with respect to the complaint that the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell brings. Certainly until all avenues within the committee are exhausted I do not think it is appropriate for me to intervene.

However, I thank hon. members for the careful way in which they brought the matter to the Chair. I think that at the moment my position is the right one. If circumstances change, of course, members may want to rise again.

The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona on a point of order.

ALLOTTED DAY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to seek a clarification from you of a matter which was raised in the House on Tuesday of this week and on which you ruled on March 19. At page 18684 of Hansard with respect to the point of order I brought up at that time having to do with the question of confidence as it pertained to opposition day motions, you said:

> The question of confidence, of course, lies with the government. The hon. House leader has made the position of the government very clear.

The problem with the position of the government was that the matter of confidence did not lie with the government. The position of the government was that the matter of confidence resided in the Standing Orders. This was the argument made very clearly and repeatedly on that day by the government, not only by the Government House Leader in response to my point of order, but also by the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare in his own speech to the House that day, in questions he put to the member for Winnipeg North and again in Question Period.

What I want to do is take the House through the two Standing Orders, the relevant ones prior to the McGrath reforms and the ones after. Those reforms came about as a result of the government, the same government which exists today, endorsing the recommendations of the McGrath report with respect to changing the rules of confidence in the Standing Orders. The government said on October 19, 1985, with respect to the confidence convention:

> The government endorses the recommendations in principle. The government will seek to have a definition of confidence written into the Standing Orders to make it clear which votes are critical tests of a government's ability to maintain the confidence of the House: e.g., Speech from the Throne and Budget. The government will determine what legislation it will consider a matter of confidence. The government will also seek to have confirmed in the Standing Orders, the practice of votes independent of party position.

The Standing Orders as they existed prior to the government accepting that recommendation and prior to the implementations of the reforms, read as follows, and I am referring here to Standing Order 58(9):

> In each of the periods described in section (5) of this Standing Order, not more than two opposition motions shall be—

And here is the key wording, Mr. Speaker,

> —no-confidence motions against the government.

There, Mr. Speaker, is clearly the language of confidence in the Standing Orders with respect to opposition day motions. That was a problem that was identified by the committee as creating the context in which both opposition and government could hide behind the substance of motions.

After the McGrath reform, the Standing Order then read, and I read from that same Standing Order, section 9:

> In each of the periods described in section (8) of this Standing Order, not more than four opposition motions shall be motions that shall come to a vote, provided that not more than eight opposition motions in total shall be motions that shall come to a vote during the three supply periods—

The difference is that in the Standing Orders after the 1985 reform, there was no longer the language of confidence with respect to opposition day motions. They were simply referred to as matters which would come to a vote, a vote which would be freer than the votes which used to take place in the context of opposition day motions, because the language of confidence was deliberately and self-consciously removed from those Standing Orders as a result of the reforms advocated by the McGrath committee, accepted by the government and incorporated into the new Standing Orders.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I take you back to your own ruling in which you said: "The question of confidence, of course, lies with the government." Exactly, because the question of confidence no longer lies in the Standing Orders. It lies with the government. Yet the argument that was being made the other day was directly contrary to your ruling and an argument which I suspect will continue to be made. The argument is that somehow or other the government is not permitted to vote for opposition day motions with which it happens to agree, such as the one the other day in which the government said it agreed that this House ought to reaffirm medicare, but it could not vote for the motion.

One more minute and I will wrap up. The fact of the matter is that we have not only the facts as I have outlined them with respect to the language of confidence in the Standing Orders, but also precedent, one of which I cited the other day. I ask that you make it clear that the ruling that you made the other day with respect to the question of confidence lying with the government is clearly different than the position that the government itself took with respect to confidence, which of course was that confidence resided in the Standing Orders and not with the government.

Mr. Speaker: I am very mindful of the debate that took place a few days ago. I understand the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona on this issue. I will consider it. It may well be that I will want to discuss the matter further with members. This perhaps should go to, and I am sure it could be arranged, it could be looked at by the privileges committee.

However, I am not, by saying that, changing what I said the other day. Notwithstanding the interesting argument put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, I would have to be persuaded mightily to change what I said the other day, which was that it is the prerogative of the government to deal with any matter as a question of confidence, unless the rule very clearly states otherwise.

In any event, I will consider the matter, and I will discuss it with the hon. member.

COMMITTEE QUORUM

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly on a somewhat different point.

Rule 118 of our Chamber requires a quorum at committees and indicates that a special resolution can be passed to authorize printing when a quorum is not present. That is rule 118(2).

This morning in consumer and corporate affairs we did indeed have a very lively quorum and quite a few members beyond quorum through to the conclusion of Mr. Spicer's testimony at which point he was dismissed from the committee. Very soon thereafter I think the record will show that I called to the attention of the chair the fact that a quorum was not present, and therefore no further meetings could occur.

People did indeed stay in the room, and a record was made from a sound point of view, I am sure. However, I just want assurance from the Chair that the moment the quorum was called, the power to print ended. We were not in a situation of hearing witnesses or any special motion. If indeed it is helpful to the House to go back into committee to resolve the issue of whether or not there should be printing beyond the point of calling of the quorum, we would be glad to call the committee back together to consider the matter.

I am just trying to be helpful to make sure that we do not get into a situation of printing beyond the point where printing should have occurred because the meeting was indeed private and informal once the quorum was called. If we were to print all of that, and then start to distribute it, we could get ourselves into a bit of a problem in the Chamber.

Mr. Speaker: Again, the hon. member for Calgary West has raised a matter which I think is properly still a matter for the committee. If his position is well founded, I am sure that some discussion with those who do our printing for us would probably keep the situation under control.

FARM INCOME PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-98, an act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture; and the motion of Mr. Foster (p. 18780).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member, it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows:

the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing—the Budget; the hon. member for St. Leonard—Employment; the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake—Northern benefits.

The hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I believe you will recall that just before Question Period you had recognized the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt to have the floor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt has the floor.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the motion that we are debating is again an indication that obviously, but maybe surprisingly, it is the opposition members who are taking a responsible approach to this particular piece of legislation. Maybe this extends to their responsible approach to what we, as legislators, should be taking toward all movements within the government.

That is, this particular motion is limiting to some extent the possibility of advantage being taken by people or organizations beyond what would ordinarily be the intent of the bill.

The motion states:

> That Bill C-98 be amended in Clause 7 by adding immediately after line 27 on page 7 the following:
> "(1.1) A producer participating in a net income stabilization account program must be a Canadian citizen or permanent resident."

It seems that this is obviously reasonable and eminently logical because the intent of Bill C-98 is stabilization of the agricultural industry within Canada. It is not intended to be the stabilization of a particular farm by someone who owns that farm, but who lives outside the country.

We recognize that if he is a permanent resident, it is an acceptable part and recognition of the fact that he is contributing and paying in Canada. However, if he is not a citizen or a permanent resident, then he will not, in the event of taking advantage of these operations, be doing so to the advantage of Canada. We recognize and hope that this is not an extension. Most or all of the people who fall into this category are just south of the border and farm on the Canadian side.

NISA, the Net Income Stabilization Account, is a surprising bit of legislation under any circumstances in that it is a glorified RRSP in some ways as far as farmers are concerned. It is glorified in the sense that no other RRSP across Canada has the government matching the contributions that the farmer makes into it. No other RRSP guarantees a certain level of interest return.

That is a very specific bit of ability on the part of the government if it is acceptable to the taxpayers generally of assisting a farmer who is in a situation where some place down the line he can use money that was maybe a little in excess a few years before. The contributions by the government increase it enough to make it a worthwhile operation.

We have to recognize that it is using taxpayers' money to match funds put into the specific account and that we are also guaranteeing a specific return, which I understand is 3 per cent above the prime rate. You, Mr. Speaker, would be happy with such an RRSP.

Why are we giving this kind of specific help in extending it to people who do not live in Canada and who are not citizens of Canada? The particular fund account is divided into two specific accounts, one of which is after tax: The producer part is after tax. The second fund, which is a specific section or will be kept separately, will be kept for the contributions by the government or governments—because the provincial government may also make contributions to this fund—and to the interest that is raised. In other words, it is set up in such a way that the farmer portion of it, which is put in after tax, and the government portion are kept separately. But both portions are going to be available to the farmer if he decides he needs them or if he qualifies for them.

If you are my age, Mr. Speaker, that qualification might be within a couple of years. So it is a particular situation which I think needs to be looked at. I compliment the member for Algoma in making sure that we in this legislature have taken a good look at limiting wherever possible the waste, the misuse that can come out of this.

It also relates back to the original three motions which were before this House that suggested that the total amount returned from any of the accounts here—NISA, GRIP or the income revenue account—all be limited so that there would not be the excesses that are possible under the present legislation.

There is no doubt that the legislation itself, the structure under which this legislation is developed, the direction that it goes in making sure there is some kind of a net for the farmer, is acceptable. But if you link these moves in such a way that specific people who do not qualify, do not need, then it quits being a safety net and it becomes a method of giving money to people who should not be getting it.

That is what this particular clause does and what the other clauses that we objected to earlier, or which we think should be put in, also do.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): The motion moved by my colleague from Algoma restricting the receipt of benefits from and participation in the NISA section of this Farm Income Stabilization bill I think is one worthy of serious consideration.

As has been pointed out by other members of the House, what we are doing is making this part of this program available to people who are not necessarily citizens of this country. This is a good part of the act, it is a very generous part of the act, and once in place will serve a very useful purpose, and hopefully will bring some more stability to the farm income situation that has gone on far too long in this country.

It is a part of the act that is going to require a considerable number of taxpayers' dollars to make it successful, with contributions from both the provincial and federal governments as well as from the participants themselves. I think we have to give some serious thought to this —not that we don't necessarily want foreign ownership of farms. If one wanted to be cynical, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if this is because of the benefit this would give to foreign owners as well as to Canadian ownership. I wonder if this is a message that the present government is sending to foreign owners, that if they get involved in the Canadian farming operations they can benefit from this type of program. I hope that is not the case, and I do not think that is the case, but it certainly would be looked upon and can be looked upon by potential or present foreign ownerships as a very beneficial way of bringing money, and it does allow them to bring money, from outside the country into the country to receive a basic interest plus a bit of a premium on that. This could be very beneficial for them. This would be at the expense of Canadian taxpayers.

I do not think the Canadian taxpayer has any strong objection to this type of program being put in place to lend stability to Canadian producers. That, quite frankly, is the purpose of this bill. However, I do not think it should be available to those who are not Canadian citizens or are not permanent residents of Canada. I am not at all sure that we are doing ourselves or the industry justice if we leave this out. I feel this amendment is needed in the bill to make it proper and to make it fair for Canadian citizens and for Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to speak in support of Motion No. 7 introduced by my friends from the Liberal Party.

As my colleague from Saskatoon–Humboldt pointed out, while we support the broad outlines of the legislation before us, the draftsmanship of it is so wanting that we are very much afraid that within the legislation carries the seeds of its own destruction. There are so many loopholes and so many opportunities for abuse in the legislation that we are dearly afraid that the cost of this program is going to accelerate way beyond what the estimates now are and because of that, the program will self–destruct.

We expected and we hoped for good legislation. It is something that this government has promised western Canadian farmers for many years now. I remember well the former Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Wise, in 1985 promising us a comprehensive farm assistance type program. It has taken the government, through many droughts, price wars and political campaigns, to finally come to Parliament with certain proposals with its legislation. It is amazing to us, given all this time, how faulty this legislation is.

Of course the problem that Motion No. 7 addresses is a serious one. It might not be significant in terms of total dollars and cents, but it will certainly drain money from the public purse to benefit individuals whom I am certain no member of this House on either side of this Chamber would want to see money going to, namely some of those folks who live and are citizens south of the border who farm in Canada and would benefit under this program. Surely no member of this House on either side believe that this program is intended to benefit those types of individuals. Surely one has to be a Canadian citizen or a permanent resident of Canada to be able to seek the benefits of the legislation in front of us today.

It is this type of sloppiness that creates this type of government waste that the people back home are furious about. They expect something a little better from Parliament. They expect something a little better from our political system. They certainly expect something a little bit better from the Conservative government.

I think it astonish the farm folks back home, many of whom support the Conservative government, many of them who hoped that in 1984 with the defeat of the Liberal government that finally the concerns of western Canada would get a decent hearing in the Parliament of this nation. High on their priority list was some legislation that would introduce a permanent program to protect western agriculture from the ups and downs of the price wars that existed between the treasuries of Europe and the United States. As well, they would like some protection from the ups and downs of our weather and the uncertainty that this provides to western agriculture.

We know in the west that we can grow good products, products that the world needs. In the long term there will a market for those products. Those products can and should be sold at prices that would sustain an agricultural economy, that would sustain family farms back home.

What they were asking for generations from the national Parliament was some well thought out programs that would put into place some of the permanent guarantees, some of the permanent stability, to ensure that our farm families will be able to withstand the downturns and enjoy the upturns.

The legislation that we have in front of us today, Bill C–98, fails to do that. It is with deep and profound regret that the farmers in Saskatchewan—and dare I say farmers right across the country, many of whom were historic supporters of the Conservative Party—feel a tremendous sense of disappointment, disillusionment and betrayal by this party and this government.

When one gets back home, it is amazing to see the sense of hopelessness and the sense of cynicism that people have concerning our institutions, particularly our federal Parliament and our federal government. When we look at Bill C–98, at the loopholes that are incorporated in that bill and at the shoddy draftsmanship of that bill—I understand even the bureaucrats shudder when they look at the bill—we can begin to understand why the folks at home are becoming so cynical of the whole political process. They feel that they are not being listened to, that they have become marginalized.

On several occasions I have talked with farmers back home who have told me that they have voted for that party all of their lives, that their kids and their wives have voted for them. "But this is the last time", they tell me. They feel betrayed. They feel that we did not get a government in Ottawa that understood their needs and that was able to act on their needs.

It has taken a long time, from 1984 with the election of this government to now, almost seven years, for the government finally to get around to introducing the legislation the west has been wanting for such a long time. However, when it introduces the legislation, it is a piece of legislation that is totally unacceptable. It has within it its own seeds of destruction through the loopholes, the wastefulness and the exploitation that it would encourage. One wonders whether this party and this government really understand the needs of western agriculture.

My party has also introduced motions in this House. Motion Nos. 1, 2, and 3 attempt to put a cap on the program, to make certain that a few people will not get a large amount of the benefits from the public purse. I understand that up to 90–some per cent of the farmers who would be eligible for this program would fall under the cap of $100,000.

It is a means of ensuring that public moneys are well spent, that there will be the maximum benefit to the maximum number of people, rather than have it so open ended that there will be a few individuals who will be able to farm the system rather than farm in a manner that makes environmental and economic sense.

It is a piece of legislation that is full of loopholes, that has been sloppily designed and that deserves some major modifications. Therefore I also wish to indicate my support of Motion No. 7.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will keep my remarks confined to Motion No. 7 wherein it indicates that it must be a Canadian citizen or a permanent resident.

It is very easy to diverge and respond to some of the comments that have been made. However I will not do that at this time.

Under the current legislation we have in place many programs in support of agriculture, such as the WGSA, the Crop Insurance Program, the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and so on. They recognize those producers who have farmed in Canada, regardless of their citizenship and/or the country of their residence. That has always been the case.

We have to recognize that we have a border which we share with the United States. It is probably the longest free-standing border in the world. We have several producers who live near the Canadian and American border on both sides and farm in both countries. Canadians are not excluded from U.S. programs, and we do not intend to start a system of cross-border exclusion.

For NISA, a producer must file a Canadian income tax form to be eligible to participate. In this case, a non-resident must report income earned in Canada and conversely become eligible under support programs.

To do anything different from this would not be consistent with other legislation we have. For this reason the government cannot accept this amendment.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if a member of the government was going to respond to this very favourable and positive amendment put forward by the member for Algoma.

I saw, as I rose in my place here, the member for Algoma rising as well. He probably had a few things to say to the hon. parliamentary secretary in response to his response. Therefore, I will try to keep my remarks brief as well, to allow the mover of this motion perhaps to respond briefly to the parliamentary secretary.

I want to say a couple of things. First of all, I find it quite astonishing that the government is quite prepared to put away funds through this legislation, through the NISA account, for American citizens. As the parliamentary secretary indicated, this legislation is not any different from the Western Grain Stabilization Act or other acts. That does not necessarily mean that if they have made one mistake on one occasion they should compound it by continuing to make that mistake in other legislation.

As far as I am concerned, the NISA program has many faults and problems with it. I will deal with that in other circumstances. However, one of the faults with NISA is that it does not limit the matching accounts, government funding, taxpayers money, to Canadian citizens.

As I indicated earlier today in remarks in this House on the motions that have been put forward by a number of members, I feel very strongly that the NISA account is a reward for wealthy producers in this country and does not address the farm problems that are compounding the financial crisis at the farm gate.

I do not believe that the government has the intention of trying to solve the farm crisis in Canada, because the programs we see seem to continue to compound those problems. As I indicated earlier, the fact that there is a $22 billion debt in agriculture in this country is not being addressed by this legislation at all. In fact, no legislation since this government has come into power has addressed the growing farm debt problem.

There has been a number of attempts to address the income problems. Those obviously have been inadequate, just as the GRIP and NISA programs will prove to be inadequate because they are not addressing the long-term financial crisis that affects the individual farmers at the farm gate.

Certainly we have a world marketplace problem that must be addressed. The Americans are a big part of that. The fact that this legislation will allow Canadian taxpayers' money to go and sit in American accounts to exacerbate further our anger with the American farm bill is just atrocious.

The government opposite is refusing to accept what I think is a very simple, reasoned, and logical amendment. It simply restricts the payments on this account to Canadian citizens or permanent residents. It is perfectly logical. We in Saskatchewan have had a long history of trying to protect Saskatchewan farm land from foreign ownership, particularly American ownership. Not only are we now prepared to accept Americans farming our land. We are also prepared to help them retire in California, New Mexico, or Arizona by matching funds that they are able to put away. It just astounds me.

We fought prior to the 1988 general election the issue of free trade. Agricultural producers in Saskatchewan, for the most part, voted against the free trade deal. We did not like what was being proposed to us in terms of agricultural matters.

We felt that the American agricultural industry was putting too much pressure on the Canadian system to allow for long-term development of the agricultural sector in Canada. We felt that if Canadian producers were going to continue to be successful in the world market and to maintain our markets world-wide we somehow had to prevent the Americans from doing what they are continuing to do, despite all efforts to the contrary: to take our markets and move their products and obviously their people into our areas.

The Farmland Security Act in Saskatchewan was designed to protect Saskatchewan farmers farming on their own land. This government and its Conservative buddies in the Government of Saskatchewan who will be there for a short period of time longer, I suppose, are doing everything they can to ensure that Saskatchewan farmers get the short end of the stick. This simple amendment corrects a major problem with a major flaw in this legislation. It would be very simple for the government to say: "Okay, we are only going to pay money to Canadian citizens". That makes a tremendous amount of sense to me.

I did not have the opportunity to sit in on a lot of the standing committee testimony that was provided when the Standing Committee on Agriculture met. Therefore I was quite surprised when I saw this amendment brought forward on the Order Paper. Like most people I had reasoned, without having to look for it, that the government simply would not be providing funds to non-Canadians either in the NISA or in pay-outs to GRIP. I am very grateful to the hon. member for Algoma for discovering this in the legislation, recognizing that something was not there which to my mind should be. It just had to be there.

For an act to allow Canadian taxpayers' money to be paid to anyone who is not a Canadian citizen in an industry which we consider so valuable and under threat from American interests is a matter which has to be addressed. I am obviously among many on this side of the House who will support this amendment when it is put to us. I hope the government will see fit to support it as well.

The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture is conferring with a Saskatchewan member of Parliament at this moment. I am hoping that the member for Swift Current—Maple Creek has managed to convince the parliamentary secretary to change his mind. I certainly appreciate any efforts that Saskatchewan members from all sides of this House can make to ensure that this act is amended properly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question on Motion No. 7?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) moved:

That Bill C-98 be amended in Clause 10 by striking out lines 3 to 9 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"10. No information submitted by a producer for the purpose of administering a program established under an agreement may be communicated, disclosed or made available to an official of the Department of National Revenue without the prior written permission of the producer."

He said: Mr. Speaker, the existing legislation provides that information can be passed from the Department of Agriculture, the programs running GRIP and NISA, to the Department of National Revenue. We do not necessarily agree that even that should happen. Surely, if it is going to happen, there should be the permission of the producer.

I know every member of Parliament in this House has had the experience of making representations on behalf of constituents and has had to get a waiver so that they could make those representations. If a member of Parliament has to get a waiver from his constituent to make representations, to get a tax refund or to get a reassessment, it seems to me the Department of Agriculture should have to do the same.

Yet, this legislation gives you carte blanche. You just push the computer and you get a spit-out of it. That would be bad enough if it was a federal public servant who was doing it, but it is not even being administered by a federal public servant. If it were a federal public servant, we could come into the House and give his minister hell here on the floor of the House Commons.

This program is all going to be administered by provincial civil servants. How does a federal member of Parliament get after a provincial civil servant who abuses the income tax confidentiality rules? Surely it is reasonable that the government has to get permission.

We had quite a debate in the committee itself. I do not want to relate what happens at the committee because that is not protocol here, but essentially the government says: "Oh, well, we do this. When you sign the form you have got to get permission". That is fine. Why not have it in the statutes if at some future time some public servant or government decides that it is not going to get the permission of the producer to get this information from the Department of National Revenue, that it will just go ahead and get it, and that it is authorized by Bill C-98 so why bother?

This amendment is a very simple one. It requires that if the government is going to call up information—and this is generally speaking a crop insurance commission of the provincial government from the Department of National Revenue—then it has to get permission from the producer.

I have talked to many Liberal senators. They have told me that if this thing comes to them like this, then there is going to be great difficulty.

I would suggest to the parliamentary secretary, who is usually a very reasonable person although not always today, that if he really wants to expedite the passage of this bill and does not want to have it bounce back from the Senate, then he should accept this amendment.

It is reasonable. It is fair. It is in line with what the government is already doing. I do not know why the government should not be prepared to simply accept the amendment which says:

> "10. No information submitted by a producer for the purpose of administering a program established under an agreement may be communicated, disclosed or made available to an official of the Department of National Revenue without the prior written permission of the producer."

It is a very reasonable, understandable clause. I was surprised at the incredible weakness of the parliamentary secretary's defence of the fact that the Government of Canada was going to provide a NISA account for non-residents and non-Canadian citizens.

To hear him tell it, NISA is like contributing to the western grain stabilization or receiving a benefit under the Agricultural Stabilization Act. For that matter, it is like getting the benefit which is implied when a producer delivers wheat to the Canadian Wheat Board and gets the initial price which may turn out to be higher than the market price.

NISA is a very special kind of deal. The producer can put in up 2 per cent of his qualifying income from his crop which is automatically matched by the government. He receives 3 per cent on top of commercial rates of interest which, right now, are probably 15 per cent. He can top it up with another 20 per cent of qualifying crop income. He will receive 3 per cent above the commercial rates of interest on that.

It is a very special arrangement. In this day and age of restraint, when we are cutting back on everything, we should not be passing this off as if it was the payment under ASA or under western grain stabilization. It is a very special arrangement. We are not proposing this kind of arrangement for GRIP because it is a different kind of program.

The response of the minister was extremely weak on Motion No. 7. I would like to move Motion No. 8 which simply requires that the government gets permission from the producer whenever it is securing information from the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this motion as well.

It is becoming very much of a communications world. The ability to move information and data from one place to another is becoming a great part of our life. Because of that, we are endangering, to a great extent, our privacy.

We have a tendency to say that we can trust Revenue Canada. If we have nothing to hide, Mr. Speaker, then we have nothing to worry about. However, that really is not the point.

The point is that what this clause gives in its present form is that:

> Information submitted for the purposes of administering a program established under an agreement may be communicated, disclosed or made available to an official of the Department of National Revenue solely for the purposes of administering or enforcing the Income Tax Act.

This assumes that the Department of National Revenue will ask for the agreement, but chances are it will ask for it on a broad basis and it will get a report from the program which will have listed everybody who has decided that he or she is going to be part of any of these programs.

Consequently, that is putting into the public domain information which we have always indicated in other programs is not available in the public domain.

As the former speaker suggested, even if we had a specific administrator whose responsibility it was to say yes or no to whether or not that information went to the Department of Revenue, that would limit it considerably.

But the real issue becomes whether any farmer who is part of this program wants this information to become part of the public record. The way it is worded at present, it can be. But I agree entirely with the position taken by the member for Algoma that agreements should be confidential and it is up to the producer to decide what is and is not private information. If the government wants this information, it should come to the farmer for it. It should not be able to go some place else for it. In that case, the farmer has no control, or even any knowledge of what information is being given out concerning the business.

I think it is time we started taking a harder line on that kind of approach and this motion is a good start. In other words, if we are a democratic nation that puts a great deal of value in the individual and in the privacy of each one of us, then we must put safeguards into our legislation rather than leaving it open to any kind of meddling or information which can, not necessarily be harmful but which we do not necessarily want to be broadly known.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that we can gain support for this particular motion. It is a very small change, it just goes from "information being available without any consideration to the participant", to saying that the participant must be at least informed. If he has nothing to hide, there is going to be no problem; if he does have something to hide, it is going to be a little more difficult to get it, I suppose. But that is still his right.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, this motion by my colleague from Algoma shows the diligence with which he has reviewed this bill. This is absolutely necessary. We have discussed this with members on the opposite side of the House and their quick answer is that this permission will be given on the application form.

But there is nothing in the legislation saying that that request for permission must be on the application form. I think in this country it is necessary and it is assumed that this type of permission be asked for.

This motion amending the bill serves the purpose of keeping the government honest, in making sure that it asks for that permission and does not go after this information without asking the private individual for permission to do so.

Again, I ask the government to reconsider. It is only common sense that the legislation say what the agreements do at present. This is necessary in order to make it legal and right and proper, so that the producers can have the protection they are entitled to in Canada.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my two cents worth—three cents?

I think the amendment is utterly reasonable. The government, in effect, is saying to us: "You have our word. You have our promise that before any information is passed along to Revenue Canada, we will seek the permission of the producer. We will seek the permission of farmers". In fact, it is telling us that the forms already contain that provision. Well, I do not think that is good enough. When it comes to enacting good legislation, we should do it in a business-like way. Let us not leave anything to doubt.

I know the government says: "Our word is good. Do not worry, we are going to be honourable about this". If that is the case, I think it is quite reasonable to ask the government to go just one more step. Put it in the legislation. Put it there in black and white. Before anything like this is done, it will be put in legislation. It removes all doubt.

I hope that members opposite will realize what we are asking for and pass this motion.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put forward a couple of thoughts relative to Motion No. 8. Certainly, one very similar had been dealt with in committee.

In any event, just before touching on that, there was some reference made to the previous Motion No. 7 by the member for Algoma and I am sure I will be allowed the same indulgence.

It is fairly evident that we have a long border between the United States and Canada, some 3,000 or 4,000 miles and that border is not one that is made out of stone, concrete or brick. It is not a Berlin wall, Mr. Speaker. It is one in which there are a number of natural occurrences such as rivers, streams and valleys. Along the length of a border like that, there would be people who farm, for no other reason than the terrain and the topography of the land on both sides of the border.

The understanding has always been that the rules apply equally to those people on both sides of the line. Therefore, it would seem inconsistent to exclude Americans or others, who farm on this side of the border from participation in the Canadian programs when our people are accorded participation in like circumstances across the way.

The Western Grain Stabilization Act, I believe, was amended some time ago and among other things it allowed the privilege of participation to non-Canadians under these circumstances.

I think it was in that debate that the hon. member for Prince Albert at that time said, and I quote him, from the July 8, 1988 Hansard:

> There is a concern that has been expressed about whether to extend this privilege of stabilization to non-Canadians. I know that that has to be dealt with within the Charter and it is something that we need to look at a little more closely, although I have no great concern about it myself.

He had no concern at all about extending stabilization to Americans a couple of years ago. It is hard to understand why there would be any concern today with the extension of that privilege of the farm income protection act benefits on a reciprocal basis.

Motion No. 8 is one which promotes a little bit of mischief, because if it was contained in the bill in the form which is proposed by the member for Algoma, it would, I believe, leave a false impression, an implication that a producer would have a choice as to whether to permit the exchange of information between Revenue Canada and the administrators of the program when in fact that is not the case at all.

With this wording, I believe that anyone reading it, such as a producer would assume that there was a choice involved. For that reason I have some concerns.

There are a couple of good reasons why the requirement is in the bill in clause 10 as written. I think the first is just a matter of audit purposes. There is a considerable amount of taxpayers' money going into these programs. It has always been the case that the taxpayers of this country expect prudent management of their money and they expect accountability. They would certainly expect that the program would be able to withstand audit. Then it becomes a question of the manner of enforcement.

At this point I would like to refer to the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1990 in which the Auditor General had quite a bit to say in regard to the Department of National Revenue, and in particular, about the economies that could be affected through the use of computerization and through the use of matching. Indeed what he noted was among other things that most of the current matching process is highly automated and does not demand a great many human resources. He was saying that in the context of encouraging more use of computerization and more use of matching between sources of information in order to reduce the horrendous audit cost when you have people involved manually trying to track things down and to secure the information that they would require in the ordinary course, in the normal audit of any expenditure of taxpayers' money.

Again, the Auditor General mentions at page 566 of that report that the computer matching is highly productive and could be expanded:

> Many new computer systems have been implemented in the last ten years to improve taxpayer services, management information and enforcement activities.

And so on. It indicates beyond any question and recommends that it would be wise for government in terms of economy to move toward more computerization and more matching and less reliance on person-years and the archaic and inefficient methods of the past.

Certainly, from the point of view of audit, which I think is inherent in any expenditure of taxpayers' money and there is a considerable amount of it here, it is not unreasonable to expect that if that is going to be done, and I think it has to be done, then it ought to be done in the most expeditious, most efficient way possible because I believe that all members of the House would want the administration of these programs done in the most effective and least costly way possible in order that the benefits can be paid out to producers rather than utilized in bureaucracy and that sort of thing.

The second point I want to make in regard to this is that I hope there is a potential, in regard to NISA, the Net Income Stabilization Account, that there could be some form of automatic triggering because one of the options is the taxable income. It might well be possible that there could be an automatic trigger through the exchange of information between the two programs.

It is quite clear that the information cannot be divulged in any event without the consent of the taxpayer or the program participant and the forms under the regulations have, as I understand it, that wording in them, wording which has been contained in every other application form for similar programs.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I am quite amazed when I read the legislation and listen to some of the objections of the government members. Is this the same government that was so concerned about Revenue Canada and the Draconian methods that Revenue Canada used? Is this the same government where the member for Welland—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe introduced a taxpayers' bill of rights?

I would really encourage the member for Welland—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe to have a look at this legislation rather than leaving the House because it is totally destroying the piece of legislation that he was so proud of, the document that was called "The Taxpayers' Bill of Rights". The taxpayer's bill of rights is being raped by Bill C-98, and the member for Welland—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe walks out. What is going on here? Is this the same government? Are these the same people who were so concerned about the rights and the privacy and the legal rights of ordinary Canadians against Revenue Canada, against the big brother state? Yet, here they are willing to allow our farmers across the country to be totally open to Revenue Canada. Before they can participate in this program, they have to sign away their rights as individuals and allow Revenue Canada to go into their records at will for the purposes of this program.

Surely one has to draw the line somewhere. Surely we cannot accept that this is the Orwellian world of 1984. Certainly all members who are concerned about individual basic human rights, concerned about the encroachment of government—particularly the tax department—are people who should be rising in their seats today to support the amendment that our friend from Algoma has introduced in the House today.

It is a good amendment. It is one really that the basic Conservative philosophy would be supporting. Dare I say that if those members were sitting on this side of the House, they would be leading a charge; they would be advancing on to the throne, on to you Mr. Speaker, as they so bravely did in years gone by. They would make a tremendous last-ditch stand on this issue of preserving the right to privacy of our farmers when it comes to government computers and particularly to Revenue Canada.

When I talk to the folks back home about the GRIP and the NISA, farmers are just shaking their heads; they cannot entirely understand the program and they have not been given all of the information. I think, as well, when they recognize the loss of personal freedom in sections like the one we are debating today that gives Revenue Canada such vast powers, it will feed their cynicism.

A number of the farmers in my district are not certain that they can sign up on this program. They are quite outraged at the prospect of tying short-term assistance on to the necessity of supporting this program. In essence, what they are saying is that the way the government has set up the NISA and the GRIP, while it does not address the needs of the farm community, it appears they have to sign up for NISA and GRIP before they can take advantage of any ad hoc payment and program. They are angry that when they sign up they also sign away their rights to privacy. They are afraid of the Draconian method the government is using; the government is saying this is it, take it or leave it. If you leave it you are not going to benefit from any of the ad hoc programs. If you take it you are going to have to sign away your rights to privacy as far as income tax is concerned.

This Draconian way, this way of using the big black boots on the farm community, is something that is totally unacceptable back home. The farmers in my district don't like the program; it is not addressing their needs. They become more outraged the more they learn about it.

No wonder the government is in such a hurry to push this legislation through. It has had almost eight years now, seven years, to come up with a program. It introduces the legislation in what we all expect to be the dying days of this session. It wants to jam this thing through. It doesn't want to give it the proper scrutiny it deserves. It commits to the treasury potentially billions of dollars.

It does not want to listen to the suggestions that the opposition has come up with by which this program could become a smart program by targeting those in greatest need in order to have the maximum benefit of helping western agriculture. It is not interested in any of the suggestions. It just wants to jam it through with its boots. We find this to be totally unacceptable.

I too wish to indicate my support for the amendment that is in front of us today.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, The Battlefords—Meadow Lake is one of those constituencies that is very much involved in agriculture. It is a constituency which rests a few miles north of Saskatoon and runs all the way up into the forest land of Saskatchewan. I have within my constituency some of the best farmland, the highest-yielding farmland, in the province and I run right through to some of the poorest farmland, the most marginal farmland, in the province. Therefore, I have some of the farming community that has been intensively involved in grains production and, without diversification, has been very hard hit by the changes in grain prices in the world market.

I also have those people who have had to all their lives carve out a little piece of land with a couple of cows, some chickens and hogs, and a small piece of grain land. Those people are the ones who are on the edge, who have no funds whatsoever to put into a NISA program. They have nothing in the bank; they are going from day to day. They are heavily in debt, making up a large percentage of the debt. They have not been involved in crop insurance or western grain stabilization. Therefore, any premiums that are going to be paid for a GRIP or NISA program are brand new expenses for a good part of the people who farm in the north-central part of my constituency.

For that cross-section of Saskatchewan producers, I am trying to speak fairly clearly to the government opposite which is putting together a program, an agreement, that is not on the table. The legislation that we are trying to deal with today that simply enables the government to create that agreement. The farmers of Saskatchewan, as are the farmers in the rest of Canada, are not in any position to debate or even think about the specifics in that agreement. There are crop insurance people in Saskatchewan right now going door to door talking to farmers, telling them that they had better sign up for this program because the premier of Saskatchewan has said that if they do not sign up for this program, they will not be eligible for any other program that comes out of Saskatchewan or out of the federal government.

These people who need cash to get their crop in the ground this year, who need to find a way to have their debt restructured so that they can survive until such time as there is adequate income produced from their industry, who are relying on us in this Chamber to provide for them an income protection and stabilization program that meets their needs have to be astounded by the way in which all of this process is happening.

I want to speak as loudly and as clearly as I can to the government opposite, to the parliamentary secretary, to the minister, to the Prime Minister, and say that these people need long-term income stabilization programs to secure their future in the industry and to secure the future of the industry in Canada: the agrifood industry, the agriculture industry, the farm industry. Without it, we are going to lose it.

Therefore, because all of this is involved in these agreements that are not on the table, we are stuck with having to amend bits and pieces of very flawed pieces of legislation in order to try to make the point to the government opposite that things are needed that are not there. Because this bill does not address the big picture, we are reduced to talking about little pieces of that big picture.

Therefore, I support the motion that is on the floor today from the member for Algoma. He has identified another small piece of this legislation that needs to be addressed.

I am concerned. If the government does not support this motion, which says that no information submitted by a producer for the purpose of administering a program established under agreement, may be communicated, disclosed or made available to an official of the Department of National Revenue without prior written permission of the producer, I am concerned about what it is behind its thinking. What is it trying to do if it will not allow the producer to be the one who controls the information that goes to Revenue Canada?

Many of my producers have had a great deal of difficulty with Revenue Canada over the last few years. Many of my producers live in that area that is marked for the northern tax allowance benefit program. Many of those people have been told one thing by Revenue Canada one day, and the next day something else. It has ended up costing them $2,500 to $4,000 in the course of a year because of the way in which Revenue Canada has dealt with them. They do not trust Revenue Canada and they certainly do not trust this government in the way it is handling this type of situation.

I give a number of examples of this Revenue Canada activity. For example, when a producer signs on to the program and puts so much money into NISA, and has money matched by NISA and fills out the forms and does everything that needs to be done, that is not done for tax purposes. That is done for the business purposes of that farm operation. The piece of paper that has that information on it in the GRIP or the NISA program does not recognize that that producer may have that year been separated or divorced or lost a child or had a number of things happen within their family circumstances that has affected their income tax operation.

For this program to be able to transfer information about that farm operation from an agricultural agreement point of view, over to Revenue Canada, for Revenue Canada to interpret it, audit it, review it, do whatever Revenue Canada wants to, is a tremendous breach of the privacy and personal circumstances of those individual producers.

The information that is provided to the GRIP and NISA programs, when they are created and set up, have nothing to do with taxation matters. We fill out tax forms, we pay our taxes, we do what we are supposed to do. Revenue Canada has to accept those signed documents as being the documents that are, in essence, the documents for tax purposes. Not the GRIP and NISA agreements, not the GRIP and NISA forms, not the GRIP and NISA programs.

Therefore, I am very, very pleased with this amendment, as I have been with the amendments submitted by my colleague from Moose Jaw—Lake Centre here in addressing some of the things that have been missing from this legislation.

In the end, I would like to see the agreements come before this Parliament for full debate before they are accepted. I would like to see the future of agriculture as described by this government in terms of its programming for the next 50 years put in front of this Parliament for debate.

Growing Together, the paper that outlined in very general and nebulous terms what this government thinks it wants to do, has not been up for debate by this country and by this Parliament. We are very anxious to see some future for Canadian agriculture. Dealing with matters such as these, pieces of legislation that simply give the government carte blanche is something we do not want to do.

I appreciate the time and attention the members from Moose Jaw—Lake Centre and Algoma have given to this bill, and to my colleague and friend, the member from Mackenzie, who has worked so hard for us in agriculture matters. I am very much in support of this particular amendment and I will support it at the time of the vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) moved:

That Bill C-98 be amended in Clause 11 by striking out lines 21 and 22 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"members who shall represent Canada, the provinces concerned, producers and any other group of persons".

He said: Mr. Speaker, these amendments were brought forward from the committee. We do not have the final committee report of the bill. I would ask unanimous consent to read the modified version of this which has the same context:

That Clause 11 be amended by striking out lines 20 to 22 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"special measures committee which shall consist of members representing Canada, the provinces concerned, producers and any other group of persons.

I think there is agreement around the House to accept that as read.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): So ordered.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a few comments to this motion if I could.

This motion is a good motion. It is motion No. 9 in the list of amendments. It has to do with clause 11 of the bill, which talks about a special measures committee.

A special measures committee is to review this bill where the minister is of the opinion that exceptional circumstances are important. In other words, where the third line of defence comes into place, there will be a committee that will be formed to advise the minister on what form a third line of defence should take.

The problem with clause 11, as was discussed many times during the committee debate, was that there are a lot of "mays" in this clause. It says:

That the minister may implement such procedures or other special measures as the minister considers necessary to determine the appropriate action to be taken to remedy those circumstances.

In other words, the third line of defence. It goes on to state:

That the minister may appoint a committee to be known as a special measures committee consisting of members who may—

This is the crucial word in this clause:

—who may represent Canada, may represent a province, may represent producers and may represent any group of persons who the minister considers appropriate.

In other words, the minister is to appoint a committee, but on that committee he can put anybody he wants. It may represent Canada, the provinces, the producers. Of course, it may not represent them either.

The concern is that we should have a "shall" instead of a "may". Certainly, it would make people on this side of the House feel more comfortable, and I am sure it would make the producers across this country feel a little more comfortable if they know that the special measures committee shall consist of members who represent Canada, the provinces concerned, the producers and any other group.

What it does is solidify in legislation the fact that there will be a group formed that will be representative of producers; in fact, it will include them. We do not know what is going to happen down the road with this legislation. We do not know when third line defences will be required.

It is very important that we pass legislation that does not allow the government to get away with things. We do not know what type of government we will have in the future. We are sometimes surprised at the type of government we have had in the past. If we had a New Democratic government of course these matters would be different.

It is important regardless of which party is in power. All kidding aside, it is important whatever party is in power that there are some assurances, that the people of Canada have some assurances, that the producers of this country have some assurances that there is some protection for them in legislation.

What we are saying is that this is an important clause to be put in place. I am pleased that this matter was brought forth.

I want to make a couple of other remarks. This group, this committee that will be formed, is going to be a very important committee. The third line of defence is certainly an important factor in this whole bill. There is still much discussion to go on with respect to the third line of defence. As I said it will come from time to time. It is a worth-while committee which will be doing very important work. I am pleased that the government will see fit to let this motion pass.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Motions Nos. 10 and 11 will be grouped for debate. They are in the names of the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings and the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre. Both motions are in order.

They will be grouped for debate and an affirmative vote on Motion No. 10 obviates the need for a vote on Motion No. 11.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings) moved:

That Bill C-98 be amended in Clause 19 by striking out lines 25 to 34 at page 16 and substituting the following therefor:

"19.(1) A review of the operation of this Act shall be completed:

(a) on any day before April 1, 1993, and

(b) the expiration of every fifth year after that date by the Minister, who may for the purpose of that review consult with representatives of such organizations as the Minister considers appropriate.

(2) The Minister shall cause:

(a) the results of any review carried out under subsection (1), and

(b) any report received by the Minister under paragraph 5(3)(a) to be laid".

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre) moved:

That Bill C-98 be amended in Clause 19 by striking out lines 27 to 36 at page 16 and substituting the following therefor:

"(a) no later than October 1, 1992, and

(b) no later than the expiration of every fifth year after that day by the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Agriculture or any special committee of the House of Commons established for the purpose, which may receive evidence from representatives of such organizations as the Committee considers appropriate."

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, just to clarify this motion, it looks like the rewording of it changes considerably the wording in the bill as we have seen it before. It does not do that, other than the fact that the original bill says that a review of the operation of this act shall be completed.

In subparagraph (a) it says: "on any day before April 1, 1996".

The purpose of this motion is to make sure that the review is done prior to that. That is five years down the road. I know the government has agreed to a review committee earlier today, of which we are very appreciative, but I think it is important that we change this date. This motion says: "on any day before April 1, 1993", which is two years down the road, and it goes on to say at every five-year interval thereafter.

That is the purpose of the motion. I think it is worth while that it be placed in the bill at this stage, and I will leave the debate at that.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, the motion I have placed before the House proposes two changes to the legislation as it now stands. The first, as does the previous motion, calls for an earlier review than is set out in the bill.

The bill calls for a review within the next five years and concern has been expressed by some producers, certainly producers from the prairie pools, that in fact there should be a review before that time, preferably starting within a year from now. We are dealing with new legislation that is going to have a lot of loopholes and problems. It is important that we try to get it right. In fact we look forward to a review process that is going to improve the program, that is going to provide farmers and producers across this country with a good program.

The second part of my motion deals with that review. The way the legislation reads now in clause 19, a review will simply be done by the minister and tabled in front of the House. Quite frankly, I have some concern with that in a couple of areas.

First of all, this is a bill that is dealing with hundreds of millions of dollars. This is an expensive program. This is also the first program coming out of the Growing Together paper. Hopefully there will be others, but this is the first piece of legislation. What we are doing is casting a new form; we are casting a new way for agriculture in this country. There is a new direction that is being set by this legislation.

It is very important as we set a new direction for agriculture that we ensure that there is a proper review process in place to fine-tune the legislation. This legislation needs some fine-tuning, but it is important that we have a review process in place that is going to deal with the review and the necessary changes down the road.

The best place that can be done is through Parliament. We are all elected here to represent our various ridings and collectively the country. What has happened with Parliament over the years is that we have an executive that tends to dominate this place, especially with majority governments. We have a situation sometimes where we have a few members of the House who really dictate what goes through this House.

What we are talking about here is a fundamental matter involving the democracy of this nation. This motion does not call for the minister to do a review but for a committee of the House of Commons or the Standing Committee of Agriculture to do the review.

The government has indicated, and we raised this in committee, why do we have to have that? The committee of agriculture can review this any time it wants and so on. It is more important than that. Although the committee of agriculture can do the review, there is no guarantee in legislation that it will do the review.

We are seeing right now in this House all sorts of negotiations and problems happening with respect to the Standing Orders which are now in the process of being changed. In fact, the proposed set of Standing Orders that I saw are going to further limit the abilities of members of Parliament to carry out their duty. It is for that very reason that we need some kind of protection in legislation so that producers will know that in fact there is to be an all-party committee that is to have a good and thorough review of this bill.

There are precedents in this House for that. Most of them are relatively recent. I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the Employment Equity Act which in section 13 says that "five years after the coming into force of this act, and at the end of every three-year period thereafter, a comprehensive review of the provisions and operation of this act including the effect of those provisions shall be undertaken by such committee of the House of Commons as designated or established by the House for that purpose".

An act to amend the Parole Act and the Penitentiary Act says in section 14 that "three years after the coming into force of this act a comprehensive review of the provisions and operations of certain sections of this act shall be undertaken by such committee of the House of Commons or both Houses of Parliament as may be designated or established by Parliament for that purpose".

The Privacy Act in subsection 75(1) says that "the administration of this act shall be reviewed on a permanent basis by such committee of the House of Commons, of the Senate or of both Houses of Parliament, as may be designated or established by Parliament for that purpose".

The Access to Information Act says as well, in section 75, that "the administration of this act shall be reviewed on a permanent basis by such committee of the House of Commons, of the Senate or of both Houses of Parliament, as may be designated or established by Parliament for that purpose".

The Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act, in section 56, also calls for a comprehensive review by a committee of the House of Commons that is designated or established by Parliament for that purpose.

The Official Languages Act in section 88 does the same thing.

There is a number of precedents and what these precedents do is establish in the legislation a permanent guarantee that this legislation will have a proper and thorough review by a committee of the House of Commons. We have seen it, as I said, with the proposed changes to the Standing Orders which are to limit further the power of members to carry out their function as members properly.

I have only been a member since 1988, but I have talked to members who have been here for a lot longer than myself. They are saying that they continue to see an erosion of their powers as individual members and that it is more difficult for them to carry out their duties. I find that one of the most satisfying aspects of being a member is working within committees. I find committee work is most rewarding. We have all-party committees so we have a view from all political perspectives. The committee is on an open basis. It gets together and decides what it is going to look at, who is going to be a witness in front of the committee, and sets out the task for that committee. It is gratifying, enjoyable and rewarding. We have to be allowed to do our job. If the government continues to hamstring us then it is impossible to do that.

It is important to put this motion into the statute to guarantee to the producers in this country that there is going to be some thorough review, because this is a fundamental change in agriculture as we know it today. We are on the road to carving out a new direction. The government has talked, and I can say with some justification that there is consultation. There was consultation through part of this process.

After having looked at the legislation, farmers are now having some second thoughts on it. In front of our committee members of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture said: "We have to be careful. We are in a period of trusting the government to bring in decent legislation." They also said: "We have not really been consulted since August and we are hoping that the government will bring in proper legislation."

There have been comments like those and comments from other producers before the committee. Others who have appeared before the committee have said: "Look it, we are not really sure exactly which way the government is going with this legislation".

As committee members we have not seen any of the proposed agreements. They will not technically be signed until this bill is passed, but we have not seen the proposed agreements. We know snippets here and snippets there. We know what is going on in some areas, but we have not had a chance to look at this legislation. It is for that very reason that we should have in this legislation this clause that allows members of Parliament to carry out their duties properly so they can do a proper and thorough investigation of this bill at appropriate times, knowing full well that it will not be taken away at the whim of a majority government that wants to change the Standing Orders. It is for that reason that I do hope that the government and my colleagues in the Liberal Party will support this worth-while amendment.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I guess it is a matter of either supreme confidence or supreme arrogance on the part of the government that it thinks that any legislation it can make is going to be perfect the first time out.

If we had a great deal of past experience that the legislation which has come out of this government can withstand the test of time, maybe we would say it was supreme confidence that would allow it to say: "We do not need to look this legislation over for five years". However, we have many examples of poor legislation, legislation badly drafted and rushed through or pushed through without the right kind of vetting.

This particular legislation has within it a considerable amount of openness. On the surface that sounds like a good thing, but it is it is legislation which is allowing agreements to be established between the provinces and the federal government. It is giving a body outside the Parliament of Canada a considerable amount of power to spend taxpayers' money.

As I said, it may seem to be good legislation now but there is no guarantee. Possibly we might have even gone further than these two amendments and suggested that we have a continuous review of how this legislation is going to work. We could have suggested that we put on that review committee a number of producers from each of the provinces, from the administration of the plans and from the federal government.

This suggestion says: "Let us take a look at this as early as possible, in suitable times, and continue to look at it so that we have a fairly good control of how it develops".

As I said, if we could be confident that it was going to work and we had the experience that most pieces of legislation worked well, we would say: "Yes, go ahead. We will hold it for five years and then we will start looking at it". But we have to assume that it is not going to work. Many of the people who have looked at it closely are already saying that there are flaws in it which we are going to have to deal with as early as possible.

We are being told things almost daily by farmers who are becoming very knowledgeable about this legislation and about the agreements that this legislation allows. They are saying: "This is going to be good legislation for a couple of years, but what about that third year? There are certain things about this legislation that we already do not like. We should look at those right away of we should look at those at a very early stage".

If this legislation goes the way that some people expect it to go, it will go into huge deficits. Unless we have a consultation and review process in place which draws this Parliament back in, it is going to become a matter between the two ministers of agriculture within the agreement they have signed. That is not the intent of the legislation. The intent of the legislation is to allow this Parliament to establish a structure for the agreements.

It is taxpayers' money we are putting on the line here, and a considerable amount of money it is. Therefore, it behoves us as responsible legislators to make sure that we protect not only the farmer in a different situation who can be gouged by this kind of legislation or these kinds of agreements, but also the taxpayer who foots the bill in the end if this becomes a costly runaway project.

Much as I want to have legislation that is going to help the farmer, I would much rather have stable legislation which makes the farmer look at it and say: "Yes, I can be part of this for the next ten years". If it is going wrong, I do not want him to leave. I want him to get in there and help fix it up. He must have enough confidence in it so that he would be part of the rearranging of the requirements which make it a good program. If we do not have the kind of review that is being suggested by these two motions, then we depend upon the minister.

There are three things about this review of which we should be careful. First, who shall do it? Second, how often should it be done? Third, to whom should it go, who should be involved in it and who should look at the monitoring of it? If we do that, we will have some kind of continuous monitoring of the situation and the parts of the legislation and the agreements which we already recognize as being flawed can be fixed up so that they will work.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few short words.

An hon. member: Do you promise?

Mr. Althouse: Yes, I promise. The main point of this motion is to draw attention to what could be a real problem with the way the bill is drafted now. As those of us who are watching the drafting of agreements between the provinces and the federal government are aware, those agreements are being signed for five-year periods. They come into effect on April 1 and they will lapse and be re-signed on April 1, 1996. It is extremely difficult to do a proper review, a serious review, if the review is reported in at the same time as the new agreements are signed.

It is extremely important, if we are going to have a serious review, that it be done at least a year before those next agreements are signed, or the whole effort is futile. Therefore, I suggest that we pick one of these dates that are before us—they are only five or six months apart—and have the review done after a couple of years of experience. In that way, we will have some idea as parliamentarians, as farm groups, as provinces, and as federal negotiators, as to what pitfalls to be looking for well in advance of negotiating and signing the next set of agreements.

The way the legislation is currently, it has no chance of being a realistic review process if the review must be tabled for public discussion at the same time as the new agreements are being signed. The review will have no effect at all if those two dates coincide, because the public will not have a chance to take advantage of the studies and the evidence that was found during the course of the review. New agreements will be signed without the public or the farm groups being fully aware of the shortcomings of the previous arrangement.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I also rise in support of the amendments introduced. What the amendment is asking for is that we put in this legislation a time for the review; one suggestion is 1992 and the other suggestion is 1993, with just a few months' difference between the two.

The essence, as my colleagues from Mackenzie and Moose Jaw—Lake Centre have pointed out, is the need to have this legislation reviewed not in the distant future but to have it reviewed a year from its coming into effect. As has been pointed out, this is a commitment of large sums of money.

Second, there are various and genuine concerns which have been expressed about this program. In the province of Saskatchewan, the provincial government has organized meetings across the province to try to explain GRIP and NISA. It has not been all that successful because it does not know the answers to the questions that the farmers are asking. There is a lot of uncertainty about this program. There is uncertainty about what the benefits will be. There is uncertainty about how much the fees will be. There is uncertainty about how it will work. Those who are out there to explain the legislation cannot really answer the questions that farmers have been raising.

That is why the lukewarm reaction to the GRIP and NISA programs is not surprising. Many farmers are just backing off. In part, they are saying: we don't know enough about this. We are not prepared to commit ourselves and the sums of money that appear to be necessary to be able to enrol in the program. We are not prepared yet to commit that. That is another reason why this program should be reviewed.

It should be reviewed as well in one or two years time on the effectiveness of the program. Is it really doing what it is supposed to be doing? Is it creating the foundation for our farm economy, and is it doing it in an effective way? Or is it becoming a boondoggle?

There is a part of me that sniffs another scientific research tax credit scam here. It was a quickie little thing that the Liberals had introduced in the dying days of the government in 1984 and it resulted in the loss of several billions of dollars of money that was not properly used towards research and development. A lot of it was wasted, Mr. Speaker. Had that money been addressed to research and development then the state of research and development would have been in a much better position in Canada today than it is.

I have that same gnawing feeling here, that we are legislation that is so loose, its draftsmanship is so awkward, that it could result in the loss of large amounts of public money, most of which will not go to the people who need it the most. Most of that public money conceivably could go to a few individuals, while the vast majority of the farmers who need the money, those who are struggling to survive, who are being sucked under and down, are not the ones who will be receiving the type of benefits they will need in order to survive.

That is the fear I have about this program. I might be wrong. I hope I am wrong, I hope it does what the government claims it will do; that it will help family farms survive, and will allow a stable agricultural economy to flourish in Canada. I hope it does that. But let us make certain it does that.

Why not allow a review in 1992-93 to make certain that it does do that, to see if there is any need for some tinkering, for some amendments, for some adjustments? Every program needs adjustments. That is part of the process of experiences; you experience things, you learn things, and you adjust as you go along.

Why does the Minister of Finance not do that? That is a whole other question about the Minister of Finance.

But what we are appealing for here in our amendment is for the government to recognize that it might need adjustments, and to allow those adjustments to be written into the legislation to ensure that this review will occur which involves all the farm organizations and the farm groups, that will involve Parliament and a committee of Parliament, the Standing Committee on Agriculture. These too should all be involved in the process of the review.

As members of this House, especially those who represent farm communities, we will pick up on how this program works and how it doesn't work. We will very quickly know the little idiosyncrasies in this program, the types of situations that even farm representatives, farm bureaucrats and even the minister in his office cannot even think of. We will pick up the little nuances and bring that experience and that information on to the floor of the House of Commons and into the committee on agriculture, so that our experience and the knowledge that we pick up in being members of Parliament are part of the input into this review process.

The amendment before us is a piece of common sense. I sincerely hope the government will be gracious in accepting the amendment because I believe it will strengthen the legislation. Hopefully it will create a bill, create a farm program that will do what I am sure all members of the House would like to see it do, enable a viable farm economy for Canada.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I just want to comment on Motions Nos. 10 and 11. Between the two I assume that Motion No. 10 will come to a vote first. It seems to me that it is the preferable motion because it suggests that a review be made by April 1, 1993. GRIP really starts August 1, 1991. The terminal point for that crop year is August 1, 1992. The final pay-out comes some time after that, perhaps in the fall of 1992.

If we are going to have a reasonable review of at least one full year of the operation of GRIP, to try to do it before April 1, 1993 is simply not practical.

I would hope that if the government is accepting either one of these amendments that it would accept the first one standing in the name of the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings. It allows for one full year of operation of GRIP plus a few months afterwards so that we can at least have a report and a review which really reflects one complete crop year operation, taking into account premiums, the benefits paid out and the over-all operation to ensure that it is a reasonable and fair assessment of the value of the program.

I hope these comments will be taken into consideration by the government. We are very appreciative of the fact that Motion No. 5 has been accepted and does provide for some review, although it does not specify an exact date but provides for a continuing review without putting the deadline of April 1, 1993, as Motion No. 10 does.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have just three short points as the clock winds around to six o'clock. First, I want to thank the Minister of Agriculture for his presence in the House and take the opportunity to say to him that the farmers in The Battlefords—Meadow Lake and in Saskatchewan want to see some bridge financing now. They want to see some pay-outs in time for planting this spring. They are going to have to know about this now.

On behalf of the producers of Saskatchewan, of western Canada, in particular The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, I ask the Minister of Agriculture to make that pitch to cabinet and to make an announcement to the people on the prairies.

Mr. de Jong: Don't tie it to GRIP and NISA.

Mr. Taylor: As the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle indicates, don't tie it to GRIP and NISA. I think that is very important too. Do not say: "Sign up or you don't get this". That is a very important point. The finance is necessary now. We know GRIP and NISA is coming later.

The second point is also on a congratulatory note. I notice in Bill C-98 a clause concerning environmental assessment. This is the first time I have noticed an environmental assessment written into government legislation. I think this is a major step forward in the legislative process. I want to encourage the government to continue to do this in all of its legislative processes, as well as all of its policy making. I have a couple of problems with the way in which it is written into the bill, but I am pleased to see that the step has been taken. The fact that we could have environmental assessment after the damage has been done by the bill is a matter that concerns me.

The third item I want to raise is this amendment. I support the motion in front of us, because I believe a review of the bill within the timeframe set out in the amendment is much more important than the timeframe set out in the bill itself.

The points that were made by the hon. member for Mackenzie are very well taken, that in fact this review must take place before any renegotiation, any new signing of any agreement occurs. The review process is very important.

As my friend from Moose Jaw—Lake Centre pointed out, it is very important we ensure that the review process is conducted by parliamentarians who have regular day to day discussions, communications, consultation with the producers who are the people who put us into this place to speak on their behalf in matters such as this.

With those few points, I hope the amendments that were put forward here today by members of the opposition will be supported by the government. I wish us all well in the deliberations that come and on our speeches at third reading, whenever that takes place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division of the proposed motion stands deferred.

Normally at this time the House would proceed to taking the deferred division at report stage of the bill now before the House. However, pursuant to Standing Order 94.(2)(b) the recorded divisions will stand deferred until 7 p.m. Monday, March 25, 1991.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. Marcel Danis (for Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-79, an Act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act, be read the second time and concurred in.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier would like to be here to discuss this important motion. He supports the motion; he has worked very hard on this bill with hon. members on all sides of the House. I want to thank him on behalf of our caucus for his assistance on this bill. I know that were he here, he would speak for it. He had an important meeting in his constituency at this time.

I may say that we support the amendments. We believe the act will improve Parliament and we support it.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, briefly, I know how hard members have worked on this bill and how quickly we would like to it to be given Royal Assent. Therefore, I move:

That the question be now put.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, as you know, there have been long deliberations about Bill C-79, the Parliament of Canada Act.

Some considerable progress has been made in dealing with the concerns that have arisen with regard to it.

However, there are still outstanding issues which need to be considered, which need to be debated. It would be unfortunate and undesirable to move to votes at this time with outstanding issues remaining. There are still some serious questions which need to be addressed. I think we need to spend some more time in trying to ensure that there is an arrangement which can be reached to the satisfaction of all the parties.

I do not think that would necessarily take all that long, and I do not think it is necessary to be precipitous. I notice, Mr. Speaker, that it is 6 p.m.

• (1800)

Mr. Hawkes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Because of the important nature of it, I think there might be a predisposition in the House to not see the clock for a bit if people do want to put some of this perspective on the table.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there consent not to see the clock?

Some hon. members: No.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, one theme that has come up repeatedly in the past few federal budgets is that Canada is facing a huge deficit. Too large a percentage of Canadians' tax dollars is going to paying the interest on the deficit. If moves are not made to decrease the deficit immediately, then the burden on future generations will be unmanageable.

I am sure we are all in agreement about the seriousness of the deficit and that reducing it is important. However, what we do not agree on is how best to reduce it.

Perhaps I can just make an analogy to describe what I see as the present government's method of reducing the deficit. Suppose a homeowner had a leaky roof but no money to repair it. Surely, it would be wise to find the money somehow in order to repair that roof. By not repairing the roof, in time it will fall and the homeowner will have no place to live. In addition, the loss of a substantial investment will take place.

Unfortunately, it is clear that the government and its economic policies follow an approach which is permitting the roof to fall in. It is not investing in the future.

We have seen cutbacks to social programs of all kinds that would have been inconceivable 10 years ago. Many feel that programs that make us proud to be Canadians, such as medicare, will soon be lost with the lessening of federal contributions to the provinces.

Colleges and universities are being forced to raise tuition fees because with less support from the federal government, this is the only way that they feel they can raise money to ensure continued programs.

The result is increasing inaccessibility of post-secondary education with more and more less well-off Canadians being turned away from an education. All these cutbacks are in the name of reducing the deficit. All Canadians must do their part is what we have been told by the government.

Are all these cutbacks really going to help reduce the deficit in the long run? I fear that by cutting back on social programs, we are allowing the roof to slowly cave in. The price we will have to pay to fix it in the future will be very great, indeed.

A Senate committee which looked at child poverty recently heard a report estimating that children who drop out from school due to poverty over the next 20 years will cost the economy $33 billion. That is an amount greater than this year's entire deficit.

Are poor families getting any help from the government in this budget? Clearly, they are not. On top of the blow of the GST, we are seeing further limits to cap funding, cuts to transfer payments to the provinces and still no national child care strategy.

There are no spending measures intended to combat the effects of the recession. Unemployment premiums will rise and the benefits from unemployment insurance have decreased. This is not good news, Mr. Speaker, as I am sure you will agree, for the 10.2 per cent of Canadians who are unemployed.

All these cuts I have just mentioned will certainly have an impact on poor Canadian families and on their children. Children are poor because their parents are poor. I think that, all too often, this government ignores this fact.

When we hear about 1.4 million Canadians being out of work, that is not just 1.4 million Canadians who are suffering. It is many more than that in terms of families with children who are finding it difficult to provide basic food, shelter and clothing for themselves.

That is 1.4 million families with children who are at risk of dropping out of school because of poverty. That is happening at a cost of $33 billion to the economy over 20 years as predicted before the Senate committee.

Is this the kind of social financial planning that will reduce the deficit, cut spending here and there to save now with the result being huge expenditures down the road to pay for those, by comparison, relatively small cuts now? I do not think so.

Perhaps I could provide another example: the case of low birth weight babies. Annually, Canada has spent over $200 million a year caring for low birth weight babies. All these costs do not end just with the initial care. Low birth-weight babies are at high risk of infant mortality, many illnesses, intellectual language and motor disabilities, increased rates of school failure and are at high risk of being socially maladaptive.

Would it not be wise to provide poor pregnant women with adequate food and nutrition before the baby is born? The cost would be marginal in comparison to the huge financial and human costs incurred after they are born. I do not think anybody could argue that this would not be a wise investment. Yet the government continues to ignore these problems in Canada, sending the message to poorer Canadians that they must do their part to help fight the deficit.

The fact of the matter is that if the government only invested in poor families now, the poor would be able to do more than their fair share to help fight the deficit later. They would help save the government many times over what it is saving by cutting social programs.

I am past appealing to members of the present government on the basis of their compassion, their compassion for poor children who are ridiculed at school because they wear clothes from the Salvation Army, and who cannot stay awake in school because they have not had anything to eat for breakfast. I am past the point of asking for compassion for the single mother who works eight hours a day for minimum wage.

I am trying to appeal to the only thing that the government seems to understand or care about and that is the bottom line. To invest today in Canadians is a good investment; it will save billions of dollars in the future. The alternative, which is presently being followed, is to save a relatively small amount of money now, with the result being a generation of Canadian children being sacrificed to poverty, only to incur greater expenses in the future.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to respond to the hon. member's question and attempt to explain government spending and transfer payments to the provinces. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not seem to understand how the federal system of transfer payments to the provinces works. The two main ways the government transfers sums of money to the provinces are what we call established programs financing and equalization payments.

Mr. Speaker, established programs financing is money that is apportioned equally to all provinces on a per capita basis. Equalization consists in payments made to the so-called poorer provinces. Most provinces receive both transfer and equalization payments. This includes Quebec and a number of other provinces.

The provinces are given this money to spend as they see fit. This year, over $36 billion will be transferred by the federal government to the provinces, who will use this money to finance education, hospitals, and all other areas under their jurisdiction. Mr. Speaker, federal transfers to the provinces were not cut in the latest Budget because this year—if I compare with next year and two years from now—the provinces will receive more money than they received last year. There was a reduction in the increase, and I am sure the hon. member will understand when I explain this in terms of his salary. His salary hasn't been cut, but the increase to which he is entitled has been reduced. He will get a raise just the same, however, and this is exactly what the government and the Budget are doing with transfer payments to the prvoinces.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time has expired.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to address an issue of major importance for Canadians generally, but more specifically for those in the Montreal area.

On December 10 last, I directed a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration concerning the tragic job situation in the Province of Quebec. At the time, Quebec had lost 87,000 jobs over the previous six months and I had predicted that the situation would deteriorate even further. Mr. Speaker, I was right.

As recently as three months ago, I asked the Minister to take concrete measures to create long-term jobs as well as implement immediate programs to assist working men and women who had just lost their jobs.

• (1810)

In her reply at the time, the Minister of Employment and Immigration stated that employment programs were available in Quebec and that these programs would bring results which would meet my expectations.

I must say today that, as far as job creation is concerned, I am not at all satisfied with the results this Tory government's initiatives have brought to the Montreal area.

And the basis of the information I have received from Statistics Canada, I must conclude that the programs to which the Minister alluded to, last December, were nothing but empty shells.

Mr. Speaker, let us have a look at the results the Conservatives have obtained with their job creation initiatives. Today, one out of every four Montrealers lives under the poverty line. The unemployment rate on the territory which includes the Island of Montreal and Island of Laval reached 15.1 per cent in February, according to Statistics Canada. Of all the major Canadian centres, Montreal had the highest unemployment rate. Some 225,000 Montrealers are unemployed.

Such is the result brought about by this government's employment policies. Although the unemployment rate in the Montreal area keeps increasing, we are still without any economy recovery program to create long-term jobs.

On top of this economic flight we now have to contend with the last Tory budget. This Budget, tabled on February 26, is not providing any assistance program to the unemployed. Quite the contrary, Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Finance announced in his Budget speech a $100 million cut from its Canadian Jobs Strategy.

Another factor which is hardly conducive to job creation is the research and development funding reduction. As evidence of this, total 1987 federal government expenditures for that item amounted to 1.4 per cent of the gross national product, as compared to only 1.28 per cent now.

Mr. Speaker, I am asking the Minister of Employment how does she expect Canadians to believe that this government is serious when it affirms that it wants to create permanent jobs and help the unemployed when in fact all the basic job creation programs are reduced?

Then again, Mr. Speaker, bankruptcy figures contribute precious little to restore the confidence of the unemployed looking for work. In excess of 11,000 companies went belly up in 1990, and this figure has been on the increase ever since. The result of these bankruptcies is a direct increase in unemployment levels. I have already pointed out that Montreal's unemployment rate now stands at 15.1 per cent. Unemployed Montrealers are not in a mood to rejoice when they see these figures.

Quebec is not immune to the havoc stemming from the bankruptcy trend. The number of Quebec bankruptcies soared to 40 per cent in the first months of 1991. Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada officials tell us that 1,618 individuals have sought protection under the Bankruptcy Act. Yet the minister told me on December 10 that I would be pleased at the outcome of job creation programs.

Who can possibly rejoice over a 40 per cent rise in the number of bankruptcies? Mr. Speaker, who can possibly rejoice over an unemployment rate topping 15 per cent?

I can assure the Minister of Employment and Immigration that nobody is pleased in Montreal. Would the minister care to ask the 1,800 General Motors employees who have just been told they will be laid off for one year whether they are going to be pleased?

I spoke about the economic situation in Montreal on a number of occasions since December 10, and again yesterday, Mr. Speaker, and I am still waiting for concrete measures designed to boost the economy in the region of Montreal.

So again I ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration what measures does her government intend to take to create jobs in Montreal before it is too late? What does the government have to offer to the 225,000 people who are out of work in the region of Montreal? Mr. Speaker, let us hope again that she has more than pious wished to express.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): I am pleased to answer my hon. colleague from Saint-Léonard who, I must say, has got quite a nerve to come and talk about problems in Montreal. I would like to quote a few statistics, Mr. Speaker, if I may. My colleague quoted several, but here is one more, Mr. Speaker.

I was in private practice as a lawyer before I was elected to this House in 1984, and during the three years of Liberal rule from 1981 to 1984, my hon. colleague's own party, 4,000 jobs were lost—that is right, Mr. Speaker, not created but lost—in the Montreal region.

Since this government was elected in 1984, 276,000 new jobs created in Quebec, 83,000 of which in the Montreal region, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gagliano: What about unemployment!

Mr. Vincent: When you were talking, I listened. I would ask for the same consideration. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, 83,000 jobs were created in the Montreal region by this government and its policies, compared to zero, actually minus 4,000, for the Liberal government from 1980 to 1984.

I would have a few more statistics for the hon. member, Mr. Speaker. Again, the hon. member is requesting policies and programs, but let me quote some figures to show what this government has accomplished since 1984. Employment rates are higher, the misery index is lower and the average family income, after having decreased by 1.8 per cent between 1981 and 1984, increased by 5.7 per cent from 1984 to 1989 in constant dollars, Mr. Speaker.

In the province of Quebec, the number of families with incomes below the poverty line decreased by 26.7 per cent between 1984 and 1989, while it had increased by 22.2 per cent between 1981 and 1984. Mr. Speaker, the last budget—

Mr. Gagliano: Come and tell that to the people of Montreal!

Mr. Vincent: —will once again ensure that these figures remain in the black for Montreal and the rest of the province. In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to tell my hon. colleague that we have no lesson to take from his party.

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, on June 7, 1990, I rose in this Chamber to ask a question about the northern tax allowance, a matter which is very important to a large number of residents in my constituency in northwest Saskatchewan.

My question was not adequately answered by the Minister of Finance at that time, and subsequently he has announced that a new permanent program will be established to replace the current one, the one that we found most unfair and discriminating.

However, during the past year, and for some during the past 18 months, residents of my constituency have been left in the dark about how the old tax program and now the new one would be applied in their area. For one part of my constituency the question is still not resolved, and for another the resolution of the question is totally inadequate. I am still trying to get this government to acknowledge that a fundamental unfairness is affecting the residents of the towns of Loon Lake, Makwa, and the rural municipalities of Loon Lake and Beaver River.

I have contacted the finance minister and the minister responsible for Revenue Canada on numerous occasions, and they are well aware that the people in these communities and rural municipalities were once declared eligible for the northern tax benefit in 1987 but were then subsequently reviewed and disqualified and forced to pay back taxes for which they had been eligible under the program. They were asked to pay back taxes with fines, interest and penalties, including court costs for some who took the matter to tax court and some now in the Federal Court of Canada.

There are two bits of unfairness in all of this. First, the people of these areas were told one thing and then assessed differently and penalized for it. Second, they remain as isolated and northern as any of the other residents in the surrounding areas who are eligible for the northern tax benefit.

Let us take the village of Pierceland, for example, which is inside the boundaries of the rural municipality of Beaver River. By a special order, the people of Pierceland are eligible for the northern tax benefits but the rural residents who may live 50 feet outside the town's boundaries are not eligible.

A nurse at the hospital who lives in town will get the benefit; the nurse who lives out of town does not. There is no fairness in that program.

Another example is a teacher who lives in the town of Loon Lake but works in the town of Meadow Lake, a half hour drive away. That teacher who lives in Loon Lake does not get the northern tax benefit, but the teacher who may live across the street from the school in Meadow Lake does get the benefit. That is not fair.

I might add that the new program established by the minister does not correct the unfairness of this. I want to ask the minister to put Loon Lake, Makwa, the rural municipality of Loon Lake, and the rural municipality of Beaver River on par with the program for the towns of Meadow Lake, Pierceland and Goodsoil.

I also want to ask the Minister of Finance to re-evaluate the new program to ensure that there is justice within it. For most residents in my constituency currently eligible for the benefit, the benefit program will be phased out by the 1995 tax year under the new program.

All of these people presently benefiting from the tax program should not be disentitled by 1995. They are northern and isolated by definition. If they are considered to be in need of this tax break today, I see no reason why they should be considered less in need in the future when they are asked to be phased out of the program.

As I see it, all Canadians should pay tax and for the taxes we pay we must receive a service. For the residents of southern and urban Canada the direct government benefits for their taxes paid are accessible. For those who live in Ottawa for example the services of government are more accessible than for those who live outside of Ottawa. For those who live in southern and urban Saskatchewan, the benefits of government are much more accessible than the benefits available to those who live in northern and isolated communities.

But every resident of Canada pays tax and theoretically it is an equal portion of tax. For northern residents, the benefits are not as accessible as for those in the southern part of the program. The northern tax benefit, as I understand it, simply recognizes that northern residents do not have equal access to government programs and returns to them some of their tax dollars in compensation for that lack of access.

Otherwise, our unfair tax program is even more unfair with northern and rural people paying a greater share than is warranted. I am hoping the Minister of Finance can correct this.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, according to the northern tax allowance program, which came into effect in 1987, every person who has been living in an eligible community for at least 6 months is entitled to the maximum $450 monthly deduction. Furthermore, the employee and his family are entitled to a deduction for travelling expenses paid up by the employer, including up to two trips a year for vacation purposes, as well as any travel taken for medical reasons.

Under the 1987 program, determination of eligible communities created some administrative problems because the criteria were applied on a local basis. It was time-consuming and led to mistakes. Problems surfaced because certain communities were eligible while neighbouring towns were not. This had to be replaced.

To this end, the Minister of Finance established, on April 29, 1988, the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas. Its mandate was to look into the eligibility criteria and to make recommandations for improving the program. The task force submitted its report to the minister on October 27, 1989.

The task force members took 18 months to study the question and prepare their report. They held consultations across Canada and made a thorough analysis of the subject. The task force concluded that a zonal approach was the most equitable and simple solution. Since the task force report was submitted to him, the Minister of Finance has received hundreds of letters and documents on this issue and has consulted with the communities concerned on many occasions.

Following these consultations and the review of the task force recommandations, the minister has developed a new northern tax allowance system for Northern and isolated areas. According to this new system, the inhabitants of the northern area, as recommended by the task force, will be entitled to the entire deduction, up to $450 per month, while people living in an intermediate area will receive half of the benefits provided. Moreover, residents of communities for which the benefits will be reduced or removed will have a long transitional period.

This new program meets adequately the general consensus on the need to reform the old program which provided disparate benefits. It will allow for elimination inequities, facilitation of compliance with the rules and improvement of the administrative process. It will also provide more efficient tax assistance to residents of remote areas of the North.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

BILL C-79

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I would like to begin by giving a brief explanation before I get into the real matter of privilege.

Last night in the House at about 5.58 p.m., the Minister of State and deputy leader of the government in the House of Commons moved:

> That the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-79, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act, be read the second time and concurred in.

The minister did not make a speech. A Liberal member, the member for Kingston and the Islands, immediately got up, agreed with the minister and spoke for less than 15 or 20 seconds. Then the chief government Whip got up and moved that the previous question be put.

We were fortunate that the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, our deputy House leader, was in the House. He spoke until six o'clock, at which time again the chief government Whip rose and tried to have the House speak after six o'clock to end the discussion on this matter.

That is all within the rules of the House. I do not question that, but the result of what they did affects the privileges of each and every member of the House.

As a result of the Senate amendments, which the House has not had a chance to review or debate, we are opening a credibility gap which members of the House and the public will never be able to bridge.

As a result of the Senate amendments, whether they were intended or not—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the hon. member and this sounds a great deal like debate, and not a point of privilege. I would just ask the Chair to take a close look at the words of the hon. member. We are here to debate an opposition day, not an issue that was before the House last night.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the remarks of the hon. parliamentary secretary. I was listening extremely carefully. I want the hon. member for Churchill to know that also. At the moment the hon. member for Churchill has set out certain facts that seem to have happened. He has agreed that whatever happened was within the rules of this place. I think when the hon. parliamentary secretary sought the floor, the hon. member for Churchill was just starting to say how this could possibly be a question of privilege.

I probably have to hear a little bit more to see whether there is any basis for privilege in the hon. member's presentation.

• (1010)

I think it is appropriate that the hon. member stay on the procedural point. It is going to be difficult enough for a Speaker to find a prima facie privilege when what seems to have happened was within the rules.

The result may not be what somebody wants, but that may not be anything resembling a question of privilege.

I am sure the hon. member for Churchill will hone in very carefully on exactly what the question of privilege is and assist the Chair accordingly.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your intervention.

Had the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader been listening, he would have heard me say that I would just give a very short precis of what happened last night. That is what I did.

The Speaker is correct in inferring that I had said I was getting on to the meat of the matter of privilege that affects all of us.

As a result of what happened last night, I and other members of Parliament cannot amend the motion. The chief government Whip got up and moved that the previous question be put.

The privilege is this. As a result of what happened, members in this House are not going to be guaranteed fair and equitable treatment and process by the legislation as it now stands. The Board of Internal Economy in the House and the committee that has the equivalent responsibility in the Senate, with its majority formed by the government, will decide when they will issue their opinions to police officers and when they will not.

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty I am in is this: The hon. parliamentary secretary has just said "debate" and it most certainly is debate.

What we have here is something which even the hon. member for Churchill agrees was done within the rules. The consequence may be that certain things somebody in the House might have wanted to do cannot take place at this time. That may have certain results.

It may be that a piece of legislation has moved farther than members in the House would want. The substance of that legislation is hardly something about which when the rules are followed, I can enter into a debate. What I am being asked to do by the hon. member for Churchill, it seems to me, is to say that the legislation is offensive, at least in the minds of some members, and that as a consequence of what was done, certain things will inevitably take place under the legislation if, in fact, the legislation is ever passed by the House. That is so clearly a question of debate that it puts the Speaker in very great difficulty trying to infer even a prima facie case of privilege under the circumstances.

I understand that there may be strong feelings about this bill. There are strong feelings about bills all the time in this Chamber, but we have rules. If the rules are followed, the fact that somebody does not like the consequence of the bill is not a question of privilege.

Of course, I will ask the hon. member for Churchill if he has anything further to add to what he has already said that would change my view. I must say in fairness to all hon. members that the fact that hon. members may not like the consequences of a bill is not something that can be debated in the "guise"—I do not mean that in any sinister sense—of a question of privilege.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately because of what happened within the rules last night, we have a situation now where there will be two classes of MPs.

We will have a government majority on the Board of Internal Economy which will decide when unfavourable opinions will not be given to police officers.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I understand the feelings with respect to the substance of the bill, if of course the bill ever becomes law. The government has moved that the question be now put, and there may well be further discussion with respect to the bill.

I understand the substance of this bill well. Hon. members will remember that I accepted their invitation to appear in front of the committee that was studying it. Whether I assisted or not I do not know, but I assure the hon. member for Churchill that if there is anybody in this Chamber who is aware of what the bill is about it is certainly your Chairman.

The hon. member has made his point, but it is not privilege and I cannot proceed with it.

The hon. member for Churchill is seeking the floor.

BOARD OF INTERNAL ECONOMY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, since you will not accept that I have a privilege when I believe I have a very basic privilege to the rights of members in this House, I will rise on a point of order.

Under the rules of this House and the way it has been conducted by this government, with the collusion of the Liberals, members will not have a fair hearing. There is no Board of Internal Economy hearing that we can trust in this issue. The board is not an ethics committee.

Mr. Speaker: It is probably best that we proceed to another matter.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: We do have a rule here that it is not appropriate to impute the motives of hon. members, despite the fact that in the course of vigorous debate it sometimes happens.

There is no particular need to rise on that point, and I think we should move to Orders of the Day.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member would want to assist the Chair in maintaining the decorum that is necessary here. There are, no doubt, other ways to express the very strong feelings that are here, but not in a question of privilege. I am sure hon. members wish to co-operate.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona) moved:

That this House condemn the government for implementing a debt reduction program which accepts the savings of children but fails to ensure that large, profitable Canadian corporations and wealthy individuals pay their fair share.

He said: Madam Speaker, this motion, which I will read again—that this House condemn the government for implementing a debt reduction program which accepts the savings of children but fails to ensure that large, profitable Canadian corporations and wealthy individuals pay their fair share—has its origins in the disgust that many of us in this caucus, and I am sure many other Canadians, felt when we saw the other day the Minister of Finance accepting a cheque from a young child who was making his contribution to the debt reduction fund.

We feel that the Minister of Finance has really gone overboard in this case and that the entire government has gone overboard in its exploitation of children in order to help reduce the deficit.

Perhaps they could keep it down to a dull roar at the other end. We feel that the Minister of Finance, not only through his willingness to accept cheques from children in order to help bring down the deficit, but through other policies which the government has implemented, had an over-all policy which is harmful to children and which neglects one of the ways in which we could bring down the deficit, and that is to have a fairer taxation system. That is what I want to concentrate on today.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, the member is trying to deliver a speech and there are conversations being carried on, on all sides of the House. I think it very unfair to him. I would ask that there be some semblance of order so we can hear his speech.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, normally I do not start raising my voice until I am about five minutes into a speech. I am trying to keep my blood pressure down, at least at the beginning.

To pick up where I left off, as I said, this motion has its origins in the disgust that we all felt watching the Minister of Finance on TV the other day accepting this cheque from children to help bring down the deficit.

I was at Wayoata Elementary School in my riding not so long ago to receive from a couple of students, Tanya Kessling and Dana de Boer, a copy of a song they had written about the environment. I think this is the kind of thing we should be seeking from children: their insights about the environment and the prospects for preserving Planet Earth, rather than their money to help bring down the deficit.

The money to bring down the deficit is out there. It is out there in the form of tax expenditures in the billions of dollars that this government maintains by virtue of its policies and its refusal to close the various tax breaks that exist for the big business sector.

If we pay attention to who was present at this debt reduction charade we had the other day in which these little kids were being asked by the Minister of Finance to break their piggy banks so that the minister would not have to tax the corporations, it was attended by the Business Council on National Issues, represented by Mr. D'Aquino. Mr. D'Aquino and his ilk represent a lot of people who either individually or as part of the corporations they either work for or own, pay absolutely no tax whatsoever.

Mr. Blenkarn: They appoint them. What is wrong with that?

Mr. Blaikie: I hear the member for Mississauga South going on and on in the far corner there. I hope that when I am done, perhaps he will get up and have something to say on the record rather than making life difficult for me when I am trying to speak on the record.

The Business Council on National Issues contains a number of companies, and I will just go over their record in the years 1988 and 1989, that made a profit and paid absolutely no tax at all or a very limited amount of taxes.

For instance, BCE Incorporated, Northwest Tel Incorporated, in 1989 had a pre-tax profit of $15.1 million and paid only $0.14 million in taxes. BP Canada in 1989 had a pre-tax profit of $6.2 million and had a credit of $1.4 million. Brascan in 1989 had a pre-tax profit of $442 million and paid only $0.3 million in taxes and in 1988 had a pre-tax profit of $262.8 million and paid no tax at all.

The list goes on. I will not bore the House with all the details of these various companies that make millions and millions of dollars. In the column which reads "taxes or credit", we find zero after zero after zero.

We find, not only with respect to these companies as companies, that individuals in Canada have been benefiting from the tax reforms brought in by the Tory government, to the extent that the number of people who made over $250,000 and paid absolutely no tax at all increased as a result of the Tory tax reform. The number of people who made over $50,000 and paid absolutely no tax at all increased as a result of the Tory tax reform. These are in the years 1988 and 1989.

I mention that in particular because the Minister of Finance is fond of accusing the NDP of using 1987 statistics which applied before the Tory tax reform, but I am using figures now which are after the Tory tax reform.

What we are referring to here is what we think is the moral flaw in the government's approach to reducing the deficit. If the Minister of Finance was serious about reducing the deficit and about distributing the burden of reducing that deficit, then we feel that some significant sacrifices should be asked of the corporate sector. This is what did not happen in the budget.

In that respect we released after the budget a list of what we called the five top loopholes we felt the Canadian government could deal with. We referred, for instance, to the interest deductibility rule, the business and entertainment tax deduction, the manufacturers and processing tax credit, the dividend tax credit, and the capital gains exemption. All these five top loopholes, in our judgment, added up to some $6.7 billion.

There may be elements of these loopholes or tax breaks which one may want to maintain, but it is clear that there is a lot of money here which could accrue to the public Treasury if there were the willingness on the part of the government to make the same demands of the rich and the powerful in Canada as it makes upon children.

The government is fond of saying that it does not want to send the bill for the deficit to our children, and it is referring to the children of the future. It is willing, however, to send the bill for the deficit to the children of the present, but not all children; only the children of the poor.

What the government really means when it says it is not willing to send the bill for the deficit to children is that it is not willing to send it to the children of the rich and the powerful. They will continue to receive the tax breaks.

Indeed, the government only recently indicated that it is bringing in a reform in order to preserve, in its tax free status, the money put in trust, back in 1972, by a great many wealthy Canadians, presumably for their children. This was done as a result of reforms which took place at that time when money was put in certain trusts, would be there for 21 years, and then become taxable at the end of that 21-year period.

That 21-year period is coming up in 1993, and what did the Minister of Finance do just before he produced the budget in which he called for everyone to make a sacrifice? He indicated that he is going to change the rules with respect to trusts so that that tax break can continue in a way that it would not have continued if he were to leave the legislation as it is, and the people who have that money in trust could pay the tax which they have had 21 years' notice of having to pay. It is not as if this is some sort of surprise attack by the Treasury on people who have this money in trust.

If the Minister of Finance is serious about reducing the deficit, if he wants credibility when he says to Public Service workers that they have to accept the 3 per cent cap on their wages or that sort of thing, he must not continue to allow the corporate sector and wealthy Canadians to benefit from the reforms he has made in the tax system. These reforms have made the income tax system less progressive. The reforms he is unwilling to make would collect some of that money from the corporations. If he is not willing to do that, then he should not really have the nerve to go to the Public Service sector or any other Canadian, for that matter, and say: "We want you to make a sacrifice".

It is the same hypocrisy which attended the government's attempt just before the budget to up the salaries of heads of Crown corporations by 4.2 per cent. at the same time, within days, it asked the Public Service to accept a 3 per cent ceiling. Actually 4.2 per cent does not look like that much when we consider some of the increases which have happened lately at the Bank of Canada. We have the head of the Bank of Canada, the architect of the government's fiscal and monetary policy, seeing his salary rise inappropriately at the same time as he is the great lecturer, telling Canadians about how they have to accept restraint.

All these things undermine the government's credibility when it comes to the question of deficit reduction.

I would be concerned about that for two reasons. First, if I thought the government were really concerned about the deficit, I would ask: "Why don't you do these things in order to beef up your credibility and therefore be able to fight the deficit better?"

What it points to is that the government is not really that concerned about the deficit. What the government is doing is using the deficit as a cover for what is really an ideological and philosophical agenda with respect to Canada's social programs and Canada's social spending.

It is using the deficit as an excuse to attack these programs because the Conservatives do not have the courage to do this in an open way. They know if they revealed what they were really up to, the Canadian people would say "no". They play upon the appropriate fear that all Canadians have of debt and they say they have to do these sorts of things. Therefore Canadians are more inclined to say: "Well, maybe that is what we have to do".

A study being done at Statistics Canada—we cannot get our hands on it yet—which shows that 44 per cent of the accumulated deficit owes its origins to tax expenditures, to the tax breaks which have been given to wealthy individuals and corporations going back to 1975 when the Liberals first started to turn the tax system into something which the corporate sector could use to make money instead of actually doing productive things. That is apparently what this study shows. The other 50 per cent is attributable to paying the interest on the debt which was created by that 44 per cent. Only 6 per cent is attributable to social spending.

Study after study has shown that social spending is not the cause of the deficit. It is other policies of the government that are the cause of the deficit. Yet it is the unwillingness of governments to admit that this is the problem.

Why are government members unwilling to admit that? It is because they would have to challenge their friends. Instead of taking decisions about funding that affect people and kids on the streets of Vancouver, the inner city of Winnipeg or Toronto or wherever, people they will never have to see, people who they do not run into in their ridings, in their lives and their social networks—they do not meet them at cocktail parties at the Canadian Club or the Carleton Club or any place like that—they prefer long-distance decisions which they never have to come to terms with the reality of.

If the Conservatives did the right thing, they would have to explain to their friends, the people who finance the Liberal and Conservative parties through donations and the people who are part of the social and economic elite of this country, why they are finally being asked to kick in and do their part. If they did have that kind of courage, if they were willing to say to those people "look, do we have a country or don't we have a country", it would not be unrelated to the question of national unity and the sense of whether or not we have a country.

It is hard to work up a sense of patriotism when we know there are people with money in this country who are unwilling to contribute their fair share to getting the country out of the so-called debt crisis we are in.

All we ask is that they contribute their fair share through the tax system. We are not advocating that instead of having kids lined up with their piggy banks we have individual businessmen and corporations lined up with cheques to give to deficit reduction programs. That is not how you fight the deficit.

You fight the deficit by having a fair tax system. We do not want to be part of this charade in which people line up to give money to the debt reduction fund. For that matter, most of the businesses, if they were to give, would find a way to make it tax deductible anyway. I believe there is such a provision. Let us not have this charade.

Let us have a fair tax system in which both the corporate sector and the rich and powerful in this country are finally asked to pay their fair share. They have not been paying their share for some time due to the growing imbalance in the tax system whereby the share paid by corporate taxation has gone way down and the share paid through income taxes has gone way up. Even that share, at the same time as it has been going up, has been becoming less progressive. It is more and more the middle class that is paying a larger share of the over-all pie that exists between the income tax and the corporate tax.

The other way of taxing is through consumption taxes, and that has also been going up. That also hit the middle class even harder than anyone else. The icing on the cake as far as consumption taxes was concerned was the goods and services tax.

Over all we have a tax system which is more and more asking ordinary Canadians to pay the bill for this country, while some people get away with the taxation equivalent of murder. Some of these large Canadian families, like the Bronfmans and others, own all kinds of companies and pay absolutely no tax at all. These people have made millions and millions through playing the tax system, through literally taking money out of the pockets of ordinary Canadian taxpayers and becoming millionaires at their expense.

When the day comes that this government and other governments are willing to ask them to prove they truly care about the Canadian community and that Canada is not just a place to make a buck, then we will know that indeed we have the kind of community that will be able to withstand the pressures that are now on it.

One of the reasons we have the crisis that we have in this country is that we have fostered particularly over the last seven years, the attitude that a country is simply a place to make a dollar, that there is really no difference between one country or another, that the only way to measure these things is by how easy it is to make money in that particular country.

The majority of people, almost everybody that I know, do not have the mobility of capital. They cannot move their money down to the Caribbean or to the U.S. or to Europe or anywhere else. They are stuck here in Canada and they are glad they are stuck here in Canada, because they consider themselves to be Canadians. They do not consider themselves to be a bunch of parasites who are always judging one country over another to see whether that is the best place to put their money or is the best place to invest. They have a sense of community and belongingness and rootedness in their country, instead of having the kind of attitude which has been fostered over the years and which has been accelerated in the last seven years, whereby everything is to be judged on how much it helps one to make money or not make money.

Money is the root of all evil, and it is worshipped on the other side of the House. That is the root of Canada's problems.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I am going to participate in this debate, but I want to ask the hon. member to apologize for one thing he said today, because it is totally inaccurate. It has never been said by the Minister of Finance, nor has it been indicated by the Minister of Finance. The member erred, and I believe I am quoting him accurately when he said that the Minister of Finance has asked kids to break their piggy banks to help with the deficit.

• (1040)

The Minister of Finance never said that. The Minister of Finance has never indicated that. The Minister of Finance has never hinted at that. It is a very unfair statement that the hon. member made.

I sat very patiently listening to the hon. member's speech. He made some very good points. In my speech I hope I will be able to counter some of the things he said.

But that was a very unfair statement to make. I know what he is referring to. I will refer to that in my remarks as well. The Minister of Finance has never done that.

The Minister of Finance is trying to make sure that the kids today will not have to pay our bills down the road so that their kids have piggy banks. That is what this is all about. For the hon. member to make that statement, that accusation is totally unfair. I wish he would retract it.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I have no intention of retracting the statement. If the Minister of Finance is willing to appear on TV accepting a cheque from a young child for the purposes of reducing the deficit, then he has effectively given the message to a lot of kids that maybe this is something that they should do.

If they do not have their money in a piggy bank, well then I guess they cannot go and break it. To the extent that not all kids keep their money in piggy banks, I take it back. But to the extent that some kids do keep their money in piggy banks, that message implicitly calls upon them to do the same.

It is the Minister of Finance who should be ashamed of himself, not me, for allowing himself to be portrayed in that way and for allowing himself to appear in a context which gives that message.

While we are on this question, why do we want to ask future generations to pay for the deficit? I am asking the question: Why do we want to ask certain sectors of the current generation to pay for the deficit and not other sectors of this generation to pay for the deficit? That is the point. No one wants to leave any kind of inter-generational debt to anybody.

If we are leaving any debt to future generations, it is a debt which we are not willing to pay now on the environment, so that they have air to breath, soil to grow their food in, and water to drink. That is the short-sightedness in terms of the environmental deficit.

We are leaving them a deficit they might never ever be able to repay because we are so concerned about our fiscal deficit at this point that we are willing to cut back on the green plan and other things that we should be doing at this point. We will be leaving them a deficit in terms of social and economic malaise.

They will be paying for more police from now until doomsday if we do not start to do what needs to be done in order to solve the problems in our inner cities. It is a question not of spending; it is a question of investment, where we are willing to spend the kind of money that needs to be spent now in order to avoid problems for future generations.

Where do we get that money? We get that money by creating the national sense of community and the national sense of will to go to these people and say: "Look, maybe in the best of all possible worlds you'd be able to keep your 80 per cent lunches through the business entertainment tax deduction and we could still fund medicare". But it is not the best of all possible worlds. It is a world in which we have to make choices between the $1.1 billion that goes to the business entertainment tax deduction or the $1.1 billion that the Minister of Finance took out of Established Programs Financing for medicare.

If I have to choose between having more nurses on the wards or more free lunches for the business community, I will choose the nurses every time.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the member and I have read the opposition motion that he put forward. I am very interested in what the NDP has to say.

As the premier of Ontario has learned, it is one thing to be in opposition and criticize and criticize; it is another thing to be in government. The NDP federally has not had the privilege, and probably never will have the privilege of being in government, and deservedly so.

I say this because instead of offering constructive criticism, instead of offering an alternative which the NDP is prepared to put forward, all we hear is criticism and carping.

The member, with respect, spoke of the goods and services tax, and it is a perfect example of the hypocrisy of the NDP. It is my understanding, and the member can correct me if I am wrong, that the goods and services tax is opposed by the federal NDP. But I remind the member—and I know he was there because I saw him on television—of the NDP leadership convention in 1989. Certain resolutions were passed at that convention, and I would like to refer him to one and ask for his comments, particularly in relation to his constant criticism. I quote:

> Be it further resolved that it is the position of the NDP that any reform of federal sales taxes must exempt essential goods and services from taxation.

I do not know how the hon. member reads that resolution, but it is one thing to say: "we are against the goods and services tax, there should be no goods and services tax", and it is another thing to have a resolution of the NDP saying that: "essential goods and services should not be taxed". That implies two things: that non-essential goods and services should be taxed, according to the NDP and, second, that services, which have never been federally taxed before, should be taxed.

If that is not hypocrisy I do not know what is. I ask the hon. member to comment on that and indicate precisely what the NDP solution is to these problems.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I recall Liberals at one time in Ontario saying that the NDP would never form the government, and displaying exactly the same kind of arrogance that the member just displayed with respect to the prospects of the NDP in Canada. It may well be—and I certainly hope it is—that that kind of arrogance will be rewarded with the same kind of political event it was rewarded with in Ontario.

The hon. member says we do not present any alternatives. We have been presenting alternative after alternative after alternative in this House, before the budget and certainly after the budget, outlining in questions to the Minister of Finance in finance committee, in statements that we have put out, where we think the government could find the money that it alleges it needs to raise through the goods and services tax and through cutbacks to what we regard as essential programs, like health care and post-secondary education.

The alternatives are there. If the member would care to read Hansard, he would find that we have been making the case over and over again, both in the debate on the GST and on the budget. The alternative to the GST is to have a fair taxation system, is to raise the money which is now forfeited through a variety of tax breaks and loopholes that we have outlined very clearly for the member and very clearly for the Minister of Finance. If the member has somehow missed it in all the things that come across his desk, I would be glad to provide him with the information, because it is there.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona for bringing this motion forward, because it does give the government an opportunity for the government to put some facts before the House and before the people of Canada.

Many members here will be familiar with the saying: "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it". However, today's motion makes it painfully clear to all Canadians that my hon. friends of the opposition have the same problems with history as they do with economics.

If this were 1981 or 1982, aspects of the motion before us would have been timely and true.

Mr. Blaikie: With a Liberal government.

Mr. McDermid: Years of Liberal governments had put in place a tax system that invited abuse and avoidance, a tax system chock-a-block of loopholes, exclusions and exceptions. The result was that many large profitable corporations and wealthy individuals were able to avoid paying their fair share of the national tax burden.

• (1050)

Of course, there was another aspect of that decade-ago government that the opposition would also like Canadians to overlook. I do not think the NDP would, but the Liberals certainly would. That was a government, some of whose members still sit across the floor of the House although I do not see any of them today, which turned surging deficits and soaring debt into the favoured tools of national policy. We are living with the tragic results of that policy today.

The budget our government tabled last month works directly at getting Canada out of the current recession and back to growth and job creation. It is also a budget that makes a crucial watershed choice about how this renewed prosperity must be not only achieved, but more importantly, sustained.

Instead of spending our way out of the recession, the budget's plan for economic recovery emphasizes controlling expenditures and reducing inflation. This is the key to the lower interest rates that will boost consumer spending and business investment to fuel growth and new jobs.

This approach, the fact that we are committed to stopping the growth of the national debt, obviously has its critics. We have heard them today. That is absolutely no surprise. After all, for nearly 20 years through the early 1980s Canadians were accustomed to a federal government whose fiscal philosophy could be summed up in two words: charge it.

That is why in 1984, the government was handing out $1.33 in programs and services for every dollar it collected in taxes. That is why in the same year, we had the highest deficit in history: $38.5 billion. That is why our national debt had more than doubled to more than $200 billion in four short years.

The interest payments on that 1984 debt we inherited are a direct reason the federal government is in a deficit position today. It is the reason our national debt is now approaching $400 billion or about $15,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada.

The interest costs alone on the federal debt will eat up over $43 billion next year. That is equal to 36 cents of every tax dollar Canadians pay. It is more than the government spends on old age security, unemployment insurance, veterans' pensions and family allowance combined. That is why the February budget refuses to buy short-term recovery at the cost of a return to surging deficits and a runaway debt.

The lessons in the last 20 years make the point bluntly. This spendthrift approach only creates a vicious circle of higher inflation and interest rates leading us back inevitably to economic decline, lost jobs and lower government revenues.

Instead, we have taken a different path, based on a continuing commitment to deficit and debt control. The February budget severely restrains the cost of government, including wages and salaries for the Prime Minister and cabinet, for MPs and the federal Public Service.

It also extends the two-year expenditure control program that we introduced in 1990, including limits on the growth of transfers to provinces. It now continues through to 1994-95. The savings achieved will total more than $15 billion.

What makes this a watershed budget is that it also takes dramatic measures, including the creation of the Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund to achieve nothing less than a fundamental change in the political culture of government spending.

These interlocking measures will transform good financial management by government from the realm of promise and political will into a matter of law. They will ensure that all revenues from the goods and services tax go solely to servicing the deficit and getting that debt under control.

Perhaps I am being a bit unkind to today's opposition motion, because it can be read to suggest, although grudgingly, that they do recognize that debt reduction is a vital foundation for Canada's long-term prosperity and economic health. If that is so, I applaud sincerely this great transformation of the NDP. I wish the NDP had been more forthright in sharing such an historic transformation with all Canadians.

If this motion does finally recognize that we can no longer borrow our way to real recovery, it still fails to acknowledge the wide-ranging changes in the national tax system that our government has introduced over the last seven years. Last November my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue released his department's 1988 personal income tax statistics. I specifically asked my hon. friend today what year he was quoting from for the 1988 results, because these figures provide the first substantial result of the tax reform initiatives that we announced in 1987.

The two major thrusts of the reform were to lower tax rates and to broaden the tax base. Lower rates provided an incentive to work and invest, thereby raising living standards. Broadening the tax base, by removing special tax preferences, makes the tax system simpler and fairer and reduces the opportunities for tax planning and avoidance that were most often used by high-income Canadians.

As well, another key element of the reform was the conversion of personal exemptions into tax credits, many at enriched values, such as the child tax credit.

Unlike exemptions which provide the greatest benefit to higher income earners, credits are fairer because they provide the same degree of tax relief to all taxpayers. The results released last year showed that, as we promised, the tax system has become more progressive and the burden of taxation was reduced for most Canadians, especially for those with lower to moderate incomes.

For example, the figures released revealed the following facts. The share of total personal income tax burden paid by those earning less than $15,000 a year was reduced by almost two-thirds, from 2.1 per cent of all income tax collected in 1987 to .8 per cent in 1988, a very dramatic drop. The share of total federal income tax revenues paid by Canadians with incomes between $15,000 and $30,000 declined from 26.5 per cent to 23.1 per cent. For those earning between $30,000 and $50,000, the share of total tax revenues dropped from 37.3 per cent in 1987 to 35.7 per cent in 1988.

By contrast, despite a larger proportional reduction in their tax rates, tax revenues from individuals with incomes between $50,000 and $100,000 increased by over 25 per cent, while tax revenues from people with incomes over $100,000 increased by 31 per cent. That is exactly what tax reform was designed to do.

I also want to highlight that the number of seniors paying income tax decreased by almost 300,000 taxpayers between 1987 and 1988. This represented an increase of 43.2 per cent in the number of seniors not paying income tax.

Madam Speaker, shall I call it eleven o'clock and continue the debate after Question Period.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, higher than reasonable gas prices continue to plague the people of my riding of Moncton. In Ottawa, Consumer and Corporate Affairs has launched an investigation into high gas prices. My colleague from Ottawa Centre got newspapers to threaten to publish the names of those stations which sold gasoline at 60 cents a litre or more. Lo and behold, magically, gas prices fell to 58 cents.

Moncton has a similar problem. I have written Consumer and Corporate Affairs to request that the file be reopened. The price of gasoline in Moncton is consistently out of line with the prices elsewhere in the province. Moncton consumers can pay 6 cents a litre more than in any other part of the province. Gasoline is 2 cents to 3 cents cheaper just 10 kilometres outside the boundaries of Dieppe, Moncton and Riverview. It is not fair and it is not just, especially in these economic times.

To date, I have received no answer from Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Could this be because the people in Consumer and Corporate Affairs have to buy their gasoline in Ottawa rather than in Moncton?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Madam Speaker, as vice-chairman of the Aboriginal Committee, I have the great pleasure to offer congratulations to the 20 graduates of the Mohawk Law and Security Enforcement Program on behalf of the Minister and the Minister of State for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

These students from Akwesasne Mohawk community were able to participate in this course through the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's Indian Study Support Program which provided $200,000 in funding to cover the course expenses and curriculum development.

Employment and Immigration Canada provided additional funding of $470,000 under the job development program of the Canada Jobs Strategy.

This is an important step in providing Akwesasne residents with an opportunity for long-term employment. This program provides reserve members with skills and enables them to contribute to self-government and the administration of justice on reserves.

The department is fully committed to programs such as this which support and encourage the wishes of native people to gain control of their own affairs.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, my colleagues and I have just returned from the Baltic States where we witnessed the March 17 unity referendum. As you know, Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia refused to participate, though each country overwhelmingly endorsed independence in their own referendums.

Their leaders said that the speed with which our Parliament expressed opposition to the Soviet military action in Vilnius on January 13 and in Riga on January 20 was significant in the build up of the international pressure which they are convinced averted a further military crack-down.

Talks between the Soviets and Baltic governments are now deadlocked. I propose that Canada, with our history as a peacekeeping peacemaking country, take the lead by promoting a special international conference on the subject of the Baltics.

The objective would be to bring interested parties together in discussions where objective criteria and the rules of international law would be used to determine the legal status of the annexation of 1940 and to set the semantics and terms of reference for further negotiations which will hopefully result in a resolution to this complex issue.

REFORM PARTY

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, again I would like to address a concern I have with the Reform Party and its vague agriculture policy.

Mr. Manning admits to his lack of agricultural expertise and acknowledges that his agricultural ideas might not work. Not only is this an insult to farmers across the country, but it is also a knife in the back to the small business sector everywhere.

We all know that the ties between the economies of the agricultural sector and small business are inseparable. For every one dollar a farmer puts into the system, this results in a seven-fold multiplier to the economy of small business.

How can the Reform Party ask anyone to take it seriously when it does not appear to have the desire or ability to formulate an agricultural policy which would in turn mean support for the small business sector?

This concerns me and I think it should concern anyone who thinks the Reform Party has anything to offer this country or its citizens.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, environmentalists resigned from the new Global Warming Advisory Committee today because the government's position is "gravely inadequate".

While scientists from across the globe have concluded that the greenhouse effect is real and other countries adopt urgent strategies to reduce releases of carbon dioxide, methane, halocarbons and nitrous oxide, Canada waits at the sidelines with no specific targets or timetables for reduction. Even the Canadian promise of last November in Geneva to freeze greenhouse gas emissions by the year 2000 has proven to be false.

The Minister of the Environment recognizes that projects, such as the Point Aconi thermal plant, should be subjected to a full EARP because of its massive carbon dioxide releases, yet he does nothing.

The Standing Committee on Environment on Monday will release a unanimous report on global warming called "Out of Balance—The Risk of Irreversible Climate Change" where once again we call for a 20 per cent reduction of carbon dioxide releases, a call for action now not next year.

Delay is a crime no future generation will forgive.

TORONTO HUMANE SOCIETY

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, the Toronto Humane Society yesterday decided to blacklist certain Canadians from their membership. In making the announcement of their exclusions, Secretary Treasurer Bob Hambley stated: "There's the morality of it. If you want to be involved in the humane movement, you have to take a stand".

Well, let me tell Mr. Hambley, the greatest environmentalists are those who live off the riches of the land. They are the trappers, the bushmen, the miners, the farmers. They have the greatest understanding of nature. They have a profound respect for the wild animals, the forests and the soil.

I say to those members of the Toronto Humane Society, those city dwellers who walk on cement, breathe the auto exhaust and keep their pet dogs and cats on leashes and wander through a square block park, your righteous words sicken those who know better.

Care and respect for animals and the land begins with a profound understanding of environmental issues, not hollow and ignorant morality statements.

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, in Tuesday's throne speech in Prince Edward Island, the provincial government announced the creation of a Ministry for the Elderly. For far too long the concerns of Canadian senior citizens have been ignored.

The federal government has a Minister of State for Seniors, but this government will not allow her to do her job. If this government had the needs of seniors in mind, it would not be cutting funding for basic medical research and it would do something about the poverty in which so many of our seniors are forced to live.

I congratulate the government of Premier Joe Ghiz. By appointing a Minister for the Elderly, the government of Prince Edward Island recognizes the contributions that seniors have made to Canada. These are the people who have made this great country what it is today. Every effort should be made to ensure that our seniors live with as much dignity and independence as possible.

SENATORS' ALLOWANCES

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Ontario on his efforts to defeat an attempt by the senators to vote themselves a non-taxable per diem allowance of $153, simply for reporting to work. The Senate voted in favour of this controversial bonus last June. Imagine, in addition to their salaries and non-taxable allowances, the senators would have received a non-taxable per diem allowance of $153, simply for reporting to work.

All the efforts of the hon. member for Ontario were directed towards having this unnecessary allowance cancelled, and I am sure, Madam Speaker, that this would be greatly appreciated by many, many Canadians.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I have a copy of a recent letter from the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs to Manitoba's Minister of Family Services. This letter shows how trivial this government regards its constitutional responsibility to native people. In it, the federal minister states that federal funding for all social services to natives living off-reserve will be cut off after March 31, 1991, in nine days.

The federal government has a responsibility to all native people in Canada. It is shameful that the federal government is going to dump its responsibility for off-reserve natives on to the provinces. This is both unfair to the native people and to the provinces that will be forced to pick up the bill. It is even more shameful that the federal government would take this action with only three weeks notice and without any consultation with the provinces or native people.

It also poisons the constitutional debate in this country with regard to aboriginal people and federal-provincial relations.

It seems clear that this government is not interested in developing good relations with the provinces or with native people alike.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Madam Speaker, Canadians crossing into Detroit at Windsor presently spend $1 million to $1.5 million weekly in the U.S. This border shopping is causing hardship for Canadian retailers.

The brain dead policy of the Minister of Revenue to fast track border crossings will sound the death knell for retailers in border areas.

This government's policy on trade and the goods and services tax have already made it easier and cheaper for Canadians to shop in the U.S. Instead of taking measures to reverse this trend, it is introducing initiatives that will encourage more cross-border shopping. Ask the merchants, the unemployed, the seniors in Windsor and Essex-Kent what they think of the minister's PACE project.

TRIBUTE TO HAROLD HARVEY AND RICHARD BEAMISH

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to Messrs. Harold Harvey and Richard Beamish, who discovered the disastrous effects of acid rain.

The two men made this discovery entirely by accident during the summer of 1964, when they were on Lumsden Lake in Ontario's Killarney Provincial Park, 50 kilometres south of Sudbury.

Working from canoes and backpacking hundreds of kilograms of nets and equipment on numerous expeditions, Harvey and Beamish investigated the disappearance of fish from vast expanses of Ontario's territory.

I also want to thank the Speaker of the House of Commons, the hon. John Fraser, for what he did as Minister of Fisheries in 1979. He took these findings seriously and asked the government to take action.

The people of Canada are indeed indebted to Harvey and Beamish!

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, cross-border shopping has caused serious economic problems for Canadian border communities. The decision by the government to consider using express lanes at Canada-U.S. border crossings and the recent Ontario Supreme Court ruling against Sunday shopping will add to the steadily increasing numbers of Canadians shopping in the U.S.

Total border crossings are up 15 per cent over last year. Crossings have almost doubled at the Cornwall-Massena border, up from 43,000 in February 1990 to 77,000 for the same month this year. The loss in business revenues and jobs outline the negative economic impact cross-border shopping is having on our border communities.

I call upon the government to immediately implement initiatives to help these communities deal with this threat to their economic survival.

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, most Canadians with whom I talk want to see some fundamental changes made in Canada, but they do not want those changes to be made by 11 middle-aged white men in blue suits meeting behind closed doors. They want an open and fair process, a process that involves everyone.

I personally believe that the best way to do this is by establishing, through a direct election, a national constituent assembly. That is not a revolutionary idea. It has been done in other countries. But we need a constituent assembly in which men and women, native Canadians, Canadians born here and Canadians born elsewhere, are all represented in the same proportion as they appear in Canadian society itself, one which meets and discusses the issues in public.

That is the only way that all Canadians will be able to feel that they have personally participated in the process.

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA RULING

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, the women of Canada have something to celebrate today. Yesterday's Supreme Court ruling that a foetus is not a person until it has completely left a woman's body simply reaffirms that life does begin at birth.

But this decision does more than reaffirm what equality-seeking women already knew. The decision serves as yet another reminder to this government that there is no need for an abortion bill, except one which promotes equal access to midwifery and other reproductive health services.

That is why the New Democratic Party calls on the federal government to work with the provinces in getting midwives out of legal limbo. Regulations, mandatory formal training, and the right to decent wages are initiatives that Canada must take to be the last industrialized member of the World Health Organization to legally recognize midwifery.

WORLD BALLOONING CHAMPIONSHIP

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, today I would like to pay tribute to the town of Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu, which will host the World Ballooning Championship from August 10 to August 18 this year. This world championship is a first for Canada, and will be attended by more than 400 participants from 35 different countries.

This unprecedented event will be one of the highlights of the tourist season in Canada. The Canadian government is proud of Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu and all the organizers of this tenth world championship, and it hopes the event will be a resounding success.

I also want to take this opportunity to urge all Canadians to come and take part in the championship events at Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu. You won't be disappointed!

WOODBRIDGE HOUSING PROJECT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, Canadians want their government to listen to their concerns. They want to be consulted on national as well as local issues that affect them and their communities.

In my riding of York North, in the city of Vaughan there is a growing concern among residents that their views are being ignored in relation to the development of 106 acres of land for a housing project in the Woodbridge area.

I firmly believe that the minister of housing has a responsibility to listen to the concerns expressed by the residents, the ratepayers associations, and the elected officials of the area.

The residents know what is best for their community. Their concerns must be addressed and taken into account before construction begins. Madam Speaker, I urge the government to listen to Canadians and act accordingly.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Patrick Watson, chairman-designate of the CBC, has accused the Prime Minister, and I quote, "of playing games", "a cheap trick", and "indifference" in dealing with the CBC cuts.

Mr. Watson said in defending the savage cuts the Prime Minister expressed "a lofty kind of contempt for all those people who've lost jobs and all those communities that had service taken away from them".

How does the Prime Minister justify his own outrageous distortion of the facts surrounding the CBC cuts?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, in response to the acting leader, I must say that it is rather unfortunate that Mr. Watson placed such a distorted interpretation on the comments of the Prime Minister because the Prime Minister's comments were taken specifically from a quote from Mr. Watson which appeared in The Globe and Mail on February 27, 1991, in an article entitled "It's Time to Clean House if the CBC is to Survive".

The article goes on to say that despite the recent budget cuts, the corporation still has a handsome annual income and "I am frankly embarrassed we can't manage on $1.4 billion a year. That's a lot of money," chairman-designate Patrick Watson told The Globe and Mail reporter.

I think it is pretty clear in the quote, and I trust that it is accurate, that that is precisely what Mr. Watson said and that is precisely the context in which the Prime Minister referred to Mr. Watson's remarks.

I could go on and quote further from the article, but unfortunately there is some unparliamentary language in it, so I would not be allowed to do so.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I would like to quote further from Mr. Watson who, I remind the Deputy Prime Minister, is the Prime Minister's appointee. I quote: "I think it's pretty sad that the Prime Minister should resort to a cheap trick—in order to protect his government, when he knows perfectly well the precarious situation the CBC is in".

Why has the Prime Minister distorted the comments of Mr. Watson when he knows that Goose Bay, Corner Brook, Sydney, Rimouski, Sept-Iles, Matane, Toronto, Windsor, Saskatoon, and Calgary have lost their local stations and local programming has been eliminated across the country at a time when the Prime Minister claims he is fighting to keep this country together?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, perhaps the hon. Acting Leader of the Liberal Party may want to ask Mr. Watson whether in fact he was quoted accurately or inaccurately. It is pretty clear that he stated, and I quote: "I am frankly embarrassed if we can't manage on $1.4 billion a year. That's a lot of money," said Patrick Watson.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, what is so unfortunate about the CBC cutbacks is that today, the Prime Minister claims to champion the cause of Canadian unity. Real unity is impossible unless our two language groups in Canada are able to communicate. Why is the Prime Minister again trying to weaken the unity of this country? Could the Prime Minister or the Acting Prime Minister tell us how closing down CBLFT, for instance, the only French station in Toronto, will help anglophone and francophone groups across this country communicate? How will closing down this station help Canada's unity?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, the CBC's total revenues have increased yearly since 1985. What the Acting Prime Minister said this morning is quite clear. Mr. Watson said in February that $1.4 billion was enough. It is up to the CBC to manage its finances and that is what it is doing. Did Mr. Watson change his mind about what he thought two months ago? Does he now think he is a politician? Is that it? What does he mean? In February, he said clearly: I have enough money. That is what he said about the $1.4 billion. Let the CBC look after its finances. It is a good service appreciated by all Canadians, and we want it to stay that way, but run by CBC.

• (1120)

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Mayor Al Duerr of Calgary told the CRTC this week that Calgarians' "money is important to the CBC but our news and views are not".

Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House if any of his Calgary MPs stood up against the cutbacks affecting their city?

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Kilgour: Does he really think—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has been in this House for quite awhile, and I do not think this is a question being asked of the government. The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Kilgour: Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House whether he thinks that one local news show from Edmonton is sufficient for 2.3 million Albertans from High Level to Milk River.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, what is important to note here is that the global receipts of the CBC have been increasing constantly each year since 1985.

In the month of February, which is not that long ago, Mr. Watson seemed pleased and said that $1.4 billion was enough money. It is not for me to decide that.

These are the people who are running the CBC. Let them administer the work of the CBC. I appreciate how effective a force it has been in providing service to some Canadians. Obviously there are other means that are being provided across the country. We do not support them all.

Let me just repeat what is written in The Globe and Mail. Mr. Watson said again: "I am frankly embarrassed if we cannot manage on $1.4 billion a year. It is a lot of money". That is what I want us to reflect on.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I have considerable respect for the minister.

He knows and I know that the CBC is part of the glue holding this great, single country together. He knows the 11 stations that were cut have weakened the bonds that keep Canadians together: his province and my province and all the other 11 stations affected.

He also knows that the president of the CBC told the CRTC that the highest levels of governments, or some such words, were consulted about these cutbacks. Will he tell us whether he as a member from Quebec was part of the decision to cut back the CBC?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, when you have more money, not less money, it means you are able to administer better, not worse.

There were decisions that were taken by the board of the CBC—this is totally appropriate—on how a corporation should be administered. We on our own behalf have seen to it that the CBC has received significant support in each of the years we have been in office, and that continues unabated.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

A few weeks ago in this House the Minister of Finance put forth a budget destined to fight a recession on the backs of the poor, the unemployed and the sick. Today Statistics Canada announces that inflation is 6.2 per cent higher than it was last year at this time.

In the same budget the finance minister announced that the government would be limiting the salaries of federal employees so that a secretary is expected to cope with this increased cost of living at a much reduced salary.

Will the throne speech, which the government has announced it will be making later in the spring, reverse this government's current policies that hurt low income and poor Canadians and introduce some economic policies that will help working Canadians?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, if the hon. leader of the NDP were to read the budget carefully, she would understand that all the measures we have taken are aimed precisely at helping working Canadians and at getting Canada back to work.

We are very proud on this side of the House that over a number of years we have created 1.5 million jobs. After seven years of record growth, the economy was overheating and we have had to take some measures to reduce it. It is sad to see many Canadians thrown out of jobs. We understand that.

That is why we must take measures to ensure that interest rates go down. They have been going down. Over the last three months they have gone down by 200 basis points. The inflation rate from early January went down six-tenths of a point.

We are heading in the right direction. We are confident that come this summer the recession will end and we will all be in a better position.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The people who are unemployed, the 1.5 million Canadians who do not have jobs, the increasing number of children who are lining up at food banks and those families who cannot afford to put food on the table, cannot afford to wait either.

While this government is fighting a recession in which it says that everyone should share the burden, and seeing clearly that it is the unemployed who are paying the price, I point out to the government certain sectors of this country like the mining sector, which made 164 per cent higher profits this year and the petroleum industry, which made 149 per cent higher profits this year.

I ask the minister: Why not bring in a fair tax system which will ensure that everyone truly pays his or her share of the cost?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, in listening to the hon. member I would think that she believes in the policy that was used of government creating jobs. This was followed in eastern Europe. It does not work.

It is through private enterprise that we create jobs. By helping Canadians to create jobs artificially, competing with companies that already have difficulty maintaining employment, causing more people to be thrown out of jobs and less income to help social programs is not the way.

The only good way is to help the economy and to create an environment for Canadians to be able to get on with the job. This is what we are doing.

We have increased our contribution this year for the unemployed. We have provided the money to help them surmount this difficult period. We all agree it is a difficult period, but we must use the right methods to extricate ourselves from it.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I am sure Canadians are hoping the "right methods" that this government has used—the failed economic policies of the goods and services tax, the trade deal and the high interest rates which have destroyed this country's economy—will not be the methods that this minister is talking about using.

Madam Speaker, day in day out, this government tells this House that national unity is an absolute priority. But it will take more than constitutional amendments brought in one after another to safeguard national unity. This government must build a country where it is pleasant to live, in the West as well as in the Maritimes and in Quebec. What kind of country does this government have in mind for the thousands of young people who are unemployed in Quebec and elsewhere in the country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I wonder, Madam Speaker, if the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party imagines that by borrowing abroad and thus increasing the Canadian debt we would be preparing a better future for our young people. What these young people are looking for, Madam Speaker, are ways of building a life for themselves, of earning a living and of competing. Canada is a huge but sparsely populated country with no national market. It has to be competitive. It is our responsibility, as national government, to manage that environment. We brought about, in just a few years, the greatest era of prosperity this country has ever known and we are preparing yet another one.

BANKRUPTCIES

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The rising number of bankruptcies in Quebec is proof positive that the recession is getting worse. According to the figures, there were 2,000 bankruptcies last month, which is 40 per cent more than in February 1990. For almost a year, the business community has been saying that high interest rates would provoke a recession. And now we have one! What does the minister intend to do to provide some relief, especially for owners of small businesses who have always created most of the jobs in this country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I am surprised at these comments coming from the other side. Perhaps I may point out that we had the beginning of a recession a few months ago. There was a major inflationary crisis. However, we have taken a number of measures and interest rates are now going down.

If we look at what happened under the Liberals in a similar situation for instance, a Canadian with a $50,000 mortgage had to pay $910 per month, while today, he would pay $411 per month, which is $4,900 less per year. Now that is the kind of policy that actively improves the economic situation in this country. Interest rates are going down, and that will give businesses a chance to recover.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, the minister quoted figures from 1982, when this side of the House was in power. However, we were later judged by Canadians and Quebecers. We paid for it! And 9 years later, now that the responsibility is yours, I want to ask the minister this: Don't you think you will be judged as harshly by the people of Canada as we were at the time?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, if he applies the same criteria that were used at the time, I don't think so. Certainly not. In fact, according to Statistics Canada, inflation is down by 6/10 of a point. That's not bad in such a short time.

There is another point I would like to make. You mentioned the GST. Initially, because of the Liberal filibuster in the Senate, many small businesses thought the GST would not be enforced, so they did not bother to claim their inventory rebate. We had reserved a considerable amount for this purpose, over $1 billion. They started claiming this rebate around the end of January, however, so the savings will start being passed on to Canadians, and that is how this tax will help our businesses compete with the United States.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In the last 24 hours alone, another 160 companies and individuals have been driven into bankruptcy. In the month of February alone, in the province of Saskatchewan bankruptcies are up a stunning 60 per cent. In B.C. since the beginning of 1991, over 1,000 companies have bitten the dust.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister take responsibility on behalf of his government for this economic tragedy, or will he reject his government's insane fiscal policies which have caused this national tragedy?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, it is certainly not with any great deal of pleasure, far from it, that we see the difficulties that many of our companies and many Canadians are facing these days because of the recession.

The hon. member can repeat that every day. He can look at what is happening in the United States, and the same thing is happening in Europe. However, what is happening in Canada that is not happening elsewhere is that our interest rates and our inflation rate are going down. This will create the condition for a renewal of our economic progress.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In the coming months in the province of Saskatchewan alone, over another 30 farms will have to declare bankruptcy, losing not just their land but also their dreams, their pride, and a way of life.

Will we have to wait until the entire agricultural sector in western Canada is driven into bankruptcy before the Deputy Prime Minister and the Saskatchewan MPs understand the depth of destruction of their own economic policies?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's concern about the situation in Saskatchewan. As I am sure he is aware, the agricultural economy is largely a grains and oilseeds based economy and one that has been affected very seriously by the trade war that has been going on, the result of which has driven prices down to depression levels.

He knows that currently before the House there is a very broad and comprehensive agricultural measure, the Farm Income Protection Act, which speaks to the very point that the hon. member raises.

I appreciate the genuine support that members on our side of the House, and particularly the Liberals, have given toward moving this legislation along. If we can only get some support from the NDP to move it along quickly, we will be able to have it in place for April 1, so that farmers will be able to have the kind of protection which will provide stability and confidence for the future.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Yesterday in Washington Canada's ambassador, Mr. Burney, said that his government would not let the environment get in the way of progress.

By progress, he was referring to the free trade deal which would encourage polluting companies to avoid environmental regulations by moving to Mexico, a country with such lax environmental standards that a 90–second breath of fresh air now costs $2 in the capital city of Mexico City.

Would the right hon. minister clarify whether his government shares the view that environmental standards and regulation are an obstacle to progress?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, neither I share that view nor does the Ambassador of Canada to the United States. New Democratic Party members would serve the interests of truth and of their own responsibility if, instead of misquoting Canadians when they declare themselves on important issues, they would quote them correctly.

If you have an issue to join, state the issue honestly. Do not introduce dishonesties into this House of Commons to try to improve your own partisan position.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, there is one thing you can always be sure of in this Chamber, and that is when you hit a nerve right on with the right hon. minister of external affairs, it is because of accuracy and not because of the dishonesty that he is always trying to flick over at the opposition.

I will quote from the transcript, and this is exactly what Mr. Burney had to say: "What should not happen, in my view, is that environmental concerns should not become the obstacle to progress toward a trade agreement". That is exactly what he said.

Is that the view that Canada is taking into these negotiations, that environment can play second fiddle, that all the polluting industries from Canada can simply move on down to Mexico?

I would like to hear some truth from the minister of external affairs.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Why doesn't the hon. member sit down and listen to some truth? He knows very well that what was said by the Ambassador of Canada to the United States was that these two issues have to be pursued with equal speed but on separate tracks. One is not an obstacle to the other.

If the hon. member would adhere to his own earnest demands for the truth, he would tell the truth in this House of Commons and not abuse his place as a member of Parliament by trying to spread falsities across the country.

Oral Questions

JAMES BAY AGREEMENT

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Yesterday, Mr. Diom Sagamish, Vice-Chief of the Grand Council of the Cree, said:

> If we are provoked—and James Bay II is massive provocation—then I will not predict how Cree anger and frustration will manifest itself. Law and order is not always justice.
> Will James Bay be the next Oka? Respect Cree rights and your own constitution. That is the real answer.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, is the government really prepared to listen? Is it listening and is it prepared to take appropriate action to ensure that fundamental change is undertaken and that the government will deal directly with the native leaders on how the James Bay project is handled and their constitutional agenda?

• (1140)

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I should say that the hon. member raises an issue of great concern to all of us. But she should know, and I am sure she does know, that there are leaders of the Cree involved in the discussions about James Bay. Everybody is concerned that there be no further incidents up there.

If the hon. member is as sincere as she always presents herself to be in this House—and as I have said before, I am sure she is—she will work with us to ensure that the concerns of the Cree are addressed in the most appropriate manner and that we work towards a conclusion that will be suitable for everybody.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I am really offended and disappointed. I got an invitation from the Deputy Prime Minister to address questions to him on aboriginal issues and he does not answer today. That is appalling.

Mr. Andre: You want appalling, look in a mirror.

Ms. Blondin: If you want appalling, looking at yourself Harvie Andre.

Some hon. members: Bravo.

Ms. Blondin: Madam Speaker, the Cree of James Bay feel they have been abandoned by the federal government in their attempts to have federal laws and international conventions on the environment upheld.

Clearly, this government is unwilling to live up to its own laws and constitutional responsibilities. Therefore, will the Deputy Prime Minister accept the offer of Noel Brown, the deputy director of the United Nations—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not know if anyone on the right-hand side of the House has heard the question. I know that because of all the noise, I did not. The hon. member may want to put her question very succinctly, very briefly, please.

Ms. Blondin: Madam Speaker, I appreciate that. I want to ask whether the Deputy Prime Minister or the government is unwilling to meet its obligations and live up to its own laws and constitutional responsibilities. Will it accept the offer of the deputy director of the United Nations Environmental Program to intervene on behalf of the Crees to help resolve this issue?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member has raised a very important point. It is a question of respecting the laws of Canada.

The governments in this country do respect the laws and if everybody did, it would probably resolve the problems.

As I said in committee yesterday, the solution is at the negotiating table and the Government of Canada is always there.

JUSTICE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The case of Linda MacDonald is a blight on the Canadian justice system. She was an unwilling victim of brainwashing, funded by the Canadian government in 1963. As a result, she lost her memory. She could not recognize her own children. She had to learn to walk all over again and she even had to be toilet trained.

The Minister of Justice has refused compensation to this person. Will the government reconsider this unfortunate and misguided decision and compensate Mrs. MacDonald?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am informed that my colleague the Minister of Justice, as indicated by my colleague here, has looked into this matter. I understand the matter is still before the courts and it would be inappropriate for me to comment any further at this point.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, the Solicitor General is not correct in that. This matter was co-funded with the CIA. In 1962 the CIA withdrew funding and Mrs. MacDonald underwent these experiments in 1963.

In her reply to Mrs. MacDonald, the Minister of Justice said that the allegations of impropriety against the Canadian government were ill-founded. It is not an issue of propriety; it is an issue of negligence. The government was negligent.

In the sense of common decency, will government please admit its negligence and compensate Mrs. MacDonald?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am not sure exactly to what my colleague is referring when he says I am not exact. The case is still before the courts. The Minister of Justice has looked into it. There have been meetings with the attorneys representing the plaintiffs in this case and the case will go on.

It would be inappropriate for me to comment any further at this point.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, before I ask my question, I would like to apologize to the House for some of the language I used earlier this morning.

My question is for the minister responsible for the C-79 legislation which was before the House for two minutes last night. In a meeting that occurred in my office on Monday of this week with a representative of his office and the Privy Council Office, I was told that as the legislation was amended by the Senate, it takes away any obligation by the board to give any opinion that it has made with regard to the proper use or improper use of the goods and services of the House of Commons to a police officer.

Will the minister tell the House what he thinks the public perception would be if the board refuses to give an opinion to a police officer, an opinion that that board has already made. What would the public perception be?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend, who is a member of the committee which studied this legislation for over one year, has a very wrong impression of our Board of Internal Economy.

I heard his comments this morning. He appeared to say that this new board, reformed by this government in 1985, which all members of all political parties sit on—I sat on it for a number of years—is partisan. I can assure my hon. friend that it is a totally non-partisan board. His House leader sits on the board.

I can say very honestly that I have never seen one decision made by that board on a partisan basis. I really do not know what he is afraid of.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, a supplementary question to the minister. The problem is that the board under this legislation has been given new powers and new obligations. Again, the problem is public perception. There will be a Conservative majority on the board. What is going to be the public perception when the board refuses to give that information to a police officer after that police officer has asked for that information?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The minister may want to answer the question, but this is a highly hypothetical question. If the hon. minister wants to answer, of course I will recognize him. If not, we will go on.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): The hon. member must know who sits on this board. The Speaker sits on the board; the Deputy Speaker sits on the board; the House leaders of the three political parties; the Whips; one member appointed by the Leader of the Official Opposition and two members appointed by the Leader of the Government.

Does the hon. member really think that his own House leader would engage in some type of conspiracy on something? I do not think so.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Today Statistics Canada reported that for the second month in a row prices in Canada were higher by over 6 per cent from last year. Statistics Canada said:

> This rate of increase remained well above the 4.8 per cent annual average experienced in 1990 as price levels continued to reflect the introduction of the goods and services tax in January 1991.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, why does this government insist on pursuing policies which are so harmful to the Canadian economy and its workers and consumers. Why won't it make some changes to help them right now?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I have a feeling that this question has been asked and has been answered before.

I will repeat again that Statistics Canada has indicated that inflation rates, the CPI, is coming down. It has come down from early January to now by six-tenths of a point. Interest rates also are coming down and this, I believe, is the result of the only valid policy that can be followed by a government. The former Liberal government did not follow it and Canadians have been paying the price.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I would suggest the minister read the Statistics Canada statement which says in part that "the impact of the January 1991 introduction of the goods and services tax can still be felt in prices". Look at the price of clothing—up 9.9 per cent since last February. I ask the minister how such results can possibly help workers and the Canadian economy. Again to the minister: Why is the government so intent on implementing policies such as the GST which have such a devastating impact on our economy?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the government itself had warned that there would be a one-time increase in the Consumer Price Index, so there is nothing unexpected there. But the government indicated as well that the introduction of the GST would rid Canadian manufacturers and companies of an extremely harmful federal tax and pump $9 billion into the economy, something which would be bound to have a very positive impact.

For their part, Bank of Canada officials also predicted that this temporary adjustment would not have any effect on interest rates and might easily be absorbed by the economy, if you will. That is what is happening now There was a sudden rise at the beginning because the billions of dollars the government had set aside to refund the old tax were not claimed by companies, convinced as they were that the Liberal senators would be successful in their attempt to prevent the adoption of the GST legislation. Such was not the case and, over the past few weeks, we have seen the six tenths of a point decline.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We have learned that as a consequence of the budget recently brought down by the government that the Department of External Affairs is considering cancelling the very important consular facility in Kiev in the Soviet Union, as promised by the Prime Minister during his trip to that country last year.

I would like to ask the minister if he will give us assurances in this House that this very important consular facility, long sought by Canadians of Ukrainian descent and very crucial during these very turbulent times in the Soviet Union will not be a casualty of the government's budget but in fact the plans will go ahead.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, if there are casualties, they will not be of the budget but of the long period of excessive spending by Liberal governments that put this country into a situation where it is simply not possible for us any longer to continue to follow all of the policies we would wish to follow.

A series of budgets have been brought down, which have begun to reverse a trend set in place by Liberal governments, a trend which was deadly to the future of this country. The most recent budget was part of that process. It will impact on all departments. The Department of External Affairs is considering the impact that particular budget will have on some of our activities but no final decision has been taken.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs well knows, the recent Statistics Canada study shows that it is not a problem of spending, it is a problem of monetary policy and that this government has driven up the deficit.

I would ask him again, because we did not get the assurance. He knows that a commitment has been made by the Prime Minister. He knows that this is an extremely important facility at this time in the Soviet Union. In terms of the entire department can we at least ask this specific question? Can the minister assure us that the consular office in Kiev will not be a casualty of the cutbacks now being contemplated in the Department of External Affairs? Can we get that assurance today?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Canadians are paying a very high and continuing price for the extravagance of Liberal governments who sat in office as though there would never come a time when we would have to deal with the realities of fiscal responsibility in this country.

This government has recognized, with the broad support of the Canadian public, that those days cannot continue forever. That will have implications for this department as it does for other departments. We are considering the exact nature of those implications. No decisions have been taken on where exactly those limitations may apply.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

As the minister knows, Saskatchewan has been in serious breach of its Canada Assistance Plan agreement with the Government of Canada. The province has denied social assistance, as the minister knows, to entitled people who refuse to participate in work for welfare programs, clearly a violation of CAP. Also, as across the country, welfare rates in Saskatchewan are well below what are needed in order to meet the basic needs of Canadians, another violation of CAP.

After months of promises to look into the evidence in Saskatchewan, will the minister act now to stop Saskatchewan from breaking the law? Why will he not enforce the Canada Assistance Plan agreement?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to refer the House, first of all, to the statements that were made in the hon. member's question. He says I know that Saskatchewan was breaking the law in instituting a work for welfare program.

What I know is that allegations have been made by the hon. member to that effect. What I know is that I undertook to look into the matter, to have it fully investigated. What I know is that the results of that investigation showed that no work for welfare program existed; indeed, we have it in writing from the government of Saskatchewan that they do not have such a policy.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, over a year ago, social action groups in Saskatchewan informed the minister, giving him names of people who had been denied social assistance because they had refused to work on the make work programs that the government had provided. He has had information, he has had names, and he has refused to act.

We know the minister does not have a heart, Madam Speaker, but now we know he has no guts. He will not enforce the Canada Assistance Plan.

Why will he not stand up for his responsibilities to poor Canadians? Why does he not take them seriously? Why does he not enforce the Canada Assistance Plan?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I do not know whether the hon. member lacks heart or guts, but he apparently lacks the ability to understand that this government must act on the basis of facts. If the hon. member has facts, none to date which he has tendered, let him bring them forward.

Madam Speaker, what we have done is investigate every allegation that has been made. We have found no evidence which would justify the claims made by the hon. member.

If we are talking about what is lacking, what is lacking most of all here is any substantiation of the claims of the hon. member.

CHILDREN'S BUREAU

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The children's bureau was officially opened this week, six months after its mandate was first announced by the Prime Minister. During those six months, over one million children passed through the lines of food banks. That is more than 3,500 hungry children for each constituency.

How many thousands more will we have to line up before the children's bureau and the Ministry of Health implement the anti-poverty plan of action signed by the Prime Minister at the World Summit for Children?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, along with children's advocates across the country, I welcome the creation of the children's bureau. I was delighted this week to be able to preside over its official opening, although it has been in place for some time.

When the hon. member talks about children's poverty, he should be aware of the fact that since 1984 some 300,000 children in Canada have been able to escape poverty and low income circumstances as a result of the government's policies.

The greatest threat to the future of our children is if we allow our economy to get out of shape and if we allow that massive national debt, that amounts to some $15,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada, to grow.

It is no surprise, Madam Speaker, when every child being born in Canada inherits a $15,000 debt, that the first thing they do is cry.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Canada lacks a nation-wide policy on child health. The implications of this for poor children are staggering. They are much more susceptible to injury and death.

• (1200)

Will the minister make it a top priority of the Children's Bureau to develop a comprehensive policy on child health for Canada? Please give a straight answer.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): A straight answer, Mr. Speaker, that is we are going to do everything we can to improve child health in Canada. We have already taken a number of important steps, including the creation of the Children's Hospital Injury Reporting Program, which is, for the first time, giving us a data base in Canada on children's injuries which will allow us to act in a very proactive way to reduce the deaths and injuries among children. Accidents are the major cause of deaths among children between the ages of 5 and 14 in Canada.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received notice of a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege arises from the remarks made by the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs during Question Period. It would not be the first time this week that the minister's words during Question Period have been challenged.

The Minister used the words "false" and "dishonest" regarding a question that I put in the House. I want to seek a response from the the right hon. minister because the quotation I used is a verbatim transcript that I obtained from the main Library of Parliament from Media Tapes and Transcripts Limited, dated March 22, 1991, eight o'clock. I obtained it at 9.14 a.m. It is a verbatim transcript from World Report on CBC. The quotation that I used came directly from the verbatim transcript.

If the right hon. minister would like to clarify his remarks, I certainly hope that he would because I know he knows the rules of this place. When a member quotes from a document that is obtained from a public broadcast and is from the Library, it is not up to the minister to suggest that it is false or dishonest to use it.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, of course I was not suggesting that the transcript was false or dishonest. My comments related to the characterization of that transcript by the hon. member. It is a practice I wish he would stop and that members of his party would stop.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I would ask that you review the "blues" of what was said during Question Period. I am prepared to move the necessary motion to have this matter referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections because I think that kind of nonsense from the former Prime Minister is an abuse of the privileges of not only myself as a member but all members of this House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: This, to my understanding, is a dispute as to facts and I do not think there is a case of privilege in that. Nevertheless, the "blues" will be checked and should there be, the hon. member will be advised. To my understanding, this is more a dispute as to facts than it is of breach of privilege.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Very briefly, Madam Speaker. While my colleague from Western Arctic was posing a question, a number of comments from across the way were stated. Some of these comments were quite sexist and quite unparliamentary. I was wondering whether we could reserve the right to raise a point of privilege after we have had an opportunity to review the "blues" and to examine exactly what has been said by ministers of the Crown with regard to comments directed at my colleague from Western Arctic.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may remember that at one point I did have to rise and ask the House to be a little more quiet so that we could hear whatever was said around the House. I am sure that should anyone have said things that I did not hear, it would then be deemed necessary for that person to apologize and the person would do so, but the right is reserved.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to ten petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

HERITAGE LANGUAGE SCHOOLS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I have signatures from approximately 50 people who are concerned about the elimination of the cultural enrichment program of the Ministry of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

The petitioners feel it will have a disastrous effect on the quality of instruction in heritage language schools. They would like the continuation of the preservation and enhancement of heritage languages as an integral part of multicultural policy.

These undersigned petitioners call upon Parliament to ensure that the quality of heritage language instruction in Canada is consistent with the preservation and promotion of our multicultural heritage.

FOOD AND DRUG REGULATIONS

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my privilege to present a petition today.

There are many constituents in Canada and in this case, many constituents from Scarborough and from my riding of Ontario, who are concerned about people who suffer allergies relating to the contents of food.

Through this petition, the petitioners request that the Parliament of Canada enact legislation amending the food and drug regulations in order to require manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives used in prepackaged foods in place of the general classifications now permitted. Further, the legislation should require restaurants and foodretailers to provide, on demand, to customers a list of all the food ingredients in their prepared foods.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I have another petition from about 300 Canadians, mostly in the Toronto area, which calls upon Parliament to withdraw Canadian Forces from the gulf region so we can be assured that they are not deployed in an offensive capacity.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to use our tax dollars for useful social programs such as child care, pensions, health care and education, and not for military adventures in the Middle East.

I have a petition from 100 or more people from the Toronto area.

The petitioners urge the government to commit our country to take all possible measures at the United Nations and elsewhere to bring an end to war, and to restore peace to the region of the gulf through an international peace conference on the Middle East.

MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I have a petition, found in order by the Clerk, under Standing Order 36 from a number of people in the Toronto area who are concerned about the low-level flight training that continues in Labrador and parts of Quebec.

The petitioners ask that Parliament call upon the Canadian government to end all NATO-NORAD low-level flight training in Canada and to redirect Canada's NATO-NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's original people to gain control of their lands and their livelihood, and toward sustainable development for all Canadians.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions signed in communities from one end of my riding to the other stating that especially at a time of serious instability in the international oil markets, Canadians need Petro-Canada to act as a watch-dog on the mostly foreign-owned and controlled oil industry.

Canadians need Petro-Canada to take the lead as a green energy company helping them to make environmentally responsible energy choices and we need Petro-Canada to remain 100 per cent Canadian.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to repeal Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada and keep Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation acting in the best interests of all Canadians.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, these are petitions signed by Canadians from St. Catharines, Guelph and metropolitan Toronto again requesting that Canada Post issue a commemorative stamp in honour of Madam Sklodowska Curie who discovered radium and who helped heal many people around the world, including Canadians. It would be only fitting that Canada issue a stamp in her memory on the 125th anniversary of her birth.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blaikie (p. 18859).

Madam Deputy Speaker: When the House began Statements by Members and Question Period, the hon. Minister of State for Finance and Privatization had the floor. He had 10 minutes remaining for his speech.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I appreciate that. When we interrupted for Statements by Members and Question Period, I was just reviewing the changes in the tax system and the results of tax reform which are very positive and have provided concrete evidence of the mistaken assumptions and unwarranted condemnation from the New Democratic Party at the heart of today's motion.

They highlight how the fundamental structural changes we have taken deliver tangible benefits, benefits I might say, assisting Canadians today at a time of economic weakness and hardship, when in fact they are most necessary.

Under our government, Canada's personal income tax system has indeed become more progressive and fair, reducing the burden of taxation on those most in need. The reforms have ensured that those Canadians who enjoy above average incomes are paying the increased share of the national tax burden, which their affluence makes reasonable.

What about corporations? We heard about those this morning. Here again, the opposition's motion is about as outdated as its economics. When we first took office in 1984 we recognized that there were problems with the tax system we inherited when it came to business paying it's share of the national tax burden. That is why in 1987 we introduced measures to eliminate loopholes that had allowed too many businesses to avoid paying any corporate income tax, even when they were fully profitable. That is not all we did.

This motion seems to forget that in order to help in the battle against the large corporations tax, in order to help against the national deficit, the 1989 budget included the large corporations tax. This measure, one of those that opposition members in the Senate, I might say, refused to pass for over a year, ensures that all large corporations will pay tax.

The bottom line impact of these measures is emerging. Government revenue figures for 1989-90 show that at a time of declining corporate profitability, total corporate tax receipts actually increased some 11 per cent. In the banking sector alone, which paid very low levels of tax in the early 1980s, federal corporate income taxes in 1989 amounted to $1 billion, so changes have been made.

In fact, leaving aside the impact of the recession, the over-all impact of tax reform and the large corporations tax has increased the government's revenue from corporate income tax by $2 billion annually compared to what it would be under the previous system. Yes, there are still companies which rate as profitable, but which do not pay corporate income tax, as my friend from Winnipeg Transcona pointed out this morning. However, there is no favouritism involved, no conspiracy against the hard-working taxpayer, no exemption from the struggle to control the deficit.

One of the things he forgets to conveniently mention when he talks about corporations that do not pay taxes in a given year is that he does not go back to see if they had losses in the year before, which of course they can write off. If the profits do not cover those losses, then it is still not a profitable company, although it shows that it made a profit in any given year.

The figures the New Democratic Party stands up in the House day after day and lays on us are somewhat misleading, making it sound like these corporations are cheating the tax system when, in fact, they are not. The combination of tax reform and the large corporation tax should cut in half the number of profitable corporations which do not pay tax. All large corporations will pay tax due to the large corporations tax.

Among the small and medium-sized profitable firms which are not taxed, the majority of these will not pay tax, as I mentioned, because of losses in previous years.

The blunt truth is that this government has taken concrete and historic action to reform the tax system we inherited. By perpetuating the myth of the corporate welfare bum, this motion sadly demonstrates the lack of substance and the absence, I might say, of meaningful alternatives which the combined opposition brings to bear on today's dilemmas. It is political grandstanding at its most cynical best.

There is a related issue I want to address head on which was brought up today by the hon. member. This is the argument that the 80 per cent tax write-off which business can claim on business related meals and entertainment expenses is a tax boondoggle and should be abolished.

This is a claim that blindly ignores the competitive reality confronting Canadian businesses. The ability to deduct these costs as legitimate business expenses is a fact of life in the United States as much as it is in Canada. Both systems recognize that meal meetings and business entertaining are legitimate parts of the business process, helping to generate sales, profits and jobs.

My colleague from Pickering has made it very, very clear how, when he was in the business world, a couple of meals ended up helping Canada to the tune of some $60 million in sales.

It is part of the legitimacy of doing business in this country. If Canadian firms were to lose this measure, we would be placing them at a direct disadvantage by increasing the comparative burden of taxation compared to their American companies, i.e., their competitors. It is not a formula for effective debt reduction. Instead, it is a prescription that would ultimately lead to lost sales, lost jobs and finally, lower government revenues. Then we would hear the NDP, up on its feet here in the House, complaining about lost jobs and so on and so forth.

Is this what the opposition wants? I do not think so. Not when it sits down and takes a very close look at this. For the government's part, the fair and proper answer, of course, is no. Absolutely not.

Two days ago at the Debt Freedom Conference, chaired by one of my hon. colleagues, a young Canadian handed the Minister of Finance a cheque for $168. The hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona made a big deal out of that this morning. This was money which 12 year old Corey Snow had raised through a garage sale and was his contribution directly for the purpose of helping our national debt. At the same conference, other individuals and groups also demonstrated the recognition that the public debt is a national problem which demands a national solution. We are all in it together.

The 1991 budget in its plan for economic recovery is making that solution real and certain. It takes the tough, decisive actions on spending restraint to bring down inflation and to bring down interest rates, so that the deficits for 1990-91 and 1991-92 will be $30.5 billion, despite the difficulties caused by the recession. For 1992-93, the deficit will fall below $25 billion for the first time in a decade; for 1995-96, it will be down to just $6.5 billion.

I want to emphasize, as the Minister of Finance has done with audiences across Canada; there is no misplaced optimism or mathematical mumbo-jumbo at work when we say the deficit will come down to $24 billion by 1992-93.

The fact is that we will no longer be faced with the transitional costs of the GST. That represents a $2 billion saving. The gulf war spending will be behind us. The expenditure control plan will deliver incremental savings. Lower interest rates will ease the burden on servicing the debt, and economic recovery will reduce unemployment insurance costs and strengthen government revenues.

In turn, this sharp drop in the deficit combined with national recovery will see the debt begin to shrink as a portion of our economy. This threshold step will mean that government revenues, combined with the continuing benefits of lower interest rates and government spending caps, will be sufficient to eliminate the need for new financial borrowing by the government in 1994–95, a very worth-while goal. That is the target we set out two years ago, in 1989.

In conclusion, in the words of the Minister of Finance delivered to the Debt Freedom Conference here in Ottawa on Wednesday, I am convinced that economic recovery is within our sights. Interest rates have fallen more than four percentage points from the peak last May. Indications are that housing sales are picking up. In fact, The Toronto Star reported earlier this week that the sale of new homes in that city last month was at its highest level in two years.

Following the conclusion of the gulf war, oil prices have returned to near their pre-crisis levels and United States consumer confidence appears to have jumped sharply. Given such stimulus, there is every reason to expect growth to resume by mid-year and to expand by 3.5 per cent in 1992. Just as important, the plan for economic recovery sets us on a path where that growth can be sustained, and confidence and investment flourish in the years to come.

Contributing to that recovery and growth will be the national tax system that we have reformed, based on a concrete and proven commitment to fairness and progressiveness. The facts are evident. It is this motion that fails to meet the test of truth and fairness.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, as usual, I listened to my hon. friend with interest. While I find I do not agree with very much that he says, I do not say he is being misleading. I think we just see the world quite differently and I think that is fair.

My questions are twofold. First, at the Debt Freedom Conference when the children gave the Minister of Finance money presumably to apply toward the debt, does he know whether the Minister of Finance accepted it? How does that actually work, when a person comes forward with a pile of money and hands it to the Minister of Finance? I ask that just out of curiosity.

Second, being from Toronto, he will know that in the Skydome, because of the Income Tax Act, corporate executives and all sorts of other people who tend to come from higher income families or are members of high income families entertain their friends and guests in boxes. A lot of the costs of their tickets and the entertainment is written off as a business expense. Consequently, it is a tax break to allow certain people to entertain their friends and watch the games and other events from privileged boxes, as opposed to the normal citizen in Toronto who attends the games or whatever and has to pay the full price of the ticket and cannot write it off on his or her income tax.

What I am trying to bring to the minister's attention is whether he personally has difficulty with that part of the tax system that continues to allow a very small spectrum of our society to wine and dine friends at the taxpayers' expense, enabling them not to pay, in my judgment, what would be their fair share toward the debt in this case, being the issue of conversation.

Could he explain where the money that the children presented goes? Does he actually believe that this tax system that allows this to occur is really the right way to proceed during these tough economic times?

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, to answer the first question, up until this budget any moneys that came in from people—and believe it or not people in the United States left money to the government and people did donate money to the government during the year— went into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. They were given a tax receipt for that and so on.

Under the budget which the Minister of Finance introduced in February, he set up a deficit and debt reduction fund. This fund will be audited by the Auditor General and will receive the moneys from the goods and services tax, the net proceeds from privatization, and any moneys that are given to the government for deficit reduction.

Believe it or not, since the budget the Minister of Finance has received some cheques from individuals to go into this fund, such as the cheque that was given by this 12-year old Canadian, Corey Snow, who had a garage sale and donated the proceeds to the deficit reduction fund. I give him full marks for that. He felt that was part of being Canadian. He wanted to make that contribution. Nobody coerced him into doing it; he did it on his own. I applaud that kind of initiative.

As a matter of fact, there was another group of kids that had a lemonade stand. I think they raised $5.58, something like that, a very small amount, and they donated that to the fund as well. I congratulate them for that.

However, the government has the responsibility of getting the deficit down to a position where it no longer has to go to the public for borrowing and it can start paying back some of the bonds and treasury bills that this government has, which by the middle of this year will total some $400 billion.

The next question the hon. member asked was about legitimate business entertainment expenses in the Skydome, in which the provincial Government of Ontario has the majority ownership and in which his friends the premier of the province of Ontario, the vice-president of the Canadian Labour Congress and president of Canadian Auto Workers have their own box where they can go and watch every event that goes on. They get into everything, not just the baseball games but the rock concerts, the tractor pulls, and all the other events that go on. What is really interesting, though, is that the NDP government in Ontario wants to privatize the Skydome. The NDP government in Ontario is going to privatize the Skydome. Isn't that interesting?

The hon. member knows full well that they are legitimate business expenses. They are in other countries. If he wants some very good evidence on how it works, just ask my friend from the riding of Ontario which takes in Pickering. I was there the other day. He can give concrete examples from when he was in the business world working for Lasco Steel of how a legitimate business expense, which it was, paid dividends for Canada in export sales to the United States.

I can tell him that it is a legitimate expense.

I have another short point. The New Democratic Party purports to support small business and tourism. The small business companies throughout Canada and the tourism industry, which the hon. member purports to support, support this particular business expenditure. As a matter of fact, they were very upset at the government when the government reduced it from an 100 per cent write-off to an 80 per cent write-off. The hon. member had better be careful because he is speaking with forked tongue in the House.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. minister for a response to the question he has just alluded to and also the question raised by the hon. member in the NDP.

They were discussing the business lunch expense and the Skydome. happens that I have some particular experience in this matter. For $200, while I was working in the private sector, I bought lunch for a group of people. That lunch culminated in the successful conclusion of a contract for the company by which I was employed of some $5 million. It created an awful lot of employment in my riding. It kept a contract in Canada that may have gone to some other country.

Having spent $200 on lunch which was only 80 per cent deductible, I guess it cost the company in a sense $160 which it could deduct from its expenses. Was that $160 tax deduction a wise investment so that this Canadian company could keep $5 million worth of orders in Canada? It did make about 10 per cent profit on that order. Was it better for the company and Canada to be able to deduct $160 or to get a share of the half million dollars in profit through the form of income tax? The corporation paid 43 per cent income tax that year.

Is it better to get a share of $160 through a tax deduction, or is it better to get a share of half a million dollars in profit through income tax?

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, that question obviously answers itself.

The hon. member is correct. It is a legitimate business expense. It is one which serves a very useful purpose within our business of creating economic activity within this country, and the New Democratic Party knows that. It keeps bringing these things forward.

For example, it is suggesting we wipe out capital gains tax. Yet the capital gains tax gives a half—

An hon. member: Like the Americans have done.

Mr. McDermid: Now my hon. friend over here is saying: "Like the Americans have done".

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I am not sure it is a point of order, but I simply want to say that the United States does not have a deduction for capital gains and I do not think—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think we are getting into a question of dispute as to facts and it is a question of debate. There is one minute left for the hon. minister.

Mr. McDermid: The Americans have a much lower corporate tax rate. The hon. member is saying that we do not tax them enough, but the point I am trying to make is that we have a $500,000 capital gains tax exemption for three groups. First is farmers because their farm is really their nest-egg, their pension. We give them a capital gains exemption once in a lifetime of $500,000. Second is small business. The third area that gets a one-time capital gains exemption of $100,000 is the investor. That is nothing to the big guys, the big shots, but to the little investor, to the small person who has a few dollars to invest and makes a bit of a capital gain on it, it means a tremendous amount. Their investment in the economy is extremely important. The big shots do not need this. They do not need this at all. It is the little investor who has faith in this country, who invests in the country, who we are helping with this, and it is good for the economy of Canada.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak to the motion introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

The motion now before the House takes the government to task for implementing a debt reduction program which accepts the savings of children but not those of large, profitable corporations. In other words the responsibility for reducing Canada's debt does not rest equitably on ordinary taxpayers and major corporations. On the strength of the Conservative government's performance since 1984, I will find it very difficult to believe that debt servicing charges will be shared equitably if ever this debt reduction program becomes reality.

Their reasoning is more for the wealthy and less for the others, more for large corporations and less for small businesses. Such is the doctrine of the Conservatives. No wonder hardship is on the increase in Canada, they create it.

The Tory government has abandoned the traditional role of the government in Canada, which is to redistribute wealth equitably and provide a social security system for the neediest in our society. Since they came to power in 1984, the Tories have been out to destroy all the institutions that provided a safety net for Canadians. They made cuts in the Canada Assistance Plan, they reduced pensions, and now they are going to start on medicare. That is the Tory philosophy: Give to the rich and soak the poor and the average Canadian.

Madam Speaker, I realize we must reduce the debt. However, I don't think the Tory way of doing it is the right way. We should reduce the debt by making everyone pay a fair share. Look at the GST, a consumer tax system implemented by the Tories. Since the GST was introduced and corporate expenses have now become business expenses, corporations can deduct those expenses and claim a credit on the GST paid. For instance, Madam Speaker, the president of a large corporation who goes to a restaurant can claim a credit on the GST paid because he can put the bill on his expense account. This way, a company that claims the GST credit doesn't pay GST. However, a construction worker who buys a sandwich at the mobile cantine pays GST and he doesn't get a credit. That's Tory tax justice!

Let's take a look at what the government proposes. On February 26, in his Budget speech, the Minister of Finance said that any excess funds collected through the GST would go directly towards reducing the debt, after having promised many times that the goods and services tax would be revenue neutral. It was supposed to be a replacement tax to collect money that was formerly collected through the federal sales tax, and it was introduced to replace a system that had become obsolete and was no longer equitable.

According to the Budget things have changed, but Canadians have realized for some time that this regressive tax would not be revenue neutral.

Finally, the Minister of Finance realized that the GST would produce a lot of revenue for his government. In his last Budget, he proposed that GST revenues would go directly towards paying off the debt. Clearly, the GST has been selected as the front line weapon to attack our debt. However, the debt we are talking about today doubled in only six years, thanks to the Conservative government. It is a fact that the debt accumulated during the past six years under the Tories equals the amount accumulated between 1867 and 1984, in 117 years. They doubled it in six years. In other words, in six years, the Tory government managed to accumulate the same debt amount that all other governments of this country had accumulated in 117 years!

If it were not for the sinister policies of this government, including high interest rates, the GST would be unnecessary.

[English]

Canadians realize that the government's inept economic policies such as the high interest rate policy unnecessarily added to the debt. Canadians are now being asked to pay for the government's mismanagement of the economy with the goods and services tax. Liberals have said all along that this was the largest tax grab in history. But the government said it would be revenue neutral. We were right.

The Liberals said all along that the GST would be inflationary, and again we were right.

We just have to look at the statistics released today. In the month of January we had an increase in the cost of living of more than 2 per cent. The Minister of Finance, when asked, said; this is just temporary, next month it will go away. Well, we had the statistics for February today, and we still have over 6 per cent inflation in Canada. So what happened? What happened there?

Now the government has decided to use the revenue collected from the GST to finance the debt. We must now look at who is paying the GST. I should add, Madam Speaker, that this additional revenue amounts to a $8 billion. But don't take my word for it, ask the Minister of National Revenue. He announced it publicly.

If the GST is financing the debt, who is financing the revenue collected from this tax? The answer is obvious, and is the essence of the motion in front of us today.

For the record, Madam Speaker, I will tell you who is asked to pay the GST and finance the reduction of the national debt. Students are paying the GST, senior citizens are paying the GST, unemployed Canadians are paying the GST, Canadians on welfare are now paying the GST.

[Translation]

As I just pointed out, students, senior citizens, the unemployed and the neediest in our society are paying the GST that will be used to reduce the national debt. These people have one thing in common: they are responsible for financing the debt reduction fund. However, they are hardly in a position to do so. The Tories apparently think this debt should be paid by people who hardly have enough money anyway. Why does the government want to punish low-income Canadians for the impact of its disastrous economic policies? This government has decided to punish Canadians who are least well off for the present state of the economy in this country. Canadians are not responsible for today's recession. The Tory government is. This government is going to pay a very high price in the next election.

The Liberal Party of Canada agrees with the tenor of the motion before the House today. We believe that responsibility for the debt should be shared equally. This responsibility should never be placed on the shoulders of students, the sick and the unemployed. We believe this policy is deplorable and most unfair.

[English]

There is one ray of hope. There is light at the end of the tunnel. The ray of hope is that the next federal election is fast approaching, and Canadians will finally and decisively rid this country of this Tory government. They will, with no doubt, rid this country of the unjust and inept policies in which they have been inundated over the past seven years.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, not six months ago but just a few weeks ago, the headlines told us how disastrous the economic situation is in this country. A few days ago, a foreman and a vice-president were attacked by an employee who had just been told he was fired. There we have the human tragedy brought about by these policies. More than $200 million was invested in General Motors because we wanted to protect jobs in Quebec and Canada. Now GM has annonced it is going to close its plant for a year and 1,800 employees will no longer have jobs. So much for this Tory government's economic policies!

[English]

The Globe and Mail, March 21, 1991, yesterday, stated "Bankruptcies Soar to Records", "Bankruptcies up 68 per cent". That is the economic policy of this Tory government.

Last week, on March 14, Le Devoir reported:

Canada is losing the free trade battle.

Who said that? André Bédard, president of the National Bank of Canada. He said that he had campaigned with the Tories to get them elected because he thought free trade was a good idea. And now he says that Canada is losing the free trade battle. Again, so much for Tory economic policies!

[English]

The minister mentioned earlier how construction was going up. The Ottawa Citizen, March 12, not long ago: "New home starts hit six year low, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation says". The opposition is not saying that. It is the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation which is a Crown corporation.

188,000 jobless in Montreal

That was in La Presse on March 13, Madam Speaker.

[English]

"Department stores take a hammering"; states The Globe and Mail on March 14. Montreal, besides being the capital of the unemployed, now is the capital of the economic slump. Again, Montreal in January lost more than 20 per cent. It is the highest city that lost the most retail sales in Canada.

[Translation]

On March 14, La Presse reported:

Retail sales: January a disaster.

As I said before, Montreal lost 20 per cent, followed by Quebec City with 18 per cent, in just one month.

[English]

The Toronto Star on March 14 stated: "Few believe Tories can end recession". That is the reality. This government is, on economic policy, as a matter of fact on all policy, totally bankrupt and it should go to the people so the people can elect a new government. Then this country can prosper and get back into business.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I listened closely to the hon. member. He seems to be forgetting that, in the days when the Liberals were in power—he was there then—for every dollar the government of Canada received, this very generous government spent $1.33, which put us in this horrible situation we are now trying to get out of.

The hon. member talked about the GST. He failed to mention that value added tax systems are in place in 48 countries, including the most dynamic countries in the world, and that Canada has the most generous system of all and that shows the most consideration for the lower income earners.

He also failed to mention, as the knowledgeable man he is on the business world, how beneficial this tax reform will be for our imports and how much it will improve our competitiveness on the global market. I would like to know if the hon. member recognizes the fact that the old federal sales tax was a disaster, as determined by five successive commissions. I would also like to know if he will admit that the previous Liberal government had said that it had to be replaced by a value added tax but that no one had the courage to do it because such a reform is very unpopular.

I would like the hon. member to tell me what he thinks of this reform. Is it necessary or not?

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I thank the President of the Treasury Board for his question and I will attempt to address each and every point he has made.

First of all, the government keeps harping about the so-called free spending policy of its predecessor. But the President of the Treasury Board must certainly have the relevant figures within his reach. If he would only look at our last financial statements, that for March 31, 1984, he would realize that before his Party came to power, we had a deficit of about $32 billion. After six or seven years of economic growth and in spite of the many tax increases, the deficit this year is about the same. After all that time, the government should therefore stop blaming its predecessor, and begin to assume its own responsibilities.

I should like to deal now with the GST and the 40 countries of the world with a similar scheme. But once and for all, let us be realistic and call a spade a spade. It is a fact that nearly 40 countries have a GST of sort, but how many have two retail sales tax system? Name one. In most of these 40 countries, there is no sales tax at all. They have what is called a value added tax scheme, a business tax or a goods and services tax, but only Canada has one.

Now, according to the statistics released this morning, we can see that clothing is the cost of living component which increased the most over the past two months. Why? Since you hail from Quebec, Madam Speaker, you are familiar with the situation there. Before January 1, there were no goods and services tax, no federal sales tax and no provincial sales tax. Now there are two! Overnight, there was an increase of 15.6 per cent, because people have to pay the provincial tax on top of the federal GST.

We should take this into account when we say that we had no choice and that Canada is now an "in" country because it has joined the other 40 countries with a GST. Nobody ever discussed with the previous federal tax system. I, for one, sat first on the Finance Committee which examined the tentative draft, and later on on the Finance Committee which studied the whole issue of the GST during this Parliament and the previous one. We all agreed on the need to reform the tax system. I remember quite well that, when the Finance Committee held hearings in Vancouver, the mayor of that city suggested then that it might be advisable for the three levels of government to stop picking each others pockets and get together instead on a true reform which would settle this matter once and for all.

The fact is that, in the end, whether it is called the federal GST or the Quebec TVQ, it is always the same Quebec taxpayer who foots the bill. The time has come to overhaul the tax system in order to pay the national debt, the deficit, and to become more competitives in this era of globalization. But no! I ask the President of the Treasury Board to read again the famous speech made by the Minister of Finance in which he insisted on the need to carry out a major reform. For political reasons, this reform was done in two stages: The first one, because he wanted to offer pre-election goodies to the people. After having placed over a million Canadians on the tax roll, he came back and said: Let us take 800,000 off. Some 200,000 remained, just the same. But there was an election. He just could not introduce his GST, because I am sure that if he had fought the 1988 election campaign on the GST instead of the free trade, there would be no Tory government today.

[English]

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, first let me say how pleased I am to rise to discuss this issue today and to say that I, in fact, commend those young children who are concerned about the financial state of the country, are concerned about the deficit and who have been moved to make their savings available to the government. There is no questioning their motives. There is no questioning why they did it. They did it for what they felt to be good reasons.

Why are we in this situation in the first place? Why has it come to children having to use their savings to cover the deficit of the Government of Canada?

We need to remove some myths about the way the deficit arose. If we do not, we will see this government continuing to put forward its argument, obviously with some success, that its social programs and government expenditures are out of control and must be brought back into line. In other words, those less well-off Canadians, the sick, students, and the young have to pay for the past mistakes of both this government and previous Liberal governments.

A recent secret Statistics Canada study shows that fully 44 per cent of Canada's national debt is due to tax breaks to corporations and to the wealthy. Another 50 per cent is caused by the interest payments and their compounding nature as a result of these revenue shortfalls. Fully 94 per cent of the national debt in Canada has nothing to do with government expenditures or social programs. Indeed, only 6 per cent of the national debt can be attributed to that.

Let's ask how this arose because we are faced with choices. Governments have to and do make choices every day. In this context, the government is making choices which benefit the rich, large corporations and hurt children. Then it is receiving from children gifts to help pay for the deficit.

We do not have to go back very long, but if we go back 15 years, we can see that the Liberals lowered the combined federal-provincial marginal tax rate from 56 per cent to 50 per cent so that richer Canadians pay less tax than they did before.

Once the Tories took office, this process speeded up. First, there was the $500,000 lifetime capital gains tax exemption. There was the lifting of about $6 billion in energy taxes from oil companies.

This government frequently says that we have no alternatives to dealing with the deficit. Let me say that we are concerned about the deficit. There is no point in ignoring the fact that the deficit is a serious problem for Canada, and that we do face with some very tough choices. We do need to reduce it.

We should not be reducing the deficit on the backs of the poor, on the backs of children or on the backs of the sick. We should not be cutting off our opportunity to invest in the future.

A senate committee on poverty recently heard that the financial consequences of Canada's disastrous dropout rate from high school is in the order of $33 billion over 20 years. In other words, if we concentrate our efforts on ensuring that children stay in school, that there was a future for them there and afterwards, this country would save $33 billion over 20 years. It would be an investment in the future. Without making that investment, it is hard to see how Canada will have a future.

We still have over 100,000 profitable corporations paying no tax. We still have thousands of wealthy individuals paying no tax. Over the last years, there has been a reduction in the taxes of the wealthy, and the figures simply do not substantiate the minister's suggestion that our income tax system has become more progressive. It has not become more progressive.

If we ask the lower income Canadians who have seen their taxes increased, they will tell us it is not more progressive and that it is not fair. They will tell us that they do not want to pay more taxes because the system is not fair.

If this set of government priorities and policies was working, we would be able to see it. After all, the proof of the pudding is in the eating, but as a result of these government policies, we have high interest rates, high unemployment rates, record bankruptcies, both corporate and individual.

We have 1.4 million Canadians unemployed and over one million Canadian children living in poverty. Ask them whether this government's policies have worked. They have not worked for those Canadians who are least able to support themselves.

It is time that this government paid attention to those issues. It is not just a question of different political philosophies. It is a question of the future. We cannot continue to ignore the needs of one million children in Canada, fully 20 per cent of our children, and expect Canada to thrive and be competitive in that global economy which is so important to compete in.

The government often says that it has no alternatives. What it really means, of course, is that it has alternatives but it does not like them. We have pointed out those alternatives on many occasions. Basically, one of the alternatives is to pay attention to the tax loopholes that were created by past Liberal and Conservative governments, which gave tax dollars to the wealthy and to corporations, which enabled rich Canadians to become richer, and which enabled business people to entertain their friends for nothing, basically, as a result of the tax system.

Let me just give five suggestions that would save about $5.5 billion. As we have said many times, we could eliminate the $100,000 capital gains exemption. That would save about $1.5 billion. We could eliminate, as has been mentioned, the business and entertainment tax deduction and save another $1 billion. We could eliminate the dividend tax credit and save another $1 billion. This is generally considered to be preventing double taxation of corporate income, but hardly any corporations pay income tax anyway. We could eliminate the manufacturing and processing tax credit, because after all, the manufacturing sales tax is gone. We could remove tax breaks for real estate developers for take-overs and for those multinationals which finance their overseas borrowing at the expense of Canadian taxpayers. Those are just five things the government could do to help reduce the deficit and there is $5 billion right there.

Who would it hurt? It would only hurt the richest of Canadians. This government has chosen not to make the richest Canadians pay their fair share of the burden of dealing with the national debt. It has to be seen as an explicit choice because the evidence is clear. It has chosen to attack the least wealthy, the poorest Canadians.

Over the last few weeks we have seen, as a result of the federal budget, provincial budgets which have severely cut into health care programs, severely cut into the number of hospital beds and the quality of health care available, severely cut into employment in their provinces and severely cut into social assistance programs in those provinces.

The evidence is clear that this government has made a choice and it has made a choice to leave corporations alone and to place the burden unfairly on lower income Canadians.

Coming from the province of Saskatchewan, there is a lesson our governments can give to the federal government. It is not a lesson, of course, that can be provided by the present Progressive Conservative government in Saskatchewan, which started with a balanced budget and now has the highest per capita deficit in the country as a result of its Progressive Conservative ideas.

In 1944 when the first CCF government took power in Canada, Saskatchewan was a bankrupt province and it, I guess, could have decided, had it taken the neo-conservative philosophy of the present Conservative government, to just cut and cut and cut, because after all, it could not afford anything.

In the 20 years that followed, not only did that government move that treasury from one of bankruptcy to one of balanced budgets and surpluses, but it introduced most of the social programs that Canada has come to take for granted. It introduced rural electrification. It introduced telephone systems across the province. It introduced medicare, of course.

It is not critical or necessary that a government says: "Because we do not have any money, we cannot invest in the future". In fact, it is absolutely critical that we do invest in the future and that we do not burden the lowest income Canadians, those Canadians who are least capable of fending for themselves.

There is another way. We can cut those tax loopholes to the rich. We can find other sources of revenue. We can stop government waste and we can make sure that we invest in Canadians.

When faced with children coming to the Minister of Finance with their cheques, the minister must have a rather odd view of the world when his economic policies do not work, and when he thinks that taking money from children is an appropriate way to resolve those deficits. Quite clearly this is a manipulation of those children.

Clearly, children will not understand the policies of the government. They are not in a position to judge which politicians are telling the full story. Actually, I am surprised that the minister did not sell these children Conservative Party memberships while he was receiving their cheques. The move to accept the money offered was really I think also a hypocritical one in the sense that the finance minister has been telling Canadians that the deficit cannot be left to our children to pay for, that we cannot leave this burden on our children in the future.

What is he doing now? Instead of leaving for the children in the future, he is taking from the children in the present. What the Minister of Finance should be telling Canadian children is to save their pennies for education and health care because with all of the slashes to social programs, to health care, and to transfer payments to the provinces, those children are going to need that money in the future to buy the services they so critically need.

It is not hard to find other approaches. It is not hard to look across the world and see other economies dealing with these situations in a different way, economies in countries that have governments which put people first as a deliberate political, social and economic choice, and which do not cut social programs and social spending in the hope that some time in the future things will work out.

What does this government tell those 1 million hungry children who go to school and cannot study because they do not have enough to eat? It tells them: "This is necessary because in the future the country will be better off". That is not the way in which any government should be dealing with its most precious resource, our children and our future. What it should be doing, as I indicated, is investing in them.

I think there are two ways of looking at that investment. Clearly we have to deal with the social, physical and psychological pain that cuts in social programs are imposing on Canadians, but this government does not listen to those arguments requiring compassion. We also can put it in the context of economic terms. As I have mentioned, and as many have mentioned, it simply is not sensible economically to cut into those programs which constitute an investment in our future.

We constantly hear the Prime Minister telling us about the need for a world class education system and at the same time cutting funding to that education system. We can see the consequences across the country. In my own city of Saskatoon, the University of Saskatchewan is now thinking of closing colleges and faculties. The dentistry school is one which it is thinking of closing. The agriculture building which has recently been built may not be opened because there is not enough funding.

What we are doing is cutting off our nose to spite our face. We are cutting off our investment in the future.

While I understand the motives of the children who are seeing the need to pay off the deficit, I think the Minister of Finance needs to look in the mirror in the morning, every morning, carefully and ask himself what he is doing to this country.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I listened patiently to the remarks of my friend in connection with this motion. As he and his party know, we in the Liberal Party are sympathetic to the fact that the government is not sympathetic to the people of Canada.

What I am interested in is the alternatives of the NDP. As I said before, it is easy to criticize. It is another thing to come up with alternatives.

The hon. member said that one of the alternatives he would propose would be to scrap the $100,000 capital gains exemption. I would like to explore that for a moment because, to me, that is a startling proposition. I want him to explain it on behalf of his party so that Canadians can know what we are talking about.

Let us look at the ordinary Canadian. Never mind the fat cats, never mind the people who go to $250 lunches, let us talk about ordinary Canadians who struggle to buy a home, perhaps maybe have a cottage if they are lucky, and maybe have a few investments that they try and accumulate in order to be able to have a secure retirement.

As I understand it, the NDP is proposing that there be no capital gains exemption whatsoever. What does that mean? Does that mean that there is going to be no capital gains exemption for a principal residence? Does it mean that when people sell their principal residence in order to retire into a smaller home, they are going to have to pay capital gain on the value of the increase in the property? Is that fair to the ordinary Canadian? Is that what the NDP is going to propose to the people of this country? Is that what it wants Canadians to understand or is it something else?

No, no, no, it is not on the principal residence, but it is on investments in stocks and bonds. The grandmother who has purchased certain blue chip stocks in order to provide for her retirement and has to cash those stocks in order to buy things will have to pay capital gains tax. A meagre $100,000 capital gains exemption, when, for years and years and years, this country had no capital gains tax encouraging the spirit of enterprise and encouraging Canadians to save and provide for their retirement.

What is it exactly that the NDP is proposing? That there be no opportunity whatsoever for people to better themselves in this country? Is it your policy to scrap the $100,000 capital gains tax exemption, have no capital gains tax exemption? Everybody will be paying more taxes then, never mind the rich.

What is the policy?

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the member's comments make a pretty stark contrast between those who want to pursue the interest of the privileged and those who do not. The 1.4 million Canadians who are unemployed, the 1 million Canadian children who live in poverty are not really persuaded by arguments which help those who are already wealthy to buy summer cottages. Those 1.4 million unemployed Canadians and those 1 million Canadian children living in poverty are not moved by arguments which put summer cottages ahead of food on the table.

If the member would like to listen for just a moment, he will know, and if he has paid attention in the past he will know, that in getting rid of the capital gains exemption we would provide for two exemptions. We would not apply it to farmers and we would not apply it to small business. So, to some extent, the member's screaming and yelling are addressed in those two exemptions.

We understand that there are difficulties that small businesses and farmers face. It is a question of the government making a choice, of political parties making a choice. I will stand up every day for poor children having more to eat as opposed to people being able to buy summer cottages.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member if he could give me a reason why he makes a distinction in his answer. He talked about giving an exemption, in his capital gains formula, to small farmers and small business people and allowing them to have capital gains and, I believe that limit, I do not know if he specified it, could go up to as high as $500,000.

There are many Canadians who do not have that situation of being a small farmer or a small business person. They are people, many of them NDP supporters, who work in companies and earn $30,000, $40,000 or $45,000 a year. They take that money and every year they find they might have $1,000 or $1,500 left over and they want to plan for their retirement.

They buy themselves some stocks in Bell Telephone or some other Canadian company, and as time progresses find that having worked 40 years, having saved a little bit every year, they have managed to accumulate $200,000 or $300,000 they are going to use in their retirement.

If I heard the member correctly, these individuals who have made investments, have made capital gains, are going to be expected to pay tax on their capital gain, but he exempts the small business person and the farmer.

Would he mind telling me why he picks on senior citizens who happen not to have been farmers or small business people to pay capital gains in this country?

Mr. Boudria: That is easy; the NDP are against seniors.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the argument made is that somebody who has $200,000 or $300,000 saved up should not pay taxes on it. That is the point the member is making.

Mr. Wappel: Of course, they should pay taxes.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): I would like this member to go to the nearest food bank in his community—after all, there are hundreds of them across this country—and go to the families in that food bank, go to the children and go to the mothers who are trying to put food on the table, and ask this: "Shouldn't we let people with $200,000 or $300,000 get out of paying tax?" Let him see what those people say.

That is not just a small number of people in this country, there are 1.4 million unemployed—I don't know how many who are indirectly affected—and a million poor kids.

The question is one about priorities, and those arguments simply do not wash with those Canadians who are hurting most.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put the motion on the record before beginning my remarks. I think it is important for the information of hon. members.

> That this House condemn the government for implementing a debt reduction program which accepts the savings of children but fails to ensure that large, profitable Canadian corporations and wealthy individuals pay their fair share.

Mr. Speaker, I have been here for close to seven years now, but this has to be the first time I see such a mixture of cabbage and oranges in a motion!

Mr. Boudria: A socialist salad!

Mr. Vincent: Enlightening remarks on the part of my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Mr. Speaker, something new for which I commend him.

I think it is important to go over the events since 1984 to respond to the arguments made by my colleague from Saint-Léonard and the NDP members.

The basic principle in this country is that Canadians do not like paying taxes. I know you do not, you told me so. Nobody likes that. But at the same time Canadians have shown a preference for various programs and they want a country where citizens are properly treated. From that point on, taxes have to be paid and collected.

Earlier today my colleague from Saint-Léonard said that in 117 years the national debt had not increased more than the one we now have in 1990 and which, according to him, can be traced back to 1984.

Mr. Boudria: Well put.

Mr. Vincent: All I can say to him is that the preceding administrations over the 117 years he referred to did not have the unfortunate experience of inheriting a $200 billion debt when they were elected to office. We did, Mr. Speaker. And we are living with it. Since 1984 we have increased public expenditures by only 3 per cent, while provincial legislatures, municipal councils and private sector companies have boosted theirs a lot more than that. We have managed to keep annual increases to 3 per cent, but we did receive much more than that.

• (1320)

In 1984, the federal government was spending $15 billion more annually, on all kinds of programs, than it was collecting revenue. Not 15 million but 15 billion. After six years the federal government is now spending 10 billion less than it collects in revenue. This means a turnover of $25 billion in six years time. That is good management. People will say we raised taxes. Sure, some taxes were raised, but 70 per cent of this $25 billion comes out of cutbacks in the federal government, and only 30 per cent out of tax increases.

And what about these tax increases? Let me explain. Thanks to tax reform, personal income tax for Canadians has gone down. I remember that when I was a tax consultant in Trois-Rivières, we had 10 tax rates. Not one, not two, but ten, the highest being 34 per cent. After tax reform, we now have three tax rates: 17, 26 and 29 per cent. Before, we had the advantage, and the hon. member for Saint-Léonard who is an accountant will confirm this—

Mr. Gagliano: I am listening!

Mr. Vincent: Someone with an income of $100,000 a year had a personal exemption of $3,000, and federal and provincial income tax added up to a tax rate of about 50 per cent. The personal exemption meant that someone with an income of $100,000 was able to save $1,500 a year. However, someone with an income of $10,000 who was paying, let's say 20 per cent income tax, so 20 per cent of $3,000 is $600. The individual with an income of $10,000 saved $600 in taxes and the individual with an income of $100,000 was able to save $1,500, on an annual basis. In 1988 we changed all that and we said there would be one tax credit for everybody. Fair and square: everybody gets the same amount. In fact, this was a tax increase because people with an income of $100,000 who were paying $1,500 less in taxes, are now paying only $1,000 less.

Mr. Speaker, before taxes, if we compare 1984 and today, people are better off. The average salary has gone up from $20,000 to $22,000. The after-tax figure has changed from $18,000 to $19,700, an increase of 8.6 per cent. This means that taxes have gone down as a result of tax reform, no doubt about it.

An hon. member: Tory times!

Mr. Vincent: I hope my hon. colleague has nothing against the 1988 tax cut.

Mr. Boudria: Big deal! After increasing taxes in 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988!

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, since 1988, the number of Canadians in the $100,000 plus bracket who pay taxes increased by 37 per cent. So, the wealthy individuals not paying their fair, that my colleagues from the New Democratic Party are referring to in their motion, we got them with the tax reform, particularly with the minimum income tax. But we heard no NDPers talk about the minimum tax which, incidentally, was introduced not in 1988 but in 1986. Neither did we hear about the minimum tax imposed on corporations since 1989, Mr. Speaker, or about the cuts in tax shelters: MURBs, limited partnerships, preferred shares, leasing rules. The 30 per cent tax increase I mentioned come from all these cuts in tax shelters, the restructuring of the tax system to make it fair and some taxes which were increased.

My colleague from Saint-Léonard talked about the GST. He said that low-income earners, the students, the underprivileged and the seniors had to pay the GST. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, they do. However, this government did introduce a tax credit. People were phoning me at my office in Trois-Rivières in December because they were grateful for having received their tax credit cheque before the tax was implemented. The sales tax credit was invented by this government. It is this government, the Prime Minister of Canada and the Minister of Finance who had this clever idea. So, Mr. Speaker, It is not true that the low-income earners are adversely affected by the GST. They have their tax credit, ahead of time, to be sure. That credit is given to nine millions Canadians who, each year, receive at least one cheque, and the Trois-Rivières area includes many of them. In fact, that credit is designed to offset the GST, which is a consumption tax, and that mean that if you are rich and you are buying, you pay the tax; if you are not rich and you are not buying, you don't pay the tax. That basic principle was quite relevantly underlined by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, and is already applied in more than 48 countries. That's no news. France applies the system. It is more complicated than ours and it works.

The 1982 tax reform has cut taxes $2.5 billions. So, Canadians pay $2.5 billions less in taxes since the 1982 tax reform, and that amount is paid by businesses who, as I just said, must pay their fair share. Mr. Speaker, let me quote some figures that speak for themselves. The fiscal reform has made it possible to distribute the tax burden among low and middle income Canadians. In 1987, despite the fact that taxpayers with less than $15,000 income accounted for 47.8 per cent of all filers and 15.3 per cent of all earnings, their share of tax revenues was only 2.1 p. 100 of the total. Compared to 1988, they represented 45.2 per cent of all filers while their share of the tax decreased by about two thirds. In contrast with 1987, taxpayers with $ 100,000 income, representing less than 1 per cent of taxfilers, earned 7.2 per cent of all income but were carrying only 13.7 per cent of the tax burden. In 1988, those same taxfilers earning more than $100,000 have seen their taxes increase by 16.7 per cent. I do not like to give too many figures but I think those ones should be mentioned and put on the record to show that this government is efficient and that we have a fair tax system in this country.

True, paying taxes is no fun, but at least the system will be fair from now on. Now, Canadian women and men who earn an income will pay their fair share. And allow me, to answer my colleague from the NDP who says once again that corporations do not pay taxes. This is not true. In Canada, corporations pay their fair share of taxes. He talked about capital gains and I will not come back to that. I think it has already been shown that that argument about capital gains does not hold. He was also talking about the fact that companies are allowed expenses that individuals are not allowed. It is true, Mr. Speaker. It is true that companies are allowed expenses that individuals, that employees are not allowed. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this is normal. Companies must incur certain expenses in the course of their business. So, they are allowed certain expenses, just like unions are.

Mr. Speaker, it is this government once again that cut back on lunches, on automobile expenses. It is this government that said on the issue of meals: there is a part of the meal paid by the company to its employee or to its president that is considered as a personal expense of that individual. That part is no longer tax deductible, but the other part is, because it is a cost of doing business. The individual who pays for his share of the meal, who works for Kruger for example, does is not entitled to any deduction. The owner of Kruger, when he goes to a restaurant with other business people, must pay his own share, it is not tax deductible. This, Mr. Speaker, is an example of fiscal fairness, and I think it disproves what the hon. member for the NDP was saying, that we had done nothing.

He was also talking about dividends. Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of working as a tax lawyer for seven or eight years, and I can tell you that the dividend tax credit is not a gift. It is a tax measure which is part of a whole package. There are two ways for a company to borrow money. It can go to the bank and borrow $100,000 at a rate of 10 per cent and pay an interest of $10,000 a year for it, which is deductible as a business expense. The other way is to go public and to tell the shareholders: "You buy shares for $100,000 and you have a return".

What happens then? After the company pays its taxes, it uses what is left to pay a dividend to its shareholders.

So the company pays dividends to its shareholders from its after-tax earnings. The shareholders are in turn automatically taxed according to their tax rate, but allowance is made for the fact that it is an amount net of tax, that the money has already been taxed when in the hands of the company.

So, the NDP say it is a tax shelter, but that is not true. That money is taxed in one of two ways: either the company chooses to borrow it from a bank or it finds some investors willing to take a chance on its operations.

Mr. Speaker, the NDP is once again talking about the deductibility of interest charges. How could a business possibly function if it cannot take out a loan and deduct the expense incurred on that loan, that is the cost of borrowing money, to improve its machinery, to expand its plant or for some other purpose. It would be unthinkable, in a system like ours, to be unable to deduct the interest charges incurred for operational purposes.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I hope that this motion will be defeated, as I am sure it will be. I hope that people on the other side, and particularly the NDP, will stop making comparisons between children—who have a better knowledge of what is going on than the NDP and who are prepared to give whatever little money they have to pay the national debt—and companies or individuals who pay taxes. They are only trying to confuse the Canadian population.

[English]

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague from Trois-Rivières on an excellent contribution to this debate. I would like to make a comment with respect to the motion and to pose a question to him.

This motion was put by the New Democratic Party. It condemns the government for implementing a debt reduction program that fails to ensure that wealthy individuals pay their fair share.

First, it seems to me that it is a little hypocritical of the New Democrats to pose such a motion when the very debt which they speak of is something which they and their cohorts in the Liberal Party inflicted upon this country during the period 1968 to 1984. Twice they had the opportunity to kill off that unholy coalition. They could have done it in the period 1972 to 1974. They could have done it in 1979, but in each case they crawled back in bed with Pierre Trudeau because he was pushing the same kind of socialist policies that they stand for.

The profligate spending that went on during that time period is what left a legacy of some $206 billion to $207 billion of debt in March 1985, the interest on which, as my hon. colleague pointed out, is something that has severely constrained the ability of the government today to respond to the kind of needs that the country has.

It seems to me that there has been a long list of initiatives taken by this government in terms of getting rid of so-called tax loopholes. The SRTC boondoggle was something that the previous government put forward and cost the Treasury of this country $4 billion or $5 billion dollars. This government curtailed that.

It got rid of the thousand dollar interest exemption, the films, the MURBs, the flow-throughs, and the business investment tax credit. It increased the tax rate on taxable capital gains. As my friend points out, it converted the exemptions to credits. It put on high income surcharges, corporate minimum tax, and so on.

At the same time, every one of these initiatives was opposed by the Official Opposition and by the NDP that posed this motion. At the same every move to refine the tax system and to modernize it was opposed by those opposite.

What I find strangest of all is the inconsistency within the New Democratic Party. This motion calls for the government to tax wealthy individuals, that wealthy individuals should be paying their fair share. A year or two ago, this government put forward measures which would result in the taxing back of the family allowance and the old age pension from high income Canadians.

Guess who opposes that move, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Boudria: Who?

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): New Democrats, the very people who want to tax the wealthy and get the rich, really punish them. They oppose the taxing back of the family allowance and the old age pension from these high income Canadians.

Does my hon. colleague not find that approach on the part of the NDP to be completely hypocritical and completely inconsistent?

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments made by my colleague. I worked on the Budget and I must say that when I heard that the seniors earning more than $77,000—excluding Old Age Security pension—should pay back part of that money I thought that the Liberals would like the idea. Those people earn high incomes, Mr. Speaker. In Trois-Rivières, and I think everywhere else in Canada, $77,000 is a fair amount of money. I thought that the NDP would be kneeling to thank us saying that at last, we were taxing without giving hand-outs to people who don't need it. It is as simple as that: we are not giving money to people who don't need it. That income of $77,000 did not include the old age security pension. Therefore I thought that the NDP would get down on their knees to thank us. My colleague was telling me the same thing: finally, the NDP and I are going to agree on one thing. As usual, for more than six years, and this is what is unfortunate here, there has not been one single policy the government has put foward that the Opposition has not been opposed.

Mr. Boudria: No, no.

Mr. Vincent: I am talking in terms of fiscal policies. The NDP and the Lberals have always been against all of them. It is impossible that they should all be wrong. Nevertheles they are against them. My colleague asked me a question, but there is another one that springs to mind. After looking at the so-called loopholes mentioned by the NDP I explained why they are not loopholes. The next question is that not a day goes by without their asking for more money for this or that. Where do they want us to get the money from? That is the question. The question is, where is the money to come from when day in and day out they keep asking for more programs? Every single day they urge the government to spend even more in all sectors. So where do we get the money?

• (1340)

It has been six years, Mr. Speaker, but unfortunately neither the NDP nor the Liberals have been able to answer that question. They did not suggest practical, intelligent and workable solutions likely to make Canada progress. The role of opposition members is to make the country progress, as is the role of government, and the country will not progress unless they can make suggestions. The have none. They do not make any. That is where the problem lies.

[English]

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue on the point that was raised by the previous questioner, that is the question of universality as it applies to family allowances and old age pensions.

Perhaps my hon. friend would agree with me that in effect the policies of the Conservatives have done away with universality as it applies to family allowances and old age pensions. For many years Canadians have been very proud of the net of security that applies to those two programs.

Of course, previously pensions and family allowances did go to families where, regardless of their income, there was in effect a tax back, if we can call it that, as people paid income tax on their total income and these items were included within their total taxable income.

The reason why we have always opposed taxing back the total family allowance is that it denies the principle of caring for the next generation of children. It means that those families who happen to have children are the ones that are penalized.

I do not see why myself and other Canadians who do not happen to have children should not be contributing toward the next generation of children. I am very pleased to do this through the family allowance, which is a universal family allowance, and recognizes the importance of all children. Those who happen to have wealthier parents of course will pay a little bit more on their income tax, but we must really reinstate the whole concept of universality.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand my hon. friend's logic, if there is one. If she feels that all families should get family allowances, I personally feel that only those families who need family allowances should get them. With all due respect for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney could do without family allowances and still raise his children. Former Prime Minister Trudeau could well survive without his Old Age Security pension. That is the point which my hon. friend does not understand. We feel that family allowances and Old Age Security pensions should be paid only to those who need them. That is the whole point and it does not take anything away from its universal character.

For instance, let us take the case of a senior citizen in my riding who this year is getting a $100,000 income; suppose that next year, for whatever reason, he has no income, he would automatically receive every month his Old Age Security Pension cheque. Universality is maintained for the needy and not for the others. I feel it is simple enough. It is not normal for a person earning $300,000 a year to get family allowances, and later an Old Age Security Pension cheque. It's not normal. He does not need the money, while other Canadians really need it. If we really want the needy to continue to receive the money, we have to take it away from those who can do without it.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity this afternoon to speak in this very important debate.

There are a number of items which should be considered in this motion. First of all, the people to our far left are commenting on the fact that the government has stooped to what we did not even think was possible for it, in terms of how low it could go, by publicizing the fact that children are selling their toys to pay down the Minister of Finance's debt.

The second theme involved is, according to the New Democrats, that corporations can do nothing right. Finally, there is the issue of taxation generally.

In my opinion, there is nothing inherently wrong for two or three people in a family to incorporate their family store, hot dog stand, or what have you. One does not have to report that to some great big socialist over there, who rules on the evil of having an incorporated family business.

To that extent, I am going to part company with our friends to the far left. I happen to think that family businesses, small businesses in particular, although incorporated are not necessarily wealthy. The idea that businesses cannot deduct such things as interest on loans in order to buy inventory to sell in their store, according to New Democrat theology, is not something I agree with. I happen to think those kinds of enterprises should be encouraged by all of us in the House of Commons, including those who are socialists.

Let us start with this proposition that we are discussing, namely children.

I understand that the Government House Leader is seeking the floor.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I thank my hon. colleague. I would just like to officially designate Monday as an allotted day.

I appreciate your courtesy.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blaikie (p. 18859).

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, we will be pleased to speak on supply issues again on Monday. As you know and I think the government has also recognized, there is a lot to talk about in regard to whether or not this Parliament should grant supply to the government. There seems to be that recognition, finally, on the part of the government. We will gladly participate Monday as well as other days, presumably, in order to be able to remind Canadians why this government should be held accountable to an even greater degree than it is right now. We will do our best to do that, until such time as the electors can render the ultimate decision of accountability, which is to turf out the government at the polls the next time.

Let me speak briefly about this issue of fairness in taxation and tax policies generally. First of all, we cannot talk about fairness without talking about the dreaded GST. The dreaded GST is creating tremendous havoc yet. I know the government said it had this science down perfectly and that everything it would do would be correct and good and proper and virtuous. Well, let me read an excerpt from today's Ottawa Citizen which was given to me by my very distinguished and eloquent colleague, the member for Stormont—Dundas.

The member for Stormont—Dundas brought to the attention of the House this morning the issue of cross-border shopping in his area of Cornwall, adjacent to my own constituency of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I quote from the article:

> In Cornwall alone, the crossings nearly doubled last month to 77,000 from 43,000 in February 1990.

This government has created taxation policies that are such that people are running across the U.S. border to do their shopping. What do those unfair tax policies do to the businesses of Stormont—Dundas, and of Cornwall, which are so well represented by my colleague? What did they do?

What did he do to the good people of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and other Canadians who own businesses in this country? Now, of course, we have our good old socialist friends governing Ontario. The good old socialists of Ontario, the friends of Peter Kormos, remind me a little bit of a dog that caught the wheel of a car as it was going by. They are asking now: what do we do with it?

The members of the NDP in Ontario protested Sunday shopping. They protested Sunday shopping so loudly and with such virtue and wholesomeness and all that good stuff that the NDP does so well, thinking of course that they would never have to deal with the issue because the courts had decided on it. Lo and behold, a couple of days ago the Supreme Court of Ontario ruled that in fact the government of Ontario—the NDP government now, of course; need we be reminded—had the authority to rule on Sunday shopping.

It was easy to be against Sunday shopping when they knew they would not have to rule on it. But now they are going to have to rule on it and the law that had been disbanded is all of a sudden back in place. At the same time, communities along the Canada-U.S. border on the Canadian side are being affected by this Sunday shopping issue. We are anxiously waiting to see how the friends of Peter Kormos handle this particular question. We shall wait anxiously for probably a few more somersaults, handstands and headstands on the part of silk stocking Bob and his good comrades at Queen's Park. We shall wait and see how to deal with that.

Let us come back to the issue of fair taxation, the GST and other matters. We have the whole issue of fair taxation by the government across the way to contend with. That is no small potatoes.

I have a letter from a constituent of the great riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell that I am going to read to you. Some of the issues he brings to our attention concern the unfairness of the taxation system of the government across the way.

He says in his letter: "If I am at work or home, and I am unfortunate enough to become involved in an accident or suffer a heart attack or other illness which might result in my death, the proceeds of my life insurance policy are not taxable income." Fair and good and proper, in so far as I am concerned. However, let us continue: "If I am at work and become involved in an accident that leaves me disabled for a period of time, and I receive Worker's Compensation benefits, these are not subject to income tax either." Again, that is reasonable.

However, listen to this: "If I am at work or any other place and I am unfortunate enough to suffer a stroke or a heart attack which leaves me disabled but still alive, and I receive disability insurance, it is considered to be taxable and are subject to income tax."

Anyone who thinks that kind of policy is reasonable and fair, has their head screwed on wrong, in my opinion. I wrote to the Minister of Finance about this issue last September. He has not even responded yet. He has not even responded to this very legitimate grievance on the part of a constituent who is trying to obtain redress. I know: "The answer is in the mail."

I have another constituent who corresponded with me recently about another issue involving unfair taxation. I am glad to see that the President of the Treasury Board is here, because perhaps he can note these questions I am asking. I see he is getting out his notebook, he wants to note this. Perhaps he can take note of this question and forwarded it to his boss, the Minister of Finance.

I wrote a letter to the Minister of Finance about an issue that was brought to my attention by another constituent in regard to child custody issues.

As members know, there is such a tax rebate device as the child tax credit. The child tax credit is another very reasonable proposition. It is given pursuant to whichever parent has custody of the child on the last day of the year. I have constituents who are unfortunate enough to have parted company, in other words they are divorced. The child lived with one parent for 11.5 months of the year and then, pursuant to mutual arrangement, moved in with the other parent. Guess which parent gets the child tax credit? The one who kept the child two weeks, not the one who kept the child 11.5 months.

I wrote a letter to the Minister of Finance on this issue. Do you know what his answer was? He said that it would be too complicated to calculate this kind of thing and that is why he does not intend to change it. This is Tory fairness. This is the explanation I get from the Minister of Finance.

I cannot believe that the Minister of Finance, who claims that he can count all the money we need to run the government in Canada, cannot count the child tax credit for my constituent. Perhaps this explains the reason why we are in this much trouble in this country; the Minister of Finance cannot count.

Over the last couple of weeks, I have been receiving phone calls from automobile dealers in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell concerning the GST refund to automobile dealers. Do you know how many automobile dealers have actually received their money back from the GST for inventory? Zero. The government promised us that those funds would be coming back 15 days later.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Twenty-one days.

Mr. Boudria: Twenty-one days. Well, what is the difference? It has been close to three months and they have not received one cent. I have not yet found one car dealer who has managed to get the money back. This is Tory fairness. I have to admit it, they are making more businesses in the constituency that I represent go bankrupt because they are hanging on to funds that do not belong to the government; those funds belong to my constituents to operate their businesses and to make them survive.

The rate of unemployment in my riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is 16.6 per cent. Why would we want such unfair policies that cause more pain, suffering and hardshihp to the people of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell?

A moment ago, Madam Speaker, I had the opportunity to discuss with my colleague from Newfoundland, the member for the riding of—

Mr. Mifflin: Bonavista—Trinity—Conception!

Mr. Boudria: —Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, who was telling me that how unfair the unemployment insurance system is. The people of Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, who are so aptly represented in this House, told their member of Parliament, who always listens to them with great interest of course, how unfair it was that the federal government recently stopped contributing to the unemployment insurance fund. So now there is only the taxpayers and the businesses contributing to the fund. Of course, this government helps himself to that fund every now and then, under the guise of grants, to provide training and so on, but have not put anything in for quite some time now.

[English]

The parliamentary secretary said in this House that since 1988, taxes were fairer or something like that. I am paraphrasing here. I know that he will stand in his place immediately and correct me if what I said is not quite accurate. I know the Minister of Finance would stand in his place immediately as well, but I do not think they will. I have good reason to believe they will not.

The Conservative members across the way are talking about this fairness in taxation policy. We are in the middle of a recession, and you do not have to be John Maynard Keynes to understand that the middle of a recession is not the time to take money away from the taxpayers, money which they need to stimulate the economy.

Let me tell you what is happening here. A family of four making between $25,000 and $30,000 a year, hardly a rich family— they would not even be considered rich in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell—

An hon. member: Your comrades.

Mr. Boudria: Well, maybe the comrades over there think they are rich but I do not. They are going to have to pay another $162, and that is the combination of increases in UI premiums and increases in the taxes otherwise, the combination of which is $162.

A family making $10,000 a year—even my friends to my left would consider it poor—is going to have to pay $55 a year more in taxes. You would think that at least people at the lower income bracket, such as the ones I have just described, would be getting a break from the people across the way. The tax system is far from being fair.

I received a letter from someone in Vancouver, British Columbia. It arrived on my desk this morning just as I was accumulating data to make this discourse to the House this afternoon. I thought this letter was quite apropos. It says:

> Dear Mr. Boudria:
> This letter is to let you know of the effect that the Goods and Services Tax is having on our business.
> My wife and I have operated our business since 1982. We have a photography Studio which specializes in Wedding photography. Each year has without exception been better than the previous year—

Note that they started in 1982 so they have been in business for a long time.

> —both in volume of business and in net profits. This year, with the G.S.T. in place we have seen a drastic drop in both of these indicators.

This morning we received new economic indicators, namely the Consumer Price Index increase for the last month and the government across the way will recognize the tremendous effect the goods and services tax has had on inflation.

[Translation]

Thus, Madam Speaker, as you can see, the new taxes announced in the Budget are all the more unfair for ordinary Canadians. As you can see, several tax initiatives of the governement opposite are unfair to people from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and the rest of Canada.

[English]

I want to talk a little bit about the issue of the Minister of Finance standing in front of the television cameras with children who had sold their toys in order to pay part of the deficit. I have not yet seen anyone sell a limousine to help pay part off the deficit. Speaking of limousines, I meant the used car lot that is outside the west door of the Parliament Buildings when we leave after a vote at night, namely the ministers' limousines.

Speaking of that, if this government were serious about restraints why are there 40 cabinet ministers to handle the affairs of this nation? In the United States, a country 10 times the size, there are fewer than half the cabinet ministers. With 10 times the population, if they can do the job of running the country with half as many people, and I recognize that Tories are only half as efficient as most of the rest of us, but do you not think they could at least do a little better than they are doing now? Could the government at least show an example? Speaking of selling toys, maybe it could sell some of those big toys, those great big dark-blue toys outside the west door here, chauffeur driven and all.

I say to the government across the way that it needs to preach restraint far better by practising some of it itself. I say to the government that it needs to establish fair taxation policies for families and for everyone else. Numerous letters I have received over the last 12 months are from couples with children who are telling me they are financially disadvantaged because they are married. I have complained many times to the Minister of Finance about that. In regard to taxation there is such a thing as the spousal equivalent exemption, or something like that. What effectively that does is it allows an adult to place a child as a deduction, the same as if it were a spouse, which effectively means that married people cannot do something that two people unmarried and living together can do. In other words, each one of them can claim a different person as being the spousal equivalent.

I do not think there should be policies in this country which discriminate against families. If they are not advantageous to families, well I still do not like it, but at least it is fair game. At the very least, one would think that one should not be worse off for being married in this country and raising a family and so I ask the government for some fairness in that regard.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member who just spoke on debate. What I like about the hon. member's contribution to this House is that he always has his ear to the grass roots in the riding and across Canada. He knows the impact of policies created in this House on the average person out there in our ridings.

He talked about the bankruptcies reported in most newspapers yesterday and in The Financial Post, John Geddes writes under the heading "Bankruptcies continue to soar":

> Ontario and Newfoundland were hit hardest in February as the recession drove 6,249 businesses and consumers across Canada into bankruptcy, up 68 per cent from a year earlier.
> In Ontario, the number of bankruptcies rose to 2,383, more than double the 1,043 in the same month in 1990, statistics by the federal Consumer & Corporate Affairs Department show.
> Newfoundland's total also more than doubled in February to 76 bankruptcies from just 30 a year earlier.

The hon. member talked about the bankruptcies in his riding. I would just like to ask him which businesses, which firms are being hit the hardest and how are these people coping? Are they drawing unemployment insurance, just how are they coping when their company goes bankrupt?

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the question from my colleague. The bankruptcies have affected the constituency that I represent very severely. It is not just bankruptcies. There are partial and otherwise plant lay-offs as well. For instance, the Ivaco steel mill in L'Orignal, Ontario laid off a number of workers a few weeks ago. Canadian Pacific Forest Product Research Lab in Hawkesbury, a lab which had been there for 80-odd years, formerly known as CIP Research, is now shutting its doors; 62 people in very good jobs, a lot of them scientists and so, on all losing their work.

There have been many lay-offs at textile plants in my riding as well. Plants have been shutting down, plants have been in some cases going out of business. In some places there are just partial lay-offs. A year ago we lost one industry in Hawkesbury, a garment factory known as Canadelle. It manufactures under licence from a company known as Wonder Bra. Some 100 people lost their jobs, as far as I know, all women.

The announcement was in October 1989. The plant closed February 2, 1990. Officials from the Government of Canada met with the people immediately. The local Canadian Employment Centre was there I think the night that they announced the closure or the day after and I was there with it.

To this day, the Program for Older Workers' Assistance—I think it is abbreviated to POWA—for older workers who are losing their jobs; these women who are, many of them, well into their fifties, as of today, March 22, 1991 still do not have an answer as to whether or not they will qualify for the program for older workers assistance. Some 16 months after it was announced the factory was to shut down, 14 months after it did shut down, and I was told yesterday that it would take at least two more months before they will be told whether or not they will get their money.

There is 16.6 per cent unemployment. Grandmothers are not the first people who are going to be rehired, anyway. When there is 16.6 per cent unemployment it makes it that much worse. And that is why there is a program for older workers assistance, which I believe was initiated by the previous Liberal government.

But it is taking so long, 15 or 16 months, to get their money, and to make matters even worse—and I think I am really getting to the centre of the issue raised by my colleague—at the same time as they are having to wait for this, their unemployment insurance benefits have been cut back. Previously they could draw unemployment for a year, so if it took a year to qualify for the program for older workers adjustment, they at least had something else in the meantime. But now they have run out of UIC and are presumably on welfare, or whatever, until they qualify for this assistance.

I could not get an answer from the government as to why someone had goofed and allowed all this time to go by and not provide a positive answer for the employees of Canadelle in Hawkesbury.

This morning I wrote a letter to the Minister of Labour asking for his intervention, personally, and of course I will not have an answer for a little while, but I plead with him to assist those women who were working at Canadelle so that they can get some benefits instead of going on welfare.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): I would like to make a comment and put a question to my hon. colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

I think it is a bit ironic that we on this side have to listen to lectures from the Liberal Party on how to manage the economy and how to reduce debt, given that it is the party which, between 1968 and 1984, over-spent. It has no regard whatever for spending limits. This government in its recent budget has proposed to legislate, for the first time in history, spending limits.

The only regret I have is that it was not done a long time ago. Indeed, had those spending limits been in place back in the late sixties, we would not have the problem and we would not have the need for the motion today.

It was easy back there during the seventies. It was the credit card operation—the Liberals didn't have the guts to face people with the cost of the programs. It was just a matter of shovelling out the vote-getting programs and not worrying about it, we will let the next generation pick up the bills.

Unfortunately, it has come back now, and you can tell that they can't stand to hear it because they know very well that it is the truth.

Take sales tax reform, for example. As far back as 1940 a royal commission suggested that there be sales tax reform. Commissions after that made numerous suggestions, but never, never in all the years that the Liberal Party was in power did it have the backbone to take that initiative.

For example, they oppose in this House any and all measures to reduce expenditures, to curtail programs that are not necessary, oppose every effort to increase revenues.

Mr. Boudria: Let the limousines go.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creak—Assiniboia): That is a clever suggestion. As a matter of fact, I will give the hon. member from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell credit, he has made one good suggestion, he suggests that the limousines go, and indeed that the size of the cabinet be reduced. I heard that, and indeed it is an interesting suggestion.

I would like to give him a chance to redeem himself at this point. He was not here prior to 1984, so of course it is unfair to hold him responsible for the sins of those in his party there before him. The hon. member for Ottawa Vanier was here so he is certainly not without sin.

I want to ask the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell a question. At this point there is still time for him to redeem himself.

Could he at this point put forward one constructive suggestion that we could use to do something about reducing the level of the deficit and curtailing the national debt which his party left to us? At $207 billion in March 1985, the compound interest on that has increased the debt somewhat drastically.

In the last three years of its administration, it over-spent in the everyday programs of government by $16 billion in 1984-85, $14 billion in 1983-84 and $11 billion in 1982-83.

I ask the hon. member to redeem himself. Rather than giving forth an endless litany of complaints about what he perceives is wrong, does he have something constructive to put forward in terms of how to deal with this problem?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may want to leave his colleague some time to do it.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the member has given me an opportunity to redeem myself, and I say this to the great redeemer across the way: he said that his government is in favour of tax reform. That is a bit like being in favour of virtue. Everyone is in favour of virtue. I am just not in favour of driving the people in my riding out of business. That is the problem I have with what this government has done.

The great redeemer across the way has asked me to provide a constructive idea of how to cut expenditures. Well, I am glad he asked. I was a little curious, so I put in an access to information request to see how much bottled mountain stream water was being purchased for the office of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In 1989-90, it was $15,047 worth; in 1990-91, it was $17,759.

I'll drink to that.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in this debate today.

It used to be a common joke that would be told at neighbourhood gatherings when the parents would get together after the kids had gone to bed and share with each other some of the disconcerting things that their children had done to them that day, memorable events such as using a vacuum cleaner to extract a toothbrush from the toilet or exhibiting artistic talent with magic markers all over the wall. Some parents would comment: "The best revenge is to live long enough to be a problem to our children".

That is no joke today. We even see bumper stickers with such sayings as: "I'm out spending my kids' inheritance" or "I'm going to live long enough to be a problem to my kids".

That is really a problem for our children, and the revenge we are placing on them is far from sweet. It is very sad and it is very sobering. Our revenge is the national debt, a debt that if we leave unaddressed will be a painful inheritance forced on our children and their children and their children.

Many of us were children in the 20 to 25 years from 1950 to 1973. Madam Speaker, I know that would include you; it certainly includes everybody on this side of the House. We grew up during a period of record economic growth and personal prosperity, and we saw a standard of living virtually double in a single generation in that period of time when we were children. Inflation was less than 3 per cent, interest rates were low, and the federal deficits were small or non-existent. We ran a plus or minus on an annual basis, and the economy was functioning well.

As a result, we grew up with confidence that prosperity and economic growth were normal things. It was almost inevitable that we would have prosperity. Our ability to meet and solve the problems and challenges of these years was only constrained by our creativity to define the solutions and a determination to see them through to their conclusion.

But then from 1974 through to 1984, and I might add even a few years subsequent to that, the way was lost. In these 10 years or so inflation soared. We tried to buy our way out of each and every new problem.

The result was very predictable. The federal deficit jumped at one point to $38 billion and the national debt grew from some $27 billion in 1974 to over $200 billion in 1984 and now to almost $380 billion.

Here we are thinking about the closing years of our careers and watching with concern, even trepidation, as our children are just beginning to assume their roles as adults in the society we are destined to leave them.

It is not simply the size of the debt that ought to concern us. It is the very tiny margin of financial flexibility that we are in fact leaving to our children. They like every generation will have their own challenges to meet, some of them about which we do not even know today as to what possible challenges they might have. At the very least we owe our children the opportunity to invest in the benefits of the prosperity they create and the solutions they apply to the challenges of their time.

Instead, we are on the verge of constraining their creativity and their capacity to meet the future by forcing them to pay for the past. This is not the future this government, this party or I would intend to leave to my children and the children of Canada.

Since the first budget and the first thrown speech back in 1984, our government has been committed to two important principles. The first is to maintain a level of social programs that enables all Canadians, young and old, to participate fully in Canadian society. In some areas of high priority, the government does not hesitate to expand its commitment.

The second is to plan year by year the control of our deficit so that our children's future options will be available to them and will not be curtailed by the need to clear away a legacy of financial irresponsibility.

The Canada Assistance Plan, which has certainly received an awful lot of attention in the last few weeks in the press, in spite of misleading assertions to the contrary remains a major component of Canada's safety net. Over $5.2 billion will have been transferred to the provinces in matching money this year to help finance social assistance payments to individuals in need and social programs of support. This will increase by some 7.3 per cent to over $5.6 billion in this coming year.

True, increases to the three wealthiest provinces, the province of which I am a resident and in which my constituency is located, are capped at 5 per cent; but the open-ended arrangement for the other provinces certainly remains intact.

In excess of $550 million of the CAP expenditures are in fact applied to child welfare services for an estimated 50,000 children in care and another 250,000 served annually through various child welfare protection services provided in their own home or in the community surrounding. These services include information and referral services, clinical counselling and also homemaker services.

The Family Allowance Program provides a taxable benefit to over 6.6 million children in 3.7 million families. This fiscal year over $2.6 billion will pass through this program to families with children.

The child tax credit, a more targeted benefit program for low and middle income families, represents another $2.2 billion of income supplementation in next year's budget.

I remind hon. members that the government has doubled the maximum value of this program since 1984, in recognition of the importance it plays to low income families with children. A special supplement for low income families with young children under the age of seven has been added to the benefit package.

Despite the deficit, however, the government's commitment to maintaining a sound safety net remains and, in areas of particular priority, it has been enhanced.

There are other important initiatives that represent the government's determination to confront new problems as they come up. In a direct response to the landmark research report on sexual abuse of children by Dr. Badgley and his committee, sponsored by the federal government, a major initiative was begun in 1986. Sexual abuse of children is a horrifying reality of life for some children for many years. I am sure every member in this House would agree that is a terrible situation. It was scarcely mentioned prior to the late 1970s. That is no one's fault; it was just not mentioned. The problem has always existed, as Dr. Badgley's report proved beyond any doubt, but it was simply hidden away beneath fear, disbelief and denial.

Between 1986 and 1990, the federal government committed $25 million to begin addressing this hidden horror. In 1988 the government introduced an additional $40 million over four years to extend the reach to address violence in the family.

The success of these initiatives and the exceptional efforts of provinces, professionals, individuals, including children and adults who came forward to deal openly with their pain, has not been easy for Canadian society to absorb.

The federal government brought forward major improvements in the Criminal Code and Canada Evidence Act to better protect children and ensure that they might be heard in the courts of our land.

Important advances in treatment and prevention were supported through this initiative. A special adviser to the Minister of National Health and Welfare was appointed with a mandate to recommend the next phase of federal action.

Last month, in response to Mr. Rogers' report, the Minister of National Health and Welfare introduced a much enhanced $136 million four-year program to continue the effort of reducing the levels of family violence in Canada.

Over 90 per cent of the special adviser's recommendations in areas of federal jurisdiction will be acted upon in whole or in part over the next four years.

The new family violence initiative will assist with training of judges, physicians, nurses and social workers, whose knowledge and experience are critical in dealing effectively with both victims and offenders.

Treatment to offenders will be provided in all 60 federal correctional institutions.

In consultation with aboriginal communities, 2,000 health care and social workers serving Indian reserves and Inuit communities will be trained, and prevention programs for over 500 communities will be developed with the assistance of aboriginal leaders.

Productive partnership will be forged with community organizations, service groups, unions and business.

This program is more than twice the size of the government's previous effort and stands as confirmation that the federal government has not lost its will to confront and address major social issues of our time.

But let us be clear about the nature and the scope of the issue that lies before us. In the report's opening remarks, Mr. Rogers, the special adviser writes:

> My life has been deeply marked by my experiences of the last two years as Special Adviser to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on the issue of sexual abuse. I have been shocked by the anguish and pain of so many victims and adult survivors. I have also come to understand that this problem is so pervasive that any child could be a victim of sexual abuse, including my own children and grandchildren.

He says in his concluding remarks:

> The changes we need to make in Canada, both at a prevention and public education level, as well in co-ordinated services to those in need, require the concerted and inclusive support of all.

Because the needs of Canadian families are changing, especially due to the increased number of women entering the work force, the government has made important changes in parental benefits. Fifteen weeks of maternity benefits are now available during the period surrounding the birth of a child. Ten additional weeks of parental benefits are now available to natural or adoptive parents. Fathers or mothers can take these benefits or share them between themselves.

Of considerable importance to many working parents is the provision of child care services. Canadians have expressed their wishes to have considerable choice in the child care that they seek for their children.

Through the Canada Assistance Plan, for example, the government is providing a quarter of a billion dollars in support for child care for low income Canadian parents and a further $600 million plus through tax provisions, the child care initiative fund and dependent care allowances for persons on training courses.

We are increasingly aware that marriage breakdown is often the cause of a slide into economic difficulty, even poverty for the spouse that maintains the responsibility for looking after the children. Departing spouses, unfortunately most often fathers, too readily forgo their ongoing financial support of their children. To respond, the government through its Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act is providing for the release of information which can assist in locating those defaulting spouses and the garnishment of pensions, income tax refunds or other federal payments.

There are many specific programs for children and families that are developed by the federal government, usually in consultation or partnership with many fine national or community based voluntary organizations with well-known expertise in issues and services affecting children.

Specifically I would like to reference three that have been successful. These programs were created to provide practical information and guidance to parents about their child's development and their own changing responsibilities to the children. The Post-Partum Parent Support Program is a resource for new mothers. Nobody is Perfect is a program that emphasizes the parenting skills for parents of children up to five years, and Ready or Not is a resource for parents of children eight to twelve years old.

One final recent initiative by the government is also worthy of mention. It is called CHIRPP, which stands for the Children's Hospital Research Injury and Prevention Program. Its creation was the result of two very basic facts. First, injury is the number one killer of Canadian children, accounting for approximately half of the 5,500 childhood deaths to children under the age of 19. Second, while we knew the number of injuries and the type of injuries, we do not know much about the specific causes of these injuries. CHIRPP is helping to study the causes by monitoring each childhood injury upon entry into a number of selected hospitals.

Detailed interviews are taken from adults and children if possible at the reception desk which seek to determine just how that particular injury occurred, the circumstances and the environment which caused it. The results are computerized within the Department of Health and Welfare. In the near future we hope to have a full analysis and an understanding of the causes as they are indicated.

Perhaps one of the most significant recent events that has occurred with great long-term potential for children in Canada and throughout the word was the September 1990 world summit for children held in New York. Leaders of 70 nations gathered to discuss and adopt a declaration on the survival, protection and development of children.

Canada was one of the six countries that initiated the summit and our Prime Minister was asked by his colleagues to co-chair its proceedings. It was a unique event and certainly a very significant success. The summit was not meant to be the end of interest in children but the catalyst that demonstrates the potential good that can come from attention focused on children.

The potential is real enough. The declaration goes on. It contains a 10-point program which all nations are urged to work toward implementing over the coming decade.

Canada was a major participant in the development of the convention through a federal, provincial and territorial working group. Through the continued effort to complete the required legislative review by the federal, provincial and territorial governments, it is anticipated that Canada will ratify the convention in 1991.

I began by talking about the crushing financial burden we could leave to our children if we do not address the implications of a growing deficit and debt. I am reminded that last year the money Canadians spent on the interest payments to service our national debt exceeded the expenditures on all programs administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare. This includes the national health care programs, the welfare programs, the Old Age Security and family allowance support programs.

Imagine the potential of this amount of money in implementing the 10-point program of the summit's declaration not only here in Canada but for children throughout the world. UNICEF projects that $20 billion of new money per year is needed to achieve the minimum conditions for children in developing countries outlined in that 10-point program. Of that, $7 billion will be needed in the form of international aid from donor countries.

It is a considerable sum, but not as great as our annual deficit. We must seize the problem of our deficit. We must maintain our levels of social investment. It is not easy, and the answers are not simple. But we have begun on the difficult path to improve our legacy to our children. May they at least credit us, finally, with having recognized the problem and carefully planned our way toward its resolution.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, in his opening remarks the hon. member paid compliments to his party. He said that it had two main goals. One was in its social policy, to maintain a certain level of social programs. The second was in its economic policy, to plan year by year to control our deficit. Again we hear this crying the blues, blaming the Liberals for piling up the public debt.

When the member's party came into office the public debt was $177 billion and now it is running up to $400 billion. I was here from 1979 to 1984. He can blame the Liberals for increasing the public debt up to $177 billion at a time when we were going through world recessions, not Canada-made recessions.

What did his government do with all the money that it collected for selling off Crown corporations? Why didn't that go to reducing the annual deficit further and reducing the public debt? What did his government do with the 33 tax increases that it brought in, in the seven years it has been in power? Could he explain to me today's article in the Toronto Star under the heading "Campaign launched to defeat Tories":

> Canadians fed up with Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's "corporate agenda" are launching a grassroots campaign to defeat the government.
> "We're no longer zeroing in on one issue like free trade—our goal is to defeat the Tories in the next election before the country is so broken up that we can't shape our own future," Tony Clarke, chairman of the Pro-Canada Network said yesterday.
> To that end, the coalition will soon launch a "mass action" campaign—including petitions, advertising and demonstrations—to protest what it says are the de-Canadianizing policies of the government.

Mr. Clarke goes on to say:

> "We believe we have to move quickly or the country will be so changed by the"—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has been in this House quite some time. I must say I have a tough time seeing the relevance of this newspaper article to the motion before the House.

The hon. member may want to put a question to the hon. member for Ontario who has completed his speech, but I really cannot agree with these types of comments.

Mr. Flis: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I did begin by pointing out the social and economic policies the member mentioned in his speech. My closing comment is quoting Mr. Clarke where he says:

> "We believe we have to move quickly or the country will be so changed by the government's economic and social policies that we won't be able to save it,"

I would like to hear from the member that if he was out to save the economic and social policies of this country, why this massive campaign to defeat his government?

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, I certainly would like to respond to that. The hon. member started off on a comment that I laid the blame on the 10 years from 1974 to 1984. I also believe that in my comment I said that it carried on through 1989 and 1990 when the debt in fact went up to some $380 billion.

I do not absolve the federal government of the last five years of the financial problem that this country has. I would point out that between 1974 and 1984 the debt of this country increased some eightfold. It only doubled in the time we were here. In either case it is a terrible number, but the fact of the matter is that we are trying to address it.

Further, I would like to respond to the hon. member's comment about all these tax changes. I note that in the election campaigns and in many other opportunities which the Liberals take advantage of they complain about the 33 tax changes and how terrible they are. Of course what we were addressing were loopholes that they had put in place. They consider it terrible that we issued a measure to prevent a variety of schemes of transfer tax losses from non-profitable corporations to profitable ones.

The Liberal Party disagrees with the reduction of a variety of special purpose investment tax credits. It disagrees with an increase in the rate of taxation on capital gains. It disagrees with the introduction of a corporate surtax. It disagrees with the introduction of put-in-use rules to limit the use of deductions where taxable income is not forthcoming. It disagrees with the removal of the inventory allowance. It disagrees with the curtailment of the use of leasing to transfer benefits for accelerated capital consumption allowances, and disagrees with a credible tax on large deposit-taking institutions, most recently the large corporation tax which has been adopted to ensure that all large companies contribute to deficit reduction. The Liberals disagree with literally all of these good steps and then complain about the fact that the government is not spending enough money.

The whole issue of the debate today and the budget we brought down is deficit and debt. We are not about to ignore these problems in our role as government.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Madam Speaker, the previous speaker began his remarks by talking about the parties that parents attended without their children to talk about the cute familial antics of their children during the day or during the week. That may very well be.

Obviously the member has not been to one of these parties lately because I have news for him. When the parents get together today without their children to talk about things, what they are doing is asking themselves how in heaven's name they can rid themselves of a government that they thought was going to do something for them when it came to power in 1984 in a landslide election victory.

They talk about the fact that when they take little Billy, or little Susan, to have his or her hair cut they now have to pay tax on that hair cut. When they want to go to a children's store to buy a children's book they have to pay tax. When they want to take that child to one of the few movies that a parent can take a child to today, without worrying about obscene language or anything else, they have to pay tax on that. That does not affect the rich. That affects the poor. That affects the lower income Canadian. That is what those people are talking about today.

The member went on to talk about the terrible deficit, and indeed it is terrible, and to his credit he admitted, and I believe his words were that it went on some years beyond 1984, as indeed it has. He suggested that his government is attempting to deal with it.

What Canadians are asking at these little parties he referred to is how the government is attempting to deal with it. We have had his finance minister for seven years and one economic statement make predictions that time and time again have been completely wrong. Throughout this time they are not tax changes but tax increases that we are talking about.

Lower income Canadians are paying more tax today than they did in 1984 and higher income Canadians are paying less tax than they did in 1984. Those are the facts. What is this government doing to try and help those people with children who are struggling in today's society, trying to reduce a deficit that is $30 billion after six years of alleged tough times under the Tories when we have had a strong economy? What in heaven's name, they ask at these parties the member referred to, is going on and how can we get rid of this government?

I ask the member how much tax is too much tax? How many times are you going to tax the Canadian people in an attempt to pay down the deficit when after six and a half years all you have done is double it?

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the member's question. His riding is very close to mine and I presume economically we confront very similar bases and issues.

I can tell you what happens in my riding at those parties I attend which are obviously different than the parties he attends in his riding. In my riding they do talk about the fact that they have to pay tax on books that they never had to pay before. They have to pay sales tax on the magazines. They have to pay sales tax on the clothing, and they have to pay sales tax on some things, hair cuts, that they never had to before.

They talk about that in my riding, and I am sure they talk about it in his riding, however, in my riding what they also say is: "You know, this is a fair tax, because everybody pays." We in our riding, much like his riding where there are many high income Canadians, also say: "Thank goodness that the government saw the light to put in place a sales tax credit for those low income Canadians who are impacted by the GST".

In my riding the people say that is a fair tax. In his riding, unfortunately, I guess they forget about mentioning that low income credit, and that is probably because in his riding nobody receives that kind of credit because it is a very well-to-do riding.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I think you will find unanimous consent in the House for the following motion:

> That notwithstanding any Standing Order on Monday the House meet at 1 o'clock p.m. and proceed to the business of supply.

I think there is unanimous consent for this motion.

[English]

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, the government has no objection to the motion. There was an attempt to have discussions and we could not, unfortunately, get all the parties together. We have no objection to using the hour between one and two o'clock for Government Orders on Monday. If the opposition feels there might be good use of that time between one and two o'clock for some other purposes we would stand ready on Monday to agree to another motion at that point which might precede it.

At this point I am agreeing with the motion proposed by my colleague across the House.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): I am sorry but I did not hear the motion. What motion is being put before the House? I could not hear it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion was:

> That notwithstanding any Standing Order, on Monday the House meet at one o'clock p.m. and proceed to the business of supply.

It would add an hour of debate. The House has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blaikie (p. 18859).

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak for a few minutes on this motion because it does give me an opportunity to talk about some of the issues which have been brought up in the debate in the last hour or two.

The motion states very specifically that rather than try and unload the deficit by having children subsidize part of it, that we should do it, as the motion says, through programs which accept the savings of children but fail to ensure that large profitable Canadian corporations and wealthy individuals pay their fair share.

Today we have had a number of members state that we in the New Democratic Party do not recognize who is wealthy and who is not wealthy. It is very interesting to note that if a survey was taken of the people of Canada who are members of the three political parties, it would show that the highest earning group in Canada are the New Democrats. We are always told that we represent the poorer people of the country, and we do, but we do that out of principle. We have become over the last few years the highest earners as far as the membership in the three parties is concerned.

I guess it proves that the people of intelligence who take a look at the issues, take responsibility for what is Canada and what makes Canada work, support the kinds of policies that we in the New Democratic Party have espoused over the years.

More than espousing, we have made them part of the fabric of Canada. Consequently, people say: "Yes. Regardless of how it affects us taxation–wise, we are quite willing to support that kind of policy."

We also know that over the past few years, because of the structure of the atmosphere under which businesses and farmers have had to work to take advantage of the protection that has been placed through corporations, a lot of us have decided it is worth while to accept the corporate structure.

It does protect us from the government and from other corporations. Consequently, we do so. Most of those corporations, which we do not consider wealthy as defined in this motion, are owned and operated by the same people. That kind of corporation is not much different than a small business that is not incorporated.

Consequently, it is not going to be affected by major taxation differences in the same sense that we are talking about in this particular motion.

We have indicated many times across the country that we think one of the changes should be on capital gains. In our policy, we eliminate certain groups from having to pay capital gains.

The aim of our policy is not to take the capital gains of that farmer who has spent his life building up a farm that he thinks will be worth while when he finally does retire and can use the gain to keep him in retirement.

The same kind of approach has to be recognized in small business, which is quite often a family operation. Everybody's time and effort is put into the building of that business. Farmers probably do not have retirement plans, although they need them. We have exempted those people from capital gains.

We are aiming at those unearned capital gains which are part of speculations within share sales. The purchasing and selling of homes other than one's principal home or cottage at high prices are unearned capital gains. They are speculative gains.

There is not a great deal of sweat or effort. When we say that capital gains should be taxed in some way, we are talking about the kinds of capital gains which are almost unearned. They are speculative gains.

Farmers and small businesses, also, do not have the protection that wage earners have. One of the questions by one of the members in opposition was: What about the wage earner who does gather a lot of money, makes an investment and then can sell it at a higher price?

Most of those people are quite willing to pay capital gains on what they gain in that speculative process. During the period in which they were earning the money to put a payment down on that cottage, extra home or extra investment, they were protected by unemployment insurance which no farmer or small business has.

If one owns a business or farm, one does not have unemployment insurance to fall back on in those days when one does not get a crop or when business is really bad.

There seems to be a very bad recognition of what is meant by regressive and progressive taxation.

Progressive taxation means that if you earn enough money to have a good living and something extra besides, you should be taxed a little more on that extra than the person who just earns enough to survive. Any suggestion that the same amount of taxation should be paid across the board is a regressive sort of approach. Progressive taxation, in contrast is tax which takes an increasing percentage of the earnings of an individual.

The GST is a regressive tax, because if you spend $1,000 on goods and services, you are going to pay 7 per cent on that $1,000. That means you are paying 7 per cent of your earnings to the GST. However, if you earn three or four times that much and you only spend half of it on goods and services, you are going to be taxed only 3–1/2 per cent on your total earnings. In other words, the person earning more is paying a smaller percentage than the person earning less.

That is regressive taxation. That is what we have been working against.

There have been suggestions made a couple of times today that because we are against the taxing of family allowance and the taxing of old age security, we are flip–flopping in the sense that they say that is tax against the rich and that we should agree with it because we are always saying that we should tax the rich.

We have to recognize that the thresholds established both in the case of the family allowance and the old age security taxes are such that now, and certainly within a few years, will be so low that a person earning a moderate income is going to have to pay more. In each of these cases we have to look at the unfairness. If one person earns $10,000 and part of it comes from the old age security or family allowance, and another person earns $10,000 and none of it comes from those, the first person will pay more taxes. It is unfair.

If the taxable portion of the salary of a person who is getting the senior citizen's allowance or the family allowance is the same as a person who is not, the former will be taxed more than the latter.

I could go on and tell of a number of things that we as New Democrats think should be put in place.

In the last budget the government had a number of choices. For instance, it could have increased the funding for social services. Instead of that, it cut the funding by $340,000 to the provinces but it did not cut very expensive tax deductions.

The record of the government over a long time shows very specifically that the choices which would have helped the poor groups of people in this country have not been made. The choices made were those choices which allow the higher level of incomes to retain those earnings.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S. O. 81—CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal) moved:

That this House call upon the government as a matter of priority to ensure that the CBC be strengthened as an instrument of national identity providing local, regional, and national services to all Canadians.

• (1310)

She said: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to the motion which you have just put before this House:

That this House call upon the government as a matter of priority to ensure that the CBC be strengthened as an instrument of national identity providing local, regional, and national services to all Canadians.

This debate today is as much about Canada as it is about the CBC. I would suggest to you that it is a debate of serious national proportions, given the particular atmosphere that prevails across this land and the sensitivity that is being show or the lack of sensitivity that is being expressed in parts of our country.

The Prime Minister has called for national unity. I am quite delighted to see that he has even used the term national unity, since he wanted it expunged from the language of the Broadcasting Act. What could have been a more sensitive tool than the question of national unity through the Canadian broadcasting system, and particularly the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

He called as well for dialogue among Canadians, but a right now a lot of that dialogue has been one-shot deals, such as through the Spicer commission.

I would suggest that the most effective communication and communication vehicle we have in place across this land, infrastructure put in place and paid for by Canadians, is that of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, better known as Radio-Canada CBC. It has its place and station identification from coast to coast to coast in English and in French: in the north, in the east, in the west, in the small urban communities, in the small rural communities across this land, in radio and TV as well as internationally. It certainly is a key medium of expression for all Canadians.

I would say that this debate today is about the kind of country we want and the kind of national institutions we on this side of the House believe are fundamental. They are the fundamental infrastructure that binds and links Canadians. It is the highway of today that we were so proud of many years back, whether it is the Trans-Canada Highway or the laying of the last spike in the railway. I just hope we have not split the heart of this nation by laying the last spike of destruction into our Canadian national broadcasting system.

We see and hear all around us about the need to build bridges in this country and the fact that it is a pressing need. How better to communicate with each other than through radio and television?

Mr. Speaker, you are a communicator. You were in the media. You are a man who knows the power of words, the power of expression, the fact that you can reach the minds and hearts of our countrymen, country women, children and folks across this land. We can be folksy. We can be esoteric. We can be pragmatic. We can go to the heart of the matter and do it through news and information, but what better way than through entertainment, than with a smile, through poking a little fun at each other.

All the different cultures that surround us and enrich us become the tapestry which is the basis of our society, whether black, brown, yellow or white. Whatever the language, that language, that culture, that way of life, becomes part of what is the distinctive Canada we have been trying to build. We have been trying to say that we are tolerant. We have been trying to say that we are a wonderful country. And what do we do? The medium that best expresses who we are and what we are, we cut its throat.

When Mr. Veilleux, the president of CBC, said the other day that we are killing this communication vehicle through the back door, strangling it through budget cuts, he was saying it as it is and calling the shot.

I appeared before the CRTC with 12 of my colleagues. We made three hours of presentation before the CRTC indicating that we could ill afford not to pay for this particular service, that we could ill afford to cut this service. If the president, the chairman of the board and the board of the CBC really were concerned for this country, were really carrying out the mandate of the National Broadcasting Act, which we just finished revising, they would have looked at it. They would have tried to make changes. They would have cut where there was duplication. They would have cut more and perhaps revised more. In the end they would have realized that we could not realize a proper French and English, multiracial, multicultural broadcasting corporation serving the three coasts of Canada. They would have resigned if they had had any kind of good conscience. This minister, they knew, never went and pleaded the cause for Radio-Canada CBC before the Treasury Board. I do not know what he said to his cabinet colleagues but, if he told them the truth, then the whole cabinet should resign.

What is happening with Radio-Canada and Radio Canada International, which I know is one of your interests, Mr. Speaker, is an utter disgrace. It is an absolute disgraces that the parliamentary channel might be privatized. It belongs to the people of this land.

I do not understand the priorities of this government. I do not understand. Even though we are in a budgetary crisis, even though we have financial concerns, and all of us share those concerns, there is still a matter of choice and a matter of priority. That priority right now is keeping this country going. That priority right now is affecting the kind of place and space for all Canadians regardless of their mother tongue, regardless of their colour, regardless of their race, regardless of their creed.

The new bill which this government has not even bothered to gazette brings in some very important new features. It bring in the whole question of the Official Languages Act. The 1968 bill took place before the Official Languages Act became part of this country. It came into force in 1969. It took place before employment equity and all the safeguards around section 15, the non-discriminatory clause, came into effect in 1982 in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

We have ignored the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We have ignored the Official Languages Act. We have ignored the new Broadcasting Act which says use independent producers, make sure that we use our creative talents through artistic expression, through entertainment, and what do we have? We have a mock CNN and a mock Newsworld, and a great big Media Watch or I should say meteorological station which is going to tell us the big weather news and give us the big sports news.

However, what is happening in small towns? What is happening in the regions? Canada is more than just a province. That is the way the CBC has seen it, just as a province. We have 10 provinces and a distinct territory, but we do not happen to have some distinctions, let us say, in Ontario.

Let me take Quebec first. We have no distinctions in Quebec?

[Translation]

—the Eastern Townships, the Outaouais, the Gaspé and the North Shore all have very specific identities. And you can't reflect those from Montreal and Quebec City alone. That won't work. The people of Rimouski, Matane and Sept-Îles where you cut regional programming and left a tremendous void are not pleased with what your colleagues on the other side of this House have done. It is totally unacceptable.

[English]

If we move into Ontario, are they trying to tell me that the northern part of Ontario looks like Toronto or looks like the Ottawa region? When we are driving along the 417 from Montreal to Ottawa or from any other part of this province such as the 401 to Toronto, or from the other provinces, we should find out about the weather and the traffic control. With this government's options and the way things are going, there are going to be more people on the 401. The point is that we cannot possibly entertain the suggestion that the province of Ontario has two spots that will reflect its entire personality: Ottawa and Toronto.

I suppose Windsor does not count. It got lost among our five large lakes of which we should be very proud. We forgot them. We just left them to languish with no voice either public or private in the Windsor area.

Then we go out to the prairies, and on the French side what do we have?

[Translation]

Don't we have a responsibility to reflect the specific culture of Francophones outside Quebec, their view of society, for their own benefit and the benefit of all Canadians? Hardly. We are cutting right and left. We cut Génies en herbe; Ce soir dimanche; Actualités régionales; Le lien. Cuts are being made all over Canada. In Vancouver, and Regina, in the official language, the language of minorities outside Quebec. Do you think that is fair? Do you think that makes sense? Do you think it's a good idea? Do you want to pursue this policy and expect to have a Canada for everyone, a united Canada from coast to coast? This is madness, Mr. Speaker, and it is intolerable!

• (1320)

I started out to say that this is what this country is all about, why Canada needs to be protected from this government that brought in a recession. On the back of that recession, it is now saying that it has to cut one of the major infrastructures that link this country; Radio-Canada, the CBC. I am saying that this is not the way we are to go about structuring our country.

The issues basically are: Do the airwaves belong to the public? Do they belong to us and are we holding that trust for the public here in this House, whether it is the public or the private sector, or do they belong to the board of directors? Do we expect the private sector to do the job of the public sector, because after all, they are a business? The public sector, in this instance is a business, but it is more than a business. It is not the ordinary business of the country, it is the special business of the country. It involves the talent of this country.

We live next to a wonderful neighbour, a giant, my American cousins. They are experts in the technique of communication. They have found the way to globalize entertainment, to show a portrait of a society that is not ours, but is amusing and entertaining. But, is that all there is to life, American entertainment, American sitcoms and an American way of seeing the world? Is there not a Canadian vision we wish to promote out there? If there is a Canadian vision how, in a communicating society, because that is what we are in, can we show it if we do not support both the Canadian Council and Radio-Canada?

We cannot allow the board of directors to take over the issue of the airwaves. It belongs to the public. Does the CRTC regulate public broadcasting in Canada or does that responsibility lie with the CBC as a self-regulating board? That is a very serious question and it needs to be addressed in a very serious manner. Are the laws of Canada, namely the Broadcasting Act, either the 1968 act or, if this government ever gets around to gazetting the 1990 act, to be respected as they reflect the wishes of Parliament, or can they be changed, as I said, through the backdoor, through government allocations?

Fourth, are the local, regional and national broadcasters and broadcasting to be interpreted as provincial? What happened to local and regional that is in the bill? Since when are the regions provinces? That is the way the board has seen them.

Fifth, the mandate of the new act includes, and I think I outlined the fact, the parliamentary will as expressed through the Official Languages Act and through the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I would suggest that the revisions presented by the board of directors, its president and its chairman, must be reviewed by Parliament. It is a matter of priority and the CBC should so direct following its hearings. It is a very disquieting moment in the history of our country.

I noted a very interesting comment which the President of the CBC, Mr. Veilleux made. The day he appeared before the CRTC, he was outlining his vision of a restructured CBC. In particular, he talked about his vision, which he translated into a programming agenda. He outlined five key elements. The first one is enough to make one stop: "A CBC that offers strong national services which are rooted in the regions of the country." The question is, if one looks at the programming what did he mean by the word "regions" and what can we possibly think he meant by the word "local"? Did he know that it was in the bill? Did the members of that board know it was in the bill?

He then goes on to mention the whole question of a mirror. I thought it was a very interesting quote he used, which I would like to bring to your attention. He says:

> What the CBC is trying to do in English and French television is replace a mirror with a window.

Instead of replacing the mirror with a window, he should have said he was replacing it with a slammed-shut window because I would like to know how the window is going to be open in so many places across this land. You tell me how the window is open in Windsor; you tell me how it in open in Matane; you tell me how it is open in Sept Iles; you tell me how it is open in Windsor. Mr. Veilleux should go back to his board and tell them to reopen the window he thought was opening—because he didn't open it. It needs to be smashed open, if that is his vision.

I would like to know how Calgary TV viewers are going to be served by Edmonton. I would like to know whether it is better to have a one-hour show that is going to include Edmonton and Calgary, instead of the two hours they presently have.

I would like to suggest that Mr. Veilleux go back to the drawing board, and so does the CBC.

First of all, I was in Newfoundland where we just left them floating out in the sea. We have cut so much in Newfoundland and Labrador, but I am sure my colleagues will talk about that. But let us look at Moncton. Programs like Tele-Debate, Tele-Débat, La Revue, Spec Art have already been cut. As I said, Génies en herbe and Musicologie—I mean, we don't have to know anything about music. After all, if we listen to the news we will know everything, we will be so well informed—we will be ignoramuses in this world.

I would say that they are not going to review Les Jeux d'Acadie. Is it not important that people in Prince Edward Island and the rest of Canada can have a sense of profound joy as they look at our youth who are involved in sports, who are showing competence and the potential to become international figures in the world of sport? But, no, we cut that out because it is not important.

Mr. Speaker, all regional programs have been cut except news. Well, I don't know if you agree with me, but I think Canadians are more than news junkies; I think Canadians are interested in a variety of entertainment, so that they can see themselves and find out who they are.

As I move along I would like to point out to you that our party believes that Canada is more than its regions, that Canada is rooted in the realities of its small communities, their singers and performers, their values, their stories. It is the fact that Newfoundland is more than an outport and the west is more than a wheat field. It is more than just the local focus, but the local focus feeds into the regional, which becomes part of the national, and it is how you build a star system. It is how you get to know the Simards of this world, how you get to know the Ann Murrays of this world. It is a way in which you can feel that you belong.

I think Al Johnson said it best when he said; "The public broadcasting service, to have to reconcile itself to being a network service, would be a little like saying let us have a Canada without the provinces".

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that that speaks reams for the vision of my colleagues across the floor.

One of the things that we can ill-afford to do is not promote this vision of Canada. In a time of great financial restraint such as now, in a time when, yes, we must be addressing the deficit, we also have to remember there is a future. If we want to have a sense of belonging, a sense of participation, a sense of peoplehood, a sense of nation, and be prepared to pay for our public broadcaster, then we have to have it rooted in the local community. We have to have a sense of belonging so that our hearts and our minds, of our children and of our public, will be prepared to pay and to continue paying for this excellent service that is the envy of the world, Mr. Speaker.

I only have a minute left. There were a few people I had wanted to bring to your attention. I am afraid that time is of the essence, but I want to point out that——Canada's diversity, its magnificent geography, its many languages and cultures, and current political events that are so important to us, are so many reasons why we need a strong Pan-Canadian voice. Therefore, we believe that the CBC must continue to play its public interest role, in other words, to help communicate to Canadians a national spirit, a national awareness that will give them a sense of pride and develop a sense of national unity.

• (1330)

I would say to you that in a real sense, television is to 20th century Canada what the railway was to the 19th. Its visual productions are the medium that allows thousands of Canadians to hear and see themselves.

If I may, I would like to close with a quote from the former Ambassador of Canada to the United States, Mr. Allan Gotlieb, because I believe as he was negotiating the free trade agreement he recognized culture. He said this, and with this I will close: "The communications revolution and the emergence of the homogenizing universal software make the role of the state in fostering the cultural life of a nation more important, far more important than ever before in history. The principal challenge for the state today in the cultural sphere is to foster the creation of the content that is carried on those electronic systems and on video screens. The spectacular growth of the homogenized universal software has made this one of the primary national tasks of our time".

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to what was said by the hon. member for Mount Royal. We are very much aware of her competence in this area. I read in her motion, and I quote:

—providing local, regional and national services to all Canadians.

She has been working on this matter for several months, and she has had an interest in communications for many years. I would like to ask her the following question, and I would appreciate a sincere answer: Did you get or did you have access to all the details on CBC expenditures, including the salaries of all journalists, members of the board of directors, employees, overtime, and especially spending on coverage of national events, and spending per station? When we talk about $1.4 billion annually, this means that the corporation is entirely free to spend $1.4 billion without being accountable to Parliament. And even that is easy. Every year I receive a nice annual report with a glossy cover and a couple of thousand dollars—just a financial report. But in municipalities, like my own town of Val-d'Or or Matane, Gaspé or Sept-Îles, every month residents can check expenditures by their elected representatives and the municipality.

My question is this: Did the hon. member, since she has contacts at the CBC, obtain all the details, not just what it says in the Estimates but details that are confidential, including all expenditures and salaries? Did you have access to that list?

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I doubt even the president of the CBC would have all those figures. This is a huge corporation, with a French and an English section, television and radio and of course the parliamentary channel, and there is also the international service. It is impossible to have all the data. In fact, I even considered asking for a royal commission to to examine CBC spending.

There are about 40 unions and groups involved, and there are certainly items where we might have a few questions. However, that is not the issue today. The CBC has been cut practically to the bone. If we look at the cuts that have been made since 1984, we get a total of more than $300 million—closer to $400 million, in current dollars.

Mr. Moore: What about the other programs?

Mrs. Finestone: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Saint-Julien: The other programs?

Mrs. Finestone: A lot of programs were cut. A lot of cuts were made, and I am sure some were made in your part of the country.

Mr. Saint-Julien: No, we don't have radio.

Mrs. Finestone: You certainly do have radio, and in fact, people hear you often enough on the airwaves. I heard you myself when I was up there. The question is rather —I won't go into all the details, like counting the flowers in the rug. I am not going to get into that. The important thing is—

Mr. Saint-Julien: That is what is so expensive!

Mrs. Finestone: Well, who knows. Mr. Mulroney might make you a member of the board of directors, and you could take the books and do your own scrutiny. Meanwhile, we have an administrator who used to be at Treasury Board and who knows how to read the books. He knows how to cut and where to cut, and as the CBC boss, he said they could no longer afford to make cuts and at the same time expect the Corporation to satisfy the criteria set forth in the bill. And that is what counts. You are changing the mandate of the CBC, behind the scenes, behind closed doors, the same as you tried to do in other areas, and we know that won't work.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to compliment my colleague, the hon. member for Mount Royal, for the motion that is before the House today. It is an extremely important motion.

I would like to ask her a question about some of the comments she made in presenting this motion with regard to Radio-Canada International. As the member well knows, some time ago the Prime Minister—perhaps March 16—said: "I guarantee that Radio-Canada International will survive."

We find out on Friday that the budget for RCI was cut from $20 million to $13.5 million. We find that the staff of 193 have been decimated to a level of 100 staff and the number of languages broadcast has been reduced from 14 to five. When you really start to look at it, Mr. Speaker, the cuts go much deeper than that. The number of producing hours are reduced from 233 to 65.

I would like to ask the member, in light of these very significant and substantial cuts that now face Radio-Canada International, what does she think of the Prime Minister's promise to keep it alive?

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, first of all, let me say how sad I think it is, particularly in the evolving world of the new democracies and the hope for application of democratic principles which we, as Canadians, like to think we apply.

It is very sad that these countries that listen to us internationally will now not hear our voice. I guess it is another way of seeing how the Prime Minister's word is his bond.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to compliment my colleague on her passionate, pointed speech.

I would like to ask her a very short but specific question. I was always under the impression that when people came before the CRTC, whether it was Global Television or CTV, they set forward a list of criteria they would meet. I think specifically of Much Music. They came before the CRTC and said: "We are going to have a national standard. We will be heard in every part of the country. It will be non-stop, et cetera, et cetera."

My question to my colleague is this. How is it that the CBC can make all of these changes which is cutting it out of regions with reduced programming almost as if it had some kind of special status before the CRTC? Does the regulator of this country not have as its responsibility the jurisdictional mandate to make sure that national standards are maintained?

Or can these politically appointed entrepreneurs for some unknown reason thwart this CRTC mandate? I know for certain that the private sector broadcasters would not get away with it.

I would like to know from my hon. colleague how it is that the CBC has special status.

Mrs. Finestone: I thank my hon. colleague from Toronto for that question. It is one of the prime questions and it is one of the issues at stake here.

Can the CBC continue to collect advertising revenue when it is not present in the community, when it cannot help the local businessman so that he can prosper along the way? Can it prevent stations from being changed, as Windsor and Rimouski have asked? Is the promise of performance and the licensing mechanism strictly for the private sector and not true for the public sector?

I suggest that the member's question is a very pertinent one, as was the one of my colleague on Radio-Canada International. Can the CBC be master of its destiny and be the only voice for the public airwaves which are mandated and cared for by laws passed by this House?

I don't know. My view is no, and I think the CRTC should so say.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Mount Royal for her motion today seeking that the CBC be strengthened as an instrument of national identity. However, I regret that she seems unaware of the fact that this strengthening process has already begun. It is under way through efforts of this government in introducing and the passage of Bill C-40, which the hon. member assisted in committee and which will be proclaimed shortly.

In fact, there is no need for this motion.

Indeed, the hon. member's energies would best assist the broadcasting system if she were to recognize that this government is working to preserve Canada's entire broadcasting system, both the public and private, and that only through renewed sensitivity to public environments and needs will broadcasters be able to assure all Canadians of their own unique structure for communications.

Perhaps some background would be helpful for members.

Let me remind the hon. member of the government's support of the CBC mandate. In a speech of the Minister of Communications of January 31, 1990 when he addressed the Legislative Committee on Bill C-40, he said:

> I have frequently said that this Crown corporation must be the cornerstone for expression of our cultural reality. It is in this spirit that we tabled before the Parliament of Canada this broadcasting bill, which, for the first time, gives the CBC a mandate to contribute more actively to cultural expression and to the exchange of the various forms it can take. The CBC must distinguish itself from private broadcasters. This is also the first time we have taken a legislative route to ask the CBC to reflect not on our unity alone, but on our cultural identity.

The minister addresses this issue directly, from the beginning. Nor has the position of this government changed. The broadcasting bill which this House has deliberated on and passed specifies a mandate to rejuvenate the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and which clarifies its responsibilities with respect to Canadian, regional and cultural programming needs.

For the first time, this mandate includes specific references to the important role that the CBC has in reflecting Canada, in providing English and French programming services, in meeting the needs of official language minorities, in reflecting Canadian society in all its aspects, in actively contributing to the flow and exchange of cultural expression and, in these ways, contributing to a shared Canadian consciousness and identity.

Certain critics have lamented the removal of the phrase "national unity" from the CBC's mandate, yet there can be no doubt that the objectives which are cited here will indeed contribute to Canadian unity.

The Minister of Communications, speaking before this House on the occasion of the third reading of Bill C-40 on December 4, 1990, asks:

> How can there be unity without the flow and exchange of cultural expression in English, and in French, among all component parts in Canada, as foreseen by this bill. And how can there be unity without a shared awareness of Canadian identity?

Let me turn now to the generous support given the CBC by this government. Yes, much is expected of this corporation; however, despite cries to the contrary from certain quarters, it should be recognized that a great deal has also been given and is being given to the CBC to meet these objectives.

Excluding advertising and miscellaneous revenues, the corporation has benefited from more than $1 billion in Main and Supplementary Estimates for the fiscal year 1990–91. These sums include an additional amount of some $45 million that was just announced on March 5, to help the CBC meet extraordinary costs involved, including cash–outs and severance obligations involved in its restructuring.

Now to the process of this rejuvenating. The board of directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation were only meeting their responsibilities when they decided in December 1990 to live within the environment that affects all other areas of the public and private sector. They took the necessary steps to meet the corporation's original mandate, as well as its new one. They knew, as do we, that at no time did these mandates suggest the corporation should expand into the provision of services at a local community level.

Gérard Veilleux, the chairman of the board, said before the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture and in a number of other statements that the corporation's self–defined mandate to support local programming placed network news and variety programming, the essence of a national broadcaster, at risk.

This review of priorities, enforced by circumstances rather than by politicians, has given the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation an opportunity for rejuvenation, allowing it to grow as a distinctive, as well as a central, element of the Canadian broadcasting system.

Like the private sector in times of restraint and, perhaps, the recession we are in, the CBC will build on strengths. Let us look at the CBC television.

The regrettable crisis in the Middle East this year showed us how important the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation can be in providing Canadians with a distinctive view of world events through The National, The Journal, Le Téléjournal and Le Point, as well as in radio newsgathering.

If the Iraqi war was the making, on a world–wide basis, of the CNN network, it was also a significant stimulus to CBC's Newsworld with Canadian English–speaking audiences. This hour by hour coverage of the Iraqi war, plus the earlier Canadian crisis at Oka, have had the effect of developing a morning audience for Newsworld. Consequently, the CBC intends to broadcast two hours of Newsworld live, daily as a morning public affairs show on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's main national network. This new service will provide English–speaking Canadians with a new choice for their morning television news.

While news has been a popular development of English programming, weekly feature programming also has gained audiences in both French and in English.

We are talking about building on strengths. Immense prime time audiences are being drawn by L'Héritage, Un Signe de Feu and by the series Les Filles de Caleb, among other French language television programs. I am told that the last program of Les Filles de Caleb had a viewing audience of over 4 million people. On the English side, Road to Avonlea can truthfully be described as a runaway blockbuster. The series Street Legal and Degrassi High also demonstrate that Canadian productions can have substantial audiences, not only here, but abroad as well.

The public resources which are being provided to the corporation both directly and indirectly are more than adequate to permit the continuation and burgeoning of a distinct Canadian television.

As to the other responsibilities which the corporation took on and which it now finds onerous, such as the provision of the Parliamentary channel, the will and the opportunity exists for this valuable service to be provided on a continuing basis.

• (1350)

Arrangements were announced only a few days ago to maintain this program through the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for a short term until new arrangements can be agreed upon. An offer is, at this moment, out to the public for an expression of interest in providing ongoing coverage of our deliberations in this place.

Perhaps from this will emerge a new, even more stimulating channel reflective of the considerable work done by legislators and regulators not only in Ottawa, but throughout the country.

Let us look at CBC Radio. From the very beginning of public broadcasting when it was the only technology available, radio has been a keystone of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Our public stereo and monaural broadcast channels have become the envy of much of the world. and rightly so. It can be said without contradiction that the programming developed for English and French language radio services are uniquely Canadian in tone and have provided an important link in our cultural infrastructure.

The CBC has recently enhanced the quality of these services in many communities by making them available on new FM frequencies. For their part the stereo networks provide Canadian listeners with an alternative music selection, as well as foreground programming and theatre.

Partly because radio is a less expensive medium than television, it has been virtually unaffected by the measures announced by the CBC board. That CBC Radio is vulnerable to economic circumstances, as reflected in future budgets; is a fact; however, the goodwill of Parliament toward continued support of these valuable services can be in no doubt.

The hon. member mentioned in her address the Northern Services. We would be remiss if we were not to recognize at this time the importance of the CBC Northern Services. They bring radio and television programming to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and to the northern regions of Quebec in seven native languages as well as in English and French. This service and other regional programming already scheduled or in planning will ensure that all Canadians are in communication with mainstream thought as well as in having the opportunity to meet each other.

In closing, this government recognizes the role played by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation within the larger framework of the Canadian broadcasting system. We have clearly supported this public broadcaster and have every intention to continue to do so. As the same time we require it to act within its mandate as defined by Parliament and to plan responsibly within the resources that this Parliament provides after much thought and deliberation.

We do not come to such decisions lightly or capriciously. In appointing persons of the high quality whom we now see serving on the board of directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, we place confidence in their administrative decisions and are firm in our belief that they will be innovative and faithful stewards of this public trust.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to publicly welcome the member for Calgary Southeast, replacing the member for Edmonton Southwest. May he have, and may we have, as enjoyable a tenure on that committee as was enjoyed with the other member. I wish him good luck in his new challenging task.

I would hope that the member from Calgary will have some effective answers for his constituents as they see their voice cut and Edmonton taking over their role. I do not think he is going to have a happy day and it is not going to be a happy birthday that they are going to be wishing him.

I would like to also make the observation that the measure of the Canadian broadcasting system, the CBC, is not measured in the same way by this side of the House as it is by the other side of the House. Prime time, mass audience rating is certainly not the only yardstick of measure. We all rejoice in the successes that have been achieved by CBC. We all know that it is the CBC performers, the CBC news anchors, the CBC level of excellence that has raised the level of broadcasting in both the private and public sector, whether it is the educational sector or the private sector. That does not replace the place that small narrow casting interests have for the Canadian public broadcaster which the private sector should not and cannot afford to do. I find it extremely interesting, and I hope that the parliamentary secretary is very comfortable with the fact, that there are tenders out for the parliamentary channel. I am sure the Canadian public is just thrilled that the private sector can then start to call the shots on which parliamentarians they would like to focus on and which standing committees they would like to hear from. It will be extremely difficult and it is a conflict of interest. I think that is an absolute disgrace. I cannot believe he would even mention it.

I would like to ask the member, while he has got an answer, it would seem, from the nodding of his head with respect to Calgary and Edmonton, tell me how I can answer my constituents and the anglophones, 800,000 of them in Montreal, whose only news service and only information is going to come either from what David Halton happens to think is important or Wendy Mesley or perhaps Peter Mansbridge, but there will be no particular broadcaster responsible for reporting to English-speaking Quebecers on what is going on through the voice of their parliamentarians here on Parliament Hill. Does he think it is fair that 800,000 of us have no voice out of this Hill?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I would not want the hon. member to think for a moment that the people in Montreal never pay any attention to her. I have always been impressed with her contributions to the committee. I also want to thank her for mentioning my predecessor as parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest. I, too, will strive to fill those shoes. He did a remarkable job as I know that the member was pleased to comment on.

With regard to the parliamentary channel mentioned by the hon. member for Mount Royal, I think that that is a matter that is yet to be seen. I think it is a rather hypothetical suggestion for the member to suggest that the service will be different in any way than it is now. Obviously, there is some regulation over the use of the cameras in the House today, and the hon. member can be assured that some similar format will be followed whatever the course of the parliamentary channel in the House.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I know that my colleague on the government side is new to his position as parliamentary secretary, but, with all due respect, the argument that the member had tried to put forward that the CBC is actually being strengthened, that its mandate is actually being revitalized, is just a little beyond credibility.

We have to look at the fact that we are losing 150 hours of programming. We are closing three regional stations and reducing the operations in the remaining eight regional stations. We have turfed 1,100 people in the CBC out on the street and there is a $108 million shortfall. We have just finished emancipating Radio Canada International. You have cut its staff from 193 to 100. You have slashed its budget and reduced its international programming from 14 languages to 5. You have got another $50 million funding shortfall in the next fiscal year. That is going to translate into another 500 to 600 jobs.

How this member can say that they are strengthening the CBC is simply beyond me.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I want to welcome the hon. member in his new role as a critic of this portfolio. He may, in the course of his acquisition of knowledge in the portfolio, look at Bill C–40, which was passed by this Parliament and has yet to receive Royal Assent. He will note in the mandate of Bill C–40 just what the mandate of the CBC is in fact. We are talking here about a rejuvenation of CBC; allowing the CBC, with the new board of directors, is moving in this direction in addressing its mandate.

As I said in my remarks, its mandate has not concluded many of the services that the hon. member speaks of. What we are talking about here is doing what it does well in addressing its mandate given the resources at a time of restraint that the private sector, as well, is facing. We will just see to what extent they are able to do that.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, if you have ever attended a meeting of the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future as I have, you will know that Canadians are hopping mad at us, the federal politicians.

They want members of Parliament to reflect their constituents' views. They are fed up with party discipline and cabinet solidarity. Some want a referendum. Others want fixed election dates and direct election of the Prime Minister. All want changes to the Senate.

If many of these changes were put in place, our government would resemble the American republican system more than our traditional British parliamentary system.

Essentially, however, Canadians want a system of government in which their concerns and not ours are debated in public and not behind closed doors. It sounds to me very much like our present municipal council system, and that seems to work.

SOLAR ENERGY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, increased environmental concerns on the use of conventional fuels and the need for natural resources conservation are prompting a search for environmentally sensitive energy technologies. In a country that wants both more energy and a cleaner environment, renewable energy resources have both excellent potential and are capable of adding significantly to our energy security.

Tomorrow the Solar Energy Society of Canada and the Liberal Party will host an exposition of solar energy technology on Parliament Hill from 11 a.m. to 3.30 p.m. in Room 200 of the West Block. I would like to invite all members of this hon. House to attend this event.

By and large Canadians still seem to be quite uninformed about solar energy technologies. Some of them even mistakenly believe that solar energy is not feasible in Canada because of our climate and our geography.

I hope that the exposition tomorrow will help us to evaluate existing technologies for harnessing the sun better and to understand the size of the challenge of ensuring an adequate, safe energy supply for the future.

TRIBUTE TO GUY LAFLEUR

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for several days the sports section in La Presse published letters from admirers of hockey hero Guy Lafleur who was about to retire. Here is one from Mr. Robert Marsolais of Joliette, who says:

> Leclerc, Richard, Vigneault, Lafleur —these are only a few of those heroes with whom an entire people spontaneously identifies.
> Intensity, determination, perseverance, generosity and professionalism —These words distill the essence of the career of the "blond devil".
> Gaze, speech and aim are equally direct. But above all, the man we admire for what he is and what he represents remains simple and unaffected.
> Thank you, Guy, for giving us some unforgettable moments and for letting us vent some heatfelt emotions.
> Another career beckons. We hope it will bring fulfilment for you, Lise and all your loved ones.

Mr. Speaker, the Quebec caucus of the Conservative Party salutes Guy Lafleur and says: Thank you!

JAMES BAY II

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, James Bay II is the largest hydroelectric project ever conceived in the history of North America, and the clear-cutting for the flooding has begun without environmental impact evaluation.

Twenty years ago the James Bay Development Corporation of Quebec launched its scheme to restrain or divert all the major rivers of James Bay and northern Quebec, creating a gigantic series of dams, dikes, and reservoirs.

Premier Bourassa then as now made it clear that the purpose was to provide power to the United States. Cost estimates for James Bay I rose from $1 billion when it began to over $24 billion for its completion in 1996.

The real costs to the Cree, to the Inuit, and to Canada's environment are devastating. Once the land is flooded it is lost forever. Mercury laden fish, drowned caribou, ruined habitat for the Beluga whales and for hundreds of other species, and flooding from the two phases of 26,000 square kilometres, 2 per cent of the entire province of Quebec, six times as much land flooded by this project as is protected in all of its provincial and national parks combined.

The federal and provincial governments are playing a treacherous game in allowing this project to proceed in bits and pieces without an over-all environmental assessment. Even worse, the alternatives to this project are being purposely hidden from Canadians and Quebecers.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY ACT

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of the free trade agreement with the United States for the first time American cars can be imported to Canada for resale. Now that American cars have begun coming to Canada, it has become clear that U.S. standards are not at all the same as Canadian standards in areas of safety, emissions, language and metric measure.

Departmental officials are struggling with how to address this issue but the answer is very clear: there can be only one set of standards and they must be met in exactly the same way by both domestic and imported cars.

To do otherwise will have a very detrimental effect to Canadian consumers and to the Canadian manufacturing industry, as well as having an inconsistent and confusing set of safety regulations.

I strongly urge the Minister of Transport to demand that the Motor Vehicle Safety Act be applied equally and fairly to both domestic and imported vehicles in exactly the same manner.

RADIO CANADA INTERNATIONAL

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, in 1945 the CBC's overseas broadcasting arm, Radio Canada International, was founded.

The federal government has again shown its myopic approach by its decimating cuts to Radio Canada International. Canadians living abroad and persons living under repressive regimes are being denied what is for many their only touchstone with home and Canada.

At a time when the British, French and Americans are increasing their international broadcasting services for the purposes of furthering trade, human rights and foreign policy issues, our government has decided to sit idly by as $8 million, 100 jobs and at least six language services are slashed out of RCI, a 50 per cent cut.

The PMO said it was embarrassed that RCI employees would announce these cuts to the world. This government should be more than embarrassed. This is just another example of government's short-sightedness in its domestic and foreign policy.

FORESTRY

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, the forest industry is vital to Canada. Our nation's forests are a renewable resource.

While in the past we have not always been the best of stewards, we have recently seen real change in attitudes and practices.

Unfortunately among the chorus of critics there are some who have ignored this progress and seem intent on damaging Canada's largest industry. It has gone so far that some even advocate foreign boycotts of Canadian products.

This destructive sentiment was seen in a recent German TV program which was unfairly critical of the B.C. forest industry. The use of partial information and half-truths has resulted in a biased perception of our forestry practices.

Certainly, when it comes to something so important to Canadians, we should be able to count on a certain degree of fairness, accuracy, and possibly even some sense of loyalty from other Canadians.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of a distinguished constituent, Mr. Wayne Meyer. For 25 years he was dedicated to his work and contributed to the building of the British Columbia economy.

Then as a result of a compassionate and humanitarian gesture for his ailing father, he found himself in need of unemployment insurance for a short period but was denied support.

He appealed the decision and eventually sought justice before the Office of the Empire and in June 1990 Mr. Meyer had his case adjudicated.

Nine months have passed. Yet the judge who heard the case has yet to respond. Here is a man who through no fault of his own was in need of UI support, was denied support, appealed to the Empire, and yet had to wait for a decision while he is forced to live in near poverty.

I urge the judge to render a decision as soon as possible to end this travesty of justice.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, Agriculture Canada and the Quebec Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food recently agreed to make the Gross Revenue Income Plan available to the Quebec grain farmers for the 1991-1992 crop year.

This plan which, from the very beginning, called upon the cooperation of the farmers as well as the federal and provincial governments in the Agri-Food Review, clearly shows that, if we work together in a genuine partnership, we can make things better for the producers.

Quebec's participation to the Income Stabilization Plan for grain farmers is vital for the farmers as a permanent and efficient source of support they can count on.

Mr. Speaker, even the UPA applauded to this new trilateral agreement.

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans makes a big deal out of consulting fishermen in Atlantic Canada. However, the fishermen see things differently.

The vase majority of lobster fishermen in Prince Edward Island told the minister that they wanted no part in the increase of minimum size of lobsters they catch. A large majority of those who responded to the survey conducted by DFO said that they wanted lobster sizes to remain at two and a half inches. Instead of listening to the fishermen, the minister is ignoring them, determined to increase the sizes in zones 24 and 26A.

The scientific evidence proves that the increases do nothing to protect the stocks. As well, the increases will lower the catches and will take money out of the pockets of fishermen and plant workers. I urge the minister to cancel the increases today.

GOVERNMENT BONDS

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, Canada is one of the few developed countries that still pays investment brokers non-negotiated fees to sell government bonds. These handouts cost Canadian taxpayers $20 million to $60 million a year.

The minister of state said the other day that this practice has been going on for decades. It may have been the practice for decades, but the government cannot justify continuing the practice while at the same time taking money from children.

The individual taxpayer is subsidizing the lifestyle of a few hundred Bay Street sharks who cart their fees away in wheel-barrows.

Is it not ironic to see that the very same people who warn us against the deficit are precisely those who thrive on it?

The finance minister, a former executive vice-president at Dominion Securities, is dancing with Bay Street wolves while Canadian taxpayers are being shaved. He has yet to learn to say no to his friends on Bay Street.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, many Canadian weekly newspapers face extinction. This government is introducing regulations that would cause Canadian newspaper mailing rates to jump as high as 1,000 per cent or 10 times their present costs.

Last December, Canada Post first gazetted the proposed regulations. The weekly newspapers had no time to react, no opportunity to plan. Subscriptions for 1991 were already sold. Newspaper publishers have cited increases in the thousands of dollars: $5,000, $10,000, up to $30,000 and more.

The local press is important to Canadians. It is another institution being attacked by this government. Newspapers in small towns and rural Canada are asking not for a handout, but just a fair fighting chance.

If postal rates need to rise, they should be phased in over long periods of time. Let us work with Canadians, not against them.

INDEPENDENCE OF GREECE

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, on March 25, 1821 the independence of Greece was officially proclaimed by Archbishop Germanos of Patras over the Ottoman Empire.

This last weekend all over the world we were celebrating this great day. In my city of Montreal thousands and thousands of people of all origins participated in this great event, as did people in Toronto.

My party, the Liberal Party, of Canada and I would like to offer these hard working proud Canadians our sincere best wishes. They chose to come to Canada. Many of them I know personally and they live in my constituency of Saint-Denis.

Yesterday, while celebrating this event, thousands of them reminded us that there is still a country torn apart by internal divisions, and that is Cyprus. They unanimously asked for the immediate implementation of the UN resolutions regarding Cyprus.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians and indeed those in my constituency of Hamilton West are greeting with a great deal of speculation and suspicion the agenda of the Minister of Transport.

The Minister of Transport is about to embark on negotiations concerning an open skies concept between Canada and the United States.

He is to embark on what may be in the Minister of Transport's opinion a well meaning idea, but the problem that Canadians have with the Minister of Transport is that the only bargaining chip he has in his hand is the accessibility of the United States and its air carriers to being carriers in Canada.

A system of cabotage within Canada is of great concern to Canadian travellers because it is going to cost them more.

U.S. Air, the seventh largest air carrier, a small one at that compared to other air carriers, is twice the size of Air Canada and Canadian combined. The carriers are concerned. They want to have their input.

We hope the Minister of Transport will at least give them the courtesy of listening.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the incredible weekend statements made by the Minister of Finance in which he blames the attitudes of Canadians for the current malaise gripping this country.

Has the Deputy Prime Minister considered that the malaise gripping this country is not caused by Canadian attitudes but rather by government policies?

I refer him specifically to the report tabled an hour ago by the Commissioner of Official Languages who has this to say about the government's broadcasting policy:

> Canadian identity, we fear, cannot be promoted by showing "Dallas" and "L.A. Law" in English and French. The CBC must have a strong national and regional presence. Regional programming has been slashed to such a point that it may never recover—In terms of broadcasting, the people who live outside the largest metropolitan areas have been made second-class citizens.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister agree with the assessment of the Commissioner of Official Languages that in fact his government's broadcasting policies are creating second-class citizens?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Of course not, Mr Speaker. The Commissioner of Official Languages presented his report today at noon. I have not yet had a chance to read it all, but on glancing through it, he also says many positive things about the action of the government.

When we deal with official languages and the environment in which we live in Canada, it is always a very delicate area to work in.

The commissioner also said that when we take everything into account, the balance sheet is most positive. We can rest assured that this government is fully committed to this policy and will continue to act in an efficient manner to make sure that the best possible policies are being implemented.

With respect to the CBC, many days of hearings last week provided the managers of CBC with occasion to explain their decision to reorganize their programming within the budget allocated.

Mrs. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I find it incredible that the Prime Minister and his government should be blaming Canadians and their attitudes for the present malaise gripping this country.

Today, the Commissioner of Official Languages criticized the policies of a government that applied the GST to books. He also criticized the cutbacks at the CBC which made people outside our urban centres, and I quote, "second class citizens". Doesn't the minister understand that his government's policies, not the attitudes of Canadians, are undermining Canadian unity?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, when the Commissioner of Official Languages starts commenting on Canada's tax system, he may be somewhat "over-extended".

I may remind the interim Leader of the Opposition that this reform was discussed at length in the House and that the government explained its reasons for introducing the tax. This reform is vital to an exporting country like Canada. It was absolutely necessary. Even opposition members have, over the years, acknowledged the need for removing the former federal sales tax which was disastrous for our exports. The standard of living and the quality of life of Canadians depend on our exports.

It was not just an obligation. It was a duty. And until now, no government had the courage to take this step. We did, and we are proud of it, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, a tax on books is not going to do much for Canadian unity and Canadian identity.

I have this question for the minister: Since he just said that the Commissioner of Official Languages says many positive things about the government, I would like to ask him why, on the very day the government received the report on official languages, it is cutting Treasury Board's budget with respect to official languages to the tune of 22 per cent. Why is the minister killing the jobs of people who are supposed to preserve bilingualism at the federal level?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, when we hear the kind of comments made by the interim Leader of the Official Opposition, we are astonished at their factual content, which is absolutely incorrect!

Last year, expenditures on official languages within government increased by 9.5 per cent, although all other budgets were cut. Next year, there will be an increase of 4.5 per cent, while other expenditures are being reduced. As far as human resources are concerned, this year we prepared regulations which were published in this week's Gazette. We worked very hard for two years, and during the comming months, we will consider how best to manage this sector.

However, I repeat that the government intends to keep managing this sector effectively.

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing, absolutely nothing, wrong with Canadians' attitudes towards official languages. As a matter of fact, in this report we find that four out of five Canadians accept official bilingualism and that three out of four parents want their children to learn the second language, in this case the other official language.

What is at stake here is the leadership this government is giving to this whole question. I want to ask the minister this, since the report today tabled is quite critical of his department. Mr. Speaker, I will read from page 56:

Efforts to promote the identity and linguistic and cultural integrity of Canada.

Results this year; insufficient, inconclusive efforts.

Harmonization of commitments to official languages and multiculturalism policies.

Results of the government; insufficient effort.

Constitutional formula to develop and reduce imbalances to improve services in the minority language services. Government position; not yet stated.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister to tell us why today, in his own department, there is talk of cutting 22 per cent of those people directly responsible for the program evaluation branch? Why is the minister cutting 15 people out of a job at this time?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I would like to repeat what I have said already, Mr. Speaker, we are increasing the budget for this particular department.

As for the commitment of this government and of the Prime Minister, I would like to quote a statement he made saying that bilingualism is an advantage and an asset for this country and that even with its imperfections, and we all recognize that there are some, it serves Canada well. He said that it will always be a challenge. A great deal of success has been achieved and, as is clearly shown in the very report you are quoting, of course it is not perfect. But I would remind the hon. gentleman that his own party had been in power for decades and we were all striving in our own way to improve it.

We introduced a new bill last year, we have introduced a whole new set of regulations that were discussed and debated in this House and in committee, and which are now in front of the public. We have made arrangements with many departments for special arrangements to manage this difficult area, and we are making good progress in the areas declared officially bilingual.

In 1984 when we came in there were 35 per cent bilingual jobs; there are now 70 per cent bilingual people in those particular management jobs.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a supplementary. In his annual report the commissioner also refers to the question of the language of work and to another important question, equitable participation. I want to deal with the regulations designed to favour the actual use of French or English as a working language in federal government departments and agencies. The findings of the commissioner's study show that nothing has been done yet. A study of environments favourable to the use of the working language has been made, but the results have not yet been made public.

So here is my question. True enough, we were given regulations concerning the language of service. But we have absolutely nothing, the government has quite simply refused to tell the Canadian Parliament just where the government stands on the issue of language of work and equitable participation. Now I ask the minister when are we going to have regulations on the language of work?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I remember quite well that a few months ago in this House the hon. member asked me to produce or publish these rather difficult and complex regulations which enable all Canadians to have as much access as possible to services in their mother tongue anywhere in Canada. We did work very hard. I continued the work which my predecessor had begun. I believe we came out with excellent regulations which drew praise from both sides of the House, I would say almost from three sides of the House. We did a good job and we are continuing this work at the departmental level.

With respect to the language of work, outside if you will, I believe the official language is already precise enough. As far as I know there has been no major problem. Should one ever arise we would be glad to deal with it at the appropriate time and place.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question comes from the speech which the Minister of Finance gave this past weekend. It was a speech in which he told Ontario Conservatives that we could lose this country.

I think the minister is right. Our unity and the faith our people have in each other are very much at the breaking point. That is why this government must change its economic direction.

I want to ask this government if it will work for Canada's survival by ending its tax breaks to the rich, by giving more support to training and to research and, above all, by getting Canadians back to work in Quebec and all across the rest of this country? That is what we need to make this country survive. Will this government give us that commitment.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I continue to be amazed at the contradictions I hear from members of that particular party. For one week, day after day, they get up in the House and tell us that we must do something because a lot of companies are going into bankruptcy. They then turn around and say: "You should increase the taxes on these companies because it is most unfair". I would like to know exactly where they stand.

It is a fact that many of our companies are in difficulty. It is by providing them with the proper environment and by bringing down the interest rates that we can help them to salvage their companies and get on with their programs. It is not by sheer magic.

The opposition and the NDP seem to think that by pressing a button we can change the course of events. Canada, like all countries, is living in the real world. We have to provide a competitive environment, put our own house in order and reduce the interest rates and then we can get on with the job.

Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, what this country needs is a lower dollar, a lower set of interest rates and the hundreds of thousands of people who would be back to work as a consequence of those kinds of policies.

I have another question for the government. Mr. D'Iberville Fortier released his report today. He discussed the climate of uncertainty surrounding the future of the official languages. He said that some people are playing with dynamite.

Is the government willing to confirm unequivocally that our linguistic duality is a fundamental characteristic of this country? Will it provide the required leadership in this field for the future?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raised many issues in his question. He mentioned in particular the need for lower interest rates and lower dollar.

I would like to remind him that we are indeed pursuing these objectives, but that the only good way to achieve this is by harmonizing the fiscal policy with the monetary policy. As regards official languages, I think the hon. member should have no doubt about it. This government is totally committed to official languages. If we were not, why would we have increased spendings by 9.5 per cent in that sector last year, when we were cutting back everywhere else? How can one claim a lack of interest on the part of this government?

Next year, while our overall spendings will be reduced by 3 per cent, spendings in that sector will increase by over 4 per cent. I think the figures are eloquent. As regards our commitment, you will find in today's Gazette I think the important draft regulations we are submitting to the Canadian people. That is unequivocal. A few months ago, we introduced a new legislation on the subject. Our commitment is unequivocal. I cannot for the life of me understand why the hon. member is so concerned. I can assure him that we are indeed committed not only to maintain but to improve this policy.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I would like to address my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Recently the Prime Minister promised to save Radio Canada International, but despite his assurances, RCI's budget has just been axed, its staff decimated and the number of languages broadcast slashed from 14 to 5. Incredibly, we will no longer be able to tune to RCI programming in Canada's two official languages.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister this question. At a time when the government can find $14 million for a glitzy ad campaign to sell the GST; at a time when it can afford $1 million plus for its budget propaganda leaflet, why can the Prime Minister and this government not find the $7 million to keep open our only newslink to the rest of the world? Or is this just another example of another broken promise by this Prime Minister?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has assured all Canadians that Canada will continue to have an international shortwave service. The government has been searching for new funds to retain a Canadian international shortwave service. That is being done right now.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the Commissioner of Official Languages has tabled a huge but most interesting report. His major concern as a result of the cuts in funding to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation will be an erosion of official language communities. At the same time is the government not undermining our Canadian identity when it is already shaky? Is it not dealing a serious blow to one of the essential characteristics of our country? My question is this: Is the government prepared to allocate the necessary funds for the maintenance and enhancement of programs for Francophones outside Quebec? Yes or no?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the Chairman stated a month ago that he felt total receipts of $1.4 billion was adequate. I can tell you honestly that I watch the CBC. There are a great many programs which I appreciate highly, but it is the responsibility of the CBC and its managers to determine how they could provide a high quality service to all Canadians, and I am sure they will.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Canadian citizens paying their taxes in Windsor, Rimouski, Seven Islands, Matane——would be very pleased with the Minister's reply.

[English]

Mr. Epp: In Winnipeg we do not want it any more.

Mrs. Finestone: Is that so?

Mr. Speaker, given that the CBC President Veilleux has said that a further $50 million shortfall is looming and more serious cuts are ahead this year if more money is not forthcoming to protect what we now have left of the CBC, will someone, on behalf of the absent minister, assure Canadians that more money will be found for the CBC so that additional services are not cut and more jobs, more than the 1,100 right now, are not lost. Yes or no.

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the hon. member that one of the reasons why the government is compelled today to ask every one to tighten their belts is that before we assumed power, the generous Liberal government was spending $1.33 for every dollar Canadian taxpayers were sending to Ottawa.

Mrs. Finestone: It costs 11 cents for the CBC.

Mr. Loiselle: Much as we would like to spend—as politicians, we would rather spend more—Canadian taxpayers just cannot afford it.

Therefore, we have asked the CBC—by the way, we have increased its budget from $900 million to $1 billion and something—

Mrs. Finestone: No, $300 million.

Mr. Loiselle: ..we have asked the CBC to operate within its budget. Should exceptional requests be made, we would consider them on an individual basis.

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Last weekend at a Conservative policy conference the Minister of Finance in effect reprimanded Canadians for their negative attitudes and told them: "Don't worry. Just be happy." That is quite a view coming from the architect of the very policies that are tearing this country's economy apart.

At that Conservative conference, the Minister of Finance praised the resolutions of the conference which he said would strengthen the country.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister about some of these resolutions. Does he think that eliminating funding for multiculturalism will strengthen the country? Does he think that creating user fees for medicare will strengthen the country?

Tell us just which of these resolutions the government agrees with. Does he admit that it is this government's negative policies that are creating negative attitudes on the part of Canadians.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think what the hon. member would find encouraging is that 800 Conservatives took the time off from a very busy weekend to talk about the future of the country, and about policies for the future.

While this was going on, the Liberal Party of B.C. was trying to find a way to extricate itself from the federal Liberal Party. Quite a difference; quite a contrast.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, what surprised Canadians was that they could still find 800 people who would call themselves Conservatives and come out in public to have a meeting.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will take a look at the report of the Official Languages Commissioner which was tabled earlier today and see what he says about another negative policy of this government, the GST, and its effect on books.

The Official Languages Commissioner says:

> The federal government should consider setting up a task force or other mechanisms to evaluate and report quickly on the linguistic and cultural dislocations created by application of the GST and proposed compensatory measures.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister admit that the government was wrong in applying the GST on books and on the economy, and set up this task force today?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, from the beginning, we tried to explain to the opposition, which was not very inclined to listen, that this reform had a certain number of characteristics.

We wanted the GST to be widely based. We wanted it to create, by removing the old sales tax on companies, manufacturers and others, a more competitive Canada thereby creating more money for people to buy books.

Second, for Canadians who have the lowest incomes, we set aside what is, in a GST or value added tax country—there are 48 of them—the most generous system to make sure that these people would be in a better position to spend afterwards than they were before. It is up to them whether or not to buy books.

The disaster which was forecast before GST reform has not happened.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The softwood lumber tariff memorandum of understanding signed by this government with the United States has been blamed for the loss of thousands of forestry jobs as well as selling out Canada's ability to make our own forest policy, particularly when it comes to questions like stumpage.

The minister of trade has said he would consult with the provinces to try and get a consensus on how to scrap the MOU.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is: Does the government have agreement from the major lumber producing provinces and the maritime premiers to go to Washington and scrap the MOU?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can only advise the hon. member that those consultations are ongoing. Obviously there are major concerns about this issue and there are some differences of opinion as regards eastern and western industries. Hopefully we will be able to arrive at a consensus and a common position which we can take as a negotiating position with regard to this important issue with the United States.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, under the memorandum of understanding, section 5 of the agreement that this government signed with the United States, the Government of Canada commits and will agree to impose a new tariff if any of the provinces reduce the stumpage that they levy on their forests.

Has the government been approached by any provinces to reduce their stumpage and is it still the position of the government that it will impose a new tariff if that is done?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not precisely sure about the state of the negotiations at the present time. Obviously these and all other matters will be considered as part of the consultation process, but I can assure the hon. member that the position of the government is that we want to deal with this issue and because it is something that involves very directly the provinces, it is important to have provincial concurrence. That is what we are seeking and when we do, we will be in the position to make a solid case before the United States.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for ACOA.

Since the closing of ADIL, which was given assistance one year and closed the next year, and is operating now only until the summer, can the minister tell the House whether or not he has caused an investigation in to what went wrong in the year that the money was given to ADIL?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to brief my colleague on this matter, but I want to tell her that as is the case with other enterprises in Atlantic Canada, our agency attempts to be helpful and do the most that we can to ensure that these enterprises have every chance of success where the jobs are badly needed.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows I asked this question in committee and as far as I know, I have not received an answer.

My supplementary is for the same minister. I wonder if the minister is aware of how many businesses have closed or gone into bankruptcy in Nova Scotia since the start of the ACOA plan. If he knows the number, would he please tell us, and if not would he table it in the House, as well as tabling what investigation went on for ADIL?.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I can tell my colleague, who seems to be far more interested in the negative than the positive in these things, that whatever businesses have run into difficulty have been a very miniscule number compared to the businesses that have succeeded and they have created and maintained many thousands of jobs in Atlantic Canada.

If she wishes to have this kind of information which, I guess, more properly should be requested through a question on the Order Paper, I will make certain that she gets some background data.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, My question is for the Minister for Science.

The president of the National Research Council acknowledged last week that the council is hurting badly, that it lacks the resources to adequately support industrial R and D, and that its most popular program with the private sector, the Industrial Research Assistance Program, has been starved for funds by this government.

When will the government recognize that the well-being and jobs of Canadians depends on investing in industrial research and development and adequately support industrial R and D through the National Research Council?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the National Research Council is but one instrument to support industrial research in this country.

The government has a very large number of programs: the Strategic Technologies Program, the sector campaigns and many others. These are all designed to promote, encourage and lever funding from the private sector for more research. That is exactly what we are trying to do.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, all of those programs have been cut by this government.

In fact, the president of the National Research Council has acknowledged that the value of contributions to the IRAP Program has dropped more than 20 per cent in the past six years. Seven years ago, the Prime Minister promised to create hundreds of thousands of jobs through investment in research and development, and to increase sales by several billion dollars each year.

That is exactly what the NRC's Industrial Research Assistance Program is doing. Will the minister make a commitment to invest in research and development and give the National Research Council the resources it needs to create jobs and increase sales of Canadian companies, which is exactly what the Prime Minister promised seven years ago?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there are two facets to the IRAP program. The first and, indeed, it may turn out to be the most important facet, is the network that has spread from one end of this country to the other in terms of the industrial strength.

With respect to the IRAP grants, they have continued to go up. In fact, in the last year, I do not know if the hon. member is aware of this or not, but the IRAP funding was not completely used and that is an important factor.

We are committed to IRAP. We believe it to be a very important program. We have no intention of letting it decrease. We have every intention of supporting it. In fact, we have asked if they would please provide us with a new five year plan, for the first time, for the whole IRAP network system.

ENTERPRISE CAPE BRETON

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister responsible for Enterprise Cape Breton.

The Brait report points out that 88 per cent of all financial assistance provided by Enterprise Cape Breton went to companies which were funded in excess of $1 million and that 71 per cent of those failed to produce jobs for Cape Bretoners.

My question to the minister is quite simple. He said last year that he would acknowledge any mistakes. I want, today, to hear him say that he is responsible for that abundant record of mistakes at Enterprise Cape Breton.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, my colleague knows that any minister is responsible for what goes on in his department. He also knows that in the last year or so there have been considerable changes made with respect to ACOA. He also, in fairness I think, would want me to put on the record that Mr. Brait, who did an arm's length, very impartial report, said that he was very impressed with the number of small enterprises that were created and the fact that this augured well for the future.

It is true that this or that mistake has tended to be highlighted but, basically, Mr. Brait pointed out that nearly $500 million of additional investment was levered out of Enterprise Cape Breton. He pointed out that there were nearly 2,000 jobs created, although he also pointed out that there was some exaggeration in the number of jobs created.

If I may, I would like to quote briefly to my colleague, what a former member of Parliament from Cape Breton of his party, the Rev. Andy Hogan said about regional development, which is worth noting: "With regard to regional economics, it is time for everyone in this House, who does not accept some of the conventional wisdom about what can be done to get behind the whole program of regional expansion, to see what can be done. We can and will be partisan in other environments, but we must not just talk, we must ensure that regions and sub-regions of Canada have the opportunity to survive in the future." That is what this government is determined to do. I would hope that deep down, my hon. colleague's thinking on this issue is not shallow.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I trust you have noted that Brait indicated that those projects with which the minister had nothing directly to do with are the ones that were successful and, in fact, only 900 jobs were produced. The failures are specifically those jobs that the minister had to sign off on. I am asking this minister whether he will take responsibility for the failures that he specifically approved and act accordingly.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated to my colleague that I am well aware of the responsibilities and that I have indicated this in the past. He may in his trite way say that these large projects are not something that should be encouraged. I would remind him, where would we be in Nova Scotia for example without Michelin Tire?

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY ACT

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As usual, I am a little confused and perhaps he can clarify something for me.

Although all the laws and regulations of the Motor Vehicle Safety Act are enforced on the Canadian auto industry, the Department of Transport does not enforce some of the regulations on U.S. imported vehicles, in effect creating two sets of rules. This creates a decided advantage for U.S. imports and a confusing set of safety standards.

My question is: Will the minister correct the situation and enforce the Motor Vehicle Safety Act on U.S. imports exactly as it is enforced on Canadian vehicles or change the rules for both imports and domestic vehicles so there is only one set of rules for all to follow?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know of no incidents such as my hon. friend refers to. The Motor Vehicle Safety Act prohibits the importation of vehicles that do not meet Canadian standards. Transport Canada has been advising individuals and companies to this effect for more than a year. As a matter of fact a leaflet with these requirements has been prepared and has been given wide distribution to associations and customs sites.

If my hon. friend has any specific examples, I would be pleased to look into them.

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I do have a specific example. It is the example of odometers. There is a very clear rule that even I can understand that says that cars imported into Canada must have metric odometers. It is my understanding that that rule is not being enforced. Perhaps the minister could clarify that.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, what I said to my hon. friend was that if he could bring me a specific example where a car has been imported to that effect, we will look into it.

JUSTICE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. On Friday, I asked about the tragic case of Linda MacDonald who was brainwashed without her consent in 1963. The Solicitor General said that he could not respond because the case is before the courts.

The minister will know that although a statement of claim was issued four years ago, there is a hold on the matter to allow the minister to review the allegations of negligence by the government and to hopefully, after 28 years, offer Mrs. MacDonald some compensation.

Will the government please stop delaying on this matter and offer Mrs. MacDonald the compensation she so richly deserves?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite correct that with regard to the statement of claim, it was agreed between the parties that pending discussions the case would not be proceeded with.

My predecessor, the Minister for International Trade, when he was Minister of Justice, commissioned a report on the facts surrounding Ms. MacDonald's case. That report took a year and the conclusion of that report was that the Government of Canada bears no responsibility for those events at the Allan Memorial Institute.

At the request of Ms. MacDonald's current solicitor, Mr. Berger, I reviewed the submissions again and we heard out his suggestions that perhaps the Cooper report, which had been commissioned by my predecessor was not complete. With respect, and with regret I am afraid, I cannot subscribe to Mr. Berger's view of those facts and we have now made the decision to proceed with the case before the courts.

I have been continuing to review the case, and it would be helpful if litigation could be avoided, but I think it is important to make it very clear that there is a distinction between a terrible situation which resulted in very significant detriment to a Canadian for which we have great sympathy and the concern about legal liability on behalf of the Government of Canada.

With respect, I cannot accept the analysis that finds legal liability by the Government of Canada. Whether a court takes a different view is of course up to the court.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the minister's predecessor, the now Minister for International Trade, did not have the benefit of the case of Orlikow et al. v. the CIA, which produced a lot of important testimony. Also, the minister in her reply said that the government was not guilty of any impropriety. Well, no impropriety has ever been alleged. The allegations have been negligence against the government. And the allegations are also that without her consent what happened was contrary to the Nuremberg Code and contrary to the UN covenant on civil and political rights.

It is a travesty, Mr. Speaker. Will the government look at this matter again? Will the government take some real action in this matter, and will the government not punish this woman for being a victim?

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, with respect, the government is not punishing that woman for being a victim. Ms. MacDonald's case, I think, raises some very serious concerns.

The question that I as Minister of Justice for the Government of Canada have to be concerned with is the question of what is the legal liability of the Government of Canada because the acceptance of liability has implications for a great many other things the government does. I am sure my hon. friend will respect that and will appreciate that.

I compliment him on the care and the detail with which he repeats the submissions made by Mr. Berger, which, with respect, were carefully reviewed by the department. I continue to look at the file. I am not in the position to indicate what I would proceed to do.

I would like to invite the hon. member, if he would care, to have a more thorough briefing from my department. We would be very pleased to give it to him.

TORONTO RAILWAY LANDS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): My question is of the Minister of Transport who is ultimately responsible for the 81 hectares of land in downtown Toronto known as the railway lands, owned by Canadians and held in trust by Canadian National Railways and ultimately by the minister himself.

In view of the strong possibility that decisions will be made on the future of these very valuable lands by the city of Toronto and by Canadian National without holding public hearings, will the minister give today his undertaking that he will ensure there will be a proper public consultation process before decisions on the disposition of these valuable railway lands is made?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): I am sure my hon. friend will know that there has been a great deal of controversy surrounding these particular lands and a great deal of discussion about them.

CN in its dealings with public lands endeavours to abide by the planning process at all times, and I have no reason to believe that it would not do so in this instance.

REVENUE CANADA

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): My question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

In 1985 Ottawa began offering retail kitchen cabinet makers in Canada a 33 per cent discount on the manufacturers' sales tax. This discount was withdrawn from Manitoba makers in October 1986, but continued to be applied in other provinces. Imperial Cabinet Company of Winnipeg alone, in my constituency, has suffered over $82,000 in refunds due.

Will the minister admit that his department made a terrible mistake, and tell this House today that he will at once rectify this mistake and direct his department to refund all Manitoba businesses concerned?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): No, Mr. Speaker, I certainly cannot admit that there was a mistake. I would suggest to the hon. member that instead of believing a newspaper report that he should check into the facts before making inappropriate and inaccurate accusations of this sort.

The fact is that the discount applies only to regular lines of furniture and the manufacturers must have published price lists for those lines. The manufacturers mentioned in the Free Press article to which the hon. member refers to do not meet these qualifications.

May I at the same time, Mr. Speaker, say that we are delighted with the number of FST rebates that have taken place. In fact, to date we have completed some 41,000 claims—on time, on schedule—representing nearly half a billion dollars.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Later today Justice Allan Cawley will release his report on aboriginal justice in Alberta. He has apparently levied the charge of judicial and political tyranny against the justice system and its treatment of native people—like Wilson Nepoose of Hobbema, who was convicted of murder in May 1987.

My question is to the Minister of Justice. By now she has received a letter from Alberta Attorney General Ken Rostad indicating that Mr. Nepoose may have been wrongly convicted, based on false evidence coerced by the RCMP from a Crown witness. Mr. Rostad has asked the minister to order the case reheard under section 690 of the Criminal Code, the same section used in the Donald Marshall case.

When will the minister act to order a new hearing so that Wilson Nepoose who has been in prison for the last five years, since July 1986, can be released on bail pending a new trial?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, on the application under section 690, I am advised that my department has received some correspondence from Mr. Nepoose's counsel. His application will be dealt with as expeditiously as possible.

I think the hon. member will appreciate that the allegations have to be put forward and investigated to be dealt with as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Before we move on to some other things which I think hon. members would want to stay for, we have been getting into the habit of putting supplemental questions which really have no reference whatsoever to the principal question.

I want to remind hon. members of the following quotation from Beauchesne's:

> Although there may be no debate on an answer, further questions, as may be necessary for the elucidation of the answers that have been given, within due limits, may be addressed to a Minister. The extent to which supplementary questions may be asked is in the discretion of the Speaker.

I would ask hon. members to keep that in mind.

We are being asked for a few minutes to pay tributes.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HON. LEON BALCER

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to join all my colleagues in the House of Commons in paying tribute to the Hon. Léon Balcer who died this weekend at the age of 73. Mr. Balcer was a member of this House and a cabinet minister for many years. He was first elected member of Parliament for Trois-Rivières in 1949. He served his constituents in the electoral district of Trois-Rivières for six consecutive terms, which at the time was a record for a member from Quebec elected to the House of Commons.

Mr. Balcer also served as a minister under the late John Diefenbaker, from 1957 to 1965. He held the post of Solicitor General of Canada, was a member of the Treasury Board and, towards the end of his career, was Minister of Transport. Mr. Balcer finished his political career as an independent member in the House and subsequently tried to start a career in provincial politics which unfortunately proved unsuccessful.

Mr. Balcer also served as a naval officer during World War II on the Annan, one of the ships that helped hunt down German submarines, and he felt he learned a great deal from this experience.

The former member for Trois-Rivières and minister and member of the Privy Council was a man of great dedication, so much so that he had earned the respect of all his constituents, whatever their political stripe.

This weekend, in the Trois-Rivières newspaper Le Nouvelliste, journalist Jacques Laberge wrote that Mr. Balcer would be remembered as a member of Parliament who served the interests of his riding with loyalty and dedication. I am sure that all members of this House will join me today in offering our sincere condolences to all the people who knew Mr. Balcer and especially the members of his family.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I knew the hon. Léon Balcer well. My esteemed colleague Mr. Gray and I sat in the House with him. We both recall one of the great moments of his life, among others, when he moved to put a stop to the endless debates on the Canadian flag. It was thanks to him that that very trying debate finally came to an end.

We know as well that he had a very active political career. I remember that he had led the Conservative forces against me during my first electoral campaign back in February 1964. Unlike some other instances, this had resulted in a great friendship between us, while the contrary would normally be expected to occur.

We extend our heart-felt condolences to his family, for we know that Mr. Léon Balcer was a great gentleman, the kind of politician we see ever more rarely. He had a sense of his country, a sense of history, a deep-seated sense of what Canada was and of his place as French-speaking Léon Balcer both in the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada and in this House, and we are grateful to him for greats memories. He accomplished a lot more than a number of members can ever expect to do in their lifetime. He was a member of this House in very trying times. He had earned the respect of all his colleagues and of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent.

I am sorry I did not have more time to prepare for this tribute we are paying him today. Still, in these few words, on behalf of my party and of my colleague Mr. Gray who also knew him well and who is the senior member of the House of Commons, I want to offer our most sincere condolences to his family.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say that I knew Leon Balcer as a person or as a member of Parliament. But when I was young I used to be interested in what was happening on Parliament Hill and I considered Mr. Balcer as one of the most straight forward and honest members of Parliament and ministers of the Diefenbaker Governement. I cannot believe that Mr. Balcer passed away. It is not easy to sum up the work of such a member of Parliament who sat for so long in the House of Commons. But I would like to say in the name of my party that it is also very painful for us to have heard of his death. It is important to mention his contribution to our country.

[English]

Léon Balcer was someone who was well regarded in many parts of this country, not just in his own province of Quebec but in many parts of the rest of Canada, for the contributions which he made as a cabinet minister, for his capacity to work hard for his people from Trois-Rivières, and for his capacity to demonstrate independence, to demonstrate integrity, and to demonstrate to the people of this country what the life and contribution of an excellent member of Parliament can mean for all of us.

• (1510)

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as the minister from Quebec region 04, represented by Leon Balcer at the time, and especially as a personal friend of Mr. Balcer, I rise in the House today to pay tribute to him and to offer, on behalf of the government, our sincere condolences to his family and to all who knew him during the years he served in this House and served his country.

He was a remarkable man with a great sense of duty. When we consider his record in the House and the fact that he was re-elected six times, as my colleague pointed out earlier, we see not only a serious politician but also an individual who, I believe, deserves to be better known. I say this first of all because of his dedication to his constituents. This was apparent throughout his career and well afterwards. There was his sincere commitment to politics as a man who believed in the causes he espoused. He had great personal dignity and earned the support of his constituents by the way he represented them in this House.

And finally, Mr. Speaker, his friendship. Léon Balcer was a good friend, without affectation, sincere, open and dedicated. As a friend, Mr. Speaker, I mourn his loss, but I will always have fond memories of a good friend, Léon Balcer.

THE LATE PAULINE VANIER

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it is a sad comment that one of the rare occasions that brings unanimity to this House is when we pay tribute to those who have passed on. On behalf of the government and, I am sure, on behalf of all members of this House, I would like to pay tribute to Pauline Vanier, the wife of one of Canada's governor generals, of a general with a brilliant career and of a Canadian ambassador.

I had the pleasure of meeting him more than 40 years ago on my first trip to France when I, a young Quebecer, marched up to the embassy and asked to meet the ambassador, and so, I had that privilege. I was very impressed. General Vanier's military career had instilled in him a certain rigour which some called rigidity—and great strength of character and discipline which, in turn, he expected of those around him. I think his wife provided an additional dimension because she was, which was unusual even then, not only a remarkable wife but also a remarkable woman as such, with many admirable qualities and also very efficient. In each of the difficult roles her husband was asked to play, she was at his side, and I think she made Canadians take pride in their representative, especially as their head of State.

She was an inspiration to her husband and to all Canadians who met her, and she presided over the destinies of this country at a time when it was making its mark in history. On behalf of the government I wish to express our sincere condolences to all her children and other members of her family.

Mrs. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, a great lady has passed away. With the death of Pauline Vanier, last Saturday, we certainly lost the last member of a real princely couple. We all know the work done by Mr. Georges P. Vanier as Governor General. We also know the work he accomplished with the 22nd Regiment which was known as Vandoo across the country. But we know also that in the Vanier family, Mrs. Vanier gave women an opportunity for fullfilment.

The Canadian Encyclopedia describes the work that Mrs. Vanier accomplished for our poor, our youth and our families. It was not only the work of her husband, but hers, as a person. She was chancelor at the University of Ottawa. She was also a powerful force in the establishment of the Vanier Institute of the Family and everybody across Canada knows that it was Mrs. Vanier who encouraged her son to create the Arche community, which gives hope to those who lost it.

With a family as highly regarded as the Vanier family, we realize that it was the mother, the wife and the woman who was able in all circumstances to give the support that was needed, but it is also true that now—

[English]

With the death of Pauline Vanier, we have lost part of a great Canadian family. We have also lost a women who, through her own inspiration, has left a monument to her family that will outlive any of her children, or grandchildren, or great-grandchildren.

Of course her work as Chancellor of the University of Ottawa was extremely well known. Less well known was the influence that she played in the life of her son and the establishment of l'Arche homes for those who really need the help.

Most particular, where I personally have a great respect for the Vanier family was in the work that she did in establishing the Vanier Institute for the Family. The family is a changing institution and even today as we speak the Vanier Institute is able to be on the cutting edge of social reform. At a time when the country is crying out for support of the new family, not just the traditional family, Madam Vanier has made the study of new families, the study of social policy, and in particular the assistance for those who really need it one of her life goals.

Of course she will be missed by her children and her grandchildren, but she will also be missed by all of those who feel that it is the responsibility of someone in public life to help, to support, and to provide inspiration to those who cannot help themselves. Indeed that has been the hallmark of the life of the Vanier family, and the person behind that great hallmark was indeed Madam Vanier.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians were saddened to learn of the passing of Madam Vanier. Madam Vanier had a long and distinguished career, both a career of her own and in support of her husband Georges.

I am sure all of us can think back to many, many occasions when as a family the two of them represented some of the finer aspects of Canadian society and what Canada meant to so many people both here and abroad.

I remember on a number of occasions in discussions with both Madam Vanier and Georges Vanier being enlightened in terms of their view of what our country was and what it could be.

We recognize that Madam Vanier was a very dedicated person in terms of a variety of pursuits. Canada is a better place because of her efforts. She was a person of considerable character. I think the model that she provided for so many Canadians was nothing short of outstanding.

As a family the Vaniers had a long and distinguished career, both of them.

Today our hearts and our thoughts go out to her family on this very sad day.

Mr. Speaker: I thank all hon. members for the tributes that have been paid both to a former colleague of ours and a distinguished Canadian, and to Madam Vanier who was for many years an inspiration to all of us.

Speaker's Ruling

PRIVILEGE

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I must now advise the House with respect to a question of privilege which was raised on Thursday, March 21, by the House leader of the Official Opposition, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, concerning the government advertisements which appeared in newspapers on March 16, 1991 relating to budget highlights.

The advertisement in question entitled "Canada's Plan for Economic Recovery" describes an eight-page newsletter which will be sent to every household explaining important highlights of the 1991 budget recently presented by the Minister of Finance.

The newsletter itself described economic initiatives taken by the government regarding inflation, the national debt, and interest rates. It also describes the government's plan to control expenditures to reduce the deficit, noting among other matters that legislation will be introduced to establish the debt servicing reduction fund.

I might say that on a number of occasions in the document the suggestion is made that legislation will be introduced.

• (1520)

In his presentation, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond argued that by placing the advertisements in newspapers across the country the Minister of Finance acted as if the House had already passed the budget. He went on to suggest that the ad misrepresented the budget document tabled in the House and made several references to the ruling of October 10, 1989 concerning the advertisement on the goods and services tax.

[Translation]

In support of these arguments, the house leader for the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Kamloops, rose to claim that not only were the advertisements contemptuous and misleading, but they also prejudiced the decision of the House on the budget.

[English]

In reply, the hon. Minister of Finance stated that he had followed the directions of the Chair as laid down in the ruling of October 10, 1989. He argued that the advertising had made it clear that these were budget proposals and quoted from the brief note in the newsletter he himself signed: "This budget proposes far-reaching initiatives." He then went on to argue that, contrary to the contention of the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, the advertisements accurately represented the 1991 budget document tabled in the House.

The interventions on March 21 touch on three major issues: whether the newsletter misrepresents the budget document; whether, in sponsoring this advertising the Minister of Finance acted as if the House had already passed the budget; and whether the advertisement will prejudice a future decision of the House.

On the first question, that is, whether the newsletter misrepresents the budget document, the Chair really has no role to play since it is clearly a dispute as to fact. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and the hon. Minister of Finance have different views on the government's economic initiatives and on the manner in which the newsletter presents those initiatives. The Chair can only conclude that the disagreement between the two hon. members is a matter of debate which could more properly be addressed in another forum. It is, with respect, not a question of privilege.

Another issue raised concerned the actions of the minister in authorizing these advertisements, and whether or not he was acting as if the House had already passed the budget motion.

To the information of all hon. members and the viewing public, on February 26 at the beginning of his budget speech, the Minister of Finance moved a motion reading: "That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government." Following this, the rules of the House establish that there is a six-day debate ending with the decision on whether or not the government's budgetary policy has the support of the House. In the present case, a decision has not yet been taken. There are two days remaining in the budget debate.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond contends that the minister should have waited until a decision of the House was taken on this motion before the advertisements were made. The minister replied that the newsletter was intended to satisfy the needs of Canadians to understand what was being proposed in the complex budget documents. The newsletter was careful to explain that these were proposals and that legislation would soon be introduced.

The Chair has to conclude that prima facie there is no breach of privilege or contempt of the House in this regard since the minister was careful in respecting the role of the House in these matters and indicated in the newsletter that these were proposals.

Another issue raised by the hon. member for Kamloops was that these advertisements prejudiced the decision that the House is to take. I would refer all hon. members to the ruling of October 10, 1989, at page 4460 of Hansard:

"The House and its committees do not work in a vacuum. Members are constantly aware of outside factors and pressures. Since no threats or bribes have been made, it is difficult to see how the work of the House has been prejudiced or which specific privilege has been breached."

[English]

I cannot see how these advertisements can prejudice the decision which the House will take on the budget motion. The purpose of the newsletter was to disseminate information and the Chair is satisfied that it did so in full respect of the authority of this House.

I want to thank the hon. Minister of Finance, and the hon. member for Kamloops for their contributions on the matter raised, as I said earlier, succinctly by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. After carefully reviewing the material itself and having considered all the arguments presented, I must conclude, however, prima facie, there is no breach of privilege.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period the member for Comox—Alberni asked me a question about an application by Mr. Nepoose. I indicated that material had been received in my department. I am advised that that is not correct. A telephone communication has been received indicating the documents will be arriving in my department, probably tomorrow. I just wanted to correct that. An application has not been received for relief under section 690 of the Criminal Code.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENT

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the seventh report of the Standing Committee on Environment entitled Out of Balance: The Risks of Irreversible Climate Change.

I would like to say that by now practically every Canadian has heard of the greenhouse effect. To respond to its threat will require many years, perhaps several decades of strong action by the world as a whole, and Canada needs to be a leading country in such efforts.

It would be easy to be pessimistic, easy to decide the effort cannot succeed. But we have to act. Global warming is a severe threat to both Canada and to the planet. We in Canada have contributed much more than our share in creating the problem.

The committee's report shows that we have a way to become very much a part of the solution. I believe this third report dealing with global warming and climate change will go a long way toward that.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee requests the government to table a comprehensive response to this report.

ELEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the 11th report of the Standing Committee on Finance in relation to Bill C–83, an act to revise and amend the law governing federal loan and trust companies and to provide for related and consequential matters, with many amendments.

Mr. Speaker, may I say we have had extensive public hearings. This report represents the pilot bill dealing with the reform of financial institutions, and hopefully those reforms can be completed during this calendar year.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise under the provisions of the Standing Orders to present a number of petitions to the House today. These petitions, I might add, are from many areas throughout British Columbia: Surrey, North Vancouver, Langley, Delta, Burnaby, Cloverdale, Vernon, Saanich, Victoria, Mission, Sechelt, Abbotsford and many other communities. All of the petitions urge the Minister of Communications to oppose UNITEL's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance communication services.

The petitioners are urging the minister to consult with all of the affected parties, specifically those citizens residing outside Canada's urban areas, whom they believe will be impacted very severely by this form of deregulation. Last, they urge the minister to hold local hearings in communities throughout British Columbia before deciding the fate of Canada's long distance telecommunication system.

CANADA POST

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition under Standing Order 36 on behalf of the residents of my riding of Cochrane—Superior, more specifically the township of Terrace Bay.

The 624 petitioners are strongly opposed to the proposed sale by Public Works Canada of the Government of Canada building in Terrace Bay and the possible closure of the Terrace Bay post office. The loss of the post office would greatly reduce the quality of postal service in their community and would seriously impair communication for business and residents in the area. The post office building has evolved to the point where it is considered to be the hub of activity for the township. Its elimination would result in a reduction in the quality of life in the area.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon the Parliament to stop the proposed sale of the Government of Canada building in Terrace Bay, Ontario.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and honour to present two petitions. One is signed by petitioners from my own constituency, from Albertville, Shellbrook, Meath Park, Paddockwood and Prince Albert, as well as people from Brandon, Manitoba.

These people are protesting the attack by the Conservatives on their rural way of life in Canada, including the abandonment of VIA Rail, abandonment of small rail lines, neglect of forestry and fisheries, cuts to the CBC and so on. Most particularly, they are requesting that Parliament support Canada's rural way of life and support the maintenance of rural post offices and postal services. They ask Parliament to reject the Conservative agenda of cutbacks and closures.

URANIUM MINING

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by a large number of Canadians, including those from Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, Lakefield, Toronto, Kitchener and Ottawa, Ontario and Hull, Quebec.

These people take note of the spill of two million litres of contaminated radioactive waste water at Wollaston Lake in November 1989. They note that the monitoring systems had not been properly inspected by AECB.

Therefore, they are calling for an immediate comprehensive public inquiry into uranium mining in Saskatchewan and northern Canada. They hope as well that an EARP panel be convened immediately to look into the new uranium mine at Eagle Point close to Wollaston Lake.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to table five petitions on behalf of constituents of my riding of Ottawa-Vanier. The undersigned now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right to present a grievance common to your petitioners, in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefor provide a remedy.

These petitions deal with the decision Canada Post made to close down postal station no. 23, located on Rideau Street, which is part of my riding in Ottawa. In the view of these petitioners, it will inconvenience all customers and it will be especially hard on the senior citizens who live nearby to be deprived of an essential service they have been enjoying for a long time.

The undersigned, Mr. Speaker, ask for this decision to be reconsidered and call upon this House to order Canada Post to reconsider its decision to close postal station no. 23, in hope that it will remain open.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of a number of rural British Columbians.

These Canadians believe that there should be a full consultation among all parties affected by any changes in the local and long distance service relationship with the CRTC hearings on UNITEL. The UNITEL bid must be integrated with the development of over-all Canadian telecommunications policy. They are urging Parliament to urge the Minister of Communications to hold local hearings in every community before deciding the fate of Canada's telecommunications system.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I will be answering Starred Question No. 451 in the name of Mr. Fee today.

[Text]

ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Question No. 451—Mr. Fee:

For the last 12 months, what has been the approximate costs of researching and answering Order Paper questions in (a) person-days (b) actual disbursement (c) other costs?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): The time required to prepare answers to questions on the Order Paper forms part of the regular duties of those concerned and as such is not recorded separately.

However, selected questions have shown that the estimated cost in time to prepare and produce answers to ministerial questions (one respondent) varies from approximately $100 to $8,000.

To name a few: Question No. 62 in the name of Mr. Plamondon was $8,000; No. 229 in the name of Mr. Comuzzi was $8,000; No. 288 in the name of Mr. Caccia was $3,500; No. 305 in the name of Mrs. Gaffney was $2,500; No. 341 in the name of Mr. Saint-Julien was $2,500; No. 393 in the name of Mr. McGuire was $500.

It can be said that the cost of answering most of the following shared questions—that is, all departments and agencies—would exceed the maximum cost, $8,000, of answering ministerial questions. There are several examples which I will not read, questions such as No. 34 from Mr. Wappel and No. 470 in the name of Mr. Boudria.

[English]

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Milliken: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have just witnessed the most partisan approach to the answering of questions that I have seen in this House for a long time.

For months and months the parliamentary secretary has stood up on questions that are starred in the Order Paper and said that he would like the answer printed in Hansard as though read. Often there has been no excuse that the answer was too long. Indeed, one of mine was extremely short the other day on the cost of royal commissions—it was three figures—and he had it printed in Hansard rather than reading the answer out in this House.

Today he gives a long-winded answer complaining about the costs of the questions. It was a question asked by one of his own backbenchers. I find it quite shocking that he would take such a partisan approach to the answering of questions in this House.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, first I wish to indicate to my friend that I did not in any way complain about the costs. The reason for reading that particular answer into Hansard is that all members of the House, being very conscious of costs to the Canadian taxpayer, want to be sure that everyone hears those answers and I think, like me might be very shocked that several of those questions cost $8,000 and others would cost more than that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. Finestone (p. 18913).

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate this afternoon. The motion that my colleague from Mount Royal has put before the House is a very appropriate motion. As we know, it deals with the current situation which the CBC faces with the severe financial cutbacks and is a question that must address the future of this corporation in Canada and the future role that it plays in building a unique Canadian identity.

The CBC is an institution with a troubled future. Over the last decade, chronic reductions in the level of funding have left the CBC virtually impoverished and unable to provide for Canadians the truly national presence that is its mandate. The mandate stretches back to the creation of the CBC in 1932 as the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission. A crucial element of this mandate was the recognition of the need to foster a sense of national community and to be able to act as an instrument or a tool which allows Canadians a sense of self. Yet today, Canada remains a nation that is virtually awash in foreign culture.

That is why the preservation of the uniqueness of our Canadian way of life has meant that special consideration has to be given to our cultural industries and to our tools of communication, such as public broadcasting through the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Unfortunately over the last seven years, the actions of the federal government which have been committed to implementing a U.S. style market-driven economy, have seriously reduced the CBC's allocation of resources and hence its ability to adequately fulfil its public mandate. If we go back and look at the budgetary allocations to the CBC, since 1984, when inflation is taken into consideration, we find that expenditures in real dollar allocations to the CBC have been reduced by hundreds of millions of dollars.

There is also in place now a plan to cut back another $140 million from the CBC's operation expenditures over the next four years.

Few organizations can be expected to operate properly when they have this kind of a financial broad axe hanging over its head. That is exactly what this government is expecting of the CBC; to make do with less by either cutting services, which it has already had to do, or to make up the losses by relying more and more on a commercial revenue base, as the CBC has also had to do. This kind of chronic underfunding by the federal government has forced the CBC to rely increasingly on commercial revenues.

In looking at the current situation, approximately 30 per cent of the CBC's revenues are gained through increased reliance on the marketplace. That has seriously compromised the corporation's ability to develop the kind of unique Canadian programming and the unique Canadian broadcasting that is required to have this corporation act as a tool of national unity and an instrument of national identity.

Such reliance on commercial revenues has already, and I submit will continue, to blur the distinction between public broadcasting on the one hand and private broadcasting on the other. Hence, it will continue to blur the distinction of the essence of the CBC. This is not a criticism of CBC management. It is just a reality of the marketplace. It is what is going to happen when you have to rely more and more on commercial revenues. You will have to mimic our U.S. partners, American programming, which has a greater revenue base, attracts more advertising revenue. When you start to mimic that you lose your sense of identity, as the CBC is already beginning to do.

Faced with these fiscal restraints, few options are available to the CBC. Through this gradual submersion into the commercial marketplace, the quintessential Canadian identity of the CBC is being lost. It is being subverted and it is losing its mandate, as I said, to act as an essential tool of nation building.

Soon, if things continue the way they have, all that will remain for this government will be to sell off the pieces to the highest bidder.

Back in 1929 the Aird royal commission on broadcasting at that time concluded that if broadcasting was going to be commercial then it was going to be American. If broadcasting was going to be Canadian, then it was going to have to be public. Back then, Graham Spry, the founder of the Canadian Radio League probably phrased it best when he said, in referring to Canadian broadcasting: "It will either be the state or the United States". I submit that the latter may very well be the consequence for the CBC if we continue with this chronic erosion of public funding.

To their credit, the management of the CBC has tried to make the best out of what is essentially an intolerable situation. Despite the onerous cuts they have presented to the CRTC, the $108 million funding shortfall, and the fact that they have had to slash and basically throw 1,100 workers on to the street, the CBC has simply tried to rationalize as best it can how to operate with this significant reduction in funding levels.

I mentioned the sacrifice of 1,100 jobs, the severing of over 140 local programs, many of which are distinguished examples of what is best about the CBC. Although I disagree with their actions, I understand exactly why they have had to do it. It has been an act that has been brought about, I submit, by a government that is essentially committed to the demise of public broadcasting in Canada.

Mr. Veilleux's choices were brutal as president of the CBC. But what options did he have? In an effort to keep the CBC alive his actions, although necessary, have only served to emasculate the CBC and to facilitate this government's agenda.

The government has tried to hide from it, has tried to hide behind the argument that it has nothing to do with the CBC cuts. That was a board decision. That was a decision of the management of the CBC. The fact remains that those decisions would never have been made if the government had not left the corporation twisting in the wind to the tune of $108 million.

I talked with Mr. Veilleux. I talked with Mr. Watson. I asked them: "How many times did you try to see the Minister of Communications and meet with him to discuss this problem?" Their answer was that the Minister of Communications was invisible, that he would not meet with them, that he never offered them a minute of time in discussing the impact of throwing 1,100 people out in the street and reducing the operations in its 11 regional broadcast centres. The minister would not even take the time of day to meet with the management of the CBC. The government is simply trying to abdicate its responsibility in terms of allowing this corporation to do the job that it is through legislation mandated to do.

The CBC's choices, necessary, unfortunate, tragic, simply reflect the economic dynamics of the day. As Mr. Veilleux pointed out recently in the submission to the CRTC, Canadian society is changing and so must the CBC. The fact is that the choices that the CBC was forced to make reflect new values in our Canadian society. They reflect the neo-conservative market-driven values that have been the hallmark of this administration right from the free trade agreement through the GST and onward. I submit to you, Sir, that those market-driven, social Darwinian values are not reflective of the needs, or the wants or desires, of the Canadian people.

Under the Broadcasting Act which is still empowered, still in force until the royal proclamation of Bill C-40, the CBC may in fact be considered to be in violation of sections of that act. I refer to the revised statutes and this is what it says in referring to the CBC: "The National Broadcasting Service should be extended to all parts of Canada, should be in French and English serving the special needs of the various geographic regions" and last, "should contribute to the development, national unity, and provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity".

The action that the CBC board has had to take in light of the refusal of this government to fund it adequately is that it is no longer able to meet the requirements that are laid out in that legislation. At a time when Canada is a nation at a crossroads, a nation, I submit, with an uncertain future, for this government to unravel and to dismantle what is essentially a critical tool of nation building through our public broadcasting system is absolute heresy.

It makes no sense whatsoever. That is why the restructuring of the CBC services have to be closely examined and revisited. We are doing that now in the submissions that are being made even today at the CRTC hearings.

I would like to applaud the efforts of the CRTC in going ahead to hold those public hearings even though it is admitted that it really does not have any power to force the CBC to change its course of action.

As the federal regulatory agency, I think it does have the ability to send a very strong and unequivocal message to this government, a message that I think and hope will reflect the extent of the public concerned and the outrage that is being presented at the CRTC hearings as we speak in the House today.

The president of the CBC, Mr. Veilleux, was adamant that the management of the CBC would not be responsible for the next round of cuts, which already loom before us; the necessity of cutting yet another $50 million to $60 million and the necessity of cutting yet another 500 to 600 jobs.

He served notice that he and the chairman-designate, Patrick Watson, are no longer willing to serve as scapegoats for this administration.

Earlier in the week at the same hearings, Mr. Veilleux stated that with future funding cuts, the CBC would no longer be able to maintain its mandate. He warned, very clearly, that it would be up to Parliament to decide on the future of Canadian broadcasting. That sounds very much, to me, like a threat of resignation.

Perhaps that is exactly what this government needs in order that it wake up and smell the coffee, in order that it begin to understand the serious nature of these funding reductions that it has visited upon the CBC.

Chairman-designate Patrick Watson just the other day was commenting on the public comments that the Prime Minister had made in relation to the CBC.

In an article here in The Toronto Star, Mr. Watson is saying that the Prime Minister is playing games with the people of Canada in a way that expresses a lofty kind of contempt for all those people who have lost jobs and all those communities that have had service taken away from them. There is even contempt for the process that is going on here in front of the CRTC.

I do not think it is worthy of a Prime Minister. I do not think the management of the CBC is willing to take any more in response to this government's mandate of dismantling and emasculating Canadian public broadcasting. I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that all areas of Canada are concerned about the effects of the cutbacks in the CBC.

I have a letter that arrived in my office today from the office of the Leader of the New Democratic Party in Nova Scotia. It is addressed to the CBC management, and signed by the Leader of the Nova Scotia New Democratic Party, Alexa McDonough. She says: "I am writing with regard to the proposal for a nightly English TV news magazine which was presented to the corporation at the opening of this week's CRTC hearings."

She goes on to talk about the concern of the loss of local broadcasting, and she says: "At the root of many policy disasters in this region is the failure of those in Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal to hear the men and women who catch and process our fish, who tend our wood lots and who work in our pulp mills, who grow our food and who care for our land. It is absurd to imagine that a nightly news magazine program produced in Toronto, regardless of how many maritime reporters it employed could satisfactorily replace Land and Sea", which, of course is one of the local programs that was axed in the round of cuts.

She goes on to warn that the people in this region properly expect that their public television network can and will serve our environment and the people who rely upon our vital resource industries.

That message is coming through loud and clear from Nova Scotia, the Atlantic provinces, Newfoundland, the Yukon, British Columbia, through our prairie provinces. Canadians are upset and angry with the cutbacks this government has visited upon the CBC.

I want to point out that this government is not the only one that should be blamed for the erosion of CBC funding, because it began some time ago. In fact, our Liberal colleagues made the initial round of cuts way back in 1978. They started the ball rolling by cutting back $78 million, which at that time amounted to 12 per cent of the CBC's budget for 1979-80.

I can go on, Mr. Speaker. We look at 1984 when this government first came to power, we see a reduction of $85 million. In 1985 a reduction of $45 million. In 1986 another $48 million. In 1989 we find, phasing over the next few years, a $140 million funding shortfall.

This leaves the CBC with essentially no choice in the matter. If it cannot make up the revenues through government-allocated expenditures, then it has to rely more on the commercial revenues that will shift its focus away from truly Canadian programming to the more Americanized type of programming. These shows, although granted they are popular—and I am sure all of us watch them from time to time—we have to also remember that these shows do not mirror the Canada which we are trying to present and develop in terms of its distinctive Canadian identify.

We have seen the closures of the three stations at Goose Bay, Matane and Toronto, and the reduction of eight other stations to operating essentially as news bureaus.

We have seen a $12 million cut to network TV and only this weekend —and we were discussing this earlier in the House today—the cutting of funds for Radio Canada International. I think it is an absolute disgrace that this government would allow an institution, Radio Canada International, which basically serves as Canada's voice to the world, being completely disassembled by the reduced funding at this level.

Mr. Speaker, I see you are indicating that my time is up. I had much more to add to the debates, but perhaps I will have an opportunity to do so during the questions that follow. I thank you for your time today.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my colleague from the New Democratic Party who just spoke. He said it was a management decision and that Mr. Veilleux would not be responsible for the next cuts. But one could wonder about spendings before 1984. I remember that in 1985 or 1986 the CBC bought a sailboat to cross the Atlantic from Saint-Malo to Quebec City. I think Joël Le Bigot sailed it. In any case, it sank. That was an expenditure. How much did the boat cost the taxpayers? Two, three hundred thousand dollars? Is that our mandate, to by boats for the Saint-Malo—Quebec City race? That is food for thought.

I would like to ask you a question, you who are a champion of labour rights—I too was a union leader, by the way. Did Mr. Veilleux, the president of the CBC, before proceeding to make cuts like those made by GM, ask his employees to reopen their collective agreement as the government of Quebec and the government of Canada did a few years ago? Did he? I do not think so.

I have another question for the hon. member, Mr. Speaker. What did your Party do when Radio-Québec shut down stations in Eastern Quebec? What did the Liberals do when the government of Quebec forced Radio-Québec to shut down stations? Nothing. On the financial aspect, we do not have access to the CBC's internal documents. So, we do not know what expenses are involved, how much was spent on national or provincial events. We would like to have access to these documents to try and find an answer to the problem.

My main question is this: Did you contact Mr. Veilleux, the president of the CBC, to find out if he asked the employees to reopen their collective agreement?

• (1600)

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, the government member has asked whether I would like to see Mr. Veilleux replaced. The answer is that I am not pointing the finger at Mr. Veilleux. I think he has been made a scapegoat for the agenda of this government.

If anybody is to be got rid of, I would hope that it would be our Prime Minister rather than Mr. Veilleux, because he is the one behind these Draconian cuts that are going to dismantle this corporation.

The member wants to talk about fiscal responsibility. He submits that it is fiscally responsible to carve $108 million out of the budget for the CBC. He submits that it is responsible to throw 1,100 people out on the street. He submits that it is responsible to close 11 regional stations.

The government has already had to give $45 million for the decommissioning costs. It is estimated that another $25 million will be required. It is going to cost the people of Canada, the taxpayers of Canada, $70 million in order to save $108 million.

The member says that is fiscal responsibility. I think it is madness.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague is doing such a nice job in this critic area with me. I really appreciate the work he has put in and the collaboration on many occasions. However, there are times when I certainly do not agree with the stance taken.

I am curious, though. I heard him supporting the CBC board and Mr. Veilleux. I understand a sense of sympathy and even a sense of empathy for the role that they had to play, but I am curious to know if he would agree with the following thought. Since they could not meet the public trust and develop the sense of public support for the proposition which they indicated themselves was a destruction of the role of the CBC, how would the hon. member respond to the thought that they should have resigned to have made the point?

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I just want to revisit the argument I made earlier: Mr. Veilleux and Mr. Watson, both relatively new to their positions, should not be the ones who are solely targeted.

They are not without blame, I submit that. I certainly do not agree with the direction that they have taken. I am not defending them but simply rationalizing the process when I say that I think they have tried to make the best of what essentially was an intolerable situation. They have indicated very clearly that should they be forced to make another round of cuts, should they have to take that kind of action, which the government seems wont for them to do, they will reach the point of no return in terms of their own ability to continue to serve.

I agree with my colleague that they have said very clearly the CBC will no longer be able to fulfil its mandate if these cuts are made. I submit that the CBC is already incapable of adequately fulfilling its mandate.

They are not without blame, but I want to refocus the cross-hairs on the appropriate target, that is the Prime Minister this government that is hell-bent for election on the demise of public broadcasting in Canada.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to ask my colleague a question with regard to the very excellent remarks that he made.

Many people are perhaps not aware that CBC coverage in fact had never been able to keep up with the mandate provided to it by Parliament.

For instance, in my constituency of Prince Albert—Churchill River, there are thousands of people who do not receive any kind of Saskatchewan television news coverage. There is no Saskatchewan station on cable systems or rebroadcast systems in many northern Saskatchewan communities. Those people certainly cannot follow the debate on public issues within that province nor see cultural or entertainments shows originating in that province, even though they are supposed to be a part of it. They already feel very isolated, and this just increases the feelings of isolation.

Second, with the closure of the Saskatoon station, it means that those northern communities in my constituency that did receive some CBC coverage through cable or whatever, are now reliant on a CBC signal out of Regina, and northern Saskatchewan news is never covered by that CBC station in Regina. It just does not have the resources to do it.

Virtually half the province is without CBC coverage. Is that the kind of thing we can expect more of? Are northern Canadians just the vanguard?

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, my colleague presents a very valid argument, the essence of which is very clear. When they move away from local broadcasting and centralize the operations with essentially one bureau in each of what they call the regions, which really are the provinces, there is no way the CBC can adequately reflect the values of individual communities within those regions.

For example, we have the situation in Windsor. Windsor is very much like some isolated communities in the northern territories. They are isolated in terms of their geography. Now they have basically lost their only Canadian voice, they feel isolated from the larger community of Canada.

The fact is that in Windsor they are essentially awash in American culture. Over 90 per cent of the programming that comes in is American. The only Canadian signal coming in as a local signal was the CBC outlet in Windsor. Now that has been closed their community values are reflected not through a local station, but through a Toronto broadcast.

Whether it be Windsor in the province of Ontario, Saskatchewan, Alberta or British Columbia where the majority of the population on the coast has very different values and views than some of our interior communities, it is impossible for the CBC to reflect those various community values appropriately.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I will speak for 10 minutes and split the time with a colleague for 10 minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House agree with the suggestion of the hon. member.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Tobin: I am pleased to participate in debate on the motion of the member for Mount Royal which reads:

> That this House call upon the government as a matter of priority to ensure that the CBC be strengthened as an instrument of national identity providing local, regional, and national services to all Canadians.

May I say in speaking to the motion of the member for Mount Royal that the member has certainly done her colleagues in the the Official Opposition, in the Liberal Party, proud. I believe she has provided a tremendous service to all Canadians concerned about the future of the CBC in the way she has consistently represented them and this issue for such a long period of time in Parliament, in committee and before the CRTC.

The very fact that the member found it necessary today to move this motion really speaks volumes about what is happening in Canada. The motion calls upon the government to ensure that the CBC be strengthened as an instrument of national identity providing local, regional, and national service to all Canadians. The Broadcast Act, both the 1968 act and the new act not yet proclaimed, provide exactly that the CBC ought to have a mandate to provide national, regional, and local service.

I am quoting directly from the new act. The words are exactly the same in the old act. They indicate that "the CBC reflect Canada and its regions to national and regional audiences while serving the special needs of those regions". What do the words "special needs"? Who are those special people? What are their special circumstances?

The member who spoke before me talked about Windsor. I agree that Windsor is in a particular situation where its needs are indeed special and important. It is almost isolated, surrounded by that great neighbour of ours, the United States of America. Its connection with the rest of Canada is tenuous, but it is certainly difficult to maintain, particularly when we see the close-down of the CBC station in Windsor.

What about Goose Bay, Labrador, represented by my friend, the member for Labrador? He is the first member for Labrador. An historic position of trust is held by Mr. Rompkey. My friend from Labrador has eloquently told us before the CRTC of the position of the people in Goose Bay, in Churchill Falls, and in Labrador West who occupy a huge sparsely populated land mass and have lost their only vehicle to speak directly to their fellow Newfoundlanders and fellow Canadians. In speaking as he has with such eloquence, the member has reminded us of the special plight of all northern Canadians who need every possible vehicle to speak to their fellow Canadians.

I represent the town of Corner Brook which lost its local station. However, it is not just Corner Brook that has lost a local station. Corner Brook serves an area of some 600 or 700 miles of coast line stretching from Port aux Basques in the south to St. Anthony in the north. It is 600 or 700 miles as the crow flies, in a straight line, but it covers thousands of miles of coast line and hundreds of small isolated communities for whom the CBC is not a luxury. It is not a selection on the channel. It is not a question of taking out the remote and flicking around until something grabs their attention. The CBC is how they find out whether or not they should go out and fish today. It tells them whether the weather is any good, whether they might catch fish or drown in a storm. It is that fundamental. There are no other stations.

The CBC is the only opportunity to speak of the potential and the problems of the people who live in those communities, the people who harvest the sea, who live off the land, who do not wake up in the morning and find six metal boxes containing six national newspapers on their sidewalks, who do not walk down to the drug store and pick up variety of magazines, who do not turn on the radio and go through a selection of Am-FM channels. These are people who turn on their radio and turn on their television and connect to the CBC because the CBC has a mandate to serve them.

The private sector is not there. The private sector is never going to be there, nor should it. There is not a buck to be made. There is not an advertising dollar to be picked up and banked. That is why Parliament mandated the CBC to serve Canadians no matter where they live, no matter what their circumstance.

The greatest irony of all is if we look at the history of the institution. Where did it come from? The notion or the idea of the CBC was born almost 60 years ago. Prime Minister R. B. Bennett, in the middle of the Great Depression in 1931, brought in the Broadcast Act. He understood in the middle of a depression, at a time when the fabric that normally holds a country together is strained, frayed and torn and when the country is having its heart ripped out by the Great Depression, that he needed another instrument to pull this country back together. He envisaged the CBC, and it was born in the Great Depression of 1931.

In the recession of 1991, what does this Conservative Prime Minister do, this inheritor of R. B. Bennett's mandate? Does he understand the need to pull the country together when the ties that bind are strained?

Mr. Pagtakhan: No.

Mr. Tobin: No, Mr. Speaker. He pulls out a huge pair of fiscal scissors and he severs the last remaining strands of the fabric of this country. He cuts off and isolates the people of Corner Brook, St. Anthony, Coxes Cove, La Scie, White Bay and Hampden. He cuts adrift the people of Windsor. He completely severs the people of Labrador. He closes down Calgary, and he says it is all done in the name of fiscal responsibility.

This issue is not going away. It is not just about the 11 television stations, the 150 local programs, the 1,100 staff that have been brutally, mindlessly and stupidly cut adrift. That is not what it is about. It is about a visceral understanding deep in the gut of this country that our institutions are being melted down and are vanishing just as the snow vanishes in the spring. Canadians know that if they do not hold on, if they do not stand up now and stop this meltdown of the institutions that define Canada, then Canada will surely follow the fate of the CBC, VIA Rail, Air Canada, and all the other national services that have disappeared.

I come from Newfoundland. I know my province is not as wealthy as some others. I do not envy those who have greater opportunity than mine. I know that we will never be as wealthy as some others, but I have always know that in some ways, in some areas, notwithstanding the disparity of resources, as a Canadian I was equal to any other Canadian.

I have always known that our health care system was there, giving us a measure of equality. I am not sure whether that will be there in a few years. I have always known that in my retirement I would have the dignity of a Canada pension. If all else failed, my country provided that. I have always known that my children and I would have access to quality education; at least I used to think that. I have always known that I could speak to my fellow Canadian. Even though I lived on an island province 19 miles away from the mainland of of Canada, on the east coast of Canada, through the most vicious storm and the thickest fog our voice could cut and be heard because we had a vehicle called the CBC.

We oppose what is happening to the CBC. We believe the CRTC now must be the voice of the people of Canada who do not have the privilege of standing in this Chamber to be heard. The CRTC must say no, just as the people of Canada are saying no to the meltdown of this country. The sooner that Mr. Veilleux and Mr. Watson, who orchestrated the assassination in the dead of night of 1,100 employees and 11 stations, leave the CBC, the sooner the CBC can be better served by new management.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy listening to my colleague from Newfoundland. He speaks with great passion, great eloquence and makes a lot of sense.

The kind of passion that we have just heard enunciated in the Chamber by the member from Newfoundland is the very kind of passion that we are seeing pouring forth in support of the CBC by groups that are coming to the CRTC hearings from one end of Canada to the other. People are coming of their own goodwill and expense to defend this institution of public broadcasting and to tell the CRTC in no uncertain terms that it has to do whatever it can to turn this government in its tracks and stop the kind of bludgeoning that is taking place to this institution. Let us stop the kind of emancipation that is taking place and the dismantling of a broadcasting system that is more than a broadcasting system. It is very much, in every part, a tool to help Canadians understand themselves, a tool to help us listen to our own Canadian voices.

I want to ask the member, because he touched very briefly on one aspect of the CBC that I think is extremely important, and that is in our international role. As the member knows, Radio Canada International has had a severe reduction in its funding in the latest round of cuts to the CBC. As a result of that, we have almost another 100 people thrown out on the street. This government loves to throw them out on the street. We have a reduction of foreign programming from 14 languages down to 5.

I just want to ask the member to perhaps reflect on what that is going to do to Canada's international reputation and Canada's voice in the world at large.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for his question because this is an area that I touched upon only very quickly.

Let me just say that one would be tempted to suspect that just as the United States, all too frequently in the last year or two, appears to speak for Canada when it comes to foreign policy and, all too often, the Prime Minister, appears to be a bare echo of the Bush league that has been launched south of the border—

Mrs. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Your inferiority complex is showing.

Mr. Tobin: —one really has to wonder whether or not the policy of the Minister of Justice, who is speaking across the way, is that Radio Canada International need not exist in the nine languages that are being cut out because the Voice of America is there. Of course, as long as this government is in power, whatever the Voice of America says we can just say ditto for Radio Canada International. One would presume that would be the policy of the Minister of Justice. She is now making some rather unintelligent noises from her seat, obviously finally discovering, after several hours of debate, some pangs of conscience bothering her in great measure.

I have one other comment for the member. I find it ironic that the former chairman of the CRTC, Mr. Keith Spicer, is now heading up a citizens' forum trying to find out what makes this country sick, angry and upset and what would pull it back together. I want to tell the remaining members of the CRTC, the commissioners now there, that they have within their grasp the ability to excite this country, to turn this country on, to inspire this country in ways that Keith Spicer can only dream about. They can do that by showing the people of Canada that the airwaves truly belong to the people. They do not belong to the NDP, Liberals, Tories, governments or oppositions; they do not belong to the CBC, CTV nor Global. They belong to the people. And the people, somewhere, have a regulator who works for the people, regulating the people's airwaves.

The CRTC can make a statement about Canada, in spite of all the doom and gloom and negative predictions about our future, that shows the people of Canada the system can work. The regulator is there and the integrity of the people on their airwaves can be maintained by simply saying no to the arrogance of the government, the Minister of Justice and the CBC.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, it might be appropriate to start a discussion on the CBC with a piece of poetry. The lines that I have in mind are from The Merchant of Venice where Shylock says: "You take my house when you take the prop that sustains my house". There are scholars in the House who will correct me if I am wrong, but my recollection is that is what he says: "You take my house when you take the prop that sustains my house."

It is appropriate because that is exactly what the CBC is. It is the prop that sustains our house. It is appropriate to use a little poetry because we should not underestimate the contribution of the CBC to the arts in this country. Gordon Pinsent, who is a famous Canadian actor now and a famous international actor, came from my province. Would he be where he is today had it not been for the CBC? Would shows like Codco be on the air? Would troops like the Mummers have grown up? Would drama reflecting the soul of my province be as alive as it is today without the CBC? The answer is clearly no.

That is why it is appropriate to start the discussion with that particular quotation. It seems to me it is the prop that sustains this House. The government may do away with the railway. We never had a railway in Labrador so we are not going to miss it. The government may do away with Petro-Canada, but we will find other oil companies to develop the oil and the gas off our coasts. The government may do away with the post office, and that will make a difference to us. It will make it tough for us, but we will survive. We will be the same as we are without the post office.

But when you tamper with the CBC, you tamper with the last fundamental unifying force in this country. The CBC is the way we talk to each other. The CBC is the way we communicate. This government is responsible for tampering with, and starting to dismantle by atrophy, the last unifying force in this country.

Mr. Watson tells us that he uses this occasion of a budget cut to create a new vision for the CBC. His vision is a window, a regional window whereby Canadians talk to each other. They see through that window and they talk to each other. That is Mr. Watson's new vision. Mr. Watson robs us of our window in the north in order to create his new regional vision.

That is exactly what the CBC was. It was a window that reflected us to ourselves, that told us about each other, a way we talked to each other at the local level. It was also a window through which we expressed ourselves to the rest of Canada and hopefully to the world, but certainly to the rest of Canada.

In creating his new window, he has robbed us of what made us unique, that unique possibility for expression and communication because, as my hon. friend from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte has said so eloquently: "There is no option for us". The private sector does not exist in Labrador. There are no private stations. Why? Because there is no market for them. There is no money to be made.

All the signals we get are from satellites. All the signals we get are sitcoms from the United States and elsewhere. There is no other local vehicle except the CBC.

In the north it is important now that we be able to talk back to the south, to those signals that come to us from the south. If we do not, we are going to be inundated by those signals, swamped by those signals and whatever culture and whatever identity we have will be submerged and eventually destroyed unless we have some way of talking back.

If you think, Mr. Speaker, there are solitudes in this country, and that they are east and west, and that they are French and English, I will tell you about other solitudes. They are north and south. The north believes that the south does not understand what it is all about, that it is on the margin, that it is not important, that it is out there and not really fundamentally part of this country. At a time in the history of this country when there are forces at work tearing us apart, it is essential more so than ever before that we have a local means of making our voice heard in this national debate.

That is what the CBC is all about. If the 30,000 people I represent were here today, they would say the same thing. Not just me; the mayor of Fermont, which is our sister community across the border in Quebec, was at the CRTC hearing the morning before I was there. He said exactly the same thing. If the mayor of Sept-Iles was here, he would say the same thing.

It does not really matter. We are not unique in Labrador except that we are part of the north, except that we are on the margin, except that we need that voice, the voice that CBC was for us. That is why this is so important. We have depended on the CBC.

Let me give credit where credit is due. The CBC, certainly as far as radio is concerned, has been a unifying factor and has reflected our local reality. We cannot say the same for CBC television.

I understand that camera crews have been on the coast of Labrador doing set pieces: a piece on alcoholism, another piece that can be shown at any time that they can slip in for 10 or 15 minutes to reflect that particular part of Canada. But that is not the local day-to-day reality of the Labrador coast. It is the difference between the play-by-play of Bob Cole and the Hot Stove League between periods.

We want the local day-by-day reality reflected in this country now, and that is what CBC region has not done up to now. The track record is not there for us. My people in Labrador know more about what is going on in the St. John's city council than they do about the Goose Bay town council or the Labrador City town council.

The stations at Goose Bay and Labrador City reflected that local reality, created a way whereby people could talk to each other and created a way whereby those Canadians could talk to their counterparts in the south in this debate.

The money saved is minimal. The jobs lost are minimal compared to the importance of those stations to us. As my colleague from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte has said, it is now up to the CRTC as the final court of appeal in the country to recognize the reality of those local stations. As our colleague from Winnipeg said so eloquently and so passionately the other day, the regional vision of Mr. Watson is not going to reach deep into the roots of this country, is not going to reflect the heart and soul of rural Canada, of small town Canada, of northern Canada. Only those local stations could do that.

It is now up to the CRTC, and I hope that this House will reflect it, up to the CRTC to rule that we must not tamper with what is the last and greatest unifying force in this country. We can only hope, and the people who I represent can only hope that the CRTC will recognize that and rule accordingly. If they do not we will have lost out in this great national debate.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I think my friend will agree, one of the delights of living in a democratic country like Canada is that if a manufacturer manufactures an item, it is his privilege to do it, but it is also the privilege of a customer not to buy it if he does not want to.

It is the privilege of a broadcaster to broadcast but it is not an obligation on the part of the citizen to listen to that broadcast. So I find it strange that while we have a—

Mr. Kilgour: We know that, Benno.

Mr. Friesen: I hear the member for Edmonton Southeast mumbling there, and I suspect he is a pretty good supporter of public broadcasting in the United States, maybe more so than he is of the CBC.

Here we have PBS broadcasting from New York State and, as I understand it, fully 40 per cent of their revenue comes from listeners in Ontario. I find it passing strange that the listeners in Ontario seem to be more interested in supporting PBS than they are in supporting some of the broadcasters in Canada.

When I watch the ratings of stations in the city of Vancouver I find that in the evening news the private broadcaster has about 75 per cent of the viewing audience while the remaining 25 per cent is split between the CBC and the other private broadcasters.

I would like to ask the member who just spoke how he can make such an emotional speech about the CBC unifying the country. That could surely only be true if people are watching. But if they are more interested in supporting the PBS in certain areas, and more interested in watching the other channels, then how can that be a unifying effect for the country?

Second, when they do watch CBC I would like to ask you how it could be that watching Hill Street Blues, on CBC or L.A. Law, or any of the other American shows on Canadian television, via the CBC, is a unifying effect for the country?

Finally, I would ask him how he could justify the cost of broadcasting through the CBC which is far higher, and I hesitate to use the proportions, than private broadcasting? How can he justify that in the support of the public broadcaster?

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had been listening, he would have heard both in the remarks of my colleague from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte and in my own, the essential fundamental point that there is no option for us.

We do not have the luxury of watching other stations. We have the luxury of watching satellite signals, but we do not have the luxury of expressing ourselves or talking among ourselves through private stations.

It exists in Ontario and Quebec. It probably exists in British Columbia, but it does not exist where we live. Let us understand that it is a fundamental point. Do not let that escape you. If you take that away, you take away something that cannot be replaced, because it does not exist in the private sector.

It could be that my colleagues across the way want to privatize the CBC. I do not know. Let them say that. I hope they will be honest enough in this debate, if that is part of their agenda, as they have been with other institutions in this country.

I happen to believe that, for us, where I live, in the past, now and in the future the only option for us with regard to local television and expressing our voice nationally is the CBC. That is it. There is no other game in town.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I understand what my friend says about the difficulty of getting a diversity of broadcasting in the regions where he lives.

Is he suggesting that we should forgo the broadcasting of the public system in cities like Toronto and Vancouver, and simply concentrate on the regions?

Mr. Rompkey: All we are asking for, Mr. Speaker, is some fairness in the system.

I cannot pretend to speak for Ontario, British Columbia, Quebec, or any other part of the country. If a public broadcasting system is important in this country—as I believe it is, was and will continue to be—of 25 million or 26 million people spread out over 5,000 or 6,000 miles and if public broadcasting is important as a vehicle to communicate among each other, then it is fair to have access to it from Labrador and other parts of my province. That is what I am saying.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Saint-Maurice.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I jotted down some rules because I wanted to speak to this motion moved by the Hon. Member for Mount Royal.

I could not leave unanswered the absurd statements made by the Hon. Member for Labrador as well as the Hon. Member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte. When listening to the Hon. Member for Labrador, one gets the impression that people in Newfoundland and Labrador have no access to television service in this country. Such is not the case, Mr. Speaker, because on the basis of the statistics in our possession, which by the way are available to any one, 99 per cent of the people in Labrador and Newfoundland own a television set. Well, if 99 per cent of people in Newfoundland and Labrador have their own television sets, Mr. Speaker, they must certainly watch television programming. It is quite untrue and unacceptable to be told today in the House that Newfoundlanders are at a disadvantage by comparison with other Canadians.

We understand that it is this Parliament's duty to provide free and equal access without charge to all Canadians, even those in some remote areas. We understand that. However, Mr. Speaker, our colleagues from Newfoundland are telling us they are at a disadvantage in comparison with other Canadians as far as television programming is concerned. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, when you look at the statistics compiled by the CBC, it is strange to see that nowadays in Newfoundland, not only in St. John's, but throughout the province, and even in small municipalities, 64 per cent of households have cable TV. That figure is pretty considerable. Besides the basic service everyone—that is 99 per cent of the people—can get with an antenna, 64 per cent of households in that province also have cable TV. That is more than in Prince Edward Island, where only 48 per cent have cable TV, than in New Brunswick, and even than in Quebec with 59 per cent.

So if the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte thought he could move us to tears today, he was dead wrong, Mr. Speaker, because with these options, he has access to all the TV stations and radio channels the people in Newfoundland, just like people all over Canada, can choose from.

• (1640)

Mr. Speaker, in this debate proposed by the hon. member for Mount Royal, her colleagues in the Liberal Party and also to some extent in the New Democratic Party have painted a picture which is all black. They tried to tell us that the last chance to save Canadian unity was to add to the $1.4 billion we already give to the CBC.

However, when you look at the figures, and we must, Mr. Speaker, since we need to back up what we say. One should not throw words which have more to do with paranoia than anything else. There is a lot of paranoia in the opposition, but arguments must be based on facts.

The hon. member told us a while ago that the last instrument to save national unity was the CBC. Watching "The National" and "The Journal" was the thing to do. If we don't watch those, Canada can't be saved. Then, Mr. Speaker, what could my friend from Labrador say about the TV watching habits of English-speaking Canadians.

Let us look, for example, at the results of the latest poll conducted by BBM, in the Fall of 1988, on the TV watching habits of English-speaking Canadians. Some 25.8 per cent of their viewing-time was devoted to the English Canadian network CTV; 26 per cent, to English Canadian independant stations; 28 per cent, to the American broadcasting stations, and 18 per cent, to the English CBC.

Mr. Speaker, does that mean, according to what the Liberal members are saying, that for 82 per cent of the time spent watching TV in English Canada, people do not contribute to the national unity? That would mean that most of the time, 82 per cent of the time people in Vancouver, in Montreal or in Saint John's watch an English broadcasting station other than CBC and they are not contributing to the national unity.

I think we have been presented with a false debate today and I find most regrettable that attempts are being made now to make political propaganda or partisan politics out of the current situation of the CBC. It is a fact that we have had to make the best of past mistakes for which we were not responsible. In 1984, our government inherited a debt that all of us, as Canadians, will have to pay for a long time to come.

That problem cannot be settled in 5, 6, 7 or 10 years. We have taken actions that will allow for a gradual reduction of our national debt over the next several years. However, one important thing must be said to the Canadian population. This year alone, Canadian taxpayers across the land will spend 1.4 billion dollars to allow CBC to maintain its radio and television services in French and in English.

It is, a considerable amount of money. As for me, what makes me angry when I hear Liberal members in particular speak on this matter, it is that we have the impression that in Canada there is only Radio-Canada and the CBC. What about the rest? How many times have liberal members stood in the House to speak of the problems plaguing private television stations in Canada, Mr. Speaker?

In my constituency of Shawinigan, people can listen every day to programs on their radio or television, a fact which contradicts what our colleagues opposite say, that our radio and television in Canada is pityful, of poor quality, and that it is not diversified.

Shawinigan is a town of 23,000 inhabitants. A small town similar to others across the country. Every day, the people of Shawinigan can tune in 29 FM radio stations, on cable, in French and English. Not bad for a small town of 23,000. And when they have had enough of radio, because people in Quebec listen to 15 hours of radio weekly, they switch to their favorite hobby, television. Quebecers watch 27 hours of television per week; half the time, they watch programs on CBC. But if the people of Shawinigan or other small towns in Canada can tune in to 29 radio stations on cable—

Mr. Speaker, the people of Shawinigan can also tune in to a grand total of 33 TV stations, a pretty fair choice I would suggest.

I wish one NDP or one Liberal member on the other side of this House would point to one country in the world with a small population of 27 million as we are in Canada, including 7 million in Quebec, where TV viewers and radio listeners have access to such a wide variety of means of communications.

Last November, Mr. Speaker, I went to Belgium, which happens to be a fairly important country in Europe. I turned on the TV and began searching for stations. As I just said a moment ago, cable TV in Shawinigan enables the wiewer to choose among 33 stations, a good selection. As people are wont to do, I began zapping to locate other stations. Well, I got the two stations in Belgium, the RTBF1 network and the RTBF2 network.

Now over to France, Mr. Speaker. Switch on the TV. In terms of population, France is bigger than either Quebec or Canada. You turn on the TV and get Antenne 1, there are three basic stations plus a private station. Four all told.

Mr. Speaker, the CBC alone has 1,600 antennas from coast to coast for French and English TV and radio broadcasting.

These media provide us with information services that are second to none. Of course the CBC network is not the only choice we have to get the good and the bad news. To inform us of all the radio broadcasting services available to us.

The private sector plays an extremely important role in this area. For instance, in the province of Quebec, there is the TVA network which broadcasts a whole series of very high quality public affairs programs.

The Members of the Opposition, either the NDP or the Liberal Party, refer to the service provided by the CBC as though it was the end of the world. The reality is quite different.

In my region, there are three private television broadcasting stations, namely, the Quatre Saisons network affiliate, the CBC affiliate and the TVA network affiliate which, at 6 o'clock, provide us with news bulletins. The news bulletins are prepared by the private sector, something the people in my area do not complain about.

In my own region, we never had a CBC news bulletin telling us that at the corner of the fourth street where the station is located in Shawinigan, there was a traffic jam. I suggest that this type of service can very well be provided by local radio or television stations which belong to the private sector.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, all Hon. Members agree—we clearly said so when dealing with Bill C-40 with which I was very actively involved by moving a number of amendments—that the CBC has a vital and very important role to play.

Mr. Speaker, the government is well aware of that. That is why we raise through taxes in my riding and the whole country a considerable amount of money which is used for only part of our broadcasting system. For the CBC, which is just one element in our system, we raise $1.4 billion in Canada.

I think that that is enough. I find it strange that on just about any matter the Liberals always think we should spend more. We do not spend enough money for this, we should spend more for that, and so on.

I feel, and I say it again because it is important, that $1.4 billion annually is a reasonable amount of money. It is enough and, Mr. Speaker, considering the economic situation, the CBC has a duty to spend this money wisely, because I think those people in the CBC tower on Dorchester in Montreal—excuse me, on René Lévesque Boulevard—should remember one thing: They are spending taxpayers' money.

The other issue, Mr. Speaker, is that the CBC is competing unfairly with the private sector, especially in Quebec but also in English Canada.

In recent years, the CBC's market share of commercials has increased at the expense of the private sector. The Minister of Communications, Mr. Masse, made a surprise statement here in the House, indicating quite clearly that perhaps the whole principle should be reviewed— Perhaps the hon. member for the New Democratic Party would care to hear me out— So the whole principle should be reviewed, and perhaps one way would be to remove commercials altogether.

• (1650)

The motion put forward by my colleague, the Minister of Communications, is an idea that we should be looking at together because, right now, the private sector of Canada, which creates jobs, Mr. Speaker, is going through very difficult times. I would like to hear the NDP and liberal members talk to us more often about the problems faced by private television broadcasting in Canada, they certainly can talk to us about CBC, but they should also mention all the other broadcasters in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to talk very briefly about RCI, our short wave international service. Many Canadians do not know exactly what it is. RCI is Canada's voice abroad which allows millions of listeners in Europe, in Asia, in Africa and in the Middle East to hear from Canada. We expect that the government will soon tell us what it intends to do exactly with this service. The Opposition has already mentioned some further cuts. It is possible, Mr. Speaker, that there may be some cuts. I will probably be the first one to regret it because I think the Canadian government must provide an international short wave service through RCI which is accessible to the largest possible number of people throughout the world.

However, Mr Speaker, we must also acknowledge the fact that Canada is not the only country in the world reviewing its policy with regard to short wave radio service. Radio–Australia is in the process of doing so and so are Radio–Denmark, Radio–Sweden, Radio–Finland. Radio–4 in Belgium is cutting its short wave international service level and is even thinking of doing away with it altogether. RSA, the voice of South Africa, has cut the bulk of its services in French and in English to North America. Radio–Prague, in Czechoslovakia, is in the process of redefining its services as a whole. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because, unfortunately, shortwaves are no longer the modern way of communicating.

Of course, I really think we must keep some shortwave services. Russia, for example. For my part, I wholeheartedly wish the government will maintain our service in the Russian language, because there is one thing we must aknowledge, Radio–Canada International is not listened by only a few hundred listeners in the Soviet Union. In fact, Radio Canada International has a higher rating in the Soviet Union than the CBC here in Canada, which shows how important that service is to us.

Last year, Mr. Speaker, 7,460,000 Soviet citizens listened to Radio Canada International. I believe it is a useful service, and I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to maintain Russian language broadcasting which represent a very important part of RCI's activities. According to a 1987 survey, Mr. Speaker, Radio Canada International had 16 millions listeners around the world. Maybe, in a few days, we will not be able to serve all the international community. However, considering the importance of the Russian broadcasting for the Soviet Union, I really wish it be maintained.

Also, Mr. Speaker, we must recognize that the CBC International German broadcasting for West Germany and East Germany is listened to by only 50 000 people. I wonder why we are still providing this service. If there is a service that should be cut given our priorities, it is that one. However, Mr. Speaker, I think we must keep and even improve our Spanish broadcasting which is widely listened to in Cuba.

During a trip to Cuba, a few years ago, I met many Cubans whose only source of information coming from North America was Radio Canada International, for its waves are very well received in Havana. That is a service which, Mr. Speaker, I think we should maintain. On the other hand, other short wave services could be dropped, or revised as most other average countries like Canada have done—I have mentioned these countries just before—before cutting or reducing the whole of their short wave services.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say to my friend from Mount Royal that her motion, as interesting as it might be, does not reflect the reality, because this government will continue to invest large amounts in its public broadcasting system, and Canadians will still choose between a public and a private system, because we can afford both.

For my part and in the opinion of my constituents, from my riding of Saint-Maurice, I must say, Mr. Speaker, that $1.4 billion represent a appropriate sum which we committed ourselves to maintain this year. I am sure that CBC management will know how to spend that money discreetly while securing the linguistic duality the federal government wishes to maintain and ensuring that official language minorities, anglophone everywhere in Quebec and francophone outside Quebec, will obtain a better service.

This is the rule we applied during the last few years, Mr. Speaker. The English-speaking minority in the Mauricie, Trois-Rivières and Shawinigan area did not have, when Liberals were in power, a local relay for the signals originating in Montreal, Quebec City and Toronto. Now they have. A whole series of French-speaking communities outside Quebec did not have this service. Since 1984, we have worked to give Canadians, from both language groups, access to these services. Our work is not over yet, Mr. Speaker, but we will keep at it. I am sure that Canadian citizens know that we are using their tax money with the utmost prudence and that we try to protect the high quality and reputation of the CBC, renowned around the world.

[English]

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member. I have a question to ask, but before doing so I would like to make a couple of comments.

One would think that this period of national uncertainty would bring about a strengthening of the institutions that bring us together as Canadians. However, during this period of constitutional negotiations the very essence of our national identity—the institutions that reflect our culture, our traditions, our priorities—was and still is being slowly destroyed.

The privatization of Petro-Canada, cutbacks to VIA Rail, closure of rural post offices, privatization of Air Canada, the free trade agreement, the watering down of CBC's role in the development of our national identity have all chipped away at these national institutions that were such an important element in our cultural and practical Canadian way of life. As a result of this government's lack of financial support for the CBC, the CBC was forced to cut back. In cutting back, regional coverage was made to suffer, in addition to a number of other important services.

In my area in eastern Canada a very important element of our culture was brought to an end. For 20 years eastern Canadians watched the program Land and Sea. This show provided eastern Canadians with a reflection of the people, the activities and the culture of the Atlantic area. The program gave the dairy farmer in Malpeque an understanding of the way of life and the problems of the lobster fishermen. It provided the tourist operator an opportunity to comprehend the needs and concerns of the potato farmer. It gave all islanders an outlet to enjoy and understand the diverse priorities that exist in our region of the country.

The dropping of the program Land and Sea has reduced the ability of eastern Canadians to understand ourselves, our identity and our differences and similarities.

Does my hon. colleague not agree that it is totally unacceptable for CBC to cut the program Land and Sea?

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, we could analyze CBC programming and we could take a good look at all this and look at each program individually to decide whether they should be cut or not.

• (1700)

I don't think it is up to the politicians in this House to decide whether or not a program should be heard. Mr. Speaker, in Saint-Maurice—and I am going to talk about what I know—according to the latest BBM survey, 7 per cent of the people listen to CBC Radio's French network. This means that 93 per cent, as far as I know, although the Liberals don't seem to use the same arithmetic—93 per cent of the people in my riding never listen to CBC Radio. I am not saying we should get rid of it. I am saying we should keep all these programs in perspective.

The program mentionned my colleague from Malpeque is special program that we could see. You know, Mr. Speaker, we could have programs on all sorts of subjects. Unfortunately, the CBC must limit itself to a certain number of programs and God knows that, all things considered, it is still a significant number.

Lets' look at Canadian television as a whole. I would remind the hon. member and the people listening to us that it is important to compare Canada with countries with a similar population in order to get a true picture of what Canada produces in terms of French and English television. In those comparisons, ten times out of ten, Mr. Speaker, Canada comes out above average considering the amount of money we invest in our television.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we cannot compare Canada and the United States. It is totally impossible, considering the population pool and existing resources. However, the problem with liberals is that they compare themselves with Americans only when it suits their purpose. You can be sure that when it doesn't, they see the Americans as a bunch of villains. That is their attitude. They would like us to have as much as the Americans have, while the reality is not quite the same.

However, Mr. Speaker, look at countries of Northern Europe like Sweden, Norway and Finland. Look at the Netherlands, which have a larger population than us, and you will see very easily, Mr. Speaker, that we have a national television system, French and English, public and private, which is by far superior to all others systems in the world and offers a wider choice than anywhere else.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the member has made some rather provocative statements here today. One of the comments he made earlier in his presentation was that the CBC should be essentially chastized for going more and more into the commercial market for what he calls unfair competition with private broadcasters in Canada.

I just want to point out to the member that he cannot have it both ways. The fact is that the CBC has had to go more and more into commercial revenues because this government has cut back more and more of its public revenues.

If the corporation were facing fixed costs as any business enterprise does—it faces fixed or increasing costs year after year as inflation takes place—it has to make up that funding somewhere. If it cannot get it from the government, if it cannot get it from the public purse, then it will have to raise those revenues through competition in the commercial field.

I say to the member that he cannot have it both ways. He is complaining that this unfair competition is happening when his government is the very culprit that is forcing the CBC to rely more and more heavily on those commercial revenues.

I would also like to ask the member if he would wish to comment on this point. Earlier in the day the parliamentary secretary said that in fact the CBC was strengthening its mandate, that it was revitalizing its mandate. We find 1,100 people turfed out on the street, 11 regional broadcast centres closed, the cutting of over 140 programs, and the CBC facing another budget cut of $50 million to $60 million and another 500 jobs on the line.

Is this strengthening the public mandate of the CBC?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Saint-Maurice has two minutes.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I would need ten minutes, but you decided to limit my speaking time and that is perfectly understandable.

I think that this question can be answered quickly by saying that the Canadian people cannot be made to watch this or that television station. That is how it works in Cuba, Mr. Speaker. The Cubans watch a particular television station. My hon. friend should know that. In the Soviet Union, it was the same thing, at least until recently. They had to watch a given station. But here, we cannot do that. In English Canada, through no fault of mine or of any other member of this House, the television station the people choose to watch 82 per cent of the time is not the CBC. I have nothing to do with that. It is just how it is, Mr. Speaker. In Canada, 18 per cent of the total English television viewing time is taken up by the CBC, compared to 82 per cent by other stations.

The CTV Network manages to produce excellent programs without public funding. The Canadian taxpayers do not pay one penny to finance that network, except maybe indirectly through Telefilms Canada for some shows. All in all, it is an excellent television network. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell seems to disagree. I can tell him that CTV makes good television and, on top of that, they do it without taking a penny out of our pockets.

What I am saying is that, in a competitive context, we should remember what the Minister of Communications once said, namely that the role of the CBC should be completely redefined and that we should contemplate the possibility for the state-run television to play a role complementary to the existing networks but without having to count on advertising revenues. That is already the case with CBC Radio, Mr. Speaker, and I can see no reason why it could not be the same with television some day.

However, and I will finish on that, we have set clear markers in Bill C-40 to distinguish between the CBC French and English services. Since we are dealing with two different markets, the viewing habits are totally different in each of them, whether we like it or not, and, in that regard, Mr. Speaker, the bill passed by this Parliament will produce dividends in the medium term as well as the long term.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would like to make something clear before we go on. The hon. member just said that the Speaker was restricting his speaking time. I have to point out that the Speaker is a servant of the House and of the Standing Orders and if an hon. member wants to speak for a longer period of time, he just has to ask for the unanimous consent of the House and the Speaker will be happy to comply.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all request the indulgence of the House to share my time with my learned colleague from Edmonton Southeast.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate this afternoon. First, I would like to congratulate my colleague the hon. member for Mount Royal who moved the motion to which I bring the attention of the House:

> That this House call upon the Government as a matter of priority to ensure that the CBC be strenghtened as an instrument of national identity providing local, regional, and national services to all Canadians.

This motion, Mr. Speaker, deserves our support, in fact, the unanimous support of the House of Commons. At the beginning of the proceedings today, at one o'clock, I think, the House was presented with the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages. Mr. D'Iberville Fortier, the Commissioner of Official Languages, who is not an Opposition member nor a NDP member nor a partisan of any sort but rather a servant of this House, precisely says in his report concerning CBC—and I call to your attention, Mr. Speaker, what is said on page 20 of the English version: "In spite of the brave front put on by CBC executives, it is hard to believe that the Corporation will be able to fulfill its current basic mandate. Canadian identity, we fear, cannot be promoted by showing "Dallas" and "L.A. Law" in English and French. The CBC must have a strong national and regional presence. Regional programming has been slashed to such a point that it may never recover".

This is what Mr. D'Iberville Fortier, the Commissioner of Official languages, says in his report tabled here in this House, already a few hours ago.

In the recommendations contained in Mr. Fortier's report, on page 65, we can read the following about broadcasting and more particurlarly about television: "A recommendation to the CRTC on improved access by minorities to broadcasts of House of Commons debates."

• (1710)

Here is the next recommendation: "A recommendation to the CBC on improved services to minority language communities. Result: not implemented. Situation in 1991 will likely be considerably worse than in 1988 because of budget cuts."

This is what the Commissioner of Official languages had to say about this government's broadcasting policy, a government which has cut funding to the CBC and forcing it to reduce its local and regional programming.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Saint-Maurice told us earlier—and I can see him in the House—about the cuts to CBC's funding and he was saying, and I want to make sure I am quoting him accurately, that in Canada we also have private broadcasters and that we should talk about them. I did not have the opportunity earlier to ask questions to my colleague from Saint-Maurice, but I still want to remind him that outside Quebec, there is no private French television station in all of Canada. Not one, Mr. Speaker. Francophones outside Quebec have either access to Radio-Canada services or none at all. As people from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell would say: "We ain't have any." And that's that.

So, as Francophones outside Quebec, we need this tool to preserve our cultural identity and our language, Mr. Speaker.

We talk about local programming. Mr. Speaker, let me give you some examples of what is happening in Ontario. We have the television station CBOFT, in Ottawa, of course, and there is another CBC television station, in Toronto, CBLFT, which serves the greater Toronto, and then one station for Northern Ontario. Now, CBOFT serves the Ottawa-Hull area. CBC has announced that from now on programming in French for all of Ontario would be done out of Ottawa. When Mr. Gougeon, of the CBC, testified before the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, on December 11, 1990, I asked him how they would serve the people in those areas. Or rather it was Mr. Veilleux I had the opportunity to question.

So, before this Parliamentary Committee, Mr. Veilleux answered: "You know, we will serve the people in Ontario through our station in Ottawa." So, I said: "All right." So if that is what they do, how are they going to serve western Quebec, Mr. Veilleux, because right now we have the news—or we had the news—from Ottawa-Hull on the CBC". Here is what he said: "Hull and western Quebec will be served from Montreal". "Fair enough, I said, but how? There is no broadcasting antenna. You will need another antenna if you want all that". From Hull you cannot directly tune in a station from Montreal; it cannot be done, unless of course they are directly linked by cable. Otherwise it does not work, we are out of range, the two cities are 100 miles apart, or 160 kilometres. There is no way to tune in directly. To that he replied: "We can review our plans to see what can be done to serve both audiences".

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, the people in Timmins would hear all about a traffic jam in Gatineau. Imagine what that would do, how logical it would be to have that kind of programming. The CBC management insist on the fact that they now serve a region instead of a locality. They even have a rather loose interpretation of the word "region". For instance, Hawkesbury, in my riding, and Kakabeka Falls, along the Manitoba border, are part of the same region according to CBC. Mr. Speaker, it is like saying—if we transpose that to United States for a moment—that New York, Denver and Atlanta are part of the same region. Distances are almost the same. Hawkesbury is almost as far from Orlando, Florida, as from Kakabeka Falls, Ontario. And yet, they are considered to be in the same region. What do they have in common for programming, Mr. Speaker? Not much, and that kind of programming is not possible. People will get bad services.

Ontario is not the only region to suffer from CBC cuts. I myself welcome young students from the Embrun Secondary School who are visiting Parliament today. These young people know, for example, how important it is to have programs like Génies en Herbe, Smac, Télé-Relais, L'Acadie and other programs produced by CBC. Of course, everything is cut now.

I see the Secretary of State is here, in the House, now, Mr. Speaker. He is a man I rather appreciate and I would like to remind him that he is responsible for linguistic minorities in Canada—as he knows well—and tell him that I trust he will convince his colleagues to do something in order to ensure that CBC maintains its local programming to serve French speaking minorities in Canada, the French speaking Canadians outside Quebec. I agree with Mr. Rolland Beaulieu, the New Brunswick minister who, appearing before the CRTC a while ago, declared that CBC and the federal government must act to correct an unfair situation which leaves Acadians defenceless against assimilation and endangers their very existence.

So, the Secretary of State, who is a sensitive man, and I know he is, when it comes to linguistic minorities, will, I hope, communicate with his colleagues, the Minister of Communications, and particularly the one who sits in front of him, the Minister of Finance, to let them know of the complaints of French minorities outside of Quebec.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Five minute period for questions and comments. The member for Saint-Maurice.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great pleasure to the remarks of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who pointed out a number of problems, and I think all members of this House will always be sensitive to issues concerning official languages minorities, anglophones in Quebec and francophones outside Quebec. We are all very sensitive to those issues.

The member should have listened to the part of my speech where I explained that the French service of the CBC outside Quebec has been considerably expanded in almost all the little towns of English Canada because people were not receiving that service before.

In my area, the English speaking people of Shawinigan could not tune in to CBC programs with a repeater antenna. They have it now. Listen, we cannot have a television station for each village in Canada. We have to be realistic. I saw a while ago the hon. member for Edmonton who, as usual, was nodding his agreement as his colleague said that the French speaking Canadians outside Quebec—it is true that there is no private station. Well, it is a matter of economics. You cannot operate a private station if— There must be a viewing public, Mr. Speaker, to open a private station. However, in Edmonton, my colleague should know about it, beside CBC in French, one can get, through cablevision, the TVA network from Montreal in French which broadcasts a whole series of programs which are different from those of CBC.

In Nova-Scotia, Mr. Speaker, I was in Halifax quite recently, and I saw it in my hotel room, one can watch, beside the basic French service provided by CBC, the television network Quatre Saisons from Montreal, Quebec. There are all sorts of programs which are different. I cannot think of a single Liberal member of this House who would leave for Nova Scotia tomorrow morning to open a private TV station over there. That is not what we are asking them. But the CBC is there and it can be tuned in easily enough in most of these municipalities.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, since 1984 we have extended the coverage of CBC antennas so as to serve the greatest number of small English-speaking localities in Quebec and French-speaking communities outside Quebec.

In that respect I must say that we have no lesson to take from the Liberal Party, for they put a stop to the antenna network expansion. The CBC now has 1,600 antennas right across the country, compared with only 950 in 1982.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): I had no intention to deal with this issue, Mr. Speaker, but our colleague has just said that he has no lesson to learn from the Liberals. I should like to tell him that it is becoming increasingly clear that he has indeed quite a lot to learn from my hon. colleagues. With the national unity crisis Canada is now facing, the government opposite has a lot to learn, and most Canadians share this view.

I should like to tell my hon. friend opposite that assimilation is especially a problem for teens who speak their mother tongue at home but often lose it gradually when they attend school. Such is the reality for francophones outside Quebec.

When I appeared before the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture on December 11 last, I raised the issue of youth oriented television programs produced by the CBC outside Quebec including Smac and Génies en herbe. After all, when young people watching television cannot see themselves, they like to see other young people. Television should mean something to them, Mr. Speaker.

As a francophone outside Quebec, I directed a question and received an answer which I will quote briefly, in view of the limited time available. As reported on page 1871 of the official report of the committee proceedings, I asked how many network programs produced outside Quebec for young people were left and Mr. Gougeon replied that there were none. Period. That is what I was told and such is the sad result of the cuts to the CBC budget. There is almost nothing left for francophones outside Quebec, something hon. members opposite should understand.

[English]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, a greater unity is essential if we are going to survive as a single great nation.

A CBC which respects its regional mandate—I am not saying that it does that now as well as it should—could be a major unifying vehicle to allow all Canadians equally, without regional favourites, to share a cultural heritage which reflects our full national identity.

Those opposite, some of whom detest the CBC, clearly have it in their sights as a candidate for dismantling by denying it funds, or oxygen, as they have done with VIA Rail and other national institutions in the past.

If we can judge from news reports over the weekend, the government wants us to increase defence spending. The headline in one paper today is "Tories Urge Big Increase in Spending on Military."

By the way, the Minister of Transport will know that $13 billion is already being spent on defence in this country. Some of us think that that is not the priority to keep this country together.

The new Broadcasting Act says that the programming provided by the CBC should "reflect Canada and its regions to the national regional audiences while serving the special needs of those regions".

CBC cuts have resulted in the closing of three local television stations, downsizing eight others and cancelling hundreds of hours per year of programs, particularly in local and regional television, thus shutting off the voice input of many of our regions of Canada. It has become impossible for the CBC regions to fulfil their mandate, to reflect the regions to themselves and to one another.

I do not think the CBC is doing well enough in this regional mandate and what is happening now is just going to make it harder. Fil Fraser of Edmonton, the former CBC broadcaster and a member of the Spicer commission has described the CBC regions in the past as "a sham". "The regions are not producing programs because they have no access to the network schedules, and they do not have any money to produce with." What was true several years ago when Mr. Fraser said that is undoubtedly more true today.

There seems to be no end in sight for the CBC's budget cuts as the corporation expects a further shortfall in annual operating resources of almost $50 million by fiscal year 1992-93. The foreseeable strategy for the corporation's survival should be, presumably, further cuts to regional programming.

I might indicate that a friend of mine who works for the CBC tells me that CBC stereo is expected to be the next thing to be cut by this so-called government opposite. It that happens, some of us who listen to it will feel that we have lost a very close friend.

Mr. Lewis: You have got a friend? You never had any.

Mr. Kilgour: I must be getting to these fellows opposite, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): You're rattling them.

Mr. Kilgour: Pierre Juneau, the former CBC president, told the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission that "the CBC has already been put on a steep slippery slope downwards". He linked the latest round of cutbacks to what he called a six-year budgetary onslaught by the Mulroney government.

CBC president Gerard Veilleux has put last year's CBC cuts—15 per cent in jobs with 10 per cent in spending—in stark perspective: He said:

If the Government of Canada were to do what we did, it would reduce the size of the Public Service by 35,000 jobs—

—I interject parenthetically that I think many of those opposite would like to do that and more.

—and they would reduce their expenditure budget by $10 billion.

If the CBC is to remain a vital link between all the regions of Canada and protect Canadians against cultural absorption by another neighbouring country, the CBC should have an assured and predictable income.

The CBC has every reason to ask for stability in its funding. If the government is unwilling to provide the money for the corporation to do its legislated jobs, it should change the CBC's mandate on a national public broadcasting system.

The cabinet's termination of several Radio Canada International services is yet another example of Tory government contempt for the CBC.

For many years, as some members will know, the very existence of RCI has been endangered by cuts to the mother corporation. The service had 193 employees, a budget of approximately $20 million, a financially insignificant part of CBC's budget—1.7 per cent—with transmitters in Canada, Britain, Portugal, Austria, South Korea, China and Japan. RCI disseminates its radio programs all over the world in 14 languages. As of March 31, 93 out of 193 staff, most of whom are located in Montreal, will be declared redundant. All Polish, German, Japanese, Czechoslovakian and Slovak and Hungarian language broadcasts, and half of the Russian ones, all English and French broadcasts except for pick-ups from the CBC and Radio Canada are cancelled.

RCI's audience around the world is expected to drop from 10–12 million now to an estimated 6–7 million and fewer than half of its present listeners would be able to understand broadcasts restricted to English and French.

The cabinet's decision to decimate RCI will be hard to explain to its listeners who would like to know how Canada can be so short-sighted. Since RCI's broadcasts are unavailable—a former RCI employee wrote this part of the speech to the member who is going to lose his seat in the next election—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Hear, hear. Listen to their cacophony of protest.

Mr. Hughes: Who wrote the speech?

Mr. Kilgour: I said a former employee. She is now working with the Official Opposition.

There will not be angry rallies on Parliament Hill, but perhaps more supportive letters of which RCI receives about 40,000 a year. I bet you that is more than the member opposite receives from his constituents. More than 80 countries have international radio services; the British, French and American governments have recently increased their broadcast services abroad for trade, human rights and foreign policy reasons. The BBC World Service and Voice of America are now spending about $200 million yearly on broadcasting abroad while our cabinet has slashed RCI's budget from $20 million to $12.7 million.

RCI has contributed to Canada's image and prestige in the world for more than 45 years, providing a variety of news and information about Canada within an international context, tailored to suit targeted Canadians.

Anyone who understands the history of 45 years of the complex and potentially explosive relations between the west and former communist bloc countries appreciates the accomplishments and the enormous potential of RCI since its inauguration in 1945.

• (1730)

A long-term objective was that of keeping the captive peoples well informed about this country and the world so that they could retain hope, espoir. For millions of citizens in eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, denied any ideas, information and news that could upset the carefully pre-ordained diet prescribed by the leadership there, RCI was a lifeline of information about this country: its democratic institutions, its multicultural communities, its technological, scientific and cultural achievements.

Now, when the young democracies in eastern Europe have begun to enjoy a better environment—censorship is lessened or gone—what do these dough-heads opposite do? They want to cut its budget in half.

How can the government possibly declare "it is time to dismantle the machinery and shut down the transmitters"? The new democracies in Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary are now rebroadcasting RCI programs on their national FM networks. For the near future, RCI had plans to relay, live, its daily broadcasts on the national radio networks in the Ukraine. RCI has extended its contractual agreements with national broadcasters in all of these countries, and the shutdown of the operation would understandably result in bewilderment as to Canadian intentions.

RCI's communication to such countries is that Canada is dedicated to democratic ideals, a country sensitive to its multicultural composition, a message that tends to affect the climate of opinion on which political leaders make decisions. Such feature programs as Innovation Canada introduced listeners to Canadian entrepreneurs, inventors and researchers whose ideas and discoveries are practical and profitable. Earth Watch looks at environmental issues informing how Canadian ecologists and scientists are attacking the problems that could face us all coast to coast. It brings a wealth of information about the events and issues that are making headlines in the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario, the prairies, B.C. and the north, and about native affairs across Canada.

RCI broadcasts in Polish, for example, translate into trade benefits. Some budding Polish entrepreneurs have been contacting the Polish section of RCI asking information about Canadian products, inventions and companies. As a result, a number of Canadian companies have established business contacts in Poland. In view of Canada's effort to expand trade with Pacific Rim countries, the termination of RCI in Japanese in Japan, for example, is difficult for any sane person to comprehend. Has our interest in Pacific Rim countries changed in the meantime?

My time is almost up, is it not Mr. Speaker?

To sum up, Radio Canada International spent many years skilfully and carefully building a system with credibility around the world. It seems that our colleagues opposite are about to cut all that by half now and maybe even more in the future.

[English]

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the member speak. I know that he is from western Canada, and the generalization for western Canadian members is that they are very cost conscious. They want to see most for their tax dollar, and do not like to see money wasted.

I have no real truck for either of the television networks in Canada; I don't watch enough to make an evaluation as to the comparative value of either one of them. However, I do know that both of them have roughly between 90 and 100 per cent penetration into the market. They cover most of Canada. It so happens that the employees of the private network total about 3,800 for total penetration, or 90 per cent penetration of the Canadian market, whereas the public broadcaster has about 10,000 employees. Take away the radio side of it and you still have 7,000 or 8,000, at least double the number of employees for the public broadcaster versus the private broadcaster. Both of them have about equal penetration of the market.

Could the member for Edmonton tell us whether he thinks that is good economics and good buying for the buck.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt there can be efficiencies made in any private or public organization. In the case of RCI, the perception is that by almost halving RCI's budget you have gutted it. It is called critical mass. I realize the hon. member does not have a lot of business experience, or do not believe he has. It is called critical mass and if you get below a certain level, you disappear, much the way I am afraid VIA Rail is probably going to disappear in a few years as well.

There is no doubt there is fat. There is lots and lots of fat in many institutions. I am not denying that. I think the government dislikes the CBC intensely. I have some personal knowledge of that. I think most of the members opposite think they do not get a fair shake from the CBC. Most of those opposite, not just the ones present, would like to get rid of CBC altogether.

The member for Macleod, who is going to lose his seat in the next election, may disagree with that. I was in Macleod last week, Mr. Speaker, and I tell you I will make a wager with the member for Macleod that he is not here after the next election.

Mr. Hughes: I've got news for you.

Mr. Kilgour: The member for Mount Royal wants you to be more polite.

We can talk about efficiencies the way the member for Surrey–White Rock was just doing, but I do not think that is what the government has in mind. What the government has in mind is bleeding CBC to the point where it ceases to be a tool for national unity. I do not know about the south lower mainland, but now is not the time to be gutting Radio Canada International, to be gutting CBC and to be dismantling a lot of institutions across Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Saint–Maurice has one minute and fifteen seconds left.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint–Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I was quite pleased to hear that the hon. member for Edmonton is interested in Radio Canada International, but I was less happy when I learned that his speech had been prepared by a former employee of that agency. I would hope he has a keener interest than that in RCI.

Concerning the Polish language service, I am not aware of any decision by the government, but I have to admit I would be concerned if it were cut. As I said this afternoon in the House, nearly 3 million Polish listen daily to Radio Canada International. I do not think this service should be cut, Mr. Speaker. The minister in charge is not in the House, but I will tell him personally what I think about that.

My honourable colleague spoke of efficiency and good management. Then, he should know that only 50,630 Germans listen to Radio Canada International. I do not think we should spend a fortune to broadcast German programs that nobody listens to. We should cut that services, and we will probably do it.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate, the hon. member for York—Simcoe. I apologize the time is over. On a point of order, the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, you were in the Chair last week, when I asked a question and you gave the hon. member who had the floor a few minutes to answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member for Edmonton–South–East to answer the question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We do not have unanimous consent. Resuming debate, the hon. member for York—Simcoe.

[English]

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us today is one which touches the daily lives of virtually every Canadian. It asks that the national broadcaster of Canada, the CBC, and I quote from the motion: "be strengthened as an instrument of national identity providing local, regional, and national services to all Canadians".

Quite frankly, I am surprised that the members would want to bring this up again today after all of the discussion we have had over the last four months. Actually, we have been debating this particular matter for a number of years. I guess there may be some connection to the fact that there is a lobby group that is meeting here in the House this afternoon. That is probably why the opposition benches are virtually empty as well. There are probably a lot of people over there. That may be the reason, and I do not know if it is a very substantive reason, for bringing this kind of debate up here in the House.

I thought it was important to talk about the mandate that has been given to the CBC and in fact to all the broadcasters in this new legislation. We have heard a lot of rhetoric about what is going on, but I think it is important that we discuss the actual facts.

I think we should also look at the process that has gone through since 1985 when a task force on the future of broadcasting in Canada reported right through until February 1, 1991, when Royal Assent was given.

This long, exhaustive process has had as its raison d'etre the shape of our broadcasting system, and the CBC's role within it. The 1985 report of the task force recognized the vital role that the CBC plays in the lives of all Canadians, but suggested that its activities could be more focused. The government's response to that suggestion was very positive. It acted on a number of recommendations to focus the CBC's mandate on its Canadian contributions.

A new broadcasting policy was put in place in June 1988. It recognized that the CBC was the cornerstone of the Canadian broadcasting system. At the same time, it recognized that the corporation was no longer the only broadcaster. Therefore, its mandate was focused toward reflecting Canada to its audience, and to being predominantly and distinctively Canadian.

That legislation died in the other place when the election of 1988 was called, but new legislation was introduced in 1989. Following extensive parliamentary committee hearings, where the hon. member for Mount Royal played an important and influential role, the bill finally received Royal Assent seven weeks ago.

The question of the role of the CBC has been in the public eye for nearly six years. It has been under examination in Parliament more or less continuously for the past three.

I would respectfully submit that the passage of this important legislation reflects in the strongest possible way this government's commitment to Canadian broadcasting, programming and to the renewal of a vital and meaningful public broadcaster. This new legislation will come into force in the near future.

I think it is appropriate to very quickly point out the important mandate which this legislation places on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Recognizing the enormous contribution of public broadcasting to the creation and exhibition of all forms of Canadian programming, this new Broadcasting Act reaffirms in strong and clear terms the role of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as the primary instrument of broadcasting and cultural policy in Canada.

Time and time again, this government has reiterated its primary policy objective in introducing and passing new broadcasting legislation which will make more and better Canadian programs accessible to all Canadians.

The new Broadcasting Act makes it clear that the CBC is vital in this enterprise. Indeed, it redefines the mandate of the CBC to permit it to better concentrate on this activity. For the first time, it recognizes that other Canadian broadcasters should do their fair share to contribute to a vital Canadian programming industry as well.

The new Broadcasting Act builds this Canadian programming strategy around the CBC. There is absolutely no doubt that the CBC will continue to play its central role as the national broadcaster.

The new Broadcasting Act ensures that the CBC will remain the principal vehicle for cultural expression in Canada. It will continue to serve Canadians by providing a distinctly Canadian viewpoint and a broad range of programming, including news, variety, drama and sports.

The mandate of the CBC as contained in the new act expects the CBC to continue to lead in providing authentically Canadian choices, particularly in popular drama in both official languages. By tradition the CBC has enjoyed an arm's length relationship with the government. In fact, for the first time the CBC's freedom of expression and its journalistic and programming independence are clearly stated in the legislation.

As the national public broadcaster, the CBC is and will remain under the new Broadcasting Act a strong and independent voice and the foremost producer of Canadian radio and television programming.

The new Broadcasting Act reformulates the CBC's mandate to place greater emphasis on the distinctly Canadian character of CBC programming. For the first time this mandate includes specific references to the important role that the CBC performs in reflecting Canada and its regions to national and regional audiences, in providing English and French programming services, in meeting the needs of official language minorities, in reflecting Canadian society in all its aspects, in actively contributing to the flow and exchange of cultural expression; and in all these ways contributing to a shared national consciousness and identity.

Critics have lamented the removal of the phrase "national unity" from the CBC's mandate. Yet there can be no doubt that the objectives, which I have just cited, will indeed contribute to Canadian unity. But how can there be unity without the flow and exchange of cultural expression in English and in French among all regions of Canada? How can there be unity without a shared national consciousness and identity?

The new Broadcasting Act reinterprets the objective of Canadian unity, now in the CBC's mandate, in terms which are more appropriate to a truly independent public broadcaster. The CBC's mandate is refocused to emphasize that its programming should be predominantly and distinctively Canadian, reflecting Canada and its regions to national and regional audiences.

The mandate of the CBC as contained in this new Broadcasting Act expects the CBC to continue to lead in providing authentically Canadian programming choices in both official languages. At the same time, the new act introduces measures governing the corporation's operations and its financial and administrative accountability to government and to Parliament.

It rationalizes the CBC management structure by separating the very different functions of president and chief executive officer from those of the chairman of the board of directors. This division of responsibilities is consistent with the practices that take place in large corporations and dynamic businesses in the world in which we live today. In fact, it is a change which is long overdue.

The chairman is responsible with the board of directors for establishing broad policies and direction, whereas the president is responsible for the day-to-day management of the corporation within the framework established by the board of directors. Both functions are essential and the positions are complementary.

Mr. Watson and Mr. Veilleux have demonstrated their ability to work well together to provide the CBC with the essential combination of creative vision and sound management which a corporation of its mandate and its scale of operations needs and deserves.

Consistent with the new act's recognition that French and English language broadcasting operate under different conditions, and in fact may have different requirements, the new act establishes standing committees of the CBC board of directors to deal with matters related to French and English language broadcasting. The committees will both be headed by the chairman and the president of the CBC so that those committees can discuss different ideas and different programming and different mandates within the over-all mandate of the CBC to encourage exchange of ideas between English programming and French programming.

The new act clarifies the nature of the CBC's accountability to Parliament by bringing under the Broadcasting Act measures previously found in other legislation.

It is abundantly clear, by these actions, enshrined in this legislation that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is a vital instrument of Canada's national identity. Its mandate is a strong, clear declaration by Parliament. The mandate is realistic, having been crafted and defined in today's circumstances, both within the broadcasting industry and for the country as a whole.

I would like for a moment to address the notion that national identity can only be preserved by the CBC providing local community services as well as regional and national services. I want to talk about the local service just for a moment.

The new act recognizes that the CBC is but one voice in many. Everywhere in this land there are other Canadian broadcasters and other choices. Clearly, the CBC does not need to nor in fact should it try to provide every conceivable service in broadcasting. There are other methods of doing this. There are private broadcasters who provide excellent services. They operate at the local level in their own towns and their own communities to provide the service to their individual communities as they see fit.

It may be that the CBC should not try to duplicate already strong local services, but use its resources to fill its legislated national and regional responsibilities.

As members well know, the CBC provides local, regional and national radio service complemented by regional, national and international television service.

In closing, I would like to place on the record the specific mandate of the CBC as contained in the new Broadcasting Act. I believe members will find it provides for a vibrant and meaningful CBC for the coming decade and beyond. It requires that the CBC, as the national public broadcaster, should provide radio and television services incorporating a wide range of programming that informs, enlightens and entertains.

The programming provided by the corporation should be predominantly and distinctively Canadian. It should reflect Canada and its regions to national and regional audiences, while serving the special needs of those regions. It should actively contribute to the flow and exchange of cultural expression, in English and in French, reflecting the different needs and circumstances of each official language community, including the particular needs and circumstances of English and French linguistic minorities. It should strive to be of an equivalent quality in both English and in French. It should contribute to the shared national consciousness and identity. It should be made available throughout Canada by the most appropriate and efficient means and as resources become available for that purpose. It should reflect the multicultural and multiracial nature of Canada.

This mandate for our national broadcaster, the CBC, is unequivocal as to the important role of the CBC in providing programming which will contribute to our shared consciousness of who we are as Canadians, of where we are going and what being Canadian means.

The government is confident that CBC is better equipped today to fulfil this important role. The concerns expressed in this motion, I submit, are unfounded. The new Broadcasting Act gives the corporation both a streamlined mandate and a new corporate structure, both of which will permit the CBC to fulfil its important role in reflecting the Canadian national identity from one coast to the other.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to remind the member that CBC is more than a mere symbol of our country, but it is truly a living institution now almost doomed to failure and death by this government. It ought to continue as a living institution to reflect the collective conscience of all Canadians.

The member indicated that Mr. Veilleux had done a good job. I am trying to paraphrase him.

In appearing before the CRTC, Mr. Veilleux gave the message that the CBC had been unfairly treated by this government, and more harshly than any department of government. If I were to follow the member in his logic, if Mr. Veilleux had indeed done a good job, then he had to follow Mr. Veilleux's comment and advice and admit that the government had made a terrible mistake in allowing this financial situation to happen to the CBC. This, in fact, was also echoed by Mr. Pierre Juneau, a former CBC chief who served for seven years; that unless we move quickly, we may lose the living institution that really has to protect our culture and our soul as a nation.

So, I ask the member a few questions. Would the member agree that Parliament must review the CBC's legal mandate in light of this government's condoning eyes and hands to what CBC has done to its operations, cut 1,100 jobs, cancelled 150 local programs and closed 11 of its 31 TV stations, about one third of its TV stations.

The second question, through you, Mr. Speaker, is how could the member tell the House that the CBC is continuing to serve its mandate when it has now divided regions into provinces?

Mr. Cole: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member mentioned a couple of questions at the end, but I think there are a few things he mentioned related to what I was talking about earlier. If he checks Hansard tomorrow, he will see very clearly that I did not at any time say that the CBC was a mere symbol. I am quoting him quoting me. I did not say that, Sir.

To suggest that it is a living institution, I agree.

Mrs. Finestone: He did not say that either.

Mr. Cole: Yes, he did. Very clearly.

Mr. Pagtakhan: I said it, but it was my own statement.

Mr. Cole: That is right.

I do not think a living institution can just continue running rampant and going in all different directions at any one time. I think we have to accept some realities.

I understand that Mr. Veilleux has said that the CBC was cut and cut more substantively and that we should not allow this financial predicament to be what it is today.

I would like to tell the member: If the government was not in this financial predicament, if it had not been started about 10 years ago when there was another government in power, we would not be in the position where we would have to make cuts. This government has been very consistent in its ability to try and balance its budget, to do something with this deficit. Quite frankly, unless we are able to continue working at that and making cuts to government programs, it is going to be impossible to do that.

The member also suggests that we go back to its mandate. I think the mandate has been very clearly discussed for the past six years. It has been discussed in this House and the other place and it is very clear that there is a new mandate now that will allow the CBC to do the things that we have suggested to make this a better national broadcasting system. I hope to see the CBC flourish to a great extent with a new mandate and a new focus in the future.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I want to bring forward six points. The member does not have to answer them, but if he cares to analyse them, I would appreciate it.

First, I suggest that Canadians are the only people who pull themselves up by the roots to see if they are still alive and breathing.

The primary policy of the CBC was to ensure that we would be more Canadian in our programming. So what does this bill do? It allows for more Americanization of our air waves, which the member did not happen to mention.

The CBC contributes, even at 80 per cent Canadian content at prime time, only 65 per cent throughout the course of the day. So it still has not, with the resources that are at its disposal, been able to reach that 80 to 100 per cent the member was talking about.

Third, as my colleague phrased the question so well: Do you recognize that they have now defined regions as provinces? A slight change in the structure of the tree.

There is no attention paid to minority rights. The member has talked about les francophones hors Québec. He should go and tell the story he just told this House in Regina, Moncton and a few other French communities such as Sept Iles, Matane, et cetera. I suggest that he talk to the private broadcasters to see if they could even possibly want to, let alone financially undertake, reach rural Canada and all its small towns. It is not possible. They should not be asked to fill the same kind of mandate as the public should.

The last point he talked about about was cultural expression in Canada. How are we to do that and have any kind of artistic input when the directive from the CBC has been to cut out all regional programs except news? I know—and I said it earlier—that we may be news junkies. We also have another dimension to our personality.

I would like to know how the hon. member sees it. The CRTC cannot rule because it is not fulfilling either the 1968 bill that is in place or the 1990 bill, if it were to be proclaimed, and the CBC should not be allowed to carry it out because it is in contravention of both bills.

The member should read all the definitions of local, regional and national. He will see where they are in contravention of their own bill. What we really need to do is to send this bill back to the House of Commons, to parliamentarians, everyone in this room, so that we can find an appropriate solution.

It is not the role of the CBC board to determine the public airwaves. Unfortunately it is not possible within the CRTC's mandate to do even what the member is suggesting it do: let the CBC carry on the way it is. The role and the destruction will be irreparable if the government continues.

The hon. member laughed when I talked about the tree that we are busy examining. There will be no roots left. The leaves will wither, as will the branches, and Canada will die and it will be your fault.

Mr. Cole: Mr. Speaker, I have two minutes to answer about eight questions the member put forward.

I am not quite convinced of the analogy that she refers to with the tree and the roots. I think the tree is going to blossom because Canadians want it to blossom. Canadians will show their kind of support. That is the way we need to do it. We cannot force a tree to put down its roots. We cannot force a tree to grow, but we can encourage it by admiring it and by doing all the other things.

The member mentioned some other things with regard to regional and local. I want to mention a particular situation in my area where we have not had local CBC television for a long time.

Mrs. Finestone: You are in Toronto.

Mr. Cole: I am not in Toronto. I am in York Simcoe, north of Toronto. Toronto is a suburb to the south. Nothing is wrong with Toronto. I just want to use an example of the closest television station to me, which is the CBC in Barrie. It is a locally operated station. It provides local news to the communities. We found it very effective. The national and regional news are provided by the main station. It contains the news of local interest. It has become a very popular program. I think that is the way for the CBC to go in the future. It should provide these small stations with the opportunity for local programming, local sponsorship and local mandates. I for one would be very supportive of that type of increase. It would put the responsibility back with the people who require it.

The member mentions that she does not like the idea of the direction coming from somewhere else: from regional, non-provincial, or whatever. Maybe the direction should be coming from the end user, the people who are providing the service. If the people providing that service and the people who are receiving that service feel there is a need, obviously they will support it in that particular area.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to divide my speaking time with the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House in agreement with the suggestion of the hon. member?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Althouse: We are debating the question of the CBC and its role as a national broadcaster. We are also discussing the cuts that have occurred at least twice in the last two years. As a consequence of those cuts, the whole question as to whether the CBC is still considered by this government to be a national broadcasting agency is very much a moot point. The original intention of the CBC to provide communications from sea to sea to sea and to permit all of us in Canada, this vast disparate land, to understand a little bit through listening to radio or through watching television about how other people in other regions live. This is somewhat in doubt with these cuts.

I look at the cuts that have occurred in my own region in the last two years. I find it very difficult to convince myself that somebody up there thinks that we are still part of Canada. The food show has been cut. Agricultural reporting during the noon hour has been cut back dramatically. A number of well-known programs in the Atlantic region and sometimes broadcast nationally were cut such as the Land and Sea program. Country Canada is still going but how much longer? As well the farm business news which was aired on the news channel has now been cut after a very successful run of some 16 months.

It makes us wonder just where the commitment went for CBC. We are finding that there are cuts right across the country. Out of Saskatoon the TV channel there has been taken off the air with these cuts. This means that stories which emanate from Saskatchewan that might be picked up on the national feed no longer have a place to come from except out of Regina. I do not know whether all members of the government realize that Saskatchewan is 700 or 800 miles from end to end. It is pretty hard for one station in the very southern part of the province to cover all of that territory. Saskatoon had a chance of making it possible.

I have a list here in my hand of CBC programs cut in British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and it goes on. There must be 23 or 24 programs that have been cut, some of which were heard nationally.

The cuts have been there. They have been real. They have been progressive. What about the cuts that were made a year ago? We were told by the president of CBC, in defending those cuts, that we still had a lot of regionally programming and a lot of resource programming. We were complaining at that time about the imminent departure of George Price who was a fixture around Parliament Hill and came into everyone's living rooms and kitchens at noon across the country. That voice is now dead. There is nobody reporting on food, agriculture and resource matters from Ottawa to the rest of the country.

Some government members and people at CBC who are defending the cuts say that this is simply taking away ghetto broadcasting. Was the food show a ghetto broadcast show? They are arguing that only a few hundred thousand farmers were interested in the food show, yet the main audience for the food show were consumers. Don't we need food? That is the new authority being granted to the CBC: if it is only as universal as food, it is not important.

How far do we carry this kind of thinking? The most popular show on CBC television at the moment is the news show—The National and The Journal—which takes an hour every night. It has very high ratings. Most of the people who are reported on those shows are some 295 people sitting in this Chamber. They take most of the coverage out of that hour every night. They said that they have been told to cut broadcasting because there are only a few hundred thousand farmers left and there are only 26 million consumers in this country who are not interested in food. Yet a program that basically places forward the names and faces of some, if not all, of the 295 people in this Chamber still continues to get plenty of coverage. I suspect that that would be, from this government's point of view, one of the last places that cuts would be proposed. It is just a question of whose ox is being gored, I suppose.

I have mentioned the various cuts that have occurred. They were step by step. We were told when George Price went that we still had programs like Country Canada and the video programs and the all-news program. In fact, one of the quotations from a letter received almost a year ago, April 6, 1990, from the president of CBC defending the cuts that the government had forced on him at that point, justified laying off Mr. Price not because he was being retired, but by not filling the position. He said this was because there were changes, that times change and that it was time that particular show and format disappeared. He wrote: "Today only a very small percentage of CBC's audience claims farming as an occupation. These farmers get up to the minute information from computers, fax, wire services, all-news television and a variety of other sources, as well as CBC Radio".

Since that time, since this last round of cuts, we can forget about all-news television as one of the sources for farm information because that was one of the things that went this time. Farm Business News which was produced in Regina by Agcom Productions aired its last episode last February 16. It was part of the Newsworld operation. It was the only western and agricultural show that appeared on CBC affiliates and channels. It was on the all-news channel and has now disappeared.

I do not think it is just an accident that the shows being pulled not only represent agriculture, the land and the sea, but they were also produced in the regions. That regional ability to employ technicians, producers, writers and broadcasters is now disappearing.

It is more than just losing the service. It is a question of losing the technical ability in those regions to produce this kind of programming either in CBC or outside CBC. By pulling away this financing and this ability to hold the nation together and to provide the kind of expertise at the regional level, the country is going to be much poorer for it. I think we have lost far more than we are saving with these cuts.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my friend's remarks, he made it sound as though we were presiding over the demise of CBC because of the $100 million cutback. I am sure he is aware that the total budget of the CBC is $1.4 billion and that every year it gets bigger.

I would like to ask my friend from Saskatchewan—and his farming community knows a lot about cutting back, where it has to be done—how he would project that in a budget of $1.4 billion a cutback of $100 million would bring about the demise of that corporation.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, this is the second of those types of cutbacks. It is becoming a habit. If it were only going to be a one-time shot, I am sure CBC could adjust. But each year it makes the cuts, lays off the people and closes the stations. Then it finds at the end of the year that it was not good enough and that it has to do it again the following year.

That is not the way this government has been operating in other areas. It has not had this kind of cutting back in crucial departments. In fact it has been increasing the expenditures in most departments.

Mr. Friesen: Would you repeat that?

Mr. Althouse: We have not seen these kinds of cutbacks in departmental expenditures. The expenditures of this government now are much higher than they were when it took office. They have gone up each of those years. The deficit has gone up. The expenditures have gone up. Expenditures have not been brought down on a continuous curve, the same way that the CBC has been asked to make its cuts in the last couple of years.

If there was an assurance that these were the last cuts, I am sure the country and CBC could make adjustments. They had a cut last year. Then they got this year's cut. How many more years of cutting will it take? Will people who are interested in a career in writing or producing tie into CBC, or will they go south or to Great Britain to do their life work?

This kind of message is sending a lot of good people away unnecessarily. If the government wants to provide some stability to CBC, it should make it quite clear that was the last cut and there will be no more.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask the hon. member what he thinks. If budgets have increased year after year since 1984, how can they be characterized as cuts? If he believes that CBC should be given a blank cheque over other more needy institutions or people in the country, how does he expect people who are taking cuts in social spending and all sorts of other areas across the country, at all levels of government, municipal and provincial levels, to be able to deal with the fact that CBC expects to have year after year after year excessive spending habits?

How does the hon. member expect CBC to be able to carry on with its profligate spending with a blank cheque and not be asked once in a while to use a little bit of good, common business sense?

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that anyone expects the CBC to go on with profligate spending. I believe those were the words the hon. member used. However, I think the public expects their government to make it quite clear to CBC that it still has a role to play in this country. I think the public expects that mandate to be made quite clear.

When they go into a budget each year for two consecutive years and ask for massive cuts, it does not send signals that CBC is going to have a continuing mandate. It begins to look as if there is a policy of attack rather than of sustaining that organization.

As a government it is possible to lay out the guidelines and stick with it. If we are going to have CBC as we all think we should, then they say so. If the budget is going to be frozen, then they should say so. But they should not come in with new budgets every year with a big surprise that there is going to be $100 million cut in consecutive years.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to join in this debate with respect to the future of CBC.

The role of the CBC has been an integral part of encouraging, developing and maintaining the cultural fabric of this nation for over half a century. The cuts that have been made to the CBC in the last couple of years have in fact affected that very fabric.

The cuts that this government has made to the CBC has had an impact in this country. Certainly Canadians have voiced their concerns. In many ridings right across the country including my own—in fact most of them—I am sure members have been hearing comments. I have been receiving both telephone calls and letters from constituents.

It so happens that I recently received a letter from a Moose Jaw resident, Cathy Anderson. She wrote a very eloquent, in fact very passionate letter. I think she outlined very well the feelings and the concerns of many Canadians, including certainly the people in my riding. I would like to read a few parts of this letter that Cathy Anderson has written. She talks first of all of radio:

> I heard the Stamp Club, Just Mary stories, and my first symphony and opera, just to name a few. When CBC began TV programming, I was viewing. With CBC programming there was a certain quality that was ours, the players ours, the production ours, and unconsciously I was proud to be a Canadian.

• (1820)

She goes on to state:

> I think that this is when I first began to have a feeling of being a Canadian, and that all Canadians across Canada were seeing or hearing our own.

She continues:

> So for me CBC represents a reality of a united Canada, and with the CBC cuts I feel it will harm the ability of CBC to bind Canada as a nation. CBC is our mirror and our window.
> CBC is crucial to the Canadian fabric, and to weaken it implies to me the Canadian voice no longer matters to my government.

Actually this was a letter sent to the Prime Minister with a copy to myself.

I think Cathy Anderson sums up very well the feelings of many Canadians right across the country of the cuts and the effect this government has had on the corporation.

One of the concerns about the cuts to the CBC is that regional differences and regional diversification are not going to be represented any more at the CBC. There was a report by the standing committee in 1988 which summarized that. It said: "If the CBC is to function as a genuinely national broadcasting service, then it must be rooted firmly in all regions of Canada. If the CBC ignores the regional nature of this country, its relevance, importance and effectiveness as a national broadcasting service will be reduced".

It is interesting that the cuts which have been effected at the CBC have resulted in those very regional cuts. Many of the programs that reflected the regional diversity and uniqueness of this nation are gone. One of the important factors, certainly for me living in Saskatchewan, which is not a overly populated province, is that it is important for the Saskatchewan message to get out. It is also interesting and important for us to know what is happening in the rest of the country.

Places in the maritimes, like Newfoundland, have lost programs unique to their area just as we in the west have lost programs that are unique to our area. The cuts at the television station in Saskatoon leave Saskatchewan with one television station to cover news broadcasting in the province, that is, the major news broadcasting.

It is hard to believe that a city of 200,000 people, the city of Saskatoon, has lost its television station for local news. That certainly affects people in the northern part of my riding who receive Saskatoon television. They have expressed concern that their local station is no longer reflecting some of the local issues which occur in Saskatoon.

The loss of shows such as the food show have also affected people in my riding. As mentioned earlier, loss of shows such as the Farm Business News which was broadcast on Newsworld, mean people in Saskatchewan are not given full information with respect to what is happening in agriculture in this country.

It is interesting that in the city of Regina there is a major broadcasting station, a beautiful building sitting in Wascana Park with beautiful facilities that is not being used. It has some of the best studios and best facilities in western Canada and it is sitting idle. It is a white elephant, and it is not that old. The purpose of that building in the mid-1980s was to provide regional programming, and to develop and promote some of the culture in that area of the country. It is not doing it.

That is why we have people such as Cathy Anderson writing to me concerned that the CBC is not reflecting the various regions of this country.

If we do not reflect the regions of this nation, what have we got as a nation? In these days, with the concerns over the Constitution and the future of our country, there are many regions and areas that need the support of the CBC to tie the fabric of this nation together. The CBC is unable to do this more and more.

It is unable to reflect those areas so that we can feel that we are Canadian no matter what part of the country we live in. It is important that, as a country, we encourage regional development.

This is one of many directions that this government has taken which is having a direct impact on the regions of Canada. The CBC is one area. It also includes deregulation of transportation, cuts in VIA Rail, post offices, communications. The list goes on. Regions of this country are suffering. They are not being represented or promoted.

If this continues, it does not bode well for the future of our nation as a united nation. There has long been a feeling of western alienation, eastern alienation and northern alienation. Unless there is a concerted effort and a fundamental goal to promote regional development, then we are going to continue to suffer and to have an alienation feeling. The future of the nation is in danger.

As a nation that was born and built on regional development, we seem to have lost that objective. I feel it is very sad. I know that people in my riding feel it is very sad. Canadians right across this nation are lamenting that fact this very day.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I just want to remind the member who just spoke that when he talks about cutbacks, he is using jargon that is actually very misleading.

If he has looked at the evidence at all, he knows that the budget will be bigger next year than it was this year. The proposal before us is that the size of the growth will be less than it has been other years, but they are not in fact cutbacks.

I am glad the member spoke because he mentioned a brand new CBC building in Regina. He called it a "white elephant" that is now sitting empty.

I asked him when the building was put up. His friend over there said it was 1985. If it was built in 1985, it was on the drawing board two and three years before that, and maybe planned four or five years before that.

If the CBC could plan a building roughly 10 years before the so-called cuts came in, is that not a symptom of a fat-cat corporation that is spending money recklessly and deserves to have its budget reined in a little bit in order to be a little bit more conscientious with a taxpayer's dollar.

If a building in Regina can sit there empty because of poor planning and too much money, is it not time that we cut back the authority of the CBC just a little bit so that its growth in spending will slow down?

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, it is no doubt true that the CBC facility in Regina was planned many years ago, before this government came to power, knowing that its objective would be to destroy CBC as a national network. The building is not sitting empty; the CBC still broadcasts its news programs from there. But it is largely empty. It is not being used to its full capacity. The reason that it was built was to provide a facility for regional programming, to highlight some of the cultural and regional aspects of that area of the country. Now it cannot fulfil that mandate.

The member talks about the growth of the CBC. He should go out to Saskatoon and tell the people in Saskatoon that the CBC is growing, and do it in front of the former CBC television station. He should come to Moose Jaw and tell the people that the CBC is growing. When he is there, he can remind them of the cuts of This Week right across western Canada; This Week in B.C. is gone. Sportsline, Down to Earth, Forum, Diversity, Network Night Off, parades, annual sports dinners, and Christmas concerts have all been cut from British Columbia.

In Regina we have lost the food show, which was a national show from Regina. We have lost agricultural programs. In western Canada, the CBC agriculture affairs person, George Price, retired and his position was cut. In fact, his colleagues in the agriculture standing committee were also lamenting the fact that agriculture would no longer be getting the thorough representation that it should. He should talk to his colleagues on that side of the House on the committee and find out if it has been growing.

The member should come to Saskatchewan and tell people that the CBC is growing. It is not growing. It is not being representative. He should tell francophones in Saskatchewan that CBC is growing. The only French network programming in western Canada is on the CBC; one channel on CBC-TV and one channel on the radio, period. That is a service.

Come to Saskatchewan and tell people that the CBC is growing. It is not growing.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to address the motion presented by the hon. member for Mount Royal and to speak on a matter which is of great importance to all Canadians.

I can readily understand the member's concern for the continued strength and well-being of our national public broadcaster, the CBC. I would like to assure the hon. member that the government shares that concern and to ask her to understand that the restructuring of the CBC is not a dismantling of this great public broadcaster; rather, it is a response to changing circumstances and changing times.

There is no question that many businesses and individual Canadians are having to adjust to the present economic circumstances. This is always a difficult exercise but often the result is that one is better equipped for a changed environment. This may well be what the CBC is presently going through.

I would first like to make one thing clear. More than 1,600 CBC transmitters remain on the air serving Canadians from coast to coast. This is something that tends to be forgotten amid all the emotional pleas and cries of woe over the future of CBC. The CBC television service reaches 99 per cent of Canadians in both isolated regions and the large cities in Canada. Those 99 per cent of Canadians continue to receive CBC national and regional television. We have all been made aware that these are tough times. But they are also different times, very different from the 1950s when the CBC was the only channel in town. Different times require different thinking, different approaches, different strategies.

While I admire the hon. member's impassioned defence of the CBC and while I respect her tenacity for keeping the issue of the importance of the CBC alive before this House, I respectfully suggest that the hon. member should recognize that nothing is static and that one should adopt an outlook more relevant to today's environment and circumstances and to the rest of the 1990s.

It would be nice if we as Canadians could afford to say to the CBC: "Okay, here is an additional $100 million for this year. Yes, next year you can count on bigger increases from Parliament". But where is the money going to come from? We live in a time of severe economic restraint. Canadians everywhere are reassessing priorities. They are struggling to live within their means and they must balance their resources.

More importantly, asking the CBC to do all the things the hon. member would like to do, and asking Parliament to give it the money to do all of those things, fails to take into account the real environment in which CBC operates.

To be sure, dreams and ideals are all worth pursuing, but let us be practical. In our pursuit of a vision for the CBC, let us be a little more realistic, a little more modern. To do that, we have to place the CBC's mandate and its recent restructuring into the proper context.

The context is this. Broadcasting is a tough, competitive business that is constantly changing. Money is tight for private and for public enterprises alike and money is tight for all broadcasters, not just the CBC.

If we are going to ensure that CBC continues to provide a strong, quality Canadian television service, let us recognize the reality it finds itself in and embrace practical solutions, practical strategies so that CBC remains the cornerstone, not only of Canadian broadcasting but, indeed, of Canadian culture.

We must change our way of looking at things, of looking at the CBC, of thinking about what it should be doing. There is little to be gained by using old thinking and old solutions to address new challenges and changing circumstances that are vastly different today than even just 20 years ago.

What kind of environment is CBC facing? Well, as Mr. Veilleux explained in announcing the CBC's restructuring; among other things, the CBC has experienced a drop in advertising revenues. It has additional expenses as a result of inflation and of covering unforeseen world events, such as the war in the gulf.

The CBC is not alone. The entire Canadian broadcasting system is facing similar circumstances; rising costs, shrinking audiences, reduced advertising revenues and tougher competition.

Private broadcasters are also facing dramatically rising programming costs and shrinking advertising revenues. People do not watch as much television as they used to and the average television viewing in Canada is one hour less per week than it was ten years ago. Ten years ago there were a total of 103 television stations in Canada. Today, there are 129.

In 1985, CBC Television was watched by 30.6 per cent of the English-speaking Canadian audience. In 1989, this figure had dropped to 25.6 per cent.

Since 1985, the CITY network has lost 21 per cent of its audience.

The cost of programming has more than tripled in the last 10 years.

The shrinking audiences and rising costs have had a profound effect on the Canadian broadcasting system, not only on CBC, but on the private broadcasters as well.

The CBC is but one of many broadcasters that has had to change the way it operates. Other public broadcasters and private broadcasters, too, have been forced to change the way they operate to deal with these pressures. For instance, in 1987, TV Ontario and Access Alberta had to change their programming schedules substantially in response to financial pressures.

Radio Quebec has closed production centres in recent years.

The CTV network had to lay off 10 per cent of its total staff in 1987 in response to rising costs and decreasing revenues.

Private broadcasting's profits totalled 19 per cent of revenues in 1985, and then dropped to just 7.5 per cent of revenues by 1989.

This situation is not unique to Canada. In the United States, the big three networks' share of the viewing audience has plummeted from 90 per cent down to 60 per cent in just over the last 10 years.

The economics of broadcasting is changing. The structure of broadcasting is constantly evolving. This is happening in Canada and all around the world.

This is the reality of broadcasting today. This is the situation that the CBC and other broadcasters must adapt to.

Broadcasters in general, but public broadcasters especially, must adopt new strategies to deal with the ever changing broadcasting environment. This is the situation that Parliament has already faced up to and accepted. That is why Parliament passed a new Broadcasting Act recently. This followed months of consultation, debate, committee hearings, discussions in the media, not to mention a number of studies.

The new act updates the CBC's mandate in a very practical manner that ensures that CBC will be a relevant national and regional public broadcaster, not only for the 1990s, but well beyond.

This mandate reflects the fact that the CBC is not the only broadcaster in Canada today. It is one of many services, each vying for the attention of the Canadian viewing public.

There is a huge, diverse Canadian broadcasting system out there with private, provincial and local cable programming services. The CBC's mandate reflects this reality. The CBC's restructuring reflects all of this.

Indeed, it has been suggested in numerous studies over the last few years that the CBC should be restructured. For example, the Federal Cultural Policy Review Committee proposed quite emphatically that the CBC withdraw from local programming and concentrate its efforts on regional production.

More recently, the Caplan–Sauvageau task force said of CBC's regional mandate, and I quote:

> The time has come for the CBC to send out a psychological message: That it is prepared to re-examine its commitments to a certain level of facilities and even to certain kinds of programming for the sake of a few hours of something more distinctive with higher production values and lower cost per viewer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 6.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 81(15), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply.

Does the hon. member for Mount Royal wish to raise a point of order?

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, because you interrupted the debate, I would like to know if I will have the privilege to ask some questions to the hon. member for Wild Rose, in Alberta? Would that be possible? The debate was supposed to go on until—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but I have to answer no because the Standing Orders are very strict and I will have to put an end to anything that is before the House at 6:45 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, considering the number of votes on the next two bills, I wonder if you would find unanimous consent to apply the vote we have just taken on the concurrence motion to the first reading of the Appropriation Act, Bill C-99; second reading of the Appropriation Act, with clauses 1 to 7 including the schedule, the title and reporting to carry on division; and concurrence in Bill C-99; and third reading. I would ask that all those votes be applied.

We could actually do the same, that is apply the votes just taken, to first reading of Bill C-100, the interim supply bill; second reading of that bill, with clauses 1 to 5 carrying on division, as well as the schedule, the title and reporting to the House; concurrence; and third reading of Bill C-100.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, prior to giving our consent, I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board if he could give the usual assurances to the House that these bills are in their standard form and that there are no extraneous issues which he would want to take in with regard to those items.

Mr. Loiselle: I can give assurance to the hon. member and to this House, Mr. Speaker, that the form of this bill is the same as the bill for other supplementary estimates passed in previous years.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I accept the suggestion of my hon. friend and the concurrence of the Liberal Party.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the House for its indulgence and maybe record my vote with my party in the forthcoming votes.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

FARM INCOME PROTECTION ACT

The House resumed from Thursday, March 21, consideration of Bill C-98, an Act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose, as reported with amendments from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(b), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of Bill C-98, an Act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose.

May I dispense with the ringing of the bells?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, you may find that there is unanimous consent to apply to this division the results of the previous one, but conversely.

[English]

Mr. Riis: I agree, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, it is in reverse, except for the concurrence motion, which would move it forward to the third stage. That would be as the first vote.

Mr. Speaker: Is there agreement?

• (1920)

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, in the interest of saving time, I would not want to have a recorded vote on all of these motions, but I would like to ask the Table to record my votes. My vote on Motion No. 1, no; Motion No. 7, no; Motions Nos. 8, 10 and 11, yea.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The first vote is on Motion No. 1 standing in the name of Mr. Althouse.

The House divided on Motion No. 1 (Mr. Althouse), which was negatived on the following division:

PRIVILEGE

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which arises from an incident that took place after the meeting of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations last Thursday, March 21, 1991.

Briefly, the member for Calgary West rose in the House last Thursday after and put before Your Honour the matter of recorded minutes without a quorum. Mr. Speaker said at that time, and I quote:

> Again the hon. member for Calgary West has raised a matter which I think is properly still a matter for the committee. If his position is well founded, I am sure that some discussion with those who do our printing for us would probably keep the situation under control.

In a nutshell, Mr. Speaker, you reiterated what you have said so many times before: that a committee must resolve problems within the committee.

Last Friday afternoon, the day following the committee meeting, I was informed by an editor of committee reporting that the PMO ordered the minutes of the meeting following Mr. Spicer's appearance removed from the record. In Beauchesne's fifth edition citation 41(1) is quite clear on this matter. It states:

> The control of the House over its publications is absolute.

It goes on in citation 75 as follows:

> Committee reports and the verbatim transcripts of committee hearings are documents published under the authority of the House and are entitled to the same absolute privilege as House documents.

Interference by the Prime Minister's office in the printing of a committee proceeding is contempt of the authority of the House and its committees.

Furthermore, I submit that while this contempt arose from a committee meeting, it has nothing to do with the proceedings of the committee and everything to do with interference in the committee report by the PMO.

As a contempt, it is the Speaker who should permit a motion to be put to the floor. It is not a question for the committee to decide. Should you find that I have a basis of privilege in this matter, Mr. Speaker, I have prepared the appropriate motion and I am prepared to move it.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, those are quite serious allegations. I think there should be some obligation on the part of the member to provide the House with some piece of evidence. He claims to have talked to a clerk who claims to have received an order from the Prime Minister's office. If the member were serious about his question then perhaps he could name names or, if he has a written document to that effect, he could share it with us so we could have it as part of our record and reproduced and in our hands.

It disturbs me that we get into something like this on the basis of something amorphous out there in the world.

I rose in the House a week ago Thursday to make sure that the House was seized of the matter. It is, as you indicated at that time, Sir, a House matter. I do not know of any occasion in my time in this place where "the Prime Minister's office", whatever that is, has ordered the House to do anything or a House committee to do anything.

If one wants to make this allegation, I think one should be prepared to put one's personal reputation on the line and provide some evidence for the allegation.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, as you will recall from my interventions of last Thursday, I was definitely present at the meeting in question, and quite a meeting it was.

I just want to bring one or two items to the attention of the Chair which might assist it in deliberating on this issue.

While it is true, as Mr. Speaker has often said, that committees are masters of their own business, as indicated in Beauchesne's, it is only true provided committees follow the rules set down by this House and its Standing Orders. We know that to be the case as well.

That is why the issue the control of all publications of the House falls within the jurisdiction of the House. That extends as well to the authority of the House over the publications of committees. As far as I am concerned, a transcript of a committee is the same as Hansard. It is the Hansard of the committee, if I can put it that way.

There is a long-standing tradition in parliamentary committees of quorum being defined in two ways. There is a formal quorum for the purpose of voting. There is also what is commonly referred to as mini quorum in our parliamentary jargon. That means to say that at any time when four members are present they can hear witnesses, Hansard or the parliamentary publication of the committee is published and so on, but votes cannot be taken.

The point I am making is that notwithstanding the fact that the committee might have lost its full quorum for a period, if mini quorum were still present a publication of the proceedings was indeed not only in order, but necessary according to our tradition.

The allegation is to determine whether or not interference has taken place with the publication of the report pursuant to the mini quorum which was obviously there.

To that extent I feel that if the issue were brought to the attention of the parliamentary committee pursuant to the prima facie information brought before us today, the committee could be seized of all the details and render a recommendation to the House on the issue.

It is not up to this House at this point to bring forward the clerk of the committee to the bar or whomever else. That is the role of the parliamentary Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. What this House has to decide is whether or not there is a prima facie case of privilege. You will make that determination at some point, Mr. Speaker, and, if you deem there is a prima facie case of privilege pursuant to the allegation made by the hon. member for Nickel Belt, I would submit that the issue can and should be referred to the appropriate parliamentary committee, notwithstanding the remarks that have been made by the hon. government Whip.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I was watching the proceedings on television and heard the allegations of the member for Nickel Belt, which indeed are very serious.

I took the opportunity immediately to ask the Prime Minister's chief of staff, his deputy chief of staff, and his legislative assistant—the three people who would know about this—if in fact it were true. All three have denied absolutely that any of them undertook to do what the hon. member for Nickel Belt has alleged and they are not aware of anybody in the Prime Minister's office besides those who might have.

What we have is a very serious allegation of interference, which is denied by those who would be responsible in that regard so I must dispute the conclusion reached by the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell that there is prima facie evidence on the floor.

There is an unsubstantiated allegation on the floor, an allegation that I wanted immediately to indicate is not one which has any basis in fact, based on my discussions with the people responsible. Perhaps this item might best go back to that committee for consideration. I would not like to see us accept an unproven allegation as having substance, particularly in face of the information I have been able to relay to the House that none of the people in the Prime Minister's office who might have undertaken this are aware of any such suggestion or action.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the member for Nickel Belt has risen on an extremely serious matter. I have listened to the interventions by the chief government Whip and the government House leader.

One of the problems the member for Nickel Belt faces is that normally when a senior member of the parliamentary staff raises an issue, whether it is a clerk of the House or some other person, we usually do not use his or her name because they are not in this House to defend themselves.

We may hear from the member for Nickel Belt later on. This is not an allegation that the member for Nickel Belt makes lightly. He believes, and I think quite correctly, that a member who is in charge of producing the committee Minutes of Proceedings was called by a representative of the Prime Minister's office, whether a senior member or not is not something we know at this time. But it is a very serious allegation and it is a very serious issue.

Are we in a situation where we want to say in the House that a charge was made by a certain staff member and this is that staff person's name? That is a new issue for us, and that is something that we have tried to avoid in the past, to protect those people who work at the table and others who work for the House of Commons.

If indeed the call was made by a member of the Prime Minister's office, that is a very serious charge of interfering with the privileges of this House.

I do not know what method may be used to solve the issue. Perhaps the Speaker could be given the name of the staff person involved. There may be methods that we can use. I would feel very uncomfortable if the government is to stand here and insist that in this House we name the person who is working for the House and use that name publicly. I think there is a real difficulty in this situation if that is what the government is insisting be done.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Nickel Belt shortly. I should indicate to the House that I am deeply concerned about this. I do not know with whom the hon. member for Nickel Belt was speaking. I am not even sure that it would be appropriate for the hon. member for Nickel Belt at this stage to give that name before the House.

I am deeply concerned that this matter has not been taken back to the committee from which it comes. The hon. member for Nickel Belt may be able to persuade me that it should rest here. I am not persuaded at the moment.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of providing any name in this House, but I am prepared to be directed by Your Honour. I could provide Your Honour with the name of the person who came to my office so that the Speaker can in fact do whatever is necessary to verify what I have said in this House.

Should there be a question of privilege, I am prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Speaker: It is acknowledged on both sides of the House that the suggestion or the allegation, as it has been called, is a very serious one.

I have to say that on the basis of a conversation with someone, certainly at the stage it is at this time, is not sufficient to raise in my mind a prima facie case of a contempt of the House or privilege. I am going to ask the hon. member for Nickel Belt to do what I think is the appropriate thing in this case, that is go back to the committee and deal with it further there.

I may very well be interested in what happens at that time, but I think that is the appropriate thing to do. We would be getting on I think very dangerous ground if we proceeded any further at this time. The allegation is very serious indeed. I do not take the allegation lightly, but neither apparently does the government.

I would ask the hon. member and other members to take this back to the committee and perhaps it can be resolved there. That is where it ought to go at the moment. If it cannot be resolved there, then of course it may have to come back here.

NARCOTICS CONTROL ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough–West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–350, an Act to amend the Narcotics Control Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to ensure that any money seized by a Canadian law enforcement body in the enforcement of the Narcotics Control Act is returned to that body for further use in the war against drugs.

A simple example will illustrate the intent of the bill. If, during the course of a drug arrest, narcotics officers seize a suitcase containing $100,000 which was used for the purchase of narcotics, then, after due process of law and conviction, that $100,000 would be returned to the police force concerned, to be used by it in future enforcement of the Narcotics Control Act.

Under the present law, this $100,000 is forfeited to Her Majesty in right of Canada, to be disposed of as the minister of health directs.

My bill is intended to ensure that seized moneys are specifically used in the fight against drugs.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

HAZARDOUS MATERIALS INFORMATION REVIEW ACT

REFERRAL OF SECTION 12 TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations on this motion. I believe you will find unanimous consent for it. I move:

> That pursuant to section 57 of an act to amend the Hazardous Products Act and the Canada Labour Code, to enact the Hazardous Materials Information Review Act and to amend other acts in relation thereto, chapter 24, third supplement, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1985, section 12 of the act be referred to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, and that the committee undertake a comprehensive review of section 12 and submit a report to the House no later than December 1, 1991.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that although the parliamentary secretary said there had been consultations, there were none with independent members, I am sorry to say. Consequently, since there was no consultation, I will have to withhold my consent.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate to my friend that I was advised that a member of the bloc was consulted, and I guess this is one of those cases where they have chosen not to wear the party label but are now independents.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I think that by trying to talk his way out of this, the parliamentary secretary is only making matters worse. The fact is, he refuses to recognize us, and when I refer to independents I include my colleague for the Reform Party who was not consulted either. He should do his homework before rising in the House and saying everybody was consulted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since there is no unanimous consent, the Chair cannot entertain the motion.

[English]

Miss Grey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to confirm also that although we may not have a problem with granting unanimous consent in this area, there may be other areas where consultation does not take place. I think it sets a dangerous precedent. I was not consulted on this, and my friend from the bloc has spoken to that as well. There will have to be other channels opened up.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I will then withdraw the motion and we will not be sending that subject to the committee at this time.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if we need to make that commitment. We all appreciate that this motion is most appropriate, and that the subject matter ought to receive consideration. I would ask my hon. friend to have further discussions and perhaps we could re-visit this later today. I think it is important that we consider this. I am hearing my hon. friend say now that there has been, in a sense, indirect consultation, so there is not a problem.

I would urge that we proceed with this motion with the support of my two colleagues who have just recently spoken.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): If I understand correctly, the parliamentary secretary has withdrawn his motion, so there is no motion before the House at this time.

Mr. Lapierre: Later, later!

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, if there is unanimous consent, of course I would be happy to reintroduce the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, just because he rose in the House and proceeded to do a little song and dance doesn't mean that we were consulted. We are available here, near the curtains, at any time. If the parliamentary secretary wants to consult us, we are available. Then we can talk.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since there is no unanimous consent, the matter is now settled.

GUN CONTROL

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to table two massive petitions signed by over 500,000 Canadians asking the government to legislate stricter gun control laws. In particular, they ask for the banning of all semi-automatic and para-military assault weapons of the type used to kill 14 women at the Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal on December 6, 1989.

This petition was organized by students, family and friends at the Ecole Polytechnique, but the signatures come from all regions of Canada.

In tabling this petition, I have the support of the hon. members for Don Valley North, New Westminster—Burnaby and Rosemont. I have on my desk, ready to give the clerk, four boxes full of the said petitions, but I have another 21 boxes outside in the lobby..

The first petition says that the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to immediately enact laws forbidding anyone in Canadian territory from having in their possession any military or para-military weapon.

[Translation]

And the second petition reads as follows: The undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass legislation now, prohibiting anyone on Canadian territory from possessing an automatic or semi-automatic weapon.

COMMUNITY NEWSPAPERS

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present two petitions. The first petition is from constituents in my riding who are concerned about the unfair increase with respect to the cost of mailing newspapers.

They say that weekly farm community newspapers fill a vital function by providing information on issues of importance to rural communities and that the proposed cuts to the Publication Distribution Assistance Program threatens the existence of these publications. Therefore, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to instruct the government to delay any changes in these mail rates for Canadian farm community newspapers until meaningful consultation has taken place. They are concerned that consultation has not taken place.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from a group of farmers from Saskatchewan who are very concerned about the removal of oats from the responsibility of the Canadian Wheat Board. They call upon the government to place oats under the Canadian Wheat Board and to give oats and barley the same protection that wheat now has under the Wheat Board, namely that those two commodities cannot be removed unless this body, Parliament, does so.

BALKAN STATES

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to this House a petition, certified correct by the clerk of petitions. It contains the signatures of some 612 Canadians who reside in towns and communities like Hamilton, Burlington, Toronto, Lynden, Mount Hope, Lancaster, Dundas, Stoney Creek, Guelph and Grimsby.

The petitioners make five demands. First, that members of the Canadian Parliament immediately recognize the legitimate, democratically elected governments of the republics of Lithuania and establish diplomatic relations with it. Second, they demand that the Soviet Union not annihilate the legitimate government of Lithuania. Third, they demand that the Soviet Union withdraw all of its military forces from Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. Fourth, they demand that negotiations between the Soviet Union and Lithuania begin and ensure that international mediation is provided during the negotiations.

Fifth, the petitioners demand that the members of the Canadian Parliament be aware of their demand that the unconditional international aid to the Soviet Union in the form of credits and feed grains be conditional upon the withdrawal of Soviet troops from the Baltic States and resolution of the Baltic crisis.

MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege, indeed an honour, to present a large petition today on behalf of residents from Sarnia and Cambridge, Ontario, from Sorrento, Salmon Arm, Heffley Creek, Kamloops, Pritchard, Avola, Blue River, Clearwater and Chase, British Columbia. As well, a petition was sent in by Kylee Olund on behalf of students from Rayleigh Elementary School. From Valleyview Junior Secondary, a petition was sent in by Carmel Burke and Rebecca Cameron. Petitions have also been received from Clearwater Secondary School, Sahali Junior Secondary School, a number of apartments in Hamilton, Ontario, and many others too numerous to mention.

The petitioners point out their support for the end of the war in the gulf, their support for peace, and their support for bringing the Canadian troops home from the gulf region. They support peace initiatives for Kuwait and the Middle East generally, support negotiations for peaceful resolutions to the ongoing conflict, and support Canada's role in a supportive military role as opposed to an offensive role.

To be fair, there is also a petition from a number of students at Sahali Junior Secondary School who supported offensive military action on behalf of Canada in the gulf region.

The petitions contain hundreds of names. It is certainly not quite 500,000, as my hon. friend earlier submitted, but we are getting very close.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions I wish to table in the House today, signed by constituents in Ottawa—Vanier who reside at 160 Charlotte and other addresses near the post office, which may be closed any time. These constituents ask the House, through their petitions, to put pressure on the Canada Post Corporation and urge it to review its decision to close the branch at 580 Rideau, supposedly because they are concentrating their efforts elsewhere.

These people claim, and rightly so, that this unwelcome decision will put an additional burden on local senior citizens and that since for many years, they were accustomed to having postal services at 580 Rideau, they would like to see Parliament urge the Canada Post Corporation to change its mind.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

PROJECTED HOUSE BUSINESS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I notice in today's Projected Order of Business that my hon. friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader, has indicated the government's interest in completing the motion on Bill C–79, as well as completing third reading of Bill C–98, and other business.

I want to give my hon. friend a very clear indication that if those are the two orders of business for the day, C–79 and the agricultural bill, C–98, I can guarantee that as far as our party is concerned they will pass. We are prepared to move and complete two pieces of legislation today in the interest that Parliament is going to wrap up tomorrow.

On behalf of my party, the agricultural bill will be completed today as well as the motion on C–79, if that is the business that is going to be conducted today, but only these two items.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I believe this is what is called negotiations on the floor.

The hon. member will know that at the last House leader's meeting there were discussions that we would be proceeding with the rule changes today, and that Bill C–79 and Bill C–98 would be given an opportunity for quick passage this morning.

I appreciate his generosity. However, I am not in a position to negotiate on the floor. As the other party can attest, the discussions that went on previously indicated Bill C–79, Bill C–98 and the rule changes this afternoon.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the very frank response by my hon. friend.

I just want to make it clear that as far as the New Democratic Party is concerned, Bill C–98, the agricultural bill, should pass today. We are prepared to pass it today, but if the government decides that it is not in its interest, so be it.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member is trying to score political points for an audience.

If he wants to negotiate in good faith, we are happy to do it at any time.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I feel I should not have to remind experienced parliamentarians like the parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Kamloops that there is a time and a place for talking and negotiating, and that, until further notice, I must follow the Standing Orders.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

The House resumed from Thursday, March 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre in relation to amendments made by the Senate to Bill C–79, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act, and the motion of Mr. Hawkes (p. 18849).

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to speak on Bill C–79 and the motion that is before the House as a result of the Senate amendments.

The House is aware that at 5.58 p.m. last Thursday, the government moved to try to quickly pass Bill C–79. There was a one–minute debate by the minister introducing it and a 30–second response by the Liberal member for Kingston and the Islands. Then the government Whip moved the previous question which, basically, prevents any member of this House from introducing any amendments.

The government did that with the full knowledge that I had amendments to the legislation as it came from the Senate. I believe that the Senate has closed one loophole, but it has built a much bigger credibility gap. This move will come to haunt this House of Commons and will come to haunt the Senate if this motion is passed without amendment.

I believe that the Senate acted in good faith. It saw in the bill which originally came from the House of Commons that it is possible for a member of this House or of the Senate who was under investigation to go quickly to the Board of Internal Economy or the equivalent committee of the Senate and ask that body to give an opinion on the issue of whether or not that money, service or premise was being used for the proper purposes.

According to the Senate, that created a chance for delay. If a member went to the Board of Internal Economy at the last minute, the board may take four, five or six weeks to render an opinion. Because that opinion had to be given to a judge, a member of Parliament or a Senator could end up delaying the work of a police officer and could prevent a search warrant or some other appropriate document from being served at the appropriate time.

If that was all that a Senate amendment did, that would be an improvement to the legislation. However, the Senate went much further. It took away all obligation on the part of the board to give the opinion to the police officer who was conducting an investigation. A police officer could be aware that the board has given an opinion. The board may have given an opinion to the member that what he or she did was acceptable, but that board may also have given an opinion that what the member of Parliament or the senator did was unacceptable under our rules and under the by-laws that the board will be introducing.

If the board in its wisdom decided that it was not going to issue that opinion to a police officer, we would all live under a cloud of doubt because that police officer in going forward to get a search warrant or something else should, and probably would, indicate that he sought an opinion that was available from the Board of Internal Economy, that the Board of Internal Economy had made that decision but refuses to give it to the police officer.

By making the whole issue of whether or not the board gives its opinion to a police officer discretionary, we put ourselves under a real cloud of doubt. I can bet that if the board refuses to give an opinion on the actions of a certain member, you can be assured that the media and the public will assume that the board is covering up for that member. They will automatically assume that the board's opinion was unfavourable to that member.

We are being asked by the quick actions of this government to vote now on a measure that is only going to cause unnecessary havoc and concern for members of this House in the future. I believe that if an opinion has already been made by the board—we are not talking about delay— then that opinion should be given forthwith to the police officers doing the investigation.

If the board has not made a decision, or given an opinion, then there should be no obligation on the part of anyone to act because then we could be perceived as delaying. But if the opinion is already made by this board or by its equivalent in the Senate, then that should be given to a police officer and that information can be used by the officer as he or she sees fit.

We are not talking about delay. We are talking about making sure that there is no perception whatsoever that the Board of Internal Economy is covering up any possible criminal wrongdoing by a member of this House or that the Senate is doing the equivalent thing with one of its members.

In answer to some questions I asked about this issue on Friday, the government said that all members can be rest assured that nothing devious is going to happen because all parties are represented on the Board of Internal Economy. That is true for this House, but it is also true that as a result of Bill C-79 members of the board are going to have to sign an oath of secrecy. We will not know what happened at a board meeting, whether the government majority on the board used its majority to prevent a ruling from being released to the police. We will never know what has happened.

We cannot be guaranteed that the board will act in the best interests of all members of this House. As I said, every time the board decides not to give an opinion, the public will assume that the member is guilty of some breach.

We have a problem with what we are being asked to vote on today. We have a problem with perception. We have a problem with fairness. That problem becomes even worse when you think about the Senate because at least on the Board of Internal Economy of the House all three parties are represented. In the Senate it is just the Liberals and the Conservatives, people who are unelected, people who never have to face the scrutiny of the public. We saw how cavalier they can be in their treatment of the public purse with their request for $153 a day attendance bonus. Last week we heard the Speaker rule that the method they used to try and guarantee themselves this bonus went against the laws of this land and the rules of the House.

We would have a situation where a committee of the Senate, meeting in secret, could decide that it does not want to issue opinions to police officers and there is nothing that can be done about it.

What we have offered, and I have given copies to the other parties, is a couple of amendments. I will read one of them:

> For greater certainty, if an opinion has been given by the Board in relation to the use by a member of funds, goods, services and premises referred to in subsection 52.6(1), the Board shall provide the opinion to the peace officer forthwith.

That is a reasonable amendment. I have a companion amendment to that to make sure that the law is covered in both clauses and both areas this is referring to. We are not talking about delay. We are saying that only if an opinion has been given by the board already, then it must be given to the police officer forthwith. It is not up to the majority on the board. It is not up to the Senate secret committee to make that decision. The board should be able to live with the opinions it has made and it should make those opinions public.

Unfortunately, the manoeuvring that took place at 5.58 p.m. on Thursday prevented the New Democratic Party from making those amendments in the House. The government is preventing debate on this very important matter. The Liberal Party, through its spokesman, allowed that to happen. We are in a situation now where we are dealing with flawed legislation.

We are dealing with something which will be a time bomb, ticking away, waiting for some member in the future, some senator in the future to be charged.

The whole reason for setting up the committee to review the Parliament of Canada Act was to make sure that we had procedures in place that protected members, but also did not put them above the law, that did not make us above the law, but at the same time, people would understand what the rules of the game are and that we have procedures in place. That is why we are calling for bylaws to be made by the Board of Internal Economy. That is why we are calling for a process where there is an investigation of a member. All of that was to make sure that we got out of the problems we faced in the past.

Now, by a last minute amendment coming from the Senate, and by the manoeuvrings that took place in this House on Thursday evening, we are facing a situation which is taking us full circle, back to where we started a year and a half ago when this committee first started to work.

There have been suggestions by others that there are other ways out of this mess. It has been suggested to me in private that perhaps what the Board of Internal Economy should do as its first order of business is to pass a bylaw that would make all of its opinions public in the case of a police officer's investigation. That is a possible way out.

I have to raise the question: Do we have the same guarantees that the Senate committee would do the same thing? They have no sense of public responsibility. There is no way of dealing with senators who act in arrogance. There is no way of dealing with senators who choose to continue to act in secret.

As members of the House, our obligation is to try and pass the best legislation possible. I think it is important that we have these amendments before this House. If we do not have these amendments before this House, we have no guarantee that members will be treated equally in the future. We have no guarantee that the board will make the wisest decision. A police officer making an investigation has no guarantee that he or she will have access to a board opinion that is ready. A judge has no guarantee that he or she will be given access to that board opinion, all of this because the government wants to act in haste.

The Parliament of Canada Act committee has basically been non-partisan. It has basically tried to resolve its issues. On Thursday of last week the government moved with undue haste. It knew that these amendments were coming. I had informed the government earlier that day that these amendments would be in front of the legislative clerk. It was that same day that the actual wording for the amendment that I read earlier and its companion amendment were produced.

Had the government waited a few hours, had they consulted, the government and the Official Opposition would have known the wording. There was no talk of delay. There was no talk of stalling. We had a legitimate concern with this legislation. We still have that legitimate concern.

Unfortunately as a result of the motion by the government Whip, "That this question be now put", those amendments which would protect members, which would protect the reputation of this House cannot be put before this very House.

I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that you seek unanimous consent of this House that the amendments that I referred to be allowed to be placed on the Order Paper. I would make that a motion at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House agree with the motion by the hon. member for Churchill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We do not have unanimous consent.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I think that states the problem. Here we are in a situation where the Liberal opposition and the government have the amendments. We have a situation where amendments that would clear the reputation of this House—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. I do not understand why the hon. member speaks before the House. In presenting his motion, his time is over.

Questions and comments, the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my comment first of all, I guess to set up the question, arises out of my absolute astonishment that this issue has arisen. There are many duties we have as members of Parliament. It is not possible always for us to follow in detail the intricacies of each bill. It is our responsibility, which we fulfil, to read the legislation and to consider it before we vote.

I had frankly understood that this issue and the issue of Bill C-79 had been settled some time ago. I guess when things head off to the other place we have a sense of it disappearing, usually off into the ether, some time to return without any change.

Here we have a case where the Senate has acted and in which it appears both the Liberals and the Conservatives, who not only dominate the Senate, but there really are no members other than a couple of independents who do not have a Liberal or a Conservative background, essentially six my friend indicates. Essentially it is a Conservative and Liberal institution. That institution sometimes gets public attention, as it did last fall, but here again it interferes with the legislative process and does so for what would appear to me on the face of it to be highly partisan reasons. The Senate amends this legislation which was designed to protect the public interest, and Parliament as well, the public interest in having an independent Parliament along with the public interest that wrongdoing be properly prosecuted; that that very delicate bill, which did provide that balance, has now been altered by the Liberals and Conservatives in the Senate. The bill comes back to this House, and what happens? The Liberals and Conservatives in this House gang up to endorse and rubber-stamp this interference in the will of this House on this bill.

Frankly, it leaves me absolutely mystified. I would like to ask the member for Churchill, who has spoken already so eloquently on this, if he could speculate for us why the Liberals and Conservatives are taking this position. He has been able to participate more carefully than I in some of the discussions and in following the details of this bill. Why would the Liberals and Conservatives want to do this? Why would it not be an absolutely obvious thing that the report to the Board of Internal Economy, or to the committee, would be made available to the peace officer and to the judge?

It seems to me so absolutely obvious, if the interests of justice are to be maintained. How come the Liberals and Conservatives not only have allowed this to happen, but don't appear to be interested in participating in this debate?

Mr. Murphy: The member for Victoria asked me to speculate, to use my imagination. I do not think I have enough time to deal with all the possible scenarios.

But, let me say this, even assuming that there is no attempt at a cover-up, and even assuming that this wasn't just an accident, the problem is that it is much more comfortable for a committee in the Senate, or for the Board of Internal Economy, to make its decisions behind closed doors and not to be accountable to anyone.

People can be very comfortable with that way of doing things. But when there is a police investigation and when a police officer comes to the Board of Internal Economy, and when the police officer knows that the board has made a decision or that the equivalent committee in the Senate has made a decision—that decision is already made, there is no possibility of us delaying anything, or the board or the House being perceived as delaying anything—then I believe that the board has a public responsibility to provide that information.

If it means that the board has to be more careful when it makes a decision, if it means it has to keep clear and accurate records of its proceedings, well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot think of a more appropriate place than for the House of Commons and its committees to keep accurate records.

I believe that if the board has looked at a member's budget and how that member has spent his budget, and it believes that that was not done under the rules of this House, then there should be no question, there should be no discretion, the board should have an obligation to give that information to a police officer and then it is up to the judge and jury to make a decision on the broader aspects of wrongdoing.

If we have a rule in this House that says you cannot spend money in such a way that it comes back to your own pocket, or to your spouse's pocket—and that is indeed happening—then I think the board has to say that that is not acceptable. I think the board has that obligation.

With regard to the question, it may well be that some people are comfortable with the old way of doing things, and maybe some people think the board should not have to be that careful when it makes its opinions. But I think the board does have that obligation.

I have clearly put our amendments in such a way that we can never be charged with delaying the due process of a police investigation.

• (1200)

I have not said that the board must have the right to give an opinion before the police officer can go any further. I have said that the board only acts where the information is ready and where it can present it to a police officer. I am saying that where the information is ready it is not discretionary; it must be given to the police officer. We cannot be perceived in any way, shape or form of being engaged in a cover-up of our own members.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I too have a question for the hon. member.

As the House knows, the other day the government introduced a package of so-called reforms to the Standing Orders, ostensibly to bring democracy back to the House of Commons and that people would perceive democracy to be existing in the House of Commons. In actual fact those of us who understand the orders that govern this House know that the very opposite is the case. It would in fact turn the government party in this House into nothing less than a dictatorship.

I just want to ask the hon. member whether or not the example we have just seen in the House today which arose from procedural manoeuvring in the House by both the government and the Official Opposition over the last couple of weeks is the kind of activity that will ultimately destroy democracy in this House.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I think the member for Beaches—Woodbine has managed to raise some of the other issues that are before the public.

If through procedural gains the government, with the compliance of the Official Opposition, has prevented amendments from coming forward on this very important matter, where we are talking about police investigations of members of this House or members of the Senate, where we see the rules being used to prevent a debate over what are the obligations of the Board of Internal Economy when there is a police investigation, we have to be worried about the over-all agenda and the government's way of doing things.

I may have problems with the rule changes, but we are not debating them at the present time. What I am afraid of—and I think the member who asked the question is aware of it—is that we already had this abuse of the rules. If anything, the rule changes that are coming down perhaps later today or tomorrow in this House make it that much more difficult for myself or some other member who is in opposition to the government or some public group that wants to appear before a legislative committee of this House. Those rules are designed in such a way as to make it more difficult for an opposition member or a government backbencher, as somebody pointed out. For that matter, under the proposed rules legislative committees would not even hear from public groups that oppose government's legislation. That is taken away.

What happened last Thursday at two minutes to six o'clock is unfortunately an indication of where this government goes with all rule changes.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I was looking across the aisle at my hon. friend from Peace River who I suspect was going to make some comments on the important issue raised by my hon. friend from Churchill.

I must say it is with a heavy heart today that we have to be here taking up time when we should be talking about agriculture. As far as I am concerned, farming is the backbone of much of our economy. The farmers are struggling. There is a whole set of issues that ought to be addressed immediately with almost a sense of crisis in some sectors of the agricultural community. We would like to do so but we can only do what the government asks us to do, as you well know, Mr. Speaker, that is to talk about a rather peculiar turn of events regarding Bill C-79.

Before I talk about Bill C-79, I want to say that I can only assume that the government is trying to put a fast one over on the people of Canada. After all, I remember last Thursday. I have just to take a moment to explain last Thursday because it is so germane to the debate today.

Last Thursday we were debating agriculture. It was appropriate. It was a good discussion. There were some excellent debates. As a matter of fact they were some of the most enlightened debates I have heard in this House in a long time. They showed a real concern about agriculture and a want to get on with dealing with these issues.

We had agreed that we would complete report stage of Bill C-98. I left some direction with my hon. colleagues which said "just prior to six o'clock let's wrap up this stage of the deliberations so that the report stage can pass and we can get on with debating agriculture", we thought today. Unfortunately it looks like that is not the case. In other words, we were trying to facilitate the business of the House by wrapping up by six o'clock so that the appropriate votes could take place. In other words, it was in good faith, above the table, honest, and positive. We were trying to do the best job we could as a positive and effective opposition.

Then, out of the blue we get a left hook coming at us.

Ms. Mitchell: A right hook.

Mr. Riis: First of all it was a right hook where the government stood up in a split second and said: "Aha, maybe we can put a fast one over on the opposition", namely the New Democrats. It stood up and introduced Bill C-79 out of the blue. There were no discussions. There had been no consultation. It was out of the absolute blue.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I may remind the hon. member that a question of privilege was raised by the hon. member for Churchill, that the Speaker has already ruled on the incident described by the hon. member, and that the Standing Orders of the House were applied. I would therefore ask the hon. member for Kamloops to be prudent in his comments.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the government may have technically been following the rules, but it tried to sneak one past us. It tried at the last minute, just seconds before the House would normally rise for the day, to introduce a piece of legislation when no one was watching. No one was watching. I am not concerned about us here. There were some opposition members here, but what about the people of Canada? That is who the government was trying to pull a fast one on, not us. We are on top of this.

This is my disappointing comment. My friends in the Liberal Party co-operated with the government. My hon. friend for Kingston and the Islands stood in his place. He usually speaks for 20 minutes. Normally he has a lot of intelligent things to say. He has a contribution to make to debate, so when he stands we always assume we are going to have a full deliberation.

He spoke for only 20 seconds. This was the first time in his life my hon. friend for Kingston and the Islands has ever spoken for 20 seconds. Why? It was to allow the government, as my hon. friend from Churchill has explained, to pass another sneaky motion which would eliminate any possibility of this motion being amended.

Mr. Milliken: We support the bill.

Mr. Riis: That is the point that I am trying to make. My hon. colleague from Kingston and the Islands yells out that they support the government, that they support this. We do not.

We think that there is something very seriously flawed with this particular legislation. My hon. friend from Prince George—Peace River is rattling his head. I can hear him from here, right across the entire aisle.

I know my hon. friends on the government benches find the opposition obstructive. They do not want to have debate in the House of Commons. They do not want to have a reaction to the government's Draconian legislation. They want to slip fast ones through to manipulate the House. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker: the people of Canada are fed up with this government manipulating the House of Commons on behalf of the people of Canada.

Let me get back to the business at hand. I am a member of the Board of Internal Economy. I am proud to be a member of that board. A lot of people in Canada wonder what it is this board does. There has been a veil of questions around this particular board. People ask me what it is we do. I explain what we do and so on. There is an element of jitteriness. We appreciate that we need a group to manage the affairs of the parliamentary precincts and people on that board, in my judgment, work very hard and are very dedicated to the task.

However, there is an element of some question. I put it at that, nothing more than that.

Then the government introduced Bill C-79, and again there was another element of question and concern. What kind of powers are we giving this board? Most of what goes on in there is not in the public purview. Then we see in the legislation—and I supported this legislation up until very recently, with the exception of the point raised by my hon. friend from Churchill—where it says that every member of the board, as soon as practicable after becoming a member of the board, shall take before the Clerk of the House of Commons an oath of affirmation, fidelity and secrecy.

As soon as we start operating in secret, people become somewhat suspicious, for good reason. The one thing we know as parliamentarians is that we want to be up-front. We want to have things on the table. We want to be in the open. After all, we are servants of the people. Whenever we start to agree to do things in secret, people begin to wonder.

Form 3, which all of us on the Board of Internal Economy will sign, says "I"—and you fill in your name—"do solemnly swear or affirm that I will faithfully, truly, and to the best of my judgment, skill and ability execute and perform the duties required of me as a member of the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons, so help me God". It goes on: "I further solemnly swear or affirm that I will not communicate or allow to be communicated to any person without due authority in that behalf any information related to matters of employment and staff relations, tenders, security, investigations in relation to a member of the House of Commons".

In other words, as a member of the board, I will swear an oath that I will not communicate, ever, any investigations in relation to a member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Malone: That is because it would not be right if you did communicate it.

Mr. Riis: I hear an echo. The point is right. To communicate in matters of this perhaps would be highly questionable. However, that is what we agree to do.

What are we saying, then? Let us make sure that we have taken every precaution to ensure that whatever decision that board makes is not only right in terms of the law but is perceived to be right in terms of the law.

The hon. member for Churchill has worked on Bill C–79 from the outset. He has spent literally hundreds of hours examining, analysing, discussing, and in thoughtful introspection in terms of the implication of this legislation. I mean that with all sincerity. He has identified a small flaw in the legislation that came back from the Senate.

He offers the following clarification so the people of Canada will know full well that if a member of Parliament is being investigated by the RCMP there will be no cover–up. There was a concern in the past that there were cover–ups, that the Board of Internal Economy and other investigations were being influenced in terms of being able to allow the RCMP to carry out its investigations effectively.

Again, not only must we be doing the right thing. We must be perceived to be doing the right thing.

The hon. member for Churchill has picked up on a problem with the amendment returned from the Senate. He has suggested:

> That Bill C–79 be amended by adding after line 18 on page 8 the following:
> "52.7(1.1) For greater certainty, if an opinion has been given by the Board in relation to the use by a member of funds, goods, services and premises referred to in subsection 52.6(1), the Board shall provide the opinion to the peace officer forthwith".

Then he suggested:

> That amendment 6 be amended to read as follows:
> "Strike out lines 19 to 29, page 8, clause (2) and substitute the following:
> (2) Where an opinion is provided to a peace officer to subsection (1) or the peace officer has been advised by the Board that an application under subsection 52.6(2) has been made by the member of the House of Commons to whom the investigation relates and the Committee has given an opinion and where an application for a process is made to a judge, the judge shall consider it in determining whether to issue the process."

It is perfectly clear, absolutely clear. It is a straightforward and simple amendment that would rectify any concern about the whole process so that Canadian citizens could feel secure and comforted to know that a fair evaluation will take place by the Board of Internal Economy and that the information will be passed along to the most appropriate persons.

That is perfectly clear, perfectly obvious. It is the right thing to do. Yet the government has, in its mysterious way, taken steps to ensure that this will not take place, that this change will not occur.

Let us set aside the House of Commons because we have a good check and balance system. All members of the House, all recognized parties of the House, are at least represented on the Board of Internal Economy.

In the Senate and its committee, with a similar operation, such is not the case. First of all, we are dealing with people who are not elected by the people of Canada. They have been appointed for a variety of reasons, because they are hacks, flacks, or bagmen, or for some other reason, by the Prime Minister of the day to the Upper House. Only two political parties sit there.

I personally do not have that much faith in the integrity of the Senate of Canada after seeing its decision to try to slip something through the back door. You referred to the thoughtful comments and the decision of the Speaker on a previous occasion, Mr. Speaker. You will only appreciate too well that the Speaker felt it was his job to point out the inappropriateness of the Senate using the back–door routine to try to get themselves a raise.

In other words, if you want to pay yourself $153 a day to show up for work then do it up–front, do it through the appropriate process. They tried a rather devious route and thank goodness the Speaker stood up, pointed that out and said it was inappropriate and unacceptable in a democratic system.

Something similar may be happening here. There is a back–door routine and the government is not permitting what anybody would consider to be a fair, just, or equitable resolution to the particular problem that has been pointed out in the motion coming back from the Upper House.

Not only are we concerned about the process. Why is it that there has been this duplicity between the Liberals and the Conservatives to try to fast–track this piece of legislation so that the New Democrats will not have a chance to clarify the legislation through amendment? Why would they do that?

I do not know. It is that kind of duplicity, that kind of working together to protect one another, which causes us concerns in this party regarding the Senate. Essentially there are only those two parties represented in the Senate. There are some Independents, but basically there are those two parties.

I do not want to start mentioning names. I do not think that would be appropriate. However, we have some pretty cosy arrangements being provided and some secret examinations going on in terms of some of their members' conduct. I do not think the people of Canada have faith in that system. That is why we are saying that it needs to be clarified. Nothing more, just clarified, so that everybody understands what the process is, everybody buys into the process and says: "Yes, this is a decent process. This is a good process. This is an up-front process. This is a just, fair, equitable process".

Why is the government against that? Why would it be against considering something that is so obviously positive and so obviously good?

We have received all sorts of advice from procedural experts. We have received all sorts of suggestions from people who watch this very closely. They say that what the hon. member for Churchill is proposing is probably soft, if anything, but at least it is a move in the right direction. I hate to say this because I have many friends with the caucus opposite and in the Liberal Party, but they have refused to accept this. We can only say that this is a very serious situation.

Tied in with this is the whole matter of changing the way this House of Commons operates, the Standing Orders, and tossing a hundred-plus years of regulation, rule, and tradition out the window to enable the government to implement with minimal opposition, minimal fuss, its oppressive agenda on the people of Canada.

Obviously we will not stand for that, and we are not going to stand for this. We are just not going to turn a blind eye and let these organizations that already work in secret have the legislative authority to make decisions regarding the conduct of members of Parliament or senators regarding police investigations and hold that under some kind of cloud. That is not the way to proceed. I want to speak very positively in support of these two amendments. I think that my hon. friend from Churchill did the right thing when he asked for unanimous consent for the government to now reconsider its silliness and permit consideration of these two amendments.

I would like to think that before we end this debate, we will again make that suggestion. Perhaps it would be appropriate to hear from other members. Many members here have a lot to say about this issue. If necessary, we are prepared to speak all day and all day tomorrow and beyond on this because we just do not feel comfortable at all. As a matter of fact, we would not even consider supporting legislation that is so obviously flawed when my hon. colleague from Churchill has provided a simple amendment which would rectify the situation.

We will continue to discuss and debate this in hopes that eventually the government will see the wisdom of following our advice.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the New Democratic Party House leader, as a member of the committee, would enlighten us as to why we are faced with this unique opposition only by the New Democratic Party. Where is the voice of the Official Opposition, the Liberal Party of Canada?

In the member's opinion, is it a presumption that it may be in government and that it would like this kind of protection when it is in government? Surely, as a new member, I would would like to be disabused of that concept. If, indeed, that is his opinion, then the Canadian public should hear it. Why is the Liberal Party so silent on this issue today? Why is it, in its years of experience, just as the Tories have been governing, when there have been errant members, that the cops should be allowed to go directly into this without any political interference? Cops are not interfered with by ordinary citizens. Why should they be interfered with by politicians?

I want to ask my good friend the House leader of the New Democratic Party to enlighten me, as a novice to this place and to this whole system of politics, why would the Liberal Party be opposed to our amendments?

Please do not disappoint me. Do not tell me the Liberal Party is cynical. I am ready for anything.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, this is a most serious question raised by my hon. colleague. I suspect, just by looking at the faces of all members interested in this issue, that it is a question on the minds of a lot of people. Why are the Liberals involved in what appears to be a very draconian and sinister move to cover up and to establish, in a sense, almost two levels of justice?

Mr. Barrett: Right.

Mr. Riis: One for the people of Canada and a separate one for—

An hon. member: For members under investigation.

Mr. Riis: Well, members under investigation, but members of Parliament and Senators.

I think I speak for everyone in the New Democratic Party caucus when I say that we feel there should be one justice system.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Riis: We can only accept one justice system.

My hon. friend, the government Whip is in his place listening carefully and we look forward to his remarks. I think perhaps, he has a different interpretation of the seriousness of this problem.

We might argue the technicalities and he might feel that in terms of the exact letter of the law, particularly as it applies to subsection 52.7 and 52.6, that technically we are overly concerned. Is it not appropriate that there be no question whatsoever? My hon. friend from Churchill raised this critical question and we might debate how critical it is.

From the fact that it has been raised and no one in the Liberal or Conservative parties have even discussed or argued against it, we can only assume that they are feeling very uncomfortable today.

An hon. member: Shame, shame.

Mr. Riis: They are feeling a part of a process that is going to get us as members of Parliament in big trouble if we give the impression that there are two justice systems. I appeal to my friends across the aisle in the Conservative Party and my colleagues in the Liberal Party to participate in this debate. Then I can determine from their points of view if my friend from Churchill has misinterpreted this amendment. I do not think he has. There is a serious problem of perception, and it is imperative that collectively all of us say that there is one justice system, one for members of Parliament and the people of Canada, and no special treatment for anybody in this country.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear all the applause from the NDP benches. I must say that the hon. member for Kamloops surprises me; he is trying to allege there is some kind of sinister plot going on here, if I can quote his words. This particular bill, Bill C–79, was introduced in this House in June of last year and I well recall that the House leader of the New Democratic Party wanted to put this bill through all stages in one day. It was only the objections of our party which saved this bill from being passed at that time—

Some hon. members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. On a point of order, the hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to June of last year, he will find that it was the New Democratic Party that refused to allow it to go through in all stages. We said there were some flaws; we insisted that it be sent to committee.

Mr. Milliken: Obviously that was not a point of order, and I maintain the position that it was our party that objected to having that bill passed at all stages in its original form in June 1990.

We then had the outraged statements of the member for Kamloops. He said this bill was a travesty and was now opposed to it, because he had seen the good reasons we put forward for opposition to the bill in its original form. The bill was referred to a special committee.

I believe the hon. member for Churchill was a member of that special committee. I think he sat on it throughout the summer. The government Whip says it was only half the time but nevertheless I understand he appeared at the committee and took part in its deliberations. The committee reported to this House in November 1990 and recommended some very worth-while changes to the bill. Those changes were agreed upon and the bill was passed on November 30 in this House.

Now the bill has come back from the Senate with a couple of amendments which are technical in nature which we in our party support. I stood up the other day when the Senate amendments were moved for second reading and indicated my support and the support of our party for those amendments. We stand by that support.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Milliken: I didn't hear anything in what the hon. member for Kamloops said that indicated that support was withdrawn by his party. He supports those amendments also.

What I understand is that the member for Churchill has had a death-bed repentance of some kind and thinks he has to make more amendments because he somehow feels left out.

I say to the hon. member for Kamloops, who supported this bill on his own admission until the other day, that he should be standing up praising the government and allowing this bill to go through. Everyone agrees with it. The only person who has a problem is the hon. member for Churchill, and we all saw how he behaved the other day when he found that he was not going to be able to move his amendments.

Furthermore, I suggest that the hon. member for Kamloops knows full well that it would be out of order for the hon. member for Churchill to move amendments to this bill at this stage. The bill has been amended and passed in this House. The Senate amendments only are before us; we cannot provide other amendments at this stage to this bill. The hon. member for Kamloops knows that and I suggest he stand up right now and admit it. This whole thing is a facade and a fraud that he is trying to put over on this House and convince the Canadian people that somehow there is some kind of cover-up going on here, which there is not.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, methinks my hon. friend protesteth too much. He gets a little excited. We must have touched a bit of a nerve when we suggested that.

Let me explain what actually happened, because obviously my hon. friend was missing during part of the deliberations.

We are not debating a bill, we are debating a motion. My hon. friend should know that. Consequently when he said that we supported Bill C-79, we are not talking about Bill C-79 today.

• (1230)

We are talking about a motion referring to Bill C-79 today. He knows better than that, but is obviously trying to cover some tracks that are pretty murky at the moment.

While we supported Bill C-79—

An hon. member: Before it was amended.

Mr. Riis: Before it was amended by your friends in the Senate, yes, we supported Bill C-79. It was then altered and we do not support the alteration. From the day it came back from the Senate, my hon. colleague for Churchill, who was the representative of the New Democratic Party during consideration of Bill C-79, indicated clearly to my hon. friend the government Whip, the Government House Leader, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader and, presumably, similar counterparts in the Liberal Party that we had serious concerns and we were going to suggest we amend the motion.

My hon. friend then went to the law clerks who were drafting the motion. We communicated that to not only the Parliamentary Secretary of the Government House Leader, but the Deputy House Leader as well. He was waiting to hear back from the clerks in conclusion.

Our track record on this is perfectly clean, perfectly clear and perfectly straightforward. I have yet to hear from my hon. friends why they are supporting—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I think it is time someone put on the record the events connected with the motion before us which, in the Senate, led to a number of comments by senators which I feel are justified and to amendments that reflect an entity that is different from our own.

To be perfectly clear, the amendments before us today, which are being proposed by the Senate, deal with a situation that somewhat differs from ours in that the Senate's board of internal economy is not organized the same way. The Speaker of the House of Commons is both member and Chairman of the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons. That is not the case in the Senate. The Speaker of the Senate does not automatically chair the Senate's committee on internal economy which is, in fact, a Standing Committee of the Senate that regularly reports to the Senate. So the procedure differs somewhat from what is customary here in the House of Commons.

Second, the amendments confirm these differences and provide for intersessional authority. The point is, that when Parliament is prorogued, since the Senate's internal economy committee is a Standing Committee, it would immediately lose its powers and be unable to pursue any further activities. The Senate therefore proposes an amendment that would provide for intersessional authority, so that senators would be able to continue to work during a period of prorogation of Parliament.

In fact, during the debate in the Senate, there was some discussion on section 52.7.

[English]

I will use my second language so that members of the House will understand there was no plot and no cover up. There was absolutely nothing done to try and change the spirit and the objectives that we had all tried to reach in getting Bill C–79 before Parliament.

I think it is a first in terms of parliamentary democracy that we now have a bill that guarantees in the House of Commons full representation to all parties on the Board of Internal Economy. One only has to look back some years ago when the government was in total command of that committee.

Today all parties have a representative on the Board of Internal Economy and that assures some justice and some equity in matters dealing with all parties and all members.

In my view there is no other way of assuring a non–partisan approach to the issues we deal with on the Board of Internal Economy, of which I am a member, and so is the member for Kamloops, who is the representative of his party.

The question arose in debate in the Senate as to our intent, our motive, our purpose. It was to give members of this House and of the Senate an opportunity to have an adjudication by their peers, by the Board of Internal Economy, of the expenditure of public funds entrusted to them to administer their offices and other things. We also wanted to put in place a system which would allow us, members of Parliament, to ask the board for an interpretation, an opinion as to the expenditures of funds in the operations of our constituency and House of Commons offices.

I see nothing wrong with that. I see absolutely nothing wrong with that. I think it is a step in the right direction. If a member is concerned or has doubt about what he is about to do in terms of expenditure or what he is about to do in terms of administering his office, then he can go to the board and ask for its opinion. He can say to the board: "What do you think of this proposal", and the board will answer either that it is okay or: "No, we do not agree, therefore you cannot do it".

The question that arose in the Senate and arose in my mind, because when we passed the bill at third reading an amendment was passed about which I had some hesitation, but nevertheless with the assurance of all parties, I thought I will not pursue that. I will not pursue it because maybe the Senate will agree that there could be here a review of that clause, which is clause 52.7.

Clause 52.7(2) read this way: "Where an opinion is provided to a peace officer, pursuant to subsection (1)", and the text went on to say, "or", and I underline "or", "the peace officer has been advised by the board that an application under subsection 52.6(2) has been made by the member of the House of Commons to whom the investigation relates and where an application for a process is made to a judge, the judge shall be provided with the opinion and shall consider it in determining whether to issue the process".

The difficulty that I had and that some other members of this group had, was with the "or the peace officer having been advised by the board that an application under subsection 52.6". I am not a lawyer, but I am told that members of Parliament and senators sometimes get wind that an investigation is ongoing on matters pertaining to the administration of their funds, that is the funds given to them to administer their office. They get wind of this.

The possibility which I objected to, and I am thinking here in terms of an all–party position, the difficulty of that position was that if a member heard or got wind of an investigation on his administration of public funds, he could immediately ask the board for an opinion. In my judgment and the judgment of many others in the Senate, that would have stopped the process there and then. That would have prevented due process because that would have prevented the completion in my view and in the view of others of that investigation by the police officer.

It said here: "Where an opinion is provided to a peace officer pursuant to subsection (1) or the peace officer has been advised".

• (1240)

What if the peace officer had asked the board if it was about to give an opinion on the administration of funds from Mr. or Mrs. So-and-so? If the board said: "Yes, we are about to render that opinion," I contend that is quite logical.

There is nothing here of cover-up. It is strictly a question of interpretation. I am not a lawyer, but I do think as a legislator that a possibility could exist that the board would have been obligated to give that opinion.

If the opinion took time, it could slow the process and retard the ongoing investigation. In fact, it could stop that whole investigation. That is what we objected to, that is mainly the issue at hand here and that is why in the Senate—I can quote from the Debates extensively—that is what the argument was.

I could quote from the text of Senator MacEachen, for example: "However, if the process of going to a judge to have a search warrant or to lay a charge is linked to the work of the peace officer in laying a charge, that process cannot be completed until the opinion of the board is given. Then there is an anomaly."

At the very least, that provision was looked at and improved in my humble opinion. The purpose of the amendment in the motion before the House today is to eliminate the possibility that an opinion, having been asked, would prevent the ongoing process, that is, the legal process, to continue.

That is now eliminated. Therefore, it cannot be read to have any other interpretation.

I say to the member for Churchill—I am not quarrelling with him on the intent of his amendments—that I would agree with the purpose and the intent of his amendment. However, I say with all due respect that there is a provision in this bill that allows the House of Commons at this time to adopt this bill and look after the preoccupations of my friends from Churchill and Kamloops.

What we could do is to look at the section dealing with the bylaws of the board. I want to read the bylaws of the board:

> Subject to section 20.7, the board may make bylaws:
> (a) respecting the calling of meetings of the board to conduct the business of the meetings;
> (b) governing the use by senators or members of Parliament of funds, goods, services and premises made available to them for the carrying out of their parliamentary functions;
> (c) prescribing the terms and conditions of the management of and accounting of funds referred to in paragraph (b);
> (d) respecting all such things that are necessary or incidental to the exercise of its powers under this section and sections 20.3 and 20.6.

We have a provision in this bill that would allow the Board of Internal Economy to pass bylaws doing exactly what the member for Churchill is proposing to the board and that would satisfy most of us. I would recommend to this House that we immediately pass this motion so we can go on to other things.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the former House leader, former Whip and very active committee member for his intervention. In particular, I want to thank him for the way he ended that intervention.

I want to point out to the House that the member for Churchill and the House leader of the New Democratic Party are just as aware as the member who has just spoken of what is in Bill C-79 and what was not touched by the Senate.

I would go one step further and read another section:

> The Speaker shall table before the House of Commons the bylaws made under this section on any of the first 30 days after the making thereof.

If the member for Churchill really cares about this institution or the people in it, does he really want to hand the Senate the power to change what it is that he proposes? Or, does he trust the House of Commons, at least, and his member on it—the House leader of the New Democratic Party—to pass a bylaw to accomplish what it is that he sees as an oversight of the bill?

Does he really want to reject the Senate message because we made a mistake? He did, I did, the member who spoke did. The Chamber did. We passed a clause with an unseen possibility in it, which the Senate spotted. I want to pay a compliment to the Senate, as the Chamber of sober second thought, on that particular clause it spotted a flaw and simply corrected it. I say thank you to the Senate. The Senate changed from a board to go back to its committee and that is a mistake. I think the Senate will be back to this Chamber some day in the next two or three years asking for a board, because I think it has created for itself an administrative structure that is unwieldy and makes it very difficult to activate the responsibilities inherent in this bill.

This bill came about and was examined by all sides of this Chamber for a purpose. We are not today, without the passage of this bill, treated like ordinary Canadians when it comes to the justice system. The securing of information from this Chamber about the behaviour of members and their utilization of the budget today, without this piece of legislation, requires a judicial process, usually a search warrant, before any information can be obtained. The Speaker has to grant permission for the warrant to be executed.

I think it is fair to say that we found that situation intolerable, that the public nature of search warrants and the fact that they are full of allegations and not proof, created difficulties for members, and in particular, members' families.

This piece of legislation is an obligation on the part of the board to provide the police and courts with information that they cannot get today. It is additional information. It is saying to the police and the courts, we will give you accurate information if you would simply come and ask.

If there is an allegation out there about the behaviour of a member, it can be dealt with quickly and expeditiously. If there is truth, or some element of truth to the allegation, it will go through an investigation and a process. If it is simply an allegation without a foundation in truth, that can be discovered and all members, all sides of the Chamber can avoid the public nature of allegations. Allegations do enormous damage. This day started at 11 a.m. with an NDP allegation about an unnamed person in the Prime Minister's office. That tars all of the members of the Prime Minister's office with a brush. It is not fair. It is simply not fair.

I would like to indicate to the colleague who spoke ahead of me, that both as board members and certainly on behalf of all the board members of my party, we would be quite willing to pass a bylaw that would require the board to give to the police officers or to the courts an opinion which is relevant to the case.

It says in the bill itself, under the bylaw section, the board of governors must make bylaws respecting all such things as are necessary or incidental to the exercise of its powers and carrying out of its functions.

Those early bylaws must deal with the way the board itself intends them to function. It can deal with the issues that are contained in these two amendments, without turning over the control to the Senate.

Abolish the Senate, says the former premier of the province of British Columbia. I did not see his legislature when he was in charge pass a motion to that effect, to abolish the Senate. It is awfully easy to sit on the side lines and snipe, but when you have the responsibility of governing, surely you have to act responsibly.

I suggest to this House there really needs to be no more time on this particular piece of legislation, that we should move to the agriculture bill. If we want more time on the agriculture bill or more time on this, I would move:

> That the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of the second reading of government Bill C-79, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act.

• (1250)

If we do not need it then we can adjourn at one o'clock or we could actually agree to consider the agricultural bill after one o'clock. At this point, I simply would ask you to put that motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): A point of order, the hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Murphy: I believe, Mr. Speaker, if you check the records or your memory, you will realize that the government Whip got up on questions and comments. Therefore, he cannot move that particular motion. It should also be noted that he has taken almost all the time for questions and comments and, therefore, not allowing other members to speak.

I am sure, with regard to this specific point of order, because he asked a number of questions which we obviously do not have a chance to reply to since he has taken up most of the time, the motion he put is out of order.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will consult before ruling on the Government Whip's motion. Since we have two and a half minutes left, I will recognize the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, on questions and comments.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I didn't realize there was a question in the comments made by my hon. friend, the Government Whip, but if our common objective is to clarify the bill—and I believe the amendment does exactly that—I have no further comments. I think everything is quite clear. All we wanted to do is eliminate any interpretations that might hamper the legal process. In other words, if a member got wind of an investigation into his administration or budget, he could ask the board for an opinion, which would have had the effect of delaying if not altogether preventing the investigation. I think that possibility has now been eliminated from the bill and that the Senate did a good job. They are to be commended and derserve our thanks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): After consulting the Standing Orders, I must admit that the objection raised by the hon. member for Churchill is in order, since according to Standing Order 43, during the period for questions and comments members may not move a motion to extend the sitting hours of the House.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, during the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, there was an offer on his behalf, as the Liberal member of the board, to take care of the concerns of the member for Churchill. I have since heard the offer from the chief government Whip, who is also a member of the board, indicating the government's support to take care of those concerns at the Board of Internal Economy.

I would like to ask the House Leader of the New Democratic Party whether he, as the New Democratic representative on the same board, would agree to attend to these concerns at the board.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply on a point of order on two points. First of all, I think it indicates, on behalf of the government a recognition that clarification is required and a suggestion perhaps that this might be an appropriate way to deal with this issue raised by my hon. friend from Churchill. I want to say, with all sincerity, that I would enjoy discussing this as a way of enabling this motion to proceed.

On another point, however, I want to say that my offer still stands from earlier regarding the important agricultural bill. If the government wants to introduce that and say this is the item of business for this afternoon, and we want to see this completed as the only item of business, we will ensure that takes place and that the bill will be passed today.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member is agreeing to let a decision be taken on Bill C-79 at this time. There are seven minutes which allow us to call Bill C-98. I would then ask for unanimous consent to allow us to continue through the lunch hour to deal with Bill C-98, the agricultural bill.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I understood that the hon. member for Kamloops suggested that members interested in this matter might get together for a discussion.

I have plenty of time this afternoon to discuss my proposal for using the Board of Internal Economy to meet the concerns of the hon. member for Churchill. If this suits hon. members, I am prepared to meet them to discuss the matter. I hope the outcome will be satisfactory.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my hon. friend from Ottawa—Vanier and his offer that he would be prepared to make time available later today to discuss this and see if we can come to a satisfactory resolution. I would be more than pleased to do the same and make myself available. I think a gesture of good faith that the government is serious in this initiative would be to introduce the agricultural bill at three o'clock when we begin this afternoon.

However, I want to make perfectly clear that if the government tries to jam through the changes to the Standing Orders at three o'clock, I would have to consider this offer to be made not necessarily in good faith.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, in response to the government's suggestion, we would be prepared to embark on consideration of the agricultural bill immediately and we would be prepared to sit through lunch in order to discuss it. I want to indicate our co-operation on that point. We think it is an important bill and ought to be disposed of promptly.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, the motions that I was not allowed to make to this House have been the subject of debate for the last half hour and have been the subject of a number of offers and counter-offers across the floor. However, I recognize that if we allow this debate to collapse now, there is no pressure on anyone to act. For us to give up this debate and allow the legislation to pass in the next two minutes means that we really do not have any bargaining power to make sure that the amendments that I was not allowed to place before this House are going to be adequately dealt with.

Considering the manoeuvring that took place at two minutes to six last Thursday, I am certainly not going to allow the same manoeuvring to take place at two minutes to one.

Our House leader has already guaranteed that if the agricultural bill is the measure brought back at three o'clock today when the House next deals with legislation, we will help make sure that that legislation passes. On legislation, we are willing to negotiate; we are willing to guarantee.

We are not going to be stuck now with a manoeuvre which will give the government the Parliament of Canada Act as it was amended by the Senate. There is a fundamental flaw there and I want to make sure it is adequately dealt with before we do anything else.

Therefore, we cannot agree to a unanimous motion to deal with other business until this is clarified.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the offer which came from the member from Vanier and which had been discussed earlier with members of the New Democratic Party caucus is to use the bylaw provision under Bill C-79 to take care of the concern; that it must be made public within 30 days of the making of the bylaw. You had the public commitment from the two parties and there is only one other party represented on the board. That is the situation at the moment, that will be the situation an hour from now and it will be the situation five days from now: that Bill C-79 and its passage is the precondition to being able to act.

I do not know whether we have a board meeting scheduled for tomorrow night, but if we were to approve that bill at this moment, move it to Royal Assent, and put it into law at the very first board meeting subsequent to it becoming the law of the land, then we can solve the problem.

The only other possibility would be to go through the whole cumbersome mending process and back to the Senate. Canadian taxpayers will be well served by the bill; it will have a great deal more clarity. That is why all parties in all corners of the House have supported it historically—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

KIMBERLY-CLARK

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, on March 19, Kimberly-Clark outlined its position on the sale of the Spruce Falls Pulp and Paper Company in Kapuskasing.

Kimberly-Clark has set a purchase deadline of April 30, 1991. This deadline creates unwarranted pressure on the purchasing employee group by withdrawing its exclusive buying rights. The deadline also applies to the sale of the Smokey Falls dam to the Ontario government. This time restriction will not permit a complete environmental assessment.

In 1983 Kimberly-Clark decided not to modernize Spruce Falls. This was inappropriate. As a corporate citizen it has failed miserably to honour its commitment to the workers.

The Government of Ontario could retaliate by avoiding the forest management agreement which would leave Spruce Falls without a wood supply for next year. A new FMA would be renegotiated with a new owner.

Kimberly-Clark is shifting its corporate responsibility to the province. Suddenly, it has forgotten the profits it has made in the past 63 years. Kimberly-Clark has the moral responsibility to secure work for the 1,200 workers it plans to lay off.

TELEMARKETING

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians are frustrated when Telemarketing calls intrude upon their personal lives.

Today I would like to congratulate the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Canadian Direct Marketing Association for establishing standards of conduct that respect consumer privacy.

I am especially pleased to see the leadership that the minister has demonstrated by making businesses responsible for maintaining acceptable standards that are in the consumer interest.

GLOBAL WARMING

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon the Standing Committee on Environment released its third report on global warming fittingly entitled Out of Balance: The Risks of Irreversible Climate Change. The report is based on hearings that extended over eight months, a review of over 120 written submissions, and the testimony of more than 100 qualified witnesses.

The recommendations of the report are solid, comprehensive and realistic. Based on four principal premises, the report concludes that global warming is proven and validated scientifically, that global warming is the inevitable consequence of past and present human activity, that global warming is a dire threat to Canada and the entire planet, and that the time to act is now, without delay.

In memory of Dean Clay, the committee's principal researcher and adviser who passed away suddenly on October 22, 1990, let me say that Dean's outstanding assistance and contribution on this pressing global issue will be a legacy for generations to come.

POTATO INDUSTRY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, potato farmers in Prince Edward Island are still waiting for the federal government to come forward with its compensation package to assist those farmers affected by the PVY–N virus.

Farmers are looking to plant their crops within five weeks and must get their seed lined up. The uncertainty resulting from this delay is not only causing anxiety among the farmers. It is affecting their ability to obtain operating credit.

This problem does not only affect the potato industry. It has repercussions on the entire economy of my province.

Surely the welfare and security of the potato industry should be a priority. The U.S. ban was put in place almost two months ago. In that length of time surely this government has been able to put together the required compensation package.

I call on the federal government to delay no longer, to let the farmers of Prince Edward Island know where they stand, and to announce immediately a full and comprehensive compensation package.

FEDERAL–PROVINCIAL FORESTRY AGREEMENTS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, at the end of this week it will be two years since the last federal–provincial forestry agreement in Saskatchewan expired.

I have lost track of how many times this government has told me that an agreement is just around the corner. The Minister of Forestry himself came to Prince Albert last August and said it would be there by Christmas. Finally word circulated that on March 11 a new agreement would finally be signed.

A new agreement was signed yesterday in Manitoba, but what has happened in Saskatchewan? On March 6, Grant Devine's election timetable was derailed by the boundaries fiasco and we have not seen hide nor hair of the agreement since.

This farce has gone on long enough.

The sustainable development of Saskatchewan's forests and the livelihood of the people living in those forests are simply too important to be held hostage by Grant Devine's election shenanigans.

Therefore I call on this government to stop playing footsie with Grant Devine on this issue and to start giving Saskatchewan's forests and the forest communities the support it has promised for so long.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, medicare is the cornerstone of the social system, cherished by all Canadians. However few understand the actual cost of these excellent services, for example that it is much more expensive to treat minor health problems at hospital emergency wards rather than in doctors' offices.

In this age of computers we should provide everyone with a print-out showing the real cost of medical services received each year. Then we would have an informed public able to make more cost effective use of medicare, with resulting savings for all taxpayers.

We already get print-outs showing our Canada Pension entitlement. I urge the federal government and the provinces to give Canadians personal information about the actual cost of their medicare.

COST SHARING PROGRAMS

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, the recently announced $80 million joint expenditure by the province of Quebec and the federal government should be looked upon as a positive step by all levels of government.

The 75-25 sharing arrangement to develop municipal roads, sewage and water facilities for industrial projects will be welcomed, I am sure, by the municipalities that benefit from it.

With a similar need for funds for regional development by municipalities in all provinces, it is hoped that the minister responsible will advise the House soon what the criteria are for provinces to apply for this assistance or tell us when similar cost sharing programs will be announced for other provinces.

The government is finally seeing the folly in its deindustrialization process and has taken a step in the right direction with Quebec, a step which should be repeated with all other provinces.

GUN CONTROL

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, last week, the National Firearms Association sent me a copy of the book entitled "Armed and Female" by the Americain author Paxton Quigley. It advocates the use of firearms as the only effective means of self-defense for women. It also puts forward an American philosophy, of an armed society, which is far from what we want in Canada. Increasing the number of firearms is not the answer to the problem of violence against women.

By sending me this book, the management of the National Firearms Association show their true intention, which is to copy the Americans. In spite of the pressures of these lobbyists working for American arms manufacturers, I will keep asking for more severe gun control measures, knowing I can count on the support of over 500,000 Canadians.

EASTERN ONTARIO ECONOMY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the Hawkesbury Employment Center which serves my riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell just released the most recent statistics on unemployment in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and the verdict is a condemnation of the economic policy of the government opposite. Based on these figures, the rate of unemployment in the Hawkesbury area, in my riding, is 16.6 per cent. It has never been this high, even during the global recession of 1982. Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Prescott in particular, is in need of immediate help.

So, I call upon the government to develop an economic recovery plan for Eastern Ontario and the Hawkesbury area in particular.

ENERGY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, after just six months in power, the New Democratic Government of Ontario has already left the Mulroney Conservatives far behind on environmentally responsible energy policy.

As just one example, the Ontario government has ordered Ontario Hydro to divert $240 million, that is $60 million per year for four years, from nuclear energy development into reducing demand through energy conservation and efficiency.

That diversion alone is worth more than one and a half times the total annual energy department's spending on all federal programs for efficiency, conservation and alternate energy. Indeed, that total federal budget of $35 million a year is only $20 million more than Ontario Hydro will spend just on advertising its conservation and efficiency programs.

• (1410)

Members might wish to remember this as they take in the solar energy exposition in the West Block today and, thereafter, they may wish to redress this shameful imbalance.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my constituents send me a very loud and clear message that in the next round of constitutional discussions native issues must be a major priority.

They do not want to see any more violence or armed confrontation. They do want to see a rapid and just settlement of all outstanding legitimate claims of native Canadians whether they involve land, self-government or sovereignty.

Mr. Speaker, you and I know that is not an easy task. Native leaders do not always agree with one another, let alone the government. The Mohawks at Oka, for example, are reportedly divided into seven factions all claiming to be the sole legitimate community leaders.

However it is essential that the government at least be seen to be doing all that it can to find a solution, and so far in spite of the minister's efforts that message is just not getting through.

NATIONAL FRANCOPHONE WOMEN'S EDUCATION WEEK

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the Réseau national d'action éducation femmes established in 1980 has just celebrated its first national francophone women's education week throughout Canada.

It turned out to be a successful week thanks to the work done by RNAEF volunteers and to the financial support made available through the Secretary of State Women's Program. The purpose of this organization is to promote francophone women in all Canadian provinces through education and access to education.

I am proud to wear this badge which says that enlightened men respect and encourage women seeking equity. It was presented to me at the first exhibition of educational services for francophone women which took place in Orléans in the riding of Carleton—Gloucester.

Congratulations to the women of RNAEF.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Before the CRTC yesterday, Mr. Speaker, Télé-Métropole and CFCF went after the CBC management with a vengeance and accused them of seeking to increase the unfair advantage the Crown corporation already has over the private television network.

Mr. Charles Bélanger singled out the CBC advertising revenues as well as the way the corporation has been promoting revenue-producing programs since the early 1980s, preferring airing Dallas to producing Canadian drama or documentaries on politics, the economy and the environment.

ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I was astounded yesterday to find that it has cost up to $8,000 each to research answers to questions on the Order Paper. In fact, some shared questions involving more than one department could exceed that $8,000 figure.

None of us can question the fact that we have the right, indeed the responsibility, to be thorough, but we also have the obligation to set an example of fiscal responsibility.

When the issue is pertinent and the information relevant for an important issue and not readily available, we have the right to demand it and the government the responsibility to provide it.

However, in the name of common sense and fiscal responsibility, let each of us ask only those questions we truly need. For the sake of the taxpayer, let us consider the value of the question as well as the cost of the answer.

BÉLANGER–CAMPEAU COMMISSION

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute to the men and women who sat on the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, particularly Bloc Québécois leader Lucien Bouchard.

A general consensus developed within this commission made up of various interests and groups, except for the Liberal Party Of Canada, the Progressive Conservative Party, and the Equality Party. Mr. Speaker, Quebec is serenely preparing for the future.

Within eighteen months Canada will have an opportunity to make formal offers to the people of Quebec. Ever more Quebecers are becoming aware that the referendum campaign has just begun and that, by October 26, 1992 at the latest, the majority of men and women in the province will vote in favour of the only realistic and practical option, sovereignty.

EXPO 92

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the House to an article in today's edition of The Ottawa Citizen which describes the construction of Canada's pavilion at Expo 92 in Seville, Spain as being on time and on budget.

Mr. Gordon Smith, Canada's Deputy Commissioner General to Expo 92, is quoted as saying:

> We're ahead because we're the best organized country here, we planned and made decisions early on.

I have in my possession an internal External Affairs document which paints a much different picture, a much costlier picture of the construction of the Canadian pavilion. Under the heading of immediate problem, the document says:

> The situation today is that we are on time but not on budget, and we may need to return to TB for extra funding in the magnitude of $10 million.

In fact, the budget for the Canadian pavilion at Expo 92 has been revised upward by $2.4 billion in the 1990 Supplementary Estimates. This represents a 42 per cent increase in less than one year.

I hope the minister of external affairs will see fit to correct the misleading impression this story leaves in The Ottawa Citizen of the true cost of the Canadian pavilion and let Canadians know just how much of a financial bath we can expect to take.

MINING

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what it is about the NDP. Whether we are talking about the member for Nickel Belt or his leader, the member for Yukon, they have got a bugaboo about the mining corporations not paying their fair share of taxes. In fact, the leader of the socialists began her questioning on Friday by suggesting that mining companies should pay more tax.

I know the leader was in downtown Toronto yesterday speaking to the Prospectors and Developers Association of Canada at its annual meeting. I sincerely hope that she has learned something about the mining association. I hope she was listening to the men and women at the meeting.

She should have heard, I am sure, that the creators of wealth, the companies the NDP would like to hit hard with rising taxes, are certainly not in the best position to pay more new NDP taxes.

The business section of The Globe and Mail today said: "mining companies reeling: $1.4 million writedowns resulted from weak gold prices and bad decisions".

Again I hope that our socialist friends read The Globe and Mail. Perhaps they will stop ranting about things and learn a little more about what is common knowledge in the mining community.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BELANGER–CAMPEAU COMMISSION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In the wee hours of the morning today a vote was taken at the Belanger–Campeau Commission in Quebec which could set the stage for the end of Canada.

At a time when leadership means standing to be counted, the Prime Minister and his party abstained in the vote.

Why did the Prime Minister refuse to stand and be counted for Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as usual my friend, the Acting Leader of the Opposition is, to put it charitably, only partly right.

In the wee hours of this morning there was not one vote. There were many votes taken at the Belanger–Campeau Commission, including the key vote which asked the members to endorse sovereignty as the preferred choice of Quebecers. The member of this government, Mr. Hogue, along with a member of her party, voted solidly against that petition.

With regard to what evolved as the ultimate package, and it having become clear that this might be endorsed by a larger number of people and become the basis of the negotiating position of the Government of Quebec, it was in respect of that appropriate that Mr. Hogue, who is the only member there as a member of the federal government that may be called upon to begin negotiations at an appropriate point in time, neither speak for nor against what is their bargaining position.

An hon. member: Their bargaining position?

Mr. Mulroney: Their bargaining position, exactly. It is one that would be set out by the Government of the Province of Quebec.

I find it very interesting that last week the Acting Leader of the Opposition rose and asked all parties in the House to depoliticize the question of national unity and today, quite in error and with mischief, is trying to politicize something that should be depoliticized.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the timeframe agreed upon by the majority of the Bélanger–Campeau Commission to give Canada an ultimate chance is much narrower. That is why we could not approve the report.

But everyone agrees that the status quo is no longer satisfactory. We need a thorough reform if we want this country to survive.

Given the tight schedule we are stuck with, whether we like it or not, when will the Prime Minister show national leadership and disclose his own agenda so that a consensus can be achieved as to the necessary reforms for a new Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Indeed, Mr. Speaker, my friend is absolutely right. The status quo is no longer satisfactory and has not been since the Constitution was patriated in 1981–1982. In-depth changes were needed and some, although modest, were agreed upon in the Meech Lake Accord which my friend supported.

In spite of these modest changes endorsed by the Liberal Party as well as the New Democratic Party, a Premier, the Premier of Newfoundland, failed to have them confirmed by a vote in the legislature of his province.

The fact remains nonetheless that deep changes are needed as I advocated in a speech I made in Buckingham. As a matter of fact, that is one of the reasons for setting up the Spicer Commission as well as the Edwards–Beaudoin Special Joint Committee. It is also one of the reasons why the government House leader gave notice to the hon. members last week that they will be involved more closely in a parliamentary process aimed precisely at preparing reforms for Canada.

• (1420)

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is accusing me of politicizing the debate. I say that if anyone in this House is politicizing the debate, that person, is right across the way. When the time comes to make a critical decision on a question as fundamental as the unity of Canada, people understand yes, they understand no, but they don't understand abstention.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Copps: The Prime Minister's representative abstained on a matter as fundamental as the future of this country. People have a right to know why the Prime Minister asked his representative on the Bélanger-Campeau Commission to abstain. Why didn't he show more leadership?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not accuse my hon. friend of politicizing the debate. I merely reminded her that last week, she asked us to depoliticize this issue, and by starting off with this question today in the House, she was putting a negative slant on the activities of a member of the government party. I explained firmly and clearly why Mr. Hogue, who voted against sovereignty and took part in every vote, abstained from this particular vote for entirely legitimate reasons. And when the hon. member accuses me of stalling, today, in some parts of this country, I am suffering the consequences of having had the guts to stand firm during the debate on the Meech Lake Accord. It wasn't easy.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: I knew at the time that it would be difficult and that our constitutional proposals were not necessarily popular with everyone, but we knew they represented a very clear and tremendous advantage for a united Canada. In fact, this view was shared by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Hamilton East and by the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard, according to an article in the Toronto Star published on June 4—an important date, Mr. Speaker—which read as follows:

[English]

Mr. Martin and Ms. Copps said the following. Mr. Martin said on June 4, "Jean, for the love of God, you want to become Prime Minister of Canada but you give no indication of where you are going"—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I think we will have to move along. The hon. member for LaSalle—Émard.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

When is the Prime Minister going to stop reading mouldy newspaper clippings and give this country some leadership?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Allaire report and the proceedings of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission provide a bitter commentary on the failure of this government's economic policies. Look around Montreal. Thirty per cent unemployed in East Montreal, and 50 per cent below the poverty line in the southwest. This government's economic policies are a major handicap for those who want to save this country. My question is this: At a time of national crisis, does the Prime Minister really think his pitiful performance is going to be an incentive for Canadians to meet the necessary challenges and stay together?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Just the same, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has reported some significant economic progress which translated in a major reduction of over 4 points in interest rates since April of last year. But my hon. friend says:

[English]

"When are you going to give leadership on the question of national unity?" I am not quoting just anybody, I am quoting the man who just stood up to reproach me, who said of the person who became his leader: "Jean, for the love of God, you want to become Prime Minister of Canada, but you give us no indication where you are going". And Ms. Copps said: "Jean, you have not understood Quebec and you are gambling dangerously with the future of Canada. One does not find the future by looking in a rear view mirror".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, what I should have said is: "Brian, for the love of God, will you think of the country".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): The turmoil in Quebec is about non-confidence in this government's handling of the economy and of the country. Interest rates, set by John Crow, a dollar set by the United States, no industrial policy, no hope. The true crisis in Confederation is that this nation—

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member put the question.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): My question is this. What does it take before this government realizes that if Ottawa is going to continue to abstain on the major issues of the day, then Canadians and Quebecers will look elsewhere for leadership, because this government has given them no choice, no chance.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are not abstaining from the great issues of the day. This government has taken a position in regard to the unity of Canada. We obtained the signature of all of the premiers, of the three leaders of the House of Commons, a great statement of Canadian unity and my friend says; "I should have said, Brian, what are you doing"? But that is not what you said. You said: "Jean, what are you doing? You are going to ruin Canada, Jean". That is what you said in June 1990. You said it, because the Leader of the Liberal Party turned his back—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It is clear that a referendum will be held in Quebec in 1992. Many people believe that we will not have enough time to respond in a constructive fashion. I think it is possible, but only if there are a legitimate process and a government with the necessary mandate to achieve it. My question to the Prime Minister is this: How does the Prime Minister intend to secure this mandate from Canadian men and women?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Canada was not founded by a Parliamentary committee. It was built by men and women who wanted a better future for themselves and their children. It is not a Parliamentary committee which will decide today whether our children will be entitled to the same privileges as Canadian citizens. The purpose of the Meech Lake Accord was to bring Quebec back into the Canadian constitutional fold. Its failure will not prevent us as Parliamentarians and Canadians eager to preserve the integrity and the unity of our great country to make the necessary effort in order to ensure the participation of Parliamentarians who will give a new direction to a strong and united Canada.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I agree that of course parliamentarians are very important in this debate. However, the Constitution of a country is not between parliamentarians, it is not between governments, but it is between a nation and its people.

I want to say to the Prime Minister that we cannot be put in the position of last year, where we had a crisis kind of week and there is not now an elected federal leader in this country, including myself, which has the mandate to fundamentally restructure the country.

I say to the Prime Minister that the kind of work that has to be done will require the support, not just of parliamentarians, not just of provincial and territorial leaders, but of the people of Canada.

How does the Prime Minister propose to get that support and that mandate from the Canadian people for a new Constitution and Canadian unity?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, is my hon. friend putting in doubt the traditions of the British parliamentary system whereby a government seeks a mandate and is elected for a given period of time? The NDP says it is archaic. Go tell Bob Rae it is archaic. He says he has a mandate that lasts five years and he plans to exercise it. That is what I am going to do.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows, Canadians know, that this government has no mandate from the Canadian people to fundamentally restructure this country.

It is essential, if we are not going to go through the high stakes, high pressure tactics used last summer, and be thrust into next summer before a referendum in Quebec, through some kind of Russian roulette crisis tactic again, that this Prime Minister and this government seek a mandate from the Canadian people for a vision of Canadian unity and a Canada that can go into the 21st century.

I say to the Prime Minister, how long is this government prepared to wait before it gets the confidence and support of the Canadian people?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why my hon. friend is being so critical of what took place last year because she, further to some meetings we had, stood in front of 24 Sussex and said that the crisis was not one of the federal government's making and that the crisis, by and large, was being handled well. If she has changed her mind on that, fair ball, but that is my recollection of what she had to say.

With regard to how we involve the Canadian people, we involve the Canadian people through the Parliament of Canada. We already have two commissions going and we propose to directly involve—

Mr. Speaker, I am answering a question from the NDP leader which I am trying to treat seriously, but her members will not allow me to answer. The only way to do it, as best I know, is to involve the members directly in parliamentary work that will give rise to solutions to this great problem we are confronting. Otherwise, I would have to conclude that my hon. friend would want me to call an election.

I cannot do that because after the election the NDP members are usually pretty hard on their leader.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The Leader of the Opposition spoke in favour of a united Canada before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, but the Prime Minister of Canada did not have the courage to appear and support Canada before the commissioners. Worse still, his representative refrained from voting. So here is my question: How can Canadians feel confident that this Prime Minister will maintain Canadian unity, whereas he prevents his own member from voting in favour of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a typically Liberal stunt. We have just heard a statement to the effect that in the wee hours of the morning Mr. Hogue, faced with a proposition supportive of sovereignty, voted against. Today, because of a subsequent vote, they want to suggest, for the reasons I have just explained, that this makes the Progressive Conservative Party or the government an enemy of Canada. Well, Mr. Speaker, my friend who was once a loyal supporter of our latest consitutional initiative will remember what some people described as the degrading spectacle at Calgary when we saw Mr. Wells congratulating Mr. Chrétien who was heard to say "Clyde, thank you for all your good work".

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the silence of the member for Outremont over the final report of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission might have very serious consequences. My question to the Prime Minister is very simple: When will you stop playing poker with Canada? Stop playing poker!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend knows that very well, for as parliamentarians we were together in the long struggle in favour of Canadian unity.

Mr. Lapierre: That's over!

Mr. Mulroney: No, it is not over. The hon. member for Shefford—as it happened, at the time he was campaign manager for the member for LaSalle—Émard—was supportive of Canadian unity. To the member for Shefford I say that we may have lost it for a few moments, but we will get it back later on.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Does the Prime Minister agree that there should be a referendum in Quebec on its sovereignty; in other words, separation from Canada as early as 1992? If he does not agree, then why did he instruct his representative on the committee to abstain and not vote against this proposal? The people of Canada deserve a clear and definite answer.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have given an answer. Perhaps I could ask my friend to check the premise of his own question.

Subsequent to that decision, Mr. Remillard, Quebec's inter-governmental affairs minister, made it clear that a referendum on sovereignty is not cast in stone. At 5:20 this morning I was listening to the CBC, as I do every morning, and he said: "If we receive proposals from the rest of Canada and if we decide to hold a referendum on them, and if Quebecers say yes, that means that we will have to postpone the sovereignty referendum."

The Minister of Inter-governmental Affairs is already acknowledging that there may not be a referendum on sovereignty. The objective of all parliamentarians, including this member, should be to work constructively to make sure that there is not that referendum on sovereignty, but that we come together with proposals that will keep Canada solidly bound together.

• (1440)

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that before the Prime Minister heard Mr. Remillard on television, he instructed his representative on the commission to abstain and not to vote against a proposal to have a referendum on sovereignty in Quebec as early as 1992. And he has not explained that fact.

I ask the Prime Minister, why did he instruct his representative on the Belanger–Campeau commission to abstain on the final vote, and therefore to take a position which indicated indifference to the future of Canada? That is not leadership; that is not fighting for unity.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this may be quite embarrassing for my hon. friend. He is suggesting that there is something really extraordinarily anti–Canadian to have voted in favour of that proposal. He will have to explain to his Liberal colleagues in Quebec his chagrin at their conduct, because all of the provincial members voted in favour of it.

Has the member told Mr. Bourassa how offended he is at his anti–Canadian conduct? The last time this gentleman rose in the House it was to say that Mr. Bourassa's proposals guaranteed Canada a solid last chance to come together in one united nation. And that is exactly what we are trying to do.

Now, I did not give any instructions to the member. That only happens in other parties. But I can tell him this—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I simply mention that my hon. friend's question is predicated on the assumption that what Mr. Remillard has already said is false.

Mr. Remillard is quoted very directly as saying that indeed there may not be a referendum on sovereignty. I think that if my Liberal friends can put aside their partisanship for a minute, they will agree that the avoidance of that referendum would be important for all Canadians.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): My question is to the Prime Minister, who has had no mandate to do what he has done to the CBC.

At a time when this nation is at a crossroads, at a time when our collective future is at stake, the Prime Minister with a swing of his financial broad axe has decimated the CBC as an instrument of national identity.

I want to ask the Prime Minister, when will he finally begin to listen to the people of Canada? When will he learn that the bludgeoning of the CBC will only jeopardize Canada's future as a nation? And, when will he give back to the CBC the level of funding that it deserves to serve as the heartbeat of Canada?

You've got no mandate to do what you've done. No wonder we are on life support.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Yes, Mr. Speaker, all of us did listen to the CBC this morning and do appreciate what they do.

But, Mr. Speaker, the budget of $1.4 billion, global receipts which have been increasing constantly since 1985, is apparently enough from what I read, the chairman–designate of the CBC having said so in the month of February. Now, this is only one month later. I am assuming he must still feel the same way.

The CRTC has been holding some hearings. Today is its last day. I imagine that we would want to give them a chance to report on their hearings.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): The members continue to laugh. But CBC president Gerard Veilleux has warned that the next round of cuts and the loss of 500 more jobs will make it impossible for the CBC to do its job as Canada's national voice. Then it is going to be up to the government to decide the fate of the CBC.

With the Federal Court's decision today that the political will to maintain the CBC in fact rests with Parliament, will the Prime Minister assure this House that the government will provide stable, multi-year funding for the CBC? And will he stop abdicating his responsibility toward the people of Canada and stand up for the CBC?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of people standing up for the CBC, all of us who have come to respect and appreciate the work that it has been doing. Yes, it has been receiving more money, not less, constantly since 1985.

One might want to reflect that there is certainly an awful lot of public money that is going into the production of some of the work that the CBC is showing on its channels. One should not forget other organizations like Telefilm, the National Film Board and indeed other public money that is available from other levels of government.

Certainly there has been a very serious significant contribution that has been constantly available to the CBC.

BELANGER-CAMPEAU COMMISSION

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Canadians want desperately our Prime Minister to speak with one voice and they want that statement to be the same in both official languages and in all regions of the country.

Would the Prime Minister, tell Canadians why he instructed or refused to instruct his colleague on the Belanger-Campeau Commission to abstain from this very important vote in this very important report. Why has the Prime Minister failed to seize the opportunity and to exercise real judgment not only in Quebec, but throughout Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know that it is the duty of the opposition to score as many political points as it can, but I think Canadians would hope that it would try to avoid scoring cheap points at the cost of national unity.

I have already explained to the colleagues of my hon. friend that there were a number of votes. At all times, particularly in regard to the specific vote that came forward, I believe it was some time during the late evening or early morning when they were called upon to vote on whether the proper orientation for Quebec would be a sovereign one, that some 17 members, including Mr. Hogue, voted solidly against. That was a strong statement of commitment to the unity of Canada.

Inasmuch as Mr. Hogue is the only member of that group who is also a member of the Government of Canada which must play an important part in negotiations, it is important that he not be associated with or seek to denigrate the work of those with whom he will be called upon to dialogue. That is the entirely legitimate reason why Mr. Hogue made a very, very strong commitment to the unity of Canada and yet, as a procedural matter, indicated that because we will be called upon to initiate these discussions, he did not want to place a yea or a nay on the document that comes from the Government of the Province of Quebec.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is trying to have it both ways.

I ask the Prime Minister, through you Mr. Speaker, as to why the Prime Minister has failed to seize this opportunity to show real leadership in the province of Quebec and throughout Canada? Why has he abdicated his responsibility to Canadians from coast to coast? Why has he refused to instruct his member of Parliament to vote again this report or is it because the minister of industry—

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should remind my hon. friend that the best way that I could show leadership in the province of Quebec, as Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party and this government, was to enter the province of Quebec as a candidate in the last election and get myself elected by Quebecers to the House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

BILL C-80

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Today we presented in Parliament 25 boxes of petitions organized by the students at Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal containing over 500,000 signatures asking the government to act quickly on strict gun control laws to protect Canadians against violence with guns.

When will the minister take steps to amend Bill C-80 to include the improvements recommended in the petitions presented today, and also the improvements recommended by the special committee which reported on February 15? When will this be done?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I know he has been very actively involved in this issue.

When I visited the students at Ecole Polytechnique last spring, I had the opportunity to discuss with them their proposals and to receive symbolically the petitions which were delivered to Ottawa today.

I have had, as he knows, the benefit of the advice of the special committee. In the week of March 11, my special national advisory council on firearms met and also considered the committee's report.

I am hoping to table before the House, very quickly, my response to the committee's recommendations. They are excellent recommendations. Some of them have suggested things that I think need to be dealt with and thought out in a little bit more detail.

I am anxious to get on with Bill C-80. I am not sure whether we will have a chance to begin second reading before we rise. If we do not, I will table before the House my response to the committee report, and ask my department to redraft the bill to be tabled in an amended form, and therefore to permit quicker passage when we come back.

At the very soonest moment, I want to advise the members of the House exactly what I propose to bring forward as a new and improved bill. I thank the hon. member for his participation in the process which is going to give us better gun control.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, in the petitions tabled today, over 500,000 Canadians asked the government to designate semi-automatic paramilitary rifles as restricted weapons. Is the government ready to act upon this recommendation or not?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. We have already studied this recommendation, but what is missing is a set of criteria to identify military and paramilitary rifles. I set up my own advisory board, and its first task will be to make a list of the characteristics by which these can be identified. We already have the power to implement such recommendations and I hope to be able to do so.

TRADE

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds.

As recently reported by the Canada West Foundation, the Canada-U.S. trade agreement is working, and working well. The U.S., which imports about one million tonnes of vegetable oil and 400,000 tonnes of meal each year, represents a potentially large market for Canadian canola producers.

Can the minister advise the House what the government is doing to provide the Canadian producers with increased access to this U.S. market?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the Liberals hold so little regard for a well regarded research institution located in western Canada. They might be interested in knowing that the research institute located in Calgary found that Canada increased its high-tech imports to the United States considerably over the last two years, while imports remained flat.

With regard specifically to the member's question, the opposition might also be interested in knowing that as a result of the free trade agreement, at the beginning of next year Canadian canola, a very high quality food that is associated with healthy living standards, will be going into the United States tariff free. This has the potential to not only increase our exports to the United States, but it should make us more competitive to the tune of about $25 to $30 a tonne, which is good news for farmers in these difficult times.

BILL C–78

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, last year the Minister of the Environment had a difficult time with the government's environmental assessment legislation and guidelines. He introduced Bill C–78 in an attempt to alleviate some of those problems.

In doing so, the Minister of the Environment said Canada needed new environmental assessment legislation badly. He said: "It is a tool that this country cannot do without."

My question is to the Minister of the Environment, who has admitted that he is prepared to amend Bill C–78, but he has ignored the legislative committee of this House for the past three months. What has happened to his commitment toward environmental assessment? Does he really believe that this country needs assessment legislation, or is he losing the battle to the big business colleagues in cabinet?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the member opposite is quite right. When I introduced the legislation last June, I made it clear that I was very interested in seeing what recommendations would come from Canadians being heard during the committee proceedings.

We heard quite a bit from Canadians and from the opposition parties during those hearings.

We are still very much committed to the legislation and we will be proposing to the legislative committee a number of amendments to try to improve the legislation and make sure that this legislation is just the best in the world.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the Minister of the Environment.

It was December 11, in answer to a question I put in this House, that the minister said he would accept amendments to C–78. Today, I have presented 111 amendments to Bill C–78 and presented them to the Minister of the Environment this morning.

I ask the Minister of the Environment, as a supplementary question, is he prepared to accept those amendments, which include such logical and reasonable things as an environmental auditor and intervenor funding?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it might have been helpful to advance this file if the hon. member opposite had given me a copy of the 111 amendments that he is proposing to Bill C–78.

CONFIDENCE MOTIONS

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Given the negative impacts of very strict party discipline on representative democracy and public confidence in our parliamentary institutions, for instance the events which took place last week over an opposition motion on medicare, would the government be prepared to introduce the following motion: "That in the opinion of this House, a defeat of a government motion should not be considered as sufficient reason for the resignation of the government unless followed by a vote of lack of confidence", or does the Prime Minister perceive such parliamentary reform to be contrary to the British parliamentary procedure?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Absolutely not, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, prior to that member's election, upon the election of this government, the McGrath commission was introduced by this Prime Minister which increased the opportunities for members to participate. The rule changes debate, which will be commencing this afternoon, in fact further enhance that.

I look forward to discussions involving how we might meet the objectives. I would wonder how one could reconcile signing a document saying: "All candidates of the Reform Party must strictly adhere to the policies of the Reform Party with free votes." If the question is in support of the policies of the Reform Party then clearly you could not, by oath, vote the way the member herself chose to do.

• (1500)

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister.

The British House of Commons, which is the matriarch of parliaments, has adopted procedures which permit members to defeat a government motion without necessarily defeating the government as a result of the backbenchers in the British system exerting their constitutional rights and responsibilities.

Would the Prime Minister at least consider instructing his House leader to study the possibility of adopting such a procedure here and reporting the results of such a study to the House at the earliest possible convenience?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is accurate in terms of what should constitute confidence motions. I would also suggest to her that if we are going to get to this question of individual members being free to express their views, we are going to have to get at the question of partisanship and party blocs in the House.

For example, in the British system all members, backbenchers and opposition, have an equal opportunity to ask questions. They are selected by lot. We would have to start there. We would have to change our voting system, but I think that would be an improvement. I would be willing to engage in those kinds of discussions.

MAPLE LEAF FUND

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The Maple Leaf Fund in western Canada, approved by the minister of immigration, has been exposed by the media as being nothing more than a front for a Winnipeg Tory fundraiser who has taken advantage of investor immigrants to build up his business empire.

Will the minister indicate to the House that the government will put an immediate stop to this abuse and protect new Canadians from Tory bagmen?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I simply do not accept the premise of the question.

Let me say that the government has introduced the investor program as a way of ensuring that in different regions of Canada there is access to investment funds through the immigration process. We have maintained high standards of monitoring on this program throughout.

The economic benefits of each particular fund are determined by the provinces, and everyone who functions as an investor immigrant is subject to the securities laws of provinces.

I simply do not accept either the premise or the conclusion that the hon. member states.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENTS TO STANDING ORDERS

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to rise on a point of order to ask that you rule that Motion No. 30 on the Order Paper before the House is in whole or in part improperly before the House and in whole or in part is out of order.

My concern is centred on two distinct elements of this motion before us. The first is found in paragraph 30, which proposes to amend the right of the Crown to debate Supply before it is granted to the Crown.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could say to the hon. member for Kamloops that I will hear him in a moment on the point of order.

Mr. Andre, seconded by Mr. Epp, moves:

That the Standing Orders of the House of Commons in force on the date of notice of this motion be amended as follows:

1. That Standing Order 24 be deleted and the following substituted therefore:

Shall I dispense?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I should say to the House that the motion which has been brought before the House by the government is a very long one. Hon. members can see that it is nearly an inch thick in pages. The usual convention in this place is that in circumstances like this the courtesies are extended and usually the Speaker is allowed to dispense with the reading of the entire motion.

I am going to ask the House again if the House will give me the courtesy to dispense with reading nearly three-quarters of an inch of documents.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate to the Chair that we do feel it is a long motion and we would be more than happy to offer our co-operation in allowing the Chair to dispense rather than read it into the record. All members can read it.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I think on every occasion to date when we have had a lengthy motion, a bill, or anything for consideration of that size we have asked that we simply have it tabled. We are talking about changing the fundamental ways that this House operates. It is of specific interest to every member.

Since you have been in the chair, Mr. Speaker, I would submit to you that for you to read it would be inappropriate. I notice that you have your hon. colleague standing by who probably has rested during Question Period and ought to be prepared. I think on behalf of my caucus we would like to hear the details of the proposals being brought forward.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, may I just beg the indulgence of members of the NDP. We have had this motion printed twice in the Order Paper every day for a while. We have it printed twice in the Order Paper today. I have read it. They have read it. Why don't we proceed?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I can also tell the Chair that, unlike the majority of members who are part of national caucuses, we were not consulted at all, while we know that somemembers and House leaders have been for nearly a year. But these rules apply as much to us as to the main political parties. We were not afforded the same treatment. The government leader did not even have the courtesy of at least notifying us. He acted in a sneaky way. So, Mr. Speaker, we want to have the benefit of listening and thinking while this document is read to us, because we did not have as much time as the other members to examine it.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. Very quickly I must say I have read the 30 pages of material on the Standing Orders. Obviously it is a very important matter, but the whole reason this House is in such a state of disrepute is the necessity of going through reading it. Frankly, this is the type of thing that all members could have read. You cannot understand it until you relate it and correlate it to the Standing Orders as amended. This is what makes this place such a farce.

I would hope that perhaps the hon. House leader of the government might add another clause, if you are going to get into debate and procedures, to make sure that we can prevent this type of hocus-pocus and get on to the substance.

There are many matters of substance to be discussed and debated on these matters of procedure, rather than this business of a preliminary procedural ambush and stating with a straight face that your counterpart can read, when we all know that if ever there were a motion not to be read, which does not make sense unless you have the Standing Orders, this is it.

I am really disappointed by these paragons of procedural virtue to my left who try to pretend one thing and practise another.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to acknowledge some of the comments made by my hon. colleague. We have to recognize that we are here as the elected representatives of the people of Canada. The people of Canada who are watching this performance are obviously interested, but I simply have to remind the House that when the question is put it must be put and, I might add, in both of Canada's languages.

We would expect the motion to be read in English and then in French.

• (1510)

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point, because I think it is important for people to understand what is going on.

We have a motion which was put before this House on March 22. This is March, 26 and we have not yet started debate on it. People do not realize that this government has said publicly time after time that it wants to ram these changes through.

We want to point out how massive and how destructive these changes are. I think that point can be made very well by having the Speaker read exactly how many rules of this House the government wants to change with almost no debate.

Mr. Speaker: The House has certainly expressed its feelings on this issue. So that everybody understands, there is a right under the rules to have the motion read. In the absence of the House's consent to allow me to dispense with reading it all, it will of course be read. The hon. member is correct; it will be read in both official languages of our country.

I shall commence to do that in a few minutes.

I cannot help but point out that, as the afternoon wears on and as fatigue overtakes my efforts and the efforts of others, we might resort to a long-standing tradition of this House that invites hon. members to come forward and take the chair. There is no question about where I will be looking first, if that should become necessary.

[Translation]

Mr. Andre, seconded by Mr. Epp, moved:

1. That Standing Order 24 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"24.(1) The House shall meet on Mondays at 11.00 o'clock a.m., on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Fridays at 10.00 o'clock a.m. and on Wednesdays at 2.00 o'clock p.m. unless otherwise provided by Standing or Special Order of this House.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know how seriously you are approaching this.

It seems to me that while it has always been tradition for a Speaker to stand when reading the motion being considered by the House, I think you will find that there will be unanimous consent to at least permit you to sit down and read the motion.

Mr. Speaker: I may take the hon. member's suggestion.

I certainly appreciate the concern that is being expressed for the Speaker. I must say that the point of order taken by the hon. member for Kamloops has caused me to lose my place.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I may start over again.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I think it very commendable for the opposition to make that suggestion.

In light of the fact that it is costing about $500,000 every hour for you to do this, and your suggestion that you were going to call on members of the House to relieve you when you become fatigued—I know you have indicated that you are going to call on those members opposite who object to it being tabled—I would prefer that you become fatigued very quickly so that you can call on the opposition members who will continue to stand to read the particular motion that is in front of the House.

I would prefer you to continue standing so that we can then encourage them to stand and waste taxpayers' money at the rate of $500,000 per hour.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, on a brief point of order, I listened to the comments of members opposite as to what is taking place. Let us be perfectly clear that when they are referring to the opposition, they are not referring to the Official Opposition of this House.

Let that be very clear. If members opposite wish to refer to the opposition, I think they should specify as to whom they are referring and not blanket us all with the same brush.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, on the same point, I do want to apologize for leaving the impression that it may be all members of the opposition.

I guess where I was lost was the fact that all of the independents are not here. Some of them requested that you read the motion.

There are some members of the NDP here and certainly they are the people I was referring to, and I hope you will call on them very soon to stand and read.

(2) If debate on any Order of the Day be interrupted by the House being adjourned by motion or for want of a quorum, such motion or Order shall be allowed to stand and retain its precedence on the Order Paper for the next sitting, provided that if debate on any item of Private Members' Business not selected pursuant to Standing Order 92 is so interrupted, it shall thereupon be dropped from the Order Paper."

Where it is provided in any Standing Order that any business shall be forthwith disposed of or concluded in any sitting and the calling in of the Members has been deferred pursuant to this section, the business specified by such Order shall be forthwith disposed of or concluded immediately after the deferred division has been taken. Any recorded division on a motion for concurrence in a bill at the report stage, pursuant to Standing Order 76(9), or for the consideration of the report stage of a bill from a Committee of the Whole, pursuant to Standing Order 76(12), may be deferred.

(3)(a) A Minister of the Crown who from his or her place in the House, at a previous sitting, has stated that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of sections (1) or (2) of this Standing Order in respect of proceedings at the stage at which a public bill was then under consideration either in the House or in any committee, and has given notice of his or her intention so to do, may propose a motion during proceedings under Government Orders, for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at that stage; provided that the time allotted for any stage is not to be less than one sitting day and provided that for the purposes of this paragraph an allocation may be proposed in one motion to cover the proceedings at both the report and the third reading stages on a bill if that motion is consistent with the provisions of Standing Order 76(10). [English]

On a point of order, the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, if I as a member of this House am going to be forced to submit to this hijacking, this lunacy, this waste, this hypocrisy foisted upon this House by the House leader of the New Democratic Party, then I simply want to ask the House if it would consider giving unanimous consent to dispensing with the reading of the matters before us.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to dispense me of reading the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Consent is not unanimous. Therefore, I shall read on.

(b) Notwithstanding paragraph (a), if the House does not sit on days designated as sitting days pursuant to Standing Order 28, the total number of allotted days in that supply period shall be reduced by a number of days proportionate to the number of sitting days on which the House stood adjourned, provided that the number of days of the said reduction shall be determined by the Speaker and announced from the Chair.

(c) Notwithstanding paragraph (a), if the House sits on days designated as days on which the House shall stand adjourned pursuant to Standing Order 28, the total number of allotted days in that supply period shall be increased by one day for every five such days during which the House sits."

31. That section 81(10) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

32. That paragraph 81(12)(a) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(12)(a) Forty-eight hours' written notice shall be given of motions to concur in interim supply, main estimates, supplementary or final estimates, to restore or reinstate any item in the estimates. Twenty-four hours' written notice shall be given of an opposition motion on an allotted day or of a notice to oppose any item in the estimates, provided that for the supply period ending not later than June 23, forty-eight hours' written notice shall be given of a notice to oppose any item in the estimates;"

33. That section 81(14) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(14) In each of the periods described in section (8) of this Standing Order, not more than three opposition motions shall be motions that shall come to a vote, provided that not more than eight opposition motions in total shall be motions that shall come to a vote during the three supply periods provided pursuant to section (8) of this Standing Order. The duration of proceedings on any such motion shall be stated in the notice relating to the appointing of an allotted day or days for those proceedings. On the last day appointed for proceedings on a motion that shall come to a vote, at fifteen minutes before the ordinary hour of daily adjournment, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of the said proceedings."

34. That section 81(16) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(16) On the last allotted day in the period ending June 23, the House shall consider any motion or motions to concur in the main estimates, provided that:

(a) unless previously disposed of, at not later than 10.00 o'clock p.m., the Speaker shall interrupt any proceedings then before the House, and shall first put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of the said motion or motions, and forthwith thereafter put successively, without debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of any business relating to the final estimates for the preceding fiscal year or for any supplementary estimates, the restoration or reinstatement of any item in the final or supplementary estimates or any opposed item in the final or supplementary estimates and, notwithstanding Standing Order 71, for the passage at all stages of any bill or bills based on the final, main or supplementary estimates; and

(b) the Standing Orders relating to the ordinary hour of daily adjournment shall remain suspended until all such questions pursuant to paragraph (a) have been decided."

Mr. Jourdenais: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Laprairie, on a point of order.

Mr. Jourdenais: I was listening carefully to the motion, but I wonder whether the hon. member for Shefford—I know we are not supposed to say members are not present but he is invisible—I wonder whether the member who says he supports the interests of Quebec really thinks it is in the interests of Quebec to have the Chair read 109 pages of a motion that all opposition members and opposition and government leaders have read. If we didn't have to read those 109 pages, we would be able to have more debate and thus further the interests of Quebec. I think the hon. member for Shefford, the great crusader and his seven or eight friends, should be the first to set an example.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois):

35. That section 83(2) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) An Order of the Day for the consideration of a Ways and Means motion or motions shall be designated at the request of a Minister rising in his or her place in the House. When such an Order is designated for a Budget presentation, the Minister shall specify the date and time thereof and the Order shall be deemed to be an Order of the House to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment, if required. At the specified time, the Speaker shall interrupt any proceedings then before the House and such proceedings shall be deemed adjourned; and the House shall proceed forthwith to the consideration of the Ways and Means motion for the Budget presentation. When a motion for the adjournment of the debate on the Ways and Means motion has been made by a Member of the Official Opposition, it shall be deemed adopted without question put; whereupon the Speaker shall adjourn the House to the next sitting day."

36. That section 84(2) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) The proceedings on the Order of the Day for resuming debate on such Budget motion and on any amendments proposed thereto shall not exceed four sitting days."

37. That sections 84(5) and 84(6) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(5) On the third of the said days, if an amendment be under consideration at fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business in such sitting, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put the question on the said amendment.

(6) On the fourth of the said days, at fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business in such sitting, unless the debate be previously concluded, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put the question on the main motion."

38. That sections 87(1) and 87(2) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"87.(1)(a) At the beginning of a Session, the Clerk of the House, acting on behalf of the Speaker, shall, within two sitting days of the placing on the Order Paper of separate items of Private Members' Business from at least twenty Members, notify the Members involved of the time, date and place of a random draw of twenty Members' names to establish the order of precedence for twenty separate items.

(b) To the extent that there is a sufficient number of eligible motions and bills, the draw shall be conducted so that there shall be in the order of precedence an equal number of motions and public bills originating in the House of Commons.

(c) The names of Members with bills and those of Members with motions shall be drawn separately to produce the appropriate number of bills and motions. The names first drawn separately shall then be combined and drawn out again to determine the order of precedence for those items.

(d) Not later than the ordinary hour of daily adjournment on the second sitting day after the day on which the draw is conducted, each Member whose name has been drawn, and who has given notice of more than one motion, shall file with the Clerk an indication as to which motion is to be placed in the order of precedence. If a Member does not file such an indication within the time specified, the first motion standing on the Order Paper in the name of that Member under Private Members' Business will be included in the order of precedence. This requirement applies equally to each Member whose name has been drawn for a public bill.

(2) The Clerk of the House, acting on behalf of the Speaker, shall, when necessary during a Session, conduct a random draw to establish an order of precedence for not more than ten additional items of Private Members' Business, in the manner set down in section (1) of this Standing Order. No Member having an item listed in the order of precedence at the time of the draw shall be eligible to have his or her name chosen. Not later than two sitting days prior to the conduct of the draw, the Clerk shall inform the Members involved of the time, date and place of the said draw."

39. That section 87(5) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(5) The House shall not consider any order for the second reading and reference to a standing, special or legislative committee or for reference to a Committee of the Whole House of any bill, nor any Notices of Motions or Notices of Motions (Papers) unless the said item has been placed in the order of precedence."

40. That Standing Order 91 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"91. Notwithstanding Standing Order 30(6), the consideration of Private Members' Business shall be suspended and the House shall continue to consider any business before it at the time otherwise provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business until an order of precedence is established pursuant to sections (1) and (2) of Standing Order 87 and the Standing Committee on House Management has made a report on its selection of votable items, pursuant to Standing Order 92(1)."

41. That section 92(1) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"92.(1) The Standing Committee on House Management shall meet as soon as practicable after the order of precedence has been established pursuant to sections (1) and (2) of Standing Order 87, but in any case not later than ten sitting days after that day, and from time to time thereafter, and may select after consultation with, among others, the Members proposing the items, not more than three motions and three bills from among the twenty items in the order of precedence and an appropriate number from among any subsequent items for which the order of precedence is established and such selected items shall be designated as "votable items". In making its selection, the Committee shall not take into account the number of Members jointly seconding an item, but shall allow the merits of the items alone to determine the selection and shall report thereon, from time to time. At no time shall there be more than three motions and three bills among the selected items on the order of precedence."

42. That Standing Order 93 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"93. Unless previously disposed of, selected public bills at the second reading stage or selected motions shall receive not more than three hours of consideration and, unless previously disposed of, an item having been once considered, shall be dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence and again considered only when it reaches the top of the said order.

Provided that, unless otherwise disposed of, at not later than fifteen minutes before the end of the time provided for the consideration of the said item, any proceedings then before the House shall be interrupted and every question necessary to dispose of the selected motion or of the selected bill at the second reading stage, shall be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment."

43. That section 94(2) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(2)(a) When a Member has given at least forty-eight hours' written notice that he or she is unable to be present to move his or her motion under Private Members' Business on the date required by the order of precedence, the Speaker, with permission of the Members involved, may arrange for an exchange of positions in the order of precedence with a Member whose motion or bill has been placed in the order of precedence; and

(b) in the event that the Speaker has been unable to arrange an exchange, the House shall continue with the business before it prior to "Private Members' Hour"."

44. That section 96(1) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"96.(1) The proceedings on any item of Private Members' Business which is not a votable item selected pursuant to Standing Order 92 shall expire when debate thereon has been concluded or at the end of the time provided for the consideration of such business and shall be dropped from the Order Paper."

45. That Standing Order 99 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"99.(1) The proceedings on Private Members' Business shall not be suspended except as provided for in Standing Orders 30(4), 50(4), 52(14), 91 and 94(1)(b) or as otherwise specified by Special Order of this House. No Private Members' Business shall be taken up on days appointed for the consideration of business pursuant to Standing Orders 53 and 84(2) nor on days, other than Mondays, appointed for the consideration of business pursuant to Standing Order 81(16).

(2) Whenever Private Members' Business is suspended or not taken up on a Monday, the House shall meet from 11.00 o'clock a.m. to 12.00 o'clock noon for the consideration of Government Orders."

46. That Standing Order 104 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

47. That sections 106(1) and 106(2) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"106.(1) Within ten sitting days following the adoption by the House of a report of the Standing Committee on House Management pursuant to Standing Order 104(1), the Clerk of the House shall convene a meeting of each standing committee whose membership is contained in that report for the purpose of electing a Chairman, provided that forty-eight hours' notice is given of any such meeting.

(2) Each standing and special committee shall elect a Chairman and two Vice-Chairmen, of whom two shall be Members of the government party and the third a Member in opposition to the government, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 116, at the commencement of every session and, if necessary, during the course of a session."

Some hon. members: Dispense!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall I dispense with reading the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent? I shall dispense.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, it was clearly audible that there was not unanimous consent to dispense. We would expect you to continue on.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am very sure that I did not hear a no, and I thought the question was in order.

An hon. member: You were not even in the House.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I clearly yelled out "no" when the Speaker asked whether there was consent. As soon as I heard the final question translated and realized what the Speaker was doing, I clearly yelled out "no."

I want it recorded. I want it very clearly recorded that I did not consent to have this dispensed with.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, when the Chair originally sought unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the motion, it was clear at that point that it was not the intention of a large number of members in the House. It seemed to me, that in the same spirit—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riis: I am sorry, I stand to be corrected, only the members of the New Democratic Party, and I think there were some independent members as well, indicated that they wanted to clearly hear the motion read by the Speaker. Obviously the intention of the House was clear at that time and I think it would be inappropriate for you, on the point of order that was raised by my hon. friend, to not give at least a moment to ensure that in fact unanimous consent was not given.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am prepared to hand down my ruling. First of all, I must confess I recognized the hon. member for Saint-Maurice although he was not in his seat, and I should not have given him the floor, since this is against our Standing Orders, and furthermore, I am not sure I heard no "nays". Of course, when in doubt, I am supposed to give the other person the benefit of the doubt—in that case, I would prefer to stick to the status quo and continue reading the motion, or has the House decided to give its unanimous consent?

[English]

Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, we have been enjoying your reading of the motion, noticing of course that to date virtually all of the motion has been read in French. I am assuming that at the conclusion of the motion being read in French, that you or others will then read the motion in English, as per Standing Order 65.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think the Chair has made it clear that unless the House—as you know, the Speaker is the servant of the House, but it is possible—since the House is the master of its own proceedings—for the House to give its consent to dispense. However, unless otherwise directed, the Chair intends to apply the Standing Orders and read, in both official languages, the motion before the House.

(2) Without anticipating the decision of the House, within five sitting days after the commencement of debate on second reading of a bill which is to be referred to a legislative committee, the Speaker shall appoint a Chairman to the said committee for the study of the said bill, from the Panel of Chairmen established pursuant to Standing Order 112 for that envelope.

(3) Any legislative committee to which a bill has been referred pursuant to Standing Order 73(2) shall meet within two sitting days after the adoption of the motion for the second reading and reference to the legislative committee of the bill."

52. That sections 113(5) and 113(6) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(5) Any legislative committee shall be empowered to examine and enquire into the bills referred to it by the House, to report the same with or without amendments, and except when the House otherwise orders, to send for officials from government departments and agencies and crown corporations and for other persons whom the committee deems to be competent to appear as witnesses on technical matters, to send for papers and records, to sit when the House is sitting, to sit when the House stands adjourned, and to print from day to day such papers and evidence as may be ordered by it.

(6) Any legislative committee may delegate to a subcommittee on agenda and procedure, its power to schedule meetings of the committee and to call for officials from government departments and agencies and crown corporations and for other persons whom the committee deems competent to appear before it as witnesses on technical matters, or to send for papers and records to be presented to the committee in relation to the bill before the committee, provided that the committee shall retain the power to approve such arrangements."

53. That sections 114(1), 114(2) and 114(3) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"114.(1) The membership of legislative, standing and joint committees shall be set out in the report of the Standing Committee on House Management, which shall prepare lists of Members in accordance with Standing Orders 104 and 113(1). Once the report of the committee is concurred in, the membership shall continue from session to session within a Parliament, subject to such changes as may be effected from time to time.

(2)(a) Within five sitting days of the organization of any legislative, standing or standing joint committee, and from time to time thereafter, every member of every such committee shall file with the clerk of the committee a list of not more than seven Members selected from Members of his or her own party in the envelope to which that committee has been assigned, who may substitute for him or her during a meeting of the said committee, according to the procedure set out in paragraph (b) of this section, provided that they shall not become permanent members of the committee. In the event of a Member having neglected to file such a list within the prescribed time, the clerk of the committee will so notify in writing the Chief Whip of the Member's party, (or, in the case of independent Members, the Chief Whip of the Official Opposition) and the Member's name shall be struck from the list of members of the committee, and the Standing Committee on House Management shall select another Member to take his or her place on the permanent membership of the committee. Provisions of this Standing Order shall not apply to the House Management or Public Accounts Committee. Members on these two Committees may draw their lists of seven replacement Members from any envelope.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I will certainly hear the parliamentary secretary, but I want to say something first, and then I will hear the hon. member.

Well over an hour ago, the government introduced a motion. It is a long motion, and as I indicated the pages are about three quarters of an inch thick. I am not persuaded that anyone was particularly taken by surprise with the motion.

Under these circumstances it has been a tradition in this place that the Speaker is allowed to dispense with the reading of the entire motion. As hon. members know, and those who have been listening and watching know, the motion is a series of amendments to the rules of this place. There is some division of opinion in the House with respect to whether the amendments meet with everybody's satisfaction. That is the sort of thing that is expected.

That in itself is not the problem. At the time I asked the House if it would dispense with the necessity of myself and others reading the entire motion, both in French and in English. For reasons which I will not comment upon, the New Democratic Party withheld that consent and, I think, also at least one independent member did.

This has been going on for quite a long time now. I am just wondering if the House would be in a mood to allow me to dispense with reading the rest of this motion?

The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, in your usual fashion you referred to the traditions of the House of Commons and the fact that there has been a tradition that when such a motion has been put, it has been the will of the House to forgo the actual reading of the motion that is before us.

Yes, that tradition has been challenged. The reason it has been challenged is that what we are about to begin debate on, changes to the Standing Orders, are also an abandonment of a whole variety of traditions, so I am proposing—

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to get into debate on the substance of the motion. I know the hon. member for Kamloops would not want to do that either.

What I am bringing to the attention of the House is my concern of the use of the rules. They are used often as tactics. I have been on both sides of the House and I understand that. It would seem to me that there are occasions when having used a rule to make a point there might be an appropriate time to not press it too far.

With respect to the rule itself, it is very hard to persuade anyone in the country that it is necessary for the functioning of this place to read all of these amendments, which of course are meaningless, as an hon. member pointed out, without having the annotated rules in front of one.

In any event, I put it to the House again: Is the House prepared to dispense?

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and then I will hear the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, perhaps this matter can be dispensed with relatively quickly if you would allow me the opportunity to pose a very succinct question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader. Does the government intend to proceed today with giving notice of a closure motion on the changes to the rules?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I have been very clear in all negotiations with my hon. friend, the House leader of the Official Opposition and the House leader of the New Democratic Party that it was not the government's intention to move notice of closure under Standing Order 57(1).

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's comment. We also were concerned that the government intended to move, if not closure, then some form of closure. There are many ways and means of closing off debate.

I would like two clarifications. If there is an affirmative on both of these, I think there would be an inclination from all sides to dispense with further reading of the motion.

The questions are the following. I would like to ask my friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader to indicate clearly that the government does not plan to use any form of closure or time allocation to limit this debate.

Second, in the time remaining, I would hope that some time would be set aside to hear the point of order that I was planning to raise at three o'clock before we got into this process.

Mr. Cooper: First, Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the Chair would take into account the time that we have wasted this afternoon because of the hon. member's persistence when hearing any point of order he may or may not have.

Second, I am not sure what the hon. member means "by any form of closure" and I therefore want him to be more specific. Certainly we as a government have every right to keep all of our options open. I have indicated privately on more than one occasion to the hon. member it was not our intention to move notice of closure today and I indicated the same to the House leader of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Dingwall: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, just to carry this a bit further with the parliamentary secretary who is I think trying to be accommodating here. Is he indicating to the House that he is not intending to proceed with time allocation or notice of closure on this particular motion which is before us?

• (1640)

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, as you know, we are always hesitant to enter into negotiations on the floor. We have had considerable negotiations in private, which have obviously broken down. I have indicated very clearly that it was not our intention to give notice of closure today.

What the government may want to do at some future date I am not in a position to predict. I can only say that we have clearly seen an abuse of House time today and, as a result of that, the House has not been able to proceed with the legislation before it.

We were very clear that we had no intention of moving that notice today. We wanted to debate the issue and we are ready to debate the issue.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I think we are making progress. If the government House leader, who has now arrived, would indicate that the government does not plan to give notice of closure, to move time allocation or to extend the hours, we would be quite prepared to permit the motion to proceed without completing the reading.

I would like to hear some indication, as to whether you are prepared to entertain a few minutes of argument in terms of the inappropriateness of proceeding with this motion at all.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I can certainly support what my parliamentary secretary said. I had no intention of bringing in closure at this point in time, as we have been discussing for upward of a year, but certainly more intensely lately. I did not expect unanimity in support of all elements of the package, but I did expect we would have a reasoned debate where points of view would be put forward and we would reach a decision by vote at an appropriate time.

That was the intent and that is the intent.

Mr. Speaker: It might be helpful if hon. members discuss the matter further. In the meantime, I take it that I do not have the consent of the New Democratic Party to dispense.

As a consequence, according to the rules, we shall have to proceed.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to have not made my point clear. I sought clarification that no notice of closure would be given today, and that there would be no steps toward time allocation or extending the hours, three simple requests.

If I may, I would like to be able to proceed with an argument on the inappropriateness of this particular motion before us.

Mr. Speaker: If I understand the hon. member for Kamloops correctly, he is saying that there is agreement and we shall dispense with the further reading. I shall hear the hon. member on his point of order.

[Editor's Note: The rest of the motion is as follows:]

(b) substitutions in the membership of any legislative or standing committee or, so far as the House is represented, on any standing joint committee shall be effective the day after notification thereof is forwarded, by the permanent member of the committee, to the Chief Whip of his or her party (or, in the case of independent Members, the Chief Whip of the Official Opposition) for signature who, in turn, will forward the substitution to the clerk of the committee;

(c) at any time when no notice has been received by the clerk of the committee pursuant to paragraph (b) of this section, the Chief Whip of any recognized party may effect substitutions by filing notice thereof with the clerk of the committee, having selected the substitutes from among all the Members of his or her party in the envelope to which that committee was assigned; and such substitutions shall be effective immediately once they are received by the clerk of the committee; and

(d) when a permanent member of a legislative, standing or standing joint committee gives notice in writing to the Chairman of the Standing Committee on House Management of his or her intention to give up his or her membership, that Member's resignation shall be effective when a report of the Standing Committee on House Management naming a replacement for him or her has been concurred in by the House.

(3) Changes in the membership of standing or legislative committees which involve the appointment to a committee of a Member not already a member of a committee in the same envelope shall be effective when a report of the Standing Committee on House Management to that effect is concurred in by the House."

54. That section 115(2) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) During periods coinciding with the hours of sittings of the House, priority shall be given to the meetings of legislative committees over those of standing committees in the same envelope."

55. That the following new section be added after section 115(3) of the Standing Orders:

"(4)(a) Each group of committees within an envelope shall have priority of use in two committee rooms, which shall be designated from time to time by the Standing Committee on House Management, provided that the committees of the Management envelope shall sit and have priority in one room only.

(b) In those rooms which have been assigned to the envelope within which they are grouped, committees shall have an absolute priority over all other users."

56. That the following new Standing Order be added after Standing Order 119:

"119.1.(1) Any committee wishing to use the facilities of the House of Commons for the broadcasting of its meetings shall first obtain the consent of the House thereto.

(2) The Standing Committee on House Management shall establish, by report to the House of Commons, experimental guidelines governing the broadcasting of committee meetings. After concurrence by the House in such a report, any committee may permit the presence of the electronic media at its meetings, subject to the said guidelines."

57. That section 123(1) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"123.(1) In addition to the powers granted, so far as this House is concerned, to the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, pursuant to Standing Order 108(4), the said Committee shall be empowered to make a report to the House containing only a resolution which, if the report is concurred in, would be an Order of this House to the Ministry to revoke a statutory instrument, or portion thereof, which the Governor in Council or Minister of the Crown has the authority to revoke."

58. That Standing Order 125 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"125. Except as otherwise provided in any Standing or Special Order of the House, and unless otherwise disposed of, at not later than the ordinary hour of daily adjournment on the fifteenth sitting day following the date on which a notice of motion made pursuant to Standing Order 123(4) appeared on the Order Paper, the same shall be deemed to have been moved and adopted by the House."

59. That paragraph 126(1)(c) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(c) unless the motion or motions be previously disposed of, not later than the end of the said hour of consideration, the Speaker shall interrupt any proceedings then before the House and put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of the said motion or motions, provided that any division or divisions demanded in relation thereto shall stand deferred until no later than the ordinary hour of daily adjournment in that sitting, when the bells to call in the Members shall be sounded for not more than fifteen minutes. Any remaining questions necessary to dispose of proceedings in relation to such motion or motions, on which a decision has been deferred until after the taking of such a division, shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment."

60. That Standing Order 132 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"132. Petitions for private bills shall only be received by the House if filed within the first six weeks of the session, and every private bill originating in the Commons shall be presented to the House within two weeks after the petition therefor has been favourably reported upon by the Examiner of Petitions or by the Standing Committee on House Management."

61. That sections 133(2), 133(3) and 133(4) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) Petitions for private bills, when received by the House, are to be taken into consideration by the Examiner who shall report to the House in each case the extent to which the requirements of the Standing Orders regarding notice have been complied with; and in every case where the notice is reported by the Examiner to have been insufficient or otherwise defective, or if the Examiner reports that there is any doubt as to the sufficiency of the notice as published, the petition, together with the report of the Examiner thereon, shall be taken into consideration, without special reference, by the Standing Committee on House Management, which shall report to the House as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the notice, and where the notice is deemed insufficient or otherwise defective, shall recommend to the House the course to be taken in consequence of such deficiency or other defect.

(3) All private bills from the Senate (not being based on a petition which has already been so reported on) shall be first taken into consideration and reported on by the Examiner of Petitions, and when necessary by the Standing Committee on House Management in like manner, after the first reading of such bills, and before their consideration by any legislative committee.

(4) No petition praying for the incorporation of a railway company, or of a canal company, or for an extension of the line of any existing or authorized railway or canal, or for the construction of branches thereto, shall be considered by the Examiner, or by the Standing Committee on House Management, until there has been filed with the said Examiner a map or plan, showing the proposed location of the works, and each county, township, municipality or district through which the proposed railway or canal, or any branch or extension thereof, is to be constructed."

62. That section 135(1) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"135. (1) All private bills are introduced on petition, and after such petition has been favourably reported upon by the Examiner of Petitions or by the Standing Committee on House Management, such bills shall be laid upon the Table of the House by the Clerk, and shall be deemed to have been read a first time and ordered to be printed, and to have been ordered for a second reading when so laid upon the Table, and so recorded in the Votes and Proceedings."

63. That Standing Order 140 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"140. No motion for the suspension or modification of any provision of the Standing Orders applying to private bills or to petitions for private bills shall be entertained by the House until after reference is made to the Standing Committee on House Management, and a report made thereon by the Committee and, in its report, the Committee shall state the grounds for recommending such suspension or modification."

64. That section 141(4) of the Standing Orders be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(4) It is the duty of the committee to which any private bill may be referred by the House, to call the attention of the House specially to any provisions inserted in such bill that do not appear to have been contemplated in the notice or petition for the same, as reported upon by the Examiner of Petitions or by the Standing Committee on House Management; and any private bill so reported shall not be placed on the Order Paper for consideration until a report has been made by the Examiner as to the sufficiency or otherwise of the notice to cover such provisions."

That a message be sent to the Senate to apprise their Honours of the change to Standing Order 108(4);

That the Standing Orders as amended take effect on the first sitting day of the Third Session of the 34th Parliament;

That for the purposes of Standing Order 104(1) and Standing Order 112, the first sitting day of the Third Session of the 34th Parliament shall be deemed to be the commencement of the first session of a Parliament;

That all outstanding Orders of Reference be deemed referred to the new appropriate and corresponding standing committees;

That, where appropriate, budgets of committees be transferred to the new appropriate and corresponding standing committee;

That the Clerk of the House be authorized to renumber the Standing Orders as may be deemed necessary, making such technical and consequential changes to the Standing Orders, as well as such changes to the Order Paper and Notice Paper, as may be required; and

That the Clerk of the House be instructed to print a revised edition of the Standing Orders of the House.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask you to rule that the motion before us, No. 30 on the Order Paper, is in whole or in part improperly before the House and is in whole or in part out of order. My concerns are focused on two distinct elements of this motion.

The first is found in paragraph 30, which proposes to amend the right of the Crown to debate supply before it is granted to the Crown.

The second is found in paragraph 20, which is the proposal to introduce a new Standing Order which can override the failure of a minister to obtain unanimous consent from the House.

My arguments, put very concisely, will seek to establish the following points:

First, that these provisions seek to erode the historic authority of the House and the rights of its members and are thus contemptuous of the House as they will tend to diminish its dignity and impede members in the discharge of their functions.

Second, these proposals exceed those limits imposed by the Constitution and by statute and the power of the House to regulate its internal affairs.

Third, adoption of these proposals would be a de facto amendment to those limiting statutes and are thus an attempt to achieve by simple motion changes which should both be statutory and constitutional.

Fourth, in light of the above, I submit that our traditions and practise require that they be found out of order. It is clear to me that the proposals in paragraphs 30 and 20 will erode the authority of the House and impede members in the discharge of their functions.

In paragraph 30 the government proposes that;

> —if the House does not sit on days designated as sitting days pursuant to Standing Order 28, the total number of allotted days in that supply period shall be reduced by a number of days proportionate to the number of sitting days on which the House stood adjourned—

I have no procedural concerns with other proposals in that section, namely to reduce the number of supply days in an ordinary session from 25 to 20. Those proposals will diminish the ability of the House to examine and debate the Crown's request for expenditure, but this change is quantitative, not qualitative. I would just further note that in the British House, to which our privileges and authorities are constitutionally and statutorily linked, the number of allotted days is also limited to 20.

It is the proposal to reduce the number of allotted days proportionately with the reduction in the number of sitting days which, I submit, is a qualitative change to the rights of the House over supply.

This reduction in supply debate assumes that opposition or allotted days are a share of House time, is provided for business which does not originate with ministers of the Crown, and that this share should be linked to the length of the session.

It denies the historic linkage between allotted days and the granting of supply to the government.

It denies the historic authority of the House over supply.

It denies the historic rights of members to debate supply.

It forgets that for this House of Commons, the contemporary form of members' historic right to air their grievances and petition the Crown before supply is granted is during the opposition days that we normally refer to.

A simple reading of this motion may not reveal this flaw. It is better understood through hypothetical examples.

If, for example, the Crown forcibly adjourns the House, we could arrive at a situation whereby our own Standing Orders would have us sitting only on June 23 to entertain one day of debate on supply and to pass the Appropriation Act.

More realistically perhaps is a scenario where, in the next few weeks, a minister of the Crown could force through the House a motion to adjourn to an indefinite call, recall the House for June 23 and obtain consent on supply.

If this motion passes, our Standing Orders would permit this but the conventional and historic control of supply by the Commons would not be upheld.

As our own Precis of Procedure points out:

> A fundamental element of the principle underlying the financial procedures of Parliament is the idea that Parliament does not grant supply until the opposition has had the opportunity to demonstrate why it should be refused.

Or, as the late Eugene Forsey wrote in his recent manuscript, The Question of Confidence in Responsible Government:

> The historic House of Commons was in Bolingbroke's phrase and emphasized by Edward Blake, "the grand inquest of the nation". Its principal concern was with the voicing of grievances and scrutinizing the financial and administrative measures of the Crown.

Certainly, at the time of Confederation, the power of the House to debate and withhold supply was clearly understood. As Bourinot wrote in his fourth edition on page 404:

> The rules of the house with respect to the expenditure of public money and the impositions of burthens upon the people are in conformity with the practice of its English prototype. All the checks and guards which the wisdom of English parliamentarians has imposed in the course of centuries upon public expenditures now exist in their full force in the parliament of the dominion.
> The cardinal principle, which underlies all parliamentary rules and constitutional provisions with respect to money grants and public taxes is this—

I underscore his words "principle which underlies all parliamentary rules and constitutional provisions with respect to money grants" and will return to these constitutional provisions in a moment.

He continued:

> When burthens are to be imposed on the people, every opportunity must be given for free and frequent discussion, so that parliament may not, by sudden and hasty votes, incur any expenses or be induced to approve of measures, which may entail heavy and lasting burthens upon the country. Hence it is ordered that the Crown must first come down with a recommendation whenever the government finds it necessary to incur a public expenditure, and that there should be full consideration of the matter in committee and in the house, so that no member may be forced to come to a hasty decision, but that every one may have abundant opportunities afforded him of stating his reasons for supporting or opposing the proposed grant.

What greater indignity to the Commons would there be, than to have to deny its right to withhold supply until grievances have been heard.

What greater insult to the authority of the House than for a government to claim supply without hearing grievances. That is my first point and very succinctly I will put my second.

• (1650)

Similarly offensive to the rights of the House and its members is the proposal to override unanimous consent. Clause 20 of this motion proposes to change our notion of unanimous consent and to enable the rules of procedure and operations of the House to be changed by an agent of the Crown unless 25 members of the House object. It is significant that this proposal establishes two classes of members, those who by virtue of being ministers of the Crown can obtain unanimous consent as long as 25 members do not object, and those ordinary members for whom unanimous consent means no one objects.

Surely this is tipping the balance of power between the government and the Commons which significantly diminishes the authority of the House and by sharply narrowing the scope of their duties is this an impediment of the ability of the members to perform those duties as currently defined.

Let us consider just for a moment what this proposed rule would and could involve. With this rule a minister of the Crown could propose that the House pass all legislation, grant all moneys for the year, diminish the ability of the committees of the House to examine government's expenditures and operations, and adjourn until further recall.

Unless 25 members, that is 10 per cent of all private members are present to oppose, these suggestions would automatically be adopted without debate, without the ability to amend.

The question I put to you, Mr. Speaker, is not whether or not this is right, or just, or fair play. Those questions, you will agree, should be saved for another time. The question I put is whether or not this is a qualitative substantial alteration to the privileges of members and a qualitative and substantial reduction in the authority of the House to debate and decide upon proposals put forward by ministers of the Crown.

Surely when an agent of the Crown can deny 24 members the right to speak to a motion this is an infringement on the rights of the House as defined by Redlich. He recognized these as:

> The sum of the fundamental rights of the House and of its individual members as against the prerogatives of the Crown.

That is from Procedure of the House of Commons, Volume 1.

Surely this would be an infringement of the privileges of members as described by Erskine May as:

> —the peculiar rights enjoyed by—members of each House individually, without which they could not discharge their duties.

A former law clerk of this House, Joseph Maingot, wrote:

> A distinctive mark of a privilege is its ancillary character—it is a means to accomplish a purpose or fulfil a function—The members of the legislative body enjoy these rights and immunities because the legislature cannot act or perform without the unimpeded use of the services of its members.

I am reminded of the importance to members of the right to deny unanimous consent by the events last summer when Elijah Harper could speak for his community by refusing to allow the rules to be broken.

You may hear arguments from those who feel that the House is the master of its own proceedings, and that if the House shares my concerns about the curtailment of the privileges of the House and its members contained in these proposals, then the House will reject them.

You may hear arguments that these are questions of debate, not of procedure.

My argument is that first, the House has never been fully master of its own proceedings and second, we acknowledge this in our daily operations.

It is the Constitution of Canada which is, in its own words, "the supreme law of Canada". It is supreme to all other laws, supreme to the Standing Orders of this House.

We cannot, by unanimous consent or by motion, reduce the number required for quorum below 20.

That is because our Constitution, in Section 48 of the BNA Act, requires that quorum be set at 20.

Similarly, we cannot, by unanimous consent or by motion, enable private members to propose taxes or expenditures.

That is because our constitution and our parliamentary conventions prohibit it. To do so would be to enlarge the authority of the House beyond its constitutional limits.

You, Mr. Speaker, would rule that any such motions would be clearly out of order.

The same Constitution and law which established our quorum at 20 and which require a royal recommendation on any expenditure or tax proposal contains another requirement on this House.

Section 18 of the Constitution says, and the language is repeated in the Parliament of Canada Act:

> The privileges, immunities and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and by the Members thereof respectively, shall be such as are from time to time defined by any Act of the Parliament, but so that any Act of the Parliament of Canada defining such privileges, immunities or powers shall not confer any privileges, immunities or powers exceeding those at the passing of such Act held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the Members thereof.

In our Parliamentary Privileges in Canada, we find the following:

> A Privilege may not be diminished, prejudicially affected or repealed save by express statutory enactment to that effect.

Any change to our privileges, immunities and powers requires an act of Parliament, not a change to our Standing Orders.

In Britain, the sources of parliamentary privileges are in the usages and customs of Parliament. In Canada, privilege is founded upon this section of the Constitution Act.

In summary, this motion contains two proposals which, I submit, are out of order as they seek to amend the powers and privileges of this House.

The Constitution insists that any proposals be contained in an act of Parliament. The Parliament of Canada Act insists on this. So too must we.

To adopt these changes, the House will be making a de facto change to the Parliament of Canada Act by amending our privileges, and to the Constitution by amending our privileges by using simple Standing Order changes, not an act of Parliament.

Last week, Mr. Speaker, you ruled that the House could not change statutes by way of a bill based on the estimates. In essence, you said that the House could not do by the back door what must be done through legislative change. You ruled a proposal to do that out of order, and declared that there would be no further proceedings on any such proposal.

I submit the same approach would require that a portion of the proposal before us today ought to be declared null and void. I trust you will similarly rule, that there can be no further proceedings relating to any proposal which seeks to change the privileges, immunities and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the House of Commons until a legislative change is made to permit such a change.

A contemporary parliamentarian John Stewart wrote: "The procedures by which our House of Commons does its work are, in a sense, a part of Canada's Constitution. They are part of the process by which we are governed. When the House of Commons makes a major change in the way it operates, the constitutional process, the governing of Canada, has been altered, perhaps not fundamentally, but certainly to some degree. There is a close, causal relationship between how a body works and what that body does."

Mr. Speaker, I thank you and my colleagues for their indulgence.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it is strange that for months and months of discussion, there was not one word of this.

Perhaps it is because citation 4 of Beauchesne's states very clearly:

> 4. Beyond the vast legacy of tradition implanted in Canada by the preamble to the Constitution Act, one section above all affects procedure. Section 18 permits the adoption in Canada of all of the privileges of Parliament current in the British House of Commons. Few of these are of greater importance than the right to regulate the internal proceedings of the House, or more specifically, to establish binding rules of procedure.

Clearly, that is precisely what is happening. Nothing more sinister. The suggestion that the House could meet one day a year and get supply is absurd. Prior to the rule changes of 1969, the Appropriations Act was a stand-alone act. It could have been closed off in one day.

The changes in 1969 brought forward a lot of days during which members of the opposition had an opportunity to challenge items in the estimates.

I ask the hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party to show me once where his party used those allotted days to challenge the estimates. Not once did his party challenge supply. To now stand up and say that it is a sacred right that is somehow being infringed is an absurdity that goes in the face of the practices of his own party.

In terms of the rule providing for changes in Standing Orders or the kind of consent motions we seek by unanimous consent, the hon. member neglected to mention it is proscribed by having it possible to introduce them only during Routine Proceedings when this House is habitually full.

Therefore, the 25 member requirement is a significant and major inhibition to abuse of that. To suggest that can be used somehow during Routine Proceedings to commit the heinous crime he has suggested is equally absurd.

In any event, I am now departing into the realm of debate on the rules which, if we had not had the childish behaviour of the New Democratic Party earlier today, we could have had that debate in substance, which is what the people of Canada expect from mature politicians who represent them here in Parliament, not the kind of childish behaviour we saw from the New Democratic Party today and continue to see.

• (1700)

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding perhaps I might indicate that I will of course hear further argument on this matter. The hon. government House leader may want to address the Chair further. I certainly will hear that at an appropriate time.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the reason I halted my remarks is that having wasted all the time this afternoon it is now Private Members' Hour and there is no longer an opportunity. The combination of this initial procedure and now going on to another day to debate this point of order to further delay and obstruct this House, I have serious concerns about that.

I would rather have that debate on the procedural argument right now if there were consent to do that. If there is agreement, let us present our arguments on this point of order now, have it ruled on, and then we can proceed with orderly business tomorrow. That is certainly my preferred option.

I would ask if there is agreement at this point in time.

Mr. Speaker: Just so that everybody understands, the hon. government House Leader put it to the House that we would continue this argument into Private Members' Hour. If there had been consent we could have done that. All I am making clear is that I certainly will hear members further on it at an appropriate time.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Algoma—Mining; the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap—The Environment; the hon. member for York West—Air Transportation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CENTENNIAL FLAME RESEARCH AWARD ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore) moved the second reading of, and concurrence in, amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-258, an act respecting the establishment of the Centennial Flame Research Award to publicize the contributions to Canadian public life of persons with disabilities.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member for Mississauga South has a private member's bill to be debated. He has indicated that I might, with leave of the House, just for a moment at this time bring before the House the bill that I had previously brought here as a private member, Bill C-258, which was unanimously passed by the House of Commons on December 10 last, dealing with the Centennial Flame and the disabled.

This bill was amended in the Senate to add some references to the Senate. It is therefore now necessary for the House of Commons to re-enact it as amended. I have spoken with representatives from all parties and groups and, as there is consent, I would like to do so.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

CRIMINAL RECORDS ACT

The House resumed from Monday, December 3, 1990, consideration of the motion of Mr. Blenkarn that Bill C-314, an act to amend the Criminal Records Act and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I begin by commending the member for Mississauga South on the initiative he is taking in presenting this private member's bill having to do with the rights of those who have had their charges taken care of, to have their records disposed of.

First of all, this bill strikes a very responsive cord in the hearts and minds of anyone interested in fairness and justice in our legal system. I am attracted to it. It makes me reflect on the days quite a few years ago when I first sponsored a bill that dealt with parental kidnapping. I had never heard of the phenomenon—I suppose that is the best use of the work I could make—before a constituent of mine told me about her child having been abducted by her estranged husband. She had found that there was no protection for her or her child in the Criminal Code as it stood at that time.

I began in 1976 to sponsor a bill dealing with parental kidnapping. It was a very short and simple bill which simply expressed that reality, but I did not receive passage of that bill at that time. As a matter of fact, it took six years for me to see that bill move from a private member's bill by an opposition member to be accepted by the government of the day in 1982 as part of the legislative package of the government.

By 1982 it had become a very complex bill, because I as an ordinary layman recognized the problem but did not realize its complexity or the complexity of the solution that would have to be presented to solve that problem. By the time the bill was passed, it was several pages long.

In looking at the proposal put forward by my friend and colleague from Mississauga South, I am reminded of that. He has presented a relatively simple bill to deal with what appears to be a very simple problem, and he would like to see it dealt with. I compliment him for that.

I am told by those who understand the intricacies of criminal law better than I do that the problem and the solution are far more complex than the bill which he has presented. Therefore, I want to begin by complimenting him and ask him to make certain that he carries this crusade forward to ensure that all the exigencies of this particular phenomenon are dealt with.

By identifying a specific provision of the law which adversely affects constituents who have been in contact with the member, and by proposing solutions as he has done, the member upholds the finest traditions of public service which all members of this House should seek to emulate.

It seems to me that all too often we address issues at the macro level and, I might add, at a kind of transient level. We address them once and then tend to forget them. In our busy schedules there remains scant time to respond in such a meaningful way to the concerns of individual Canadians.

This can be even more problematic for those citizens who do not have experience in dealing with the mechanisms of government, who feel powerless in the face of bureaucratic rules, and who do not have an organized or sophisticated proponent to speak loudly for their rights.

It is in responding to the needs and aspirations of these citizens that the role of the private member in identifying inequity and in proposing legislative solutions is so important.

My hon. colleague has fulfilled this most important obligation of the private member in the initiative before us today.

• (1710)

What is the problem he has identified? The member seized upon the issue when he became aware that a young man who had received an absolute discharge as a dispensation of case before the courts was nonetheless left with a criminal record. This person was required therefore to obtain a pardon to remove the record of the conviction.

I might add that simply getting a pardon is not necessarily always the end of the problem for someone in a case like this because, for example, if he were to cross over the international border between Canada and the United States many times, even though the Canadian authorities may have expunged the record and given him a pardon, it is not necessarily true that the American authorities have done that.

As the hon. member quite rightly points out, the purpose of granting an absolute or conditional discharge is to ameliorate the negative effects of the occurrence. My colleague points out that when the Criminal Records Act was proclaimed more than 15 years ago, it provided that the consequences of a finding of guilt which resulted in an absolute or conditional discharge should be dealt with as if a criminal record had been created although no conviction was registered.

My hon. friend displays his usual perception and acuity of thought when he notes that this provision of the act appears inconsistent with the implicit intent that the purpose of a discharge is to be less deleterious to the offender than if no discharge had been granted.

The decision to grant a discharge is made by a judge, having regard for the nature of the offence, the circumstances surrounding its commission, and a decision about the offender and whether his personal circumstances are such that he requires this exceptional treatment.

Arguably, being required to apply for a pardon for a crime that has not resulted in a conviction creates an anomaly which should be rectified. With no harm to the public safety, measures may be taken to redress this inequity. The hon. member has suggested one such way.

I know the member has informed himself on the history and development of the Criminal Records Act and will therefore be aware that the provision of immediate concern was put in the legislation as the only way to compel the sealing of the various and disparate components of their record, which will still exist even when no conviction is registered.

For instance, in our system which shares federal–provincial responsibilities for the provision of justice services, records of a sort exist at the police level, within the administrative mechanisms of our courts, under the authority of both federal and provincial officials responsible for corrections, and within the national police information data base named the CPIC system.

Regardless of the disposition, reference to the particulars of the case may exist in any of these locations and under the control of these various authorities. It was considered expedient and efficacious to treat the discharges as if a conviction had occurred, to expedite the sealing of these various records. In fact, at the time it was considered to be the only realistic mechanism to provide the protection to the ex–offender which the hon. member seeks today.

As successive governments benefited from the experience of administering the provisions of the act, this and several other unforeseen consequences of the legislative provisions were identified as requiring reform and the legislation was targeted for amendment.

The suggestions before us today pin–point two of those problems and seek to provide corrective solutions. While the problems have been well identified, I must tell my hon. friend that his suggested reforms are but one course of action among several which have been proposed.

In addition, if the House adopts the measures before us today, there would remain several additional issues requiring our attention. While it has been said that perfect is the enemy of the good, in this case I would suggest, with respect and deference to my friend's interest and hard work, that it may be possible to bring about more comprehensive and needed changes to the act.

If the outcome of the member's work is that the government is to initiate a review of outstanding issues, focusing particularly on the principle of fairness which my friend has raised, I would suggest that this would be an indication of the close collaboration between private members and the government.

In fact, this would amount to a clear indicator of the positive effect that one member speaking for the rights of a private citizen and a constituent can have in changing the laws of Canada.

I know you are signalling me to stop, Mr. Speaker. I will finish with just two sentences.

Without being trite or waxing too eloquent, I would say that if the member's work proves to be a catalyst for reform in this area, he should be proud of his efforts and complimented by all of us who feel strongly about the important role each member may play in the political life of this country.

I want to end by complimenting the member on the work he has done and encourage him that even though time might run out on this particular measure, he take the occasion of the experience he has gained in this measure to work on the measure to ensure that the bill in some form does receive passage of this House.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for this opportunity to join in the second reading of the debate on Bill C-314, an act to amend the Criminal Records Act and the Criminal Code.

Many of our constituents have strong opinions on the way our criminal justice system should work. I welcome this discussion of some of the legislation that frames the system. I would like to outline for my fellow members and interested Canadians who may be following these proceedings some of the background that must be considered each time reform of the laws governing criminal misconduct is undertaken.

The acts that the hon. member for Mississauga South proposes to amend are only two of many interrelated statutes that have evolved to guide us in our daily conduct and to exact punishment when societal norms and values are violated. The Young Offenders Act, the Income Tax Act, the Fisheries Act, the Narcotic Control Act, and the Official Secrets Act are only a sampling of the federal statutes that exist to control behaviour and to exact punishment when their provisions fail to deter.

In addition, there exists a plethora of provincial statutes and municipal laws of which one may run afoul and a good number of Canadians have been dealt with by the courts for their misdeeds. More than one in ten of our adult citizens has a criminal record.

It is important that the record shows who these offenders may encounter on their way from the commission of an offence to the determination of their penalty. In a typical case an individual may be arrested by a municipal police officer who, although operating in accordance with local policies and procedures, is ultimately answerable to a provincial government, which through the provisions of our Constitution Act exercises responsibility for the administration of the Criminal Code and related federal statutes.

The case may then proceed within the provincial jurisdiction to a Crown attorney who takes the facts to court. If the judge determines guilt and the sentence is a fine, probation or incarceration for less than two years, the offender may never encounter the federal sector of the criminal justice system directly.

Should the sentence be of two or more years duration, however, he or she will become the responsibility of the Solicitor General of Canada and will enter the purview of the Correctional Service of Canada and finally, the National Parole Board. Most of those convicted will at some stage encounter one or more voluntary organizations that often assist in the supervision of those who are conditionally released and other assistance in rehabilitation programs to prepare offenders for their reintegration into the community.

The system is not simple. From municipal to provincial jurisdiction, from the federal system to the voluntary sector, the whole process is most often begun when the police act on a complaint of a private citizen who has been victimized. Of course the media may show an interest in any particular crime or court case. It is important that we keep in mind the number of diverse players in the criminal justice game.

To conclude my preamble, I will note that the imaginary criminal that I have described and every other Canadian whose deeds have led to a sentence being handed down by a court, including those who have been granted conditional or absolute discharge, will thereafter bear a criminal record.

Furthermore, this record may not be limited to the record of an arrest or a transcript of a trial but may exist in many forms and in various locations.

In preparing for this debate, I tried to become familiar with the bill that the hon. member for Mississauga South has put forward and the legislation that has prompted his initiative. There is a lesson for all of us here. Legislation that has been duly considered, passed by this House, and promulgated with the best of intentions may in the passage of time prove to be imperfect.

The Criminal Records Act is an example of legislation that may have created certain inequities, anomalies and administrative difficulties and yet has endured for some 20 years without significant amendment. I would suggest that one of the amendments that is long overdue for consideration is the one proposed by the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Bill C–314 would correct an anomaly that apparently has led to undue hardship in a number of cases and would simplify the application of the provisions of the Criminal Records Act. As I have already implied, any efforts to simplify the area of criminal legislation would meet with my approval. Efforts to reform the Criminal Records Act should not, however, be limited to a single change, even if the amendment may address the most obvious or the most important flaw in the legislation.

Let me outline some of the other facets of the Criminal Records Act that have attracted suggestions for reform over the years.

Every pardon, however minor the crime for which a citizen has been convicted—including those non-convictions resulting in conditional or absolute discharge that are troubling our colleague—may only be granted through the concurrence of the Governor in Council. This approval is granted on the advice of the Solicitor General who has in turn relied on the agencies within his ministry for their recommendation respecting each and every application for a pardon.

As an example of an area in which the opportunity for reform is obvious, removing the requirement of the Governor in Council to approve all pardons would reduce an administrative burden. Alternatively, a lesser degree of relief could be realized if the Governor in Council authority could be directed toward a more manageable group, such as the serious offences contained in schedule 15 of the Parole Act, while others could be in the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General.

To follow this line of reasoning further, another administrative shortcut that could be considered might be that the Solicitor General delegate the authority to the chairman of the Parole Board to grant pardons directly in certain circumstances. Although pursuit of these options would appear to entail only technical and procedural change, it would require legislative amendments to be brought before this House.

A number of issues and suggestions for reform have been presented during reviews of the Criminal Records Act that have been conducted over the last decade. These are now being studied by a committee of officials in the Ministry of the Solicitor General to determine their continued relevance. While these outstanding issues may not require action in the short term, they may continue to be supported by the groups that propose them and any limited legislative reforms which are brought before Parliament may result in renewed calls for more extensive reform from interest groups and the public.

Past suggestions for reform have included the following issues. What options might be entertained in the determination of those who would be eligible for a pardon under future legislation? Questions remain as to whether the eligibility period for a pardon should relate directly to the penalty imposed, to the nature of the crime itself or should be, as it now is in cases where pardon is granted, a standard period for all offences in each of several specified categories.

What consideration will need to be given to developing criteria to be used in determining an ex-offender's status as a law-abiding member of the community? To investigate loosely defined indications of character, as is now authorized by the Criminal Records Act, during community assessments may be contrary to modern concepts of the right to privacy and equality. It has been argued that to deny relief on the basis of non-criminal behaviour is to impose an additional disadvantage on an offender by virtue of his status as an offender.

What should be the extent of the relief obtained when a pardon is granted? It has been noted that a conviction carries with it numerous disabilities which can profoundly influence an offender's subsequent contacts with the criminal justice system; self-image, social interactions, occupational pursuits, travel possibilities, and much more. Unfortunately, the Criminal Records Act offers at best, only a partial remedy for such problems. The act provides only that records will be sealed when a pardon is granted.

There is a very important clause in Bill C-314, which calls for the destruction of pardoned records in the circumstances outlined by the bill. This highlights the problem that the benefits of the current legislation are limited with respect to the most serious disabilities which flow from the creation, control and dissemination of a criminal record and collateral information. To be completely clear about this, as it now stands, an individual who has been pardoned can answer "no" if asked: "Have you ever committed an offence for which you have not received a pardon", but cannot deny that an offence was committed.

It is my opinion that any reform of the current legislation should address, at a minimum, the question of whether an offender shall be afforded the right of deniability of the criminal convention upon grant of the pardon.

If it should prove impossible to destroy, rather than seal records once a pardon has been granted, to what if any use may these residual records be put? Consultations have suggested that there is no final consensus among interested groups on the appropriate use of or access to the sealed records of pardoned offenders, nor is there agreement on the proper procedure which should be followed for the eventual destruction of records.

I must admit, some quite persuasive suggestions have been made that records should be available to the police for investigative purposes; to Crown attorneys for use in prosecutions of a pardoned offender for a new offence or to judges in determining sentences.

A strong body of opinion expresses support for applying a bona fide employment exemption to permit access to records. This would allow access for certain employers to records of convictions relevant to the job responsibilities.

For example, a pardoned record of conviction for predatory sexual offences against children might remain accessible to day care operators, school boards or adoption agencies.

These are just some of the examples that really should be studied very thoroughly. I am sorry, I have run out of time, so I will have to close.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure, as always, to rise in this House and discuss legislation which, in this particular case, is well intended and well directed. One can see this very easily in the explanatory notes.

"The purpose of this bill is to provide that where a person is discharged under the Criminal Code in respect of an offence, all records relating to that offence must be destroyed." That is the proper purpose and proper intent. We really do not have any problem with this legislation going to a committee to be looked at or to be rethought and brought back, whichever the government prefers.

We have some basic problems in about four areas. They could be accommodated in committee by amendment or the legislation could be redrafted. The intent, from our point of view, is a good and proper.

When a court grants an absolute discharge or a conditional discharge, the purpose of the judge making that decision is in effect to say that in an absolute situation that somebody broke the criminal law, probably by mistake and probably unknowingly or the effects are going to be so great that the court wants to say that the offence did not in fact take place.

The other intent is to say on a conditional basis that: "Yes, you probably knew what you did was wrong, but we do not want to see you penalized for the rest of your life. So this is a condition. You do this, this and this, and then the offence will disappear". But the record is not disappearing. The intent of the legislation is to get rid of that record and really do what the court wanted done.

Our concerns are very simply put in the area of specifics. There is really no definition of what constitutes a criminal record. For the legislation to work properly there must be a clear definition of what actually falls into the record and what is going to be destroyed, so that the intent and purpose indicated in this bill are accomplished. All that requires is a good definition of "criminal record".

Section 5 in the bill also appears to remove the defence of autre fois convict in circumstances after the passage of time. I do not think that defence should ever be removed. It should be there and available no matter what happens. It appears to create a situation that could see a person recharged because the record is destroyed. Therefore we need some advice and some direction as to how to get around the conundrum of having the record disappear and then, at the same time, having somebody who could be recharged under the same offence because there is no record. So this requires more thought and direction, but could again be accomplished by amendment.

The other area of concern for us is the fact that the records are normally very incomplete and scattered among different courts. People could be residing in one province and the conviction is in another. It creates numerous problems in trying to determine just exactly what should be destroyed and where it is. The definition would determine what should be destroyed but it still might be in circumstance where no one knows where the record is. We need to come up with a system where that is controlled, or at least deals with it, so that everything which is intended to be destroyed is in fact destroyed.

The final thing that gives us some concern is in the area of the actual process of destruction in which it is required that the person be notified, giving that person the right to be in attendance. Again we think that that is well intended, but it could be reworked and changed so that it could accomplish the purpose that if the person did want to be in attendance he could be. On the other hand we do not want to see that as a mandatory situation that the person be in attendance and the legislation does not seem to say that.

The other concern is that the person may not be able to be notified for whatever reason and is assuming that his or her record is going to disappear after a passage of time, does not leave his address, and therefore is not notified. Consequently the record may not be destroyed. We think there should be a little fine tuning in that particular section.

But for those exceptions, the general intent is one which we support. We are leaving it to the government to determine whether it wants this to go to committee or whether it wants to not support its own member and, in effect, its own proposal which would bring benefit to individuals who have absolute or conditional discharges.

That is why I do not want to take my full time in speaking on this but to have clearly on the record our concerns, the things we would like to see looked at and could be done by committee. It is up to the government to decide what they want to do.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words on the bill before us. I would like to begin by expressing my respect for the hon. member for Mississauga South for his very close attention to what is obviously a very important matter.

The information I would like to bring to the attention of the House this afternoon relates to the historical background of the legislation which is before us. Although the hon. member for Mississauga South is well aware of that historical background, I suspect other members of the House and the public at large may not be. They may not be aware that there seems to be some parallels between the bill which is here today and the actions of a former member Donald Tolmie who was responsible for the original genesis of the legislation.

The origin of the current Criminal Records Act was in fact a private member's bill. It was introduced in June 1966, and referred to the justice committee at that time. The justice committee held four meetings between March 21, 1967, and November 2, 1967. Various witnesses appeared at these meetings of the committee, and the whole process appears to be both an instructive and a helpful one.

The justice committee subsequently made its report to the government of the day. The government, in the interim, had developed a bill of its own and the committee proceeded with study of the government initiative.

In introducing the government bill, the then solicitor general, the hon. George McIlraith, commented on the purpose of the proposed legislation, and I would like to quote that:

> In this whole subject there is the problem of striking a proper balance among the different needs.
> It seems to me that our prime and paramount need, and indeed the whole purpose of seeking to legislate on this subject, is to provide some means of removing from a person, who has been convicted and subsequently re-entered society and rehabilitated himself, that rather vaguely defined but nonetheless real stigma that he seems to have to carry with him in later life in those circumstances it would seem to all that it is unjust. That is the primary need. But consistent with that I suppose it is only responsible to say that we must not in correcting that evil, create another by removing the proper need relating to the identification of criminals who are still engaged in criminal activity. It is a delicate matter of adjustment to get a proper balance because that latter need, while not the paramount one in this type of legislation, is nonetheless an important one which cannot be brushed aside or ignored.

It would seem to me that we face, in the current situation, the same fundamental question that was posed when the legislation was first introduced in 1967. What is the legitimate balance between the objective of assisting those who have transgressed the law to reform and lead crime free lives and equally legitimate needs of the policing authorities and the community at large to be protected from a recurrence of criminal activities.

In truth, I must say that the question is one that requires very serious thought. Certainly, it is worth the time of this House to ensure that all the opinions on a very important issue have been canvassed.

We must not rush to make one change to a complex piece of legislation which may have far-reaching and unforeseen consequences on the other parts of the system. Has sufficient study been done, is a question which we must ask. Have the opinions of the interested parties been sought and secured? Ideas for change in this area were first presented to the House in the form of a private members' bill, as I have already indicated. That is much like the proposal which is before us today.

The government of that day apparently recognized the importance of implementing change in this area and encouraged to act on that initiative by Mr. Tolmie, proceeded to study options for reform and to present to the House, a government bill. That bill proposed comprehensive reform, and resulted from a consensus of those with knowledge of the subject.

It may well be that we are faced with a similar situation today. My preference would therefore be to see a substantive review of the issues take place, leading to a presentation of a comprehensive set of recommendations, based on the bill which is before us.

If I may draw an allusion, I would suggest the introduction of the current measures, like that of the original private member's bill presented in 1966, should be followed by a period of reflection.

I would suggest that perhaps during the period of reflection, the hon. member for Mississauga who presents the bill, might be pleasantly surprised, given time, at just how far reaching his actions may prove to be.

In fact, I understand that officials within the Ministry of the Solicitor General are presently studying the very reforms suggested in my friend's bill. I also understand that this review of the issues will consider other possible reforms as well.

If I may for a moment return to the historical review of the debate at the time of first passage of the Criminal Records Act, I believe hon. members will be struck by the continuing parallels to the task which faces us today.

The justice committee at that time was fully informed on the complexity of balancing the various dictates posed by the objectives of the legislation. They were cognizant of the need to create an act which would remove as much as possible the residual stigma which remained for those offenders who successfully rehabilitate themselves.

They were also aware of the need to consider the complications to the actual functioning of this act, created by the split in criminal justice responsibilities between federal and provincial government.

Our learned predecessors were sensitive to the fact that the vagaries of public sentiment often discriminate against persons with a criminal record. This was most true then, as it is now, in the vital area of employment.

However, are we to forsake entirely our responsibility to ensure that people who are hired for sensitive positions are adequately screened before being offered a position of such trust?

For example, I am particularly concerned that some provision remain which would allow a person who is an employer or prospective employer of any person whose duties involve the instruction or supervision of children to inquire as to whether or not the applicant for employment has been found guilty of any offence against a child.

You may say, Mr. Speaker, that in the bill before us, we are only referring to those offenders who have received a discharge, who have not been convicted. Might I remind the House, however, that in many provinces there are child abuse registries that record even suspicions of abuse and this record is made available in certain controlled circumstances.

Should the federal Parliament, therefore, provide less protection to the children of Canada?

• (1740)

I am not sure what the answer to that question should be, but I do believe we have a responsibility as parliamentarians to study very thoroughly the options which are available for reform in this area.

In the bill which is before us today, my hon. friend has suggested we should violate the principle of ascertaining a period of crime-free behaviour in the community as proof of a reformed character and behaviour before granting a pardon to those persons who have been found guilty of a crime but who have received a discharge of some sort.

I believe we may want to think seriously about this proposal before proceeding. By changing one, but only one, aspect of a law, will we create an imbalance similar to that of which I spoke to earlier? I for one am prepared to wait to hear the results of a review of these issues before committing myself unequivocally to any one course of action.

If I may, I would like again to return to the original debates and to provide the House with a flavour of the types of collateral issues which were identified by the experts who testified in committee. Several questions were raised:

Would the statute have an effect on whether reference to a pardoned record would be ordered expunged from credit reports?

Would it appear on insurance applications?

Could employers receive access to information on a pardoned record?

Would a bonding company be able to ask for such information?

Could a witness be cross-examined in court on facts relating to a sealed record?

Further questions were raised as to how the Criminal Records Act would affect provisions governing military recruitment and service. As well, concern was raised over the effect of pardons on disqualifications for membership in self-governing professional bodies.

There is a provision in the bill before us today to allow for the destruction of the record and to encourage the offender to be present. This point has been discussed by others already during the course of the present debate. I thought it would be most interesting for the House to recognize that once again our discussions today closely parallel those which preceded the passage of the original legislation.

I wish to quote from the official Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs from Tuesday, April 14, 1970. The committee was discussing the proposed Criminal Records Act.

At that time, in April 1970, Mr. Hogarth made the following comments on the nature of criminal records in Canada.

He said, and I quote:

> I was just thinking of the number of places where a criminal record appears and what really you have to effectively seal in order to seal a criminal record.
> You have the court record in the first instance. In the Agostino Case on a habeas corpus application they use nothing more than the entry in the court journal that the man was convicted to prove his conviction.
> So you have several court records on the first level. You have the entry in the daily journal of the courts, then the court docket or file, you might well have a third record that is kept separate and apart from these first two that I have mentioned. Then you have three, four or even five levels of courts to deal with. You have the juvenile court perhaps and I do not think we are going to be faced with that problem, because I think those records can be dealt with. You have the Magistrate's level; you have the County Court level; you have the district court, Queen's Bench, King's Bench or Superior Court level of the province; you have the Court of Appeal levels; you have the Supreme Court of Canada level—all these people might well have records of the conviction.
> You then get into the police records. You have the local police who arrested the man. They might well have a record of his subsequent conviction coming back to them from the police force that they turned him over to on the warrant they arrested him on. Or any one or more detachments of one police force, particularly with the gazetting of criminal records. If you notice the number of police cards that come out with a photograph of the accused, his conviction, the fact that he was convicted, what he was sentenced to so they can keep indices, several types of records kept in the individual police forces at the local level.

I continue to quote:

> Then you get into the subdivision records; then you get into the central crime index records in Ottawa. Then you get into prison records, and international records. The fact he may have been reported as convicted to the American authorities or the British authorities.
> Apart from all the official records, then you have newspaper records and when it comes to sealing a criminal record, in order to make sure that no one can get at it, you are going to have an awful lot of documentation in this country to deal with if you want to do it effectively.

That is the end of the quotation.

I am suggesting, in conclusion, as is evidenced from the debates which have already taken place, that this is an exceedingly complex issue, perhaps more complex than some of us realize. I think it is important that the Minister of Justice and her officials use the legislation, use the bill which is before us, as an opportunity to examine this very important but very complex issue.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): I am pleased to take part in this second reading debate of Bill C–314, an act respecting amendments to the Criminal Records Act and related legislation.

The member for Mississauga South has done his homework and intends to correct a long–standing anomaly through direct action.

The part of the Criminal Records Act that is the subject of Bill C–314 is an area that has been identified previously as problematic. I therefore commend the hon. member's good intentions.

I would point out that the government has also done its homework in this area. A wide variety of questions raised concerning reform to the Criminal Records Act has led to far–reaching consultations with concerned interest groups, government officials and affected citizens.

The most extensive consultations occurred during the clemency review initiative in 1983 when the distribution of a discussion paper, the circulation of a questionnaire and in–person meetings took place with all provinces and territories. Provincial officials in the departments of the Attorneys General, social services, corrections and justice took part. Many private sector agencies active in criminal justice were contacted, as were criminal justice professionals and concerned citizens. A total of 93 responses were received after the distribution of the discussion papers. Representatives of other federal departments, regional and national parole board members, police forces and associations, correctional officials and the judiciary and counsel, the private sector and individual inmates and inmate representatives were included in the consultation process.

The full 18–member constituency of the national associations active in criminal justice responded. These responses included those of the St. Leonard Society, the John Howard Society, The Salvation Army, the National Association of Friendship Centres, the Church Council on Justice and Corrections, and the Canadian Association of Social Rehabilitation Agencies.

The expectation that changes to the Criminal Records Act were imminent was raised among this wide spectrum of individuals and groups. Proposals for change that came forward were closely scrutinized by those who became actively engaged in this consultation.

A more limited consultation took place in 1986. Provincial deputy ministers responsible for criminal justice were informed, as were selected non–government organizations including the large group of national voluntary organizations which belong to national associations active in criminal justice. The Canadian Bar Association, the Uniform Law Conference, and the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police were contacted.

When new proposals are brought forward, it should be expected that a very large number of concerned and interested constituencies may wish to address the issues. It seems likely that this will be the case regardless of how limited or extensive the proposed reforms are.

In the present case of Bill C–314, the lack of major change will be contrasted to previous expectations and demands for broader change will almost certainly be raised. Should proposals for broader and more general reforms be brought forward, the many substantive issues would attract the attention of various constituencies on different sides of the issue.

When Bill C–314, or any other bill that might affect the Criminal Records Act goes forward to committee, several groupings of possible reaction and interest can be identified. They include, first, governments: federal, provincial, municipal and international. Within the federal government a substantial number of departments and officials have a special interest in possible changes to the Criminal Records Act.

The Department of Justice will in all likelihood be interested in any amendments which may have an impact on the judicial system by allowing an ex–offender to deny the existence of a pardoned record.

The Department of Defence has been involved in consultations in the past, and would be interested any changes to the present legislation which could affect the disciplinary procedures of the department, as well as have an impact on its record–keeping system. The agencies of the Solicitor General have an obvious interest in the matter. The Canadian Security Intelligence Service clearly has an interest regarding access to pardoned records for both national security and intelligence purposes.

The financial and person–year implications for the National Parole Board and RCMP will need consideration and careful study, since they are the bodies that conduct investigations relating to pardon applications.

There would be other interested departments and agencies, I am sure. In addition to the direct changes proposed by Bill C–314 for the Criminal Records Act and the Criminal Code, other federal statutes which preclude an offender under the circumstances from working in a federal department will need review.

An example of this is the lifetime bar to employment with in a customs office for any employee convicted of accepting a bribe or assisting in the smuggling of any product into Canada. Similar provisions exist in a range of many other federal legislation and regulatory statutes. Changes in the law may also have an effect on the Canadian Human Rights Commission and may need to be congruent with provisions to the Access to Information and Privacy Acts. This latter concern may be particularly relevant in discussions with victim advocate groups.

Provincial governments and municipalities have a strong interest in changes to the Criminal Records Act in those areas which affect policing at the local or provincial level. Any measures which require provincial compliance or co–operation in the administration or delivery of criminal justice services which will be affected by possible changes will require thorough consultations. Changes to the legislation may have an impact on provincial human rights commissions, particularly in Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia, Manitoba and the Yukon, where protections exist against discrimination on the grounds of a criminal conviction for which a pardon has been granted. A large number of provincial licensing and permit authorities may be affected by provisions of a new act.

International consultations would be useful to ensure that any changes to the act do not diminish the credibility of a Canadian pardon in the eyes of foreign jurisdictions. If reservations were expressed, this might lead to a lower rate of voluntary acceptance of the pardon as a certificate of good behaviour for the purposes of travel by Canadian citizens to other countries.

Second, there is the voluntary sector— victim advocates, offender aid groups. Any proposed changes to the act become the focus for debate among voluntary associations active in criminal justice. Many of these groups have been consulted during the past and all can be expected to strongly represent the views and interests of the particular constituency which they represent. The sometimes conflicting goals of increased protection of the public and assistance to deserving ex–offenders will need to be carefully balanced. Any attempt to isolate a single category of offender to be held to more or less rigorous eligibility requirements for example may cause a reaction from some who will suggest the inclusion of convictions for other crimes as further categories which should require a longer or briefer period before a pardon can be granted.

Offender support groups can be expected to argue strenuously for major reforms which they have been advocating for some time. Special victim interest groups will each support proposals which address their particular concern.

The third group is the private sector. Such business groups as the Chamber of Commerce may expect to comment on any proposed changes to the act that might affect an employer's right to know the background of his employees. Professional associations governing the affairs of lawyers, doctors, accountants or real estate personnel will have an interest in any legislation which would remove their right to regulate entry to the profession by ex-offenders. School boards, camps, nurseries, and day care providers will have a particular interest in ensuring that changes to the law do not inhibit their ability to screen prospective employees who may pose a threat to the children under their care.

Credit bureaus should be involved in defining the protection which can be provided to ex-offenders regarding the confidentiality of information which is on the public record.

Finally, the public, the fourth group. The general public will be interested in any proposed changes to the act and strategies will need to be developed to disseminate factual information identifying the problems with the current legislation and how any proposed changes will better protect the public, help deserving ex-offenders and create a more efficient system.

While the benefits of Bill C-314 to certain individuals who presently have records is obvious, it would appear that efficiencies would also result. I see little in these proposals to address the concern that the public should not be subjected to undue risk. Specific members of the public may have concerns about how legislation may affect the right for example of children's aid societies to screen prospective foster or adoptive parents. Others may raise questions of whether change procedures for pardon will allow dangerous offenders easier access to firearms, driving privileges, or positions of trust following a conviction and prohibition being imposed.

Finally, the fifth category, the media. Provisions of the act which would change the rules regarding the disclosure of information to the public concerning a pardon conviction and the possible destruction of records has special repercussions for those involved in publishing and research. Consideration is required of how non-disclosure rules would affect the publication of law reference books, what access researchers may have to protected records and what protection would be available to limit the disclosure of information contained in the newspaper and the electronic media data banks and files. The interests of both academic and official government archivists must be considered before a final decision is taken on the best procedure and timing which should govern the destruction of records following a further waiting period after a pardon has been granted.

To conclude, I view Bill C-314 as an example of a positive effort by a member of the government side to take personal responsibility for an action he believes not only to be necessary, but overdue. I admire and support his actions in this regard.

I do suggest, however, that even a well thought out initiative such as the one put forward by my hon. colleague for Mississauga South can open up a consultative process of an intensity and duration that far exceeds that which might be anticipated in light of the modest attempt of the proposed amendments.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on Bill C-314, a Private Members' bill whose purpose is to correct an obvious discrepancy in our legislation which so far has been overlooked.

The hon. member for Mississauga South has drawn our attention to the fact that individuals whose offences did not justify sentencing by the courts were nevertheless labelled as criminals for periods from between one to three years; this does not include the time required to process their requests for rehabilitation.

I know the hon. member did not want to give the House the impression that everyone who tries to have every trace of a guilty verdict erased from his criminal record and get an absolute discharge has to wait five years, as he said in December.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, it seems quite possible that people who have just obtained an absolute or conditional discharge believe— that their run-ins with the justice system are finished as soon as they leave the courtroom. This misconception may never cause problems, but it is also quite possible that a few years from now, they will be denied a job, security clearance or access to a country or they may suffer some kind of embarrassment or inconvenience.

People who are unaware their name and criminal record have been preserved or who are not familiar with the procedure under the Criminal Records Act to have their file sealed, are vulnerable to suspicions which may at any time compromise their reputation and their job.

It is reported that the significant increase in applications for rehabilitation has had the effect of slowing down response time. In fact, as was mentioned by another member, the Nelson Task Force felt that the rehabilitation process provided under the Criminal Records Act was costly, unwieldy and unefficient. However, in line with the tenor of the task force report and thanks to excellent co-operation between the National Parole Board and the RCMP, the process was drastically revamped so that a significantly heavier workload could be taken on without significantly increasing the resources allocated to this activity.

Several changes were responsible for this increased efficiency. The first change concerns the documents collected by applicants. A person applying for rehabilitation must now include with his application all the necessary documentation: a certified copy of his criminal record obtained from the RCMP, a certificate of the court sentence obtained where the case was heard; and, if necessary, a record of military conduct obtained from the registry or the commanding officer.

The kit provided for an application for rehabilitation contains all the necessary information and everything applicants need to transmit their fingerprints to the RCMP and receive a copy of their record. The RCMP's Criminal Identity Service apparently has no trouble sending criminal records directly to applicants during the initial stages. This administrative reform has speeded up the process and helped the RCMP accelerate retrieval of the records in question. The number of applications it can process went up to 10,028 in 1984-85.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may conclude very briefly. I believe that by tabling C-314 in this House, the hon. member for Mississauga South has given us food for thought. In fact, judicious interventions of this type often form the basis for wide-ranging legislative reform.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

MINING

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on March 11, I put a series of questions to the Minister of Employment and Immigration concerning the lay-offs at Denison Mines in Elliot Lake.

A week ago last Friday, Denison Mines laid off approximately 1,050 employees in that community, in addition to the 2,200 people laid off last July and August by Denison and by Rio Algom. The situation in that community has resulted in something like 80 per cent of the miners in the work force being laid off at the present time. The existing lay-off of 1,050 is for a six-week period, but that will be repeated in July and August when the same number will be laid off. Out of that group it is projected that some 400 will be permanently laid off.

Since that time we have had word from the president of Denison Mines, Mr. Bill James, that the likelihood of the company continuing on a permanent basis beyond the end of 1992 is very questionable because of the arrangements between Ontario Hydro and the mining company for the supply of uranium to Ontario Hydro. It is impossible to overemphasize the gravity of the situation.

One of my questions to the minister was along the following lines: Can the minister speed up the payments of UI benefits?

I had visited the community the week before that, and the reports were that it would take seven or eight weeks for the benefits to be paid because of the backlog with hundreds of thousands of people receiving UIC benefits in the province of Ontario.

I have received some assurance from the minister, but I would like to have the parliamentary secretary reaffirm that those benefits will start to flow during the fourth week from the time of the lay-off. It is essential that these miners receive benefits a lot sooner than the seventh week as was projected.

The second area concerns the funding for job training, retraining, and upgrading of workers. There was a budget last year of approximately $6 million. A program was put before the minister's department several months ago for a new budget under the Community Futures Program for manpower retraining, for job search, and for community adjustment as well as industrial adjustment activities within the community. We are still awaiting a decision with regard to that Community Futures budget. It is the East Algoma Community Initiatives Incorporated group that carry it out, but the funding for those workers comes from the Community Futures Program budget.

Those are some of the concerns that are weighing heavily on this community, whether the government is going to provide those funds for retraining and upgrading. At the present time, we have something like 500 people in pre-vocational training and upgrading and 200 in technical.

• (1805)

The additional lay-offs and uncertainty being created will require many more dollars this year for training. As well there will be another 500 people who were receiving UIC before this current lay-off. We really end up with something like 700 people in training programs and around 1,500 receiving UIC during this six-week period. I assume that will be repeated this summer, in July and August, when there will be a seven-week lay-off.

That brings to the fore the other requests and demands I am making of the minister, that we be provided with additional assistance at the Elliot Lake Canada Employment Commission Centre. That centre, with an ongoing staff since the lay-offs last year of about 17 people, is simply not capable of coping with all the counselling problems or the management of 2,200 people in training, on UI, or in upgrading courses. I am hopeful that the government will move to provide an additional five people at the Canada Employment Centre in Elliot Lake to cope with the massive load required during this coming calendar year and in the year ahead.

There are many other initiatives the government needs to move on such as funding for the Retirement Living Program, the decentralization of government offices to the community, as well as a number of initiatives being put forward by the province. However, these with regard to manpower are urgent and need to be resolved. We need to have reassurance that the government is going to support, encourage and assist the community in this the most difficult time almost in its history.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I am pleased to have the opportunity to discuss the initiatives the government has taken to help laid off workers in Elliot Lake.

Most recently, Employment and Immigration Canada has responded to the latest lay-offs at Elliot Lake by making arrangements with the employer to facilitate the preparation of records of employment and to assist the affected workers in filing their claims for unemployment insurance benefits in Elliot Lake.

Over 900 claims were filed on March 15 and another 100 were filed on March 22. It is expected that the claims will be processed promptly as the Sudbury Canada Employment Centre will assist the Canada Employment Centre in Sault Ste. Marie.

It is anticipated that the claimants will receive their first reporting cards within the next week or two, and should receive their benefits within the normal four to five week period after filing and not eight weeks, as the hon. member has indicated.

In addition to financial assistance through the unemployment insurance system, Employment and Immigration is ensuring that laid off employees have access to the full range of employment and training programs.

First, our industrial adjustment service committee in Elliot Lake is working with Denison Mines and Rio Algom Ltd. Management and the United Steelworkers Union concerning lay-offs this year and last.

By the end of 1990, of the 427 employees then laid off at Denison Mines, 351 had positive plans for employment or training and 53 were taking early retirement.

The government is also helping Elliot Lake through the Community Futures Program.

In August 1990 a $1 million training program and relocation assistance were allocated to Elliot Lake under this program.

In November 1990 the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced additional funding of $1.7 million. This meant more training programs, relocation and adjustment assistance for workers who lost their jobs.

For the fiscal year now ending our total commitment to Elliot Lake and nearby communities is well over $9 million.

The member is aware that an application for further funding under the Community Futures Program has been submitted. It is now being reviewed by the minister's office and every consideration will be given to this application.

• (1810)

Finally, the member should be aware that beginning in April 1991, the claimant re-employment strategy will be in operation in all our Canada Employment Centres. A claimant re-employment strategy is a simple yet efficient procedure that will be delivered through our Canada Employment Centres to assist workers.

This process enables UI recipients to meet with employment counsellors and discuss in detail their particular training and employment assistance needs. This assistance will be there right at the very beginning of the employment period.

Anybody can see that Denison Mine workers who were laid off will and have received assistance to help them through this difficult period.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the question that I raised some time ago, as a matter of fact it was back in November 1990, was a question regarding the future of the Fraser River Estuary Management Program. For the information of the House and people listening, the Fraser River Estuary Management Program was a five-year joint federal-provincial program of which there were five different funding components. The majority of those components were through different ministries of the federal government as well as ministries of the provincial government.

That funding has essentially come to an end and the reason that I posed the question in November 1990 was that the funding was essentially wrapping up in December of that year. The five-year funding was essentially grinding to a halt. That funding has now come to a halt, although I understand there have been some limited extensions of that funding.

I might point out that the reason for the Fraser River Estuary Management Program was to look at the environmental health of the Fraser River and to try to come up with a system of monitoring the environmental parameters as well as monitoring the health of the foreshore around the river.

It has been fairly successful. It has been a program that has worked and has worked reasonably well. There has been a lot of scientific data that have been brought to use as a result of the last five years that the program has been in place. The problem is, and now we have passed that December deadline, that essentially the funding has now run its course. The five-year mandate was up in December 1990.

I understand that there is a retroactive clause which can be applied and under which funding can be extended to some degree. I understand that there has been a three-month extension for the program. That three-month extension I might add comes to an end on March 31, 1991, and we are now at March 26 of that year. We have only a matter of days left before in fact that extension has run its course.

I understand there have been a number of deliberations between the Fraser River Estuary Management officials as well as the federal and provincial governments looking at extending the funding. I want to point out that in the recent green plan, which is the environmental document of the federal government, with regard to the Fraser River basin there is very little mentioned. In fact nothing is really mentioned in terms of ongoing funding for the Fraser River Estuary Management Program. It does give reference to it. It says co-operative mechanisms such as the Fraser River Estuary Management Program have made progress on pollution prevention in recent years.

Despite this program, many parts of the river basin are in need of urgent clean-up action. For example, high levels of heavy metals have been found in non-migratory fish in the lower Fraser River close to waste treatment plants and industrial sites.

The document, which is supposed to be the federal government's bible of environmental clean-up initiatives, remains essentially silent on the future of the Fraser River Estuary Management Program. Nothing is mentioned there about a commitment to continue the funding of the program. There has been no recognition with regard to the development of management strategies for other parts of the Fraser River basin. There have been no specifics in the document as to the assignment of powers of enforcement which could be applied to the Fraser River Estuary Management Program.

To make my point once again, there is no commitment in this green plan for the federal government to continue to fund the Fraser River Estuary Management Program and no commitment for the government to in fact expand the mandate of the program.

I might add that in a detailed document, which my colleagues and I and the New Democratic Party released on November 29, 1990, we did in fact call for an integrated management structure to create agencies similar to the current Fraser River Estuary Management Program, which should be developed, as we pointed out, for all areas of the Fraser River. The FREMP only takes care of the lower part of the Fraser River and we have called for the development of parallel or similar agencies to look at the mid-Fraser and the upper reaches of the Fraser River that are also affected by industrial and domestic sources of pollution.

The reason that I wanted to pursue the question further today is to ask the government whether it has made any final decisions as to the ongoing funding and financing of what has been a very, very valuable environmental initiative, one whose future is currently up in the air. The program has had to wind down because at this point, at least to my knowledge, there has been no final commitment to put that funding into place, nor has there been any final commitment, as I mentioned, to expand the mandate of the program to create similar agencies.

Perhaps the member who will be presenting the rebuttal in just a moment will want to discuss just what plans the government has in place for the ongoing funding of the current FREMP and what possible initiatives it is willing to commit itself to at this time in terms of demanding or developing an expanded mandate for these kinds of environmental initiatives.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to say a few words on the very important issue of the environmental well-being of the Fraser River system and in response to the hon. member's question.

First of all, I would like to assure the hon. member that the government is well aware of the environmental needs of the Fraser River system and is well aware of the stress under which it is operating.

I would like to take the opportunity, if I may, to thank my caucus colleagues from the province of British Columbia who have been very, very diligent in ensuring that the minister and his officials and myself, as parliamentary secretary, are kept constantly informed on the needs of the river system. I might say, in return, that I appreciate their ongoing commitment to the environmental agenda of the Government of Canada.

As the hon. member who asked the question is well aware, there have indeed been ongoing talks with the province of British Columbia, particularly with the new minister who is responsible in British Columbia for the environment. We are currently negotiating a three year renewal of the Fraser River Estuary Management Program. It is a program that should include an expanded budget and an expanded membership. I would anticipate that there would be some hard information provided as a result of those talks in the very near future.

I think, as most members of this House understand, the Fraser River Estuary Management Program really addresses only a small part of a very major issue. Although it is a major achievement in itself in terms of interjurisdictional co-operation, it is really the entire Fraser River ecosystem that must be considered and that is very much what is on the agenda at the moment. The hon. member did refer to the green plan. I was pleased that he did so, but I do not think he really did justice either to the green plan or to the attention it has paid to the Fraser River system. I think you will see, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure that all members of the House will applaud, that there will be an expanded program in place in the not too distant future with respect to the Fraser River ecosystem.

• (1820)

We are looking at curbing pollution throughout the entire basin using increased enforcement, if that is necessary; the question of the cleaning up of waste sites, the restoration of wildlife and fishery habitats and the improvement of water quality. That can be done only with the co-operation of all levels of government.

I am sure the hon. member will contribute toward that co-operation.

AIR TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pursue this evening in the few minutes allotted to me a question I posed in the House to the Minister of Transport on March 18. It concerned the open skies negotiations that will be taking place in a few short weeks. The open skies negotiations refer quite simply to the revisiting of the existing air agreement between Canada and the United States that was last amended and modified in 1974.

The major dilemma in the open skies negotiations, from Canada's perspective, is the whole concept of cabotage, which is a fancy term for simply saying, do we allow American carriers to go beyond simply coming into Canada, as they do now, and dropping off passengers? Do we go the extra step and allow American carriers the ability to pick up Canadian travellers in point a and bring them to another Canadian destination? That is what is meant by the word cabotage, which in essence would allow the American carriers to freely access Canadian points and probably offer reciprocal cabotage rights to our Canadian carriers.

The problem is that our industry is very different from that of the Americans. It is a lot smaller and the feeling among the air industry in Canada is that if we granted American carriers cabotage, that is to say if we allowed American carriers to roam freely in and around Canada, we would probably not have a Canadian industry as we know it in very short order.

In fact, when the government appointed a special parliamentary committee to investigate the dossier in anticipation of the negotiations, we found two things. First, by and large the Canadian industry and the many witnesses who came before us advocated that when we enter into negotiations, we clearly tell the Americans that cabotage should not be on the table as far as it is concerned toward giving the American carriers those rights in Canada. If we enter into negotiations and want to raise cabotage, it should only be done in the context of granting it to the smaller Canadian carriers in the United States, but not reciprocal.

Second, we had an agreement that was unanimous. In fact, members of Parliament from the Conservative, Liberal and NDP parties signed the unanimous committee report that said quite clearly to the minister that we should not pursue giving cabotage rights to the Americans and that if we want to pursue cabotage, it is only for Canadian carriers in the United States.

The minister at the outset of that special committee suggested that he would take the committee report very seriously and that he would listen enthusiastically to the recommendations of the report. Therefore, it came as somewhat of a surprise and also as a frustration on my part, as the transport critic for the Liberal Party, to hear the Minister of Transport going to Washington and giving a major speech on February 12 which put cabotage clearly on the table.

Therefore, my question on March 18 was to have the minister give his undertaking to the House and to the Canadian industry that cabotage for American carriers would not be advanced by our Canadian negotiators.

• (1825)

If it was placed on the table by the American side, we would clearly say no, that as a bare minimum and as a bottom line there would be no deal if it involved giving American carriers the right to travel anywhere they please in Canada.

We said so because the industry is going through some troubling times. We have seen the lay-offs of thousands of workers. Presently we have a monopoly between Air Canada and Canadian. We have the regional interests that want to maintain a sense of quality service. While some cities in the regions have had an additional number of flights, many of those cities no longer have jet service so one can debate whether the quality of air service to those regions is getting better.

Therefore, the whole question of allowing cabotage for American carriers puts in jeopardy an industry that is already going through some difficult times.

I hope the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport will give his assurance on behalf of the minister and the government that when the minister talks about protecting the viability of the Canadian industry, we want to know what that means.

We believe that protecting the Canadian viability of our industry means being prepared to say and to have the courage to say to the Americans, no, to cabotage.

We want to improve our air treaty. We want to improve the access points between Canadian and American cities. We want to continue to do business with each other. That is fine. But if it is going to mean cabotage, then it means we are not interested and we are going to walk away from the table, not as sore losers, but in a very pro-Canadian industry way that says: "Our bottom line is the integrity and the independence of our own system. Cabotage would infringe on that, and therefore, we would rather make no deal than make a bad deal."

I hope the parliamentary secretary will give the House this assurance because it is certainly anticipated in the Canadian industry that if we enter negotiations and we are weak on cabotage, I think we are going to come out in a worse situation that we were in when we went in.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I find it most unfortunate that my hon. friend opposite from York West would take this kind of approach to negotiations.

We were both members of the Special Committee on the Canada-U.S. Air Transport Services. We both participated in the preparation of the unanimous report of that committee. Indeed, the report of the special committee gave an endorsement to an early negotiation of a new liberalized air agreement.

I would have thought that my hon. friend would have left it at that, but he is insisting that we turn around put very strict restrictions on various things before the negotiations even commence.

The Minister of Transport has repeatedly said that he is committed to getting the best deal possible for Canada in the interest of the travelling public, communities that are served, airports, businesses, the airline industry and its workers.

The hon. member will also know that while he has been rehashing his arguments about cabotage over and over, the Minister of Transport has been meeting with, among others, the airline presidents of our two major carriers.

The meeting of Claude Taylor of Air Canada and Rhys Eyton of Canadian Airlines was part of the continuing consultations to ensure that the minister and the Canadian negotiating team have a full understanding of the concerns of the airlines, Canadian consumers, communities and business and tourism interests before entering into formal negotiations.

The airlines understand that we need a new agreement. Certainly the communities we hear from on our travels want a new agreement. Indeed, some presenters were quite aggressive in their demands for a new agreement.

The Minister of Transport has been very clear, whether in Washington, Ottawa, Edmonton or Toronto, that he is not prepared to sign a deal that does not ensure the continued viability of the Canadian airline industry.

We know these will not be easy negotiations. The special committee acknowledged that as well, when it refrained from "tying the negotiators hands", to quote from the report. Cabotage is just another market entry tool, as are gates and slots, et cetera.

I am sure that my hon. friend has not forgotten that the airlines will be at the table. I certainly do not expect them to sit passively on the sidelines.

We on this side of the House firmly believe, contrary to the apparent position of my hon. friend opposite, that through continued consultations, hard work and tough bargaining, an agreement can be reached that responds to the needs of both consumers and the aviation industry in Canada.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, the people of my riding of Nipissing feel victimized by the pricing practices of the large gas companies. In fact we might say that they are fuming.

I must confess that I find it difficult to account for price differences of over 10 cents a litre between urban and rural points in my riding and over 20 cents a litre between northern and southern Ontario. The people want to know: How could such large differences exist within a relatively small geographic domain and isn't it odd that the retail price of gas reacts very quickly to increases in production costs and very slowly to decreases?

What is even more perplexing is that there are no mechanisms in place to ensure that consumers are not ripped off for such a vital and necessary commodity. In fact, we are at the mercy of this virtual monopoly and what it can get away with in the marketplace.

The Minister of Finance said in his budget that he wanted to be tough on inflation. Indeed, he threatened the Public Service with job losses and back to work legislation. I wonder if the minister will be just as tough on his corporate friends when they give us unwarranted price increases, for this too causes inflation. Or, is it one set of standards for his friends and another for everyone else?

WORLD CURLING CHAMPIONSHIPS

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, the city of Winnipeg, the curling capital of the world, is this week the site of the 1991 Canada Safeway World Curling Championships.

Ten teams in each of the men's and women's divisions are battling it out for a berth in Sunday's finals where world champions will be crowned.

Support from the fans has been extraordinary. A crowd of 11,349 last night at the Winnipeg arena raised the four-day attendance mark to 121,931, which eclipses the previous week-long record set at the 1978 world championships held in Winnipeg.

The combination of competitive curling, strong fan support, an army of dedicated volunteers, corporate sponsorship and excellent television coverage by TSN makes this week's curling in Winnipeg a truly unforgettable world-class event.

GUN CONTROL

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, this House accepted over half a million signatures for gun control.

Recently, too, an Angus Reid poll found that 80 per cent of Canadians and 88 per cent of women oppose easy access to arms in this country. The petitions and the poll raise the question of democracy: a concept in which the justice minister has been citing her belief throughout the Bill C-80 saga.

She fails to mention that her own Advisory Council on Firearms consists overwhelmingly of gun users. But, as the head of Canadians for Gun Control points out, "owning a gun does not make you any more of an expert on gun control than having a disease makes you a physician".

New Democrats say to the justice minister: physician, heal thyself, include the majority of Canadians in the advisory process: the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Chiefs of Police, and not just a biased minority of gun users.

Canadians want democracy. Canadians want strong and effective gun control.

THE STUDENTS' COMMISSION

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of all members and indeed all Canadians a national students' conference entitled "The Students' Commission". It will bring together four grade 10 and 11 students from all 295 federal ridings to one of our national workshops in Fredericton, Montreal, Toronto or Saskatoon during May and June of this year.

Thereafter, 96 representatives will travel to Ottawa to hammer out one final set of recommendations which will be presented to the Prime Minister on July 1.

The Students' Commission will be a viable forum through which our youth can express their ideas on a number of important issues facing our country today, such as national unity, the environment, the transition from school to work, drug abuse, the job market, as well as problems and promises of education, all as seen through the eyes of a cross-section of young people.

In particular, the commission offers our youth an opportunity to tell us, members of their federal government, what type of Canada they would like to see and what direction our country should take.

I know that all members will want the youth of their ridings to have every opportunity to know about The Students' Commission and to let it know of their interest and support.

HUNGER

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, no problem can be more immediate yet at the same time have such lasting consequence as the inability of a growing number of people in our society to find enough food to eat.

While permanent solutions to this human suffering lie in the creation of a lasting world peace, investment in the individual, and environmentally sustainable development, we must find the time and the means to address the fact that today and every day in Canada and around the world people are going hungry.

On Saturday, April 6, we in Ottawa South are organizing the second annual "Stop Hunger—Fast", a non-partisan hunger awareness event that features a 24-hour liquid only fast. Over this day we hope to collect food, pledges and volunteers for the Ottawa Food Bank and UNICEF. "Stop Hunger—Fast" will be held at the Herongate Mall in Ottawa, and we are hoping that our residents will take the time to learn about how we can stop hunger.

Hunger need not exist. Children need not be denied their future for a lack of food and senior citizens, for all their years of work and care, should not have to live in poverty today.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are facing the question of national unity. Now is the time for all good people to come forward and speak up for Canada.

One such patriot who has and continues to speak up for Canadians is Don Cherry. I am please to inform you, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Cherry is here in the House today witnessing our democracy in action.

The pride we take in hockey, our home game, is a reflection of the pride we have for Canada. Don Cherry has recognized this fact and is vocal about his feelings.

The upcoming Stanley Cup finals and the Canada Cup are fine examples of Canadian spirit. If Canadians could put as much effort into issues of national unity as they do their hockey, our country could stand together.

As Mr. Cherry says: "Unity is like a bunch of grapes; disunity is the pits".

KUWAIT

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, last week the federal government announced further measures for Canadian companies to participate in the reconstruction of Kuwait.

The key word here is companies. The Kuwaiti government will not issue individual working visas. Our government has indicated that it will not issue a list of Canadian companies awarded contracts.

I ask: How do Canadian workers access this wonderful employment opportunity that this government speaks of daily?

Canadian workers who have been laid off due to the made-in-Canada recession and plant closures are desperately seeking employment opportunities. Many of my constituents are willing to relocate to the Middle East, yet they are frustrated with the lack of co-operation and initiatives from the federal government.

• (1410)

This government is sending mixed signals to the Canadian people. This government is giving Canadian companies exclusive control over the contracts, and this government once again is ignoring the wants and needs of our own employable people.

DECENTRALIZATION

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, have you ever heard your constituents say that we can solve Canada's problems by decentralizing government? I have heard politicians and academics say that but not my constituents.

Some politicians say that we need to disentangle government, that we are over-governed, that we need to get the decision-making process closer to the people, and that that will eliminate waste and inefficiency. It all seems to make sense.

However, if we decentralize, what happens to our national social safety net? What happens to national standards? What happens to the equality of all Canadians? Should the city of Toronto's works department, for instance, really look after the Trans-Canada Highway? If it did, would that eliminate waste and inefficiency?

Personally I think we still need a strong national government.

EXPO 92

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise again today to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to tell Canadians the truth about the boondoggle known as the Canadian pavilion at the World Exposition in Seville, Spain.

Yesterday I referred to a departmental document that said that the budget would rise by $10 million. Now it appears that the actual rise is even higher, from $33 million to at least $46.7 million, a $13.7 million overrun so far.

I have another document in my possession, also from external affairs, dated October 6, 1989, which shows that the minister's officials knew the construction budget for the pavilion had been underestimated by 50 per cent. This clearly shows that the massive cost overruns plaguing this project are not just the result of unforeseen disasters in the past six months. It has been going on for a year and a half.

Yet at the same time that the government is spending more and more money on a pavilion in Spain which will be demolished at the end of the fair, the external affairs department has said that 306 positions will be cut in the next six months as a result of the federal budget.

I ask the minister responsible to confirm just how much the disposable pavilion will cost and how many jobs in external affairs will have been sacrificed to finance this apparently bottomless pit.

SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, today I have the pleasure to honour a colleague, a compatriot and a great Canadian. This man is a warm and kind friend to many and certainly a friend to all that is right and just in this country.

I am here to praise the man for whom the Canadore College Gerry Weiner Scholarship was named. This scholarship, which will be awarded in perpetuity, and for the first time in the fall of 1991, will serve to recognize the contribution and leadership of a student in the social service program in the area of human rights.

I understand that the person responsible for scholarships and programs took this decision while listening to an inspiring speech of the Secretary of State in North Bay on the occasion of the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, March 21. It was not a prepared speech, but it came from the heart.

We are doing everything we can to promote national unity, and I know that people in my riding and other ridings in Canada will do so as well. Congratulations to our Secretary of State.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, the 7.6 per cent unemployment rate for the economic region of eastern Ontario is totally inaccurate.

Unemployment in Cornwall is over 15 per cent with 3,400 people looking for work. Many have lost their jobs due to plant closings and bankruptcies. The number of weeks needed to qualify for UI in Cornwall is 18, whereas only 10 weeks are required in regions where unemployment is at 15 per cent. In addition, only 21 weeks of UI benefits are provided to the jobless in Cornwall who do qualify for UI instead of the 37-week coverage allotted in a 15 per cent region.

When will this government stop using inaccurate data to mask the real picture of unemployment in Cornwall and other communities in eastern Ontario? When will this government improve the UI system which sets unemployment rates? When will it implement an economic development program to help the economy of eastern Ontario so that UI is not needed? The people want answers now.

COMMENTS MADE BY RIGHT HON. PIERRE ELLIOTT TRUDEAU

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, in a speech at the University of Toronto last Thursday, the former Prime Minister of Canada stated quite bluntly that after the patriation process in 1981–82, sorcerer's apprentices persuaded Quebec it had been left out.

Now he accuses the Supreme Court, and the majority justices he himself appointed, of manipulating the evidence. This is not only contempt of court, it is an argument unworthy of a man who in the past was so quick to condemn injustice.

Furthermore, he justifies his Machiavellian policy by claiming he enjoyed the support not only of federal members from Quebec but of the majority of Quebecers as well. That is false. In March 1981, only 27 per cent of Quebecers supported patriation and 54 per cent were opposed. A year later, the figures had hardly changed: 26 per cent in favour and 55 per cent opposed.

If the former Prime Minister of Canada had tried to understand the aspirations of Quebecers instead of wanting to sabotage them, his policies would have had a better chance of surviving into the next century.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Before starting Question Period, I just want to share something with all hon. members.

Hon. members will know that we have customarily, for some time now, been coming in to open Parliament and to take prayers early. The reason for that is not to lose any time in either members' statements or in Question Period.

I am in your hands. I cannot proceed without a quorum, and I would hope that over the break you would all be determined to be here just a minute or two early when we come back so that we can get on with the business of the day.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADIAN UNITY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): That is certainly a good point, Mr. Speaker, given the fact that we all need some prayers at this crucial time in our country.

My question is for the Prime Minister.

[Translation]

There is one point on which there is a consensus in this House: it would be better to renew Canada than to have a referendum on sovereignty.

Yesterday, referring to his constitutional policy, the Prime Minister said outside the House that he had a very good idea of what he wanted to do and of the timeframe in which he wanted to do it.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to reveal to the House today what that timeframe is, since every hour wasted is an hour lost for Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, we appointed the Spicer Commission and the Special Joint Committee, the Beaudoin–Edwards committee, with very specific objectives. I said that at a given time we intended to put all this together with what transpired from the work being done by the Government of Ontario, the Government of Quebec, the Governments of Alberta and New Brunswick and so on, in a parliamentary process. This would give Canadian parliamentarians a chance to put forward national—not provincial—proposals that would reflect the needs of Western Canada, the Atlantic regions and the North, which might pave the way for a new Constitution or an amended Constitution. That is what we hope to do as we continue our work.

For the same reason, I urged the hon. member sometime ago to submit her own ideas on the subject—which would be a very interesting exercise—on behalf of her political party, and that is why all of us who believe in Canada are going to work together. We may work together as a team to initiate a process that will pave the way for a new but nevertheless strong and united Canada.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in fact on this side of the House we want to play an all-party role. We want the Parliament of Canada to begin the real work of examining where we can go as a country.

Since last year, we have asked the Prime Minister for a larger role for the Parliament of Canada. His House leader has acknowledged that over the next few weeks it is likely the government will announce such a committee, possibly in the throne speech.

Given that time is short, given that the constitutional clock is ticking, does the Prime Minister not think it would be better today to share his time frame and his ideas so that the Parliament of Canada can get on with the real job of saving the country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not doubt the sincerity of my hon. friend in regard to her commitment and desire to save the country.

• (1420)

One would have to be pretty far off base to fail to understand that this country, Canada, has been a magnificent illustration of co-operation between French and English speaking Canadians for 123 years. We are resolved to keep it together for another 123 years.

My hon. friend seeks a larger role for Parliament. There were two questions when we came back: one was a larger role for ordinary Canadians. The argument was that there has been too much involvement by many parliamentarians and premiers.

The Spicer commission was designed to invite comments from ordinary Canadians. It has been criticized by some, but I still believe that the Spicer commission will prove to have been an excellent initiative that will provide beneficial results and a major contribution to the debate. It is to report on July 1.

The second problem of substance we encountered not only with regard to the constitutional discussions last year, but with regard to the aboriginal discussions mandated under the previous Constitution was a flaw in the amending process. That is now being dealt with for the first time by a Senate–House of Commons committee.

It is doing very impressive work across the country. I saw some of their hearings from the territories and from Edmonton. Those two reports will have a very major and beneficial effect on the debate. It will be helpful to all parliamentarians.

Now that the Belanger–Campeau commission has reported, now that the Ontario legislature report has been tabled—I discussed it last night with Premier Rae—and other reports are in the process of coming in, the Parliament of Canada can be seized not only of these but of all initiatives coming from all parties and all citizens.

I believe that we can put together the kinds of proposals that are responsive to the needs not only of Quebec, but of the west, the north, Atlantic Canada and Ontario. Then we can devise, perhaps, a new Canada; a better, more modern, more flexible and more united Canada.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister said clearly outside the House: "We have a pretty good idea of where we want to go in the timeframes we would like to respect." Obviously, he has a plan in mind.

Does he not believe it is about time he shares that plan with the people of Canada? Does he not realize that if he waits until after Easter and until the throne speech, every hour lost is an hour lost for this country that we all love, Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the urgency inherent in the question of my hon. friend, but I indicated in the House of Commons in the past that this is a sovereign Parliament of a great and sovereign nation.

This Parliament shall establish the timeframes and not the legislature or political party in any province. We have a country. The country is called Canada. We are going to keep this country together by working together to the timeframes and the objectives of Canada.

In the process of doing that, we will by every reasonable means seek to observe and respect the wishes of others that emanate from other legislatures. That is not unreasonable.

The fundamental objectives must be set by legislators in the interests of all Canadians and within timeframes that all Canadians will find reasonable. I am not unaware of what is happening elsewhere, but I insist on the supremacy and the primacy of this House of Commons.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. With the Bélanger-Campeau report, Quebec has lobbed the ball back into the federal court, all of which has taken place in a climate of political crisis and economic decline created by this government. Canada needs profound political change but it also needs economic change. Unemployment and poverty are increasing in Canada. Fifty thousand children are going hungry in Montreal alone. My question is this: How does the Prime Minister intend to persuade Quebecers to accept his new political contract, considering that his economic contract and his obsolete policies have failed?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of comment all parliamentarians should try to avoid in this debate on national unity. Federalists in Canada and Quebec are not that numerous nowadays—

Some hon. members: True!

Mr. Mulroney: —that we can afford to indulge in such mean—spirited accusations. We need all our allies. We need everyone. And I would urge the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard to contribute actively to this debate and do so positively and constructively. Instead of tarnishing the reputation of the federalist forces, help us build this new Canada!

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I can't believe this! The country is in a crisis, and all the Prime Minister has to offer is clichés.

[English]

The Prime Minister may not think the economy is important, but yesterday two of Canada's leading economists testified that this government's economic policies were: "destructive, caused vast damage, were nonsensical." The economists then went on to say that this government's policies would result in higher unemployment, more bankruptcies and a higher deficit. Mike McCracken and Doug Peters were the two economists.

The issue is, can a nation that is deprived of hope by its leaders, hope to hold together? The question is, why can this Prime Minister not bring himself to understand the inevitable link between national unity and a sound economy.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend asks if I understand the link between a sound economy and national unity. I assume that we all understand that. You do not have to be a Liberal or an NDP or a Conservative, I think everybody understands how important it is.

My hon. friend says we have not demonstrated it. For example, today in the Toronto Star there is a headline which says "Economic optimism in Canada leaps to a three-year high," which means that the policies of this government are taking effect.

My hon. friend quotes a few economists in regard to the economic difficulties we are having. Well, we are having difficulties. We are emerging from a recession. Interest rates have dropped 408 basis points since their high, and we are now in the process of coming back.

Yesterday I had the privilege of spending an hour and a half with the Secretary-General of the OECD. He indicated that in its reports it would be commenting on the fact that the policies of deficit reduction, free trade and the GST of this government are contributing to a modernizing of the economy and that Canada's economy will soon be regarded again as one of the strongest in the industrialized world.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

[Translation]

Yesterday, during Question Period, I asked the Prime Minister three times how he intended to obtain a mandate for restructuring this country. Today, it was reported in one of the newspapers that the Premier of New Brunswick and the Prime Minister had discussed the possibility of having a national referendum on the Constitution. Is that how the Prime Minister intends to obtain this mandate?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not see the report but I have discussions on a regular basis with all provincial Premiers. Last night, I spoke to the Premier of Ontario who said that this afternoon he intended to make a major and, I assume, very useful speech on national unity. Of course, when we discuss these issues, we cover a range of possibilities, but we are not committed to one idea in particular at this time, especially since Beaudoin-Edwards is now considering the matter of the amending process, including referendums. The commission is to report in the near future, and with the hon. member, we will look at the results.

• (1430)

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. Clearly Canadians need to know what is happening in all stages of constitutional development in his country. Canadians want to be involved and they want to know. One of the key issues is how we open up the constitutional process to all Canadians.

The Prime Minister has said that he will not work on a timetable other than Canada's timetable. But there is a timetable set through Quebec. Quebec has said that it wants the option of a referendum in 1992. We cannot ignore that timetable.

We also read today that there is a report from his deputy ministers who are working on the Constitution and have put in interim reports. Will the Prime Minister table those reports in the House today so that we can all share from that thinking and so that all of us can participate in that debate with full knowledge of what the Prime Minister is working on and what his officials are working on?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have some difficulty tabling any reports from the deputy ministers inasmuch as I have never seen one. To the best of my knowledge there has never been any report submitted to me, to my office, or to the cabinet. I can assure my hon. friend that I have not seen hide nor hair of any report from any deputy minister with regard to the question she raises.

I will examine them when they come in and I will be happy to discuss them with the leader of the NDP in her capacity as a member of the Privy Council. We can decide the extent to which they could be tabled at that point in time.

I just want to point out to the leader of the NDP that contrary to her prefatory remarks, I never said that we were going to ignore Quebec's deadlines as set out. I said we were going to follow our own, and in the process of following our own, established by the sovereign Parliament of a sovereign nation, we will seek to accommodate the wishes expressed by others to the extent humanly possible. It seems to me that this is a fundamental Canadian question that ought to be decided by the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, of course it is a fundamental Canadian question and that is why this party has been pressing to make sure that all Canadians are involved: aboriginal Canadians, Quebecers, and the multicultural community.

But I say to the Prime Minister that the worst thing—and I know it is not the Prime Minister's wish or this government's wish even— for this country would be to see a Meech Lake II where the door is slammed on Canadians as other negotiations were going without the involvement or open knowledge so that everyone could participate in it.

His deputy ministers are working on reports. That is fine. There are other meetings going on. Apparently there are some talks about a referendum. We hear about one-to-one negotiations. Canadians do not want a sequel to Meech Lake, they want renewal. Will the Prime Minister be open with Canadians about all of the closed door initiatives as well as the open processes, the commission that we know is going on, and be honest with Canadians about the initiatives he is taking?

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the hon. member meant would the Prime Minister be frank, but I think that we should watch our language in this very carefully.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to accept from my hon. friend any useful and constructive suggestions that she may have either in regard to procedure or in regard to substance. I have already indicated that—because the leader of the NDP has talked about the desire and the importance of listening to Canadians—we established the Spicer commission precisely so that it could listen to ordinary Canadians and it is in the process of doing that.

One of the matters that became very clear, beginning with the aboriginal processes in 1985 and 1986, and then in Meech Lake, was the flaw in the amending process. We have established a committee that is presently supported by members of her party in the process of looking for ways to correct the amending process.

Both of these reports, one listening to ordinary Canadians, another seeking to unblock the amending process, would be major contributions to putting forward the substance of constitutional reform.

The House leader and I have indicated that it is our intention at the earliest possible moment to create a committee that will involve all of the parliamentarians in putting this together on behalf of all Canadians. As soon as it is done, I will be inviting the member either to participate or to designate participation, but also to give us her ideas on how best this can be done.

There has been a lot of criticism of Meech Lake by my hon. friend. I would simply remind her that we are all great Monday morning quarterbacks, and her party supported Meech Lake all the way through.

BELANGER–CAMPEAU COMMISSION

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): My question is also for the Prime Minister.

He said yesterday that he gave no instructions to the Conservative member on the Belanger–Campeau commission as to how to vote on Monday on the question of a referendum in Quebec.

Many residents of this single great nation would like to know why the Conservative member on that commission was not told to vote against an early referendum. Will the Prime Minister tell us?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered that completely yesterday in both English and French.

[Translation]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. Is the Government of Canada's position on the referendum a matter that interests all Canadians? Is the Government of Canada in favour of a referendum of Quebec's sovereignty, even in June 1992? Could he tell us something more substantial than he did yesterday?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question is so juvenile and hypothetical it doesn't deserve an answer.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. Yesterday in the House the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 19019 of Hansard:

—we are not abstaining from the great issues of the day. The government has taken a position in regard to the unity of Canada.

Canadians want to know why the Prime Minister says one thing on the floor of the House of Commons, while a representative of his government and his party does a completely different thing by abstaining before the Belanger–Campeau commission. Why the double standard, Mr. Prime Minister?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend from Toronto was here yesterday when I indicated that when the question on sovereignty for Quebec came up, Mr. Hogue, the member for Outremont voted solidly against it, along with other members of the commission, and it was defeated 17 to 15.

I also indicated to my friend something that he knows. He knows that Jean–Pierre Hogue is a very strong and very firmly committed French Canadian in favour of Canada's unity—so much so that it brings laughter from the Bloc Quebecois. They don't like strong French Canadian people who believe in Canada's unity as Mr. Hogue does.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: They are going to find out, this little group over here on my right—and I am being charitable because Easter is coming—that this group is going to find out—

—there are a lot more French Canadians who believe in Canada than French Canadians who believe in destroying a great country like ours.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is if he was a strong national federalist he should have stood the course right until the end and cast his ballot on behalf of the country that we all enjoy and the one we all love.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1440)

Mr. Speaker: The question is getting very close to imputing the motive of an hon. member. I am sure the hon. member would want to be careful.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I return to the Prime Minister who also said yesterday, and I quote: "We have a Canadian agenda. We are not bound to anybody's agenda or anybody's time frame."

I ask the Prime Minister this. If he was so intent to pursue a truly Canadian agenda, why did the government representative abstain and thereby fail to stand up for a more realistic time frame that would give the Canadian agenda a better chance to succeed? Why condone a race against the clock?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thought my hon. friend, as a strong committed federalist, would take pleasure in the fact that a member, a colleague of accomplishment, such as Jean–Pierre Hogue, defended the interests of Canada, represented the Parliament of Canada with great dignity. Jean–Pierre Hogue is a very strong Quebecer and a very strong Canadian. He believes very strongly in the unity of Canada.

As the Speaker has implied, it is very dangerous for anyone to impugn the patriotism of a member of Parliament. I would remind my friend in any case, and I say this with some affection, to remember, as someone else said, that patriotism is the final refuge of a scoundrel.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, we learned in Le Soleil this morning that once again the Prime Minister and at least two of the premiers are secretly discussing a national referendum on the new amending formula.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Skelly (Comox–Alberni): Has the Prime Minister involved the leaders of Canada's aboriginal peoples in any high–level discussions regarding the Constitution and, knowing the dangers of excluding them, why not?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will tell Bob Rae of the indignation of the hon. member of the fact that he and I have been speaking. I will tell Bob the next time rather than call me to call you.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am told that the matter was not raised with Bob Rae last night, but—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Skelly (Comox–Alberni): When Parliament returned last September the Prime Minister promised us one of his four pillars, that Canada would address the relationship between aboriginal peoples and governments. Yet his government has fobbed off responsibility for the off–reserve child welfare in the province of Manitoba, refuses to assert jurisdiction for on–reserve policing in Quebec and the Prime Minister himself has ducked every single question on aboriginal issues in this House over the last two weeks, including the last question.

Is this the kind of priority aboriginal people can expect from the Prime Minister and his government?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government is giving the very serious problems of aboriginals the highest priority and indeed the minister of Indian affairs registered another very significant accomplishment on behalf of aboriginals in British Columbia just the other day, and I want to congratulate him.

I suppose a question of equal importance is: How does the hon. member know what I said to Bob Rae? I think he has been spending too much time with Simon de Jong.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who says he has a good idea of his agenda for Canada. All Canadians are proud that our linguistic duality is one of the fundamental characteristics of Canada. I ask the Prime Minister, is it equally an important part of the Canadian agenda that our aboriginal people, our multicultural reality and our Charter of Rights and Freedoms be affirmed as fundamental to Canada's future?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the three final proponents referred to by my hon. friend, I believe, are already in the Constitution and/or in the charter. Obviously that is already there.

With regard to the linguistic duality notion as being a fundamental characteristic of Canada, which it is, that very important precept was found for the first time in the Meech Lake Accord, which is one of the genuine regrets that I had, and I know many had, when it was rejected.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the other three were not found in the Meech Lake Accord where linguistic duality was located.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister knows Canadians feel left out of the constitutional process. They want to participate. They want to be consulted in an open process. Can the Prime Minister give us the assurance that residents in the North, members of cultural communities and members of native communities will be directly involved in the next round this time?

Mr. Lapierre: And women and children!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend said "this time". I personally chaired two sessions with native leaders to obtain a constitutional amendment, and we were very close to success. If there had not been some last minute decisions in 1985 or 1986, we would have obtained this constitutional amendment that was so important to Canada's native peoples. So, do I believe it is important that the issue of economic and constitutional justice for native people is dealt with in a positive way? I believe it is not only important but vital. If we agree that this problem must be settled, we require the participation of all native peoples. And we intend to be very active and in urging them to participate.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. This week, the Commissioner of Official Languages reported that official bilingualism has been very successful, especially in federal institutions and the National Capital, but that improvements were necessary to preserve national unity. Does the Prime Minister agree with the commissioner? And if so, is he prepared to table the regulations for language of work and equitable participation arising from the Official Languages Act, regulations that are now two years late?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I may remind the hon. member—I already explained this in the House, I believe yesterday or the day before—that we have tabled a major piece of legislation. This government has tabled an important bill concerning official languages. Since then, it has prepared a very important set of regulations that are still being reviewed by people across Canada and which have now been printed in The Canada Gazette.

As for the language of work, I would say the legislation is sufficiently clear to provide a valid framework for efforts in this respect. As far as the government is concerned, we are putting in place a series of protocols to keep improving the quality of these services.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, that is not the view of the Commissioner of Official Languages and many other Canadians in minority language groups.

My supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. The Commissioner of Official Languages also stated that none of the present commissions on the future of Canada or Quebec have made a precise proposal on the role of bilingualism in a restructured Canada. In this respect, when can we expect a specific policy from the government for the constitutional debate which would fully recognize the linguistic duality of this country?

• (1450)

Will the language minorities continue to be protected by the federal government or will they be forgotten in the constitutional shuffle?

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious the Commissioner of Official Languages is doing his job. He looked at all sectors and, on the whole, he said he was very satisfied. He drew our attention to a number of points that we could certainly improve, and I think that is clear. But if it is so simple, why didn't the Liberals deal with the problem during the many years they were in power?

[English]

CONSUL GENERAL IN BOSTON

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and it concerns a very serious breach of professional ethics by Canada's Consul General in Boston, former Conservative cabinet minister, Tom McMillan,.

As the minister knows, three weeks ago Mr. McMillan wrote to a Prince Edward Island daily attacking Mary Boyd, the head of the Catholic Church Social Action Commission in Charlottetown, for speaking out against Conservative government policies and he urged Islanders to write to the Pope's representative in Ottawa to attack her.

I want to ask the minister this. Will he call in his former colleague, the Consul General, and explain to Mr. McMillan that this conduct is totally unacceptable for a diplomat and will he ensure that McMillan apologizes, not only to Mary Boyd, but to the people of Prince Edward Island and the Catholic Church for this very serious lapse of judgment?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my church, may I thank the hon. member for his help.

May I quote to him the beginning of the letter from the Consul General of Canada, where he said: "Your Excellency, I am not writing to you either as Canada's Consul General to New England or as a former politician. Instead, I am writing as a concerned Roman Catholic"

I will not go on to read the rest, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the minister unfortunately is confused. The letter in question is not the letter he quoted from, which is a private letter. The letter in question is a public letter, published in a Prince Edward Island newspaper.

I want to ask the minister: In light of that fact, and in light of the criticism by Dean Thomas Maybe, fellow Catholic of the Atlantic School of Theology, who said: "The letter displays ignorance of Catholic teaching and insensitivity to proper relations between church and state", will the minister not recognize that it is fundamentally wrong for—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is, certainly by his supplemental, moving into a debate which is taking place between some Christians of the Roman Catholic faith. I really think that it goes beyond something that the right hon. Secretary of State, despite his allegiance, is in a position act upon.

I am going to move on.

QUEBEC'S RIGHT TO SELF-DETERMINATION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. During Question Period, we heard the Prime Minister claim that it was up to Canada to decide, that it was a prerogative of the House of Commons, that it was up to the Government of Canada to set its own timeframe, and this on the very day the Bélanger-Campeau Commission and leaders of Quebec society chose their timeframe and the path they will follow. Is the Prime Minister telling Quebecers that he wants to deprive them of their right to self-determination, that he does not acknowledge the supremacy of the National Assembly with respect to the issue of Quebec's nationhood? Is the Prime Minister telling Quebecers he wants to try to confuse the issue and thus prevent them from making a clear, logical and unambiguous decision?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Not so, Mr. Speaker. Quebecers are expressing their views, and I am referring to those who took part in the Bélanger-Campeau Commission. If I am not mistaken, there will be further comments this afternoon. We intend to read this report very carefully because it constitutes a major position for the Quebec National Assembly and, I assume, for the Government of Quebec. However, I noticed that in his comments as Premier of Quebec, Mr. Bourassa said he was committed to carrying out all his responsibilities, regardless of commissions of inquiry. In other words, he is not yielding his moral or political authority to anyone.

That being said, I consider the Bélanger-Campeau report as a major contribution by Quebec to the national debate. The government and the federal Parliament intend to take an active part in this debate. And I am sure the hon. member will not be offended if, as the Prime Minister of Canada, and as Canadian parliamentarians, we ensure that the prerogatives of a sovereign Parliament are also respected.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the fundamental question I asked the Prime Minister of Canada is this: Does he recognize, in law and in reality, the right of Quebec to be the master of its destiny? Does he recognize the right of Quebec to self-determination and that of the National Assembly to hold a referendum in 1992 to decide of Quebec's own future without any interference from the government of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raised this question before. The answer is in the record.

An hon. member: Answer!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, many things are going to happen, but I will not put up with being harassed by the Bloc Québécois while I am answering an important question on behalf of all Canadians. You can count on that!

As I said,—

An hon. member: Just wait until the next elections!

Mr. Mulroney: I will be waiting for you resolutely. Let us see how you fare in Quebec!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Come to Quebec and you will see that, if they have to choose between the builders of Canada and the demolishers from the Bloc Québécois, Quebecers and Canadians alike will go for those who will build a great big country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds.

The same minister in 1985 caused the Western Grain Stabilization Act to be amended to provide for the possibility of interim spring payments.

Given the fact that seeding time is not far away, I want to ask the minister if it is possible to say whether there will be an interim payment or not. If so, how much will it be and when will it go out to producers?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the Western Grain Stabilization Act provides for joint funding by producers and the federal government to assist producers in times of falling grain prices.

We are in a situation now because of world grain prices being very low that the fund will trigger a payment this year. I am happy to announce today that we will be putting cheques in the mail to producers at the end of this week.

The total amount will be $158 million.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Often on this side of the House, we disagree with the Prime Minister in a great many policy areas. On the question of Canada and the obligation we, in this House, have to do what we can to work together to keep this country united, we agree with the Prime Minister.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: How is the cause of national unity strengthened and fostered when the Prime Minister, as he did yesterday, began this phase of this important debate in our nation's history by spending a good part of the Question Period attacking the Leader of the Opposition who is not here, and by attacking premiers who are not here to defend themselves?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that is a question. Perhaps the hon. member would put a direct question to the government.

Mr. Tobin: I do not know how else, but to say to the Prime Minister: If we are going to work together in this Parliament among the parties and all the players, the provinces, to rebuild Canada, that requires trust, sharing information and opening up the backroom process to build a team to restructure this country.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1500)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the comments by my hon. friend in regard to the intentions of his party to contribute constructively to the debate. I take that in good faith. Indeed, it would probably be a major contribution that we could all make to the country, given the seriousness of the challenge confronting us, if all of us undertook to depoliticize this very important issue and work together on behalf of a united Canada.

I do not want to digress or diverge from what I have just said, but my friend says that the Prime Minister began this phase by attacking the Leader of the Opposition yesterday. I did not. What began were comments from the Leader of the Opposition, to which I responded.

That being said, I want to accept my share of responsibility in terms of partisanship and give my hon. friend the following undertaking: The importance of this issue is such that all of us should go the extra mile to avoid partisanship in dealing with this fundamental question of national unity, and I tell my hon. friend that if that is the position of the Liberal Party and the NDP, it is one that I will follow suit on and respect.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for my demonstration of frustration and anger a moment ago.

In supplementary to the Prime Minister, I accept what the Prime Minister has said and I say to him on behalf of this party and on behalf of all Canadians that we want to be part of a constructive process.

Will the Prime Minister at the earliest opportunity please share with all members of Parliament the plans, the designs, and the process that the Prime Minister alluded to yesterday so that we can work constructively and collectively to give this country a fighting chance?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend says that he wishes to be part of a constructive process and to work collectively. I think that is already an important contribution to the most important debate that will be confronting this country in an extended period of time. I thank him for that.

I give him the assurance, as Prime Minister of Canada, that we will work collectively and constructively with him and all of his colleagues to make sure that Canada does indeed remain a strong and united country.

In conclusion, and in the same spirit, I owe my hon. friend from Granby a comment simply because I was precluded from answering. It is very simple and straightforward: The participation of the Prime Minister of Canada in the 1980 referendum presupposed by all of those who participated in it the democratic acceptance of what was a democratic consultation among the people of the province of Quebec. That has always been my position. It has been the position of the Leader of the Opposition and others, and I believe it to be a legitimate one.

PRIVILEGE

WITHDRAWAL OF COMMENTS RESPECTING STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I made allegations to the effect that the PMO had contacted the reporting services to prevent the printing of minutes. That is not so. In fact, the PMO's contact with reporting services was to obtain the minutes of the meeting.

Earlier I informed the chairman of the consumer and corporate affairs committee of such, and I now withdraw those allegations unequivocally.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point. I had the opportunity to discuss this matter with my colleague before Question Period today, and he was kind enough to inform me of his intention to rise in the House today to make the statement that he just made.

I thank my colleague on behalf of the members of the committee for having closed this matter in the way he did.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, of which I have given Your Honour notice, concerning the supplementary question which I was attempting to ask of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Question Period.

As I pointed out to Your Honour, the question related to the actions of the Consul General in Boston, for whom the Secretary of State for External Affairs is directly responsible. Indeed, he was responsible for the appointment of this individual.

In my supplementary question, I was simply seeking to obtain an assurance from the Secretary of State for External Affairs that not a private letter but a public attack on an individual within the Catholic Church of Prince Edward Island for expressing views on government policy was not an acceptable manner for a diplomat to proceed.

I was simply seeking an assurance from the minister, who is responsible for the Consul General's activities, that this kind of thing will not be repeated and that there would be an apology. With respect, I would hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs might be prepared to answer the question which is indeed in order.

Mr. Speaker: I think the first thing I should say is that of course the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway gave me notice of this and raised it as a question of privilege. It is not. It is a point of order. It may well be that if I had heard the end of the question, the supplemental, I might have been in agreement with the hon. member.

However, given what was said at that point I felt it was straying beyond the bounds, and that was my ruling at that time. I understand the point the hon. member is making.

The right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs may wish to respond. He indicates that he does not wish to respond.

ARREST OF GLEN KEALEY

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise on another question of privilege. At approximately five minutes to two today outside this Chamber a gentleman, Mr. Glen Kealey, was standing peacefully and silently, holding a Canadian flag and a sign.

At that time, Mr. Kealey was approached by a member of the RCMP and was arrested. A number of members of Parliament questioned the basis for that arrest, and we were told by the officer in question that Mr. Kealey was obstructing the law.

I want to raise a question of privilege regarding contempt of this House in view of the unanimous and strong position that was taken by the Standing Joint Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations in a letter addressed to the Minister of Public Works in July 1990 when the regulations allowing for this kind of arrest were severely criticized and were arguably in breach of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It was suggested and it was urged unanimously by the committee that the regulations should be revoked at once and that there should be pre-publication for any subsequent regulations.

In the response by the minister dated September 26 to this question, the minister stated: "The regulations are not being enforced by the RCMP".

Surely it is a sad day in this country when a Canadian citizen wishes to stand silently and peacefully in front of the Parliament Buildings and express his views with respect to government policy, and that person is arrested as a criminal and taken away in an RCMP vehicle. That is not acceptable in Canada today.

I want to ask for clear direction from the Chair. Will the Speaker make it very clear to the RCMP, since it is the Speaker who is responsible for the precincts of this House, that this kind of conduct is unacceptable, that it is totally inappropriate for any individual to be arrested when that individual is silently and peacefully standing on Parliament Hill, exercising his or her freedom of speech in conformity with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Will the Speaker give that direction to all Canadians, particularly to the RCMP, and will he ensure that no further arrests will be made of those who are seeking to exercise freedom of speech in this country?

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): I rise on the same question, Mr. Speaker. I simply want to add my voice to the question raised by my hon. friend opposite and tell you that I also witnessed the scene. The thought that came to my mind was that we have lost a little bit of democracy today.

• (1510)

Things were very peaceful, and all of a sudden an RCMP officer who had been told to do so—I am not particularly angry with the action of the policeman because obviously he was following orders—arrested the gentleman in question when he was doing absolutely nothing that was criminal or violent. If one person's rights and freedoms in this nation are in peril, then the rights and freedoms of us all are in peril.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question.

Mr. Speaker: Very briefly. I have the point.

Mr. Kilgour: I join with my colleagues on both ends of the House. I think you and I have discussed this matter before. I realize that you do not have jurisdiction outside the building and that you may feel, therefore, you can say nothing about this matter.

As was just put my colleagues, all our rights are affected when a priest and today Mr. Kealey can be dragged away for not obeying a lawful order. I understand the police cannot give what the basis of that lawful order is.

Mr. Speaker: Let me deal with this point first of all. As is perhaps not as well known as should be, the Speaker's jurisdiction ends at the building wall. It does not extend out on to the grounds.

Second, I do not know what the circumstances were and I cannot sit in judgment as to whether the arrest was within the law or outside the law.

Third, the hon. member raises the matter as a question of privilege. There may or may not be a legitimate complaint about the action of the RCMP under the circumstances. That is not for me to rule on.

I have to decide whether the matter that is raised is a question of privilege or a contempt against the House. I have to say that nothing that has happened has made it impossible for any of the three hon. members to rise in this House, to carry on and to do their duties. That is, after all, the essence of what is a privilege. It must be clearly understood that although there may be no sign of prima facie privilege there may be, however, a complaint in another direction.

The hon. members have given some indication of their unhappiness. They of course can take the matter up in other ways, but I do not think they can establish, certainly on what I have heard, a prima facie case of privilege.

With respect to the policy in general here on the Hill, hon. members know that it is a matter from time to time of considerable concern. I certainly will discuss the matter further with colleagues in the Board of Internal Economy.

I also want to say—and this does not necessarily reflect on the facts that took place today because I am not sitting in judgment of them—that there are security problems. They are very real. One way or another, in the final analysis the Speaker is responsible for the security of all members, at least when inside the building. This is a matter which gives the Speaker some difficulty because there is this dividing line.

We are governed by the rule of law and I do not have authority to do what might be a very good idea to give me authority to do. However, I do not have it at the moment.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, to add to the point you just made, when there was a disturbance in this House some months ago, you felt that perhaps the most appropriate way to deal with it would be to refer the matter to an appropriate committee. This in fact was done, the details were looked into and discussed among members and other witnesses. I wonder if it would be the appropriate thing to do in this case as well.

The point is that when there are disruptions in terms of innocent citizens before their Parliament Buildings, I think it is something of concern to us all. For that reason, I just wonder if it would be appropriate to refer the matter to the appropriate committee for consideration and report back to the House.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise in my capacity as co-chairman of the Joint Senate and House of Commons Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations, particularly in response to the comment of the hon. NDP House leader.

As the hon. member for Burnaby indicated, the committee has already looked at the public works regulations which were brought into place by the Minister of Public Works and which were the subject of my friend's comments.

The committee has in fact already advised the minister quite clearly that the committee's view is that those regulations are totally unacceptable and unconstitutional.

Mr. Speaker: I am also bound by the rules. This is a matter of debate. It may be a matter for Question Period. However, it is not something that I can interfere with. I do not think I have the authority even to go as far as the hon. member for Kamloops has suggested, that I refer this matter to a committee. The committee is the master of its own proceedings and can take the matter under consideration if it wishes.

As I say, I will do what I can do. I will discuss it with members of the Board of Internal Economy because undoubtedly security and all such matters, not just within the building but outside the building, are of very grave concern to us.

Mr. Wappel: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has heard my comments. I will listen for a moment.

Mr. Wappel: I just want to say, Mr. Speaker, that in my view one committee of this House is already seized of the matter. My point was just to indicate that the particular committee of which I am the chairman is already looking into it.

I also wanted to make the point that the minister wrote to yourself, Sir, in September 1990 and now we have an arrest outside the House in March of 1991. With great respect, we are still waiting for a response from this place.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise just for clarification. You indicated in your response to the member for Burnaby that you were not responsible outside the walls of this building.

Could you advise the House and the people who are watching who in fact has the jurisdiction relative to the policing of the grounds of the House of Commons? Which minister has responsibility or which organization has responsibility for that?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may have that question and he may have further questions. He may certainly come and see me and I will discuss it with him, but I think we are getting far beyond anything that I can justify under the rules.

RESPONSE OF MINISTER

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my personal concern arises out of a question which I asked toward the end of Question Period. It was a question directed to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds.

I do not consider that the question was frivolous or that it lacked substance. However, I say with the greatest respect that I do not believe the hon. minister was given sufficient time to provide an answer.

I suggest that perhaps it was a 15 or 20 second span. It was inadequate to provide an answer. I do believe that there are several hundred thousand grain farmers who would be very interested in hearing the answer.

I wonder, with the greatest respect, whether the minister might be afforded the opportunity to complete his response to my question because I for one would like to hear it.

Mr. Speaker: I certainly regret if for whatever reason the hon. minister did not have sufficient time to give his response.

I must also point out that there are very adequate means available to ministers and to members to make information available. Of course the hon. member can avail himself of the rules, bring about an adjourned debate and put further questions to the government, at which time the minister or the minister's parliamentary secretary would be able to give an even more full response.

In any event, I certainly regret if the minister was cut off too quickly. I will try very hard to make sure that does not happen.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, again with the greatest respect, I simply wish to make the observation that it appears that a number of questioners are allowed considerable preamble, some of which I would suggest were 40 to 50 seconds in length, and indeed there are long answers. I am simply suggesting that a question from a backbench government member ought to be treated with the same respect as one from any other member within this House—

• (1520)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I want to assure the hon. member that questions from all members are treated with respect by the Chair. There have been suggestions made very recently that members on both sides have some discussions among themselves with respect to Question Period. I am hoping that those discussions are taking place.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the point is well taken that we want to make this place as relevant as possible. May I suggest that in a moment or two we will be getting into Routine Proceedings and that the minister responsible has an opportunity to make a short statement at that point.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL DEFENCE AND VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with its mandate under Standing Order 108(2), the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs has the honour to present its fourth report. Having undertaken a study of arms transfers, the committee tables its report entitled "World Summit on the Instruments of War and Weapons of Mass Destruction".

This study was undertaken with some urgency, as the committee believes that we have the duty to do what we can to prevent the types of mass arms build-up that allowed Iraq to invade its neighbour and to cause tremendous suffering.

As a part of its post-hostility proposals unveiled in February, the government proposed a world summit designed to highlight the problems of weapons proliferation and to develop plans to control it. In the weeks since the end of the war, the committee has held hearings with a number of experts on the idea of a world summit.

I am pleased to say the committee supports the proposal and has made some suggestions which we think could strengthen its impact. We hope our suggestions will be useful in this regard, and we will work to ensure that Canadian policies are consistent with the goals of the summit.

SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE STATUS OF DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons.

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE FOR THE SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fourth report of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations.

[Translation]

This report emphasizes the lack of legal authority for certain programs administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare and intended to authorize the possession of controlled and restricted narcotics and drugs.

[English]

The report notes that the department has been aware of the lack of authority for the regulations authorizing these programs for at least 15 years.

The report also notes that successive ministers have failed to seek parliamentary approval for legislation authorizing these regulations, despite the government's admission that the current regulations are illegal.

[Translation]

In their fourth report the committee categorically rejects the suggestion of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to the effect that departmental recourse to illegal regulations can be justified by his department's health protection mandate. The report points out that constitutional government principles make it mandatory for ministers and other public officials to enforce the law as it has been passed by Parliament, not as they would wish it to be drafted.

[English]

The fourth report calls for the revocation of the current regulations and their replacement by new regulations that conform to the Narcotics Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act.

SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Hon. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the seventh report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

The committee issued an earlier report entitled Securing our Global Future: Canada's Stake in the Unfinished Business of Third World Debt.

Today's report responds to the government's reply. It is entitled Unanswered Questions: Uncertain Hopes. It encourages continuing Canadian leadership on the critical North–South issue of debt relief.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–351, an act to amend the Criminal Code (terminally ill persons).

He said: This bill concerns amendments to the Criminal Code. Specifically, it deals with the serious subject of the right of individuals who are in the latter stages of terminal illness to refuse or withdraw from medical treatment in order that the timing of a more natural death may preclude unnecessary pain and suffering.

In essence, this bill will address the question of whether we allow individuals in our society to have the right to die with dignity.

As a society and as a government, we can no longer keep avoiding this issue as there exists virtually no government regulation or no judicial guidance concerning the right of a terminally ill patient to refuse or withdraw from treatment.

Terminally ill patients must have the right to determine their own length of treatment and physicians must, in turn, not be held liable for following the very wishes of their own patients.

A strict reading of the Criminal Code of Canada would indicate that withholding treatment from the terminally ill might constitute a criminal offence. As a matter of fact, the Criminal Code has a number of sections which either indicate or seem to indicate that doctors must provide their patients with full medical treatment regardless of circumstances.

Section 14 of the Code reads: "No person is entitled to consent to have death inflicted upon him."

• (1530)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe that is a brief explanation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

WAYS AND MEANS

NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce a ways and means motion. It will no doubt be of interest to all of those who are concerned with the increasing fairness and efficiency of the GST.

So, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 83(1), I have the honour to lay upon the Table a notice of ways and means motion concerning the Excise Tax Act and other Acts pertaining to the implementation of the Goods and Services Tax.

I ask, at the same time, Mr. Speaker, that you designate an Order of the Day for the consideration of the said motion.

Ms. Copps: I would like to wish Happy Easter to everyone, Mr. Speaker. I also wish to thank the government to have taken our advice about the GST on books.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Western Arctic would like to present a motion, but she must have unanimous consent.

An hon. member: Let us hear the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

PETITIONS

CANADA POST

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to table today another four or so petitions on behalf of residents of my riding of Ottawa—Vanier who disapprove of Canada Post's decision to close down the branch located at 580 Rideau Street, which is part of my riding. These petitioners claim that this branch is serving not only a number of senior citizens homes, but also several embassies, three of which already strongly opposed the closure.

Mr. Speaker, I have tabled nearly a dozen petitions on behalf of constituents of Ottawa—Vanier asking Canada Post to reverse this unfortunate decision and I hope they will listen to good old common sense.

[English]

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present today. The first requests that as the House of Commons has condemned the brutal and unacceptable Soviet crackdown on Lithuania and Latvia, Canada has suspended aid to the U.S.S.R. in light of Soviet military aggression in the Baltic States and the Canadian government does not recognize the de jure annexation of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union, and the Canadian government supports the peaceful restoration of freedoms in the Baltic States, and as the present Government of Latvia was elected on a pro-independence platform and enjoys the confidence of the people, the petitioners call upon Parliament to allocate and activate credits for feed grain to Latvia and the neighbouring Baltic States.

The next petition, Mr. Speaker, is similar in the preamble. However, in the whereases, the petitioners call upon Parliament to ascertain the specific requirements for medical aid to Latvia, allocate funds for the acquisition of required medical supplies for Latvia, and expedite the shipment of these supplies to the Government of Latvia.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of several thousand residents of Labrador from a number of communities; Happy Valley, Goose Bay, Labrador City, Wabush, Nain, Makkovik, and other communities along the coast. The petitioners are calling on the Parliament of Canada to instruct the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to reverse its decision regarding the cancellation of Labrador services. They point out that the federal government, through the CBC, has seen fit to cancel all locally produced and locally broadcasted television material in the region of Labrador, and as Labrador is the only location in Canada's north to experience such a cut, and as there is no alternate source of local television broadcasts available in Labrador, neither a daily newspaper, nor a full-time local radio station, that these local CBC television services are essential and should be reinstated immediately.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise, following the tabling of the Ways and Means Motion by the President of the Treasury Board, where we removed the tax on yoghurt but we certainly did not stop taxing books, which is to impose ignorance. Taxing books is a terrible mortgage on our future, and I think we should do everything that we can to encourage reading—

[Translation]

Now that we have come to realize the extent of the problem of illiteracy in our country, now is the time to encourage reading, not to tax it.

[English]

It was with great regret that I will read once again into the record that petitioners, thousands now, call on this Parliament to remove the repressive tax on reading, which is a tax on intellectual property.

Mr. Speaker, please note that Canadians are not happy with the the Ways and Means Motion deposited today.

CANADA POST

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present a petition signed by many of my constituents from Malpeque, Prince Edward Island. They are concerned about the post office in Albany and state that the Canada Post Corporation, which is presently reviewing the status of the Albany post office for conversion, its residents should not be deprived of adequate postal service due to the rural nature of Prince Edward Island.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to reject proposals which will decrease postal service to their local community, to take strong and immediate action to assure them that our post office, which serves a great need in their community will not be closed, put out on contract, relocated in another community, replaced with supermailboxes or any other inferior service.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present the names of close to 600 petitioners who signed this petition stating that thousands of east Europeans did enter Canada legally in good faith and did subsequently apply as self-exiles in good faith.

• (1540)

Self-exiles from Poland and other east European countries are unable to work or attend school while waiting for their applications to be processed, creating unnecessary hardship for both themselves and their sponsors. The processing time for many of these self-exile applicants is up to three years. The quotas imposed by the Minister of Employment and Immigration limit the number of applications being processed.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to request the Minister of Employment and Immigration to reciprocate on their good faith and speed up the process, remove quotas, and allow self-exile applicants to work or attend school while waiting for applications to be processed.

I am pleased that the minister responsible is present to hear these petitioners, and I hope that she will act on these before Easter.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition. This is further to the thousands of Canadians who have already petitioned this House calling upon the government to issue a stamp in honour of Marie Sklodowska Curie who discovered radium. This honour can be made by issuing a commemorative stamp on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth, which will take place on November 7, 1992.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present to the House numerous petitions signed by citizens from North York, Thornhill, Willowdale, and several hundred from Guelph, Cambridge, and others outside of Toronto, all of them objecting strenuously to the unjust imposition of taxes on books, on reading, on literacy.

All of the petitioners humbly implore this Parliament to urge the government to withdraw the GST on textbooks and other materials that lead to literacy and culture.

HEALTH CARE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition on the subject of the private member's bill introduced this day by the hon. member from Fraser Valley West. The petition points out the difficult questions confronting health care professionals, family members and terminally ill persons which have grown more complex with the advancement of medical technology. It calls upon Parliament to acknowledge openly the urgent need for changes to address the present denial of human dignity among thousands of elderly and dying Canadians by taking such actions as it deems appropriate to cause the government to examine the numerous proposals now being presented which would safeguard the right of every Canadian to control his or her own life to the end.

ETHANOL BASED GASOLINES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise again to present petitions signed by over 400 members of my constituency supporting the use of ethanol based gasolines. They want the government to make the oxygen content of gasoline at least 3.2 per cent and to ban methylcyclopentadienyl from further use in the automotive industry and as automotive fuel.

I am shocked that in response to earlier petitions the government has been responding using technology that is probably 10 or 12 years old and not up to current standards on the efficiencies that are involved in manufacturing this product or some of the end uses, one of which is a flour that can be used for human consumption, particularly suitable for Third World countries.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present petitions signed by approximately 900 or so Canadians, plus some visitors to our country. It is part of the "Put Canada Back on Track" campaign. The petitioners, who are from right across Canada, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail services cut on January 15, 1990, to maintain and where appropriate upgrade remote services on which many Canadians rely, to provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail, and to make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world.

This is a new petition and perhaps the government can come up with a new answer.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a group of petitions from constituents in my riding from Melfort, Naicam, Mistatim, Hudson Bay, Spalding, Pleasantdale, Grandin, Fairy Glen and Lac-Vert, who note that the government is attempting to off-load some of the costs of maintaining RCMP policing in their area. They point out that the Government of Canada and Canada benefits by at least 30 per cent by the activities of the RCMP.

The petitioners request the Parliament of Canada to continue the sharing of this important national symbol and institution and that the federal government continue to carry 30 per cent of the cost of RCMP policing instead of the 25 per cent to which it is attempting to shift.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present with respect to the goods and services tax and its impact on Canadians, an impact which the petitioners are quite critical of.

The various ways and means motions which have been presented before the House today do not deal with most of these problems. They do provide some very important changes with respect to jigs, dyes and moulds, which are of extreme importance to my constituency and I am pleased to see, but they do not address things such as the need to provide an exemption for books, the need to see to it that this GST is replaced by a fair tax system applying in a fair way to Canadians across the country.

INCOME TAX GUIDES

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I have two sets of petitions which have been duly certified by the Clerk of Petitions.

In the first one, the petitioners point out that tax guides have been provided for a variety of groups with special needs. It also points out that students are a group with special needs with respect to income tax. They seek action by Parliament to request that Revenue Canada make available to students a guide that would be suitable to their needs.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present the final 3,000 of 57,000 petitions which were submitted by the citizens of Windsor, the content of which you know, but I think it is important to re-emphasize the final paragraph. It says: "Wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take all necessary measures to preserve local CBC television broadcasting in Windsor and all other areas deprived of such service by federal government cutbacks and by the decisions of CBC management". I would remind you that we in Windsor have lost our sole source of local Canadian broadcasting and are, therefore, subject to dominance by American airwaves by the action of this government.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by people in a number of provinces: Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario, Manitoba and, as well, residents of England.

In their petition, the people humbly pray and call upon Parliament to support the New Democratic Party plan to restore VIA Rail services which were cut on January 15, 1990, and maintain and, more appropriately, to upgrade remote services on which many Canadians rely, and to provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail and make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world.

URANIUM MINING

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to be able to present a petition signed by several hundred people from places in Saskatchewan like Moose Jaw, Regina, Saskatoon, Prince Alberta and, in Manitoba from Brandon, Boissevain, Winnipeg and other points. These people have taken note of the spill of radioactive waste at Wollaston Lake in 1989. They found that the regulatory system that pertains to these kinds of events was grossly inadequate.

• (1550)

Therefore, the petitioners are calling for a comprehensive, independent and public inquiry into uranium mining in Saskatchewan and in northern Canada in general.

As well, the petitioners feel that there needs to be an immediate EARP panel convened in order to look into the new mine at Eagle Point next to the Wollaston Lake mine.

DYING WITH DIGNITY

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the pleasure of presenting two petitions.

The first one states that since 1981, Canada's Dying with Dignity Association has been expanding and reflecting the concerns of Canadians for more widespread understanding of euthanasia.

It goes on to point out that many thousands of Canadians are kept in existence in conditions totally lacking in human dignity and with no resources for relief. The petitioners call upon Parliament to acknowledge openly the urgent need for changes to address the present denial of human dignity among thousands of elderly and dying Canadians.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the second petition I have is 45 pages long and contains several hundred names.

The petitioners are mainly old age pensioners living in mobile home parks who point out that the goods and services tax is being levied unfairly on their residences. They point out that the government is taxing shelter by virtue of the definition of mobile homes.

The petitioners also point out the government's failure to recognize the use to which mobile accommodation can be put and call upon the government to rescind the goods and services tax. They wish the prevention of taxing of shelter for persons residing in movable residences, including recreational vehicles, small trailers and houseboats.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise under Standing Order 36 to present yet another petition on VIA Rail.

The petition shows how widespread the support for VIA Rail is. The petitioners are from places like Winnipeg, Toronto, Kamloops, British Columbia, Fredericton, New Brunswick and various places in Manitoba, Thunder Bay and Calgary, Alberta.

These petitioners have not given up on VIA Rail. They have asked the government and Parliament to maintain VIA Rail as a present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

PUBLIC DISTRIBUTION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present two petitions.

The first one is from a number of residents from Saskatchewan who are concerned about the cuts made by this government regarding the Public Distribution Assistance Program which is threatening the future of weekly newspapers.

The petitioners are particularly concerned that weekly newspapers have been especially hard hit. In fact, weekly newspapers are, in many cases, the sole instrument for receiving news in a local area. They call upon this government to make some changes with respect to the mailing costs for these newspapers.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition presented to me by a number of farmers from Saskatchewan who are very concerned that this government has removed oats from the Canadian Wheat Board.

The petitioners call upon this government to replace oats under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board and to give oats and barley the same protection under the Canadian Wheat Board that wheat presently has.

They further call upon this government not to remove oats or barley without this institution, Parliament, first having a debate and making a decision after a proper and open consultation with all the farmers in western Canada.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed the following bills: Bill C-99, an act for granting Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991; Bill C-100, an act for granting Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre in relation to amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-79, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act, and the motion of Mr. Hawkes (p. 18849).

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As you know, this motion on Bill C-79 received a lot of debate yesterday, basically on the fact that I was not allowed to introduce some of my amendments which would have ensured that any opinion the board had already given with respect to an investigation that may be ongoing on a member of Parliament or a senator, and the bill reads at present:

> —the board or the relevant committee in the Senate may not give that opinion to the police officer who requested it.

In debate yesterday representatives of the Conservative and the Liberal parties indicated that they would be willing to make sure that the Board of Internal Economy in this House passed bylaws soon to ensure the gist of that would be part of the bylaws of the board.

If we could have that assurance at this time, that those people spoke for their parties, I think you may find that there is a disposition of the House to move quickly on this matter.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): The member for Ottawa—Vanier and I had discussions earlier and I had his assurance. He is not in the House at the moment but there may be another member of the party who can speak on his behalf. But I welcome the input from my colleague across the way. I can assure him that as a board member and on behalf of the members of my party on the board, we would attempt to incorporate the principle in a bylaw as quickly as possible, once we have it proclaimed and through Royal Assent, and so on. It should be one of the very first bylaws, if not the first bylaw.

The advantage of that may be, in a funny kind of a way, Mr. Speaker, if we get it right it will endure forever, if we get it wrong all members of the House from experience can tell us it should be changed, and we can change the bylaw if we haven't got it right. It has been a clause that has given us enormous difficulty in its wording over time, and so there may be a kind of advantage to doing it by a bylaw which is legally binding on the board and on the behaviour of the board. But if we do not get it right the next time, it will be easier to change and more quickly changeable to make sure that we get it the way the House wants.

I hope that is sufficient confirmation. I do not know if the representative of the Liberal Party is willing to confirm, but I can assure the House that I had that conversation with the member for Ottawa—Vanier at around two o'clock or two-fifteen. He made the offer on the floor yesterday and is still standing by the offer.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): I am afraid I am not in much of a position to help. I have tried to locate the hon. member and he is not in the building at the moment. He will be back later today. If he had the discussion as was indicated by the government Whip—and I have no reason to disbelieve the government Whip in his statements. I am not a member of the board obviously and can give no such assurance and I am sorry not to be in that position—but if the discussion took place between the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and the hon. member for Calgary West, then I think the hon. member for Churchill could take that assurance.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): One of the realities is that the existing Board of Internal Economy may change in the next month, month and a half. Because if the House does prorogue there will have to be a new striking of that committee and I suspect because of the changes, particularly in the Official Opposition as well as on the government benches, there may be some readjustment.

I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, if through you I can ask the chief government Whip whether he was speaking as a member of the board or whether he was speaking on behalf of the government in terms of an indication that the government would be prepared through its votes on the Board of Internal Economy, whoever may hold them, to ensure that those bylaws were put forward.

Mr. Hawkes: One of the beauties of Bill C-79 and the changes is that the board continues through dissolution, promulgation—it could indeed be changed, but I would give him the assurance, and we definitely have enough votes to be able to see that the bylaw comes into place.

Mr. Murphy: Without insurance and with the assurance that the member for Ottawa—Vanier gave me privately on behalf of the Liberal Party, I would be willing to let the bill come to a vote.

• (1600)

The New Democratic Party caucus will still oppose the legislation, not because we are against Bill C-79—we have supported the work there—but because we believe the very issue we have been talking about today should have been put in the legislation. It is not that we doubt the word of the board. I think it will be in the by-laws that affect the House of Commons. However, my concern is that by not having that as a requirement we have no power to ensure that the Senate passes the same sort of by-laws.

Therefore we will oppose the motion before us, but we certainly do not oppose the intent of Bill C-79.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The first question is on the motion standing in the name of Mr. Hawkes.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion of Mr. Hawkes agreed to

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on the main motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before you begin the ringing of the bells, let me indicate that there have been consultations.

There has been a request that we defer this vote to about 4.45 p.m. and therefore have a vote at 5 p.m.

However, that is on the understanding that upon the completion of that vote we would then move to the consideration of Bill C-98. No one would object to the normal motion for continuation of hours through to the completion of Bill C-98. It might take until 6.30 p.m. or 7 p.m. as a lot of members would like to make at least some input on it.

There would be general agreement that no party in the House intends to stop that motion for extended hour and that at the conclusion of that debate no party has the intention to have a recorded division at that point.

If we could just have that confirmation, we could defer the ringing of the bells until 4.45 p.m. for a vote at 5 p.m.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, assuming that right after this motion passes and/or Royal Assent we will immediately deal with the agricultural bill. The bells will start ringing at 4.45 for a vote at 5 p.m. and we will return to consideration of the agricultural bill.

The understanding is that there will be no dilatory motions, no additional extensions, no additional legislation or motions brought in if we do go past 6 p.m. and that there will not be a recorded division called for, at least by this party, on the agricultural bill.

Mr. Milliken: We agree with what has been stated, but I think it should be a House order. It should be agreed, by unanimous consent of the House now, that those are the terms. I think the table could properly draft the order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

FARM INCOME PROTECTION ACT

Hon. Marcel Danis (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-98, an act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will keep my remarks very short. This piece of legislation we are dealing with, Bill C-98, has had considerable study throughout the country going back to January 9, 1990 when the committee was formed. We have had a lot of consultation right across the country with provincial governments, producers, and the federal government.

I would like to read into the record, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, the names of those people who contributed so much time and help to the process we have just come through: from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, Don Downe; from the National Farmers Union, Gil Pedersen; from the Atlantic Grains Council, George Burris, secretary-manager of the council; from Quebec, Claude Lafleur; from Ontario, Terry Daynard, executive vice-president of the Ontario Corn Producers' Association; Roger George of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, an organization which represents many farmers and producers across this country; and Larry Miehls from the Ontario Soybean Growers' Marketing Board.

• (1620)

From the prairies we had Gordon Cresswell and Bill Duke who served with the Western Canadian Wheat Growers' Association; Ken Edie from the Manitoba Pool Elevators; Alex Graham from the Alberta Wheat Pool and Terry Hanson from the Advisory Committee of the Canadian Wheat Board. Also we had Ed Armstrong, Western Barley Growers' Association; Bob Hopely of the Western Grain Stabilization Advisory Committee and Keith Lewis, the past president of the Prairie Canola Board; Owen McAulay from Keystone Agriculture Products; Roy Piper from the United Grain Growers; Barry Seneft, director of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool; Frank Spanbauer from Western Canada Pulse Growers and Brian Haddow from the B.C. Federation of Agriculture.

Mr. Vanclief: You forgot us. We helped.

Mr. Cardiff: Yes. Mr. Speaker, I want to say, as well, that we thank all parties in the House of Commons for the co-operation they extended to us. They recognize the importance of this legislation and how necessary it is to have it implemented as quickly as possible.

Many things have been said about the legislation. We have been accused of hurrying it through the House of Commons in the process. As I said before, from the timeframe and the consultations held with producers across this country, the 19 producers on that committee, I believe this is legislation that everybody should be very proud of because they played a very major role in its development.

It is now up to us to give quick passage to Bill C-98, and allow the Senate to deliberate on the bill. It is the first time in a long while the farmers and producers of this country have had such a major, comprehensive piece of legislation that offers the long-term security and bankable programs this legislation does.

We wish more provinces would offer the NISA program, because we believe that GRIP and NISA are compatible with one another and would give that much more security to the farm economy as well.

I will close my remarks by asking my colleagues if they could give quick passage to this legislation, because I believe it is absolutely necessary and the producers are looking for it.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words at the third reading stage of Bill C-98, the Farm Income Protection Act. This is extremely important legislation.

Unfortunately it is not legislation which spells out exactly what arrangements will be provided to producers of agriculture products, but rather provides a framework for the government to put in place agreements with provincial governments and with producers groups. From that point of view, I think it really circumvents Parliament and does not allow for the normal kinds of inputs to be made for producers in stabilizing their incomes.

The proposals planned under this bill, the Gross Revenue Insurance Program and the Net Income Stabilization Account and the third line of defence, or the special arrangements provisions probably will be made to work.

I am exceedingly skeptical as to whether the agreements that have been put in place will be in place three or four years from now. I think there will have to be massive modifications to them.

I believe there is a great deal of concern among producers as to just how serious the government is about this legislation. There are those who think there will be a massive payout in 1992 and 1993. Those are election years. After that there will be very little pay-out because of the structure and the arrangements. Whether the GRIP and NISA programs survive no one knows at this time.

There is one overriding consideration and it is that the situation for Canadian grains and oilseed producers is so desperate that whatever the proposal being offered by this government and by the provincial governments involved, producers need it desperately at this time.

The net farm income this year is projected to drop by 54 per cent from about $4 billion to $2 billion. This is an industry that at the retail level has something like $45 billion. At the farm gate level there is some $22 billion. Out of that $22 billion only $2 billion is there as total net farm income. The Department of Agriculture has projected no net farm income for provinces like Saskatchewan and Manitoba this year.

The situation is exceedingly desperate. Farmers are being forced to take GRIP this year because the initial price for grain is not going to be revealed until late July. The world farm gate price for wheat may be as low as $90 or $95 a tonne, lower than it has been in real terms since the 1930s. The situation is so desperate that producers feel they have absolutely no choice.

If we look at the three levels of support, GRIP and NISA are designed to stabilize farm incomes and level out the low years with the high years of income. The government has lost all credibility with the special arrangements committee, special arrangements or deficiency payments that are being proposed because it has not made an announcement. It is now the end of March. It is questionable whether any assistance will be made available in time for the seeding next month or early May.

That destroys the credibility of the whole three-stage level of support, especially with net farm income dropping by over 50 per cent this year. Many farmers feel they have to take the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, even though the premiums are very high, because of the tremendous uncertainty and the question in their minds is: "Is the government really going to provide any additional assistance?"

Today the minister had a backbencher put a question concerning western grain stabilization fund. He announced that there was going to be $158 million distributed under the western grain stabilization fund this spring. That would be an interim payment in this particular crop year. It sounds like a lot of money. When we realize that net farm income is dropping by $2 billion, and the minister's own advisory committee on interim financial support is recommending at least $1 billion or $1.2 billion, it is not very much. Unless the minister comes through with a major payment, the situation this spring for literally tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands of producers is going to be very bleak.

On this side of the House we are concerned about executive federalism, where the government gets legislation like this which puts it in the position to make all kinds of deals without hardly a nod to Parliament. Fortunately, the government has accepted a couple of amendments from this side of the House. One is by the member for Prince Edward—Hastings recommending that there be an ongoing review of the legislation. The one that provided specifically for a review and report to Parliament by 1993 was not accepted, but we hope the amendment that was put by the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings will have the effect of providing that kind of interim review.

I do not think there is very much confidence among producers as to what is going to happen with this legislation. I am told that in the central part of Alberta many producers will not take the program. I met with a number of producers in western Canada over the weekend and the split was interesting. Some were going to take the program because they were in such a desperate situation. Others who were in a stronger position financially said they saw the benefit this year, but thought they would be paying for four years and, at the end of the day, they would not profit much by enrolling in the program. So there is great skepticism and great uncertainty.

The one amendment, which was put by our side of the House and accepted, provides for the government to be required, with the concurrence of the provinces, to table each agreement. At least we have the agreements with whatever number of provinces take it on.

There is great concern that the legislation will not be national in scope. There is provision for it. We have some five or six provinces who have, so far, indicated they will take the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, but only one has agreed to take the Net Income Stabilization Program, that being Saskatchewan. Whether the program will ever be national in scope the way that the western grain stabilization and the Agriculture Stabilization Act worked in tandem, only time will tell. That is part of the uncertainty with the whole arrangement.

The bill sets out laudable objectives: it should be market neutral; it should be production neutral; it should respect our international trade arrangements; it should be environmentally sustainable. Yet some groups who came before the committee were able to put very convincing arguments that none of these objectives will be met, at least in the initial year. That is why the need for a very capable and competent review.

Already there are important and credible agriculture forecasting groups saying that the bill is going to encourage greater production of wheat and it is going to ignore market signals. It would be most unfortunate if that were to occur this year when wheat is at $2.50 a bushel rather than $4 or $5 a bushel and that should not trigger a signal for an increased production of two million acres of wheat rather than a reduction of one million acres of wheat as probably would have happened without the GRIP program being in place.

There are a number of other amendments which the government did not accept. One is to protect the integrity of individual producer's income tax confidentiality. This bill will provide that the ordinary crop insurance authorities in each province will simply be able to trigger an individual producer's income tax files. I am not sure that is necessary or desirable. I am sure it is not desirable and I doubt that it is even necessary.

We had proposed as well that the government should not be allowing NISA, which is a funded program where the government matches dollar for dollar certain amounts of funding, to be made available to other than Canadian citizens or permanent residents of Canada. The government did not accept those amendments.

We look at the bill believing that it is a framework legislation that can provide for agreements. We are not certain how effective the legislation will be and whether the objectives will be met. On the other hand, we believe that the government has an immediate responsibility to provide cash assistance before the crop season begins this spring. Because of its urgency, we hope that the government will act and bring this legislation back to the House from time to time to be amended, as needed, or at least to have the agreements amended so that we will be able to make the necessary adjustments. With the wide variety of growing situations and market circumstances and other aspects involved in this, and at a time of incredible cash flow shortage, there is not much confidence or belief that this legislation will stand as it is for very long without amendments to those agreements.

We want to see the legislation pass so that the benefits can be made available to producers. We think it will require adjustments and changes not very far down the road, but we are pleased to see it pass at third reading today and get on the road to providing assistance either later this fall or certainly in the next crop year to remedy in that crop year what has been lost in this particular crop year. During the past two years the government has chopped back in a crude and violent way government support programs by some $1.6 billion. That is why there is an emergency today for Canadian grain and oilseed producers.

This legislation is not going to correct that immediate problem. We require assistance immediately, before the planting season this spring. If this legislation works the way the government believes it will, hopefully it will be useful in the next crop year 1991–92.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I attended a press conference where I and a number of my colleagues from this House who had made a recent trip to Sudan and Ethiopia were putting before our country the needs of those particular countries for food. It is recognized that if we do not get a couple of million tonnes of food to those countries in the next few months, as many as a million people will die.

There are 12 million people in those two countries that are being affected by famine, a famine that is considered to be even worse than the one in 1984–85 in which one million people died. This is thought to be a worse situation because of unco-operative governments and the wars that are going on in those areas. We in the prairies and in Canada grow over 50 million tonnes of grain, of which we export up to 30 million tonnes. Our contribution to world food is fairly small compared to the amount that we actually grow.

What we are talking about today is a system which will allow the farmers in Canada to survive. It is almost ridiculous that we find ourselves working on a plan that is supposed to help in the survival of the food producers in our country when there is such a great need in the world for the food that we produce.

Obviously there is something wrong with our distribution system. Some people starve while we cannot get enough for our product to survive. The various papers that were part of the growing together operation that the government put into place made a plea for a structure that would stabilize the food production industry in Canada.

The two plans that are part of this particular bill, the Farm Income Protection Act, are the Gross Revenue Insurance Program and the Net Income Stabilization Account. They are the product of a considerable amount of discussion among people interested in farming and among farmers themselves. At least that was what was supposed to happen. However, the consultation process only went so far. It continued up until the basics had been agreed upon, then the details were left to the bureaucrats and the legislation was left to the bureaucrats.

The agreements which really make up the key issues in this whole operation of a safety net are between the federal government and the provincial governments, with only marginal impact from the farm groups.

I know the government says this is the product of a considerable amount of consultation, and I guess we have to agree with that. However, this government has also given the term "consultation" a bad name. Therefore, we are always a little suspicious that what we are getting is an opportunity to say something, but nobody is on the other side listening.

This bill is enabling legislation. It allows the federal Minister of Agriculture to make agreements with the provinces and with the producers relative to the provision of safety nets for the products they produce. The parameters of these agreements are supposed to be established in this legislation and these are supposed to be long-term safety nets.

This was not to be an ad hoc solution to the disasters when they arose, but was supposed to be an ongoing, permanent solution to the ups and downs of the agricultural sector. The need for a permanent stabilization program has long been part of the New Democratic Party's policy, as it was a policy of the CCF, which preceded us.

Various attempts have been made over the years to establish programs which would allow this kind of stabilization as far as agriculture is concerned. We have had the Western Grain Stabilization program, the agricultural stabilization program, Crop Insurance Act, various supply management marketing boards. All of these have been attempts to put in place a safety net program that would be permanent and satisfactory.

These attempts have worked with varying degrees of success, supply management probably being the relative easy winner among the groups. In 1985, the Hon. John Wise, then the Minister of Agriculture, made a commitment on behalf of this government to the country that he would put in place a permanent long-term stabilization program for all sectors of agriculture. I am sure John Wise is breathing easier today because I think he gave up in despair of even expanding the supply management under the ideology that was at that particular time espousing things like free trade and the selling of the country.

As it happened, the hon. John Wise left us and it has taken the government since 1985 until now to come up with some kind of an alternative to the suggestion that was put in place at that time.

FARM INCOME PROTECTION ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-98, an act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, basically GRIP is much the same structure as a New Democratic Party proposal which is quite well known across the prairies and across the rest of Canada called the Family Farm Stabilization Program. It is by comparison to our program that we see the shortcomings of this particular program.

I would like to spend a bit of time on a couple of those shortcomings. First, this was supposed to be a long-term program and it may be a short-term program. The Western Grain Stabilization Program floundered under a $1.2 billion deficit, a deficit which Grant Devine hopes is to become greater in the next few months and hopes that he will win the Saskatchewan election.

I suggest that this program may be short-term because of the 15-year moving average price which is likely to pay well for the first couple of years, particularly for wheat. It will pay well because it takes in those years in the late 1970s when the price of wheat was fairly high.

This will mean that the program will establish a pretty hefty deficit during the first two years of its existence. We hope that the deficit will not sink the program during those years. That is why I suggest that it may be a short-term program. If it goes several billion dollars in the hole in the first couple of years, this government or a following government may have to or may want to look at it. However, it may not have to do so in the first two years, which will almost take it to the next election. That is one shortcoming of this particular program.

It may be short-term for another reason. If the guaranteed price falls after a couple of years, farmers may not want to be part of it.

The success of this type of program depends on almost universal subscriptions from the producers. If the producers decide that they do not like it and start dropping out, the program eventually falls on hard times and the government is likely to dump it. It is likely to dump it, particularly after a couple of years, if it becomes politically advantageous for the government to do so.

That is another reason why it may not survive and another reason why we think it has some shortcomings.

A third concern is that it does not include the cost of production for even a minimum amount of production. We are not suggesting, and we have never suggested it, that the cost of production be guaranteed for great amounts of product produced, to unlimited levels. However, we have suggested that every farmer should be assured of the cost of production for a certain part of his production.

There is not enough stability in this program after the first couple of years. If they start producing crops lower than the cost of production, they will want to get out of it as soon as possible or go into products that are more marketable. We in Canada know that we have to continue producing the products presently in place.

Another flaw in this plan is that there is no limit to the amount that can be paid to any particular producer. In the United States similar programs are now being blamed for the demise of the family farm, because those programs ended up paying 85 per cent of the funds available to 10 per cent of the farms. Those 10 per cent were the large farms, many of which were vertically integrated corporate farms that took the lion's share of the program. Meanwhile, small farms or farms that had been viable disappeared, with the effect of elimination of rural communities and, to a great extent, the rural way of life in many states.

In our amendments to this bill we have suggested that a limit should be placed upon the amount paid to each unit to keep the total cost of the program down. That again is a flaw in this particular program. There is nothing within this legislation which guarantees a top limit on the spending as far as the taxpayer is concerned.

In the policy our party has been suggesting for years we had many issues in place that are not in this program. The first would be the cost of production, a basic part of production. In the second level of production we suggested a similar program to the one we are talking about today and that the average price be guaranteed. In the third level farmers would have yield insurance.

There are two other real concerns about the short-sightedness of these particular plans. There is nothing in this program or related to this program which relieves farm debt. That is a major concern out there at the moment.

In Saskatchewan there has been a major decimating of a number of farms by foreclosures, quit claims and other methods.

• (1720)

Twenty to 30 per cent of the farmers are in financial difficulty. These plans do nothing to help these farmers stay viable, so that they can make use of these plans. Many farmers are also in a position where they do not have money to plant this spring.

The Minister of State responsible for Grains and Oilseeds made an announcement that western grain stabilization would make some pay-outs this spring that may help in the bridging. These plans are based on this particular year and the farmers need funds now to plant. Consequently, a number of farmers may not be able to take advantage of GRIP because they do not have enough money to put seed in the ground now.

I could spend a considerable amount of time talking about NISA which is a glorified RRSP plan, the kind of plan of which every group of people in Canada would like to take advantage. I could talk also about a number of other issues that we are concerned about: the fact that this is not friendly to the environment, that it gives the wrong kind of market signals, that it does not include forages. All of these are concerns we have with these plans.

Mr. Speaker, I will sit down now. I know there are other speakers who will talk about the particular concerns we have with this bill.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make a few comments about Bill C-98, the Farm Income Protection Act, before the completion of third reading.

Without a doubt this is the most all-encompassing piece of farm legislation that we have had in Canada in many decades. That statement has both pluses and minuses. It is a piece of legislation that is attacking the stability problem of farmers in Canada in a different way than we have ever attacked it before in the hope we can provide that stability.

I want to point out to the House and to all Canadians that the dangers of this type of bill, which is enabling legislation, gives this government and any future government more power to deal with agricultural legislation and programs than has ever been given in Canada before.

With this bill a government does not have to come back to the House of Commons or to the Parliament of Canada to make changes in most, if not all, of the important pieces of farm legislation. That gives flexibility, I agree, but it can also be used, if so desired, in negative ways, whether it be for political reasons, or for the expedience of doing what may need to be done in a hurry in order to help solve a problem. As I say, there are pluses and minuses.

We should all be aware that this bill, albeit for the most part a good bill, is not the be all and the end all that some people would like us to believe it is. It will put some stability into the farm situation, but most of that stability is going to be in the very near future. When I say the near future, I mean at the end of the 1991 crop and at the end of the 1992 crop. After that there are grave concerns about what may happen.

I would just like to quote from a very highly regarded Canada agribusiness authority, Agriweek, that is published in Winnipeg:

> The first crop year to be covered is 1991–92 and a substantial payment for that year is reasonably assured. But market prices have nowhere to go but up;—

And let us hope that is the case, Mr. Speaker. The article goes on:

> —meanwhile the 15–year moving average on which support prices are based will go progressively lower each year. When the two converge benefits will cease but premiums will continue. Unless crop prices drop even further the probability of significant GRIP payouts after about 1992–93 is low.

We have to realize that this is the type of program that has been arranged as it should. I agree that those producers who sign up cannot get in and out each year. One of the conditions of signing up for GRIP is that once a producer signs up for one year he must give three years' notice.

This is a type of insurance plan, but a farmer cannot get out for three years. The minister himself has said that the deficits, which should be covered by the premiums, are going to build up in the first two or three years in particular and if the premiums get to a level that they do not pay for the forthcoming year, there is not any way the producer can get out unless he or she has given notice some three years prior to that.

The other concern is that it is a combination type bill. In order to have anywhere near the effectiveness it is hoped to have, a producer must take part in both GRIP and NISA. All provinces right now with the exception of one, have not seen fit to sign up for the Net Income Stabilization Account portion of the bill.

We must not be deceived when we see the charts and figures that are put before us as taxpayers, producers, and people in the agrifood industry that show the net results of producers being involved in GRIP and NISA. For the most part producers are not involved in NISA and everyone says that for the program to be as successful as we hope it is producers must belong to both. Most producers in this country are not going to be given the opportunity to belong to both because most of the provinces have not signed up for the NISA.

When we look at the charts and the net income the farmers have had in the last 10 years, even with the new programs, when we look at the projections for market prices, market returns, and the returns from GRIP and NISA, these programs are still only going to guarantee Canadian producers about 80 per cent of the average net income they have become accustomed to for the last 10 years. I do not think there are many Canadians out there who would be happy with that.

The good part of that is that it is going to be stabilized. There will be some stability. But it is one thing to say to someone: "Yes, you have an income, and you are going to have an income for the next five years, or 10 years, or whatever it is". It is another thing to say: "But, it is going to be at 80 per cent of what your income has been for the last 10 years," or, in this case, the figures that we look at.

That would even be different if the income for the last 10 years had been a good income so that that cutback could be afforded. I can tell you that that cutback cannot be afforded.

The other concern that I have, and I think it is one we need to pay a lot of attention to and spend a lot of time with, is the acceptability of this program and the results of this enabling legislation, how it is going to be received by the rest of the world and by other trading nations. Already we have some of those groups from outside our borders taking a look at it, one of them being a very highly respected economic forecasting group from the United States, the Wharton Econometric Forecasting Associates. They are already pointing fingers at what they feel will be the net result of this piece of legislation. They say that it is going to increase production and it is going to influence, not only the amount of acres of different crops that will be planted in Canada, but the distribution of those acres and the distribution of the different types of crops, whether they be wheat, canola, flax, lentils, corn, soybeans, or whatever it might happen to be.

• (1730)

Those are matters we had best be aware of now. They are going to be looked at by other countries at the GATT negotiations. Other countries are going to pass judgment on whether they think this enabling legislation allows Canadian governments now and in the future to influence production and, therefore, influence the amount of grains, oilseeds or crops that are in the country and whether that will adjust what might otherwise be the production level in Canada and, therefore, affect production in the rest of the world.

I would like to thank the government for all of the amendments they made at committee, and further, the amendments they made at report stage here in the House on Bill C-98.

One of those amendments was by my colleague from Algoma, which requests and ensures that the agreements the federal government makes with the individual provinces will be tabled in the House of Commons so that we can review and look at those each time the agreements are made.

The other was an amendment in my name, which covered the concerns of a lot of groups and individuals who came forward at the agriculture committee when we were going through the bill, prior to clause by clause review at the end.

The amendment states that the minister must appoint a review committee which each year must review and report to the minister with any suggestions or amendments they feel need to be made to the bill in order to improve it. I feel that is absolutely necessary. I appreciate the fact that that has taken place.

I do not think I will make any more comments, other than in closing, to say basically it is a good bill. It is not the be all and the end all. It is better than the ad hoc programs we have at the present time. It is filling in the second line of defence we are concerned about at the farm level.

The first line of defence, as we all know, and the only line of defence that producers and farmers want is a fair return from the marketplace for the produce, livestock and crops they produce. That is really what we want. That is really what producers want and that is really what is needed.

Along with that, there has to be the government programs and the government action and force put into place to ensure that producers have a decent interest rate, not the interest rate we have now that is away out of whack, compared to our competitors, especially those south of the border.

We need proper border inspection put in place. We need a better way of counteracting the game that our friends south of the border like to play in putting up non-tariff barriers and the other word that they are now admitting they are using in the way they describe what they are doing, called harassment. They are excellent at that. We have do a much better job on behalf of our producers, as a Parliament, in counteracting that.

The GRIP and NISA programs covered by Bill C-98 puts in place the second line of defence in order to give some stability if the first line of defence does not provide a fair return to the producers for their product.

There is the third line of defence, which the government is presently dragging its heels on by not telling the producers what it is going to do, if anything, concerning the 1991 spring year as a result of the terrible prices in farm products because of the 1990 crop prices. That is bridging financing to get the producers through the situation they are in now, until the positive effects of the GRIP and NISA programs can take place after this year.

Again I urge the government to get off its hands and get that done so the producers know where they are for this year. Hopefully producers will to be able to take part in and benefit from the enabling legislation which puts GRIP and NISA in place for the long-term benefit of Canadian producers. Therefore, when they are benefiting and are productive, they will be producing the quality food that Canadians demand and deserve and they will be able to do it at a reasonable and competitive price.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a privilege to be able to participate in this debate because there is probably no debate that we have had in this House of Commons that more directly affects more people in a whole region than the one that we are talking about now.

What we are talking about is not so much whether Bill C-98, the Farm Income Protection Act, will protect production in this country, but whether it will protect family farmers in this country. I have no doubt that we will keep on producing food in this country. Certainly we have the resources to do so and the world will keep on needing food, there is no question about that. So we will produce food in this country.

The question is: Who will produce it? Will it be family farmers as we have known it; generations of farmers who pass on the farming knowledge from one generation to another, the knowledge of a particular piece of land from one generation to another, or will it be corporate farms, a very few large farms where everybody works as hired help with no real commitment to the industry and culture of the farming community, the small communities and towns that rely on the farming community? All of that, which is so much a part of the Canadian fabric, could well be lost.

I would like to say that in some ways I feel, quite personally, that it is many of my friends and peers who are getting wiped out by the agriculture crisis that we are facing right now. The older generation of farmers, our parents, people who started in the 1930s and so on, went through tough times in the late 1950s which were resolved, in many ways, by the Diefenbaker government selling grain to the Soviet Union and China. Those same people went through the low prices and the inability to sell grain in the late 1960s and early 1970s when the former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, distinguished himself by saying: "Why should I sell your grain?" Those farmers went through those years. Those who have survived will continue to survive, but they are getting older.

What happened was that in the 1970s when prices were good there was quite a number of young farmers in all communities across the country who went back to the farm and established their families on the farm and took up farming as a career. These farm families are now in their late 30s, 40s and early 50s and are up against the wall. These people do not know whether they will be able to put a crop in this year. These people do not know whether they will have to relocate their families, whether the way of life that they chose is gone forever or whether it is worthwhile to try and hang on for another year. This is a crisis that not only pertains to individuals, it pertains to whole communities and, indeed, whole regions of this country. If you look at the figures you can see why.

In 1980, net farm income in this country was about $4.5 billion to $5 billion a year. By 1989-90, it had gone down to $3.2 million although inflation had about doubled the cost to production in that time. Another 54 per cent drop this year to about $2 billion nationally. But in Saskatchewan and Manitoba not a dime of net farm income over-all. That means there is nothing to live on for farm families in those two provinces without government assistance in this coming year. Unfortunately these discouraging trends in the farm community have also been reinforced by other actions of the government which have also served to demoralize farm communities and take away their reasons for being—things like post office closures, closures of railways, and now most recently the cuts to revenue sharing with the provinces, which is serving to undermine the health and education systems.

In a lot of these rural communities it is the small rural hospital, the small rural school that is already in trouble that will be the first to go because of the cuts that were recently announced by the federal government. That again undermines that rural community, not only in terms of morale but by taking away valuable jobs which members of the farm family could hold to supplement their farm income.

The legislation we are talking about here permits the government to proceed with agreements with the provinces on the GRIP and NISA programs is the result of a long process obviously. There is a long history of struggle by farmers to get in place government programs which will maintain their incomes and their way of life—going back to the thirties, struggles for crop insurance, struggles for grain stabilization and so on.

It became apparent that a lot of these were not working properly. Too much ad hoc assistance was still needed, and that is why when the former Minister of Agriculture, John Wise, in 1985 committed the government to a long-term permanent program, there was widespread support for that idea across the farm community and across all political parties, a real willingness to move that agenda ahead.

Unfortunately, in its first term of government the Progressive Conservative Party chose not to move on that front. I think, without violating my native sense of modesty, the New Democrats did the farm community a real service in the last election by actually pinpointing, or at least suggesting, a particular program, a specific program, the Farm Family Support Program, which detailed a program for family farmers and forced a debate to occur on the whole question of a permanent safety net program.

I think it was a very good program. Certainly in Saskatchewan it was very well received. Saskatchewan farmers, as a result of that in large part, returned a large number of NDP members to this House this session.

There were a few aspects of that proposal that were particularly noteworthy in this context. One is that it set a basic support level at the cost of production, which this year would be about $5.28 per bushel as opposed to the $4.15 which the government is proposing under the GRIP legislation.

Second, the payment was payable at the elevator. You did not have to mail anything in, it did not depend on some announcement down the road, it was there at the elevator, it was part of the cheque when the farmer delivered his grain.

Third, there was a cap on the program which permitted the program to be premium-free for the first 8,000 bushels. There would be premiums above that, but it had the cap on the program so that the maximum amount of money went to the maximum amount of farmers, and therefore achieved the objective of keeping family farmers on the land.

The process was obviously continued by the Growing Together strategy, which I think resulted from some of the political pressure that had been created by the NDP in debating this particular proposal, as well as other farm groups. A consultation process ensued that had several stages, and certainly I want to give credit to the people who were involved in that. There were a lot of sincere people who put a lot of effort into it, and I think in some measure their voices were in fact heard.

However, in the last round of meetings that occurred in the farm community, and is still occurring, there was also a great deal of uncertainty about these programs. Farmers flocked to them in huge numbers. There must have been thousands of farmers who attended GRIP and NISA meetings in the last several months. They were very curious. Over all, people recognized that there needs to be a program, that this at least offered some potential of a permanent, effective safety net program.

However, they were also very skeptical about some aspects of it. They were trying to take an objective look. Some of the problems that people identified are, I think, worth making note of again. One thing is that there is no relationship to the cost of production in the formula, and that it uses the 15-year rolling average to determine the level of farm support.

As one farmer, Lloyd Johnson from Turtleford, wrote in a communication: "What GRIP does in effect is guarantee 70 per cent of a market price that everyone already knows is too low to maintain the farming community."

That is true. If you look over the last 15 years, we have been steadily losing farmers, and to establish a payment level at 70 per cent of that obviously dooms us for some time to come.

Second, this is not a national program. It depends on individual agreements with specific provinces. Therefore, you get a situation where Saskatchewan residents pay $168 per capita, Quebec $21, and Ontario $30; certainly not a national program.

Third, it discourages forage, crop rotation and reforestation on marginal lands.

Fourth, it creates more uncertainty because the temptation is going to be to sign up for the program and then withdraw because the rolling average will create falling benefits. This will put the plan in trouble. As Roy Romanow, Leader of the NDP in Saskatchewan said: "It might well be the shortest long-term program in history."

NISA helps those most who need it least.

The last aspect I would like to refer to is the third line of defence. We have a serious problem this spring. Certainly in that regard we appreciated the $158 million announcement that we heard earlier today, but there is still uncertainty about the rest of the third line of defence. There is a suggestion that it will be tied closely to GRIP and NISA. That is unfair to farmers because the details of those programs are not fully known. Those farmers need that commitment now. The government promised that it would make known to farmers before spring seeding what this payment would be. It is time to do it now.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to participate in this debate. In Canada we have too few farmers now; we need to commit ourselves as a nation to a strong and vibrant farm community that is based on family farms being there not only in this century but into the next.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to the third reading of Bill C-98, the legislation which provides authority to the federal government to enter into negotiations with the provinces on matters pertaining to the protection of income for farmers.

The legislation does not refer to the present farm financial crisis of trying to support a $22 billion agricultural debt. It merely enables the federal government to enter into agreements with the provinces in matters relating to farm income. Farm people have grave fears about the future of their income stability and although this legislation proposes to establish the now much talked about but confusing GRIP and NISA programs, this legislation contains none of the provisions which will guide the administration of these programs. What GRIP and NISA really are is described only in the agreements to be signed with the provinces and in the regulations yet to be seen.

In other words, with this legislation in front of us, what we are being asked to do is to write a blank cheque for the government to fill in the details later. The crisis on the farm and the future of the prairie family farm, as well as the future of the agriculture industry itself, are much too important at this time to sign that blank cheque.

I have given a lot of thought to this since Bill C-98 was first introduced in the House on March 4, and I must now say that I cannot support it at third reading. For reasons I will explain in a few moments, I cannot support GRIP and NISA in their present forms. Therefore, I cannot in all fairness consent to legislation which allows the federal government to sign agreements which would set these programs in place.

There is a much more immediate financial need that must be addressed, as well as the long-term interests of agricultural sustainability and viability that we must discuss. The government's discussions and consultations which led up to the creation of GRIP and NISA included matters relating to the present crisis and the potential long-term problems in the industry. This government should be bringing legislation dealing with these matters before us instead of Bill C-98. This bill will not save one single family farm from foreclosure in 1991.

• (1750)

Bill C-98 ignores this crisis which is driving families from rural Canada in greater numbers than ever before. This trend must be stopped and reversed. In doing so, ideas presented in GRIP and NISA programs must be significantly changed.

A number of these changes were presented by the opposition in amendments earlier this week, but many of them were rejected by the government whose agricultural agenda is obviously much different than mine and that of the people I represent in Saskatchewan.

Since February 26 when the finance minister tabled his 1991 budget, farmers have been looking at one line in the minister's speech. That one line indicated that $1.3 billion in additional spending had been earmarked for farmers in need.

It is almost five weeks later, and still there is no word on the exact nature of that $1.3 billion. In my speech at second reading and again at report stage in this House, I urged the Minister of Agriculture to talk to the finance minister and get that money released immediately for spring seeding.

The prairie pools, the National Farmers' Union and others say there is a deficiency in agricultural support in excess of $1 billion. That must be made available for the seeding, or seeding is in jeopardy.

Today once again, I say to the minister: Stop playing games. Release the money and do not tie it to the yet unapproved GRIP because there are many producers in my area who will not sign up for GRIP but who are desperate for immediate assistance.

On March 1, when the Minister of Agriculture was in Regina, he said in a speech that the budget's $1.3 billion would be used to help off-set the WGSA deficit, introduce GRIP and provide transitional funding to get into the new safety nets. That word "transitional" is important because that is what we need now.

I hope the minister will rise in his place before this debate is over and announce that transitional funding as part of a spring seeding program. Decisions on the farm are being made now, and the minister knows this.

The minister's Regina speech also talked about new partnerships, dialogue and compromise. I want the minister to know that I agree with dialogue and compromise, but I want to see a little of that from his side of the House.

Farmers and their representatives in this House have identified many problems with GRIP and NISA, and they have suggested many changes. The government would be well advised to show a bit of that spirit of compromise and improve this legislation before us in line with what has been suggested by my colleagues in this House.

There are real problems in the agriculture sector that Bill C-98 does not address, as I have already noted. Is the government aware of many of these problems? Apparently not.

The 1986 farm census conducted by Statistics Canada gave us a very gloomy picture. No doubt the 1991 census will prove even more depressing. That census indicated a dramatic decline in farm population, an increase in the average age of the farm operator and a growing need for farm families to obtain off-farm income to make ends meet.

Some people think government subsidies for farmers are wrong. When we study the issue, we see that nobody subsidizes the farm more than the farmer himself. That 1986 study indicated that 55 per cent of farm family income came from off-farm earnings.

In order to stay on the farm, the farmer had to look off the farm for income. How many other Canadians would keep their jobs if doing so meant that they had to seek other employment just to secure the incomes necessary to pay for their food, shelter and health care needs?

This has meant that there is a growing proportion of farm spouses in the labour force. In 1986, 66 per cent of farm wives were in the labour force and accounted for roughly 25 per cent of the total farm income. We know that that has increased dramatically since then.

This extra income is necessary because during the past seven years expenses have risen sharply, prices have dropped drastically and interest rates on money borrowed to stay in the operation have been sky high.

With a combined farm debt of more than $22 billion, the average interest payment in 1985 was $10,800 per farm. It is worse today. That is interest, not principal and interest, just interest. Farmers have all their other costs to make on top of that, after interest. It is no wonder that the banks and the government's financial institutions are foreclosing. It is because the interest payments have made these farms non-viable.

In 1941, there were 733,000 farms registered in Canada. By 1986 there were fewer than 300,000. In the short five-year period, 1981 to 1986, the number of individual farms declined by a whopping 13 per cent. In contrast the number of corporate farms has increased. Therefore, I am not surprised that the new GRIP and NISA programs will allow pay-outs to be made to non-Canadians because more and more of these corporate farms are owned by people who live outside of Canada.

In 1941, 27 per cent of the total Canadian population lived on farms. By 1986, only 4 per cent were farm residents. By far the largest number of the people living on farms is in my province. In 1986, 17 per cent of Saskatchewan residents lived on farms. They want to stay on the farm, but the policies of this government and the Liberal government before it are driving them away.

Is it any wonder that the majority of Saskatchewan residents voted against these two parties in 1988 when the financial crisis was beginning to hit them hard.

When the Minister of Agriculture was in Regina on March 1, he also said that GRIP and NISA were designed to bring stability, predictability and security to the agriculture sector. Only two of these are correct. GRIP will certainly stabilize the price of grain, but likely at too low a level to make a difference. We can certainly predict what the program will do to farm gate prices over the long term, but there is no security in this.

Security in agriculture, both in farming and in processing, is important. Indeed, it is crucial to the future of the industry. For farm families in rural Canada in general, any and every program put forward by this or any other government must ensure viability and the better future that brings to all rural Canadians.

The minister sees GRIP as one of the first programs in a package flowing from his green paper, Growing Together, issued earlier in this government's term. The paper was based on four pillars: market responsiveness, self-reliance, regional sensitivity and environmental sustainability. For the most part this translates into a plan that eventually removes government support in times of need. If we examine GRIP closely, we see that that is exactly how it has been designed.

Farmers will always be committed to high premiums, but in a few years will likely to guaranteed no more than the market price for their grains and oilseeds. With the 15-year moving average provision, we are being asked to buy into a package that will eventually guarantee only low prices, below production cost prices for our products. This is nonsense.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I would like to hear the hon. member, if you do not mind. It is a great speech. The hon. member, please.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I realize the member for Vegreville and the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster have a lot to talk about after what I have had to say here. I am very pleased to hear that they are listening so intently.

For a farm to be viable, without total government support and without every member of the family working off the farm, we need to secure prices, at a bare minimum, that cover the costs of production. If not, the debt climbs and more people will be pushed off the farms.

At second reading I outlined other government agriculture programs which are tied into the marketplace philosophy of this government, like the interest free cash advance which was taken away just when it was needed most and the termination of the branch line rehabilitation program which has speeded up the rail lines abandonment schedule. Even the Saskatchewan Conservative government knows this is wrong and is complaining that the federal government is merely passing the grain transportation costs of maintaining the rail beds to the provinces which have to maintain the roadbeds.

That raises one other very important matter. Bill C-98 and the GRIP and NISA programs do what this government is attempting to do across the board; decentralize the economy and off load federal costs on to the provinces. Agriculture is an important national industry and should be treated as such. The federal government should not and cannot expect the Saskatchewan taxpayer to shoulder any more of the financial burden. The national taxpayer and those who benefit from a government supported cheap food policy should assume the costs of maintaining the industry.

For the wage earners of Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver, to pay a greater share of the Canadian food costs would only be fair.

Then the province of Saskatchewan would be free to look after its own responsibilities like education and health care. I do not have enough time to get into all the federal programs that have been designed to push people out of agriculture, but I stress that is happening and that is happening on purpose.

The numbers speak for themselves. Anyone who has already lost his farm knows exactly what I am talking about. Just two days ago I attended a meeting in a farming community in my own constituency. I was overwhelmed with the sense of depression that existed among the farmers present. Many knew that GRIP was going to reduce their incomes over the long term, and most wanted changes made to the program which none have yet seen in any detail.

For the most part the farmers were resigned to the fact that GRIP would become a reality. Some were saying they would never sign up for it and expressed a desire for deficiency payments to get them through this period of low prices. Other said: what the heck, they will sign up in the early years and then withdraw when the guaranteed price starts to decline. They need the money now and are quite prepared to do almost anything to get it quickly. If that means signing up for a flawed and inadequate program that will eventually destroy their industry, they are willing to take their chances.

The minister knows the threat that this attitude presents. For farmers to take advantage of the program in the early years and then withdraw simply leaves the program bankrupt and debt ridden, which is not the idea at all.

Then the next government—and there will be another government—has to start from scratch repairing the mess and trying to retire yet another Tory generated debt.

However, the biggest threat in my constituency is the fact that many producers have not belonged to crop insurance or the Western Grain Stabilization Program. They have not paid insurance premiums in the past. The premiums are not part of their cash flow at present.

Now GRIP comes along and requires a hefty premium to be paid. That premium of $8,000, $12,000 or $20,000, depending on the size of the farm, is a brand new up-front expense on many of these farms. It is an expense that cannot be met. It is an expense that may mean many will not be able to participate in GRIP, even if they want to participate, because the government has been saying that transition funding, spring feeding funding, or any ad hoc funding will be tied to participation in GRIP.

These producers are doomed to an even more marginal existence and a more rapid removal from the land. For the average producer on the prairies, one who is in debt, one who requires off-farm income to make ends meet, one who is confused and concerned about his future, GRIP and NISA are no answer to the immediate and devastating problems facing them.

As I have said, after reviewing Bill C-98, after reviewing testimony before the Standing Committee on Agriculture, and after discussing this with significant numbers of producers in my constituency, I cannot in good conscience support the passage of Bill C-98 and give the federal government my consent to pursue federal-provincial agreements which would set these agricultural programs in place. Rather, I would urge the Minister of Agriculture to pursue another course. I am glad he is in the House today to be able to hear what this other course is.

That other course would include an immediate spring seeding payment, the lowering of interest rates on farm debt, the development of long-term, long-range agriculture support programs which include sound transportation programs and, most of all, a commitment toward an income policy that guarantees a fair price for agricultural products: grains, oilseeds, specialty crops, as well as dairy and meat products. As I have said before, a fair price in my eyes must cover at the very bare minimum the farmer's cost of production.

I continue to believe, as I said at second reading, that the GRIP and NISA programs indicate that even this government knows there is a need for a long-term income stabilization in the farm sector in Canada. However, GRIP and NISA are only a recognition of this point. They are by no means an end. Much has yet to be done.

• (1805)

There is no reason why this government cannot reintroduce its program of deficiency payments to meet year by year needs, until an adequate and fair income stabilization program can be developed. It is the very least we can ask. The industry and the future of hundreds of farm families depend upon it.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I think I am rising to close the debate on third reading of this bill.

Today we are faced with massive farm income problems across Canada, brought on in part by the farm bill introduced in the United States several years ago. It has had the effect of creating a world price for wheat and other major grains which is consistent with the loan rates established by the U.S. government.

Its farmers are well protected because they get the loan rate, which currently stands somewhere in the neighbourhood of $2.30 or $2.40 Canadian for wheat. They are also guaranteed the target price by way of deficiency payments at the end of each crop year. U.S. farmers are getting a return that covers the cost of production of a big chunk of their farm community, whereas our farmers are being asked to work under a loan rate which is almost half that price.

In order to compete in world markets we have had in Canada some recognition of the ups and downs of the market. We have had in place the Western Grain Stabilization Act. It has had a long career of almost 15 years since 1976. Today the minister announced what I presume will be the final payment out of that act of $158 million. This $158 million will be appreciated by western farmers, because it will go a little way toward paying the premiums under this new GRIP program. It will pay a fraction of those premiums.

The act itself is permissive. The meat of what is being proposed here appears in federal-provincial agreements to which my friend from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake referred in his speech. Those agreements are not as good as what people had hoped for, but I believe this act has some potential.

In historical and political terms I would place it somewhere in the neighbourhood of the 1935 act to establish the Canadian Wheat Board. It was put in place by the dying R. B. Bennett administration that finally cottoned on to the plummeting that he was taking in the countryside and finally understood that he was not terribly popular in the country. I guess he saw how many Bennett buggies there were out there and decided he was not a popular man. On his almost political death-bed he brought in the Canadian Wheat Board Act because farmers had been attempting to get a wheat board for some 15 years before then. One of his last acts of desperation to try to get support back was to pass the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

I think agricultural historians 20 or 30 years from now will place this act in the same position. Farmers put a great deal of pressure on this government to get part of what we have before us here. As part of the green paper response and various task forces that were set up, one was to look at income stability. While they were not to bring in any report, they persisted and in fact produced recommendations which were acted upon in part with this legislation.

The farmers in that group wanted some form of price insurance or price guarantee to make them competitive with the United States. They were trying to get something like the target prices of American farmers so that they would know if they had 1,000 bushels of wheat to sell they would get about $4 a bushel for it. They could then design their farms so that they could get the maximum production out of them once they knew what the price was. That is what they wanted. What they seem to be getting in the agreements that are being signed between the provinces and the federal government is some form of revenue insurance.

Revenue insurance is not the same. It is simply a guaranteed price under an index moving average price carrying over 15 years times the actual average yield for the area. It is much less costly to the fund and less risk to the program. We have to work on as to how these agreements will work is a bit of hearsay evidence, because the agreements themselves were not available to be put before the committee. The agreements could not be discussed because the government said that it did not have legislation. Because it did not have the legislation passed, it could not sign the agreements and, until the agreements were signed, the provinces could not be asked to make them public.

We have the information that is round and about in Saskatchewan, distributed by the provincial government there. While those pieces of information are still being formed, we think we have some concept of how the proposal will work under the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan.

In order to show the House how it works and to show how it is not the final solution, so to speak, let us suppose Saskatchewan has one farm that grows nothing but wheat and barley. We will use the actual acres in production for that farm of Saskatchewan for 1990. We will apply the GRIP program to that year and just see what results.

We will note that there were 16 million acres seeded to wheat in Saskatchewan last year. It was a fairly good year. The average yield was 32 bushels to the acre. The average price at the elevator was about $3 a bushel. Therefore they took off $1.536 billion worth of production. In the barley production, they seeded 3.65 million acres. The average production was about 50 bushels to the acre, for 182.5 million bushels at a price around $1.40 a bushel, yielding 255.5 million bushels.

Had they been under GRIP, would the income have been a great deal more than the $1.780 billion? That is the question. If there had been an average crop, there would have been only 400 million bushels produced. It would have, therefore, qualified for the GRIP price at the maximum yield at $4 a bushel or $1.6 billion. Instead of $1.536 billion with the good crop that we produced, had we produced an average crop and had GRIP we would have got slightly more money. We would have got about $60 million more in money out the GRIP payment had it been in effect this year, because that was what our coverage level was.

Having produced a 50 bushel to the acre barley crop would we have got a GRIP payment this year? Because the price is only $1.40 per bushel and GRIP coverage should have been around $2.30 a bushel, would we have got a payment? The answer is yes, we would have got about $55 million of payment. In total receipts from the fund, had we produced an average crop this year instead of the crop we did, this year's crop would have produced $120 million from the income account. What would it have cost us to get that? Our premiums into the account would have been in the neighbourhood of $220 million. With the crop we produced this year, if we had had the GRIP program, we would have contributed about $220 million on wheat and barley in the form of premiums and that would have given us the right to pull out about $120 million of GRIP payments.

The point of the story is that if we produce an average crop, we are more likely to get a better return. We will spend less money putting fertilizer and chemicals into the crop. The new market realities for farmers after this particular series of agreements come into effect is that farmers will be encouraged to reduce the amount of production they have.

This is reminiscent for some of the older crowd, including myself, of the LIFT program that Otto Lang introduced back in the 1970–71 crop years. It was LIFT, as you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that was supposed to stand for lower inventory for tomorrow and farmers very quickly said that what it really meant was lower incomes for tomorrow.

When we take the data that was presented from the Department of Agriculture in the committee, when it was presenting its expert opinions, we found that net farm incomes from grains and oilseeds across Canada has run about $3.5 billion to $4 billion the last several years and is expected to go almost to zero for the crop year 1990–91, the year that we are in. By using the example that I have just presented, for Saskatchewan at least, there would have been virtually no advantage to having had GRIP in this year that has just past. Even with GRIP Saskatchewan grain growers are going to have to get used to not having any money for the crop year 1990–91.

The department's estimates for net farm income in future years, 1992 and 1993, are quite optimistic relative to this year. The department estimates we could have $1.5 billion to $2 billion of net income, thanks to substantial GRIP and NISA payments expected in 1992 and 1993. That could all be thrown into a cocked hat if farmers have a good crop this coming year.

The worse thing that could happen to our region with the kind of agreements that are being signed is that we have another crop similar to the one we have just had because we will have contributed more to GRIP than we will get out and we still will not have any money, just as we do not have any money this year.

This is not a perfect program. As I say, the legislation is permissive. It is the agreements that are being signed between the provinces and the federal government that we have to be critical of.

Farmers have been very much aware of the similarity to these agreements and the LIFT program. They did not like LIFT. They felt forced into signing into LIFT because the government of the day told them that if they did not sign up for LIFT, they would not be able to deliver any grain because they would not have any quota. The only way they could get quota for the grain that they had built up in their storage bins was to sign up for the program and then they would get the right to be able to deliver it. They signed but under protest.

When I listen to my farm constituents and people across the west, and some of the mumblings I am hearing out of Ontario as well, they are not liking it but they do not see that they have any choice. I hear people trying to make arrangements. A number of very good operators have told me that their fertilizer has been cancelled. I spoke to a representative of one of the large supply companies in western Canada this morning who said that they have had a number of customers come to them and say: "We will pay you the margin on the fertilizer, but we do not want to take it". In other words: "We will guarantee that you have a profit for having handled it, but please keep it in your own storage. We do not want it. GRIP makes it a liability for us to have it. It just increases our costs and will decrease the amount of money that we will get in return at the end of the year".

It does make some dramatic changes. It will reduce the amount of grain that is in store and will be shipped. It will reduce the amount of money that goes through the western economy by way of fertilizers, herbicides and all the things that go into creating a crop.

• (1820)

Farmers do not like this kind of pressure and these kinds of choices. They have also been told quite clearly that if they are not signed into GRIP or NISA or both, if there is a third line of defence payment, which is the new buzz-word for the hoped for deficiency payment for the 1990-91 income shortfall, hey will not be considered for that payment.

They are very much in a quandary. They are feeling weak because they have had a series of bad years. While they produced quite a bit of grain last year, there is no particular relief in the bank account or in the accounts due, so they are going to join.

Some civil servants sat in on the committee hearings who came up to me afterward and said: "How does this pressure work? Why would farmers sign when they are put under these kinds of strains? Why do they not just stand up for themselves and say no?"

I said: "Put yourself in their shoes. Maybe the best way for you to understand this would be to consider that you and all civil servants in Ottawa were fired last week. The government left you without jobs, and five months later it came to you and said: You can have your job back and we will pay each one of you $7,000 a year". They said: "But this is voluntary. You do not have to do it". I said: "I bet over 90 per cent of you would sign up, because there is no other option for farmers". That is the kind of situation that the federal and provincial governments are taking advantage of with these agreements.

We are not going to see the kind of results the government spelled out when it introduced this legislation and this program. You do not have to be a rocket scientist to understand that this is not a market responsive program. You do not have to be a genius to know that it will disrupt the rotation of crops, because forage crops did not get included in this program.

There will be some predisposition among some farmers to break up some of those acres that are in forage crops. There will be some tendency to shift acreage from the rather small acreages at the moment in specialty crops to take advantages of the fairly high price guarantees for those crops.

There will be a tendency for people to retire early, dispose of their farm, divide it up among family members. All of this will happen and we will have the kind of stories we hear around the coffee shops, where one guy at a meeting I was at said: "Look, I pull chaff wagons behind my combines. I am smart enough to be able to measure when I should be putting $4 wheat in the combine hopper and $2.50 wheat out the back end". Those are the very crass and crude definitions that are going to be applied in order to maintain themselves.

This is the end of seven or eight very hard years for prairie farmers and grain farmers right across the country. Farmers will do what they have to do in order to survive. We will permit that to happen with the passage of this legislation, with the hope that like the Wheat Board legislation in 1935, future governments and future opportunities will arise so that the next series of agreements will provide truly the kind of program the farmers set out to establish when they made their initial report leading up to this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I thought the hon. member for Mackenzie was gong to be the last speaker, but I notice that the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre has about a 10 minute speech.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks with respect to this bill.

• (1825)

The details and the ins and outs of this bill have been discussed many times over, but I think it is appropriate to make a few general comments with respect to this legislation and with respect to the future of rural Canada, family farms, and particularly western Canada.

There has been a need for a permanent farm program for some time, a program that has been promised since 1985. Bill C-98 does allow that program. However, being enabling legislation, we are not sure of the full details of the program and we do not know exactly what is coming out. We are somewhat in the dark. Farmers in my riding and farmers in western Canada are concerned about the future of rural Canada and about the future of family farms. While the government is asking farmers to trust it with Bill C-98, the farmers are saying: "We have trusted you in the past and look what you have done to us."

The erosion of the Canadian Wheat Board has been particularly hard on western Canadian farmers. The removal of oats from the Canadian Wheat Board was done without proper consultation, as was the removal of the two-price wheat system. The free trade agreement, which is going to affect the movement of grain into this country from the United States, is going to take one more slice away from the Canadian Wheat Board.

Western Canadian farmers have lost the fuel price rebate. They have had their cash advance taken away and replaced with a loan that is an interest-bearing loan. Before, they had a $50,000 interest-free cash advance; now it is an interest-bearing one, albeit a quarter of a million dollars. With an advance of a quarter of a million dollars, I don't know how many farmers in Saskatchewan would even qualify for it, let alone be willing to take it.

They are concerned about the transportation issue, the future of the Crow benefit, and the rumours that we have been hearing here and throughout the country that there are going to be some dramatic changes made to the transportation of grain in this country. There is concern over the future of the family farm. They are concerned, with some real justification, that the direction that this government has been taking over the last seven years does not bode well for a viable farming family future.

The government says that, unlike in the past, there has been some consultation, and that is true. It certainly has been much better than in the past.

With respect to the removal of oats, the government said that it had done valid consultation. It said that it had consulted with numerous farm groups right across the country. In fact, when questioned in the House, it quoted hog producing groups, groups such as the Alberta Sheep Growers Association, which has nothing to do with the growing of oats. In fact there was no consultation with the Advisory Committee of the Canadian Wheat Board and there was no proper consultation with oat producers. A Decima poll that had been put out, which the government is fully aware of, made it very clear that farmers at least wanted the opportunity to be able to have the option to decide whether or not oats would be under the Canadian Wheat Board, just as farmers would like to have the option with other grains as to whether or not they would be under the Canadian Wheat Board. There certainly was not consultation there.

With respect to Bill C-98 there has been some consultation, and there has been consultation with most of the major producer and farm groups in this country. The final results, however, are somewhat unclear because we have not seen the final programs. As some of the groups before the committee said, they simply have to trust that the government will come up with a valid and beneficial bill for them.

The concern that some groups have expressed—and certainly one of the concerns that I have and one of the reasons that I am unable to support the bill at this stage—is the process of review. If we are going to have a new direction for the future of agriculture in this country, there is a need for an ongoing review. What we should have is an all-party committee made up of members of the House of Commons, done as other committees are done with the same representation as is in Parliament so that the majority would be, in this case, the Tories, followed by the Liberals and then the New Democrats. But it should be an ongoing committee that can review this legislation, that can provide suggestions and alternatives to the government. As the Minister of Agriculture said, this is only the first piece of legislation with respect to agriculture. He is anticipating, and we are therefore anticipating, more bills to be coming forth. If that happens, we are changing the whole face of agriculture.

It is important that there is a proper review process and an ongoing review process and it is done in an open fashion, an all-party fashion. That is what I think is appropriate for this piece of legislation and for the other farm bills that will presumably be coming down.

The fact that the government is not concerned about the future of family farms is evident in that this bill is not going to protect family farms in the long term. We have in Saskatchewan I think 23 per cent of the farmers in Saskatchewan who are insolvent.

Unless we have this commitment to the family farm, unless we have this commitment to rural Canada, the erosion is simply going to continue.

I want to make some concluding remarks. Once we lose the infrastructure that is now disappearing, it is not going to return. Once the farmers are gone from the land, the family farms are not going to return. Once the small business shops are closed up, they are not coming back. Once the infrastructure is gone, it is gone forever.

We have a chance to maintain a viable, healthy, rural infrastructure in the west based on agriculture, in other parts of the country based on fishing or forestry, or whatever the situation may be. We have the opportunity now. We have to be keeping that in mind. We have to, if we are going to maintain a viable infrastructure, have that as a basis for all such legislation, and certainly this is one piece of legislation that should have that in mind. I think in the long run that is not going to be borne out. In fact, we are moving to larger and larger farms and fewer and fewer people in rural Canada. That is a travesty. It is very sad. It is a situation tht I grieve for every time I go to rural Saskatchewan, every time I go to my riding and I go into communities that are dying, where farmers are hanging on by their fingernails. This government has done really very little to save those people.

In closing, I would say that this bill is going through, we are going to have a permanent program, but the concern for rural Canada and the concern for the future of farming families is still there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, before we go I think it would be very appropriate if all of us wish you, in both Polish and Ukrainian, Restos Uskras—which means "Christ has Risen", or if you prefer, "Happy Easter", or if you prefer "Joyeuxes Pàques", or if you prefer Kronia Pola in Greek, or Buena Pasqua in Italian. And, as you know, this Saturday it is going to be another event, not for the Christian but for the Hebrew faith. As you know, it will be Passover this Saturday. So I think it is also good to wish to our colleagues "Happy Passover".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I thank the hon. dean of the House for those kind words and I wish each and every one of you a very, very happy Easter.

It being 6.35 p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 28(2) the House stands adjourned until Monday, April 8, 1991 at 2 p.m. pursuant to order made earlier this day.

The House adjourned at 6.35 p.m.

THE BUDGET

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, this morning the Liberal Party launched its campaign to bring to the attention of the public the need to defend Canadian workers against the latest attacks by the Tory government.

In its budget, the government, by example, told every employer to forget about bargaining rights and to threaten workers with job cuts and increase contracting out in order to block wage increases.

From 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. today on Parliament Hill, we are giving provincial and federal Public Service workers, pensioners and members of the employment equity target groups, teachers and the academic community a chance to voice their opposition to such blackmail.

When the government is threatening bad faith bargaining, back-to-work legislation and interference in the conciliation-arbitration process, the rights of Canadian workers and service to the public are in jeopardy.

Other such forums will take place on April 22 in Thunder Bay and Kingston. We encourage all Canadian workers to participate and to help us to tell the government that enough is enough.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE LIEUTENANT-COLONEL MAURICE HALLÉ

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Brome—Missisquoi, Gabrielle Bertrand, who is not here today, has asked me to inform the House of the passing on April 5 last of the former member for that riding, Lieutenant-Colonel Maurice Hallé. Mr. Hallé served in this House from 1940 to 1947.

To Mrs. Hallé and her family we offer our deepest sympathies during this trying time.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member.

HOUSING

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the Allaire report and the C.D. Howe Institute have both recommended that housing become exclusively a provincial responsibility.

Before rushing to a decision, let us remember that federal government housing programs are available everywhere in Canada. Let us remember, as well, that only federal government mortgage insurance is available everywhere in Canada, and that mortgage insurance has helped to build one-third of the homes in our country. Let us also remember that the federal government programs have made possible 640,000 homes for low-income Canadians, homes which form an essential part of our national social safety net.

If housing does become exclusively a provincial responsibility, will mortgage insurance be available everywhere in Canada? Will we have a housing social safety net? Will our taxes go down? What do you think, Mr. Speaker?

REFORM PARTY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, over the past weekend the Reform Party held its convention in Saskatoon. It was clearly a well stage-managed production. I am a little concerned, that with all the lights and the hoopla, what actually transpired over the weekend may have been lost: the Reform Party has already sold out.

It is a shock for me to see that the party that was so quick to join with the NDP in the fight against the GST actually back-pedalled on the issue this past weekend. They now support the hated GST. It was truly disappointing. They are beginning to look more and more like the Tories already. Like Tories, they support user fees for medicare. Like Tories, they want to tear down the Wheat Board and orderly marketing for farmers. Like Tories, they want the free trade deal to go even further. And like Tories, their well-heeled backers call the shots.

Mr. Speaker, the well-financed, well-polished image the Reform Party projected over the weekend was no mistake. The Reform Party is nothing more than Tories in a hurry.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Yesterday I joined many of our colleagues and thousands of Canadians to witness three Canadian warships return to their home port after nearly eight months' absence.

On Sunday, April 7, Her Majesty's Canadian Ships Athabaskan, Terra Nova and Protecteur sailed proudly into the dockyard in Halifax, returning with the same professionalism and dignity they displayed during their impressive and reputable contribution to the Persian Gulf war. These ships stopped 1,800 merchant vessels and boarded 22 in their enforcement of the United Nations economic sanctions against Iraq.

This House and all Canadians can look back with pride at this example which shows the ingenuity, dedication and commitment displayed by all those officers, men and women in the Canadian forces and with the Department of National Defence who knew their duty and did it well.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on March 20, the House of Commons Board of Internal Economy decided to cut $5.6 million in the 1991-92 Budget for the Parliament of Canada.

The cuts affect the committees' operating expenses as well as the printing of parliamentary publications and the discretionary expenditures of parliamentary associations and delegations. Moreover, it was decided to use only one telecommunications satellite instead of two for the parliamentary television network.

Mr. Speaker, I applaud these cuts, but we could do more by cutting down on our discretionary and other expenses of the Parliament of Canada and the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, later this week, on April 11, I will disclose to the people of my riding the total cost of my discretionary expenses and of running my Parliamentary offices. Can the members of the Bloc Québécois do the same, yes or no?

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the latest unemployment figures were released at the end of last week and revealed that unemployment stood at a shameful 22.2 per cent in Cape Breton, which was double the national average.

These figures do not include those whose unemployment insurance benefits have run out, those who have simply given up and those who have lost all hope of ever finding a job.

It is another bleak spring for Cape Breton, with no hope for a better or brighter summer. That is bad news for young people who are seeking summer employment in order to pay for their education. Tuition fees are rising, prices are rising, taxes are rising, but opportunities are declining.

Once again this Prime Minister and this government have failed. They have failed to respond to the severe economic problems Cape Breton and the country continue to face.

I call upon the Government of Canada and the Department of Employment and Immigration as well as ACOA to introduce emergency funding for job creation programs to assist Canadian families in those regions in this their hour of economic need.

LEADER OF THE BLOC QUÉBÉCOIS

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois has just given us another example of his lack of financial responsibility.

The new spokesman for Jacques Parizeau in this House is now ready to choose the American dollar as the currency for his future independent Quebec. This is another evidence, Mr. Speaker, of the leader of the Bloc Quebecois' unrealistic approach in spite of his heated rhetoric.

One day, the Bloc Quebecois requests a common currency with Canada, the next, they want a separate currency, only to change their mind again the day after and talk about aligning the Quebec currency with the American dollar. With this death wish theory, they even consider abandoning at some point the American dollar and creating a new Quebec currency.

So much for consistency! How politically irresponsible! The people of Quebec will not entrust their future to such adventurers who seem only motivated by anger and passion.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, all across this country farmers want to prepare for spring planting. This should be a time of anticipation and hope. But this year it is marked by fear and anxiety; fear because farmers are uncertain of their future; anxiety because many are unsure of how they will finance their operations this year.

• (1410)

The past few years have been unkind to agriculture. Low commodity prices, natural disasters, floods and droughts have decreased earnings and depleted savings. Man-made disasters, such as the government's free trade deal, high interest rates and a high dollar have caused irreparable damage to Canadian agriculture. As farmers attempt to plant the 1991 crops, this government sits idly by without giving immediate assistance.

In the past year, over 2,000 jobs have been lost and at least 12 plant closures or slowdowns have occurred. In Essex-Kent, two processors are gone and others are in danger of closing. Thousands of acres of fruits and vegetables are in jeopardy. Farmers' livelihoods are being lost.

I call upon this government to act now to save farming and the agrifood industry.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, Asian gangs are becoming a serious problem in Canada. In Vancouver, Calgary, Toronto and Montreal we read of murders, gambling, extortion, drug trafficking, prostitution, immigrant smuggling and other serious and violent crimes, all connected to ruthless Asian gangs.

It is even more disturbing to read the reports that these gangs are actively recruiting more and more members, many of them school-aged youngsters.

I want to commend the police in these cities who are dealing with the gangs as best they can with the resources available. I also want to say that I appreciate their frustration with a system that is not screening out criminals and bogus refugees; a system that makes it difficult to deport immigrant gang members that are convicted of crimes in Canada.

I call on the government today to take a closer look at what we can do to strengthen our immigration laws and to prevent these violent and dangerous criminals from entering and staying in our country, and quickly deporting those convicted of serious criminal offences.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the Mulroney government is again reneging on its commitment to international development; its promise to the poorest of the poor.

Without any consultation, the government forced CIDA to cut millions of dollars of support from Canada's development NGOs. NGOs, including CUSO, Canada World Youth, Canadian Crossroads International, and others, are losing funds to a shadowy ODA reserve fund, yet another government slush fund.

Two important points have to be made. First, by cutting funds to Canada World Youth and Crossroads, the government is cutting programs which foster international understanding through cross-cultural exchange.

Second, these funding cuts undermine all development NGOs' ability to operate in a business-like manner. Our NGOs are very prudent in their planning and management. Now, by breaking its funding contract with the NGOs, the government puts at risk the very future of these highly regarded development NGOs.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the last few weeks have seen the return of many of our military personnel from the Persian Gulf—members of the first Canadian hospital from CFB Petawawa have return; RCRs from London; three ships with full crews, and many other military personnel.

Those of us who had the privilege to welcome many of our dedicated and professional service personnel home were very impressed by their comments. As a couple of young women said: "When you are facing a crisis, there are only a few things in your life that really matter. It helps you to put important things first and the rest becomes rather immaterial". Many said: "It takes an experience like this to emphasize that we do, in fact, live in the greatest country in the world and we should develop a greater appreciation for that fact".

It is up to the rest of us as civilians to keep this country united and strong. Only in this way can we honour them and pay them the rich tribute they deserve for being excellent Canadian ambassadors and service personnel.

So let us get with it Canada, and do our part by building a great Canadian nation so that Canada can continue to play an important role both here at home and in international affairs.

REFUGEES

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, today some three million Kurdish civilians, mostly women and children, are scattered in the valleys and mountains of Kurdistan without food, shelter or adequate clothing. Under harsh winter conditions where snow covers many mountains, they are fleeing Iraqi troops, desperate to reach Turkish and Iranian borders. The roads are jammed, children are dying and Iraqi forces have fired into this stream of helpless humanity.

These victims believe that they were betrayed by the American President and the world. For the Kurds the new world order looks very much like the old. In 1988 the world turned a blind eye when Kurds were gassed in Halabja in March 1988. Indeed, as historian Arshak Safrastian said: "In the world there is probably no ethnic group that has been more persistently abused and misrepresented than the Kurdish race".

In view of this desperate situation, I call upon our government to vastly increase the level of humanitarian aid and to ensure that Kurds are treated with the same generosity as refugees in coming to Canada, as Canada has historically treated other refugees. Plainly, Canada must support the 25 million Kurdish people in their struggle for democracy, for justice, for peace and self-determination.

We stand in solidarity with the Kurdish people, with their brothers and sisters here in Canada, who have been denied justice for far too long.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, on March 21 the Supreme Court of Canada decided that the foetus is not a human being within the confines of the Criminal Code. In the absence of any other law in the Code, the court had no choice but to come to that decision.

However, that same court had invited Parliament in January 1988 to decide "the precise point in the development of the foetus at which the state's interest in its protection becomes compelling".

Parliament did just that in Bill C–43. Although Bill C–43 offered very little protection for the unborn, its underlying principle was that the state was protecting the foetus from conception to birth.

Given the Senate's rejection of Bill C–43 and the most recent decision of the court, I call upon all who want to protect life to accept their responsibility and work together to produce a realistic, incrementally sound strategy towards the goal of full legal protection to all human life from conception.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, first I would like permission to say thank you, to the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister, the Leader of the NDP and members of Parliament from all sides who wrote me notes or telephoned wishing me well. It is proof once more, that despite differences, we are all members of the same club, in a way, to fight for a great country. So I would like to say thank you everyone.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, for more than a year, the Canadian economy has been in a recession. All economists now agree that this recession will extend until at least the fall. Statistics Canada said on the weekend that in Montreal, 223,000 unemployed people are now looking for work. At 14.1 per cent, there is more unemployment in Montreal than in cities with traditionally high jobless rates like St. John's, Newfoundland; Saint John, New Brunswick; Halifax and Moncton.

I therefore ask the Acting Prime Minister: Has the time not come to stop talking about inflation, about the high Canadian dollar, and get busy creating jobs for Canadians who want to work now, especially in Montreal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, most Canadians want interest rates to go down even more. For this, we must reduce the inflation rate. Inflation has come down very well, resulting in interest rates that are 4 per cent lower than last spring.

I think that the reduction in the inflation rate can continue. I think that is the best way to improve the economy and that is the most important objective in our Budget for reducing interest rates. Every part of our Budget is meant to help bring down interest rates. We have been successful at it since spring and I think it is possible to be even more successful in the future.

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not think this answer will put any Canadians to work or put a pay cheque in the pocket of any of the unemployed in Canada. There are 220,000 people in Montreal who would like to work; 200,000 people in Toronto who would like to work; 80,000 people in Vancouver, your home town, who are unemployed today. The big cities of Canada are becoming economic graveyards.

The people of Canada would like to know when this government will stop talking about inflation. It has been talking like that for the last six years. We have 1.4 million Canadians who want to work today to gain back their dignity. When will the Minister of Finance do something about that?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition says that reducing interest rates is not going to—he is shaking his head. He says that the reduction in interest rates is not going to create jobs.

I have been involved in consultations with people right across this country. The one thing that each one of the groups said to me was: "Get interest rates down." That is what we have been doing over the course of the last eight months. A 4 percentage point drop in interest rates is one of the largest drops in any industrialized country in the world during that period. The result is going to be a renewal of the economy in this country.

We have seen, during the course of the past few months, where there has been, because of the drop in interest rates, a substantial increase in activity in—

Some hon. members: Where?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The people opposite wonder where. If they would read the newspapers they would see that there is a substantial increase in the amount of activity in the housing market. That is going to lead directly to housing starts. The increase in housing starts is going to lead to increased business for the forest products industry and for all the industries that supply the new housing markets. That is how we are going to create jobs in this country.

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we will solve these problems when we have a different government and a different Minister of Finance.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: I have another question for the government about its economic policy, this time about its foreign economic policy. I would like to ask the Minister for International Trade this question.

The President of Mexico, in a discussion we had with him this morning, made it absolutely clear that energy will not be on the table at the trade negotiations with the United States and with Canada.

If Mexico can say that energy is not on the table, why can Canada not do the same thing, and make sure that Canada will be like Mexico, which controls its self-sufficiency and the security of supply in energy?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, quite obviously, Canada and Mexico have different interests with respect to energy. It was in the national interest of Canada to try to get a more secure market for our surplus of natural gas in the United States. Mexico is not in the same position. Their Constitution states the government must own the oil resource. So we recognize that this is the case.

I am glad to see the hon. the Leader of the Opposition back. He looks in good shape. He is sitting in a very dangerous position, but he is looking in good shape.

Mr. Simmons: He will not be there long.

Mr. Crosbie: That is true.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Much of this conversation could take place after Question Period. Perhaps the minister could answer the question.

Mr. Crosbie: I hope that the voice of Clyde Wells is not being heard in the House, Mr. Speaker.

The President of Mexico said today in an address at lunch time that doubts that spring from reason with respect to future economic activities are certainly understandable, but that doubts that arise from fear are not. I would suggest to the hon. Leader of the Opposition that he heed that advice. If he has any doubts, I hope they will spring from reason and not simply from fears that somehow are conjured up by the Liberal caucus.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pursue the questions to the Minister of International Trade about free trade within North America. The minister is on record as saying that the United States–Canada free trade agreement could be reopened in the upcoming trilateral negotiations. And yet today, here in the House of Commons, the Prime Minister said that the free trade agreement will not be reopened.

When will the government make its position clear and how does the government believe that a trilateral agreement can be concluded without reopening the bilateral agreement?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, in the event there was actually some difference between what I said and what the Prime Minister said, I would be inclined to follow whatever the Prime Minister had said.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: I would still have my own opinion, but it might not be the opinion of the government. However, I do not think there is any difference between anything the Prime Minister has said and that I have said.

The United States has agreed and we have agreed; we are not negotiating to open up the U.S.–Canada free trade agreement. But if we get some improvements, if we get something better while we are negotiating the tripartite agreement then there might consequentially have to be some changes to the U.S.–Canada free trade agreement. But we are not opening up the negotiations. So I do not think I have said anything different from the Prime Minister, but if I have, I am sorry.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): The minister's apology to the House is stimulating but hardly illuminating.

The Leader of the Opposition has drawn our attention to the contradiction between Canada's position with regard to energy in the bilateral free trade agreement, and Mexico's position with regard to energy in a trilateral agreement.

Let me address a further question to the minister. There is a contradiction, surely, in the fact that the United States government has rejected a recent decision of a binational panel in Canada's favour. That casts serious doubts on the effectiveness of the trade disputes mechanism in the agreement.

Will the government take the opportunity of the upcoming Canada–Mexico–U.S. negotiations to remedy such flaws in the bilateral agreement?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): I do not believe the matter to which the member alludes is a flaw in an agreement. In our opinion, the United States has launched an extraordinary challenge with respect to the matter of a pork countervail in violation of the spirit and the intent of the free trade agreement. We are not responsible for the actions of the United States. We hope that the judges who were appointed in this extraordinary challenge will deal with that in a very convincing manner.

• (1430)

It does not matter what provisions you have in an agreement. Two sides have to administer it and it may be interpreted and administered differently in different places.

It does not matter what provision we have in the U.S.–Canada–Mexico agreement, there will doubtless be differences about interpretation and different approaches in the two areas.

I am not gainsaying the fact that we believe that in this particular case the United States has acted in a way that is contrary to the intendment and meaning of the agreement, but we realize we are in a very sensitive position right now with respect to obtaining authority from Congress for a fast-track approach to other negotiations.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. We have had the Canada–U.S. trade deal now for a little over two years. What we do know is that Canadians have lost over 260,000 jobs in this country.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. McLaughlin: We do know, and Canadians increasingly know, that the Canada–U.S. trade deal has been a bad deal for Canadians—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: —and that now this government is determined to make a bad deal worse by entering into the tri-level negotiations with Mexico.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. We believe that there should be fair trade. We believe that there should be expanded international trade. When will this government come in with a policy for fair international trade that will serve the interests of Canadian workers, and also international workers?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party says that there should be expanded trade, but she is against every effort to expand trade. She is against the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement which will expand trade. She is against the U.S.–Canada–Mexico negotiations which might, or may, or can possibly expand trade. She is very equivocal about the Uruguay Round, and she cites the loss of 250,000 jobs, which is against all the evidence.

I will just refer to one study. Peat Marwick shows Canadian firms investing $30 at home for every dollar spent on foreign mergers and acquisitions last year as compared to the situation before the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement. In other words we have given confidence to our own people to invest in Canada. I can quote the boss of Proctor and Gamble who says: "We have become substantially more efficient in the last two years and clearly we now have more jobs in our Canadian plants than we would have had without the agreement". That is Proctor and Gamble.

I could go on indefinitely, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister for International Trade. The Minister for International Trade can go on and cite how good the trade deal has been for multinational corporations, but maybe he should talk to Canadians who have lost their jobs in plants that will not open again.

I want to say to the Minister for International Trade that there are many elements to the trade deal that I think will make the global economy more fair and serve better the people of all countries. Last December I asked the Minister for International Trade if he would consider in a trade deal looking at working conditions for workers, health and safety standards and environment, and the minister said it was a silly idea.

I say to the minister again, if he is truly interested in international agreements that serve the workers and all citizens, will he insist that in every international trade agreement working conditions for workers, health and safety standards, and environmental conditions are part of those trade deals?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. lady might I say that exports, for example, in agricultural products to the United States from Canada went up 20 per cent in 1990 as compared to 1989.

Farmers are not the corporate spooks that the hon. lady refers to. In 1989 agricultural product exports to the U.S. went up 13 per cent compared to 1988.

I hold in my hand here, from Mexico, a document which the hon. lady can have: "Mexico Towards a Better Environment", which is printed on recycled paper containing up to 40 per cent straw cellulose which shows what the Mexicans are doing with respect to trying to combat environmental and pollution problems.

The environment is the concern of us all. The more prosperous Mexico becomes, the greater its ability to combat pollution, the more assets it will have in order to increase salaries and improve the working conditions for people in Mexico.

Why is the hon. lady against giving Mexicans a chance to improve?

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, this party stands for making working conditions for all workers, domestically and internationally, safe and environmentally sound.

The Minister for International Trade talks about making the lives of people better.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the government says that a North American trade agreement would help Mexico's poor. This statement is hard to believe, because the gap between rich and poor in the United States and Canada is wider than it was before Canada–U.S. free trade.

My question for the minister is this: Where is the evidence that the situation would be different for the poor, for the working people of Mexico and Canada with an agreement between the three countries?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the proof is that in the world since 1945 and the adoption of liberalized trade policies by most countries of the world, including the United States, trade has expanded exponentially.

As a result of that, we have all become tremendously more prosperous, including Canada. Thirty per cent of our GNP comes from trade. Mexico is also becoming a trading country. It has reduced and changed its whole mercantilist regime.

Until four years ago, Mexico followed the same kind of blind, hopeless polices that the hon. lady advocates. It has changed them. It is now full of dynamism and hope. It is joining the world community. It knows it can only gain wealth and strength by being competitive with the world.

Mexico is turning its back on the old socialist, mercantilist policies. That is what we have done, and we are not going back in the direction that the hon. lady wants us to go back to.

REFUGEES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I think the minister, we on this side and all Canadians are shocked and horrified by the tragedy of the Kurds five years after the international community stood by and watched them being gassed by the same group of the Saddam regime.

Under the so–called new world order, should it not be a case where the international community takes direct action when, clearly, conventions on genocide are being abused? Why are we talking about normalizing relations with Iraq under the UN cease–fire resolution when the tragedy that occurred has not been addressed?

Can the minister tell us if Canada would support international action to maintain a sanctions program until this brutal terrorism against the Kurds comes to an end?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, not very long ago in this House, the hon. member and others were asking the government to take action to ensure that help could be extended to children and to others who were disadvantaged in Iraq.

Mr. Peterson: Don't be cheap.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Somehow the member for Willowdale regards that kind of action as cheap. I do not quite understand that kind of logic.

Mr. Simmons: You wouldn't.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): No, I do not understand that kind of logic.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): What we are very much in support of is action that tries to help people in Iraq who are victims of that regime.

That is why this government took actions beginning in the summer that resulted in a withdrawal from Kuwait by Iraq and its aggressive action. That is why we are supporting the United Nations now. That is why we announced on Friday of last week an additional $3.3 million Canadian to international humanitarian organizations to kelp the Kurds. That, as the member knows, is in addition to some $77 million for humanitarian purposes that we made available in the summer and on which we had not only made promises, but actually delivered the help to the people who needed it.

• (1440)

That $3.3 million will be expanded as the need increases. Our strong tendency is to continue to work through international organizations, whether Red Cross, Red Crescent or the organizations of the United Nations.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my memory recalls the amount of money we pledged to help the tragic suffering of the Kurds is about the same amount the government spent on advertising the GST program. I do not think there is any comparison between the two.

If we are truly interested in stopping that suffering the minister knows is continuing, should it not be the responsibility of the international community to go beyond just condemnation and to take specific action?

Second, I want to ask the minister if we have made representations to our Turkish allies under NATO to make sure that Turkish refugees are given full asylum in that country and that we will promise and take leadership in ensuring that a major aid program is provided in order to give comfort and security to the Turkish government and the Iranian government, which must provide that refugee program.

Is this not, in scope, similar to what we faced in Indo-China back in the late 1970s and early 1980s? This is a tragic problem, and I would like to know seriously what you are doing about it.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I certainly would be interested in knowing what specifically the hon. member, I presume on behalf of his party, is suggesting is independent action that Canada should be taking with regard to that situation. I would be interested in the precedents that he would invoke and I would be interested in his view as to the implications that would have for the sovereignty of nations in which there is an uprising.

With regard to activities of the United Nations, I would remind the hon. member that he and his party, or at least many members of his party, were not prepared to support the United Nations at an earlier phase. They are certainly now prepared to support the United Nations very actively in all aspects of this matter.

Some hon. members: That is a lie.

With respect to Turkey, I had the opportunity yesterday morning, to speak—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: There are a lot of people who would like to know what the answer is with respect to Canadian policy. I would ask all hon. members to give the minister a chance to reply.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity yesterday morning to speak to the Foreign Minister of Turkey. He was on his way to the border areas. I will be speaking to him tomorrow. We are very conscious of the problems that the Turks feel they face with regard to becoming a place of domicile, even on a temporary basis.

We have made it clear that we think the most effective help the international community, including Canada, could give would be to people who were either within Iraq or within temporary camps on the border, on the Turkish or on the Iraqi side. This is obviously a terrible tragedy and one that requires the whole of the world to respond as effectively as we can. We think the most effective response is going to be by way of international organizations.

As others have mentioned at earlier times in the House, one of the difficulties we are dealing with there is quite simply a difficulty of terrain. That makes more direct deliveries of food aid, for example, much more problematic than it might be in other parts of the world.

We are considering all options that would allow Canada to continue to play a constructive role. As I said, we were among the first nations to respond with humanitarian assistance in August. We have increased that now. We are prepared to continue to increase that as conditions warrant. We would prefer to do that within the framework of existing international organizations.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the government has choked the CBC's budget in real terms and now, adding insult to injury, the government is rewarding one of its free trade friends with the pitiful patronage appointment of John Crispo to the CBC board of directors. It is just plain chutzpah.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister share the views of the appointee, John Crispo, that the CBC is, and I quote: "a lousy left-wing Liberal-NDP pinko network"? If that is the case, I understand what he has done. If not, will he withdraw Mr. Crispo's appointment immediately?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Crispo supports the CBC as an institution.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Weiner: Different people have different ideas about how the CBC should be run, but we all begin as supporters of the CBC. I think that is what is critical.

Here we have an individual, Mr. Crispo, an eminent economist. The CBC represents all Canadians and, therefore, it should reflect the great diversity of opinion that exists in this country.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, this is the most gross appointment and you are certainly not supporting it. You are aborting the CBC.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member would want to put her question through the Chair. Please put the question.

Mrs. Finestone: The CBC board gave a unanimous vote of confidence in the integrity of its news and its current affairs services, while the new appointee, John Crispo, calls it biased, left-wing and, to the journalists, a disgrace to professional journalism.

Is the Crispo appointment now the Prime Minister's way of censoring the CBC news or is this just another way that the government uses its cheap tricks, showing lofty contempt for the CBC?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I was not sure if I heard a question. As far as I am concerned, the CBC has a significant budget to administer, with global receipts of some $1.4 billion. There are other instruments by which funding has also been made available.

As far as I am concerned, I start my day by listening to the CBC, and I am a very strong supporter of that institution. I am not sure whether the member would want to get that involved in administering what should be a public corporation at arm's length and independent from the government.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Last week the Prime Minister appointed University of Toronto Professor John Crispo as his hired gun to carry out this government's vendetta against the CBC.

As we know, Mr. Crispo is notorious for his unabashed hatred of the CBC and views Canada's public broadcaster as a nest of anti-government, left-wing "pinkos" and a dangerous, if not evil force on our society. Those are his words.

Why is the Prime Minister intent on heightening his attack by engineering even more strife on Canada's public broadcasting system and why is he using Mr. Crispo and his take-no-prisoner rhetoric to carry out his scorched earth policy against the CBC?

Mr. Loiselle: You missed a couple of cliches.

Mr. Epp: That is okay, he will get a supplementary.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, there are 15 members of the CBC board. I do not have an indication of the political affiliation of the members of the CBC. In fact, the only person I may know personally is the wife of one of the senators who, I am sure, is deeply committed to the continuance and to the operation of the CBC.

• (1450)

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Crispo was one of this government's most ardent and vocal supporters of the free trade during the 1988 elections.

In light of U.S. trade negotiator Carla Hills' comments that under the Mexican Round, Canadian cultural industries will be on the free trade table, I would like to ask the Prime Minister through his deputy why it is his intention to use Mr. Crispo to dismantle the Canadian public broadcasting system under a trilateral free trade pact with the U.S. and Mexico. Or, does he just figure he has not done enough damage to the system already?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Every time Carla Hills speaks the NDP shakes, but we do not. The United States might want to discuss the issue of cultural industries. We are not against discussing anything with anybody. But we do not propose any changes in the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement, which protected our cultural industry, and we are going to continue protecting our cultural industries.

The Mexicans are not threatening our cultural industries. So the hon. gentleman should not quake every time Mrs. Hills speaks.

TRADE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): My question is also for the Minister for International Trade.

I would like to say to him that when John Crosbie speaks Canadians laugh, and it is not a laughing matter.

Since the introduction of the free trade agreement, we have lost 220,000 manufacturing jobs across this country. Since the arrival of the GST, we have lost 71,000 jobs in the service sector.

Given that the minister admitted earlier in this Question Period that the Americans are violating the spirit of the current free trade agreement, why is he pursuing willy-nilly a new trade agreement with another country with no conditions attached?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): We do not have an agreement yet with any other country. We have one free trade agreement so far, and that is with the United States.

We have got certain very firm benefits from that. We know that the United States is worried about its economic position in the world and there are very protectionist influences there. We know at the present moment the President is trying to get authority from Congress for an up-or-down power with respect to negotiating trade agreements, the fast track authority, and that therefore has some influence on what American officials say.

We have to live with the United States. It is right next door to us. We have been living with it now for some 125 years. The hon. lady does not have anything to fear. We are here protecting her and all those who think like her against the perils of living next to this giant neighbour. Because we have got this agreement, we now have a solid foundation with which to defend our interests in the United States whenever they are threatened.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): I do not need your protection. The people who need your protection—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to remember that she should put her questions through the Chair.

Ms. Copps: The people who need protection are the 1.4 million Canadians who are losing jobs a result of the devastating economic policies of this government. GST, a failure; free trade, a failure.

I ask the Minister of Finance what specific programs can he offer to Canadians today to put our people back to work. Never mind the Mexicans and the Americans; why don't you put Canadians back to work?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): I am sure that my hon. friend was here this morning listening to the speech and she should reflect on the fact that Mexico went through the wringer in 1982 because of the high debt, high deficit problems that they have, and they had difficulty getting out of the economic problems that developed at that time.

It is instructive to note that a country that has gone through those difficulties is following the policies that this government is also following: getting the fiscal problem under control, getting the debt problem under control, combating inflation, deregulation, encouraging greater flows of foreign capital, changing the regulations of how foreign capital is treated in this country and the sale of public enterprises.

I think the point here is quite clear. Policies that they are following and policies that we are following are designed to improve the quality of the economy and designed to improve the capacity of individuals who are out of work today who want work.

My friend opposite wants to go back in the dark ages of economic policy and look back at ways that led Mexico into problems, that led this country into problems and—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as our leader already said, Montreal is the city with the highest unemployment rate in Canada. Montreal is also the city with the highest rate of poverty in Canada. The situation in Montreal is a national tragedy and the government has decided to forget Montreal. My question is the following: Why has the government not approached the governments of Montreal and of Quebec to initiate a special program to reverse this horrible situation in Montreal? Why not?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I think that it is absolutely wrong when the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce says that there is no agreement between the Government of Quebec and the Government of Montreal. I met the Mayor of Montreal on Friday morning. We already have two areas of Montreal where millions of dollars are being spent, in the east and the southwest. Of course, there is a problem of industrial infrastructure in Montreal. We are trying to change that. A month and a half ago, you had the announcement of $300 million for the Space Agency in the Montreal ara. Other announcements are imminent. Once again, I ask the hon. member to be honest. The situation in Montreal today is difficult, but it is not comparable to what it was in 1982.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the situation in employment is worse now than it was in 1981–82 and that answer will not relieve the thousands of unemployed in Montreal at the present time.

One out of four Montrealers now lives below the poverty line. There are 192,000 more poor in Montreal than in all four Atlantic provinces. The government has a special development program for Atlantic Canada and for other regions in Canada. Why not such a special program for Montreal?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I just said to the member that we have two special programs in the most hurt parts of Montreal, which are southwest Montreal and east Montreal. We will continue to work. We work with the province of Quebec. I heard that this province should make a few announcements in May in its budget and we will make other announcements.

But we have to work with the reality. It is what we do. Nobody wants the layoffs and the job losses that we have in Montreal. We are working on it, but we have to work in such a way that those jobs will be permanent, will help Montrealers and the great city that Montreal has always been.

TRADE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Sometime after May 1, American wheat will begin entering Canada without restriction as a result of the free trade agreement. Regrettably, once this occurs the decision can never be reversed. This cause has been triggered partly because American subsidized grain sales have directly affected traditional Canadian markets in violation of the free trade agreement.

Will the government today advise the U.S. that American wheat will not come into Canada freely and that an action will be commenced against the U.S. for a violation of the free trade agreement under article 701.4?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, when the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement was negotiated, Canada received an advantage because it was agreed that Canadian wheat and other grains would be eligible to be exported to the United States without impediment.

• (1500)

At the same time, American wheat and other grains would not be exported to Canada freely until such time as any subsidies received by American grain farmers with respect to American grains were at the same level as the assistance given by governments to Canadian farmers.

Now, after several years of the agreement, the situation changed with respect to oats, as I recall it, a year or two ago. American oats had been permitted to be exported to Canada under this arrangement. If American assistance for wheat is no greater than Canadian assistance in the coming year, American wheat would be eligible to be exported freely to Canada. Is there anything more fair than that? We have had the advantage, if anything, for the last two or three years in selling our wheat and other grains in the United States. If the American subsidy level decreases and becomes the same as the Canadian subsidy level, surely they are entitled to be able to sell their product up here in Canada. Could anything be fairer than that?

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): That clause has been invoked because the United States has violated the free trade agreement. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the National Farmers' Union and Prairie Pools and others have all been calling on this government to act.

It is clear that U.S. subsidized grain sales have hurt our traditional markets and have violated the free trade agreement. When is this government going to finally stand by Canadian agriculture and give farmers the support it promised them when it announced the free trade agreement in the first place?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have just explained how the free trade agreement worked to the advantage of Canadian farmers. The present estimates of support by government in both countries are still preliminary. This year, American levels of support may or may not be higher than Canadian levels of support. That is a different issue than the abhorrent American Export Enhancement Program which they devised to assist them in competing with the European community, which has an even more abhorrent system of subsidizing exports. While they are battling the European community, they are not paying sufficient attention to who their friends are. We certainly do not agree with that procedure, but with respect to the main question of the hon. member, we were treated very well under the free trade agreement. We have had the advantage and we will have to see what happens in the future.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. During Question Period, my friend from Burin—St. George's made a comment which I think he would like the opportunity to withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I have not heard complaints about the remark. The hon. member may be able to repeat it.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, if I had said something which offended the right hon. member I would be the first to withdraw it. I would like to see Hansard to see exactly what I said. At the time, the right hon. member was saying that we did not support the United Nations and that is not true. We do support the United Nations. We do not support kowtowing to Bush.

Mr. Speaker: I will look at Hansard and examine the record, if there is one.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I heard distinctly what the member from Burin—St. George's said. He called the external affairs minister a liar twice. He should have the courage to stand up in his place and withdraw.

If the hon. member said that, he should withdraw. If the hon. member wants to see whether it appears in Hansard, I am prepared to wait.

There is no question that if it was said, it should be withdrawn.

Mr. Simmons: Clearly, I do not know what all the fuss is about. I called a lie a lie. If it is not parliamentary, I withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: There are a lot of different ways to say things in here, but the raison d'être for a rule against unparliamentary language is a very simple one.

It is based on the fact that when it is used, it creates disorder. As a consequence we do not have free speech. That is why the rule is there, and hon. members have to support it.

It is not just for the Speaker to go through a list in Beauchesne and remind hon. members of what, from time to time, has been ruled unparliamentary.

In supporting it, if somebody has become excessive, a withdrawal has to be a complete and unequivocal withdrawal, or we are not supporting the convention. I would ask the hon. member to assure the House that his withdrawal is unequivocal.

Mr. Simmons: I thank you, Sir. The withdrawal is unequivocal.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member.

PRIVILEGE

OFFICE OF THE MEMBER FOR RICHELIEU

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I sent you a letter raising a problem, because my rights and privileges as a member were violated in an exceptional and unacceptable way last Sunday, that is yesterday.

In my absence, with no authorization or consent from me, my confidential files and everything I had in my office were taken. My office was plundered. It was opened without permission, without my giving the keys, without my staff being warned, without notifying me. All my documents and personal effects and those of my staff were taken away to another building, without my consent.

My rights as a member are in your hands. As Speaker of the House, will you let such a thing be done to me? I never received a notice from you to change my office. What I asked for in writing—I wrote to you a month ago—I never received a reply, except an acknowledgement of receipt. I therefore want to go over the facts, because I think it is not only a violation of my rights as a member of Parliament but also contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms for people to raid a member's office without a warrant and without him being there.

I spoke to the person in charge of moving to tell him that I could not be there on the 3rd, that you were out of the country and that I did not agree with that waste of money. I therefore said that I would not take part and that I would contest the legality of expelling me from my office and spending $10,000 for nothing. And I said: When the Speaker gives me an order by letter, then I will know whether the Speaker of the House is there to represent not the three party whips but all members equally. Who can claim office space for me based on my seniority of a member first elected in 1984? No one, because the Bloc and independent members are not recognized.

The Speaker of the House must make this request. He must defend me. He did not do so as far as I can see. I want to know. I talked to Mr. Riedel, who is in charge of all physical arrangements on the Hill, on Friday and said to him, "On Monday, I will ask the Speaker of the House whether he will defend my rights as a member in the same way as others. We will wait till Monday." He said, "Very well." And he is supposed to be in charge of all physical arrangements. He agreed to wait until Monday to be able to talk with you. Now without warning, on Sunday morning, they moved, paying the movers, telephone installers and fax installers overtime. Everything was moved under special surveillance, it seems, with extra staff. Those are unacceptable expenditures! It was moved to another place on Wellington Street and I was even offered to have everything redone if I kept quiet—to have the carpets changed, to have painting done, extra walls put up and so on. I do not accept that.

I ask who authorized this move because I received no letter from you. If the authorization came from the Chair, well, you acted in a partisan way to the detriment of my rights and privileges as a member, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: First of all I listened very patiently to the hon. member whose office was moved from one to another. I am prepared to discuss the matter with the hon. member, or any other hon. members, but I have to advise the hon. member that it is not a question of privilege. He may or may not have a complaint. It is a matter of administration and there is quite a lot more to the story than we have heard and I am prepared to discuss that at another time, and that is the end of it.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but it is not a question of privilege. The matter is closed in this House.

Mr. Plamondon: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: In that case, Mr. Speaker, forcing my door without my permission and taking my confidential files—how is that not a question of privilege and how are my rights—

Mr. Speaker: Once again, I am sorry, but it is not a point of order.

[English]

A point of order is something that rises out of the rules of this place. This is an administrative matter and will have to be settled one way or the other to the member's satisfaction or otherwise, but not in this Chamber.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8) I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 39 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege and the honour to present a petition signed by 173 Canadians. Most of the names were collected on the VIA run between Truro and Halifax a week and a half ago. The petitioners call upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail services, cut on January 15, 1990, maintain and where appropriate upgrade remote services on which many Canadians rely. They do not think train service is a laughing matter. They ask as well for a legislative mandate for VIA Rail, and to make available the resources it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world. This petition is also signed by a number of residents of Cape Breton who attended the Sydney East Richmond annual general meeting of the NDP.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, it is my duty to present four petitions signed by citizens of my riding of Ottawa—Vanier who condemn the decision by Canada Post Corporation to close the franchise at 580 Rideau Street.

The petitioners maintain that this will inconvenience all customers in the area, especially all the retired people who live nearby and will be deprived of an essential service that they need.

For these reasons, the undersigned ask Parliament to call on Canada Post to review the decision to close station 23.

[English]

UKRAINIAN CANADIANS

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition signed by many residents of the city of Edmonton, many of whom are descendants of original Ukrainian settlers. They wish to bring to the attention of the House—and I quote from the petition—"That during the First World War and after Ukrainian Canadians were unjustly interned in concentration camps, deprived of property and valuables, deprived of liberty of movement, and deprived of the right to vote." Therefore, these petitioners pray that the Parliament of Canada will pass a resolution acknowledging these injustices. That is all they ask, surely it is not too much.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Madam Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition from people who still oppose the Goods and Services Tax. These residents of Pont-Lafrance, Sheila and Pont-Landry in the Tracadie region still bear the unacceptable burdens imposed by the Goods and Services Tax.

[English]

CANADA POST

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present further petitions in addition to the thousands already tabled.

The petitioners are calling upon Parliament to ask Canada Post to honour Marie Sklodowska Curie by issuing a commemorative stamp on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth, November 27, 1992, which I might add is also the 125th anniversary of Canada's birthday.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today and present quite a number of petitions from many parts of British Columbia. They come from communities such as Burnaby, Hundred Mile House, Surrey, Vancouver, Langley, Coquitlam, Pit Meadows, Vernon, Kelowna, Prince George and a number of other locations.

These petitions, which total about 1,040 names, ask the Minister of Communications and this government to oppose UNITEL's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance telephone services.

They urge the Minister of Communications to consult with all affected parties, specifically those citizens living outside Canada's main urban centres, who will be impacted very severely by this form of deregulation.

Lastly, they urge the minister to hold local hearings in our communities before deciding the fate of Canada's telecommunications system.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Ross Reid (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and privilege today to present to the House a petition signed by thousands of Newfoundlanders and Labradorians, which asks Parliament to do what it can to ensure that the many hundreds of Bulgarians who have come to Newfoundland and Labrador are not sent back to the uncertain state of that country and sure persecution. It asks that they be allowed the opportunity to build a life in Canada, not only for themselves and their families, but also for other Canadians.

I want to add that this is a petition that I personally support very strongly.

CANADA POST

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions asking that Marie Sklodowska Curie be honoured for her scientific contributions to humanity.

This is a request made by many of my constituents and constituents of the Niagara Peninsula. I would ask that this House consider these two petitions in the name of my constituents.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 19027).

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing on a point of order.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, I have a different point of order from those raised before and I will be as brief as I can.

This relates to the possibility of dividing Motion No. 30 into categories so that we can make an effective decision on each, because Motion No.30 is complex and contains several distinct proposals. I think it is not possible for members to give a yes or no answer to the question of whether this motion should be adopted. It is over 30 pages long and contains 64 clauses touching on virtually every aspect of the operations of the House.

• (1520)

I suggest dividing the proposals into perhaps five groupings: One, proposals to change the dates and hours of House sittings and to limit the debate on supply, the budget, the Throne Speech and so on; two, proposals to alter the operations of committees; three, proposals to amend the passage of government bills and government business including reduction in time of some speeches, to refer those bills to standing committees, to facilitate the use of closure and time allocation, to remove the right to divide on first reading, et cetera; four, proposals to override the denial of unanimous consent; five, proposals to change the conduct of Private Members' Business.

I would like to refer to Beauchesne, fifth edition, page 150, paragraph 415 where it states:

> (1) A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the House may be taken on each separately. The Speaker has a discretionary power to decide whether he should divide a motion.

It should be noted as a precedent that in 1964 the Speaker make a landmark decision on that particular provision in Beauchesne when he decided to divide what was a short nine-line motion. At that time the House was seized with a motion which sought to change the Canadian flag and sought to enable the Union Jack to continue to be flown.

The Speaker at that time recognized that many members wished to say yes to parts of that motion and no to other parts of it. He relied on British practice and quoted one British Speaker from 1912, I believe, who said: "The rule of course is if any member feels embarrassed on voting on a resolution that the Chair shall revise the resolution in order that the member may if he wishes to vote yea on one part and no on the other not be embarrassed by having to vote yea or no on the whole of it".

In that particular case the Speaker of our House ordered the flag motion divided.

Since then the House has been offered many complex or complicated questions, including constitutional amendments for example, and often an accommodation is made among the parties to permit the proposal of a series of amendments which would give members an opportunity to state their positions clearly.

The House has also considered amendments to Standing Orders which touch on one or more aspects of our House business. Today's motion though is unique in that it does not come from a committee study, where an opportunity exists to put forward concerns, and nor has their been an arrangement made among the parties to reach some accommodation with regard to voting.

It will not be possible for Motion No. 30 to be amended sufficiently to permit members to divide up the question for themselves and vote yes to those sections they support and no to others. The government, it is reported, will not entertain a long debate on this motion. It has been suggested that closure will be moved later this week.

If that is the case, it is unlikely that there will be an opportunity for more than one amendment to be presented. The two major parties will have the opportunity to have their views on the record; the government's view contained in the motion and the Official Opposition's view contained in its amendment. There will not be an opportunity for an official view to come from the New Democratic Party, from the Bloc Quebecois, from the Reform Party, from any of the independents or indeed any opportunity for government backbenchers to voice their concerns.

Unlike the experience of the House on constitutional issues, there is apparently no willingness in this House to accommodate those members by permitting a series of amendments to be put to the floor. My colleagues on all sides may agree with much that is contained in Motion No. 30. I agree with many of the 64 proposals, but I disagree vehemently with others, as do other members in the House.

How can we vote yes to something that contains so much with which we disagree and vote no to something that contains so many sensible proposals?

Madam Speaker, I would ask you to use your discretion, as is clearly possible in this circumstance, and consider the precedent of 1964. I ask you to divide Motion No. 30 into the five distinct motions I mentioned earlier and to permit each to be debated, amended and voted on separately.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I will not be long in my intervention, but I do want to indicate a few difficulties that I have with the proposal from the hon. member for the New Democratic Party.

To begin with, the relationship between hours of sitting and other rule changes respecting the manner in which legislation is dealt with and so on is not separate, they are related. One cannot, on the one hand, change the rules respecting the days, hours we sit and so on while, at the same time, carrying along those rules respecting length of speeches, length of debate that were appropriate for a different calendar. They are related. The separations that the hon. member suggests would be inappropriate because you cannot have one without the other.

I do acknowledge that there are some separations. The committee —part of it— does stand on its own from the other things. Certainly, if that were suggested as separate votes, I do not have any particular problem with that.

I do have to take this opportunity to make a couple of points. The hon. member said this is unique in terms of rule changes. He is inaccurate. In 1969, there were major rule changes brought forward. This is not a unique occurrence in that regard. They did not come from some other source, they came from the government.

The other problem I have is this. These rule changes are a result of negotiation discussions that go back over a year. I will go into some more detail on it during the debate. What we have is this phenomenon. I proposed, on behalf of the government, a major set of changes which I gave to the other major parties and said: "Consider them". They came back and said: "We do not like this, we do not like that, we do not like this". Some of what they did not like we said: "Okay, we will take that away even though having them would have been nice from the perspective of the government House leader". In other words, we negotiated. We negotiated and arrived at a final package that had a lot of give–up on our side and acceptances. We did not accept all their suggestions. I am not implying that. Nor did they say at all times that they agreed fully with the total package, but we did have a negotiation.

Now what the hon. member is really saying by his suggestion is we now want the opportunity to put into our pocket, as collected and received, all of those things we gave up in the negotiation, but we want the right to challenge and vote against, in as many different ways as possible, those things we did not. It is a kind of have your cake and eat it philosophy. It is the way they have been operating in committees, I am told, where in fact they sit down in a standing committee study, demand that the report reflect their point of view, the committee accommodates their point of view and, at the end of the day, they say: "Fine, now that we have got that we are going out with a minority report".

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Which one?

Mr. Andre: Which committee, the hon. member for Edmonton East says. I can give him a score of examples.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, order. The hon. minister is getting into debate at this point. The House has heard the points presented by the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing. I think the hon. minister has given us a good idea of where he stands and he will certainly have time to express more of those ideas in debate.

Is there one more point the hon. minister would want to make, but I would not want him to get into debate at this point?

Mr. Andre: I accept the Chair's admonition. My point in raising that in the first place is to accept that as a principle is to interfere significantly with our modus vivendi in terms of working with the House leaders in terms of negotiations. If the Chair is to accept their principle that everything must be broken up and they must have an opportunity to challenge each of the items separately, then one can see, I think, that there would be very little incentive for the government to negotiate and discuss these things. Rather it would be in our interest, since in fact we are going to end up with a debate and vote on each and every item, to develop our own proposal totally independently and bring it forward, present it to the House and say: "Okay, let us debate and decide ".

• (1530)

I think that would be a significant diminution, if you will, in the way we ought to operate. It is for that reason I would ask the Chair that the request of the New Democratic Party for the opportunity to separate all of the groupings they talked about not be considered.

It would challenge the fundamental way we operate. More than that, we cannot separate the calendar from those aspects of the rule changes which are designed to make it possible for us to accomplish what we need to accomplish within the context of the proposed calendar.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, very briefly to the same point of order of my hon. friend from Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

Listening to my hon. friend, the government House leader, I want to make it clear that in no way was there any suggestion that the 64 different sections of the motion before us be broken up for obvious reasons in terms of the difference and the unrelated nature of each of these parts.

They are obviously inter-related. The point my hon. colleague was making was that there were five categories. Perhaps Madam Speaker, on behalf of the members you would identify two or three.

We are simply saying that to change the way not only this House operates but the way the members of Parliament do their work within the parliamentary precincts and within the general nature of their responsibilities is to acknowledge the fact that work done in committee, while it may in some way be related unquestionably to work being done in the House, is really a separate kind of behaviour.

We are talking about rule changes: what time of the day we should meet, how long a period we should have for presenting petitions and what time the House will adjourn for the day.

This set of changes, I think we all agree, is related in a very similar way. It has nothing to do with sizes of committees and members of committees and the way committees ought to operate.

Madam Speaker, we are simply asking you on behalf of all members of the House to provide an opportunity, not to debate on a whole number of different items and vote. I agree with my hon. colleague that discussions have taken place and so on.

On the other hand, he also agrees that perhaps there were two or three different major items on which the House could render a decision.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I just want to briefly add to the arguments of my two colleagues.

When my colleague from Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing spoke, he made reference to the fifth edition. I have what appears to be the first edition in my hands, dated 1884. It says: "A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the House may be taken on each separately".

It is clear that for well over 100 years, the right has been given to the Speaker to make that determination on behalf of members so that we can make an appropriate judgment on the various components of the motion before us.

I would think it would be in the best interests of all members of Parliament, and not just opposition members or independent members but government members as well to have the opportunity to say "yea" or "nay" on the particular groupings that have been suggested.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, very briefly I just wanted to reply to two things that the government House leader said.

He said that I had mentioned that this was a unique motion. I did not say that. I merely said it was a very complex one, and I think he agrees with that.

I want to point out that he did suggest that at least the proposals relating to the operations of committees could be treated differently.

I think you have some indication of recognition of the point I was making at least with regard to one of those sets of proposals. I would urge you to consider the possibility of dividing them into five categories so that we can really address them properly rather than in a confused state all mixed together.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I did not intend to speak but, as someone who has been a Whip now for two years and a bit, when somebody stands in the House and says that committees are not related to the hours of the House et cetera, I can simply say out of my experience they are intertwined.

One affects the other. Attendance, the hours of the House and all these things are intertwined in the same way that a large statute like the Bank Act which runs several hundred pages from time to time of revisions are intertwined.

We can go down a very slippery slope if we start breaking things up to the point where we pass something which on its own may make sense but has an impact on the other side. Certainly, these rule changes have been examined from the perspective of all three parties. They have been shared with large numbers of members of the House. They track back to the original parliamentary reforms package in 1984–85, and they are interconnected in a way that I did not want to leave unacknowledged in the House. Interconnection between these changes does, in fact, exist.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair had undertaken to hear other points of order that could be presented during the consideration of these changes to the Standing Orders that govern us. I therefore listened very attentively to what first the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing and the hon. Leader of the Government in the House, the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan and the hon. member for Calgary South said to us.

[English]

The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan will allow me, I think, to wonder about the author and date of the book he cited. I do not think that Beauchesne was really part of our lives in those years, but nevertheless it was something quite interesting and certainly gave the chair the opportunity and the possibility of dividing things which are put to the House.

At this point I can tell the House that the Chair will look into it and will re-read all the arguments put to the House at this time. The Chair will come back with a ruling in the shortest possible time.

Resuming debate, the hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Point of order, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, just to seek clarification, when we were last here a case was made about whether proceeding with this debate would be appropriate.

Could you give some indication of when the Chair would be indicating its response to the arguments put forward at that time?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I can assure the hon. member that a response will be forthcoming as quickly as possible. We do not feel at this time that it should prevent us from proceeding with debate.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak to Motion 30 which introduces significant, and in my view long overdue, changes to the rules under which this House operates.

[Translation]

Parliament's task is to debate issues and to make decisions and the Standing Orders of the House guide this process. They govern the proceedings of the House and establish a framework in which the government carries out its legislative program and the opposition questions the government in an orderly way and hon. members debate issues and make decisions by a majority vote.

The modification to the Standing Orders before Parliament is the result of a year of discussions and great co-operation among the House leaders. It is the most important series of changes proposed in the modern history of the Canadian Parliament.

The proposals seek the following objectives: to improve Parliament as a forum for good relevant debate through the modernization of obsolete and vague rules, a greater contribution from members to the parliamentary process, but also recognition of their obligations towards their constituents.

[English]

I want to talk about the public environment. Parliament and politicians are held in disrepute, and there is a heightened and dangerous sense of cynicism in the public of Canada concerning this institution, about which we should all be concerned. People are demanding more contact with members of Parliament and more involvement. The days when they were satisfied to have their representative act in their best interests in Parliament are long gone. They want now interaction on a more regular, routine basis.

• (1540)

We hear it exemplified by demands for referenda and recall elections. Free vote is a part of it. We hear incessantly that people want to have more impact, more interaction and more influence on their members of Parliament. Some of that is healthy, some is not. The demand that we represent our parish, our constituency to the exclusion of every other interest is at this time quite dangerous because you hold a country like this together by accommodating the points of view in other parts of the country.

If we parliamentarians cannot see the other point of view, if a person like me from Alberta cannot appreciate the concerns of someone from Cape Breton, Newfoundland or Quebec and cannot participate or vote in concert with those colleagues, but is required by the exigencies of political pressure to say: "I vote in the affirmative only for those things which benefit Calgary and in the negative for everything else", then we are not serving the country very well. One cannot keep a country together like that, one cannot keep a family together like that. Yet we are hearing those demands.

I am not saying parliamentary rules are the source of all this public concern, but parliamentary rules cannot be excluded from it. Parliamentary actions and the reputation we have as parliamentarians are certainly a part of it. Therefore, we should approach the question of how we function, how the rules govern us, not just from the perspective of what it does for our partisan advantage in our adversarial system, but also what it does for the institution and for the country over the long haul.

The public is saying it wants more information and less rhetoric. It feels insulted in a lot of ways by what it sees here. I think we in Parliament have all experienced school kids visiting, sitting up in the gallery, watching us function and going away shaking their heads saying that if they acted like that in the classroom their teachers would discipline them severely.

I am not suggesting there is something wrong with this current group or that it is a reflection of who is on which side of the House, because it has been occurring frequently. Part of the problem is the way in which the public is informed. The vehicles used to inform the public do not work very well.

The March 25 CBC news item on the rule changes is perhaps a good example. It was clip-by-clip effort to give the viewers the message that the government is out to stifle Parliament. Nothing could be further from the truth. There were inaccuracies in that three-minute story, just plain factual inaccuracies. It is no wonder that no one understands Parliament when they are 50 feet off this hill.

We know many Canadians rely on television for their news. If they had to rely on that particular news story, they would have a very distorted view of what in fact is happening. Apart from the errors and lack of facts, there was a cynical and partisan tone. It simply reported and accepted the partisan response of opposition. No wonder the people are cynical.

Even on a non-partisan issue like this, only the base politics came through. We saw only the accusation that this was Fascist, stifling and Draconian. These kinds of shrill, loud adjectives when used bring us all into disrepute. It is something that you are going to see various members of the New Democratic Party objecting to; my condemnation of the use of those words. I want to ask them to reflect sincerely. If they believe that public debate helps and that their reputations as parliamentarians help when they go on television or in public for various reasons, do they really think using words like Fascist and Draconian brings respect on themselves or this institution? Is it is helping to bind this wounded country together, to generate jobs for people, or helping anybody in any way? I want to ask them to reflect on that sincerely before they so glibly defend that kind of thing.

We live in an adversarial system. The government proposes and Parliament disposes. There is the give and take, but taken to extremes and under the glare of television I wonder what we would do. It was Bismarck in the last century who said: "There are two things people should not watch being made, one is sausages and the other is laws." Well, like it or not, modern communication has the people watching laws being made. If we do not want to make them all sick to death of our democratic institutions we should bear that in mind as we perform in this Chamber and look at these things.

Mr. Riis: Harvey, you are turning us into a sausage factory.

Mr. Andre: There is my friend from Kamloops who participated in these discussions more intensely over the last couple of months, but was aware of them going back a year. He never once in private said to me that these are Draconian, Fascistic and would stomp on Parliament. Never once in our discussions did he use any such language. Sure, he did not like every clause, I acknowledge that, but he has to acknowledge that we made some changes to reflect—

Mr. Riis: Name one that we suggested. Name one that the NDP suggested.

Mr. Andre: We will name several, as a matter of fact, that were changed in reflection of the changes suggested. He knows that the day before his public utterances there was a three hour meeting in the office of my colleague, the parliamentary secretary. He knows that substantial changes were made then. He knows what he said privately at that time. He then walked out of that private meeting and said: "This is Fascistic, this is Draconian." Then, when my parliamentary secretary said: "Well, you know that in view of your statements we can no longer agree to those changes." He said: "I understand that." That is the root of the problem. You participate in good faith in negotiations and discussions and then at the opportunity for partisan advantage, for a shot on television, you have got to make sure you use the noisiest adjectives you can: "Draconian", "Fascistic", "stomping on Parliament". All the things that will get you on national television. You then sit down and say: "Is it not sad that we are brought into such disrepute as politicians."

Mr. Riis: It is not politicians, it is the Tories who are in disrepute.

Mr. Andre: Right. The editorial in today's Ottawa Citizen is I think instructive to the hon. member for Kamloops and to everybody else. I will just read a part of it:

> The juvenile antics and partisan performances of our elected politicians in the House of Commons sometimes make it very difficult for Canadians to care much about what goes on there.

Amen.

> And as our political leaders lose credibility they're diverting attention away from the seat of democracy by relying on commissions of appointed officials to address the woes of the nation that should be addressed right here, in Ottawa, on the Hill.
> In short, our elected leaders are making Parliament irrelevant.
> Thus it is difficult to understand all the opposition politicians' complaints and moans about the Commons rules changes recently introduced by Government House Leader Harvie Andre.

These reforms would do more to restore some credibility to the House and its occupants than another roving committee of so-called great Canadians could.

• (1550)

It goes on, Mr. Speaker, but I think it makes the point very well.

The Canadian political system can no longer tolerate that level of debate, that kind of language, the extreme shrill noisy level of debate, a level which I humbly suggest has sunk far too low with those last outrageous claims by the opposition parties, particularly the New Democratic Party. Canadians deserve a better opposition, not just opposing for the sake of opposing, which is what we are seeing here. They need more rational, intelligent opposition and analysis through better quality debates, more fair and technical review of legislation, through more pre-study and constructive committee work. That is what these reforms are all about, making us more relevant to the times, recognizing what Canadians have been asking for, better quality representation both in Ottawa in Parliament and in the constituencies in direct contact with the elector.

However, rather than that constructive and reasoned input Canadians are fed the standard pat, shrill claims from the outraged opposition.

Not once in the last several months during our almost daily discussions with the Liberals and the NDP have I heard about these objections. There was never a word about constitutionality, not a peep about the theory that we would only sit one day, no mention that the NDP will take these to court, not one word in all of those meetings.

It is offensive that they both actually contributed items to the package. How can they take such active part on the one hand and yet profess the extreme indignation on the other?

Our work with the opposition has a long track record and tradition. Just to go back over the history: Prior to March 1990, my predecessor, the present Minister of Transport, actually raised the issue. In March 1990, discussions on rule changes were held and I was present, as were the current leader of the New Democratic Party and the past House leader of the Liberal Party.

In July 1990, as a result of an all-party agreement, the House leaders travelled to the United Kingdom to review standing orders and discuss the British parliamentary practice. There were two representatives from the Liberal Party, there were three from the Conservative Party, and at the last minute the representative of the New Democratic Party had to cancel.

A package of proposals was assembled through my offices and on December 5 I wrote to the Clerk of the House indicating that with the approval of the three House leaders, we would ask the Clerks to provide expert assistance in writing into the language of our rules those proposed rule changes that were written out in more descriptive fashion in the proposal.

On December 20, 1990, we put forward an initial package with some degree of clarity to the opposition for its review and comment. On March 1 the House of Commons Clerk prepared a preliminary draft of the rule changes for review and discussion in a package. On March 19, after several discussions between them, the House leaders met and final discussions and negotiations were completed before caucus presentations on March 20.

On March 20 the New Democratic Party contacted the House of Commons Clerk, withdrawing approval for any further drafting assistance. On March 22 we filed the rule changes with the House of Commons at 2.15 p.m.

Every step of the way it was a fully co-operative process. There was no sneaking up with rule changes that had not been fully discussed.

That is not to imply there was approval with every single step. It is to say, as I said earlier, there were no surprises and there was no indication to me that these were Fascistic, Draconian or perhaps subject to court challenge, as is implied by the House Leader of the New Democratic Party.

What do they do in general? Key to the rule changes was the question of a calendar that would provide for more time for members of Parliament to be in their constituencies. Initially we had two proposals on the table, as a matter of fact. One proposal would have us go to a four-day week, with not sitting on Fridays. The other proposal was for a program that basically said one week a month would be free for members to do other things.

In the end it was agreed, particularly by the New Democratic Party, but of members from my party from western Canada who also felt quite strongly that the one week off a month was the preferable option because of distances involved, and the difficulty they had in getting back to their constituents and then back to Ottawa.

That was what was proposed. I should say that leading up to that, I had asked for a little bit of research to be done. It was done by the Library of Parliament. The research was on what other jurisdictions around the world do. What do other democracies do? How long do other legislatures and parliaments and congresses and so on sit in other countries? It was an interesting piece of research.

Australia sits an average of 66 days a year. Its parliament sits 66 days a year; 89 per cent of the bills introduced by the government are passed, for an average of about 14 per day of government business.

Denmark sits an average of 106 days a year; 89 per cent of government bills are passed, for an average of seven bills per day of government business.

Canada sits, although the calendar provides for 175 days, but because of unscheduled non-sittings, an average of 155 days a year over the last 10 years. Only 56 per cent of government bills are passed, for an average of one bill per government day of business.

France sits 149 days. Western Germany sits 17 days. Japan sits 43 days. The Netherlands sits 100 days. New Zealand sits 100 days. Norway sits 180 days.

There is the first of that list, countries that actually sit more days than Canada. Spain sits for 88 days. Sweden sits for 134 days. The United Kingdom sits for 170 days. There is a unitary state where they have two levels of government. They pass an average of two bills per government sitting day, compared to the one per sitting day in Canada, so they get twice as much legislation through than we do.

The United States sits 144 days. We sit longer than the U.S. Congress. The European Community sits 65 days. In other words, only Norway and the United Kingdom actually sit longer than Canada's parliament in terms of sitting days per year.

If somebody could demonstrate that in fact we have better laws, that we are more democratic than the rest of the democratic world, then I think a case could be made for even sitting longer. But with a country this size, this diverse, to suggest the best thing we could do is keep members of Parliament here in Ottawa as many days a year as possible is absurd. It is an absurd proposal. We know that our provincial governments, many of which pass just as many pieces of legislation as we do, do not sit anywhere near as long as we do. Everywhere from New Brunswick at 42, to Manitoba at 98. Quebec is at 74, Ontario is at 84 days a year. Nova Scotia sits 62 days a year.

In the context of this national constitutional debate we are having, members of the legislative assemblies, national assemblies, provincial parliaments, are in their constituencies talking to their constituents, interacting with them.

• (1600)

Members of Parliament, who have a national mandate, are not able to be in their constituencies with the same frequency, with the same opportunities for interacting. Is that really something we should applaud, underline, repeat, particularly when we have examples of other legislatures around the world which manage to do more business in less time? If somebody can demonstrate that they are less democratic than we are and that somehow their people are worse off than we are, then I would like to hear those arguments.

In proposing the rule change for one week off a month, basically we will be sitting the same number of hours; more, as a matter of fact, because there will be an additional hour a day added to the calendar. So, effectively, on an hourly basis we will not be sitting less.

The new calendar will give more time to members of Parliament, particularly those from the more remote regions who cannot easily get to their constituencies and back in a two-day weekend. It will give them time to be with their constituents, to interact in a manner that Canadians are increasingly demanding.

Some have suggested that fewer Question Periods are somehow going to significantly weaken our democratic system. I offered to extend Question Period time a little bit, but that was not received.

I do not want to get into this debate too far, but I think it would be instructive to have, perhaps, some independent observers, perhaps from political science departments, to reflect on the degree to which Question Period helps or hurts our democracy and democratic institutions.

We cannot deny that it is an important check on potential abuse of government power; or deny that it is an important vehicle for members to bring forward the concerns of their constituents. But we cannot deny that the manner in which we conduct Question Period brings disrepute on all of us. It is more theatre than exchange of information. We adopted it from the United Kingdom, the mother of all Parliaments.

To give an example of the difference, twice a week for 15 minutes each day, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom must be in the House. On average, in that 15 minute period, 20 questions are asked and answered.

In the first 20 minutes today—and I was looking at the clock—there were five questions, many of them lead questions from the Official Opposition.

That is not a total measurement or the be all and end all of what Question Period should be. However, the House Leader of the Official Opposition, on a point of order, raised the question of whether we could not improve the efficiency of Question Period by reducing—he referred primarily to the length of the answers, but acknowledged that, perhaps, the length of the questions might be examined as well. At that point, I did say I would welcome that discussion. I would welcome the opportunity to have some appropriate discussions. Maybe I would want witnesses the next time we get together to discuss rule changes in private. Perhaps a committee of this House could look at the rules of Question Period to see whether we could not make it more effective than it is. That is something that could be done.

I dispute absolutely the accusations made that somehow we are less than democratic because we might have 20 less Question Periods a year. The suggestion by some that 20 less Question Periods a year makes us less democratic is just absurd. You wonder if they could be watching Question Period. I can understand, from some journalist's point of view, that Question Period is pretty useful. A journalist can get up, go to the office, clean off his or her desk, come over and watch the show for a while, get the story, go back and write it up and be be back in the press club having a beer and the day's work is done.

If the journalist doesn't have Question Period, he or she is going to have to dig for a story. So I can understand some objections. But I do not understand anybody who says in all sincerity that we are well served by the way our Question Period operates, and that somehow we are more democratic.

If a person is ultra-partisan, yes maybe; but if he or she is really looking at the respect the institution should have if it is going to guide this country into the next century, I don't think anybody in all sincerity would say that we couldn't look at some changes. I hesitate to add that these rule changes do not affect Question Period in any of the ways that I have been talking about; that is something that we will need to consider later.

There are rules to improve debates; allowing more speakers by reducing time limit on 20-minute speeches after five hours versus eight hours. Now we have half-hour speeches, or 20 and 10 for the first eight hours. The new rules will be for the first five hours and then we will switch to 10-minute speeches. It is going to force a longer speaking list and more concise arguments; it will be a better quality and more lively debate.

The fact that this place empties out after Question Period and nobody pays much attention to the debate ought to be a cause of concern to all of us. Anything we can do to sharpen up the debate should be welcomed.

It is interesting to look at other legislatures and what they do to sharpen up debate. There are some interesting lessons that we could learn.

This change allows the Whips of each party to split the time allotted so that they can accommodate the members within their own caucus in a better way than is possible now. It promotes the objectives of the McGrath commission report, such as the question and comment period we added last time, as well as the committee changes, the five envelopes to develop expertise in the membership in each envelope, and to allow members to focus on their own area of expertise.

There is a clear distinction between legislative and standing committees. The intent of the McGrath commission report was that legislative committees would be different from standing committees. They would exist temporarily to handle legislation. However, they have become a kind of duplicate of the standing committee and have gone off on national tours and what have you with legislation. That was not the intent. In a sense, it is a contempt of Parliament when they do that, because when legislation passes at second reading in this House it has received approval in principle—the principle is approved. The role of the committee is not to debate again whether the legislation is appropriate in principle, by touring the country and hearing from groups about the principle, but rather to look at all the details.

Earlier the opposition was concerned that we were going to exclude the ability of groups to appear before these committees in the language used, that we would talk about technical witnesses. It was not intended to exclude in that sense and it will not be used in that sense. I think the amendments to the language are appropriate. The intent is to signal clearly what the McGrath commission had recommended, and to which everybody agreed, that a legislative committee should act a like legislative committee and that people appearing before the committee as witnesses should be there to critique the provisions of a specific bill, not the principle of the bill. Therefore, they should be knowledgeable in that sense. We think that is an improvement.

The envelope system will permit more government consultation on policy development. It will improve consultation prior to drafting, hopefully making for better laws.

We are providing the rules to experiment with television in committees, giving the same access as print, following the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

We are allowing, formally, minority reports to be tabled in the House. We are also allowing the member to speak to it on the floor of the House, which is a change.

• (1610)

Private Members' Business will adopt the 21st report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, another example of the government acting on the McGrath commission report. There will be only three hours of debate before a vote, instead of five, with an extra hour added on Wednesday to facilitate the substitution of Private Members' Business which we know will be helpful.

I have not gone into all the details. The parliamentary secretary, the member for Peace River will in the course of his debate be more specific on the details.

Let me say that the work of my parliamentary secretary, the member for Peace River, has been extraordinary in this whole exercise. Indeed, he has followed a long tradition in this regard.

He was a member of the McGrath commission and as a result is very familiar with the rules. He feels very intensely—as intensely as I or any other member of the House—about the importance of these rules and this institution operating in a business-like fashion. He has done an extraordinary job, and I want to say in this public way how much I appreciate the work he has done. In a very real sense, these changes would not be here but for the work he has done in this regard.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, we live in an extraordinary public environment today where all politicians, particularly those at the federal level, are held in disrepute.

I saw some public polling data the other day which asked people in every province of this country which government they felt closer to, the provincial government or the federal government. Every province was basically the same. About 12 per cent felt closer to the federal government and 78 or 80 per cent felt closer to their provincial governments.

Mr. Milliken: That's because they've had a Conservative government for six years.

Mr. Andre: I heard the member for Kingston and the Islands say it is all due to the fact that one party is in office at this time. I hope that was said in jest. I hope he feels that we do have a sincere, genuine, real problem in this country with respect to how people treat and feel about this institution, and how they feel about us. I hope he shares my view that that is very much a part—not the total—of the constitutional problems, the lack of unity that is evidencing itself throughout this country.

I hope he feels, as I do, that it is important that we not trivialize these debates over rules and this debate in the House of Commons by excessive partisanship and extreme language about motives.

I hope he feels that we do not need any more the extremes of our adversarial system. What we need is more evidence to show to the Canadian public that we can work together, that in the end, we have an interest first and foremost in this Parliament as opposed to our particularly partisan advantage.

These rule changes were negotiated in good faith. I outlined the history of what happened. There was every indication that there was a high level of consensus and agreement. That is why we proceeded with them and that is why we are proceeding them now.

In a sense, these reforms are stage two of parliamentary reform. The McGrath report was stage one. This is not the be all and end all. I think we need a stage three to reduce the particularly bad and damaging aspects of our adversarial system.

We need to do this with some urgency. We need to recognize that we have a responsibility to this institution and I hope, pray and to a degree expect that after some genuflection towards our partisan instincts, goodwill and common sense will prevail. We will deal with these rules in some reasonable fashion, have them in place and the country will judge and I think see that they work a little better than the rules they are replacing. Hopefully, that will give us the energy to carry on with phase three.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 38, it is my duty to inform the House of the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment: the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier—Official Languages; the hon. member for Edmonton East–The environment; and the hon. member for Saint–Léonard–The economy of Montreal.

We continue the debate with the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

[English]

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, much has been said by the government House leader, but I wanted to refer to a number of passages which I think will clarify some points for members on both sides.

I rose in my place as the opposition House leader and indicated the following to the government leader as well as my colleagues. I wish to quote from those remarks. This is from Hansard February 25, 1991:

> This is the first time that I have been called upon as opposition House leader to co–operate with the government in arranging the business of the House. I want to make it perfectly clear that I hope I shall be in a position to provide this kind of co–operation on most occasions.
> It should be noted, however, that co–operation is very much a two–way street. It is my intention to approach discussions about House business as my predecessors have done in a reasonable and understanding manner, and I expect that the leader of the government in the House will do the same.
> While the underlying assumption in parliamentary democracy is that the majority shall in the end prevail, it is essential as a facet of the process that the minority has the right to express its views in full. This House represents all of the people of this country, including the 57 per cent who did not vote for the government in the last federal election.

I quote those words because we, as the Official Opposition, have attempted at every opportunity to be reasonable, to be pragmatic, to try to facilitate what we believe to be the important business of the House. What are some concrete examples of that? We agreed with the government on the setting of the budget debate. It needed a consent order from this House, which it received from my party and, if I may indicate, co–operation was also forthcoming from the New Democratic Party.

There was speedy passage of the borrowing bill. I believe, if my memory serves me correctly, and I am sure hon. members opposite will jump to their feet and correct me if I am not, it was I who indicated in our discussions that perhaps an extension of the hours might be appropriate in order to give members of my party as well as others an opportunity to debate in full the contents of that particular piece of legislation.

We co–operated in expediting the passage of the agricultural bill, which our critics debated very vigorously in committee, as well as on the floor of the House of Commons. However, due to the pith and substance of that bill they thought it very appropriate that it have passage in order to provide farmers who are in desperate need with some form of financial assistance in the foreseeable future.

In the expediting and completion of the Parliament of Canada Act, my predecessor, the member for Ottawa—Vanier, did a superb job on behalf of our party. We again demonstrated to members opposite our willingness to co–operate and give quick passage of that particular piece of legislation once we received the amendments from the upper House.

• (1620)

The Financial Administration Act was another piece of legislation where members of the Official Opposition co-operated with the government. The passage of the Bretton Woods agreement amendments was another piece of legislation we adhered to.

With the legislation that has come forward from the government, we as the Official Opposition have been reasonable, have been respectful of the majority opposite. We have stated our case and in many instances we have lost the battle in terms of the democratic debate and subsequently, of course, the vote.

I think the record has to show that, notwithstanding the co-operation, we did demonstrate clearly and unequivocally on the floor of the House of Commons that when it came to the proposed rule changes, since assuming my position on or about February 1, 1991, and thereafter in subsequent meetings both privately and public, I have indicated quite clearly to the government members that in no way could we agree with the contents of the proposed rule changes. That is not to suggest that there were not discussions which followed thereafter. In fact, there were discussions that followed thereafter. There was a working committee to look at some of those proposed new changes.

My colleague from Kingston and the Islands has done a superb job, not only with regard to the rule changes, but other matters as it affects the business of this House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dingwall: I had some discussions with the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. I am a bit surprised and in some respects quite offended at the government House leader suggesting and implying that somehow we consented to these rule changes and then at the ninth hour backed off. That is not the case at all.

We said early on, clearly and unequivocally, that we were opposed. Yes, there would be some discussions that would take place with this working committee, but let it be said once and for all that there was no agreement either by myself nor by my predecessor with regard to these proposed rule changes.

I think the record ought to show that very, very clearly, so that no member in this House can have the interpretation which I believe the government House leader tried to imply in his remarks.

I note that he is not here and perhaps it is not appropriate for me to say that in his absence. Nevertheless, I say that in all sincerity.

The presentation by the government House leader endeavours to present the government's amendments to the Standing Orders as being necessary to make Parliament, as he says, "more efficient". The minister might well have borne in mind the words of Professor Franks, the founding chair of the Canadian Study of Parliament Group when he wrote, and I quote:

> Reform of Parliament is not simply a technical matter of making Parliament more effective and more efficient, although it is often presented in those terms. Reform is also a question of the purposes for which political power is to be used in Canada and how various interests and viewpoints succeed and fail to influence political choices and outcomes. The balance between Parliament and government affects the balance between an emphasis on the particular and on the general welfare. There are many collective public goods that can only be provided by government and will only be adequately ensured if a strong voice defending a general public interest is heard in politics. Fundamental and often competing goals of equality, freedom, justice, private and public goods and economic growth and stability must be balanced in the political process.

The government's proposals are heavily weighted towards what it considers to be parliamentary efficiency and effectiveness. The government, unfortunately, has lost sight of the whole picture. There is more to Parliament than the legislative efficiency of its workings.

First, Parliament provides, through the electoral process, the political legitimacy of any government. Second, it provides government with the resources necessary for governing: the authority, the funds, the dollars and the cents if you will. Third, Parliament exists to make the government behave, to be the public's watchdog. Fourth, it is an important function of Parliament to provide an alternative government, that is, to enable the opposition to present its case to the public and to the country. Fifth, Parliament provides a forum for the development of political leadership. Finally, Parliament provides a focus for political communications when its discussions express the mind of the people, informing both society and government of grievances and problems.

There are many more expectations of Parliament than the processing of government legislation. It was the late Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker who put it so well when he said: "Parliament is not a sausage factory".

The government is presenting its package of so-called reforms less than five years after the House embarked on what the Hon. James McGrath called the most ambitious attempt to pursue major and comprehensive reform in the more than 100 year history of the Canadian House of Commons.

Perhaps Professor Franks' more realistic view on the subject commends itself to the House today when he said:

> The record of reforms of the past decades is not one of unblemished success—Many reforms have not accomplished their stated objectives, while others have had unanticipated and undesirable consequences. Reforms that are not solidly grounded in reality are not likely to succeed. Quite the reverse, they are likely to create unlikely and unreal expectations which cannot be met. The resulting failures lead to disillusionment, pessimism, and a loss of legitimacy for the public and for the participants. Constant reform can become as much a habit as immobility and can be as inappropriate a response to problems.

It is with this in mind that I question the appropriateness of the government presenting this package of major changes to our procedure at this time. There has been no general blockage of the legislative mills in recent years. There has been no major blockages of these legislative bills or statutes that have come before us. Even the most offensive and most unpopular bills have been quite readily forced through the House using the existing rules we now have. Nor do I hear any crying out by the populace that their members of Parliament do not spend enough time with them. To the contrary, most of us find that our electors expect us to spend most of our time here in Ottawa attending to the affairs of the nation.

Quite frankly, I suspect that the government's real motivation in presenting this package at this time is merely a matter of what the members of the Cabinet perceive to be convenience. Ministers of the Crown are irked by having to attend the House and by having to answer for their inadequacies. Madam Speaker, I do not have to inform you of the numerous inadequacies on the front bench of that side. By having to report daily to the public who employs them, Parliament is an irritation to these ministers of the Crown. In presenting this package of rule changes, ministers of the Crown are seeking relief.

We, on this side of the House, will not allow Parliament to become a subcommittee of Cabinet. We will not allow that.

The government forgets that the only source of its legitimacy is the House of Commons. It will find that its efforts to denigrate the institution further will only diminish what little public support it has left. It will soon be reminded of the wisdom of that old folks saying: "If it ain't broke don't fix it".

• (1630)

Let us turn now to the specific proposals. First, there is the proposed new parliamentary timetable. There are two facets to the government's proposals, a revised parliamentary calendar and a revised daily sitting times.

Essentially the government is proposing that the House adopt an annual calendar that would see it sit for eight fewer weeks of the year. Eight fewer weeks of the year. The normal Christmas, Easter and summer adjournments would be lengthened. In addition to the mid-trimester breaks in the November and February, the House would have weeks off in May and in October. This would reduce the number of sittings per year to about the number common in the post-second World War period. It is interesting to look at the history of the House calendar to assess whether the government's proposals are much of an improvement to that time.

This is a matter that has gone through many changes. The one constant has been that the House, once called into session, has sat Monday through Friday. Until about 30 years ago, standing committees often met on Saturdays, and for the first 40 years after Confederation, a session typically began in January or February, and continued into the spring, usually until late May or June.

Usually the House would adjourn as a result of a government motion for a week or two to enable members to go home for Easter. On occasions, sessions would begin in November or December, in which case the government motion would provide a few weeks adjournment at Christmas.

On a number of occasions the usual spring prorogation was forgone in order to permit certain committee work to proceed, and the House adjourned pursuant to government motion over the summer.

Earlier in this century, the pressure of business led to late autumn openings of the session becoming more common, with a Christmas adjournment on government motion becoming the norm.

During World War II, and in the post-war years, sessions became longer and adjournments at Christmas, Easter and for the summer, on the basis of a government motion became a source of frustration because of their unpredictability. As early as 1947 there were proposals to establish a regular parliamentary calendar, but these were not acted upon. By the 1960s it was not unusual for the House to sit into August.

The adoption of the present supply system in 1968 with trimesters built into the calendar gave rise again to proposals for a set calendar for sittings. But the guessing game about Christmas, Easter and summer adjournments continued, and on occasion, such as Christmas in 1971, the normal adjournment was missed altogether. It took the long, acrimonious, pointless debates on the question of a summer adjournment in 1980 and 1981 to cause the House finally to act. It has been the conventional wisdom that it was the government that wanted to keep the House sitting to pass legislation and that the opposition wanted it to adjourn.

It is even said that for many years, Mackenzie King resisted improving the air conditioning in the Chamber because he thought the hot and humid Ottawa weather in June and July acted as a legislative catalyst.

This conventional wisdom, however, is based entirely on the wrong-headed, simplistic and anti-democratic view of Parliament as a legislative sausage factory. Any government as slap-happy over closure as this government naturally would be happy to keep the House open even less.

There is that much less time for the opposition to call the government to account. There would be fewer Question Periods to probe the government's inadequacies. There would be fewer opposition days to criticize the government and to put forward ideas. There would be less time for debate and discussion designed to inform the public. I would remind you that the public wish to be informed of all the facts, coming both from the government as well as opposition.

When the House sits less often, it is not the legislative function, it is the watch-dog function that is diminished. The bureaucracy gets its legislation and the public gets the wool pulled further down over its eyes. Ministers of the Crown then have the opportunity to vacate Ottawa and do what they do best, or what they think is best, and that is to be political.

The government makes the argument that members can better serve their constituents by spending more time with them.

If members are to understand fully what their constituents think about the issues of the day or what issues are of particular interest in their own regions, they obviously must spend a great deal of time in direct contact with their electors.

The present parliamentary calendar combined with the excellent facilities made available to members already guarantees that any conscientious member can keep himself or herself fully informed about the issues in their constituency.

Members have always had free postal privileges and for more than 20 years, free telephone privileges. In addition, members have up to 62 round trips by air each year that permits them frequent travel between Ottawa and their constituencies.

An effective member of Parliament does not need an additional eight weeks a year in the constituency to improve upon his or her services. What is needed is the opportunity to pursue constituents' problems or grievances both through private communications with the government and its agencies and through parliamentary processes, including questions, debates, private members' proposals and others.

A further eight-week reduction in the time that Parliament sits can only serve to diminish a member's ability to serve his or her constituency. The government is proposing to give members more time to hear about problems, while on the other hand less opportunity to do anything about these problems.

I heard the government House leader refer to the fact that members wanted to spend additional time with their constituents. I think what members of the general public would want, as was so ably demonstrated during the discussion with regard to the goods and services tax, is not necessarily for members of Parliament to spend more time with their constituents, but to listen to their constituents and thereafter act on their behalf. That is what they want their members of Parliament to do.

The ability of the House of Commons as a whole to call the government to account is also being reduced. The reduction of the normal annual sitting time by eight weeks means that there are 40 fewer days during which the government is obliged to deal with the Question Period. There will be 40 fewer days in which ordinary citizens' petitions may be presented to Parliament.

There will be 40 fewer days in which emergency debates to deal with urgent national development may be proposed, and there will be 40 fewer days in which it is likely that committees will be able to find quorums in order to pursue their business.

There will be 40 more days each year in which the government will be able to function in semi-secrecy. There will be 40 more days for the government to pursue its own hidden agenda, whatever it may be, and 40 more days for the government to escape the public eye and the scrutiny, if you will, of the national media.

The government asserts that its proposed eight fewer weeks a year is designed to make members of Parliament more effective. In fact, this proposal can have no effect other than to make members of Parliament less effective. It represents a 20 per cent dilution of the focus of parliamentary work, and it represents an attempt in my view and in the view of my party of an unpopular government trying to hide its misbehaviour from the people of Canada.

It is not content with reducing the time that the House sits. The government also proposes to make it more difficult for members to be effective when the House is permitted to sit. It proposes to add hours of sitting. That will reduce the time that members have to make adequate preparation for debate, diminish the amount of time available for committee meetings and erode the amount of time available for members to perform the very constituency related duties that the government claims it is so concerned with.

Until very recently, changes in the sitting hours of the House was very slight and came very slowly. After Confederation, the House sat at 3 p.m. on Monday through Friday and since most members lived well over a day's journey from Ottawa, Saturdays were often used for committee meetings.

This was not as leisurely an approach as it appeared because the House did not have automatic time of adjournment and frequently sat into the small hours of the morning. Nonetheless, it left mornings free for constituency work or in the case of ministers, departmental work and members could find the time for a fulsome and unhurried Victorian lunch before settling in for the day's debates. That was years ago. Some members at that time complained that the rigours of late night sittings left them in no condition for the next day's work, but the hours of sitting were unchanged for well over 40 years.

In 1906 the hour of meeting was advanced to 2 p.m. and Wednesday night sittings were eliminated. For 85 years the institutionalized Wednesday evening off has been invaluable to members for meeting their constituents, for dealing with many other non-parliamentary obligations and in the case of those who have brought their young families to Ottawa, for giving them at least one night in seven of something approaching a normal family existence.

For another 20 years the House did not have an automatic adjournment hour, although there was a working arrangement under which the government would usually move the adjournment around 11 p.m.

For the 40 years after World War II there was frequent experimentation with the sitting hours, and most significant and enduring of which was the replacement of Friday evening sittings with Friday morning sittings in order to enable the majority of members to travel to their constituencies for the weekends.

Finally in 1982, all of the often disruptive and counter-productive evening sittings were replaced by morning sittings.

Now the government is proposing to add an hour on a day of government business to each sitting. It is doing this by asking the House to sit earlier on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays and later on Wednesdays and Fridays.

There are some questions as to the validity of replacing days with hours that will be raised later. First, one might take note of the ill-advised proposals for Wednesday evenings and Friday afternoons.

As mentioned earlier, Wednesday evenings have been kept clear of House sitting for 85 years. This has been a recognition that members of Parliament do have extra-parliamentary duties or family responsibilities that require at least one week night to be kept free. Wednesday has virtually for the entirety of this century been institutionalized as the evening embassies, interest groups, regular visiting groups have planned for years ahead to have various events scheduled for that particular evening.

Now the government proposes to create this unnecessary chaos. No doubt there are bureaucrats perhaps in the Prime Minister's Office or elsewhere or some other place who cannot envisage members of Parliament being required in Ottawa some place other than Parliament Hill probably because they themselves are restricted in their undimensional existences.

The proposal to extend the hours on Fridays is even more of a surprise since the present sitting arrangements for Friday are entirely the product of the Conservative backbenchers who a few years ago proposed sitting at 10 a.m. on Fridays and adjourning at 3 p.m. in order to facilitate members keeping constituency engagements on Friday evenings.

The government claims that it needs these additional hours to replace the legislative time it is losing by sitting eight fewer weeks in a year. One might well marvel at the ignorance of the way the House functions on the part of the bureaucrats in the Privy Council Office. Sausage makers may be judged on the number of bangers per hour but legislators think in terms of days and weeks. This proposal I suggest is a foolish government miscalculation and ought to be dropped.

One must not diminish or dismiss so lightly the application of this principle to the so-called opposition days, which are really government days allotted to the business of supply, to permit the opposition to choose the topic for debate. Part of the government's proposal is that the number of so-called opposition days be reduced from 25 to 20. The government argues that the additional sitting hours compensate for the lost days. In fact, the proposal reduces the number of issues that the opposition may raise before being compelled to vote the government the money it requires and needs.

The business of supply is the essential business for which the Crown summons Parliament and the principle of—and I quote— "grievance before supply" is absolutely central to parliamentary democracy. The opposition day system is the main vehicle for the maintenance of this principle and it is absolutely unacceptable for the government to attempt, in the guise of making Parliament more efficient, to bring about a major erosion of the exercise of this principle by reducing the number of grievances that the opposition may raise by some 20 per cent.

There is an even more insidious move by the government buried in those proposed rule changes; that is the proposal that if the government uses its majority to stop the House from sitting when the rules normally require it to sit, the number of opposition days is further reduced. In other words, if the government used its majority to force an adjournment from the end of March to the middle of June, it could do away with virtually all the supply days. That is at the very time that the Main Estimates, the government's principal spending plan for the year, is before the House.

I ask you, Madam Speaker, is that fair? Is that just?

Mr. Peterson: They don't want democracy to work.

Mr. Dingwall: The government is proposing to give itself a vehicle for preventing the House of Commons from giving any consideration at all to its main spending plan.

This strikes at the very purpose of calling Parliament into session at all.

Earlier this year we proposed to the government a modification of the supply rules whereby the allotment of supply days would be determined, not by the calendar but by the nature of the estimates, the nature of the demand for supply that the government at any given time had before Parliament. We felt that this would give the government some much needed flexibility, while protecting the right of Parliament to examine the estimates and to "grievances before supply".

Our proposal disappeared into the great bureaucratic maw, and what came out instead was a proposal that would diminish the absolutely fundamental parliamentary activities.

This is totally unacceptable.

Thus, we see that the government's parliamentary timetable, presented as a vehicle for efficiency and effectiveness, is in fact just another power grab, just another attempt to reduce the means for holding the government to account to Parliament and through Parliament to the people of Canada.

This desire to silence the opposition is reflected not only in the timetable proposals but also in a series of proposals regarding the length of speeches and debates.

Arguing that the reduction in annual sitting days ought to bring about a corresponding reduction in the number of days that are devoted to the already limited-by-rule debates, the government proposes to reduce the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne from eight days to six days.

In its drafting the government has also eliminated the opportunity for the opposition and for a third party to move a second amendment or subamendment, thereby eliminating yet two more opportunities for the confidence of the House in the government to be tested.

The address debate, more colloquially known as the throne speech debate, is a unique event in a session in that it gives members virtually unlimited scope to raise in Parliament all issues that they consider worthy of attention and action.

The session opens with the Speech from the Throne by the Governor General in which the government's priorities are outlined. Government backbenchers then propose an address in reply, thanking the Governor General for his or her speech. The opposition proposes amendments to the address in which issues that it deems require different or greater attention are raised. By the end of the debate, members have had a wide opportunity to deal in general with the state of the nation and are ready to get down to specifics.

In a House which has grown to 300 members, this was a real opportunity for backbenchers in all political parties to come to the House and to express their views during the throne speech debate on a variety of issues, some national, some regional and, yes, some which were of particular significance to their constituency. I recall that in 1980 as a backbencher when we were in government having that opportunity to express the concern of my constituents. It was an opportunity in which I participated and I would recommend very strongly to members of Parliament, of all political parties, that they should also participate. But by reducing the number of days you are prohibiting the number of members of Parliament who have legitimate concerns, not partisan, testy issues where barbs are thrown back and forth, but a real opportunity to lay before their colleagues and members of Parliament real issues of substance and great concern.

I suggest at a time when our country is debating the very structure of what we wish to have in the future, by removing this opportunity for members of Parliament, it will not add in any substantive way to greater understanding, or appreciation of the regions and of the different peoples who make up this great country.

Originally there was no time limit to the address debate and in the first few years after Confederation, the address was sometimes adopted after only one day. The address in the early days was a lengthy one, sometimes with many paragraphs referring to specific government proposals in the Speech from the Throne. These were voted on separately, and amendments were infrequent.

Early in this century the address changed to a single paragraph expressing thanks for the speech and amendments commenting on the inadequacies of the government became more common. The address debate also became lengthier, culminating in a 26-day marathon in 1926 that had to be ended by closure. Originally amendments to the address were not automatically considered non-confidence items and at least twice in 1899 and as late as 1951 amendments were accepted by the government.

In 1959, however, Mr. Speaker Michener ruled that amendments had to directly challenge the government's policies. After the 1926 fiasco pressure mounted for a limitation on the length of the address debate and the establishment of a framework for consideration of amendments.

The present system was adopted in 1960. In recent years governments have drifted away from annual sessions with a result that the present government has now been in office for almost seven years but has permitted the completion of only three address debates.

Thus for years on end members have been deprived of this valuable opportunity to air the issues that concern their electors. Consequently they have been forced to seek other vehicles for putting these matters before the House and there has been a somewhat disruptive effect on the conduct of other business.

Now the government seeks to further institutionalize the reduction of this valuable time, an action that seems likely only to institutionalize the consequences for the length and tone of other debates.

So I ask the government: Where is the rationale, where is the thinking if you want members to go back to their constituencies, meet with their electors, listen to what they have to say but then be denied the right to come to Parliament and to express their views, or a particular view? Where is the logic? There is no logic, none whatsoever.

Similarly, the government proposes to abbreviate the budget debate by two days. In the 19th century there was no formal budget debate. The Minister of Finance made his annual financial statement either on a motion to go into the committee of ways or means or in a committee of ways and means or of supply.

After 1912 the statement was always made on a motion to go into committee of ways and means. There was great reluctance by the House to limit the length of the budget debate since taxation is so fundamental to the role of Parliament. In 1955 the debate was limited to eight days and this was reduced to six in 1960.

The rationale for limiting this debate on the general budgetary policy was that there would still be ample opportunity to debate the specifics in considering the various bills emanating from the budget.

I wish to underline that. The rationale for limiting this debate on the general budgetary policy was that there would still be ample opportunity to debate the specifics in considering the various bills emanating from the budget. I will come to that very briefly.

In 1968, debate on specific ways and means motions was eliminated and the committee on ways and means was abolished. Thenceforth, the six-day budget debate has been on a motion: "That the House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government."

Tax measures cannot be introduced until this general debate is completed, and until 1985 the committee stage of tax bills had to be in a Committee of the Whole. The insistence of the government in 1985 that tax bills be referred to a standing or legislative committee further eroded the focus of the House as a whole on these fundamental fiscal issues.

Now the government is proposing a further reduction in the time the House may spend on its fiscal policies. It not only proposes to reduce the budget date by two days, it also proposes automatic closure after two days debate on any budget-related bill that increases the government's borrowing authority. This is another unacceptable abridgement of Parliament's fundamental role.

Again, I come back to my point. Spend more time with your constituents, yes, but why on the other hand do you want to deprive hard-working members of Parliament—and let us take a minute or two here. There are numerous members of Parliament in all political parties who work very hard, diligently on behalf of their constituents, who do not ask their electors what political partisanship or party they belong to. They represent them all, in most instances very well. And now you say to those members of Parliament in the Throne Speech, you are going to slap two days off; on the budget debate, slap two days off; opposition days you are going to cut to five.

To the casual observer it does not mean anything, it is just a few days off. But we represent people, live people in all regions of this country, and they have particular views and concerns that only members of Parliament who are aware of them can present in a sound, reasonable and rational way.

The government is not content with the abbreviation of the three so-called set pieces, namely the address, the business of supply, and the budget. It is demanding new, more Draconian rules to limit debate on other legislation as well. So it just does not stop there, it goes well beyond.

When the House decided in 1968 that most bills should be referred after second reading to a standing committee rather than to a Committee of the Whole, it was thought that the second reading stage might be treated by members with somewhat less urgency, that many members might prefer to wait until third reading stage when the bill was in its final form before participating in the debate. That did not prove to be the case. Second reading debates frequently continued to be lengthy and after a couple of days of debate, it was noted, tended to be repetitious. In 1982 it was decided that after eight hours of second reading debate, that is after about two sitting days, further speeches would be reduced to 10 minutes. That is the present system.

That was an experiment that appeared to be working, but one which the present government has been generally unwilling to facilitate. Almost no second reading debate has been permitted by this government to pass the eight-hour threshold before this government has invoked some form of closure.

Now the government proposes to reduce the eight-hour period to five hours, about one sitting day. It also proposes to apply this rule not only to second reading, but to the third reading as well.

• (1700)

In addition, the government is removing the provision for a 40 minute speech length for the first spokesperson for the third party and it is eliminating the heretofore unlimited speech length for the first two speakers at third reading.

We do not have to say it in a loud voice. We can say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the people of Canada, that this is a very well thought out package of rule changes. It does the following.

Members of Parliament draw a salary of some $64,000, a $20,000 in tax free allowance, as well as other perks for telephones, postage, office and staff. I think it would be safe to say that we would average roughly $100,000 a year in income or thereabouts. We are now being told by the government opposite that we will be paid that sum of money not to be in Ottawa for 235 days. When we are here, the government does not want us to talk too often. It does not want us to participate in the budgetary debate of the Minister of Finance. It does not want us to participate in the Speech from the Throne.

Opposition days will be reduced by 20 per cent. Individual statutes, some of which you have expressed great concern and interest over the many years that you have served in this Chamber, members of parliament will be cut off on second reading and will be cut off on third reading.

If the general public does not understand what is taking place, I want to say that this is taking place 18 months before the next federal election. Do you see what is happening? This is an attempt by a government that is so low in the polls to put together a package which would enable them in some way to allow their colleagues, their members, to go to their constituencies in the hope that they might be able to soothe the anger, the frustration, the disappointment, the contempt that the general public has for them, their leader and their party.

An hon. member: They are wasting their time.

Mr. Dingwall: As my colleague from Newfoundland, a distinguished House leader in that assembly, said just a moment ago: "They will never do it. It is not going to work". It is just not going to work. Canadians must realize that this is a contrived document. I suggest it came from the Privy Council Office, the Prime Minister's Office and, of course, the government House leader and his very able—and I want to underline this—parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, very able, but misguided in every way.

There is little justification for any of these proposals. The elimination of the 40 minute provision for the third party's principal spokesperson is, in my view, and I say to my colleague of the New Democratic Party, peevish and it is petty and a removal of the unlimited time for the principal speakers from the government and opposition at third reading is unnecessary and probably in the long term will prove to be counter productive.

It is at the third reading stage that the House finally has before it the bill in the form in which it is to be passed. This is the only opportunity on which either the government or the opposition has to comment fully on the bill and all of the issues and circumstances pertaining to it. The unlimited time provisions are virtually never abused. In fact, it is a short-sighted government that proposes to do away with it. I do not think it is necessary to give that up. All that will happen is that more speakers will want to speak longer. Rather than improve the quality of the debate, this proposal will unfocus it.

Keep in mind, that it is a part of the grand strategy to tell members of Parliament, representatives of the respective political parties, that: Yes, you have a complete statute before you, a complete bill before you, with various amendments, and after it goes to committee, second reading, third reading, report stage, the whole works and it comes back and you want to have ample opportunity as say the Leader of the Opposition or party spokesperson, the government does not want to do that.

Even with all of these incursions into members' time, the government opposite is still not satisfied. It is not enough for them to reduce the number of supply days, it is not sufficient to cut off the budget debate, it will not do to sacrifice 25 per cent of the address debate, even the premature shortening of the speeches at second and third reading will not satisfy the government's appetite for beating up on members of Parliament. It needs something else. It needs a streamlined time allocation rule as well.

When time allocation rules were adopted by the House in 1969 it was written into their text a device to discourage governments from unilateral action. If the government could reach agreement with all of the parties, it could move a time allocation order without notice and see it decided without debate. If it had a majority of the parties but not all of them it could proceed without notice, but the order would be subject to a two-hour debate. In cases where it did not have the agreement of a majority of the parties, the government would have to give a day's notice before the two-hour debate.

These safety valves have not been onerous. Successive governments have not been inhibited from using the time allocation rules and members of the present government uses them almost as often as they change their own socks.

Nonetheless, the Conservatives are an impatient lot and they find it hard to live with the fact that the day on which a time allocation motion is debated cannot be counted as a day within the allotted time.

Now the government proposes to make all time allocation motions non-debatable and to make the day on which such an order is adopted count as a day within the allocation. This will save the government a whole two-hour debate. It will accelerate the passage of the bill by one calendar day or perhaps two if time allocation is used both before and after committee. What it removes, however, is any inhibition of the government attempting to ram legislation, no matter how undesirable or unpopular, down the people's throats. It will also remove any inducement for the opposition to co-operate in any way with the government in moving its program forward. Making time allocation easier for this government is like giving an alcoholic the keys to a distillery.

The government will find, more and more, that it is compelled to use the rules rather than other forms of persuasion. On legislative items that might otherwise have been passed after a moderate amount of debate will not proceed unless the government uses the rules that it seeks to make more convenient. These rules, to which the government now too readily turns for relief, will have to be depended upon in the normal course of events. Without co-operation from the other parties, the overall progress of the legislation will be slowed by the constant invoking of the rules that were meant to be used only in exceptional cases.

Earlier, it was mentioned that at least some of the motivation for these proposals at this time was pettiness and peevishness. The government's motion contains a number of proposals for which there can be no other explanation. For example, there is a proposal that the loss of a quorum should mean only that the House adjourn for the day and that the item under consideration not disappear from the Order Paper, unless restored later. A government with a majority has a responsibility to keep the House open and it should be prepared to pay a price for not being able to live up to that responsibility.

A government with a majority should be able to keep 12 per cent of its members in the House to keep its business moving and, if it cannot, it should not be able to get off with so light a penalty as merely having the House adjourn for the rest of the day. Similarly, moving the axing hour of closure from 1 a.m. to 11 p.m. merely serves to make Parliament's most unseemly rule even less severe. A government desiring to use the guillotine of guillotines should be forced to keep the House open to a very late hour, not merely to give more time to the debate that is due to be cut off, but also to provide more disincentive to the use of this severe rule.

The proposal for which there appears to be no explanation at all is the closing of the Notice Paper at 2 p.m. on Fridays. This comes in a package that proposes to keep the House open until 4 p.m. on Friday. Surely the Notice Paper ought to be open as long as the House is sitting. This proposal must come from the bureaucrats or politicians interested in political games. Nevertheless, does it add anything to the facilitation of government business? Does it add anything to the principles of natural justice where in any court of law, where before any tribunal, quasi-judicial or otherwise, one would be given an opportunity to have notice and the government wants to slam it down at 2 p.m. as opposed to 4 p.m.?

I want to be candid with all members of this Chamber. There are some proposals in this package that are either acceptable or could be acceptable in other circumstances. For example, the government is proposing that the introduction and first reading of all bills be deemed to have taken place after notice. That is, no vote be permitted on the introduction and first reading of any bill.

It has always been a principle of our party that every member of the House should have an unfettered right to bring in a bill. The first reading stage is merely an offer to print a bill and its adoption at first reading in no way implies approval of the substance of that bill.

The circumstances in which this proposal is being made, however, make it more difficult to support it. The government is attempting in this package to cut off as many vehicles as possible for which members may voice their constituents' discontent. When legitimate channels for grievances are blocked, the grievances will find less constructive routes for their expression.

On occasion forcing a vote on the first reading of a bill has been that route. The government in proposing to make that stage non-votable is blocking a comparatively harmless safety valve for the House of Commons. It will find that the grievances will be channelled elsewhere, quite properly and probably along an even less agreeable route.

A similar proposal is the provision enabling the government to do by notice what it heretofore has had to do by special order in arranging the presentation of the budget. The government's proposal is rather loosely worded and may lend itself to manipulation. I would not want to leave the impression that the government opposite would want to manipulate the workings of the House of Commons. I would not want to suggest that, but I am sure other commentators would, Mr. Speaker, as I am sure you can refer to them at length. In itself it does not appear to impair the functioning of the House.

The government is also proposing some refinements of the process of recording divisions. It has only been a few years since the House began to defer divisions and it is natural that we should now be considering some revisions to this process.

Similarly, the specific ending of the possibility of repetitive ringing of bells when the House is involved with successive divisions merely reflects what has become the common practice of the House today. The whole process of recording votes in the House has been unsatisfactory to most members for some time. The McGrath committee recommendations were not fully acted upon and there have been other recommendations over the years that also bear further examination.

Finally, the government is proposing a process that would formalize pairing. In previous years pairing was quite common and members often took the time of the House to record them. My party, as of this moment, has not decided to accept the principle of pairing, but if other parties in the House so choose it is willing to let them record their pairs as they so desire.

The government package does contain a number of quite positive measures. First, there are refinements to the process of the adjournment debates, the so-called late shows. These refinements will allow more members to participate, will allow more current topics to be discussed, and will provide some resources for members to whom the government refuses answers to written questions on the Order Paper.

Similarly, the government has taken a positive step in proposing that motions dealing with Senate amendments to the bills be put on the Notice Paper. This will greatly facilitate the House in dealing with matters that are frequently quite complex and very technical.

Finally, the government is to be congratulated for continuing the process of modernization of the handling of the Private Members' Business. This began with the McGrath report and now the government seeks to make permanent the refinements recommended by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On that note, I wish to thank publicly on the floor of this House of Commons the superb work done by my colleague from Kingston and the Islands with regard to that.

Another proposal the government makes that is rather intriguing is its proposed new Standing Order 56.1. The government seeks to circumvent the awkward and downright debilitating doctrine of unanimous consent.

For many years the House of Commons has used this doctrine to circumvent its rules, usually those involving notice. If nobody present objects, then it is considered fair to ignore the normal rules and proceed on the grounds of expediency.

There are some proceduralists who have always questioned the doctrine of unanimous consent on the grounds that, since the request for leave to circumvent the rules is usually in itself done without notice, the rights of members absent to be protected by the rules are subverted by the doctrine itself.

The government proposal goes a long way to correct this error. The government may have been motivated by a desire to avoid being obstructed by one or two members when the leadership of all groups in the House have agreed, but what it has come up with is, in fact, a considerable improvement, in my view.

Under the circumstances in which the government is proposing this rule, it is not improbable that unanimous consent on the spur of the moment will be less easily obtained, but this proposed rule offers a compromise, a method whereby a form of notice is in fact provided, and a fail-safe whereby a reasonably small number of members, at a time when attendance is usually high, may prevent the circumvention of the rules.

The remaining area of procedure that the government deals with in its proposal concerns the working of committees. This is a subject that has been actively discussed by members at least for the last 20 years in the House and is likely to continue the evolution of the committee system for many years to come.

In the post-Confederation period, there were only a handful of standing committees, each of which consisted of several dozen members and none of which did much more than consider the merits of proposed private bills, a procedure that occupied a great deal of parliamentary time before general laws concerning incorporation, transportation, communications, et cetera, were enacted. From time to time standing or special committees conducted special investigations of issues, but only at the initiation of the House itself.

Any bill that was referred to a standing or special committee still had to follow the regular legislative process, including a committee of the whole stage.

Gradually, the memberships of the standing committees were reduced to more workable sizes and, commencing in the mid-1950s, estimates were referred to standing committees for detailed study, although the estimates still had to be examined by the committee of supply as well.

In 1968, the foundations of the modern committee system were established with the procedural reforms that sent all estimates to standing committees and abolished the committee of supply and also sent most bills to standing committees rather than to the committee of the whole. The number of subject matter investigations increased as well.

Over the years the standing committees have continued to evolve. Their powers have been more clearly defined and enhanced and they have gained real roles in both the legislative and policy development processes. Many members, especially backbenchers on both sides of the House find that their most gratifying work comes in the less formal and less partisan form of committees. These bodies, however, are creatures of the House and inevitably reflect the political conflicts that preoccupy the House as a whole.

Until recently the government and opposition alike had no problem staffing committees. In the last 18 months, however, the political situation in the country has made, in my view, the government's backbenchers less willing to spend time on committees, thus making the task of the government whip in maintaining the government majority on committees far more difficult.

The response of the whips on the government side last autumn was to attempt to force a radical reduction in the size of the committees, thus reducing the number of government backbencher bodies that would have to be produced for any given committee meeting. The opposition parties whose members remain as eager as ever to participate in committees resisted this unfair reduction in opportunities for committee membership.

The result was that the September report of the Striking Committee was never concurred. The functioning of the committee system has been impaired since that time.

The government proposal for the committee system leans heavily to the government side. In order to rationalize the staffing and meeting of committees, committees are placed in five envelopes containing the number of specialized standing committees and two legislative committees. Each envelope of committees will have certain dedicated rooms and priorities will be clearly established, so we are told.

Legislation will go either to a standing or legislative committee after second reading, depending on the workload and the issues before the various committees. In discussions over the winter the House leaders and whips have agreed on the size of the committees and taken together with the envelope system, it is hoped that the differing point of view will be reconciled. I suggest that only time will tell whether it can be reconciled.

There are a number of general considerations, however, that the proposals for committees bring to the forefront.

First, there is the question of minority reports. The government proposes to place in the rules the right to amend minority reports and to comment on them when the report is presented to the House.

Second, the question of broadcasting committees. The proposed new rules for the first time mention this possibility but do so in such a way that the possibility of such broadcasting may actually be reduced. A government like the present one which is so desperate in the polls may actually use these rules to retard the progress in this particular regard.

Third, the question arises as to how the proposed new Standing Committee on House Management can deal effectively with its heavy burden. This committee is to function as the Striking Committee, the Management and Members Services Committee, and the Privileges and Elections Committee. It is to be a comparatively small committee and it is to accept the burden of staffing other committees, bird-dogging the administration of the House of Commons, operating the complex system of Private Members' Business, considering ongoing questions of procedure and electoral reform, and dealing with any matter of privilege or contempt that may come along.

This is an awesome burden for any committee, especially one that is going to be rather small. It is likely to be dominated by very senior members and there is a serious danger—and I do not wish to imply the motives of anyone because that would be totally inappropriate—that it will tend to operate unduly in closed and even secretive ways. I am talking about in-camera sessions.

The potential for making the House of Commons look as if it is an Old Boys Club is a real one with this kind of proposal, and consideration will have to be given to a less exclusive approach to dealing with the matters proposed for this particular committee.

If not, the charge will be made and the perception I suggest could become reality within a very short period of time.

Finally, there is the question of the witnesses that may be heard by committees on bills.

The proposed new rule refers to these committees being permitted to hear only, and I quote: "technical witnesses". The government seems to think that only government departments and agencies can provide witnesses with sufficient technical knowledge to assist committees in the legislative process.

That means if a bill is referred to a legislative committee, members would only have the right to summon before it individuals within the bureaucracy or the department to give a specific explanation of how the law or the statute is read, hence classifying that individual as a technical witness.

I suggest that is very unfair. A lot of the time and on a lot of occasions, members of Parliament need the assistance of those groups and individuals who are the victims or the beneficiaries of the legislation to explain how it will actually work. It is a different perspective and it is a different view, but on many occasions they are very helpful.

For instance, I remember when we were debating Bill C–21, the Pharmaceutical Act, some years back and both we as opposition parties and the government summoned experts from across the country. They were able to amplify, not only the meaning of the technical language, but its far–reaching effects; not only in three months or six months, but in two or three years. Of course, you always have jurisprudence. You may have common law or decisions reached in other countries which may have a particular effect on our legislation. There may be some judicial decisions before the courts. To limit ourselves as members of Parliament to quote technical witnesses and restricting what a technical witness can be, I think we hamper substantially, the work that members would want to do in terms of improving a particular piece of legislation.

The opposition fully understands that the community at large has many technically competent persons who are not only able, but also are very much needed by any committee on a variety of legislation. Government officials cannot possibly possess adequate expertise to help a committee assess the impact of any piece of legislation. Business, labour, interest groups and academics, potential beneficiaries and potential victims of legislation will all be able to provide the kind of technical assistance that committees require on legislation.

Any ill–conceived attempt by the government to narrow this definition will not merely lead to political difficulty in the House of Commons, it will lead to further public frustration of being shut out of government. That, unfortunately, is the real thrust of the government's proposed rule changes. The real impact is to shut people out of government.

So much for the Prime Minister's statements of an open government. The government must think it clever to claim that its package is intended to do the opposite. It claims that it will give members more time in their constituencies to interact with the people. What it is really doing is reducing both the time and the opportunities for members to try to do something on behalf of those very people.

The government claims its package is designed to enhance the reputation of Parliament. Yet, virtually every one of its proposals is intended to de–fang Parliament. To make it more difficult for Parliament to deal with the issues that concern the people of Canada. All the government will achieve with these proposals is to frustrate Parliament.

• (1730)

It can be sure that the frustration will gain expression most probably, Mr. Speaker,—I say this to you, Sir, being cognizant of the many years that you have spent in this House—in some unforeseen way that is highly unlikely to enhance the reputation of Parliament, let alone the Government of Canada.

The government proposes to deal with a number of procedural issues that simply do not cry out for change, except that in responding to the people they create inconveniences for the government.

Even in cases where the government makes proposals that do need further procedural evolution, the government is acting in a pre–emptory manner or, in the case of the committee system, planting the seeds for future efforts to shut people out.

I wish to be clear on behalf of my party that we are opposed to this package of rule changes and have said so consistently.

I listened to the government House leader talk about the effectiveness in Parliament, the efficiency of Parliament and the cynicism of the Canadian people. He suggested having fewer sitting days because other countries have fewer sitting days than we do, but he did not talk about the geography of Canada. He did not talk about how Canadians are displaced all across this great country. Basically, we have a small population; hence the need for further dialogue and debate, and better appreciation and understanding of different viewpoints.

He makes reference to other countries. As I said earlier in my remarks, it is part of the grand strategy to shut Parliament down.

For a moment, let's talk about the national media. What will it do to the national media in this country? It has a role to play. Sometimes it is not very complimentary to the government and sometimes it is not very complimentary to the opposition. Nevertheless, we live in a free and democratic society and the media has the right to probe, to make ministers accountable for various speeches that they may give across the country.

By shutting down Parliament and by having us sit 40 fewer days, if you will, that will deny the media real access to ministers of the Crown. It will preclude us as members of Parliament to raise issues on the floor of the House of Commons which enable Canadians, through the media, to understand what is going on whether they be valid points of opposition or not. The Canadian people will judge.

Canadians are cynical, yes. They are very cynical about the government. They do not want their members of Parliament to be in their constituencies listening on the weekend in the coffee shops, in their constituency office, at a Rotary Club or a business luncheon or at an ethnic group sitting.

That is not what Canadians want. It is part of the equation. It is a very important but small part. Canadians want their members of Parliament to act on their behalf. What better example of hypocrisy of the government House leader and the government opposite than the goods and services tax?

Every Canadian I have talked to in my constituency, every small business person, everyone who pays taxes in this country—we have had some unprecedented levels in tax increases with this particular government—have opposed the goods and services tax.

They have petitioned members of Parliament. They have petitioned ministers of the Crown. We have had a lengthy debate in the House. We have had a lengthy debate in the Senate. We have had committees travel this country and what has happened? The government has said: "Up yours, we are not going to listen". So what is this argument, this smokescreen of spending more time so we can find out the problems? That is fine, but what are we going to do about the problems? The Conservatives did nothing with regard to the GST. It had 57 per cent of the Canadian population against it in the last federal election. It has many economic measures which are opposed by labour groups, by various regions in this country, whether it be health care, whether it be post-secondary education, a whole host of things.

The argument is being made and written by some of the editorial writers in this country that Parliament will become more efficient, that yes, it is wise to send members to their constituencies. No one has said it is not wise to send members to their constituencies, but do they ever stop and think that a government has to act when it talks and when it listens to people? This government does not listen to people because if it did, it would not be where it is in the polls today.

I find it rather shocking and disturbing that the government House leader would come forward today and say: "Canadians are cynical". Do not paint every politician, every political party with the same brush. We are the ones who opposed the free trade agreement. We are the ones who opposed the goods and services tax. We are the ones who opposed the cutbacks with regard to health care in this country, with regard to post-secondary education. We are the ones who opposed the cutbacks to VIA Rail, the privatization of some of our Crown corporations. We are the ones who opposed the unprecedented level of higher taxation in this country.

This government has not listened. Do not tell me, do not tell my party and certainly do not tell the Canadian people that all of a sudden the Conservatives have taken a shower and all of the toxics inside have now come out and have gone and that they are going to start listening to Canadians because they are 18 months before a general federal election. Let us not be cynical, Mr. government House leader. Let us not be cynical. Let us be candid. Let us be realistic. Let us be pragmatic. Let us be honest with ourselves that these rule changes are not in the best interest of Parliament. They may be in the best interest of a few ministers of the Crown and maybe a few backbenchers on the other side who wish to get to the constituencies a little bit more often.

Surely to God we can work out systems within our respective caucuses to allow members of Parliament, if the need be, to spend more time in their constituencies if the issues and the subject matter arise. That is the real crux of the problem that we are facing here today.

People are not demanding to speak to their MPs. They are demanding positive action on their behalf. As a result, they want to have their members of Parliament whom they believe, by and large—I do not know of any public opinion poll that would substantiate this sentence—but I think most constituents understand that their member of Parliament, whoever he or she may be, whatever political party, is working very hard on their behalf. They also believe that we are paid a fairly good wage. To get that wage the government is now telling us: "You will get that big salary but you are going to spend 235 days in your constituency".

What is going to happen, Mr. Speaker, if these rule changes pass? There are a number of scenarios. You are in for three weeks and you are off for one. Members of Parliament are in their constituencies. They come to Ottawa. We have an extra hour of debate every day on government business. We have sessions on Wednesday. We have a committee system which is quite different. Some changes have evolved there.

Do you think committees are going to be sitting those three weeks, Mr. Speaker? Do you honestly believe that those standing committees of the House of Commons are going to sit on a regular basis?

I would venture to say that they will be scheduled to sit, but because of other demands, because members are being circumvented in terms of making presentations here before the House of Commons, we will have very little opportunity to participate in meaningful ways in committees. That is not to suggest that they will never meet. They will meet. There is no question about that. But what will be flawed, is: do not meet tonight, do not meet tomorrow, you can meet while you have the week off. So the three weeks are up. You have the week off to be in your constituency, or you can be in a committee in Ottawa. You know what is going to happen. Members will have to go back to their constituencies because they will tell people for three weeks that they have to be in Ottawa but they have a week off and will be back.

Where does the committee work go? Where does the examination of the estimates end up? Will there be a focus in committee? Some, yes, but perhaps for many, no. Members will be torn, they will be torn: stay in Ottawa, participate on special committees, legislative committees, standing committees, or go back to their constituencies because they have been told by the government that is the week you spend in your constituency so that you can listen to your constituents.

It all fits. It is just like putting your hand into a leather glove. The scenario is very, very smart, if you want to choke off debate in Parliament, if you want to provide less time for ministers of the Crown to be accountable to the opposition parties and to the national media and to the interest groups across this country, less time for those of us in opposition to be the public watchdog as to what is taking place with regard to the government activities of the day; less debate on the budget; fewer opposition days; less debate on the Speech from the Throne; less opportunities with regard to second reading on a particular piece of legislation; less opportunity to speak on third reading of a particular bill; a more effective—if you will—time allocation rule for the government, not the opposition; committees which will meet or may not meet.

It is a pretty neat, sophisticated package. A neat package for a government that is in political trouble. I say to members opposite: "This will not save you. What will save you in the next election is if you were to listen to the Canadian people".

Members who are here with me today make the point that it is too late. It is too late for members opposite to change their ways, to correct their sins of the past. But perhaps they ought to try. Perhaps they ought to try to do the democratic thing that they talked so much about from 1984 to 1988. Perhaps they ought to try to give members of Parliament greater latitude in discussing the various issues of the day. My colleague, the member for Kingston and the Islands, and I think other members, have alluded to the government that not every motion that comes before the House has to be a non-confidence motion on every occasion. We understand the realities of quorum and people, et cetera, being here. We could accommodate that. But they do not want to hear that. They believe that just by getting back to their constituencies for that week, that will be able to resolve their political difficulties. I am afraid they will be sadly disappointed after the next federal election when the hon. Jean Chrétien and the Liberal Party of Canada become the governing party in this country.

Mr. Hockin: I doubt that.

Mr. Dingwall: Hon. members say they doubt that. Perhaps if they are true to their conviction, and I see the minister for small business who has particular responsibilities in an area that I represent in the Parliament of Canada, and I say this in a kind of shy way because I am kind of shy, but if the minister really believes that his policies are so good, if he really, really believes that his privileged status as a minister of the Crown has endeared him to the people of Canada, why does he not try to convince his colleagues in cabinet to do an honourable thing and we will have a little vote. If you do not want to call a general election just have a little vote in your constituency and winner takes all. Better still, have a vote in my constituency and the winner takes all as to whether or not they have confidence in the hon. member opposite or whether they have confidence in this hon. member who represents the constituency of Cape Breton—East Richmond.

I suggest that the minister opposite, who has a privileged status—and I underline that—earned but, nevertheless, status. Not only does he get $64,000 a year, not only does he get $20,000 in tax-free allowance, he is a cabinet minister and they make the big bucks. They get the chauffeurs to the car, they get all the deputies, they get all the assistants and they get all the big invitations.

I say to that hon. minister, run. Let us have an election and winner takes all. You will see that the sins of the past and your present attitudes toward various policies which exist at the present time and your attitude with trying to choke off the democratic ways, the House of Commons will not meet the test that Canadians expect of parliamentarians in the next election.

An hon. member: I win when I run.

Mr. Dingwall: The hon. member says he wins when he runs. Well, I have just given him an opportunity. If he is so believes and has conviction that they are running such a wonderful government and that these rule changes meet the test of the Canadian people, perhaps he should put something on the line. I say that somewhat in jest because I know hon. members opposite do not want to go to the polls. They are hoping by some miracle that the phoenix will arrive from the ashes and that Mulroney will do an about face and become popular among the Canadian people. Quite frankly, that will not take place.

In closing, I wish to say that the two—

An hon. member: Not yet.

Mr. Dingwall: If the hon. member wishes me to speak longer I will accommodate him and I will speak longer. If he is enjoying my intervention that much, I will try to accommodate for a while yet. I want to thank the hon. member for his vote of confidence.

I have another speech, but there are two points. I indicated to the government House leader and I indicated to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader that we, the Liberal Party of Canada, were opposed to these rule changes both privately and publicly. I indicated to them quite clearly that there ought to be a process. Let us move from the substance and let us go to the process. It is all well and good for individuals to have some discussions with regard to rule changes, but I have indicated clearly to him that we should have a standing committee, perhaps a special committee.

In fact, my colleague for Kingston and the Islands even made the intervention at one of our meetings with regard to having the whole matter referred to the Standing Committee on Elections and Privileges in order that we may examine, have witnesses come in, have Canadians see and be consulted. That was not to be. We have asked for a special committee of members of Parliament, not necessarily to travel the country or go to other jurisdictions, but perhaps to bring people here and discuss these in a reasonable manner if in fact rules have to be amended and changed. That was denied.

What was given by the government was a mere discussion of some of the rules by a working group which I believe the parliamentary secretary, my colleague from Kingston and the Islands, and a senior member of my staff had. But there have been no "substantive changes with regard to their proposals". They have backed off a few things, but nothing overly substantive that could cause a reasonable person to conclude that this package is in the best interest of Parliament, of parliamentarians, or of the Canadian people.

They score very low in terms of process and in terms of substance. So the cliche that has been used in this House on many occasions, the Old Boys Club, is the route that they elected. That is the route that they follow, but they were told along the piece at all times that there was no deal. I know—this may sound unfair and I hope members will forgive me—that the government House leader was the minister responsible for Bill C-21, amendments to the Pharmaceutical Act.

I do not know if he has a cold or is on some form of drug, or whatever it is, but he has certainly forgotten some of the facts as I have enunciated them here today. Some have suggested that he has used bully-boy tactics. I leave that for others to discuss at another time. But let it be clear that we oppose these rules. We will debate them in the weeks ahead, Mr. Speaker, and I see you nodding your head and you are in agreement as well and I am sure you would want to participate and I welcome your participation because as a distinguished member of this House you, too, realize as I am sure many members do how Draconian and how terrible this package of rules is for Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I accordingly move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands:

> That the motion be amended in the first paragraph by deleting proposed amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 12, 16, 17, 21, 25, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, and 45 and by deleting section 73(5) in proposed amendment numbered 24.

Mr. Speaker, I was intending to sit down but since the hon. member opposite has wanted me to speak for another period of time I want to accommodate him because it is not often that I get a chance to speak in this Chamber, particularly on a subject which is so vital to our deliberations here.

I know the hon. member opposite who made that statement is a long-standing member of the House of Commons and he, too, will probably want to participate in the debate over the next number of weeks as we approach June, and that he would want me to put other items on the record.

I want to assure him that there are many members of my party who will now want to speak, particularly after the interventions which have been made by the government House leader. I know my colleague from Kingston and the Islands and the member for Ottawa Vanier will want to participate at length and they will have other things to say. I do not want to disappoint the hon. member, but I want to tell him that they will have, shall we say, an enlightened view on some of the proposed rule changes, perhaps very similar to the views that I have expressed here today. I hope that he would be in the Chamber and afford them the same kind of opportunities and courtesies by listening to their interventions which we believe, and which we know, will add a great deal to this particular debate on a very important subject matter.

Finally, I want to say thank you to my colleague from Kingston and the Islands and to members of my staff who reviewed this legislation. But I want to thank the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader and the chief government Whip for their deliberations on this particular subject matter. I know in my heart of hearts that way deep down, both those hon. members know very well that these rule changes are wrong, and probably on Wednesday when they go to caucus they will stand in their place and echo the sentiments that we are echoing on this side of the House: No, no, no to these rule changes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I find the amendment moved by the hon. member to be in order.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I must say we enjoyed listening to that exhaustive examination of the proposed changes to the rules of the House. Now, of course, we are debating government motion No. 30, rules of the House of Commons and changes to the Standing Orders.

It sounds very straightforward and perhaps rather inconsequential in many respects to those listening to the debates and watching the discussions. Thirty pages in our books, 64 different clauses. Let's face it, there is quite a range of issues here, some very trivial issues that simply needed to be brought up to date in terms of the modernization of dealing with the legislative material.

Others have touches of totalitarianism associated with them, major changes in terms of how the House of Commons operates.

Perhaps it is not by mistake. You will notice how it is dark over the House of Commons today. When you look out the windows there is a dark cloud hanging over the House of Commons. It is symbolic, I might add, in terms of the dark cloud that hangs over the Parliament of Canada and the dark cloud, indeed, that is hanging over parliamentary democracy as we know it in this country.

I must say that what we are debating today is perhaps one of the most important issues that we will debate in this House for the next number of weeks and months. Today, when the Prime Minister introduced the President of Mexico, he referred to the House of Commons as the "crucible of parliamentary democracy". When the President of Mexico spoke, he referred to this House as "the House of democracy in which is determined the will of the people of Canada".

This is a crucial House of debate. This is where the duly elected representatives of the people of Canada come to reflect the views of their constituents and reflect their views as elected people regarding government policy and government programs. We were asked to study and to examine these government policies, programs and proposals, to examine their impact on different regions of the country and on different groups within our society, whether it was the free trade agreement or the goods and services tax. I refer to these as perhaps two of the largest and most important pieces of legislation we have had a chance to discuss in this House in the past number of months.

I think all of us, certainly the people of Canada, would recognize that it is very important we debate issues that the government of the day brings forward and that we examine legislation in detail, that we hold the government accountable for its deeds or for its actions or for the various acts of individual cabinet ministers. We have seen over the past number of months, as a result of that accountability, whole sets of ministers of the cabinet have had to resign or have seen fit to resign.

The government House leader spoke of the anger and frustration of the electorate and the fact that they hold members of Parliament or politicians, generally, in contempt. May I suggest that one of the many reasons for that is that people feel a sense of powerlessness. They have strong views on certain issues, whether it is the GST or the free trade agreement, and they bring it to their members of Parliament. They raise their issues at parliamentary committees or through other avenues, and the government totally ignores them.

When a government House leader says that it is important for members of Parliament to go back to listen to their constituents, we all know that constituents have been saying to members of the government for months and months on end: "Do not proceed with the goods and services tax", in every constituency across the country. Those of us in opposition have risen to reflect the views of our constituents. Many of us on dozens and dozens, and perhaps hundreds of occasions, have reflected their views that this tax is punitive, cruel and mean and is the wrong tax to be bringing in at this time.

I look across the aisle and I know that some of my friends on the government benches hold meetings in their constituencies and they are publicized. The media attends and reflects the mood of the constituents and the questions being raised. Once again, hundreds of thousands of people have registered their opposition to the goods and services tax or to the free trade agreement or to the changes to the unemployment insurance legislation, and the government just ignores their concerns.

Some hon. members: They are not listening.

Mr. Riis: No wonder people are frustrated. No wonder the electorate feels that the government does not care, because it has not shown in any way, shape or form that they, in fact, do care about what the people who elected them are concerned about.

I think people are saying that they are fed up with government arrogance. What they call this government, essentially, is an elected dictatorship, where the government is elected for a period of time and it feels it has the mandate to do anything it wishes. It does not matter that the programs and policies it is introducing was not discussed or raised during the last federal campaign.

As a matter of fact, I think it was the present Minister for International Trade who said, not many weeks before the last campaign that: "We could not tell the people of Canada what we were going to do, because if we did, no one would elect us". So, obviously, they fooled the people of Canada. They did not say: "If we are elected, we are going to introduce the goods and services tax".

So when the government House leader says that Parliament must be reformed, I must say that we can have all the rules in the world and unless the will is there, it is not going to change behaviour. We know that as parliamentarians. We can have all the rules and regulations of the House, but unless there is a will to make this place work properly, it will not work properly. We know that as parents. You can have all the rules for your children that you want, but unless there is a will, if you like, to do the appropriate thing, to act appropriately, to conduct your business in ways according to accepted traditions, it does not take place.

That is why I say, if the government is hoping that this type of parliamentary reform they are now introducing, and will eventually jam through the House of Commons, because again they will have to use the heavy hand of closure to get their way.

This is not going to change the situation if the government continues to ignore the people of Canada. What we see month after month and year after year, we hear people speaking out. Why is it so critical that we have an opportunity to discuss these issues in depth?

I want to use one example. When the government brought in the idea that we should de-index pensions, it said: "We should de-index the pensions of all those people who collect old age security." In other words, we should erode those pensions over time.

The opposition said: "We have got to let the people of Canada know what this is going to do. We have to let pensioners and future pensioners know what the impact of this legislation is all about." We debated the issue day after day, and slowly the people of Canada recognized what the government was attempting to do. It was going to erode the pension system of Canada, and the people spoke out.

The Prime Minister, to give him credit, said that the government was wrong, that it should not have done that. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, under these new rules with the government's ability to move legislation through quickly, the people of Canada would not have a chance to react, those pensions would have been de-indexed and the pensioners of this country would see their pensions erode.

That is why we say we want the opportunity to examine legislation, to study it and to invite experts and other people from the outside to come in and look at the government's plans.

I do not think the government is reforming the parliamentary system. It is deforming the parliamentary system to allow it to impose its political agenda on the people of Canada that much more quickly. That is what it is doing.

The government wants to turn this into some sort of sausage factory, not a legislative assembly but a legislative assembly line that just moves legislation through and does not give people a chance to examine it. It does not want to give the opposition a chance to study it. It does not want to provide the same opportunities to hold the government accountable during Question Period.

It is no mistake that it is called Question Period. All we hear are the questions. We never get any answers back. This is one way we have of bringing to the people's attention what the government is doing. I hate to say it, but as a result of questioning in this House of Commons, one after another, cabinet ministers have had to resign their seats: One, two, three, four, five, six. It goes on and on.

It would not have happened if we had not had a chance to raise questions during Question Period concerning a minister's behaviour. Now we are going to see that erode as the government attempts to do away with Question Period for certain times of the year.

The government House leader went on at some length to explain why it is appropriate that members of Parliament get home to listen to their constituents. I pointed that that argument is rather hollow. Obviously the track record would speak for itself that this government does not listen to people. The members can go home every day of the year and nothing will change.

The point is that when their constituents tell them what to do or what not to do, the constituents know they will be totally and simply ignored.

There is another aspect of this. It was pointed out to me by my colleague from Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, who I want to say at this point has been extremely helpful. His wisdom and the thought that went into this process has to be recognized by all as leading to some very meaningful discussion inside and outside our caucus in terms of the changes being proposed to the government and essentially what they will do. He pointed out to me the other day that the political landscape of this country is changing.

What this government does through these changes is perpetuate the two-party system. We tried to make the case during our so-called negotiations that there are now other viable parties in the House of Commons. The New Democratic Party, a newly elected party, ought to have some recognition in terms of the rule changes, but that was essentially ignored.

We have seen changes introduced to attempt to block small political parties from playing a role in the House of Commons. I refer to the new definition that the government House leader has of unanimous consent. Until now, we had to seek unanimous consent to change the rules at will, virtually.

Sometimes, and as a matter of fact often, it was to the benefit of the House that we alter a rule for a particular afternoon or we change a way of doing business to facilitate a piece of legislation or to assist members in the performance of their duties. The government has changed that. What unanimous consent means is unanimous all but 25 members, so that during Routine Proceedings the government can introduce a motion to pass a bill at all stages or to change the Constitution or to carry out all sorts of what could be termed Draconian changes. Unless 25 members leap to their feet immediately, it is done, just like that. It can be used and abused so easily, but again it will enable the government to facilitate introducing its political agenda through the House of Commons.

I know the government always says: "We have to become more efficient. We have to become more effective". It was very frustrated when the opposition spoke against the goods and services tax and tried to point out why this was the wrong tax. The government was very frustrated when we spoke out against the major changes to the unemployment insurance legislation that would do irreparable harm to families, particularly in the regions of the country. The government was frustrated when we spoke out against the free trade agreement. It said we take too much time talking in the House of Commons.

We appreciate that democracy is not always the most efficient way of doing business. The parliamentary system is not the most effective and efficient way of conducting government business. The most effective way is a dictatorship. That is the most effective way. That is the most business-like way; simply impose the legislation and Parliament is nothing but a rubber stamp if it exists at all.

That is why some of us have felt so strongly about these changes, because that is the direction in which we are moving, where the government simply says: "Here is our agenda". There will be no vote at first reading of a bill. We are going to pass this in principle and put it into a legislative committee where we cannot take time to discuss the bill in any sort of depth. We can only discuss technical aspects.

Mr. Speaker, that would mean that the GST legislation would be introduced, sent off to a committee and unless you were a tax accountant or a tax lawyer, you would not be welcome. You could not call witnesses to say how is this going to affect the farm community, the fishing community; how this is going to affect various sectors of the economy or other elements of society. Oh, no, Mr. Speaker, you could not talk about that. You have to talk about specific details of the legislation.

This is something that we do not support. We think this is wrong. What it means is that rather than the people of Canada, through their organizations, groups or individuals having input into legislation, lobbyists will have input into legislation. They will be the ones who are able to advise the government members and their officials. The people of Canada will be frozen out of the process. That is one of the many reasons why we say we cannot support this package.

The government House leader said that we consented in some way to these rule changes, that he felt that somehow we had agreed during the process that these were acceptable. I think my hon. friend who spoke on behalf of the Official Opposition indicated that that was not the case. It is a bit like being sentenced to death and saying: "Let us negotiate how this is done". We could determine that it could be done by hanging, it could be done by injection or there are a variety of ways to do this.

That is essentially what happened. The government said: "Here are all the changes we want to make so that this place will be more effective, more efficient and more business-like", to run more like a corporate boardroom as opposed to a parliamentary democracy. We said: "We cannot accept these". There are some changes that we can accept. There are some that are rather trivial and simply reflect a changing House of Commons, but there are some measures that we simply cannot accept.

For example, supply days are one of the most important aspects of our work here. Supply days go back to when the king wanted money, he had to set aside certain days to discuss on the part of the duly elected people whether this was an appropriate expenditure or not. We have those days. We have 25 of those each year. We are required to have at least 25 days where the government schedules a day for debate on whether the government is using taxpayers' money adequately and whether their plans are appropriate in terms of more expenditures.

It is a long-stated tradition that 25 days during every calendar year be set aside to discuss how the government is spending our money. Now I know the government is doing away with days to debate the budget and the throne speech, and so on. We could talk about those. However, what this one measure does is that it enables the government, if it ever wished, to have the Parliament of Canada sit for only one day a year. What it says is that when we do not sit, those normal supply days will be eroded, will be just ignored. If the government chose not to sit, other than for just one or two days of the year, that is it. There is nothing in the Standing Orders that could change that.

Mr. Speaker, you have signalled that I have one minute left. This is part of the problem. I notice that the government House leader spoke for an hour. The representative of the Official Opposition spoke for an hour and a half, and the New Democratic Party speaks for 20 minutes. That is it.

Does this reflect the true nature of the House of Commons? No, it does not. It reflects an old-fashioned view of the House of Commons where there are two political parties. Mr. Speaker, does this reflect the emerging political reality in the country where we might have four or five or six political parties represented in this House after the next federal election? No. It is just going back in time. That is why we feel this is inappropriate and I simply want to conclude by saying the following.

The government believes that by introducing these changes, which I say tend towards fascism, and I use that term consciously, where the government House leader and the Prime Minister will have the tools now to more effectively muzzle the opposition, to more effectively muzzle the free press, because they too depend on Question Period. That is the only time they have access to the Prime Minister when he dashes up the stairs. He does not call press conferences, and so on.

If the government believes that by imposing these new changes that will severely restrict the opposition members of the House of Commons from doing what they are expected to do on behalf of their constituents, that this is going to allow them to fool the Canadian people sufficiently so that it will be re-elected, it will not work. It will not work. The people of Canada know that this government is not operating with their best interests at heart. They know that this government, after years and years of experience ignores their calls, their pleas. I would say this is a dark day for the democratic system in this country. It is a dark day for the Parliament of Canada, and that is why we in the New Democratic Party feel that these rules cannot be approved and supported in this House.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, we have been listening to a rather familiar refrain about dark days. For somebody with such a light head, that is really quite a comment to make.

The hon. member was speaking of muzzling and the high-falutin, high-sounding words on the other side, how all members of Parliament are important and it is important for each one of us to have our opportunity in the House. Then he condemns a package which says that more members will have more opportunities to speak in this House, and that is what the package says.

Let us come to the guts of a test for the member opposite. The members in this House who are muzzled during Question Period sit on this side of the House. Of the 158 of them, 120 do not sit in the cabinet. They get an average of five or six questions a week, to 60 on the other side, for a group that is smaller. If he believes in the principles he has been espousing, will he stand up in this House at this time and adopt the system that exists in Australia, the system that exists in England, where questions go back and forth across the House and all members are treated equally and one side is not expected to be muzzled. Will he agree to that principle?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, it seems odd that we are now getting into a discussion of what the Standing Orders ought to be. May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, as has already been proposed, that this be referred to the appropriate standing committee before it is closured off and jammed through the House of Commons. This is the kind of situation that ought to be discussed. My hon. friend is sitting there screaming at me now. That is the appropriate response, presumably, in terms of the government. It cannot handle any kind of criticism.

The point is the following: So-called negotiations never did take place. The member is now suggesting that there are all sorts of changes that we ought to be discussing. I could not agree more. He also knows that the idea was that standing committees ought to be spending more time in pre-study of proposed legislation. That is not in the Standing Orders. These are simply discussions that we have heard.

If we were doing the correct thing, and if he really believes that these changes were to make this institution more effective, it would be appropriate then to have more people brought into the process, but the process that was followed was in secret. People were not involved in an open way. This is why I say some of us have offered to the government the suggestion that this be referred to the appropriate standing committee where all the committees are represented in the open, with nothing to hide, and to discuss ways and means of making this more effective.

Again, the old approach, a handful of people in a back room operating in secret is somehow the best way to proceed. I say it is not.

I should use this opportunity, while I am on my feet, to move a subamendment.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. If I am not mistaken, the Standing Orders do not allow a member to move an amendment during the period for questions and comments.

I therefore remind the hon. member that we are still in that period.

[English]

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hawkes: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, might I suggest you inquire of the House as to whether or not there is unanimous consent to allow the House leader to propose his amendment and, in the spirit of the proposed amendments to Standing Orders, see if there are fewer than 25 members who object.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up with a brief supplementary and we will follow another one of his suggestions. The first principle was muzzling, the second principle was freedom of expression in the Chamber. It is so easy to follow through on his principles that I simply say to the member, let us have unanimous consent to continue this debate until midnight tonight so that we could all have a better chance to talk about it. I am asking for unanimous consent to continue the debate until midnight, to follow through on his principles. Does he want freedom of speech or does he not?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House give unanimous consent to extend the—

Some hon. members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, further to the amendments on the changes to the Standing Orders of the House, I would like to make a comment to the hon. member. We must not forget, Mr. Speaker, that the government worked for months on this with the opposition; there are no surprises for anyone in this House. The opposition can hardly be surprised by anything in this package. What we see is its biased reaction to what is a good reform that will make Parliament more effective and bring it closer to the people. That is what Canadians want.

I think that it is important for a member from a large region like Abitibi, which is 555,000 square kilometres to be in Ottawa for three weeks and in my riding for one week. It is important for Northerners, for a member from a region like mine, to be in the riding at least one week a month. Earlier, the member said that the government wanted to do away with Question Period. The government wants nothing of the sort, because during the discussions that you had with the government, you never asked to extend this question period by an hour.

I will give you an example of what democracy is. Today, during Question Period, I was scheduled to ask the Hon. Minister Benoît Bouchard a question through the Speaker of the House of Commons.

I was unable to do so. You had the opportunity during that period to ask several questions. As a member of the government party from a large region like the Abitibi, it is important for members from large regions to be there one week a month. In this House, we often notice, although you are present a month at a time, that half your colleagues are never in Parliament.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I do want to make one comment. He referred to one of my colleagues who was asking a question. I said that he had to speak to him only in one language.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is necessary in the House of Commons. Here we are able to speak whichever of the two official languages we choose. I do not think I have to feel obligated to speak one language or the other.

But Mr. Speaker, you will recognize in your position as Speaker today that—

Mr. Saint-Julien: Je n'ai rien compris en anglais. C'est pour cela.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, earlier I made the case that proceeding with this particular motion was inappropriate and the Speaker indicated that he would be rendering a decision on that argument some time soon. I would seek the right to be able to move an amendment after the Speaker has rendered his decision. I do not think, at the moment, that either the amendment that has been moved or my proposed subamendment would be in order in light of what I hope the Speaker will say when he renders his judgment.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Just a word to say that the Chair will certainly note the comment by the hon. member for Kamloops and will make its decision as soon as possible.

The hon. member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have been following this debate not simply for the two or three hours just passed, but over the many years that I have been in the House along with some of my colleagues here from Newfoundland and so forth. We have taken a great deal of interest over the years.

When I first came here in 1974 I remember very clearly the attitude that some of the members at that time still had about the revised rules of the House brought in in 1969, I believe it was, which varied the rules considerably. To them it was still convulsive to think about the radical changes that were brought in such as having opposition days instead of committee of the whole for a lot of the bills, especially the money bills.

Change is always very difficult, but I want to begin by complimenting the House leader for the Liberal Party on the contribution he has made to the debate today. I thought he spoke and contributed very well to an understanding of the issues that are before us. He did it dispassionately and as much as it can be done in the Chamber like this, and we cannot always absent ourselves from partisanship, he did it at a very high level. I want to compliment him for that. I cannot say the same thing for the House leader of the New Democratic Party.

I think we ought to assign someone here to keep a box score of the number of cliches the member for Kamloops can throw about in one of his 10 or 20-minute speeches. The degree to which he banters them about is almost beyond counting. It is worthy to note that while he spoke in his address about the need for further debate, the muzzling of Parliament, and all of those cliches that roll so quickly off his tongue, when we gave him the opportunity to extend the debate so that his members could take part, he said: "No, we don't want to extend the debate. We just want to talk about the way Parliament has been muzzled". Give them a chance to talk and they say "no".

We have had a further display of this. I noted that one of the things that the New Democratic Party is opposed to is the fact that we want to change the times when the House is sitting. We would have one week a month away from the House when we could do constituency work. They do not like that idea. The fact is that in reality, they are already on a platoon system. They are already doing it. They are off in their ridings one week out of the month.

• (1830)

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Friesen: They do not want to give that privilege any kind of official endorsement. They want to do it quietly so that nobody notices.

I noticed, particularly this morning, when that party which is so interested in developing countries had an opportunity to support the president of a developing country like Mexico, it had 15 members here this morning, I counted; 35 per cent of its caucus was here, 65 per cent was somewhere else. Yet, when that party ran for election it said: "We want to represent you in Ottawa".

Mr. Keyes: Do not throw stones in a glass house. How many were you missing?

Mr. Friesen: That brings me to the real dilemma which all members of Parliament confront. All of us, when we stand for election, when we go through an election campaign, face this dilemma. In one way or another we are saying to our constituents: "I want to represent you in Ottawa". We say it regardless of party. We say it with all sincerity, and we want to do this. We want to go to Ottawa and take the needs and the concerns and the issues of our people and give them voice here in this Chamber.

I remember toward the end of my first campaign, an elector, an elderly gentleman said to me, talking about all of the candidates: "The trouble with you guys is that once we elect you, we never see you again". Prior to, and in the 1950s and 1960s that was almost unavoidable. Travel was by train. The person elected took the train from Vancouver to Ottawa, spent three months in Ottawa and then came. Obviously, the geography of the country determines that once they are elected it is not going to be very often that you will see that member again. Geography is one of the difficulties of representing a constituency in Canada. That is a dilemma we all face. It has nothing to do with party affiliation. It has nothing to do with ideology. It has entirely to do with geography.

So, we are caught in that dilemma. We want to represent our people in Ottawa and yet we also want to be with our people in the constituency.

I want to say to members opposite that this formula was dear to my heart when I sat on opposition benches, because it is important for us to speak out for our constituencies in Ottawa and represent them well here. At the same time, it is also important for us to be back home to get an understanding and a feel for what our constituents are saying.

One of the truisms of life is that the longer you spend in Ottawa, the more unrealistic the world becomes to you. It is only as we go back to our constituencies and only as we spend time with people who elected us, that we maintain a realistic view of what Canada is all about, what life is all about. The longer we stay in this city consistently, without any break, the surer we are of getting an unrealistic perspective of issues here and in our constituencies, and of our responsibilities. It is only as we go back home that we become reconnected to reality and understand the issues.

When I was in opposition, I was already in favour of this kind of reform. Added to that, I could see that the ministers of the Crown sitting in the treasury benches had an additional responsibility. They had an administrative responsibility that I, as a backbencher did not have. Yet management is a very important facet of government business.

Here are the ministers of the Crown—and again it does not matter which party is in office. Here is a minister of the Crown who has to be at Question Period every day and has to spend time being briefed for Question Period. At the same time he is concerned about his department, how it is being managed. The more time he spends here for Question Period, the more he is turning over to bureaucrats the management of the department. He has less time to examine what the bureaucrats are doing.

I heard recently that one of the ministers of the Crown had the highest compliment given to him when his department said "he is the best deputy minister we have ever had". By that it meant that this person is involved with every concern in his department. That is not always possible if you are trying to divide your time between the House and, as the opposition rightly demands, accounting for the administration which, in fact, includes administering and managing the department.

The opposition says that if you reduce the time you spend in the chamber you reduce the amount of democracy. Now, I think that deserves a little bit of examination:

I would contend that this is certainly an important forum for democracy but it does not begin here. Democracy really begins on the campaign trail, on the election trail, when we are elected to office. During that time we espouse the platforms we would promote if we were elected to office. I have said this on a number of occasions here. This is an idea that comes from the parties of the mother of Parliaments over in the United Kingdom. The platform, what they call the party manifesto, is all important. When they are campaigning they have a very carefully structured party manifesto and a platform which they enunciate during the campaign, and when they are elected they are accountable for making sure that the legislative program that they introduce as a government follows their party manifesto.

Now that is the first step of democracy.

Mr. Fisher: So when are you going to start using it?

Mr. Friesen: I will come to that.

Mr. Fisher: Never.

Mr. Friesen: If we allow campaigning, as we have in the past, to be nothing but sloganeering, like "the land is strong" or "zap, you are frozen", if slogans which have very little to do with your legislative program once you are elected dominate your campaign, you will diminish the level of democracy right at the threshold where it ought to begin. When we diminish it there, naturally when we get into the Chamber here we have a free rein. If there is no structure in the campaign it is no wonder then that when you get to the Chamber opposition parties will object to the program that the government is presenting; it has had no forerunner, it has had no foundation.

Democracy begins on the campaign trail, and then it is developed here in, as someone said, "the crucible of democracy".

Therefore, to reduce the number of sitting days but lengthen the hours so that you have an aggregate number of increased hours is not a reduction of democracy. That is making democracy work.

I remember in the campaign of 1984 our party very clearly talked about wanting to dismantle the national energy program, and yet as soon as we were elected and we started doing that we were opposed. I mean, this is something we promised to do and yet the opposition said "you don't have a right to do what you promised to do".

Then we proposed, during the election campaign, privatization of the government corporations and the opposition said "no, no, you can't do that", but we had promised to do it.

It seems to me that is what an election campaign is all about. I come back to the United Kingdom experience. There is a saying over there among the two or three opposing parties—whatever the year happens to be—that the government is entitled to its legislation. It does, it gets it as it ought to. The opposition is entitled to debate what it sees as the flaws of that concept, of that ideology. That is true. That is the opposition's right and it ought to be exercised.

• (1840)

In the United Kingdom—and my friend from Newfoundland walks out—they debate an issue like that for five, six or seven not weeks, not days, but hours for a bill of some magnitude. They have concluded that if the government has campaigned on a platform and it was elected to introduce its platform and to legislate it into being, it is entitled to do that.

I remember sitting here for hours at night debating a bill on which we had campaigned, and we were being told withdraw the bill after we had campaigned on it. Somehow that to me sounds like a contradiction to democracy.

In the 1984 campaign we had over 50 per cent of the vote. Presumably we had a right to do it. That did not stop the opposition. Now the leader of the government says 53 per cent voted against us in the 1988 campaign. Well I do not remember any time when the Liberals were elected when they had 50 per cent of the vote. That did not stop them from introducing their election campaign platform, their legislation. They did what they wanted even though they had less than 50 per cent of the vote.

I want to point out that the beginning of democracy having a clearly defined campaign, that the crucible of democracy is here and we are entitled to legislate the campaign promises that we introduced and we go on from there.

I would like to underline another concept and that is the myth that by reducing the number of days we are introducing a radical new reduction of democracy when, as the government House leader pointed out this morning, Australia with a geography somewhat problematic to them, like we have here, has 66 sitting days a year. It passes 89 per cent of the bills introduced. Canada sits 155 days, two and a half times as long, and passes 56 per cent of the bills introduced.

I am asking members opposite: is that an efficient use of parliamentary time? If we have campaigned on a platform and the legislation flows from it, are we not entitled as an efficient democratic body to introduce and receive passage of that legislation?

West Germany sits on the average of 17 days a year. It passes 90 per cent of its legislation. Japan sits 43 days a year and passes 76 per cent of its bills. Even the United States, which has a little bit of a problem of geography and population, sits only 144 days a year and passes the majority of its legislation.

It is a little bit of a ruse to say that by reducing the number of days we sit so that we can spend time in our constituencies but increasing the number of hours in the days we sit so that we maintain the same amount of time in the chamber, is somehow a reduction in democracy.

I want to make one other point and that has to do with Question Period. If members opposite are interested in improving the efficiency of Question Period, I would simply point out to them that they have the same bothersome, meddlesome worries I had when I sat over there: The prima donnas who sit on the front benches hog all the camera time.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Friesen: I have their attention, Mr. Speaker. The man who is best at it is laughing. When you have members sitting in the front and asking questions that take two and three minutes, that inspire answers that are just as long, two or three minutes, give me a break, you cannot have many questions answered in a 45 minute question period. What each caucus needs to do is put the boots to those guys who hog the camera and the time, limit them and get rid of the speeches and ask short, pertinent questions that require short, pertinent answers. We will improve Question Period far more than adding a few days of Question Period to the calendar of the House of Commons.

I invite each caucus, including ours, to do that, then we will improve the procedure of the House of Commons.

Third, I want to talk about committees. Can I speak as long as the opposition House leader did? The third point I want to make is regarding committees. It is important that we start invoking the principle of approval in principle in the House and make committees do the work of technical improvement of the bills.

I remember when we were debating C-55 and C-84. We had an immigration lawyer before us who opposed the bill. He was not in favour of the bill. He came before the committee, not to say withdraw the bill. He said: "You have improved it in principle, now here are ways I think that you can improve it". That is what we need to do.

Mr. Heap: And you ignored him.

Mr. Friesen: We did not. My friend from Spadina said we ignored him. No, we did not. As a matter of fact, he gave us very good consultative advice that we used.

I am sorry I do not have as much time as the opposition House leader. I know the members of the opposition would love to hear me speak longer, but I heed your advice.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, speaking for this side of the House, the only ruse in this place is the one being regurgitated by the government here tonight and being roasted by us on this side.

The hon. member speaks well of reality if the reality was that this was the year 1969, because today, in 1991, we have had advancements in communications and the tools of communication, the likes of which this member has not seen in 15 to 20 years. We have the parliamentary reports which we can put out quarterly. Every three months you can send one out. We have access to distribute information in lots of 4,000 pieces, as many times a week as you care to. We have free mailing privileges that go out to all your constituents in your riding.

Mr. Gagliano: Community television.

Mr. Friesen: Community television, the Whip for the opposition party states. Community television where you can go and take a member of the government if you want to, if he or she is obliging, and go across the street to a cable organization, sit down with that person, spend 28 minutes discussing the issues of the day and mail it to your riding. Free mailing privileges and telephone privileges. If someone calls or someone expresses a problem to your constituency, you can get on that phone immediately from your constituency office and call that constituent back immediately.

I am available to my constituents. All they have to do is call the office and make it a point to tell my office that they want to see me. I say terrific. I am in the House Monday through Friday doing the job in the highest court of the land, the privilege that we have to be here on behalf of our constituents. This is the place of work. If we could move it to Hamilton West we would be more than happy to, but unfortunately there are 295 members with the same opinion. We cannot even convince the government to get an airport there, never mind the House of Commons. They can make it a point to request that they would like to see me on Saturday.

• (1850)

The constituency office is open Saturdays for that express purpose. If we really love this job, if we are really here because we believe in our country and we want to do the right thing for our constituents, if we want to stand up for our home town no matter where it is in this country, we are going to make ourselves available to the people who put us here.

That is what we are being paid for, and that is the job that we are here for.

Some hon. members: Right on.

Mr. Keyes: I do not want to test the hon. member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley but I want to ask him: "When did the sun rise—"

I will come to my question.

Mr. Friesen: Oh, you've got a question?

Mr. Keyes: This is question and comments. I will give my comment, and I will ask the member a question.

This member has been in the House for how many years?

An hon. member: Too long.

Mr. Friesen: Sixteen: it does not matter.

Mr. Keyes: The member has been in the House for 16 years. When did the sun finally rise—

Mr. Laporte: Order, let someone else ask a question.

Mr. Keyes: I am asking a question. When did the sun finally rise on this member that after 16 years, he finds it important that he must be back to his constituency for one week out of four.

It seems that for the last 16 years he has managed to do that quite capably. Did he rise in this House ever in the past 16 years and say: "By golly, Mr. Speaker, I have to get back to my riding association at least one week in four because I cannot seem to get the job done otherwise." No. Sixteen years he sat in this House, and there was no problem.

Now the government comes through with this new edict, this new magic for parliamentary reform which is complete nonsense. It is an appendage like an arm that should be cut off.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, here is a man from Hamilton who leaves his office at nine o'clock and can be here at 10.30 a.m. He has no time zone changes.

I will tell you that it is speeches like his that make western Canadians despise central Canada. They hate it with a vengeance.

He can vote here on a Wednesday and be at a meeting Wednesday night in his riding.

I will tell you: I get up and leave Vancouver at 9 a.m. and land here at 4.30 p.m. The day is gone. He can leave his office at 9 a.m. and get here at 10.30 a.m.

Smart aleck, that will never sell. He talks about all the brochures and what have you that he sends to his riding. Fine. So do I. That is why I have been here for 16 years. I do not think he will be here next time with that kind of an attitude.

For all the letters, parliamentary reviews and householders that we send out, the reality is that the people still want to talk to us personally. They want to meet with us personally. It is not easy to do when we have a six-hour flight on a Thursday or Friday. It is not easy to do six hours after a days' work and then meet constituents.

Wake up, smell the coffee and see how big Canada is. I want this member to know, Sir, it is one thing to send out householders and it is another thing to see them in flesh and blood. Maybe his wife is satisfied with a phone call, but I think she would rather see him in person. That is the way constituents feel, too.

It is not enough to get a letter. It is not enough to get a householder that your staff printed. They want to see us. They want to meet with us. For once, I would like to find a central Canadian from that party who would travel to the west often enough to see what it is like to represent a constituency out there and still meet the needs, aspirations and the feelings of those people out there.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): The question of the proposal with respect to three weeks on, one week off, has been around for a long time. It was looked at by the McGrath committee. It was not rejected at that time on its merits. It seems to me there are good arguments on both sides, and that is not the debate I am here to enter at this point.

I want to speak to what the member actually had to say and some of the things he did not say. He talked about governments having the right to implement their mandates. I agree with him. There is often irony in the questions that opposition members pose, but there are also examples of when governments bring forward things that they did not promise. All governments are guilty of this, and your government has been guilty of this as well, with respect. In my judgement, the GST and the free trade agreement, at least after 1984, are examples. There are times when the opposition feels that the government did not make point of saying it was going to do that, and I think it is legitimate at that point for people to make that part of the debate.

The member mentioned Question Period, which I think has deteriorated seriously in the time that I have been here. I remember when I first came here. Speaker Jerome was in the Chair. People were cut off if they had long preambles or were not permitted supplementaries. I think part of the deterioration of Question Period owes itself to the lack of discipline, with respect, that the Chair is unwilling to impose on the House, and also to the discipline of television, which looks for those 15 or 30-second sound bites which the old Question Period did not provide as easily. We have conformed ourselves to that medium and perhaps we need to take a second look at that.

The member made a point with respect to committees. He knows that when we considered these kinds of things during the McGrath committee, we also considered a process whereby the principle and the substance of bills would be considered beforehand in a way that this particular reform that he is now defending, does not introduce. That is one of the reasons why we are critical of it.

Finally, with respect to the whole question of efficiency, I think you could stand to introduce new efficiencies into this system if you at the same time introduced new meaning into those more efficient processes. This reform has failed to do that. You have not given real meaning and power to the participation of opposition members at the same time as you have introduced new efficiencies. That is where you fall down.

I wonder if the member could tell me why, in his defence, he did not mention the four areas where this reform—or deform, as we have called it—specifically goes back on recommendations made by the McGrath committee of which he was a part. The re-introduction of parliamentary secretaries into the standing committees is a case in point.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time for questions and comments is over. Does the House give its unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Blaikie: Then there is the question of limited rooms for committees meeting within these envelopes, which will, as sure as I am standing here, have the effect of not permitting all committees to work when they want to work. That will take away the self-initiating power which the McGrath committee recommended. There is the question of legislative versus standing committees and the power which this reform would give to the government to decide whether or not a matter went to a legislative committee or a standing committee. Again, eroding the McGrath reforms. Finally, putting the whole matter of substitution even more under the Whips than it is now, when the spirit of the McGrath committee was to take power away from the Whips and invest it in the private members. The Whips have too much power over this place already. They are a scourge on this place. The essence of the McGrath report was to give more power to the private member, more power to committees, and that is exactly what this reform is not doing. In fact, the reform is going in the opposite direction.

I know I am not being fair in the sense that I have not given him the time to do so, but the member was a member of the McGrath committee and it would have been interesting to hear how he can justify these changes, knowing as I do, the position he held collectively with me and other members in 1985 on these same matters.

Mr. Friesen: First of all, the member has given me a very lengthy list and I would like to deal with them with the thoroughness that I think they deserve, because he is a serious member on this subject. This is no gadfly, he is not a fly-by-nighter on this. He has been in on this subject for many, many years, and I would propose to deal with only two of them and then if the members will give me permission, pick it up at 11 a.m. tomorrow and then I can look at this list.

• (1900)

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on March 25, the Commissioner of Official Languages submitted his annual report to the House of Commons. Given the social and political, or rather linguistic, climate, this report showed very encouraging signs of the rise of bilingualism in the country. It thus counterbalanced a more negative interim report, in my humble opinion, Mr. Speaker, made public five days earlier by the Spicer Commission on March 20.

In his report, the Commissioner of Official Languages says that four out of five Canadipans accept official bilingualism. Another encouraging fact: three out of four parents want their children to learn the second official language in immersion courses. Mr. Speaker, although this report mentions rising support for bilingualism in Canada, it also denounces the inertia of Treasury Board. The Commissioner says on page 36 and I quote:

> The list of what the Treasury Board Secretariat did in 1990 is not half as interesting as the catalogue of what it did not do.

The Commissioner says on page 83:

> The Treasury Board should be the engine of the renewal decreed by Parliament. We do not ask that it display zealousness; in future, we would merely ask that it discharge more effectively all its language policy responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, that is why on March 25 I asked the President of the Treasury Board in this House how he could explain the 22 per cent reduction in staff at the Official Languages Division of Treasury Board, his own department. I asked him how he could reduce staff from 64 to 50 in this division which, as we know, is responsible for applying in his department and federal departments a law that is sometimes misunderstood, sometimes mismanaged and often misapplied.

The President of the Treasury Board replied—obviously evading the issue—that this division's budget had increased rather than decreased. Treasury Board is to check on what is being done in the departments and to take corrective action where required. How can the President of the Treasury Board dismiss 14 employees when the workload is going up rather than down? In so doing, he is shirking his responsibilities for fully and effectively applying the Official Languages Act.

Mr. Speaker, the Official Languages Act was adopted, as we know, in July 1988. However, nearly three years later, we are still without regulations on language of work—I stress language of work—and also without regulations on the need to have criteria for equitable participation. So we still lack two parts to go with the Official Languages Act.

Mr. Speaker, I asked the President of the Treasury Board to tell me when we could expect to receive regulations on the language of work from his department. He answered me, and I again quote his answer of March 25:

> With respect to the language of work, outside if you will, I believe the official language is already precise enough. As far as I know, there has been no major problem. Should one ever arise, we would be glad to deal with it at the appropriate time and place.

Mr. Speaker, either the President of the Treasury Board does not know what language of work means, which would surprise me, because he is an intelligent man, or his mind was on something other than the House of Commons or he has amnesia. A few days before, in a press release from a public service union, we learned that public servants had difficulty obtaining documentation and the right to communicate with their supervisor in their own language.

By language of work, Mr. Speaker, I mean the ability of public servants to work in either official language. I mean their ability to speak to their supervisor and receive personal services in their own language. I mean their ability to obtain ordinary, everyday material like forms and manuals in the language of their choice. Now, the Commissioner of Official Languages reports on page 135, and I quote:

> A large number of supervisors, 25.6 per cent, are still unable to carry out this function in both official languages. As well, there are many others who, having passed a language test and qualified for the bilingualism bonus, make no effort to give their employees freedom of choice in language of work.

So there are no standards, Mr. Speaker. Nearly three years after the passage of the Act, the Commissioner still concludes, on page 132, and I quote:

> —that progress towards the language of work objective in federal institutions has stagnated both as a result of the vagueness of current policies and because many senior managers attached no priority to meeting the objective.

And further on, page 136:

> It seems clear that the language of work provisions of the 1988 Act will remain a dead letter unless the Governor in Council adopts regulations clarifying the rights of federal employees.

Furthermore, the Professional Institute of the Public Service, a rather well known union, said in a research report that 32.9 per cent of francophones cannot communicate in their language with their supervisor. The Official Languages Commissioner had to report, page 132, that his "words fell on deaf ears" in 1988 and 1989, for his recommendations regarding the establishment of a master plan to ensure implementation of the new Act were not retained.

The President of the Treasury Board answered that question last March 25 when he told me in this House that there was no problem. But there are problems, Mr. Speaker, and the government has to solve them. I feel it is high time for them, the Minister and his government, to remove their blinkers, to realize that regulations are needed. The need is urgent and imperative to ensure respect of both official languages in the workplace. I therefore ask this to the parliamentary secretary: When can we expect regulations about language of work? When can we expect regulations about fair representation?

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to reply to the question posed by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier regarding official language regulations and the regulations on the language of work.

As hon. members are aware, the first priority of this government was to propose regulations on service to the public in English and in French. The President of the Treasury Board tabled such regulations in the House of Commons on November 8, 1990. These proposed regulations have been prepublished in The Canada Gazette, Part I, March 23, 1991.

The Parliamentary Committee on Official Languages is currently studying these proposals. I understand they will shortly be making their recommendations to the President of the Treasury Board.

As the President has already indicated on a number of occasions in this House, these regulatory proposals on serving the public were necessary to complete some key aspects of the Official Languages Act of 1988.

With regard to language of work matters, the Official Languages Act is already quite specific regarding the obligations of federal institutions. The act sets out a number of concrete requirements based on long-standing government policies that remain in place.

Let me just cite a few examples such as the provision of personal and job-related services to employees and work instruments in bilingual districts.

I understand that there were more detailed instructions as required. Treasury Board may issue policies or directives according to its mandate under the Official Languages Act.

It is indeed not necessary to regulate all matters. For instance, initiatives to create environments conducive to the effective use of both official languages may be taken without actually issuing regulations. These initiatives could range from federal institutions making special efforts to assist employees returning from language training to use their newly acquired skills in meetings and supervision to develop the bilingual lexicons in special areas. It goes without saying that Treasury Board will continue to carefully examine all matters related to language of work and will strive to ensure that all obligations under the Official Languages Act are met.

• (1910)

As for regulations on equitable participation, the Official Languages Act already sets out the government's long standing commitment in this area. I can tell hon. members that we are committed to ensure that English speaking and French speaking Canadians have equal opportunities to obtain employment and advancement in federal institutions. Current government policies are clear and explicit on this matter. In fact, participation levels in the Public Service broadly reflect those found in the appropriate sectors of the national labour force.

Any specific imbalances, such as anglophone participation in federal institutions in Quebec for example, are being dealt with by Treasury Board and the institutions concerned. Issuing regulations on language of work and equitable participation do not appear to be necessary at this time.

Moreover, I can assure hon. members that this government will continue to actively meet its obligations and commitments to the Canadian public and to its employees in accordance with the Official Languages Act.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, do you remember the green plan? Do you remember the government's promise of significant and real progress in tackling environmental problems? The minister and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources seem to have forgotten. At least that is the message in the latest budget.

For the seventh year in a row the department's funding of energy efficiency, conservation and alternatives was cut. Last year's already pathetic $40 million was cut another 12 per cent down to $35 million. That is a whopping cut of $375 million, 91 per cent in this budget item since 1984 when the budget was $410 million, the first year of the Conservative government's reign.

By contrast, in 1991–92 the government will be spending $154.8 million as a loan for the Husky Oil upgrader at Lloydminster and $180.6 million in the Hibernia project. That is more than $335 million in two oil megaprojects in 1991–92 alone. That is almost 10 times the entire budget for all energy efficiency, conservation and alternatives.

In the case of Hibernia, the government will be giving over $1 billion of taxpayers' money—that's right, a $1 billion gift—to a consortium that is planning to ship virtually all Hibernia oil straight to the United States. It will not even be refined in Canada. That $1 billion give to Hibernia, a straight subsidy to American consumers, would have paid for this government's measly annual funding commitment to all energy efficiency, conservation and alternatives—remember, Mr. Speaker, $35 million—for over 28 years.

Again, by contrast, this year the government will funnel $215 million into nuclear power development through Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd. and the Atomic Energy Control Board and there is more. According to a speech the minister gave June 5, 1990, to the Canadian Nuclear Association, Canada has invested a staggering $30 billion in nuclear facilities. Presumably this includes the $40 million per year that AECL spent over the last 10 years just to investigate sweeping its radioactive waste into a hole in the Canadian Shield.

One final contrast, even after just six months in power the New Democratic Government of Ontario has already left the Mulroney Conservatives far behind on environmentally responsible energy policy. As just one example, the Ontario government has ordered Ontario Hydro to divert $240 million—that is $60 million a year for four years—from nuclear energy development into reducing electricity demand through energy conservation and efficiency.

That diversion alone is worth more than one and a half times the total annual energy department spending on all federal programs for efficiency, conservation and alternate energy. Indeed that total federal budget of $35 million is only a little over twice what Ontario Hydro will spend each year merely on advertising its conservation and efficiency programs.

I should point out as well that Ontario Hydro is subsidizing the federal government in a pilot project to save energy in about 60 federal government buildings. That project, to install new lighting, motors and insulation, which reportedly will save the federal government $860,000 a year in energy costs, is being extended to all federal buildings in Ontario. I do hope that this program will demonstrate to the Mulroney Conservatives just what a little leadership can do.

Less than two weeks ago, on March 25, the all party House of Commons Standing Committee on the Environment tabled its report on global warming. This unanimous report entitled Out of Balance—the Risks of Irreversible Climate Change warns that the phenomenon of global warming is a fact and it poses a severe threat to Canada and to the planet as a whole.

The report obviously supports what the minister stated in a speech he gave in Toronto on September 13, 1989, and I quote:

> The greatest reductions in carbon dioxide can be obtained through energy efficiency and conservation.

Having made these remarks, the minister then cut the budget for energy efficiency and conservation by a two-year total of 28 per cent.

The minister still talks a good line. He was quoted in a Globe and Mail article of March 30, 1991 apparently qualifying remarks—laughable in a morbid sort of way when you consider this government's massive bias against energy efficiency and alternatives in favour of fossil fuel and nuclear megaprojects—that the Mulroney Conservatives have a "market based" approach to energy policy. Said Mr. Epp:

> I think it is the role of an energy minister to get us into areas where the present infrastructure will not take us. If people argue that I am moving away from the marketplace, I will accept that charge.

Mr. Speaker, I pray for the day when I will be able honestly to level that charge.

Perhaps, just maybe, the minister is beginning to believe some of the good advice he has been receiving. For example, in March 1989, his department received a report entitled Energy Demand in Canada, 1973–1987, which included a series of proposals for future policies and programs. It says, and I quote:

> To achieve the major economic and environmental benefits that energy efficiency still has to offer, government policies and programs for the future will need to emphasize a strategic combination of, energy efficient standards; improved information programs; financial incentives, and Research Development and Demonstration assistance.
> To rely solely on energy prices and existing market mechanisms is a formula for failure. Active and constructive intervention in the marketplace is absolutely essential.

In Halifax last June 18, just 11 days after his bill to authorize the bill dollar gift to Hibernia passed second reading, the minister told members of the Solar Energy Society of Canada that, and again I quote:

> It is clear that a safe, environmentally sound and economically viable energy path is imperative for this country. For this reason, we are firmly committed to the expansion of the efficiency and alternative energy sector. Like you, we want it to play a much larger role in Canada's energy economy.

The words and the evidence are clearly at odds. So my question to the parliamentary secretary is this. In view of this government's repeated funding cuts to energy conservation, efficiency and alternatives, what conclusion can Canadians draw other than that this government's actions, contrasted with its claim to be truly committed to energy conservation, efficiency and alternatives, merely demonstrates its stunning hypocrisy?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada is committed to the goal of maintaining and enhancing the environmental quality and in the green plan as set out by a comprehensive framework for the achievement of this goal.

The green plan contains strategies for improving the quality of air, land and water. The green plan promises that as a part of the strategy for reducing greenhouse gas emissions, the government will take several specific actions. It will implement the National Action Strategy on global warming that will be a comprehensive approach, cast in the international context, emphasize flexibility to take account of new information and developments and recognize regional differences.

It will table a National Energy Efficiency Alternative Energy Act dealing with the regulation of energy efficiency levels in energy-using equipment, labelling of products to convey information on energy use, and collection of statistics on energy use.

It will set minimum energy efficiency standards for appliances and equipment.

It will improve and expand the present Energuide program for energy labelling of home appliances.

It will update and regionalize the federal Measures for Energy Conservation in new buildings, and encourage their incorporation in building codes.

It will improve the energy efficiency of transportation by setting new fuel efficiency standards, helping to inform fleet managers and drivers and working with the provinces and municipalities on improvements in the transportation system.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will establish a National Advisory Council to promote government industry co-operation and to establish energy efficiency targets for each of Canada's industrial sectors. Alternative energy sources will be encouraged through accelerated development of market penetration of alternative transportation fuels, including expansion of natural gas markets, increased availability of alternative fuel vehicles and support for research and development.

This hon. member is incorrect in his statement that EMR has reduced funding for efficiency and alternative energy in the fiscal year 1991-92. The government's estimates tabled recently projected expenditures of $34.7 million, slightly higher than the level of expenditures for the fiscal year 1990-91.

While the hon. member chooses to criticize the government for its current spending levels on efficiency and alternative energy programs, he does so most selectively. What he fails to acknowledge is that for all intents and purposes, spending reductions on these programs were due to the government's commitment to erase the last vestiges of the National Energy Program. Moreover, spending on efficiency and alternative energy under the NEP provided for a cumbersome and ineffective manner.

Four years and millions of dollars later, taxpayers were shown little return on their investment.

This government and our department is committed to the green plan and committed, Sir, to ensure that all Canadians have an equal opportunity to work and also being able to ensure that we have an environment for the future.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to speak on a subject of the utmost importance for the people of the Montreal area. I am referring to the disastrous job situation and economic conditions in Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time I raise this question. I raised it over six times since February 25 and I have not yet received a satisfactory answer.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that this government has forgotten Montreal. On December 10, 1990, I asked a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration regarding the deplorable job situation in the province of Quebec. At that time, 87,000 jobs had been lost in Quebec just over a six month period.

The minister told me, at the time, that employment programs were available in Quebec and that I would be happy with the results they would produce.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I am still not satisfied with the efforts made by this government to create jobs in the Montreal area. That is why I raised the question again on March 18. So, Mr. Speaker, let us look at what results the employment initiatives of this government have produced.

In Montreal, today, one person out of four is living below the threshold of poverty. The unemployment rate for the region encompassing the Montreal area reached 15.1 per cent in February according to Statistics Canada.

These are the results of the employment policies of this government and the reason why I raise the subject again tonight.

Economic conditions in Montreal are so bad that the unemployment rate is higher there than in any other city in Canada. The situation is getting worse and we have no economic recovery programs in place.

Based on the report the SECOR counsulting group presented to the Quebec government, an estimated 615,000 people are living in poverty in the Montreal area. Nowadays, that is unacceptable!

On March 18, the Minister of Labour told me that his government had invested millions of dollars over the past two years to help stimulate the economy in Montreal.

Where has that money gone? The economic situation in Montreal only got worse. In the La Presse issue of March 28, we can read that 60 per cent of the welfare recipients in Montreal have been on welfare rolls for more than two years.

We must conclude, that this government's action does not improve in any way Montrealers' standard of living. Indeed, one would be wrong to say that because the initiatives of this government have had one result: to throw Canada's economy and Montreal's in particular into a slump. They have destroyed families by depriving them of their income, of their jobs and of their salaries.

On March 18, the minister of Labour has stressed that in order to create jobs it was necessary to teach people new technologies. But, I told him that a new knowledge is useless if one is unable to put it into practice. A person will be able to put his newly acquired knowledge to good use only if we create new jobs and if Canadians have a renewed faith in their economy. Unfortunately, this government has managed to achieve exactly the opposite, since jobs are more difficult to find and Canadians in general have less confidence in the economy.

So, Mr. Speaker, when we look at the situation today, we see that in Quebec the bankruptcy rate has increased by 40 per cent in the first few months in 1991. According to Statistics Canada, 1,618 individuals have asked for the protection of the Bankruptcy Act. If the minister wants to increase confidence in the economy, these figures won't help. As for the government's effort to create jobs, I would say their record leaves much to be desired.

I have just mentioned to the minister that people need jobs in which they can use their new knowledge. However, by reducing funds for research and development, the government is not encouraging job creation. Between 1987 and 1990, government spending in that area decreased from 1.4 per cent to 1.28 per cent of the GNP. Mr. Speaker, again, I ask the government: How will they resolve the unemployment problem in greater Montreal and throughout the vast Montreal region? What will they do to help save the 1,800 jobs being threatened at General Motors, in Boisbriand, in the Sainte-Thérèse area? What measures will they introduce to put Montreal's economy back on track? What help will they provide to the 225,000 unemployed in the Montreal region to finally revitalize this economy the government seems to have forgotten?

Mr. Speaker, I know my time is almost up. I just wanted to explain how it feels to read articles such as there: Poverty gaining ground in the Montreal region; 615,000 people living in poor households, 50 per cent in Montreal. Montreal, once the biggest city in Canada, has become the unemployment capital of Canada, the welfare capital of our country. The time has come for this government to assume its responsibilities and stop the dramatic loss of our country's very valuable human resources.

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I wish to respond in greater detail to the questions of March 13 by the member for Saint-Léonard.

Let me first say something about jobs. Between 1980 and 1984 when the Liberal government was in power, 4,000 jobs were lost in Montreal. Between March 1985 and March 1991, 96,000 net jobs were created in Montreal. We know that more needs to be done, but the hon. member belittles that great city if he paints a picture of unrelieved gloom.

We know assistance is necessary. The statistics make that clear. This government is taking a number of measures beneficial to the economy of Quebec, and Montreal in particular. Agreement has been signed with the province of Quebec to spend $440 million in federal funding over five years, between 1988 and 1993, on economic development in all regions of Quebec.

The government is very concerned about the challenges faced by certain neighbourhoods in Montreal, especially the southwest. In April 1989 the federal government responded to the Creesom report and announced that it would provide the following assistance in southwest Montreal:

> Employment and Immigration Canada will allocate $32.5 million over the next five years on various labour market initiatives. The government intends to work with the local community to develop sustainable jobs and more qualified labour. For the last two years it has been working with RESO, an economic development corporation, to establish training priorities. For example, EIC is presently developing with RESO a special school where local residents can receive training assistance.
> Industry, science and technology will provide $15 million to establish an industrial recovery program for southwest Montreal.
> The federal government will also provide housing and financial assistance to southwest Montreal. Forty-eight million dollars in Federal Business Development Bank loans has been allocated over the next five years to promote economic activity in this area.

There are many more assistance projects that have been announced by this government:

In November 1990 the Department of Employment and Immigration allocated $2 million to establish in east Montreal a petrochemical training centre. This will respond to that industry's need for skilled workers.

The Canadian Jobs Strategy also helps. In 1990-91, $32 million in Canadian Jobs Strategy funding has enabled 7,925 Montrealers to participate in training programs. Furthermore, a total of 46 industrial adjustment committees are active in the Montreal region.

Finally, I understand the member's concern with the Montreal economy and the job market. This government was concerned with this particular issue long before the members opposite chose to focus on the unemployment statistics.

For example, the government fought for Bill C-22, the pharmaceuticals bill, which brought investment and jobs to this city. The members opposite did not want this legislation and delayed it for 17 months.

The government knew that a more innovative approach to labour market programs was needed in early 1989, and yet Bill C-21 came into force only in late 1990. Had we had Bill C-21 in place in January 1990, $800 million in UI training expenditures would have been spent last year in this country. Montreal would have benefited, but had to wait until the opposition made up its mind.

In conclusion, the government is helping the Montreal petrochemical industry, an industry which was all but completely abandoned by the former government.

This government is helping the Montreal and Quebec economy, and it did so long before the opposition woke up in March and chose to focus its attention for the first time on the state of the Montreal economy.

APPENDIX

ADDRESS

THE PRESIDENT OF MEXICO,
MR. CARLOS SALINAS DE GORTARI

to

Both Houses of Parliament in the

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

Monday, April 8, 1991

President and Mrs. Salinas were welcomed by the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada, by the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate and Honourable John A. Fraser, Speaker of the House of Commons

[English]

Hon. John A. Fraser (Speaker of the House of Commons): The right hon. Prime Minister.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. President, Madam Salinas, Mr. Speaker, cher collègues, mesdames et messieurs:

During my visit to Mexico last year, Mr. President, we laid the foundation of a new beginning in relations between Mexico and Canada. Today with your visit here all of us build on that foundation, and on behalf of the people of Canada I extend to you, Mr. President, to Mrs. Salinas, your family, and all members of the Mexican delegation the warmest of welcomes to our country, Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Formal diplomatic relations between Canada and Mexico go back many decades. First contacts date to the days of Captain George Vancouver who gave Canada's largest Pacific island its original name, "Vancouver Y Quadra", after himself and the commander of the Spanish vessels, Mexicana and Sutil with whom he sailed.

[Translation]

If Canada and Mexico grew on the same continent, each tended to look elsewhere, however, for like-minded partners. But the world around us is changing dramatically and economic competition and opportunity are the hallmarks of our age. And so it is no coincidence that both of us have re-calibrated our global orientations and re-formulated our foreign policy priorities, at about the same time.

• (1110)

[English]

Since you came to office, Mexico has been focusing more northward to the United States, our common neighbour, and to Canada, to build new partnerships to improve the lives of your people. And Canada has begun to focus more southward, to consolidate our base in the hemisphere and to pursue new opportunities in the global economy.

Our first step in implementing this new policy direction was to conclude a free trade relationship with the United States. As you know, the decision to secure that free trade relationship was supported 100 per cent by all Canadians and all members of this House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, give or take a few.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: The next step was to develop a comprehensive strategy for relations with Latin America. By the year 2000, 600 million people with a purchasing power of $1 trillion will live in Latin America. It will constitute a continent of enormous economic power and great political influence on the world stage.

As part of our strategy for relations with Latin America we have joined the Organization of American States, both to demonstrate our commitment to progress in this hemisphere and also to play our part in making it happen. A lynch pin of our strategy is our renewed relationship with Mexico.

During my visit to Mexico last year we concluded 10 agreements covering a wide range of public policy issues from law enforcement to environmental protection. Today, four more agreements are being signed; on film co-production, double taxation, and on commerce, including a $500 million line of credit between EDC and Pemex.

These agreements are further building blocks in the construction of our new relationship.

A North American free trade agreement is a logical next step. That is why, Mr. President, we have endorsed your proposal for such an agreement. We know that the road will be long and difficult. We know it is a courageous decision by you, Mr. President, and all parliamentarians wish you well.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: A North American free trade agreement would create a market of over 350 million people with a gross product of over $7 trillion, bigger than the European Community whose economic relationships will intensify greatly in 1992.

[Translation]

Trade in goods and service would exceed $300 billion per year. Canadian consumers would benefit from the lower prices that competition and comparative advantage can deliver. And Canadian producers would benefit competitively from the restructuring and modernization that access to a larger market makes possible.

We have no intention, however, of renegotiating the Canada-U.S.A., FTA. We want to build on the FTA and to expand trade liberalization to encompass all of North America.

The objective of all three governments is to negotiate an agreement that allows them to strengthen their economies through free trade, for the benefit of their people.

[English]

The advantages for Mexico are clear. If there is one lesson that globalization and interdependence have taught, it is that increased trade brings higher living standards and greater opportunities. Trade, not aid, has opened up the most effective avenues to prosperity and to social justice. Aid, while extremely helpful has not itself been able to deliver prosperity. But trade, by transforming developing nations into advanced economies, has done so.

Not so long ago Singapore, South Korea and Taiwan were considered to be underdeveloped centres of low-cost labour. But as a result of sound economic policies at home and increased trade abroad, the standard of living in these countries on a per capita basis, is on a track to parity with the western industrialized countries during this decade. This is an extraordinary achievement and I think it is one that Mexico is going to emulate.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Countries with strong economies can afford to provide their citizens with social benefits that others cannot. These same countries are also those that can afford to impose the most stringent environmental standards on their industries and on their citizens. They are also the countries that dominate international trade.

Mr. President, 87 per cent of Canadian imports now come from the United States, Europe and Japan, and not from, for example, countries with extremely low wage rates such as China or India or the Soviet Union. The argument that wage structures in less developed nations somehow fundamentally distort a free trade area, or provide substantially unfair advantages, does not stand up to serious scrutiny.

The reality is that in the knowledge age we live in, competitiveness depends not on one, but on many factors, including education, training, productivity, communications and transportation networks, proximity to markets, and the costs of capital as well as the costs of labour.

[Translation]

The Government of Canada believes that a Canada-U.S.-Mexico free trade agreement can prove to be in the best interests of all concerned—if it can be achieved on terms that are acceptable to all three sovereign nations.

But important as the trade issue is, there is much more on the agenda of our two countries. Cooperation is underway on environmental protection. Business links are growing between private enterprise on both sides. And 350,000 Canadian tourists and business people visited Mexico last year.

Talks between President Salinas and I will address the evolving situation in this hemisphere to which he, as President of Mexico, brings a unique perspective. And our talks will go beyond respective domestic and regional concerns to the ongoing challenges in the Persian Gulf, the evolving situation in the Soviet Union, the prospects for successful conclusion of multilateral trade negotiations and the urgent need to limit the spread of weapons of mass destruction and to control the sale of arms.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, simply put, there would be no discussion today of a resurgent Mexico, much less of a North American free trade agreement, were it not for President Salinas. His confidence in Mexicans and their confidence in themselves, have made it possible to transform attitudes, to accomplish changes and to chart a course that even five years ago seemed unthinkable.

Canadians respect Mexico's dynamism, and all Canadians admire Mexico's culture. We welcome you today, Mr. President, as the visionary leader of a great people with an exciting future. Here in the House of Commons, this crucible of Canadian democracy, I invite you now, on behalf of all parliamentarians of all political parties, who value our association with Mexico—and all of us do—I invite you today to address the Parliament and the people of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

His Excellency Carlos Salinas de Gortari (President of Mexico):

[His Excellency spoke in Spanish.]

The Hon. John A. Fraser, Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada; the Hon. Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate of Canada; the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada; hon. members of the House of Commons and Senate of Canada; Your Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen: I come here in respectful response to the invitation extended to me by this sovereign body, which so worthily represents the people of Canada. In this house of democracy resides the will of the great Canadian nation to find its own answers to its needs and to forge its own path in the world. I bring to this rostrum the friendship of the Mexican people and speak with their voice in expressing our desire for Mexico and Canada to become better acquainted with their many coinciding aspects, as well as with the wealth of their differences, so that together we may embark on new relations of exchanges and co-operation for our mutual benefit.

Canada and Mexico are both the outcome of singular experiences, but both are genuine nations, soundly rooted in their history and solidly backing their national project. Here in this Parliament speaks the voice of a sensitive and vigorous country that jealously guards its linguistic and cultural traditions and cherishes peace and co-operation among nations. Mexico draws its identity from a synthesis of civilizations and cultures; the strength of our blending of races gradually built up a national character that is proud of its past, aware that it is the heir and custodian not only of universal values but also of its own way of life and profound communal solidarity.

Mexico has a robust identity and sufficient vitality to build its own sovereign future. We therefore do not fear an encounter with the world, rather we actively seek it. To be bent on autarky would not only be Utopian, but would mean condemning ourselves to backwardness and marginalization. Our homeland is able to look out at the world and open itself up to contact with other peoples, without thereby failing to be faithful to itself, to its traditions and culture, to its values and historical raison d'être. We Mexicans today look towards the future and are determined to play a significant role in the coming century.

That is why I have come to Canada, an industrialized nation with a high export volume, a wealth of natural resources and a wide rate of freedoms, which will undoubtedly contribute to shaping the world of the third millennium. The Mexican people want to establish new continental relations that are more dynamic, more productive and more just. By doing so, our governments will be in a better position to carry out their tasks in a manner befitting the men and women of our countries and our times, who are doing their best to make our hemisphere an area of convergence and freedoms. We can take advantage of the goodwill and hard work of our peoples to guide our agreements and encounters to our mutual benefit and ensure that this new world will once again astonish humanity, just as it did 500 years ago.

Members of Parliament: Today, as we are just beginning to witness the end of the world's post-war structure, we recognize the crafty barriers and outworn dogmas that are designed to hinder the exchange of ideas, goods and people. The new co-operation between the great powers, the autumn revolution in central and eastern Europe, the new democracies here in the Americas, evinced, to our fascination, the global nature of the human condition, the flexibility of politics and the economic interdependence of nations. The Persian Gulf conflict was a painful reminder of the same global reality. Today, it is no longer possible to dream of an isolated social experience, impenetrable to coexistence or to alien conflicts. The hope and the challenge of building a world governed by international law are growing at a parallel rate. The true challenge of our times is to recognize the constructive force of the globalization of history, to face with responsibility and respect the variety of social experience and to avert the risk of new attempts at protagonism and new myths aimed at ignoring the sovereignty rights of states.

The world economy is the stage of a harsh and intense competition for markets. The revolution in knowledge and technology is transforming work habits and making social relations more fluid. New centres of innovation, resources and trade are at the forefront of economic activity and are forming into blocs to profit from their comparative advantages. To have staying power in this new international arena demands changes in economic structures, openness to competition and innovation, and new forms of association both within and outside the borders of individual nations.

In view of those circumstances, Mexico has set out to make the changes needed to secure a new placement in the world economy and to play an active role in the political configuration of the future. Within our borders, Mexican society has undergone a significant transformation over the past 25 years. Our current population of 82 million will increase by a further 10 million during my administration. Every year, one million young people seek to join administration. Every year, one million young people seek to join the labour force. Their demands are clear-cut. They want opportunities, services, and to participate in the decisions that concern them as well as in national affairs. They now reflect the demands of a better-informed and therefore politically more active, mature society. That is why in Mexico development, democracy and, above all, solidarity with those who have the least are essential needs and not merely options for defining government policies. Our response has had to be commensurate with these legitimate demands and in keeping with the new global reality.

We have strengthened our democratic institutions by changing the customs and practices that hampered the indispensable modernization of our structures. Thus, we now have a more vigorous system of parties in which increased electoral competition is the distinctive characteristic of political contention. The progress of democracy in Mexico has been reflected in the establishment of a new juridical framework for electoral matters, the result of an agreement reached between the different and even opposing political forces in the country. This new electoral legislation ensures a framework agreed upon with a view to establishing mutual responsibilities and acceptance of electoral results. We Mexicans know that our greatest political challenge lies in renovating our democratic practices, organization and structures in unison, so as to respond to an increasingly demanding society.

Mexico has never lost its course on the road to democracy. However, if politics are to be constructive, favourable economic conditions need to be established—as many fledgling democracies are beginning to discover—to ensure that the aspirations and ideals of liberty are solidly founded in actual reality in order to be long-lasting. The democratic exercise of power therefore also involved building economic foundations that will give our people more and better opportunities to realize their hopes for a decent life.

In Mexico, it is through our modernization strategy that we have sought to regain the path to gradual, sustained growth. After two years of persevering joint efforts in that direction made by society and the government, we have succeeded in achieving a growth rate of 4 per cent of GNP in real terms, and in reducing the public deficit to just half a percentage point of our national product, the lowest level in a quarter of a century. Strict fiscal discipline and a successful, timely renegotiation of the foreign debt have provided the necessary stability. Moreover, the pact signed by all sectors of society to reduce inflation remains in force, and this year we aim to cut it back to half the rate recorded in 1990.

During the past two years, Mexicans have seen inflation reduced more than it had been over the past 20 years. Our objective is to lower it to single-digit levels comparable to those of our main trading partners and to provide the greatest possible certainty regarding the development of our economy.

Economic stability has therefore been our highest priority. From the outset we viewed it as an essential condition for ensuring the continuity and viability of the structural measures that we have implemented in order to modernize our productive plant. The main objective is to make Mexico a major exporting country: hence the urgent need to ensure greater efficiency in productive processes and over-all quality of the end product. That is why we opened up our economy to international and domestic competition. In a brief period of time, we moved from being one of the most closed developing economies to being one of the most open. We have dismantled non-tariff barriers, removing them from over 85 per cent of imports; tariffs now average 10 per cent and the highest stands at 20 per cent. We needed to encourage innovation and competition, and to take advantage of the arbitrage of foreign prices on domestic prices.

That, in turn, meant broadening and stepping up the process of deregulating large sectors of our economy and establishing more attractive conditions to encourage greater flows of foreign direct investment, on which access to new technology largely depends. The fields of transportation, telecommunications and secondary petrochemicals are now more efficient and competitive; new regulations afford security and certainty to foreign investors who now have 100 per cent access to investment in activities that account for nearly two-thirds of our GNP. The Mexican Congress is currently studying bills to define clear, competitive rules for the protection of intellectual property rights. The climate for investment is attractive and dependable. This year Mexico has witnessed the arrival of nearly $4 billion in foreign investment and we expect more in the future.

Another important structural change has lain in the sale of public companies that are not of a strategic or priority nature. Our State has grown not only in terms of bureaucracy but also of property. The economic crisis of the past decade revealed the seriousness of the problem. More state-owned property and greater trade protectionism in Mexico simply did not lead to greater justice or greater economic strength that would allow us to deal with international contingencies and grow. The government has therefore privatized mining industries and companies, our airlines, and the telephone company, and soon to come are the commercial banks. The funds obtained from such sales have aided financial stability and have been invested in tackling extreme poverty. The Mexican people realize that government responsibility does not lie in owning a new fleet of aeroplanes or new bank offices, but in meeting demands for water and schools, and in providing opportunities for Indian, rural and urban communities. That is why Mexicans support the government's programs for change and thereby guarantee the continuity of such programs.

This shows the magnitude of the efforts made by the Mexican people. The strength of the nation and its increased capability to meet domestic needs and the demands resulting from globalization of the economy rest on a firm foundation. Consequently, we now intend to step up the process of diversifying our ties and bolstering trade relations with the various regional integration areas. We are aware of the potential of our geographic location, which makes us, like Canada, neighbours of the world's strongest economy and a link between the Orient and the Occident. We are also aware that Mexico is a bridge connecting the northern and southern parts of the hemisphere, which implies greater two-way trade with the countries of Latin America and therefore a secure link in shaping a continent-wide, free trade area.

Consequently, we have begun talks with Canada and the United States of America that will, in the near future, enable us to embark on negotiations leading to the signing of a trilateral free trade treaty. I am convinced that such a treaty is unquestionably the best option for the parties involved. It is an opportunity for our three nations to create a major economic zone that while respecting our cultural differences, will have the vitality to compete successfully with the European market and the Asian Pacific Rim.

Within the framework of an agreement between sovereign nations that will do away with tariff and non-tariff barriers, increase the expand trade patterns and objectively and justly resolve differences, we can expect investment and the creation of jobs to benefit all three countries. We will also be able to find economies of scale that will not only increase the competitiveness of Canada and restore that of the United States, but also bring Mexico's competitiveness up to world levels. A new array of technological options may well open up as a result of greater specialization and diversification in production and exports. We have what is needed to translate efforts into well-being for the inhabitants of North America.

Particularly for a country such as Canada, where the export of goods and services accounts for one-fourth of the gross domestic product, Mexico's market, in full expansion with 82 million consumers, is a potential destination for Canadian products and investment. Correspondingly, Mexico is seeking free and reciprocal access for its products to Canada and the United States. Furthermore, we are convinced that such conditions will generate greater investment and more sources of well-paid jobs, which will dissuade our fellow countrymen from leaving Mexico in search of job opportunities in the north. Economic relations with the United States are already strong, but we now wish to ensure that they grow in an organized and equitable manner, taking into account differences in the levels of development achieved by the two economies.

Very broad opportunities truly exist, since the economies of Canada and Mexico are complementary. Mexico is seeking to gain from Canadian experience in the fields where Canada has consolidated advanced infrastructure and has leading-edge technology. Such fields include, for example, telecommunications and public transportation, advanced irrigation projects, and water and environmental sanitation. Efforts to modernize Mexico urgently call for access to different technological options that will give producers greater flexibility in meeting the expectations of modern consumers.

Freer trade between our nations is expected to enhance the well-being of our peoples. We must not blame free trade for the conditions imposed on the productive situation by other factors. We have nothing to fear but barriers and obstacles that are intended to protect some parties from competition and, in doing so, end up destroying creativity and well-being. We must not forget that, sooner or later, such barriers have been demolished by the freedom-seeking vitality of peoples and by their demands for justice.

Distinguished members of Parliament, a free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America is already in force. Arduous and intense negotiations preceded the signing of this agreement and now serve as valuable experience of which Mexico hopes to take advantage. Although the debate was undoubtedly intense, it was finally shown that the economic prosperity of Canada, one of the world's most important exporting countries, is closely linked to access to new markets and consequently to plans for developing a free trade in goods and services. An economy that closes itself off loses competitiveness. An economy that is skilfully opened up gains new competitive vitality.

In Mexico we share this vocation. It is with the support of our culture and our history that we are opening up to the world and to the competition for markets. We know that the path that each nation pursues cannot be other than the result of its own historic experience, of the specific circumstances of its geography and even of the resources with which nature has endowed it. In the world of today, however, comparative advantages are not inflexible—they can be built up. The circumstances of today's world oblige us to make use of all the energy, imagination and determination of Canadians and Mexicans alike in working toward the convergence of our goals, so as to take full advantage of the complementary aspects of our economies. We can share a vision of the future, based on the long term, that will heed the needs of coming generations, who deserve to live in a better world.

We have embarked upon a new and vigorous stage in bilateral relations between Canada and Mexico. We are counting upon the spirit of our societies and the interest of our governments to strengthen our ties in the different areas of our agenda, both as regards our economies and in the fields of politics and culture. In particular, we in Mexico want to intensify the co-operation between our countries in two areas that the Mexican government and people regard as especially sensitive. These are: the fight to definitively eradicate the scourge of drug trafficking, and the mutually respectful and concerted effort to improve the environment.

• (1150)

The international struggle against illegal traffic in narcotics is Mexico's struggle as well. Over the past two years, we have seized thousands of tons of cocaine and destroyed hundreds of hectares of marijuana and poppies; we have broken up over 100 criminal organizations and confiscated their goods and properties; we have substantially increased budgetary resources for combating drugs and raised penalties and sanctions against those proven to have a connection to this chain of terror; we have ratified the Vienna Convention and are playing an active role in international forums. We have carried out these and other actions because in Mexico we consider drug trafficking to be a basic threat to the security of our country and to the health of our young people. We know that this chain of criminal activity transcends the frontiers of any country—which means that co-operation among nations is essential. Nonetheless, for it to be truly effective, such co-operation must be respectful of the sovereignty of all the states involved.

In the protection of the environment, Mexico assumes its commitment along with the entire world, because it sees this as a humanitarian cause of universal scope. Mexico has gladly accepted its responsibility in this crusade that is incumbent upon us all, since all of us stand to benefit from its advances and its successes. We Mexicans are convinced that our growth need not lead to the ravaging and pollution of the environment; quite the contrary. Growth that damages the environment is not growth. Resources and technologies for cleaning it up are still needed, but with government and society working together we have made progress.

A few days ago the Mexican Government took the decision to definitively close down one of our country's five refineries, precisely the one that supplied Mexico City. This was done at great economic cost, but this action will prevent the release of 80 thousand tons of pollutants per year into the atmosphere. We are also going to make other heavy investments in improving the environment of Mexico City, but we realize that a great deal still remains to be done, not only in our capital city but also in other areas of our country, some of which have been declared part of the patrimony of humanity. The initial and long-term efforts must be made by the Mexicans themselves, but we also propose to obtain more far-reaching international co-operation in this endeavour. I must acknowledge that our efforts have been supported by the invaluable technological and financial assistance of friendly countries, among them Canada, for which I hereby extend the sincere and fraternal gratitude of the people of Mexico.

Honourable Members of Parliament, Mexico has always based its foreign policy on strict observance of the principles that define harmonious coexistence among nations. By tradition and conviction, Mexico has displayed a clear vocation for peace and conduct consistent with respect for the self-determination of peoples, the peaceful settlement of controversies and co-operation for development. For that reason, and because of the strength of its history, Mexico has confidence in its future, in the deep-seated nationalism of its people, and in the vigour of an ancient culture, which is experiencing a renewal and renaissance, and which proudly offers to the world's surprised eyes the contributions stemming from the spirit of its men and its women to the vast cultural wealth of the west.

Today Mexico, proud of its past, looks to the future. In doing so, we have found in Canada a friendly and respectful nation, interested in becoming acquainted with our way of life. We Mexicans also want to gain a better knowledge of this country's way of life, to explore in depth the traditions and customs of the people of Canada, and to enrich ourselves with the value that they themselves place on their pluralistic society and the diversity of their ethnic groups and their languages.

In the spirit of a Canadian who so staunchly demonstrated the strength of his determination, Terry Fox, as in the impressive talent of men of science like Frederick Banting and the humanism of Stephen Leacock, we Mexicans have come to know of the greatness of your people. That is why we are certain that this new era of friendship can be positive and enduring. The people of Mexico make very good friends. They want to be, in the true sense of the word, friends of the people of Canada.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau (Speaker of the Senate): Your Excellency, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Prime Minister, honorables collègues du Sénat et de la Chambre des Communes, distinguished guests:

[Editor's Note: Speaker spoke in Spanish.]

[Translation]

Mr. President, we are honoured by your visit. Your stature as an economist and a humanist inspires us with trust borne of reason. The validity of your democratic convictions is testimony of mutually beneficial co-operation.

[Translation]

You embody our countries' hope to create organic ties on this North American continent which we share with a powerful neighbour.

A worthy representative of contemporary Mexico, in your writings and your political life, you have already shown that technology and human values are not opposed but, on the contrary, that they combine to enrich humanity.

[English]

It is entirely appropriate, Your Excellency, that you should visit our assembly at this historic juncture in Canadian-Mexican relations. Mexico is of immense importance to Canada.

Before today, we knew you as a forward-looking leader determined to reshape your nation to meet the challenges of the future, while preserving the diversity of your cultural traditions and a deep sense of national pride in the achievements of previous civilizations.

Today, we have had the privilege of hearing you speak eloquently of your vision of the Mexico of today and tomorrow, and we feel that under your leadership the aspirations of your people are in good hands.

Your bold vision for the future of North America opens the door to new avenues of co-operation which promise to carry us well into the next century. Time strengthens friendship, and we look forward to expanding our ties in the months and years ahead.

In listening to you, Mr. President, we realized once again how the firmness of your ideological convictions is yet allied to a wise pragmatism, and your courage to a political wisdom which commands respect.

Mr. President, your mother is an economist and your father a senator; your inheritance was obviously the presidency.

We are proud to share our coming prospects with a neighbour who so profoundly grasps the interdependence of the modern world.

Your country is indebted to you for a new deal for its people. Your knowledge and experience fit you perfectly to play a prime role in the new deal that the three neighbouring countries in North America are contemplating. And we have the greatest confidence in the man who started the process, the President of Mexico, whom we have the honour to welcome here today.

On behalf of my colleagues in the Senate of Canada, your Excellency, allow me to thank you very warmly for your inspiring address to us today and for your moving expressions of friendship for the Canadian people.

We would ask you to carry back to Mexico a message of the deep friendship which all Canadians feel for the Mexican people.

[Translation]

I thank you, Mr. President, and wish you good luck.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Your Excellency, Madam, Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Members of the House of Commons and Senate, honoured and distingued guests, ladies and gentlemen:

Today, I have the duty but also the immense pleasure to express on behalf of all members of the House of Commons and of all political parties represented here our great joy in having you among us in this historic Chamber.

[English]

Canada and Mexico have enjoyed an enduring friendship over many years. Since diplomatic relations were established in 1942, we have maintained positive and constructive contacts for our mutual benefit in numerous spheres of activity.

I should mention, Mr. President, the continual exchanges that have taken place between members of your Parliament and members of our Parliament over many years which have had a great effect in understanding both among your own people and among our colleagues that you meet with today.

I might say from a personal point of view that before I was elected to this House, I visited your country as part of a bidding delegation for the 1976 Winter Olympics, when you were holding the Olympics in 1968. We were very well received by your representatives and they got us the Olympics. They got us the Summer Olympics though, not the Winter Olympics.

I have also had the privilege of being on a parliamentary delegation visiting your country. I want you to take back to your colleagues the very great importance that we place on these exchanges.

Today, we are facing new challenges arising from vast changes in our hemisphere and the world community, and you have spoken of them. In your address to us today, you have not ignored the difficult questions but rather with statements of courage and vision you have drawn attention to them.

As a true leader, you have reminded us that a challenge is also an opportunity. Since assuming office you have achieved great progress in moving Mexican society forward to realize its true potential.

Those of us who have had the opportunity to visit your country are impressed with the vast storehouse of resources, both material and human, with which your country is blessed. Culturally rich, economically dynamic, historically resplendent, politically self-assured, Mexico cannot help but succeed. These values and attitudes are reflected in the views you have expressed to us today.

The comments that you made, Sir, with respect to the drug problem and with respect to environment are timely and are of great importance to us. We know, because we are not naive, that the terrible scourge of the drug problem is not just as a consequence of where the drugs are produced, but also as a consequence of those who use them. So your comments are timely and helpful.

Your comments with respect to the environment come at a time when at a global level and all around the earth people are more and more realizing that this may well be the great issue that we have to resolve. Your comments bring encouragement and help to your friends here.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker Fraser: It means a great deal to us, who share the continent with you, to hear your comments because leadership is something that in this day and age must go beyond national boundaries and that when you make these statements, which are the statements of a true leader, they are an inspiration for all of us. We are deeply grateful for the message that you have brought to us from your country.

In closing, Mr. President and Madam, let me say on behalf of all who are here today, and many who are not able to be here, we value immensely our friendship with your country. We want to continue the relationship in a more and more effective way. We welcome you here today. We wish you could stay longer. We wish both you and Madam and your colleagues the very warmest best wishes from all Canadians. Thank you.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

FORESTRY

TABLING OF FIRST ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour today to table, in both official languages, the first annual report to Parliament on the state of forestry in Canada.

In keeping with the commitment inherent in the new Forestry Act to monitor and to protect our environment, of which our forests are such an essential component, this report establishes a new era of national accountability for forest management and resources.

In receiving this document, Mr. Speaker, you will notice that the current economic status of the health of the forests are presented in a form which is easy to understand and which will provide the general public a basis on which to form an opinion so they can participate in the decision-making process regarding our forests in the future.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 28 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to present a petition on behalf of a large number of constituents from Kamloops and surrounding communities in British Columbia.

The petitioners state that whereas the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and private broadcasting stations are required by the Canadian Broadcasting Act to provide access to their broadcasting facilities to all Canadian citizens on an equitable and non-discriminatory basis, and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has failed to act in good faith on behalf of three separate requests made by a Canadian citizen to have his views directed and presented over its provincial and national broadcasting facilities in direct context, the petitioners then are calling upon the Government of Canada to demand that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and all private broadcasting stations in Canada provide access to their broadcasting facilities to all Canadian citizens, said access to be in direct context.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, once again I have the honour to rise in the House and present a petition on behalf of the young farmers of Lambton County who state that our Canadian citizens are being polluted by the ever-increasing automotive emissions and whereas ethanol can be produced from corn, wheat, and barley and is a renewable resource, plants remove carbon dioxide from the atmosphere.

They state that a minimum 3.2 per cent oxygen content in gasoline fuels should be mandatory and MMT should be banned.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to present a petition signed by approximately 43 residents of Edmonton, Kingston, Calgary, Surrey, Stoney Plain, and Victoria. They have all petitioned Parliament to put Canada back on track and indicate their support for the NDP's plan to restore VIA Rail.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege today to present two petitions, both of which have been cleared through the clerk of petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first petition is signed by 32 residents, principally from British Columbia but from other points as well. It calls on Parliament to reject the goods and services tax and to ensure that if and when there is broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, this reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab. The point of course is that the opposition of the Canadian people to the goods and services tax has in no way diminished.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, my second petition which is signed by 120 residents, principally of Edmonton, calls on the House and I quote from the petition: "We need Petro-Canada to remain 100 per cent Canadian thereby keeping the money it makes in Canada". The petitioners call on the House to defeat or repeal, which would be the more appropriate choice at this point, Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the National Petroleum Company of Canada, and keep Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation acting in the best interests of all Canadians.

THE SENATE

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to present this petition from a number of constituents in my riding. In the petition, they comment that they know the Senate was established in 1867 to represent the regions of Canada and to provide a medium for sober second thought and, whereas the Senate now performs no useful function, is completely partisan and has proven, after many efforts, to be impossible to reform, the petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to abolish the Senate outright.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed from Monday, April 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 19129) and the amendment of Mr. Dingwall (p. 19156).

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada)): Mr. Speaker, you will recall at the close of debate yesterday, there was an exchange between myself and the member for Winnipeg Transcona. I had agreed that I would take his questions and do my best to answer them today. I think there was unanimous consent yesterday for me to do that. If there is unanimous consent, I would be prepared to do that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Do hon. members give unanimous consent to extend questions and comments period?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by prefacing my remarks with something I had intended to say yesterday. I had intended to mention of the good work done by a committee of the House in 1982-83, a committee headed by Tom Lefebvre who is now a senator in the other place. It was a committee on parliamentary reform and did some very good work. Among other things, it established a firm calendar to operate under and it got rid of evening sittings of the House. Both of those were very important to us. There was resistance to that change, but he did it. The committee persevered, the House accepted it and it has been good.

I want to make a point to my friend from Winnipeg Transcona. Not all of the recommendations of that particular committee were accepted, nor were all of the recommendations of the McGrath Commission accepted. Every time committees like this meet and bring proposals forward, some of them get accepted and there is a general trend line of improvement of the way the House operates.

I pay tribute to the Tom Lefebvre committee as well as the McGrath commission. I point out that we resisted change. Allan MacEachen, who was House Leader at the time, certainly resisted it, not because he was opposed to change, but because he would have to learn the rules all over again. He is like some lawyers; they are all in favour of legal reform until they realize they have to learn new statute law and build new case law. They then lose their zest for legal reform.

I want to make that point, sir. The member for Winnipeg Transcona was asking about when the government does things that are not part of the campaign promises. That is a legitimate question. He could have used better examples. He mentioned GST and free trade. Those were both prominent in the campaigns. The 1987 white paper on taxation, which was tabled in June of 1987, was debated for 15 months before we went into the campaign and debated during the campaign. Those people who were opposed to the GST are now helping the public to believe that the government had no mandate to bring it in. For that they have to answer to themselves because they are not being honest with the public on this.

There was plenty of debate and, believe me, I was on the griddle many a time on the campaign trail concerning it. Mike Cassidy, the former member from Ottawa Centre, spoke on that. For people who are opposed to the GST, to help perpetuate the notion that there was no mandate, are being a little bit politically dishonest. I need to say nothing about the free trade debate. However, there are cases that the member for Winnipeg could have mentioned. For example, issues come forward after the campaign is over, after the government is in office, which could not have been anticipated during the campaign. I think there is only one thing for the opposition to do and that is to make sure that the government, when it attacks and tackles those issues, does it within the confines of its own philosophy.

For a government like ours to promote decentralization and privatization and then bring in a bill that would create new Crown corporations would be a little bit contradictory. I think we would be rightfully taken to task for that. So they need to keep us consistent with our philosophy. That is fair.

There is another issue that is more difficult to handle, and that is when a political party allows its real agenda to be hidden during a campaign. That is a problem. The public needs to protect the whole democratic process of an election campaign by grilling each of the parties on what its real agenda is. That is the purpose of an election campaign. We have to get away from allowing the party hacks of all parties determining the campaign by way of slogans rather than substance. That is where democracy begins. We must not be bamboozled in any campaign by the superficial sloganeering.

The second question the member for Winnipeg asked was about the whole committee process. He said: "Would it not be better when the McGrath commission asked that committees deal with a process that would allow us to deal in principle and substance debated beforehand". He is right. He is absolutely right.

An hon. member: This is a speech.

Mr. Friesen: Well, I am simply trying to deal with his questions and I have done it. When we dealt with the Canada Pension Plan bill, the minister of health at that time submitted the bill in principle. It was debated outside the House. It was dealt with in committee and brought back to House and dealt with in one day. We need to do more of that. We did it with the gun control legislation and it works. We need to do more of that.

Third, the member asked about efficiency. I would agree with him that efficiency is bad if it deteriorates the role and the importance of the private member. It is good if efficiency enhances the role of the private member.

He asked about the staffing of committees and the role of parliamentary secretaries and the whips in bringing about substitutions. Both of those, I would submit to my friend, are problems within a caucus and the membership of the House itself. We make the system work or we do not. The whips have a job to do to make sure that their party is properly represented in committee. If we as members do not fulfil our obligations to sit in committees when we are challenged to do so, when we have signed up for it, then that system falls apart and the whip gets powers we do not want him to have. It is up to us to make the system work.

Finally, I would simply say that those committees that are aggressive get the resources they need to do the work and the rooms they need to do the work. Those that are passive and take direction lose that. Those that give direction get the resources and the committee rooms they want.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in this debate today. I suggest in some ways it is a very important debate in this House, because it deals with the changes the government has proposed to our rules.

I want to say at the outset that I find the government's method of proceeding in this way to be contrary to the traditions of this House. My experience is that in most cases where substantial changes to the rules have been proposed, the government has dealt through a committee of the House and got a report from the committee.

I can go back to the last major rule changes, first of all rising out of the McGrath committee report, which are the most recent, but they go back to 1969 when the changes were made that provided for the time allocation rules of this House.

The government acted first through a committee of the House which considered the proposed changes, made a report, and the government then acted on the report. If you check the historical precedent in 1969, you will see the government in fact moved a motion, but that was simply to the same effect as the committee's report, and that motion was moved and proposed in the House after the committee had completed a detailed study of the rules.

This time we have had the government say in House leaders' meetings that it had changes it would like to propose to the rules; here they are; tell us what you think. I submit that it is contrary to the past practice of this House. It has denied the opportunity for public input on the changes that are being proposed which fundamentally affect the way this House operates. This House is, after all, the public forum of this country where citizens have the right to express their views through their representatives and, on occasion directly, in the committees.

The government is changing the rules of the game to suit its own political purposes. We in the opposition object to that change. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, the House leader for the Official Opposition, detailed our objections to those rules very carefully yesterday.

I am not going to review the same ground, but I do want to make a comment on the general approach of the government and suggest that it has been wrong-headed from the start on this issue.

Having said that, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Peace River for the active role he played in the negotiation process that led to the resolution that was tabled in the House. I was happy to work with him in the course of those negotiations. I acknowledge that some of the very sensible suggestions that were put forward from this side were accepted by him and included in the rules. He amended some of the government's original proposals to make them better in my view for all Canadians, and also more palatable for the members of the opposition parties in this House.

I submit that in the end, he was unable or unwilling to go far enough in making changes to the proposals. We have therefore moved an amendment to those rules to delete the particularly odious provisions that are included in the package that was tabled before the House. I recognize the efforts he made and I am sorry that we are unable to achieve more agreement. Had there been an opportunity for committee discussion on these rule changes, I believe that greater agreement would have been obtained on all sides. I am sorry that has not taken place. I am sorry it was not agreeable to him and to his superior, the government House leader, that in fact a reference on this motion be made to a committee so that detailed study could proceed in that body.

The essential thrust of these rule changes is to limit debate in this House. The rules seek to do it in two ways, first, by making the House sit less, and second, by streamlining—and I use the word advisedly—the closure rules.

I am not going to run through all of the rule changes in detail, but the amendment we have moved, that deletes a series of the proposed changes, deletes the new scheduling arrangements. It deletes the provision in the rules proposed that limits to 15 minutes the opportunity to present petitions from the people of Canada in this House. We deleted the changes in the closure rule that restrict the hours of debate by a further three hours after closure has been imposed. It is one of the most Draconian closure rules in the British Commonwealth, and yet the government is seeking to cut off another three hours of debate.

We have objected to the further change in the time allocation rules which will save the government another day of debate and will enable it to force through legislation in something like five days in this House, not counting first reading. We have objected to the reductions and limitations on budget and throne speech debates and on borrowing bills. That is the thrust of the amendment that we have moved. We have suggested that all of those rather odious provisions be stricken from the package that the government has put before this House.

In some ways I suppose it is not surprising that the opposition has taken this view, but I must say I was shocked to hear the government House leader, or read of the government House leader's comments in respect of the rule changes the other day. In his speech yesterday afternoon, he was protesting the outrageous comments of the hon. member for Kamloops. Well, I think everyone in this House knows that the hon. member for Kamloops has a tendency to exaggerate, a tendency to hyperbole, and tends to blow things out of proportion. In other words, I think making a mountain out of a molehill is a commonplace for the hon. member for Kamloops, and I think everybody here knows that. Having said that, the government House leader I thought protested too much yesterday, especially having regard to what he said in the Globe and Mail on March 23. I would like to quote the government House leader. I quote the article by Susan Delacourt:

> Mr. Andre says the opposition's planned fight against the rule changes is just for the sake of appearances, since the three party leaders have been actively negotiating the changes since December.

I presume he meant by that that just because you have been negotiating means you somehow agree. I think the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond in his very able speech yesterday made it very clear that we did not agree. This is pure pie in the sky rubbish coming from the government House leader. He ought to know better. He went on to say:

> "They will battle for show, but they're glad we're going ahead with it," he said. The government hopes to have the changes approved by the time the Commons adjourns on Wednesday,—

That was of course several weeks ago:

> —but is prepared to have MPs come back on April 8 if more time is needed to get approval."

Since we only started the debate yesterday, it is obvious that more time is in fact needed.

For the government House leader, having accused the member for Kamloops of being unfair in labelling these changes as Fascist or dictatorial, to suggest that somehow we are opposing these for the purpose of show is a bit far-fetched. In fact, I suggest that it was a most improper suggestion. He ought not to have made it. We are not opposing these for show. We are opposing these because we believe in practice and in theory that the changes are bad.

We believe that this country functions best when it has a strong and effective opposition. In fact, that was the view of the Conservative Party until very recently when its ideas of Parliament and its role and its importance changed dramatically. I am going to deal with what I think are the reasons for those changes a little later in my speech, but I want to talk first about their attitude to the importance of opposition, which they have done so well for so many years in Canada, particularly throughout this century.

After all, it is only since 1984 that we have had any Conservative government hold office for any length of time in the course of this century, since Borden's government collapsed in 1921. Nevertheless, their role as an effective opposition is well known. Now, having found that government is less comfortable, they have decided that perhaps oppositions should be muzzled and controlled. That is the purpose of the rule changes that are before us today.

I would like to read a quotation from the book, the leading work I suggest, on the Parliament of Canada by Charles Edward Selwyn Franks, one of my distinguished constituents, and a good friend of mine, and a former professor of mine, who wrote in his book, The Parliament of Canada, on page 5 the following about the functions of Parliament. I will not detail the first four, which I believe the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond in his very able speech yesterday mentioned. I will simply read the other two. He said this:

> There are two further functions of parliament which are so important that they deserve to be identified in their own right, though they might also be subsumed under the general rubric of making a government work. The first of these is the function of parliament as a recruiting and training ground for political leaders; the second is the function of political communication, where the processes of Parliamentary discussion, in Bagehot's terms, express the mind of the people, teach society, and inform both government and citizen of grievances and problems.

That exposition of the importance of an opposition in Parliament to inform the people and to express their grievances in Parliament is a deep rooted one in the British parliamentary tradition. Over the years governments have sought to curtail the rights of oppositions to present grievances and to argue their case. Governments resent oppositions that look like a government in waiting because it is perceived that all the weaknesses of the government are shown up by a skilful and competent opposition.

What this government is facing in this House is exactly that, a skilful and competent opposition. It is suffering in the polls as a result of that fact and so it is seeking to close down Parliament, shut the opposition up so it cannot present itself as a reasonable, sensible and viable alternative.

If any greater authority on the role of an opposition is needed, I do not think I could find one, other than looking beyond perhaps the most famous of all opposition leaders in this century, Mr. Diefenbaker.

• (1130)

He used to lead hon. members opposite when he was Prime Minister, but he was better known as Leader of the Opposition. He was a disastrous Prime Minister, but as Leader of the Opposition, everyone acknowledged his effectiveness.

I am sure that Mr. Stanfield would acknowledge his effectiveness because throughout the years that that gentleman had the honour of leading the Conservative Party of Canada, he was constantly overshadowed by the former leader, Mr. Diefenbaker.

I would like to quote from a little work called "John G. Diefenbaker: Those Things We Treasure". It is a little book of his speeches. The unfortunate thing about the book is that it does not give the source. It is just a selection of speeches on freedom and in defence of our parliamentary heritage published by MacMillan of Canada.

I am sorry that it does not give the source because I am sure that the speeches were delivered in important places and would add weight to the veracity of the statements contained in them.

Mr. Dick: Are you filling in time?

Mr. Milliken: I see the hon. member for Lanark—Carleton is waking up. I am glad he is enjoying my speech.

Mr. Dick: Are you filling in time?

Mr. Milliken: I am filling in a good deal of time. If the hon. member would pay attention to it, I think he would find that he might change this resolution and realize what a mistake the government is making in proceeding this way.

I will read from page 5 of the little work: "On the Role of an Opposition". I quote:

> Only a strong and alert opposition can hope to check and control the excessive powers contrary to the Constitution that may be assumed or conferred upon governmental administration, the so-called bureaucracy.
> Only an alert opposition can prevent the short-cuts through democratic procedures that cabinet ministers and bureaucrats frequently find attractive. It is only the opposition, functioning as a recognized part of parliamentary proceedings, that stands opposed to the degeneration of the governmental system into a form of arbitrary direction of public affairs by the executive and the bureaucracy.
> Without it, minorities woul stand unprotected. Freedom would wither. Individual liberty would be in jeopardy. Unwarranted and oppressive invasion of private rights would grow unchecked.
> Without an effective opposition, the administration in office could and would carry on the task of running the country under circumstances identical with the totalitarian one-party state. To some, this may seem an efficient way of running the country, but the first victim under such a regime as Hitler, Stalin and Mussolini demonstrated is freedom itself.
> Without an opposition, it is not too much to say the parliamentary system of government would fail in its primary task of protecting the rights of individuals and minorities, and of ensuring freedom and democracy. In the parliamentary system, an opposition is as necessary as the cabinet itself. One without the other would mean tyranny or chaos.

> It is commonplace that governments view an effective opposition as an obstruction. That is a view that is too often and too lightly taken up by unthinking critics of Parliament. An opposition that discharges its parliamentary responsibilities may appear in the superficial view to be obstructionist.
> Extended opposition means lengthy debate. It was the British Labour Party chairman, Professor Harold Laski, who wrote that the alternative to the talking shop is the concentration camp.

I suggest that these words of the former Leader of the Conservative Party, the former Prime Minister of Canada and a distinguished Leader of the Opposition, are words that the government should be paying attention to.

It should follow the advice contained in Mr. Diefenbaker's words and heed them. I quote again from his works, on page 36 of this book:

> Professor Ivor Jennings, the great English authority on Parliament said, and rightly, that the function of Parliament is not to govern but to criticize, to modify government policy and to educate public opinion.
> To those who say that Parliament should be turning out legislation in quantity, my answer is that its mission is freedom and the assurance that all the people shall receive justice. It is not a slot machine into which one drops a slug to see the legislation come out.

I suggest that this government takes the attitude that Parliament is a sausage machine or a slot machine into which one drops a slug and watches legislation come out. The evidence of that is manifold throughout the list of changes that it has proposed to the Standing Orders.

I could quote further from the book, but like many of Mr. Diefenbaker's speeches, it is very repetitious.

I do commend hon. members, though, to read the work. I think they will find that instead of sitting there supporting this resolution they will stand up and admit that they are wrong, make changes in it and agree to the amendment that we have proposed in this House.

I would like to go back in time to 1969, because one of the changes this government is proposing to the Standing Orders is a change to the time allocation rules. Time allocation rules were brought in in this House in 1969 by the then Liberal government over the profound objections of the opposition. The hon. member for Peace River can correct me if I am wrong, but in 1969 there was no member in this House sitting on the Conservative benches who is currently sitting here. I believe all have moved on to greater things. Sorry, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants was here. He is now an independent member. I can see he recanted from his views and has moved on to greater things. The government finally used closure to get these rules through, after 12 days of debate. After 12 days of debate. I want to point that out to the parliamentary secretary. I can assure him that if closure is applied on this debate, he will hear about the 12 days of debate that went on in 1969. We are quite prepared to debate these for 12 days, I can assure the hon. member.

Pardon? The hon. member asks how many hours a day. I will get the information and check, but I assure him that it was very similar to the hours of sitting that we now have. Because, of course, there were night sittings in those days and they sat late and worked at night. Oh, this is a phoney point of order.

Mr. Hawkes: Point of order. Just on behalf of the government, we accept his offer to extend the sitting this evening so that more debate can occur, and I hope the unanimous feeling exists in the House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's kind intervention. He knows it wasn't a point of order; it was just an attempt to disrupt my speech.

I wanted to read from Mr. Diefenbaker's speech on the occasion of the debate on these rule changes. What happened was that Mr. Diefenbaker and the members of his party—and at another time I may quote some of the other members—but the changes that were brought in by the time allocation motion were said to be a total disaster for Parliament. The Conservative Party at that time took the view that this was going to destroy the institution. We all know that somehow Parliament survived those changes and the rule has been used from time to time, although not extensively.

What Mr. Diefenbaker said on that occasion was this: "I ask this of the ministers—and I am faced by a galaxy of two, two ministers sitting across the corridor when Parliament is discussing a matter that, if carried into effect, will be the death sentence of this institution." I see I have one so he doubled that.

He went on to say: "They sit and they smirk." This is what Mr. Diefenbaker said about the attitude of the government to the rule changes that the government was proposing and that, in fact, have been used and adopted in this country for many years. This government, which used to say this was such a disaster, is now proposing to reduce the time available to members to discuss rule changes, even under the present time allocation rules. It is cutting by one day the time available for debate at report and third reading stage as a result of these changes.

The hon. member looks surprised. Read the rules. It cuts it by 24 hours. I say that it is a shocking abuse of the government's authority in this House.

Why is the government flying in the face of these historical principles that give the opposition an opportunity to oppose?

I see that my time has run out, Mr. Speaker, so I am going to have to answer that question myself, either in questions and comments or in my next speech on the subamendment that I expect will be moved later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Ten minutes, questions and comments period. The hon. member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): I would just like to ask the member, who understands rules and procedure very well, why he chose to give us a history lesson instead of dealing with the technical difficulties he sees in the rule changes. Why would he do that when we are debating rule changes, and he does not deal with that?

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond gave an extremely lucid and very clear exposition on the technical difficulties with the rule changes. Perhaps the hon. member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley did not understand when I said in my speech that I was not going to traverse the same territory he had. I have tried to explain the thrust of the the very technical rules. I did give a list that we are objecting to in our amendment. They are all being objected to because they cut the time available to members of the opposition to speak in this House and for this House to work through three methods: By shortening the times of sittings; by reducing the number of sitting days by about 41; and by reducing the number of days available to the opposition to debate the matters it chooses. There are five days taken away from us as supply days. There are two days taken away from the debate in reply to the speech from the throne, and there are two days taken off the budget debate. In addition to that there is a two-day limitation on second reading of the borrowing bill.

All those are effectively opposition days. They are days when the opposition can choose to move amendments and debate subjects of its choosing, not subjects dictated by government order and decree.

What I am saying to the hon. member—he may have missed this in the early part of my remarks—is that I was not going to go through the technical aspects of it. I am dealing with the question of general fairness.

While I am on my feet I will tell him why I think the government has changed its mind on this. In 1984 throughout the campaign the government kept saying how it was going to change the rules of Parliament, reform Parliament, and make it a better institution. It did make some changes. Now it is going back on all that. As the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond pointed out yesterday these changes are not along the lines of the McGrath reforms. They are retrograde steps in most cases and the government has found that its members must stay in Ottawa now. When they were in opposition for 50 years before 1984, with the odd break, they found they could run back and forth to their ridings all the time. Now they have to be here to maintain their majority otherwise they would get defeated in this House and there would be an election in which they would all lose.

When you are at 12 per cent in the polls you do not keep many seats. Even the hon. member for Peace River knows—and he must be quaking in his boots—that he would lose his riding if there were an election tomorrow. So they all stay in Ottawa.

They are down in the polls and they say: "Boy, if we could only get to our ridings we could get up in the polls". They will not because the policies they are pursuing are so bad they cause them to be down in the polls. It is not their presence in Ottawa. It is because their policies are so terrible.

They say: "Well, if we could go out and sell the policies across the country, if we could get out around Canada and tell Canadians what a great job we are doing, they might believe us and maybe we would go up in the polls". They will not. They are going down, and they are staying down, because their policies are so rotten.

We are here exposing those policies day after day and it makes them nervous. So they say: "We do not want our bad policies exposed. We want to spend the time in our ridings instead where at least we can commiserate with the misery we have inflicted on Canadians with our disastrous policies of free trade, GST, high interest rates and all that sort of stuff. Let us shut Parliament down; let us curtail debate; let us limit the right of the opposition to raise subjects of interest. Then we will be all right. Then we will go up in the polls". That is the purpose of these rule changes. That is why they are being done now. Instead of in 1984 or in 1989, they are being brought in in 1991 because they know an election is around the corner. They see how far down they are in the polls and they say: " We have to salvage something from the wreckage of six years of disastrous government."

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I certainly listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member from Kingston and the Islands, and I also watched on television the interesting exchange by the member for Winnipeg—Bird's Hill and the member for Surrey—White Rock. I must say that did get more into the atmosphere of debate on something that is pretty important. Those are the rules of this House.

I did subtly remind the former speaker—I have to confess I was here—when we had the last major rules changes in 1969. I think that is when Thumper Macdonald, our present high commissioner in London, got the nickname Thumper. We did have that long debate; it went into the summertime. There were many hours of debate; morning, noon, and night. Then finally the government invoked closure to amend the rules in a more fundamental way than I perceive in these changes.

I have other things I would like to say at some time but I was very interested in the references made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I was here in the House during his leader's speech which was certainly lengthy and did cover points in an arresting way. Frankly I think the opposition is really off base on a lot of its concerns. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands blessed in a government role, would say the same thing the Parliamentary Secretary to the House leader and the member for Peace River would say. I shudder and shake to think what a fellow called Erik Nielsen would do if he were in this House regarding these rules in view of some of the debates we have had on minor rules changes.

You get it both ways, but frankly it depends where you sit.

I am very interested as an independent member, and frankly there are going to be more, regardless of the whole thrust of the Elections Act which does not allow independent members to collect money in the same way that members of registered parties collect money. That is going to involve an interesting law suit in the federal court to in effect have an injunction against any collections unless there is a change. I hope to question the Government House Leader in Question Period today on that. There are so many things.

These rules are for the recognized parties and the role of an independent is very remote to say the least. We have heard a lot about the tentative agreements or all the preliminary discussions. In the motion that the loyal opposition filed, I noticed that it does not refer to paragraph 20.

My direct question to the member for Kingston and the Islands, who was involved in these discussions is: Was his party in agreement with clause 20? The very fundamental change in the question of unanimous consent goes out the window unless there are 25 members who will stand up and say: "Hey, you cannot go ahead". I heard and understood the House Leader yesterday talk about someone mentioning that this was only done in Routine Proceedings. This is the greatest charade in the world. Routine Proceedings can start in this House on Monday under the new parliamentary calendar which started today. You can hardly have 25 people in the House.

You can have a Government House Leader stand in this House and do this under the new suggested change in unanimous consent. I say with all respect to everything that has been said. I know my time is up, but I would like to ask a specific question: Since the loyal opposition did not refer to paragraph 20, can I assume that the Liberal opposition is in favour of paragraph 20 which fundamentally changes the whole concept of unanimous consent?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, to answer the hon. member's question about the elections procedures governing donations to his party, I have a Private Member's bill before this House to amend substantially the Canada Elections Act. If he could convince his former colleagues on the other side of the House to allow that bill to proceed, I would be happy to deal with the issue in committee, if it is not already in the bill, that would cover the problem he has raised.

Mr. Nowlan: It is a good charter case.

Mr. Milliken: Well, I hope we do not have to do it by charter. I hope we can do it right here in this House.

With respect to paragraph 20 of the Standing Orders, the proposal was discussed and was more or less agreed. As I said, there was agreement on very very few things. Most of the items were discussed and as the hon. Parliamentary Secretary will say there was part of a package and, therefore, there was not specific agreement on any one item. The proposal we found favourable in respect to unanimous consent was this proposal. Instead of 25 members, it was, I believe, 15. We preferred that.

I want to make it clear that this does change the unanimous consent rule. The minister must rise, ask for unanimous consent to put his motion and it must be refused. During Routine Proceedings at a subsequent time he may then put his motion. The notice is there. Members should realize that the motion will then come up in Routine Proceedings. Generally, we assumed there would be more than 15 members, which was what we thought, or 25 members present to object and therefore it would be stopped. It is a change in the rules, but we think it is a worth-while one. We feel there are many routine motions that are dealt with in this House on the basis of unanimous consent which are denied for frivolous reasons. The House ought to have some mechanism of allowing those motions to go through without the necessity of 48 hours' notice.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this debate. I do want to say, at the very outset, that the tone of the debate for the last couple of days has been good and has really reflected the kind of attitude the House needs to take to its rule changes.

There are, however, a couple of exceptions. The first day was entirely wasted by having the Speaker read the motion before this House. Members could have better used that time to discuss the issues that are so important to us.

I am a little disappointed that the member for Kingston and the Islands chose not to discuss at length and in detail some of the changes. Having worked with him at great length over the last few months on these rule changes, I know he has a very clear understanding of not only of the rules as proposed, but of the implications of those rules and an understanding of the tradition which has been part of the process that has brought us to where we are today in the House of Commons.

It has been a fascinating process to go through these negotiations in the last few months, to look at a number of Standing Orders and to come up with a package which I think is a significant package, a package which is good for the whole House. It is not a package designed, as the hon. members opposite would have you believe, to protect a government on the run. It is anything but that. It is is consistent with the McGrath reforms. It builds on those reforms and brings some of them up to date to face the reality that we live with today.

It is consistent with some of the work begun by Tom Lefebvre as chairman of another committee on rule changes back in 1980–81. That was my first experience with rule changes. I was privileged as a new member of this house to be a member of that committee and found it a very enlightening experience and a great opportunity to get a bit of an understanding of the traditions of this House.

I think the rule changes we are dealing with here in the House today are consistent with those traditions.

There are about four particular elements that I want to address in my remarks today. I want to begin by looking at the changes to the committee process. I begin there because, for me, that is one of the most interesting and exciting elements of the House of Commons procedures and processes. I begin there because one of my favourite times as a member was the time that I spent on committees.

I was a member of the McGrath task force when I thought that committees, for the first time, were given powers and opportunities which they never had before. When I was a member of a committee in opposition, the only things we could work on were those items referred to us by a minister of the Crown. We, as a committee, never had the opportunity to discuss anything that was controversial or anything that would have in any way pushed the government.

This government changed that significantly with the McGrath task force by allowing committees to become self-starting, by allow committees freedom and latitude to work within their subject areas to develop policy ideas and to develop a process that could have an influence on the government process in this country.

Out of that flowed two very significant elements. One was that standing committees would be self-starting; with the ability to move, to act and to explore. The other was to put in place legislative committees. Those legislative committees were to, at that point, deal strictly with legislation, to deal with it in a technical way and to accept the fact that the House had already adopted, in principle, the legislation that was referred to the legislative committee.

That is where McGrath started. It is where McGrath put forward a proposal which was accepted by this House.

Unfortunately, since that time a couple of things have happened. The legislative committees, not in all cases but in some cases, began to view themselves, not as legislative committees, but as standing committees.

They began to fuzz the two lines that were to exist between these committees and try to get them both to function in the same way. It undermined a very fundamental part of what I thought the McGrath task force was trying to establish.

The McGrath task force had recommended that the number of standing committees be reduced and that the membership of those committees be small, preferably around eight members. Since then we have gone from the 17 or 18 committees that the McGrath task force recommended, to some 21 to 23 today.

We have also gone from the majority of committees being eight or nine members to 14 members. As a result, we have once again undermined some of the fundamental elements of the McGrath task force.

That brings me to the changes we have here. We asked that the committees be developed into five envelopes. The committees remain. We do not change them. However, they are gathered into five envelopes. Each of those envelopes has a consistency which flows through it—a thread of common interest. Whether it is an economic interest, a human resources interest or a natural resources interest dealing with things like oil, gas and forestry, there is a common thread there.

The reason for that is to pick up on what the McGrath task force tried to accomplish: To develop an expertise in our standing committees that would serve as a resource for both this House and for the government in the development of policy or legislation that would affect this country.

I think that by bringing us back to this envelope process, we encourage the concentration and the development of that expertise. We do not in any way change the membership rights which members enjoy under the McGrath task force. In fact, it is the member who, under these proposals, continues to have the say over his or her substitutes on a particular committee. Within an envelope dealing with that substitution list submitted by a member, it is very easy to make an exchange.

Consistent with McGrath, we have tried to bring the legislative committees it back to what was originally suggested: Legislative committees will be legislative committees. They will not try to act as standing committees. They will not try to be something they were not designed to be. They will look at technical witnesses and they will meet with them. Technical witnesses may include members of a department, people who work for a department, lawyers who are familiar with the subject area, or interest groups that have a technical response to a bill. The fundamental goal of the McGrath task force was to see that those legislative committees would accept that the House had already dealt with that bill in principle. There is a thread there.

There is another important aspect in this rule change package. Right now, if the House were to decide to send a specific issue to a standing committee, for example, but there was not consent to do so, the House would have no choice but to refer the bill, or the subject matter of it, to a legislative committee even though there may be widespread support on all sides of the House to send it to the specific standing committee, or a special committee. One of the rule changes we provided for in this particular package, is that now by vote the House can decide to send a bill or an issue to a special committee, to a standing committee, or to a legislative committee. This is very consistent with the kind of goals the McGrath task force was trying to accomplish.

There is one exception in the area of committees which caused me some concern, and I know will have caused some concern to other members familiar with the work of McGrath. One of the things we had recommended during the McGrath work was that parliamentary secretaries not be part of standing committees. Mr. Speaker, we did that based on the experience that all of us had come through in that period. From 1980 to 1984, it was the government which directed what issues any particular committee would or could discuss. When an issue was before a standing committee, the parliamentary secretary started acting like a policeman or a director. He or she had tremendous control over that committee. As a result, members reacted by saying they did not want parliamentary secretaries on committees.

• (1200)

Since the McGrath reforms, what has happened is that opposition critics who are expert in a given subject area are members and active participants in the committees. But on the government side the one individual who is not a member of cabinet, yet has the most experience with a particular subject area, bill, or issue, the parliamentary secretary, is excluded from the process.

So, Mr. Speaker, we have come full circle. We have now said that we saw where McGrath was going; we understood what McGrath was trying to accomplish at the time; but it was not working. It was not working because the committee was being robbed of an individual who was a tremendous resource to the committee in terms of information, in terms of access to the department, and all that is going on within that particular department.

We have now come to the point where we feel it is time to put the parliamentary secretaries back into the committee, to give them an opportunity to build bridges between the committee and the department, and the department and the committee. I hope this will fulfil the very goals the McGrath task force set out to accomplish, which was to give backbenchers in the House of Commons an opportunity through the committee process to develop policies, legislation, and direction on any issue that this country may be faced with.

I referred very briefly to the requests of McGrath to reduce the size of our committees from 14 members to 8. We have renewed that request in this package. We have not done it by changing the rules and by restricting in our Standing Orders the sizes of committees. We did not do that for a reason which is very simple. It is something we want negotiated and discussed by the members of this House. My own experience was that when I have been a member of a small committee, that committee worked well. It built a relationship within itself that often ended up with a unanimous report which then was reflected in the legislation of the day.

Therefore, we have once again put the request to members on all sides of this House that they seriously consider reducing those committees that now have memberships of 14 members, and reducing them to eight. It is an option of the House. It is not something the government has any intention to direct, or wants to direct. It is a process we hope the members themselves will develop and see the opportunity that we think exists.

The last matter I want to mention about committees is the question of televising committee hearings. That has been an issue of controversy in the House and for good reason. There are some very strongly held feelings on both sides of this House. For example, I am concerned that when the television cameras came into the Chamber—I was not here before—one of the things that began to happen and is part of our everyday experience here now is that many of us play to the cameras when participating in debate. We do not play to the audience, or talk to the people here in the Chamber, or to the Chair. We play to the cameras. As a result it changes our behaviour.

What happens if we go into a committee environment and the same thing happens there? The one area in our parliamentary process that has been very active, very influential, what if it too becomes another stage? Then we have a problem.

Nevertheless, we must recognize that we are in a new world today. It is unfair to allow print media to have full access to committees and yet not allow electronic media the same access. We shut out radio and television. We have to recognize that reality.

That is why in these rules there is now a change to develop experimental guidelines for the televising and radio linkage of committee hearings. We use the word "experimental" because it is very fundamental. It is very important. We have to build an experience together and we have to decide on a type of system that will allow the committees to function to their maximum ability, yet provide, as much as possible, equal access to all media, electronic or print.

The second thing that I want to touch on, briefly, is the calendar. That has been one of the areas which has received significant media attention. We have heard all sorts of arguments about it. The proposal in this particular package is that we move to the three and one formula, where the House would sit approximately three weeks and then it would not sit for one week. That time could be used for one of two things: first, members could return to their ridings to meet with their constituents, to hold public meetings, private meetings, whatever they choose to do; or, second, that time could be used for committee work.

I heard yesterday the member from Hamilton going on and on about how this was running away from responsibility. He had no problem being here in the House of Commons. He could be here Friday. He could be here Monday. Therefore this was a gross example of a government trying to duck and run.

Mr. Speaker, I have to tell you as a member that was sitting in this House listening to that speech, I was very much offended by it. Why was I offended? Because I cannot travel to my riding in two or three or even six hours. To get to my constituency takes me 12 hours. If I want to be back in my riding to hold meetings on Saturday morning, I have to leave here Thursday night. If I am going to be here Monday, I have to leave Sunday night.

So, Mr. Speaker, you can see very quickly for someone like myself, who lives in a northern and a western riding, why this kind of formula has a great deal of appeal. I can then stay here through that three-week period. I can focus and dedicate my time to the work of the House, committees or whatever particular role I may have at that moment, but then I can take a week—and in fact, if you take in the weekends, which gives you a little bit more time—I can go home and do some concentrated constituency work, listening to my people, gathering their concerns and bringing them back with me and hopefully have those reflected in the debates and the issues before this House.

I was offended when I heard a member, who can be on a plane and probably in his riding in two or three hours, or even jump in a car and be there in five hours, tell me that I am neglecting my duties and my responsibilities and I am somehow ducking the issue by asking that instead of giving me a weekend, that I get from time to time a week to work in my riding.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling that my time is about to expire. It is unfortunate because I am just beginning my remarks.

There are a number of things that flow from those changes. There is the reduction in the budget days from six debating days to four. There is the reduction in the throne speech from eight to six days. There is the reduction in the allotted days from 25 to 20. All of those flow from the calendar, not because we are trying to limit debate. If I were to buy the logic of the opposition, then to have the perfect democracy we would sit 365 days. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, their whole argument is that democracy is based on the number of days that we sit. So we are going to go for perfection in Canada. We will sit 365 days.

The problem is, Mr. Speaker, that if you look at what happens in the opposition benches, they are on a roster system. One-third of their members at any one time are back in their ridings. They are not here working in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, my time has expired. I wish I had more time to continue with my arguments. I believe very strongly this package is consistent with the work began by Tom Lefebvre and is consistent with the reforms brought in by the McGrath task force. This is a package that is designed to help all members of the House, whether they are on the opposition benches or the government benches.

It is not a Draconian package. It is not fascist as we heard it described. It is a fair package and it is one that I am very comfortable defending in any forum, including the one where it is going to have the most impact, here in the House of Commons.

• (1210)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the parliamentary secretary's speech, as I thought I would. As the hon. member for Surrey—White Rock—Langley indicated, it was not a history lesson. I am sorry that he did not enjoy my history lesson. I thought he might have found it helpful to fit these rule changes into the context, particularly when I was quoting most extensively in my speech from his former leader, Mr. Diefenbaker. I am surprised he was disappointed in that.

The hon. member for Peace River in his speech talked about the wonders of the rule changes and particularly the change that allows the one week off for the member to go to his riding. I think he misconstrued the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton West, and I admit it was open to this misconstruction yesterday. But the point the hon. member for Hamilton West was making so effectively was that he did not object to members having a week off, his objection was to the cutback in the number of days of sitting.

Surely the parliamentary secretary, who was after all instrumental in discussing these matters, I presume, with his boss the government House leader, could have said: "Look, the opposition has trouble cutting the number of days from 174 or 175 to 134. Maybe another way to do this is to sit an additional three-week period. Give another 15 sitting days in the summer, at some other time of year." But what the government did was say, keep the holidays we now have, let us add to them.

I use the word "holiday" advisedly, because like the hon. member for Peace River, when I go to my riding I work quite hard. I spend time there and I spend many hours working there. I think most hon. members do exactly that. So I do not call it a holiday but it is a time away from working in this place. The public, naturally, regards members as working only when they are in Ottawa, it seems, but that is not always the case, and I acknowledge that as well as anyone else.

If the government was serious in its suggestion that it really wanted to give members time to be in their ridings, why did it simply deduct sitting days from the calendar and take an extra week off here and there? Why did it not add another three weeks of sitting, in September or August or July, or January which now is free of sittings, and continue at least something close to the number of sitting days? Why did it reduce the sitting days so much in order to achieve its end? Because we could have had three weeks of sitting in January and another week or two before the scheduled resumption date in February. All that could have been done quite easily, but the government chose not to. They simply reduced. Could the parliamentary secretary answer that?

Mr. Cooper: Yes. I am very pleased to answer the concerns of my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands.

He will know from several of the meetings that he and I had with Mark Houlton from our office, who worked so hard on this package.

As a government, we put forward two proposals; one was to sit Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, and the House not to sit on Fridays and keep roughly the same parliamentary calendar as exists today; or the second proposal which was to go with the three and one option.

What the hon. member should recall is that it was the request and the feedback from the opposition members which indicated they preferred the three and one.

There is a difference between what is said in private and what is said in public. I want to be very specific and I do not want to accuse anyone. I am not saying that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands supported the three and one proposal. I want to be very clear about that. What I am saying is that the feedback from the opposition benches indicated the one that had the best consensus on both sides of the House—

Mr. Milliken: Most palatable.

Mr. Cooper: Most palatable—that is the word I will accept—was the three and one proposal. That is why we chose to go with it. It was not an arbitrary decision of the government; it was part of the discussions and negotiations that had been going on for months.

I am glad the hon. member asked the question as it gives me an opportunity to put on record the facts of what really happened in terms of the calendar changes.

Mr. Milliken: I appreciate the hon. member's response, Mr. Speaker. I think he stated it correctly. He asked which of the two we preferred and we said that we did not like either, but if we had to chose we would take this one. That is what we said. It was the more palatable of the two.

What I have indicated, and what we have indicated throughout, is that we were not in favour of reducing the number of sitting days of this House. I hope he has got that message.

To put the negotiations in context, I think it is fair for the hon. member to know, and he may want to comment on this, that when the government makes a proposal to change rules without going through the usual committee routine of coming up with changes, as happened with the Private Members' Business changes which the government has included in this package and which were the result of an all-party committee meeting and which were unanimously recommended to this House by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. Even the New Democratic member sitting on that committee agreed with the changes that were proposed. We have made no amendments to all those changes that have been proposed. We agree with those changes. They were the result of all-party work in that committee.

Had the parliamentary secretary gone to a committee, I suggest, as I said in my remarks, we might have achieved more consensus. But what the government does when it says: "We are going to change the rules", is say to the opposition: "You can negotiate with us to the extent that we are willing to bend but, in the end, with our majority, we are going to do what we like."

What happens, as an opposition, is that we are put in a position of trying to get the best deal we possibly can, but knowing that if we do not try to do that the government will go and do exactly what it wants anyway and then we will really get kicked in the teeth.

What we did, in the course of these talks, is try to soften the blow that the government was delivering in the form of these rule changes, to get the best package that we could live with by indicating our areas of strongest disagreement, of strongest dissent so the government would know where it is going to find itself in difficulty.

Our amendment indicates those areas where we feel the government is wrong. We have some reservations in other places, as the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond pointed out yesterday, but, by and large, we can agree with the package.

Does the hon. member for Peace River not realize that when a government starts negotiating on rule changes, something that is fundamental in this House, is negotiating from a position of tremendous strength and that the opposition has very few levers with which to play? Does he not realize that those negotiations would result in answers and in responses that perhaps would lead the government to think it has agreement when it does not?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, my friend was obviously a successful lawyer in his private life before coming to this institution. He makes a bad argument sound pretty convincing and pretty good.

The truth is what has happened in this case. We start out, as a government, putting forward a proposal. We put that proposal on the table and we discuss it with the opposition parties. We change that package and that proposal to the point where it is hardly recognizable. We take that package and bring it into the House. But what happens then? The opposition takes the things that it was not successful in changing and chooses to highlight them and oppose the final result.

Members do not mention the fact that we, as the government, have made significant changes. I am sorry, in fairness you are right, the hon. member did say that. What they do, and I think the House leader for the government put it very well yesterday, is they want to have their cake and eat it too. They want to go through all of the discussions, all of the negotiations, get all of the changes they can and then, in the end, oppose the package. They call it things like fascist, Draconian and all sorts of negative terms when, in fact, it was a very, very effective and good negotiation process which I think resulted in some very positive changes. I am not trying to take credit for those. I am quite prepared to give the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands a great deal of credit because he did make a number of suggestions. He and Mr. Yanover put forward a number of really positive suggestions which we have incorporated into the rule changes and, I think, have strengthened the package.

It is unfortunate that once again the opposition mentality, rather than support the package, is trying to manipulate us as a government into a position where we are forced to use closure to put what I think is a very good package through this House of Commons.

• (1220)

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise and add my perspective to the particular changes that are being proposed by the government, some of which are certainly of interest and some of which were long overdue. I personally would love to see much more free voting on the part of members so that they do not have to be following the Whip's line all the time.

That is something that I have found very hard to accept. In fact, I found it very galling at certain moments in the course of my last two mandates in this House.

In speaking to the rules of order of change in the House, I think that if they were passed as they have been presented by the government, they would permanently alter Parliament as Canadians have come to know it. I think that Canadians have come to be much more aware and sensitized to the House through what Mr. Warren has explained to them as he puts on our television tube the procedures of the House.

I think that has been very important in helping people to understand what is fairly complex as a procedure.

I see one of my colleagues from Alberta across the floor. I recall our coming in here together and doing a bill on chips and costs. We all had difficulty learning how the House operated. We in this House had difficulty learning and adapting. We did not know we were supposed to be partisan in this House. A colleague from the Conservative bench helped me as I was trying to address a bill that I knew very little about at that given moment.

I think I came out with some enlightened observations, both from my own side, that of the opposition, and the government side. I think that that is what it would allow us if there were more free votes in this House: To have and to be able to express joint and common views which we share that do not necessarily require the kind of party line vote in areas that are quite diverse in what we address in this House.

So, the changes this government is proposing to the Standing Orders are a further proof that the Prime Minister is trying to dismantle our national institutions, as he just did with the CBC. It makes absolutely no sense! The new rules undermine the legitimate role of Parliament, that is to confront the government with its responsibilities. The proposed changes are intended to stifle the Parliament of Canada.

The government proposal relinquishes altogether the notion of consensus between parties in this House. The McGrath reforms, and the earlier Lefebvre reforms, as well as the 1969 amendments, were all based upon full ranging debates with a view to reaching a consensus in a spirit of co-operation. Parliament is the latest victim of a dictatorial decision-making process that is what my colleague from Kingston and the Islands was discussing with the member opposite.

[English]

While some say that the Conservative government lacks direction, purpose and a clear vision of Canada, I do not say that I particularly share that point of view in this Parliament. I would argue quite the opposite.

I would say that while it appears to be bungling its way through almost every issue that faces this country, the Conservatives in my view have a very clear agenda that seeks to fundamentally change the structures and the institutions of this country and not in the best interests of the unity or well-being of this country, or in the forward agenda of Canada for Canadians: men, women and children to be distinct on the global map.

That has been the hidden agenda. That is the forward agenda, and that is what it does when it dismantles the institutions like the institutions of this House. The proposed changes to the rules are just that other step of closing down Canada.

I would call this the dismantling of the strongest national institutions, Parliament and the House of Commons. Parliament to me is a sacred trust. If it is to be altered, it must not be done in a way that is in the best interest of the government of the day, but what is in the best interest of the people of Canada, Parliament's shareholders.

I speak knowing that we are going to be the government of today tomorrow, and I say that it is not good for us as Liberals as it is not good for the Conservatives.

It is bad decision making on the part of this Parliament to allow this kind of dictatorial decision making.

[Translation]

Under the proposed changes, the House would sit eight weeks less every year and there would be fewer days to debate the budget and the throne speech. The number of opposition days where motions on sensitive political issues can be debated would also be reduced.

[English]

The government may argue that it has a majority mandate from the people to govern, but I would argue that the government did not put its full agenda before Canadians during the last election. I heard my hon. colleague—who is about the walk out of the House—say that the government's agenda has always been frustrated. I would suggest that the government's agenda was not always forward in the course of a political election.

For example, did the Prime Minister say that if elected—come on there, Don Blenkarn, I ask you—did the government say that if elected it would eliminate 50 per cent of our national railway? Did it say that?

An hon. member: No, no.

Mrs. Finestone: Did the Conservatives say they would close CBC stations from coast to coast, from one end of this country to the other, and dismantle that institution?

Did they say that their government would introduce a new major sales tax on everything from reading, intellectual property, the right to knowledge, to taxi cabs and to one yoghurt that they had to go and—

Mr. Blenkarn: Yes, they did.

Mrs. Finestone: No, they did not. Did he say his government would introduce—

An hon. member: And unanimously too.

Mrs. Finestone: Never mind. That is not so, I do not believe. The answer is no, no and no. Let us remember that the role of the Official Opposition is today in a working democracy, something perhaps they have forgotten about. A democracy only works when there is opposition. It does not work with the tyranny of the majority.

I quote a man of great stature and influence in the business world, as a deputy minister within the structure of the government that makes it work, and as a minister of this House, the former Mitchell Sharp, who said that the role of the opposition is to play the role of the defence lawyer, to be sure that the government proves to the public every point and every policy beyond a shadow of a doubt.

I would say the government under its new rules will not allow the opposition to play that role and to hold the government to account, for with less sitting time, shorter debates, restraints and restrictions of powers of legislative committees, the government will become even more tyrannical. Perhaps it did not realize that. However, that is the end result, the bottom line.

The government, since 1988, has known the depth and breadth of the unpopularity of its economic agenda. Its political agenda has not been popular. Look at the polls and then tell me I am wrong. As a result, it has short-circuited parliamentary debate on important issues, in large measure through the use of closure, the cutting off of parliamentary debate, both in the House and in the Senate.

One former Conservative minister, and I think he was quite well respected in this House at that point, Erik Nielsen, said and I quote: "The procedure of closure had been repugnant to the Canadian people. My own personal view is that never in parliamentary debate should there be a muzzling of free debate." That is a citation from him. Yet the government has used closure on an unprecedented scale, especially since 1988.

On the second day this House sat after the 1988 election, the government introduced closure to ram through the free trade agreement, even though a majority of Canadians, 57 per cent, had voted for parties opposed to the trade deal.

Then closure was used at three different stages on Bill C-21 under which the government will eliminate the federal contribution to unemployment insurance, thus abandoning its responsibility to job reduction—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Finestone: You know, you are such a nice guy. Why don't you just button the lip and listen to what I have to say, and then you can argue afterward.

Closure was used twice on the notorious clawback bill which taxed back our senior's pensions, twice on the GST and twice on the bill to privatize Petro-Canada. In total, the Conservatives have invoked closure or time allocation no fewer than 21 times in 29 months since the 1988 election.

The Conservatives invented closure under Sir Robert Borden in 1913 to get passage of their naval aid bill. It was strongly opposed by Liberal opposition leader Sir Wilfred Laurier, who, during the 1913 debate on the closure proposal said that he was going to feel much more comfortable in a defeat at the polls, rather than using closure, because he felt it was so Draconian, so anti-democratic, so far from any of the principles that he supported, that he went the whole way. I quote what he said: "Heaven is my witnesses that I would rather stand here today defeated and in opposition by that appeal to the people than stand over there in office by the power of the gag".

I will admit that there may be times when the use of closure or time allocation is justified. From 1913 to 1984 closure was used fewer times in those 71 years than the Conservative use in the last 29 months.

Finding that closure was not sufficient for the government to get its way, we now have more Draconian measures being imposed. The proposal will cut the sitting days of the House of Commons by almost 25 per cent. At a time when this country is facing a constitutional crisis, when there are rising tensions among our aboriginal peoples and international military actions are increasing and there is destabilization in the international world, increasing levels of unemployment, this government is now proposing what they call "holidays". Well, ladies and gentlemen, I would suggest that it is not a holiday to go back to one's riding. It is a responsibility. I see a particular pleasure to go back to your roots, to the people who elected you to hear what they have to say so that you can, in essence, come back here and report.

I would suggest that if you have Friday, Saturday, Sunday and Monday, certainly in most cases that would be adequate. I understand my colleagues from the far west, the far north and the far east would prefer the one week every three weeks. I would say that neither of these proposals is what we have in front of us. We have some other kind of a scheme that lengthens periods that were already on the calendar to even longer periods. It does not see us come back to this House during enormously long periods of holiday during the summer season.

I would say that the proposals that were made, the options that were given to us were not very palatable, so we picked the lesser of the evils. There certainly was a way in which we did not have to cut from 175 to 134 sitting days. All this is at at time, as I have said, when Canadians are searching for leadership on these issues, when Canadians are listening to hear what their members have to say on these issues of burning concern.

I do not believe that MPs are going to be comfortable with this kind of change. It is a recipe for the rebirth of Canadian values that will not be found in the choking of debate in this House.

As well, it would appear that the government thought longer sitting days would equal the loss of one week a month in sitting time. But tell me, when will the committees meet? When will we meet in legislative committees? Is the government's plan to make them completely inactive or meaningless too, or to hide the issues from public scrutiny to avoid the test of proof beyond a shadow of a doubt?

Checking the government is an obvious task of the opposition party and one I believe the committees of the House have undertaken constructively in areas of legislation, spending and administration. The government always believes its legislation to be good, but that opinion is not always shared by those who are affected by it.

For example, and I can only use the things I have been intimately involved with in this House, the legislation on broadcasting and on copyright, both considered good by the government, had in excess of 50 amendments each. Obviously, these two bills have benefited from committee study and from the amendments which were brought by both sides of the House.

I personally felt that we, the government members and the opposition members, worked constructively together, along with the minister and the parliamentary secretary to improve both of those bills. In scrutinizing the legislation and in prodding the government to take action, we effectively made changes that were very constructive.

Other examples of strong committee work involve the review of political appointments to boards, commissions and agencies. I just have to talk about the John Crispo appointment—

An hon. member: Shocking appointment.

Mrs. Finestone: —as opposed to the Bill Neville appointment, just to name two, or David Colville to the CRTC. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I do not care what your party party partisanship is. You can be a good strong Conservative, a good strong Liberal, a good strong NDP. As long as you are a considered and thoughtful Canadian, I do not care what your party policy is, but have some knowledge of the dossier which you are considering, the committee on which you are going to sit and have some constructive sense of the role in society. Do not do some of the silly things that this government has done in bad partisan politics. In good partisan politics, I have no objections.

That is why the power of committees to review and to arouse public interest is very important. They do not have that power, as I have said, to rescind or overrule, but they certainly can have a degree of moral suasion when bad appointments have been made and we would hope would make the government more prudent in their nominations.

I would suggest that we try to make committees examine the issue, raise public awareness and, as well, examine every dollar of government expenditure. That is a very important role that opposition must play. It is not easy to find the errors and it is not easy to find the misjudgements, but it is important. We work hard on an opposition bench, with very small staff, to find those errors. That is why we have to be in this House as well to carry out that responsibility. We do spot checking, as you know Mr. Speaker when you were on committee, and you did it very effectively as well.

I believe it could be said that we do have a salutary effect on government when it knows we are on the outlook for waste, for inappropriate and unbalanced regional spending or non-spending. For those kind of extravagances, I could allude to the Department of Communications and its minister, but I will not bother the House at this particular moment. I have done it at other stages.

After all, it is the people's money. I think we have to be more frugal and more prudent with that money than we are with our own money and our own pocket-book. That is a commitment that every member takes and should observe when they come to this House, and it is their responsibility.

I think that we have to look at government administration of its departments and its agencies. By the very nature of things, we are the receivers of complaints from public servants, public people and taxpayers. I hear from the film makers, the broadcasters, the artists, the performers, and the business people. As well, I hear from people about the ordinary problems in my riding: employment, pensions, all kinds of serious concerns from people who are dissatisfied, from refugees and immigration, et cetera. It is our job to be in the riding, hear about these issues related to our portfolio and related to our ordinary people and bring them back and ask questions in this House.

Recent investigations by the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture involving the National Arts Centre, Telefilm Canada, the National Gallery and the CBC have been very important. How committees undertake their work I think is equally important.

Mr. Speaker, you have advised me that I have very little time left. I want to talk about just two other things. One is the importance of opposition days, that we are able on opposition days to take initiatives, to discuss issues that go beyond partisan politics and look at societal issues of concern. We had a marvellous debate in this House on violence against women. Even though it was brought before this House by the Liberal Party, that was not the point. Every member on all sides who participated added to the understanding and awareness of the community out there through an opposition day of this nature.

The development of human resources, education, job training, research and development, agriculture and fishing were very important. That is why opposition days must be maintained, because they are vital. Losing those 40 sitting days will also require us to reduce those opposition days, the number of question periods, our debates on the budget and on the throne speech and certainly on other aspects of our daily work.

In summation, I would just like to make the following points. There is no protection in the simple title of democracy. Even the best intentioned rulers in any kind of a democratic society, if they are left unchecked, they become very autocratic. I would remind hon. members that Lord Acton said that "power tends to corrupt and absolute power corrupts absolutely".

I finish with a quote from Benjamin Disraeli who says that "the function of the opposition is essentially one of criticism". It is critical that we allow for the kinds of sitting days—just find other opportunities and other ways—which allow the House to expose the issues, which allow constant probing, and which allow us to play the role that we were elected to play in this House.

• (1240)

I thank you very much Mr. Speaker and I hope that the public will be aroused enough that it will let the government know that this is not acceptable; we must have consultation and it must go to a committee, it cannot be done arbitrarily as we plan to do it today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate, the hon. member for Calgary West.

[Translation]

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to move the following:

> That the House continue to sit during the lunch hour for the purpose of continuing consideration of government motion No. 30 regarding amendments to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Would those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

And fewer than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), the motion is deemed to have been adopted.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: I guess another example of government brutality is the need to move that motion so we can have freedom of speech.

Going back two weeks ago, we made the offer to sit for extended hours to debate these rules. I myself tried to get the House to agree to that yesterday on more than one occasion. I have tried already once today. We need a rule to force the House to sit so that debate can continue.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I just wondered if it is appropriate within the present rules for the member to move a motion to extend hours at the beginning of his speech, and then continue to speak afterwards.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will remind the hon. member that, when the member for Calgary West rose to move his motion, I had just recognized him as the next Speaker in this debate. Once the motion had been agreed to, he continued his speech, having been recognized by the Chair. He did not lose his right to speak as a result of moving his motion.

[English]

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): I would point out to my hon. friend across the way that just for extra protection I indicated that I would stay on my feet so I would not lose my place. There could be a technical glitch if you do indeed give up the floor to move a motion.

I would like to get back to the importance of rules.

In 12 years of observation, of coming to this place with high hopes and a lot of concern and of caring, it is with some sense of sadness that I can go back to most ridings in this country, certainly to my riding, and find that the work we do in this chamber is held in low regard. The opposition would have us believe from time to time that it is government members who are held in low regard, but I say we are all held in low regard. We are seen out there in our communities as self-serving.

The whole notion that this is perhaps the best place in the country to be in the sense of offering service to our communities and to our country may exist in our hearts, and I would hope in the hearts of all of us in this Chamber, but it does not exist in the heads of the voters of this country.

What exists in their heads is the notion that we are greedy, that we do not work, that the decisions we reach are bad ones and that we do harm to this country. Who tells Canadians that? I suggest the House leader for the New Democratic Party is rather consistent at telling Canadians that that is the level of concern that goes on in this Chamber.

When we try to change the Parliament of Canada Act to make it function just a little more sensibly, when we try to change the rules of the House, it is as if we have no positive motivation. It is as if we do not care for the people of this country.

Canadians are a pretty sensible bunch. If they were not busy in their work places today and they had the opportunity to watch the House of Commons debates from start to finish and not through the filter of national media, they would come to some different conclusions about this place.

If they had a camera that panned all these empty benches at this point, they would realize how few people are sitting in this Chamber at this very moment. If they were able to watch that day after day, they would see that there is seldom a day when three quarters of the New Democratic Party are in attendance in the Chamber.

The NDP has a system inside its party—

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Saint-Denis on a point of order.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I think that my hon. colleague who is promoting new Standing Orders should at least recognize and accept the present Standing Orders that strictly forbid—it is contrary to all parliamentary traditions—

[English]

—all British parliamentary traditions to comment on the presence or absence of a member or a group of members. It is not really helpful to conduct a very pleasant debate on a very important issue.

He knows he cannot do it. Why does he insist on doing it? Perhaps he wants to provoke a political party and show that since there is no agreement I might as well apply la guillotine.

I am not on duty today. I am here to listen to certain points of view on these rules. If the hon. member wants to make this a partisan issue, he knows he will get a reply. We will lose a lot of time. He is already asking for an hour more during lunch time. We did not object.

Why does he not apply the spirit of the rule? I am worried, if he starts this way, about these new rules. If he is awakening us, we may participate much more vigorously with regards to these new rules.

[Translation]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the very experienced hon. member who has, I believe, served in this Chamber for 27 years.

[English]

—because he underlines the fact that we have some conventions. There is nothing in the rules which says we cannot talk about attendance in the Chamber.

There is something in our practices. Speakers have ruled it that is not a good idea to talk about motivation or attendance. The rules are here and the practices are there.

The only point—I will make it quickly—is that Canadians have a right to be upset when we say one thing and do another. When the New Democrats stand in this Chamber, each one of them knowing that they have a basic pattern of being here three weeks and gone one week, and when we say that should be the rule of the Chamber, they say that it is awful, it is nefarious and it is a plot.

• (1250)

That is what they do, and they have been doing it for two years. That is what brings us all into disrepute.

Mr. Fisher: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether reference to a member's presence in the house is in the rules of order. I have certainly heard Speakers—every one who has sat in that chair since I came to this House—upbraid members for making those kinds of references. Maybe it was only because they were specific.

I guess the member can ramble on as long as he wants about whether or not New Democrats are in the House. I think the people who voted for us certainly know that we serve them well.

Mr. Speaker, there is a—

An hon. member: That's not a point of order.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order! Just a clarification. I think it is correct, as several members pointed out, that the practice under our Standing Orders is not to indicate the absence of any member. You understand the nature of the present debate, where we are considering changing the Standing Orders, in a way calls this practice into question, because this debate obviously involves whether members are present in the House or not. The Chair does not wish to take a stand on the substance of the debate but he recognizes that it is not unlikely that during the debate, members feel the need to mention the presence of members in the House or in their riding. In this regard, the Chair intends to be understanding and hopes that on both sides of the House, members will try not to get personal. I understand that it is hard to draw a line between what the Standing Orders say and what is at issue in the debate.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has a point of order?

Mr. Milliken: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to clarify a point. When the hon. member for Calgary West moved that we sit during lunch hour, we did not object to that motion. Now the hon. member made a speech. And as the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing said, the fact that the hon. member moved the motion and started to speak after it was adopted causes a problem. I hope that the only reason he is speaking now is that he kept his right to speak after the motion, and we did not object to that motion. That is surely why he has the floor now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I greatly appreciate the request for clarification from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Generally the practice is that moving a motion includes the right to speak. But according to parliamentary practice, when the member in question took the trouble to indicate that he wanted to continue his speech and there was no opposition to that—I took it for granted that the House agreed to give the floor back to the hon. member for Calgary West. But again, you understand that I would not want to create a precedent and for that, I appreciate the comments from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

So the hon. member for Calgary West again has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the difficulty the Clerks at the Table have in judging my 20 minutes because so much of it has been taken up by the opposition.

My own timetable tells me that at least five and a half have disappeared with points of order and I am sure that the Clerks at the Table will adjust that time accordingly.

The point I was making is that what the rule changes do in terms of the parliamentary calendar is essentially capture what the opposition has been doing for two years. There is a certain loss of credibility for all us when members of the opposition stand up and complain about it because Canadians like the actions to correspond with the words. When you say one thing and you do another, you hurt the credibility not only of yourself, but of the institution, of the democratic process and of the country as a whole.

The person who spoke before me complained about the use of the rules in this House in December of 1988. That was the most vicious election campaign in my life in terms of the misinformation that was spread in places like senior citizens' homes and caused sleeplessness and illness throughout this country. The voters decided that the opposition was wrong and the policies should be adopted.

The people who stand in this Chamber and say: "We believe in democracy", completely ignored the most important element of the democratic process: An election. They would not simply come to this Chamber and approve the voters' choice when it came to free trade; it should have been done in an hour. It had been done by the Chamber before. We had a complete national election in which millions of dollars were spent. They had used every nefarious, incorrect argument in the book and been rejected by the voters. Then we had to come to this Chamber and use the rules to make the passage.

If you think that does not do harm, you are wrong.

My training, before coming to this place, was as a psychologist and I know that the human mind is very, very important. When you say one thing and you do another you cheapen this place.

I want to get to committees because we have said a lot about committees this fall. At our caucus last May we said that the committee system was not working. It was asked why the committee system was not working. They say to me and to each other that the opposition, in part, is responsible because you do not get the same members coming, you do not get the willingness on the part of the opposition to meet on Mondays or on Thursdays or Fridays. They want you always to meet on Tuesdays and Wednesdays. That is the opposition. There are arguments like that of the Deputy House Leader of the Liberal Party: "Well that is the government."

I just happened to put my staff to work on some attendance records. I thought that might enlighten the Chamber. Let me just start with the New Democratic Party. It is concerned about health and welfare. Its attendance at health and welfare is 38 per cent. That is out of their entire caucus of 44, and not just the member on the committee.

Let us look at the solicitor general. We have got a lot of concern about justice and solicitor general. The NDP's attendance at justice and solicitor general is 29 per cent.

Some hon. members: Oh, shame.

Mr. Hawkes: Oh, shame. Well the Liberals are better, it has 55 per cent attendance. The bad old government has only at 80 per cent attendance.

Mr. Milliken: These books have been cooked.

Mr. Hawkes: These books have come right from the table. That is another way in which they impugn this institution. It is as if they were saying the clerks at the table bias the information for the government. Well that is not true. Those clerks serve us all well and impartially and these figures come from them. They care about the economy and they care about jobs in this country. They just ache and they bleed every day in Question Period. We have a committee on industry, science, technology, regional concerns. The poor people in Atlantic Canada and in northern Quebec et dans tout le pays.

• (1300)

An hon. member: And western Canada too.

Mr. Hawkes: They do get better. The New Democrats are up to 47.5 per cent attendance. Almost half the time they have somebody out of their 44 people. Almost half the time. And the Liberals have 50 per cent. Half the time they come to this committee that is concerned about science, technology and jobs and the poor, old, terrible government is only at 88.75 per cent.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Hawkes: The poor chairman is missing government members almost 10 per cent of the time. Of course, we only have to send eight. The New Democrats have to send two and the Liberals have to send four. But they cannot even get one person there a portion of the time. Not one out of 80 some odd. But they will stand in this Chamber and say: "The government is cutting off democracy. It is making the committees smaller when we need them".

Canadians lose faith in this institution when you say one thing and you do another. That is not helping us in the national unity crisis.

Mr. Crawford: Go to the environment.

Mr. Hawkes: Do you want to know what the environment is, Mr. Speaker? The Liberals have a 67.5 per cent attendance. The government is worse. It has 66.2 per cent.

Mr. Crawford: I do not even believe that.

Mr. Hawkes: Well then you do not believe the Table. It met 20 times. We had an average of 5.3 members at environment. The Liberals had 2.7 and the NDP was 1.8. Those are the facts.

What we are dealing with here today is a package of changes that I think will get changed again. I am not sure that we have the exact right system for committees. I am not sure that we have the exact right timetable. But when my record over 12 years for any single year in 12 years has never fallen below 90 per cent in terms of my being here for votes—for 12 consecutive solid years, both opposition and government, never.

There is nobody in the New Democratic Party who has a voting record in this Chamber in the last two and a half years that exceeds 75 per cent. I can make that statement without even looking at it, because we keep attendance records of all parties in my whip's office. There may be one or two Liberals actually, who represent Ottawa area ridings. But I will take the oldest person in this Chamber, who has been here since 1972 and drives five or six hours back to his riding and his voting record will be in the neighbourhood of 95.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is talking about voting records of members of Parliament. I would like to take him up on that challenge. He said one or two members from the Ottawa area—I do not live near the Ottawa area. I would like to suggest to him that my voting record is well above 75 per cent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Calgary West, one and a half minutes left.

Mr. Hawkes: I say to the members of this Chamber, on this Parliament of Canada debate, there are some debates that affect our lives more than they do the voter's lives. Those debates should not be long because we have been sent here to deal with the interests of the voters. But these are important debates to the future of our country. We should watch what we say because through our words in this Chamber and with the media out there to define the public perception of this institution and this democracy and ultimately, and perhaps very quickly, the continuation of this country.

If we stand in this Chamber and say to each other that we are bad people with bad motivation and bad consequences, and we are doing it to score cheap political points, we may succeed, but ultimately we do damage to the entire system, to our nation, and I think it is inappropriate.

Mr. Speaker, I would say that the powers we have for taxation, criminal law, the Constitution, are awesome. The voters of Canada would like us to behave better and the rules can help but they are not the answer. The way we conduct ourselves will have more to do with our acceptability as an institution and a Parliament than any change in the rules will ever do.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the government whip how he thinks both opposition members and his own backbench members can better serve their constituents in this House when presenting the concerns of their constituents. These Standing Order changes, among other things, will reduce the number of days of debate on the throne speech, will reduce the number of days for debate on the budget, will reduce opposition days, and will reduce to a large extent the time available to any particular member to speak.

Perhaps he could explain to us how, by reducing the time available for debating issues, we can better serve our constituents and better deal with the issues here in the House.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, it is my real hope that with a 27-week calendar that almost all members would be here for 27 weeks so that we can listen to each other, so that we can dialogue, so we can spend 25 weeks where we come from in our home community, and that we get this interchange. That would be a significant improvement.

If we better understood each other in this Chamber and in the committees, it would be better.

But when we insist on a calendar that requires members to fly all night long, to arrive tired, to have pressure to leave to catch an airplane, we miss each other and we miss each other far too often.

The silent group in House of Commons terms is government members. Neither the rules nor the practices allow us to participate with any sense of equality in Question Period, which is obvious, or in debates. There is always the pressure of time.

When you meet with the opposition House leaders they always want five speakers, seven speakers. They state: "If you let me have my five then we will stop and you can pass it. Of course if you put government members into the mix and they talk about their view, not the government's view, on behalf of their constituents, that will delay it. Then you will have to use closure; then we will stand up and we will pound you".

What we have said in these rule changes is that we will get to 10-minute speeches more quickly. Instead of taking 30 minutes per speaker, which is a 20-minute speech and a 10-minute question and comment period, each of us on each of the public issues must be able to have 30 minutes in this Chamber which means opposition and not government, we are simply saying that after the first five hours of debate in this Chamber instead of eight we will move to 10-minute speeches. Then in 30 minutes, three members representing their ridings can make a presentation to the House in an attempt to be persuasive.

If there is something wrong with allowing more of our 295 members to participate in a debate instead of allowing fewer people to speak longer, then I do not understand how this violates democracy.

Surely it is better to give more members an opportunity to speak more often on behalf of their constituents in this Chamber. Surely it is better to have smaller committees where the role is meaningful and where one does not sit and warm a chair but can actually participate.

Surely those two things operate in the public interest better than the system we now have.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I was in my office and watched the speech on the tube that my hon. friend from Calgary made just recently.

I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I was very disappointed in the tone that he set and the so-called factual information that he gave the House. It was coming from a person for whom I have a lot of respect. I have worked with him in a friendly and what I thought was a constructive manner over the years.

I did not hear from that member any substantive argument that Canadians would understand why this government wants to change those rules, except that he took his 20 minutes to do something which the government could have done in committee if it had those facts and those kind of statistics. I could quote all kinds of other statistics because I was there for seven years as Whip also, showing him how his members were lax in their duties in committees.

It does not accomplish much in creating the kind of atmosphere of parliamentarians' decency. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we had to plead with the government to get a committee going here on consumer and corporate affairs not very long ago, because it refused to call it. He has his reasons, and we have ours.

Parliament was paralysed in terms of committee work. The transport committee was also. A lot of things could be said that are negative of the government Whip. I must tell him sincerely that I appreciated the work he did on trying to get this so-called reform going.

I do not think he succeeded in convincing any of the members of this House or of the public that this was the right move. I think he played partisan politics all through his speech. He tried to denigrate the NDP and the Liberals, knowing very well that what he said could be termed—I cannot use the word because the book says I cannot use it.

The government is now saying that members have to go back to their homes, their ridings and meet with their constituents. If I recall yesterday, the House leader, his boss, said on page 19133 of Hansard:

> People are demanding more contact with members of Parliament and more involvement.

I agree. In 1988 when the majority kept the minority Official Opposition of 40 members or less going all through the summer of 1988, it did not give a damn about the people in our ridings. It did not care because it was platooned.

It had 70 members away and 140 members doing something else. That is why I cannot use the word. Understandably, the government knows what I am talking about. Let us have a constructive debate. I will talk on this thing this afternoon and I will not use that kind of crap.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hawkes: Anybody watching will have trouble believing how we respect each other in this Chamber.

This is not a time in Canadian history and simply not the moment when partisanship should dominate. What should dominate at this point in our history in this Chamber is an attempt to come together to resolve problems.

When we were in opposition we used the rules to delay the government. We hoped and felt we did it judiciously. We delayed government where it should be delayed and we approved where it should be approved. We did not, I do not think, stand in the House and berate the government for going on longer because we blocked it.

It is so difficult for someone watching television to believe that we get speeches on the need for more debate and more freedom of speech and when we stand up—and I will do it again in closing—and ask for the unanimous consent of the House to continue this debate this evening beyond the normal hour of adjournment for another five, six or eight hours, from six o'clock until midnight? Would you, Mr. Speaker, simply ask the members of this Chamber whether their conviction about the importance of freedom of speech extends to the notion that tonight on this very important issue, we can debate between six o'clock and midnight. Six extra hours of freedom of speech is all the government is asking for. Mr. Speaker, would you please ask the House if there is unanimous consent for that motion?

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, my friend from Calgary West knows the rules very well. Standing Order 26(1) and (2) says that a member must have the floor and be in his seat. The member for Calgary West did not have the floor. We are on comments and questions so the member does not have the floor when we have that kind of a situation. The member for Calgary West is not seeking anything. He is just trying to play politics again.

If he comes in here at 5.55 p.m. or from four to five this afternoon and puts that motion to the House, we will deal with it then.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be a little more constructive than the last speaker and deal with the motion that is before the House in both some general introductory terms and in some specifics.

As a relatively new member to the House of Commons, I came, as most new members, expecting the debate to be meaningful, the government to listen, to respond to constructive suggestions and criticisms, and not only to listen to us but to listen to the Canadian people.

That does not happen. There is no sign of it happening. These rule changes will make it even more difficult for those of us who are bringing forward these arguments to have the opportunity to put pressure on the government and to hopefully get it to change its mind.

Since 1988 the government has disregarded accumulated parliamentary practice and has unilaterally changed the way the House of Commons operates. It has made routine the use of closure and time allocation by which debate is curtailed and bills are forced through the House. Closure was used as we all know only 21 times between 1913 and 1988 and yet it has been used 13 times in the last three years by this government.

In addition, by stacking the Senate, by using closure illegally in committee, the Conservative government has changed Parliament from a forum for debating and amending government proposals to a legislative rubber stamp. That is why the Canadian public finds Parliament difficult to understand, because the government is not responding to arguments which are presented, arguments which the Canadian public support.

On March 25, as we all know, the government House leader presented a new Conservative vision of Parliament contained in the 64 amendments to the Standing Orders that we are discussing today. Individually, these sweeping changes range from the relatively trivial to the totalitarian. Collectively, they will shut down Parliament and shut out its members from any meaningful legislative role.

Canadians want changes to Parliament. There is no doubt about that. They want parliamentary reform. They are fed up with the Parliament which fails to respond to their needs or reflect their concerns. Sometimes they are embarrassed by some of the behaviour such as that we just heard from members and senators. They are angered by the indifference of governments and the inability of their elected representatives to effect change.

But these changes, the changes proposed by the government House leader, will not deal with the real concerns that Canadians have about the operation of Parliament. These proposals are designed to preserve the quickly eroding authority of the government which is within 11 votes, as we know, of losing its parliamentary majority.

• (1320)

Many of the proposed changes have the goal of keeping the House closed whenever possible. After all, when Parliament does not sit, government cannot be defeated. By reducing the number of sitting days to 135 from 175, the government is cutting two further months from the parliamentary calendar. For 24 weeks a year there will be no opportunity for Question Period, no opportunity for regular press activities and questioning of MPs and leaders, no committee hearings and no ability to debate or question government policies. In short, there will be no accountability. The government will escape the scrutiny of the House for almost half of the year.

The shortened calendar though will not impede the government from enacting its agenda because a government which has invoked closure after only seven hours of debate on an issue as sensitive as the GST will find 135 days sufficient to ram through the legislation it wants to pass.

The argument appears to be that for reasons of efficiency, we need to restrict the opportunities of members to bring forward the considerations and concerns of their constituents.

We are going to increase by 25 per cent the time spent each day passing government motions and bills, but we are going to reduce the number of days spent debating the budget, the throne speech and opposition motions. We are going to reduce the number of committee meetings by requiring several committees to share two committee rooms. We are going to restrict the testimony before legislative committees to purely technical matters. The government is going to facilitate the use of closure and time allocation limits on debate, cut the length of most speeches to 10 minutes and remove the right to vote on certain stages of bills.

In the name of efficiency, these are the sorts of measures that the government is tabling and proposing to restrict the activities of members in the legitimate pursuit of bringing forward the concerns of their constituents.

In fact, the government will be able to avoid sitting for all but a few days. Currently, the House must sit for 25 days a year before the government can get approval for money for operations, in others words, for supply. In order for the supply to be triggered, these 25 House sitting days must be scheduled. But under the Conservative government's proposal, the government will be able to reduce the number of supply days when it shuts the House down and passes an appropriation act with only a few days sitting.

If the government does not get its own way through all of these restrictions on the activities of the members, the government has invented or presented us with an ultimate escape clause, a rule that lets it invent new rules.

Last year, we will all remember, whatever our position might have been on the constitutional question, that Elijah Harper, a member of the legislature in Manitoba, showed Canadians how powerful a single elected member can be on certain occasions when unanimous consent is required. Mr. Harper could not block or defeat the Meech Lake Accord, which he and which most Canadians were so opposed to, because our system ensures that the will of the majority prevails, but he could refuse to let the Manitoba legislature suspend the rules agreed upon by all of them and he denied unanimous consent to waive notice before the debate began.

Unanimous consent, both given and withheld, as we all know, is a crucial check in the balance of power between a government and its legislature. Yet, almost daily, the House of Commons agrees, by unanimous consent, to set aside regulatory procedures, to speed Routine Proceedings or to reach an agreed decision. This flexibility ensures that limits on which there is a consensus are treated differently than truly opposed issues.

No individual member can stop the will of the majority, but our parliamentary procedures guarantee that any one member can prevent abuse of the process. The government wants to change this. It wants to redefine unanimous consent. Unanimous consent now will mean at least 25 people. In other words, 25 members of Parliament must be present to block government proposals to change the rules and arrange government business in a way it sees fit. If fewer than 25 members get to their feet to oppose, these motions will be adopted without debate and no member could even utter a word of opposition.

With such a rule in place, the government, at appropriate times, could pass certain bills or even constitutional procedures, establish or abolish committees or get parliamentary approval to controversial government appointments. In other words, it would be able to short-circuit the entire legislative process. I think there are reasons why it is appropriate for the opposition to delay the process of government business. Although the government dislikes that and finds it frustrating, nevertheless it is appropriate in certain circumstances for the opposition to give the public the opportunity to consider the government's measures fully, to fully understand the issues and give them an opportunity to mobilize their opposition if that seems appropriate.

It is appropriate that the opposition have the opportunity to from time to time use whatever procedural measures are there to delay the government's business, not just to be a nuisance, but in order that the public can fully understand and appreciate the issues and respond to them.

I think in the context of the present political climate, there is another point which is worth making in regard to these changes. That is, they are irresponsible in a very real way. It is irresponsible to change the rules which will work well in a two party system when, as we can all see, it is almost certain that there are going to be five parties in the next Parliament. To try to work these rules with a Parliament comprising of five parties is going to make it very difficult to facilitate the operations of Parliament. In addition, with those five parties, it will make it very difficult to change the rules to effectively respond to those five parties.

I think the government in a very real way is closing its eyes to the realities of the country, the realities of what is going to take place in the next Parliament, and in that sense will harm future parliamentary action.

The most pressing issue for us and for our constituents I think is that these changes will make it very much more difficult for MPs in opposition, as well as on the backbenches of the government, to represent the views of their constituents. I have mentioned a number of those situations in which less time will be available for members, reducing the time for speeches, reducing the scope of investigation on committees and of course this particularly undesirable resolution regarding unanimous consent.

I have concentrated on the parts which we have difficulty with, assuming that the government will spend its time on the parts it sees as desirable. I have spent time on the problems. I think what it does is take parliamentary reform in a direction away from what will be meaningful to this House. It is rather like the government's tax reform which makes the tax system less fair.

In closing, I would like to make reference to a point I raised yesterday with regard to dividing this complex motion. Mr. Speaker, you will remember that I made a suggestion or I called upon the Speaker to use his discretion to divide this complex motion, discussed reasons why we find it difficult to offer a clear position on a motion which contains so many elements, some of which are desirable, some, as I have indicated, of which are quite undesirable.

The Liberals have offered their amendment and the House will be able to decide whether or not it agrees with their concerns. I would like to offer a further amendment to the motion. We have a situation in which this matter is still under some consideration, but I trust that the Chair will reserve on whether or not these amendments and any other amendments which might come forward are in order, pending the Speaker's ruling on the various points of order which have been raised concerning this motion.

If I may, I would like to move an amendment, seconded by my colleague from Saskatoon—Dundurn:

> That the motion be amended by deleting paragraphs 8, 15, 20, 22, 23, 24 and 55 and amending paragraph 13 by deleting the words "the member speaking in reply" and substituting with "the two members speaking in reply".

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair therefore receives the subamendment, takes it under advisement and hopes to make a decision as soon as possible.

• (1330)

[English]

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would hope that you would reserve the classification of what I have just presented.

My intention is for the proposal that I put forward to be another amendment to the motion, pending any recognition that you might have, of the desirability to split the motion into parts.

There might be some problems with regard to it being a subamendment as a result of the rules with regard to amending other amendments. My intention was to put that forward as an amendment, pending your consideration of the point of order that I raised yesterday, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair has heard your additional information and will surely take it into account in the decision he will render.

[English]

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the member from Saskatoon in addressing the House raised once again the issue of the reduction in the number of sitting days proposed in the new Standing Orders.

I would like to make a comment on the matter of sitting days as they relate to the House of Commons.

The Parliament of Canada Act makes it very clear that there is an obligation on every member of Parliament to attend each and every day that the House of Commons sits. In fact, there is a financial penalty for missing a sitting day, even though if it is on public business and so on there is an exemption.

That exemption is resorted to universally by members of Parliament. In fact, I do not think there have been any reductions in sessional indemnities by way of penalty for not being in attendance in the House of Commons.

This is something the public should know. Every member of the House of Commons is required to be in his or her seat when the House of Commons is in session. We know that that is simply not the case. We do not attend every time that the House of Commons is in session.

We do pursue other interests, be they constituency or party interests or other forms of public interest. The point is that we should take a more realistic approach to sitting days. We should recognize that members of Parliament, members of the House of Commons, are required to do things other than be present in Ottawa at their seat in the House of Commons.

They are required to attend at various functions around the country and in that way serve the parliamentary, public and constituency interests. I do not see anything wrong at all, morally or otherwise, with being realistic about the number of days in which the House of Commons should sit because it is not necessary in the public interest to have the House of Commons open 365 days a year.

If that was the case, why would members not be arguing for a 12 month session of the House of Commons, a five day week and for them to be present at all times except through statutory holidays the same way that government offices are open? If that was in the public interest and if the public had an interest in Parliament being open on all those days, why would members of the opposition not be seeking that as a resolution of the problem?

Why would they be objecting for a reduction from 175 days to 135 days? Why would they not be looking for an increase? Why would they not have the House of Commons open every day that government offices are open so that people could come, watch the proceedings in the House of Commons and see the government in action?

We all recognize that there has to be some kind of sensible limitation on the days in which Parliament sits. The only question is: Is the limitation to benefit members of Parliament, or to benefit the Canadian public?

I say very clearly that the Canadian public benefits from a reduction in the sitting days. I would like members to address that point. Do they really think the public really benefits from keeping the House of Commons open as long as possible? Does the public benefit in other ways?

Let me just briefly mention that point because I think the public benefits if they have an opportunity to see their members of Parliament in their constituencies at functions to that they can address their concerns directly to their member. I do not know why members want to hide themselves in Ottawa and turn aside the opportunity to go back to their constituencies one week in every four when everybody knows where we are.

They know that events and appointments can be scheduled to accommodate that. I ask this of the member from Saskatoon: Is that his idea? He does not want his constituents to know that he is available once a week in his constituency office? Does he want to take advantage of the Parliament of Canada Act and say: "I have to be in Ottawa. Parliament is open. You cannot see me."

I think if we are going to be fair with our constituents, we would set a situation where people know where we are. They would know when we are going to be in our constituencies and when we are going to be in Ottawa pursuing the national interest.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the theme of the member's comments, we clearly have a good deal of agreement. What we both seem to be saying, what I am saying and what I took him to say, is that we need to ensure that the rules which apply to the operation of Parliament facilitate the operations of our activities as members of Parliament representing our constituents and so on.

We represent our constituents in different ways and in different places through different activities. Some are here in Ottawa in this Chamber and some are here in Ottawa in other circumstances, in committees and so on, and some are back in the ridings meeting with constituents and dealing with their concerns. Then we have our other responsibilities to our parties and to the system as a whole to spend some time in other parts of the country also.

My point is that we need to spend as much time here in Ottawa as is necessary to effectively pursue our constituents' concerns and interests and to effectively represent those concerns and interests. By reducing our opportunity as members of Parliament to put forward those arguments, this government is making life more difficult for members of Parliament to do that part of their work which is done here in Ottawa.

I do not understand how anybody could argue that by having less time to debate issues in the House of Commons that our activities as an MP will be improved. How is it better for me to have only 10 minutes to speak rather than 20 minutes? How can that possibly enable me to represent my constituents effectively? Why is the government always interested in ramming legislation through? Why is it not interested in letting all members have an opportunity to speak?

There is one illustration arising from my province. When the New Democratic government in the late 1970s nationalized the Potash Corporation, that debate took 120 days. When the Conservative government in Saskatchewan privatized the Potash Corporation, it used closure for the first time in Saskatchewan and rammed it through in less than a couple of weeks. That is not the way to effectively deal with the issues and have the issues debated. We should be looking for ways to facilitate opportunities for MPs to fully contribute to the debates rather than narrow them, rather than to reduce the days of debate on the throne speech and the budget and the length of speeches. How many times have we heard members stand up and say: "I am not able to really say very much in 20 minutes", or "My time is up and I have so much more to say". We need to respond to those concerns too.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing. There is an extension of hours, in my understanding, in the sitting days so that the total number of hours are not decreased by very, very much.

An hon. member: They are increased. The total hours are increased.

Mr. Belsher: The total hours are increased, I am told. My friend beside me has some notes.

Is it not true that the party of which the member is a part has a sort of a semi-form of platooning so that members have three weeks here and one week off. They are almost following this sort of a format. We should like the rest of the members to be able to take advantage of such a format. Is this not a fact of what the New Democrats have actually practised for the last several months?

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that is the case and it has been the case with me, that on occasion I have been able to spend a week in my riding at one period of time. It is not very often I am able to do that, but I try to do it whenever I can. There is certainly no formal procedure within the party which provides each of us with an opportunity to be in the riding for one week a month. Some of us are able to do it. Most of us try to do it because we think it is appropriate for the reasons mentioned by the member for Halifax West to be in the riding and responding to those concerns.

If it happens, it happens. There is no formalized process for it. We do make every effort to be there in the riding so that our constituents can reach us. I presume that every member does the same thing.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I feel privileged to be able to rise and present a few words in the House, particularly to my distinguished friends opposite, many of whom have sat in the House for as long as I have.

I am coming at this from 12 years' experience. I have now had some eight years on the government side in two separate Parliaments and I also spent a long time in opposition. If there was one constant throughout my entire 12 years, felt by members on both sides of the House on a personal basis, it was that the Standing Orders of the House were not satisfactory. When I arrived, in 1979, some of the strongest critics of the rules were members of my party on the government side then and when we were in opposition, individual Liberal members were unhappy with the Standing Orders because the Standing Orders were outmoded. I therefore want to commend the members who participated in the process to change these Standing Orders. The House leaders from all three parties played a very valuable role for which they should individually be commended.

There is an outline set forth as to the discussions they had. They were very detailed discussions; proposal after proposal to change the rules. The package we are debating today reflects the negotiation that took place. One does not get everything one wants. The government certainly had to back down on many things and the opposition did not get everything it wanted either.

The point is that at some point the House has to decide. I can remember the grand experiment in 1980 tried to give individual members more authority, more say in what happens in this House by developing task forces. As a relatively new member then in opposition, I had the privilege of sitting on a federal—provincial finance task force. We crossed the country and heard evidence from all sorts of provinces and of witnesses. We made a unanimous report and many of the provisions of that report have now worked their way into the substantive law of the nation. I sat on one on Senate reform and we had some very creative ideas that came to us from Canadians and which we incorporated into our report. They are gradually being seen as more and more sensible as time goes by, and I think will become part of the next change of the Senate when that change occurs.

In 1984 the McGrath committee made substantial recommendations which were adopted by the House and which I think have benefitted the House in terms of the standing committees and the legislative committees.

Having had more experience with those, having identified more weaknesses and needs for change, we have this package before us today which represents a detailed negotiation flowing out of the practical, real-life experiences we have had as members.

I recognize the reality and I would not expect the opposition members to stand up and vote for this because when you are in opposition, and we used to do the very same thing, it often is in your best interest to negotiate changes behind closed doors. You make your recommendations, you get the government to change its proposal package, but when it comes time to vote in the House, as an opposition party you simply cannot be seen to be agreeing with the government. Indeed, there is a narrow, partisan political advantage to being opposed to the government because the government over time becomes unpopular because governments have to make decisions. Oppositions never have to make decisions, that is not their role. Their role is to obfuscate and to bring up minor points, and we used to do it admirably well.

I remember in opposition when we agreed to 90 per cent of a bill, we would stress in our debate only the 10 per cent—one or two items out of 10 items that we disagreed with. That is all we would talk about. We would vote against the bill because, when you are in opposition, you try to keep all of the people out in the country who are opposed to something—the special interest groups usually—on your side so they will vote for you in the next election.

I think Canadians need to understand that on this package the opposition parties played a very meaningful role in getting up to the final package, but of course they cannot be seen to stand in the House and vote for it because that would anger so many of their own narrow partisan supporters—and that is just the way it works, that is democracy.

I want to say to Canadians that they ought not to worry about the allegations being made just now about the lack of efficiency, and about how we will not be here and accountable, and about their rights being cut back. That just is not so.

When you look at the realities of the thing, even under the new proposals where the average sitting days will be reduced from 155 days to 134 days, what you really want to look at is how many hours Parliament will sit over the course of a year. Under the new rules Parliament will sit for more hours than under the existing rules. So in a sense what you are getting from the opposition parties when they stand and vote against this package is opposition to working harder. Are they opposed to working harder? I would like them to answer that. That is what the new rules do, they provide more hours—albeit under a less number of days. Look at the number of days other Parliaments sit.

We have to put it in the context of the legislative jurisdiction of this Parliament. We are a federation, and the whole range of sovereign powers that Parliaments operate under in this country is split. The provinces have a huge number of jurisdiction items that only they pass laws on. We have a limited number that we pass laws on. Essentially, we have about half the constitutional jurisdiction, and yet we sit more hours than governments that have the whole package.

Look at the example of France. France is a unitary state and its Parliament has full constitutional jurisdiction and yet it only sits 149 days a year—substantially less than we do. Australia, which is a better example because it too has a federation and therefore a split constitutional authority, sits for 66 days.

I have no hesitation in telling Canadians that I am sure we will get as much work done as we do now and I want to put the argument to my friends that we can actually be superior under the new model if we, as members of Parliament, do our jobs the way I think we should. I will speak to that in a minute.

I believe these changes are important and necessary. I would be prepared to live with them as a member of the government, or as a member of the opposition.

Mr. Brewin: The opposition. I hope you have the opportunity to experience that again.

Mr. Thacker: Well, I think around the turn of the century we will have a session in opposition, but it will not last long I hope.

This Parliament, with only half the constitutional authority, actually sits many more days than other Parliaments with the full range of constitutional authority.

Let us look at it from another perspective. What about the number of bills passed by other Parliaments per sitting day? Canada passes, on average, one bill per sitting day. That might seem like a lot, but Australia with the same constitutional jurisdiction as ours, passes 14 bills per sitting day. In short, its committees meet, get all these bills ready to go and when the members hit the House they do not need the same amount of time because they have had input before. That is the major point I want to put forth.

Under these changes, these 20 standing committees, divided into these five envelopes, can spend the time on what I think we are elected to do by our constituents; to sit on those committees and develop policies, to review departments, to review areas of the law and to make recommendations as to how these bills can be changed and how the laws can be changed so that they are more effective.

It is having input up front, before a legislated bill, a proposal hits the House.

Once you get a specific proposal it is not easy to change the principles and the broad philosophy behind it. I have always enjoyed the work at the policy level to try and get this input when it is at the bureaucratic level before it is put in the form of a bill. That is what the new rules will permit us to do.

There is not much political gain from that because it is often difficult in a final bill to say: "I am responsible for this clause or that clause." I can assure you, having been here for 12 years, that most of us as individuals have had an impact on the bills and on the broad policy thrust that the government has been prepared to pick up and change. I am very proud of our accomplishments.

Look at some other countries in terms of their production. The United States, which has an awesome jurisdictional authority, and because it is a super power, has a million different things to deal with; more than we do in Canada. It passes an average of 10 bills per sitting day.

The Netherlands passes 14 bills per sitting day. New Zealand, with its socialist government, passes eight bills per sitting day. Sweden, another socialist government, passes seven bills per sitting day. We pass one.

I think the case is clear that under the new proposals we will be able to pass more bills per sitting day, but that is not unusual because we are still only one per day compared to 14 in Australia, 14 in the Netherlands, 9 in Japan and 10 in the United States. Let us not think we are wasting our time or somehow abusing Parliament under the new proposals.

The final point I want to make is that the reason I think the new rules are important is that they will permit the laws of Canada to be changed at a rate which will keep the nation up to date, modern and in full competition with other countries that are changing their laws much more quickly.

The reality is we are behind because over the past few years we have wasted so much time in this country debating bills in this House and delaying change. I want to give some examples.

In the area of intellectual property a question arose when some drug companies started to charge too much around the world for drugs. Different countries responded in different ways. Every country except Canada responded with a price review board so they could force these drug companies to justify their increases. Canada took away their patent rights and so no research and development was ever done in this country. If a drug company wanted to develop a new drug, it would not be developed in Canada. It would be developed in Germany, the United States, Britain, or Switzerland because there would be patent protection.

We made that change. The opposition parties both opposed it.

Plant breeders rights legislation existed in every other country of the world.

Mr. Milliken: That's rubbish.

Mr. Thacker: Well, not every country, but the major ones. Not in this country. I remember when Mr. Whelan introduced that bill for the Liberals. A large number of us in the Conservative opposition were prepared to vote for it, but the NDP and the church groups in that case were so effective in their opposition that they were able to block that bill for 15 years. We finally got it through but our researchers are 15 years behind these other countries in developing new crop varieties. That means our money goes off-shore to get new varieties rather than our own scientists developing them here.

The point is that the rules permitted the opposition to block that bill for 15 years. I think that was unfortunate and a mistake.

I must concede that both opposition parties learned their lesson when we came to the Integrated Circuit Topography Act, which was under intellectual property. That bill went through with all parties agreeing to it because we finally got the point across that we had 25 companies in this country designing and building microchips, but they had no patent protection. Therefore they were going to close down and go off-shore. All three parties agreed to rectify that and so we are moving ahead.

We are behind on aboriginal rights, on constitutional change, on the issue of transportation, and on agriculture. It goes back to the rules of the House, and in my view it is not in the best interests of the country or even in the best interests of the opposition parties. I can remember being in opposition when the Liberal government proposed the National Energy Program and proposed all sorts of other bills. We opposed those bills with a passion. In the case of the National Energy Program, we delayed it for a year.

Mr. Milliken: You took away our right to oppose it.

Mr. Thacker: Yes, you are absolutely right. I do not think that was correct. I do not think that was proper and I did not agree with it at that time because my view was that if these bills are so bad for the Canadian public then what we should do in opposition is to want the government to pass them quickly, get them out and get those bills laws so that they are oppressing our people.

Mr. Brewin: That is a terrible argument.

Mr. Thacker: I think that is a very good argument. I would like to hear my friend from Victoria put the opposite. Mr. Speaker, I just want them to hear my point. If the bills are so bad, surely the role of the opposition is to stand up, to identify, "we think this is a mistake, that is a mistake". It goes to a legislative committee. "We think it could be changed here and here and here." In my experience, the government will accept many of those changes, but, if it does not, the bill becomes the law. If it is as bad as the opposition says, then it is going to be hurting Canadians. When we get to the next election, every one of those hurts will be brought to its attention. They will be able to judge the government and throw them out.

I think what would have happened is we delayed a lot of bills, whereas had they come in sooner or if the new rules were in place where committee members had input much earlier, the bills that come before the House would not be as defective as they are now where the bills come primarily out of the bureaucracy, out of the special interest groups who are proposing change without having access to the elected members who are going back to their ridings one week out of the month.

So, I am hoping that the new process will just simply be superior. I am prepared to live under it even if I were in opposition. I think it will be good.

Mr. Brewin: What does it do to the committees?

Mr. Thacker: I think the standing committees will now spend their time on the policy issues trying to have input to the bills before they actually are proposed in the House. A Standing Committee on Agriculture will take up some of these controversial questions, will make proposals that a government would be foolish to reject because it reflects the good work of all three committees.

Mr. Brewin: Just like it was foolish to reject the CSIS report.

Mr. Thacker: Absolutely. My friend is absolutely correct. I think governments are foolish when they reject the committee reports, but my experience has been that those committee reports ultimately work their way into the public policy.

Then we have the legislative committees that will spend more of their time on the specific technical details of the bill. Whereas now what is happening is when a bill goes before a committee, the committee gets in witnesses who are speaking really to the principle of the bill and to other broad policy issues that are not related to that bill. I think that is a waste of our time. I think it is a waste of money and it does not really change the bill that is before the committee at that stage.

I have to say to you, all things considered, I believe this package is worthy of our support. I am happy to stand and support this bill. I know the members of the opposition will probably not be able to stand and support it, but I know, having spent many years in opposition, that I bet you if you could poll them privately, if you could search their minds so to speak, we would find that a lot of them are in agreement with the vast bulk of these changes.

I think, because I am prepared to live with it if I were in opposition, that it should be good reason for many other members to come to the same conclusion. The opposition should take a longer term view and support this package, although I realize they will not for narrow partisan reasons. I suppose, if I were sitting there, I would not either.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened, with interest, to the hon. member's speech and particularly the comment that he made about the longer hours that the House is sitting. He suggested that members of the opposition somehow opposed these because they did not want to work harder. I could see his tongue sticking out the side of his cheek almost at that point. He knows that the opposition in this House is extremely hard working and very diligent in its duties. I am sure that he knows that the five additional hours a week that the government has thrown into the sittings of the House are really not designed to make the House work harder. What they are designed to do is make up additional time for government business because it is taking away so much of the time by cutting 40 days from the sittings of the House.

NATIONAL SOIL CONSERVATION WEEK

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of National Soil Conservation Week from April 8 to 14 is to make all Canadians aware of the importance of soil conservation.

This is a unique opportunity to encourage farmers to ensure sustained economic growth for their farm while they improve and safeguard the quality of the soil.

The federal-provincial national soil conservation program, with a $150-million budget, offers farmers financial and technical assistance to adopt soil conservation methods.

Mr. Speaker, farmers from all over the country have successfully adopted various practices: green-manure crops, field windbreaks, grassed waterways, extended crop rotation, stripe cropping and conservation tillage. These are all essential for sustainable agriculture.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, did you know it is the policy of the Conservative government to apply the goods and services tax to medals won by Canadian athletes competing outside of Canada?

A case in point: a constituent of mine from the Leander Boat Club in Hamilton coached his rowing crew to an impressive fourth place finish at the Head of the Charles regatta in Boston. The team members did not receive their medals at the regatta. They were subsequently shipped to Hamilton. Do you know what happened? Customs Canada sent an invoice for the GST due on the awards.

The constituent wrote to the Department of National Revenue asking for an explanation, but the department did not even have the courtesy to write him back a letter. The government spends millions of dollars telling Canadians how to pay the GST, but all this constituent of mine got was a scribbled note on the bottom of his own letter: "Awards duty free, but pay the GST.".

While it is the policy of the government to charge GST for bronze medals, it is not for the gold medal. The same constituent ran into Brian Boitano at a reception and asked whether he paid for his gold figure skating medal. Boitano, was amused and said: "Of course not".

The medal winning Minister of National Revenue knows well the spirit of competition. I say to him: Do a favour to our athletes and not tax them for their awards.

FRASER RIVER

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the mighty Fraser River in British Columbia is one of the busiest waterways in Canada. It is used for fishing, shipping, boating and by the forest industry for its mills and booming grounds.

There is multiple use and multiple responsibility. Those who live and work on the river depend on each other to assume that responsibility.

Because the Council of Forest Industries and the federal and provincial governments benefit from the forestry's use of the river, all three have committed funds to a debris control board.

The board clears 75,000 cubic metres of wood waste from the Fraser River and another 75,000 cubic metres from the Strait of Georgia every year. Without this work, fishing boats, pleasure craft, float planes, bridges, docks and houseboats would be at risk.

As of April 1, the federal forestry and fisheries departments have both eliminated their $45,000 share of the annual cost of debris control board.

No one seems to be able to explain why. No one seems to be prepared to tell the users of the Fraser, especially the fishing fleet, why these federal departments have abandoned their share of the responsibility for an inexpensive cost-effective program that potentially saves millions.

TRADE

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, those who have business experience know that trade today is international.

Quebec's business people know that very well.

That is why they massively supported the Free Trade Agreement with the United States.

These days, we have the honour to receive the President of Mexico and on behalf of the business people of Quebec, I wish to welcome him.

I also want to tell him that we Quebecers strongly desire developing our trade relations with Mexico in a harmonious way.

At the present time, the success of this initiative depends, for now, on the federal government.

That is why, as a member from Quebec, I intend to be vigilant.

Quebec's present and future interests are at stake and we must ensure that the federal government discharges its responsibilities to Quebecers.

JUVENILE CRIME

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, last week in Burnaby, B.C., a jewellery store manager was gunned down in broad daylight in a shopping mall by two teenage thieves.

In March, four teenagers, one brandishing a 25 calibre semi-automatic pistol, walked into another Vancouver jewellery store and walked out with jewellery estimated at $400,000. One of them was only 13 years old.

Vancouver police say these are examples of a growing number of serious and violent crimes being committed by children. A report in The Vancouver Province says that more than two dozen similar crimes have been committed in lower mainland B.C. in the past few months, mostly by children. Many gangs are using children to commit crimes because under the Young Offenders Act the worst that can happen to a juvenile is three years in jail.

This government has proposed amendments to provide for increased penalties under the Young Offenders Act. Those changes, and perhaps even stronger ones, are needed to prevent and help deter our youth from choosing a life of crime.

I call upon the Minister of Justice to take a serious look into this growing problem and take decisive action before many more violent crimes are committed.

CANADA POST

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, for many small towns and villages in Canada, the distinctive brick post office building is the one tangible presence of the federal government. But this presence is being systematically dismantled by Canada Post Corporation with the full support of this government.

In my riding the communities of Monastary, Orangedale, Margaree Harbour, and St. Joseph du Moine have recently lost their post office.

Last week the residents of Mabou were notified that their post office was next on the chopping block. The Mabou post office, serves 410 households in this proud community, in existence since the 1820s where the inscription "Mabou—House of Letters" in Gaelic is eloquent testimony to a rich Scottish tradition. This community is to lose a post office it has had since 1871. No consultations and no appeal.

This carnage has to stop. It is time this government reined in its Crown corporation run amok.

It is time Canada Post listened to the residents of Mabou, Orangedale, St. Joseph du Moine, Margaree Harbour and all those other communities which want to preserve their rural post offices, this fundamental badge of nationhood.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, according to the media, senior federal civil servants are meeting regularly to plan a new decentralized Canada.

If we ever do transfer federal responsibilities to the provinces they will certainly need additional taxing powers as well. That would clearly weaken the federal government's ability to manage our national economy. The Minister of Finance has often pointed out the problems we have now when provincial spending policies conflict with federal economic policy. Greater decentralization will mean even greater conflicts and ultimately could lead to economic chaos and the disintegration of Canada as a viable nation.

That is not what most Canadians want. Most Canadians, and I am one of them, want a strong national government.

SHIPBUILDING

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it is no secret that Canada's shipbuilding and repair industry is in a severe crisis.

Successive Liberal and Conservative governments have failed to ensure that domestic requirements for vessels used for transport, coastal trade, defence, the fishery, our national resources, offshore petroleum development, and search and rescue patrol would be met by Canadian shipyards and Canadian workers.

The Liberal government of the early eighties, through their then finance minister, now the Leader of the Opposition, cancelled the last amount of shipbuilding subsidy offered to Canadian shipyards for new vessel construction.

The Conservative government has totally reneged on its 1984 election promise to adopt a national shipbuilding policy as a top priority and has instead presided over the further erosion of the industry through a rationalization policy of delay, neglect and downsizing.

And now the final insult: the motor vessel Arctic, 51 per cent owned by the Government of Canada, is going to a Spanish shipyard for major repairs at a time when thousands of shipyard workers in Canada are out of work.

It is time that Canada matched shipbuilding support offered by our competitors' countries. It is time that shipyard work goes to Canadians.

TAXI INDUSTRY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to defend taxi licence holders at Montreal International Airport. The director of Dorval Airport raised the price of operating permits by 84 per cent plus GST. Many tax licence holders who did not pay these additional charges by April 5, 1991, lost their right to work at that airport. Most airport licence holders report that their income has dropped 46 per cent on average because of the GST and the recession created by this government. The higher licence costs mean that each licence holder must earn nearly $2,000 a year more on average.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the director of Montreal International Airport to reconsider this huge unjustified increase. Let us give taxi drivers at Dorval Airport a chance during this period of economic crisis.

AIR CADET LEAGUE OF CANADA

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, today marks a special event for an important group of young Canadians. On this date in 1941, the Air Cadet League of Canada received its charter authorizing it to set up a reserve of aviators who would be trained for service in the Royal Canadian Air Force, which was then participating in the war effort.

More recently, the League and the Canadian Armed Forces worked together to provide a series of aviation-related training programs for young men and women aged 12 to 19, with the aim of producing better citizens for Canada.

The Air Cadets now have some 27,000 young people in 440 squadrons from coast to coast, in communities such as Bishop's Falls, Acton, Abitibi, Peace River, Don Valley East, Yukon and Valleyfield, in my riding, to name only a few.

The Cadets provide our youth with very valuable civic training and in many cases are the most significant activity for young people in the outlying regions of Canada.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that all members of this House join me in offering the Air Cadet League of Canada our sincerest congratulations and best wishes for success in the future, on their 50th anniversary.

HOUSING

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, some politicians would have Canadians think the economy is in tatters and investor confidence is in shreds.

However, numbers released yesterday tell a different story. They tell a story of renewed hope for the future and the willingness of average Canadians to ignore the rhetoric here and go about their lives.

Those numbers came from the Toronto Real Estate Board, and show that the sales level of resale homes in that city was up 120 per cent in March over the same period a year earlier. Almost 5,800 homes changed hands in a single month and that is up 64 per cent from the month earlier, the fifth best month ever. Why? Because interest rates have come down, inflationary house prices have come down, and buyer confidence has gone up. Times may still be tough, but I find it hard to think of a more powerful symbol that there are better days ahead.

Oral Questions

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): When this government created the Spicer commission, it did so in an apparent attempt to elicit the opinions of Canadian citizens and to move away from the closed door, secretive approach that characterized previous constitutional discussions.

Just last week in my riding of Nipissing, we learned that commission moderators can ban the media if they so desire under the guise of making the participants feel more comfortable. The public is footing the bill for this forum, the most expensive in Canadian history, yet the media can be prohibited from covering and publicizing the proceedings. Wasn't the purpose of this forum to listen to what Canadians have to say and to engage in dialogue with one another?

Perhaps this is why the government suffers the image problem it has. If the people want to be heard, they will be, regardless of who is present. It is not by banning media from public hearings that encourages citizens to speak up. On the contrary, debate will be enhanced when other people see and hear what their fellow citizens have to say.

When this commission was created, it was termed the biggest exercise in democracy. They should have called it "demockery". What was supposed to be a country-wide public opinion search has become the government's $27 million and counting patronage fund.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, as a Canadian, and as a member of the Standing Committee on National Defence, I was fortunate this past Sunday morning to have been in Halifax with many of my colleagues who, along with His Excellency the Governor General, the Right Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn, the Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, the Minister of National Defence, Bill McKnight, and the Associate Minister of National Defence, Mary Collins, welcomed home from the Persian Gulf 950 Canadian forces personnel who served on board HMCS Athabaskan, HMCS Terra Nova and HMCS Protecteur.

I felt equal pride later in the day when I joined a reception party at CFB Uplands to officially greet 90 of our Canadian forces personnel flown in from Germany en route from the Persian Gulf.

In both situations, for the loved ones of these courageous men and women, fear and uncertainty gave way Sunday to tears of joy. Beyond a doubt, we as Canadians are extremely proud and thankful for their contribution to peace.

Governor General Hnatyshyn summed up admirably the feelings of all Canadians toward all our returning personnel when he said Sunday to the waiting families in Halifax that their loved ones: "remind us that Canada is blessed with skilled and courageous service men and women who are prepared to defend peace whenever and wherever it is endangered".

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, today the Government of Canada and the Canadian Institute of Forestry are sponsoring a parliamentary forum to discuss forestry and its issues across this country.

As well today, the Minister of Forestry tabled his first annual report on the state of our forests. Our forests need attention now from this government. The same government that talks about supporting our forest community is at the same time unwilling to stand up to the American administration and terminate the softwood lumber memorandum of understanding that is crippling our forest industry.

Hundreds of communities are dependent on the forests for their survival. We need some action now.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Today the Conference Board of Canada released its most recent report which said: "The latest federal budget is also contributing to the weak outlook for 1991" and will have a "dampening effect on the economy's return to health."

When will the Prime Minister admit that the February 26 budget was a mistake? More than 1.4 million Canadians are asking the Prime Minister for a new budget so that we will create the jobs that are needed, or a new Minister of Finance who will know that we need a new budget in Canada.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend refers to a report of the Conference Board. Immediately post-budget, the Conference Board predicted that recovery would occur in an April-May timeframe. In the budget itself the government had said that the economy will recover in the second half of this year and grow strongly in 1992.

Other economists support the government's view. What appears to be happening is that the Conference Board is now bringing its forecast into line with the forecasts that were set out very clearly by the government in the budget in 1991 where there is no doubt—I think this will dishearten my hon. friend—that there will be substantial economic recovery by mid-year 1991. There will be very strong growth in 1992 and the same in 1993.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, that is not a very good answer for the 1.4 million Canadians who are looking for jobs.

Neither is it very good for the 73,000 children who depend on social assistance in Toronto alone. Food bank officials in Toronto say that the number of people using food banks today has increased 30 per cent to 120,000 people.

Will the Prime Minister do something about this problem? Will he make sure that his Minister of Finance stops talking about inflation and keeping a high Canadian dollar? Will he make sure that there will be jobs for the parents of these children who are the innocent victims of his made-in-Canada recession?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a remarkable statement by someone who was a former Minister of Finance. He urges me to tell the Minister of Finance to stop talking about inflation. I will never do that. Inflation is an insidious illness—

• (1420)

Ms. Copps: So is unemployment.

Mr. Mulroney: —that affects most of all the elderly, the poor and people on fixed incomes. We want to keep inflation down and not let what happen when the Leader of the Opposition was minister of finance. We do not want a repeat of that.

Now, with regard to the very serious question my hon. friend raises, the bank rate is down by some 409 or 410 basis points.

Ms. Copps: The polls are down.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says the polls are down. Well, I cannot quarrel with that; the polls are down. But you know what? They have been down before and as long as they are up on election day, that is what matters. It means we have stuck to a very serious economic game plan that has brought about recovery.

In point of fact, apart from the very significant decline in interest rates, my hon. friend who raised questions about Toronto will acknowledge that housing is one of the most important indicators of economic growth or decline. In March, sales of existing homes increased by 64 per cent in Toronto. The March sales were the highest total since April 1988. This indicates that the beginnings of a recovery are there and all Canadians can look forward to better economic times.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the Prime Minister decided to answer my question on interest rates. Yes, there was a slight drop in the interest rates. However, they remain four percentage points higher than in the U.S. So, the Canadian dollar is very high and therefore our Canadian products cost too much on the international market. When will the Prime Minister come to realize that, if we had a more competitive dollar instead of a high interest rates and high dollar policy, jobs could be created across the country which would allow the 223,000 Montrealers who today are looking for jobs to regain the dignity they are entitled to as citizens of this country.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the interest rates dropped not slightly, as the hon. member said, but by a full 4.5 points over the last 11 months. That is quite substantial! I recognize without hesitation, though, that interest rates of 11, 11.25, 11.50 and 11.75 per cent are still too high. I readily admit it. I think, however, that the hon. member will agree with me that 11.5 per cent is much better than the 22 per cent, which was the level at which the interest rates were when he was in power.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: I am about to talk about Diefenbaker.

Mr. Mulroney: The Leader of the Opposition wants to tell me something about Diefenbaker, and I will talk about Mackenzie King afterwords—

Mr. Chrétien: Tell us about the unemployed, Mr. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: Go ahead, talk about Diefenbaker but, please, do not bring up interest rates!

[English]

Mr. Chrétien: You are like the Blue Jays yesterday, Brian. Not the Expos.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Prime Minister.

Today the Conference Board in its forecast said it expected the rate of inflation to go up 5.7 per cent this year, up from 4.8 per cent last year. If the Prime Minister is so concerned about inflation, why are he and his government pursuing policies which the Conference Board said are making inflation worse rather than better?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no one said what my hon. friend suggests has been said. The government acknowledged when it brought in the GST, that there would be an increase in the inflation rate. Notwithstanding that, we were seeking to bring about in the second half of this year renewed economic growth in a non-inflationary climate.

We agree that inflation rates at 5 or 6 per cent are still too high. My hon. friend will sympathize with me I am sure because he was a member of a government where inflation went to 13 per cent. We are keeping the rates down to 6.5 per cent or 5 or 5.5 per cent. I think we should be entitled to a few words of congratulations from my hon. friend.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the close to 1.5 million people who are out of work due to the policies of this government are certainly not going to find any words of congratulations for the Prime Minister.

We have high unemployment, a too high dollar and, in spite of the Prime Minister's words, a still too high interest rate. Is this not proof that the government's budget is the wrong budget for the wrong time? Why will the Prime Minister not admit that his budget is making the economy worse rather than better? Why will the government not bring in new policies, a new budget to create jobs and get the economy moving again right now? Why will it not give those words of encouragement to the 1.5 million people this government has put out of work?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in recent weeks the IMF, the OECD and the World Bank, among others have expressed support for the policies being pursued by the Government of Canada.

If my hon. friend has an alternative to the policies that are being followed by the Government of Canada, we would be happy to hear from him unless it is a typical Liberal recommendation to spend more money and to tax not only our children but to start taxing our grandchildren. That Liberal policy we will not follow.

I share my hon. friend's concern in regard to any degree of unemployment. In the first five and half years of this government, some 1.6 million new jobs were created, 87 per cent of them full-time and some 65 per cent of those jobs went to women. I think that is a good record.

As we come out of this recession in the summer and the autumn, it is the hope of this government that Canadians will maintain that kind of job-creating record which I point out to my hon. friend, in the first five years, led the OECD countries with the exception of one. I think that is a powerful record and it is one that Canadians can achieve again.

REFUGEES

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

A few months ago, the world watched as the coalition countries went into war and today we are watching a human tragedy, particularly of the Kurdistan population. For the Kurdistan population certainly the new world order must look very much like the old world order.

We found almost $1 billion in Canada to fight that war, $600 million of which was allocated in the February budget. What kind of real humanitarian aid are we now prepared to give? Clearly, we cannot walk away from this situation. What kind of humanitarian aid, above the $3 million already committed, is Canada prepared to give to the suffering of these people?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there may well have been some Canadians who, faced with the various problems in Iraq, were prepared to have Canada walk away from its responsibilities.

This government has never walked away from its responsibilities. We do not intend to do that now. The hon. member will know that in August of last year, Canada announced something in the neighbourhood of $77 million in humanitarian assistance to deal with—

An hon. member: You make a partisan play out of everything.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): If you cannot stand the heat go home to Victoria.

• (1430)

As I indicated, the Government of Canada made available some $77 million in August, particularly to Jordan and to Egypt, but also to other countries. We not only made that commitment, we delivered on the money.

On Friday my colleague and I announced a contribution of $3.3 million to various international humanitarian organizations. I am pleased to announce today that an additional $4 million will be provided to international humanitarian organizations to help ease the suffering of the Kurds. I should say that about $2 million of that additional continuing contribution by Canada will be to the Canadian Red Cross to expand its operations in Turkey. Others will be to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for operations in Turkey and in Iran, and UNICEF will receive some $300,000 for its operations in Turkey.

I am also pleased to announce that the first consignment for the International Red Cross will be carried to the region by a Canadian Boeing 707 which will leave Trenton tomorrow.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the minister.

There was a good answer to a very simple question and eventually we got to it. I am glad to see that the government is giving more aid in this area. That was simply what the question was about.

[Translation]

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the Kurds in Canada are very worried about their families in Iraq. I would like to ask the minister what the government will do to help Kurdish families, the Kurds here in Canada, obtain information about their families in Iraq?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have already been conversations between representatives of my department and spokespersons and representatives of the Kurdish community in Canada. We intend to continue these consultations.

Of course, it is difficult for us or for anyone to obtain accurate information on the Kurds in Iraq. Much of that area in Iraq is in upheaval; there is a great movement of people: more than a million are now travelling to the borders of Iran and Turkey.

I think that the best guarantee we can give Canadians and others is to find ways to stop Saddam Hussein's activities, to stop the attacks on the Kurds. In the United Nations and through our humanitarian acts, we are seeking ways to end this tragedy.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, certainly we all agree that it is necessary that the Kurds be protected and be given the protection of the United Nations. I am sure that the minister would agree that part of that in the long term is to ensure that we have arms control in the world. The United Nations should take a strong stand on arms control and let Canada be a participant in that.

In particular on the whole issue of arms control and disarmament, I would like to then ask the minister who has made very good comments about arms control and disarmament why his government just this week slashed by over 50 per cent funds to disarmament groups, down to a meagre $111,000. Is this a commitment to peace that this minister and this government have by slashing funds for disarmament?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no one questions the commitment to peace or to practical methods of arms control by this government. There is a program of restraint in place. It does apply to certain activities, including the Disarmament Fund.

The hon. member has raised questions with regard to the role of the United Nations in this crisis with respect to the Kurds and I think the House may be interested to know the current situation as Canada sees it.

The House will know that the European Community has proposed a sort of enclave under UN protection. We share some of the concerns of the Secretary General of the United Nations with respect to jurisdiction. But in the circumstances, we would nonetheless support that European Community proposal.

However, if the enclave idea is not acceptable, we have set out an alternative Canadian proposal. There was a discussion on Saturday between my office and Ambassador Yves Fortier. Yesterday afternoon, Ambassador Fortier, on behalf of Canada, made a formal proposal to Jean Claude Aimé, the Assistant Secretary General of the United Nations, regarding an alternative Canadian proposal, which we believe avoids the problem of sovereignty. That proposal would involve—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I assume the House is interested in the nature of the—

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Secretary of State.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, our proposal involves two elements. It involves the sending into Iraq of a civilian United Nations presence which would have in the first instance a responsibility for ensuring the co-ordination of delivery of humanitarian and other assistance. It would also assign to that civilian United Nations presence a sort of ombudsman role which would be able to guarantee, as best the world can, that undertakings with respect to amnesty are being honoured and would be able to offer some indication to citizens of Kurdish origin in Canada and to concerned citizens around the world.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think you would agree that as much as we may welcome the proposals by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, it would be much more helpful to the members of this House if he had given a statement in the House and we had time to properly consider and respond to it.

I would like to put a question directly to the Prime Minister. Last fall the Prime Minister acted as the co-chair of the special summit on children. At that time he declared very directly that Canada was committed to the eradication of suffering of children around the world.

I think the Prime Minister would agree that there is no greater spectacle of children suffering than the many thousands of wounded and hungry children in the hills and mountains in the boundary areas of Turkey, Iraq and Iran.

I would ask the Prime Minister: In his capacity as the Chairman of that summit, will he not accept that he has a special obligation in the case of the suffering of the Kurdish children, and will he under the auspices of the UN organize a special meeting of all the participants who were engaged in that children's summit to come together to mobilize a major, comprehensive aid effort on behalf of the suffering children of Kurdistan. Is that not the kind of responsibility and leadership the Prime Minister could show today?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, indeed Canada co-chaired the World Summit for Children at the United Nations, and along with some 70 or 75 other countries, we undertook some obligations, all of which, with the support of members of Parliament, the government will respect.

My hon. friend raises a most serious question about not only the tragedy unfolding in Iraq, but also the special implications for children. It was with this in mind that the Secretary of State for External Affairs instructed the ambassador at the United Nations, Mr. Fortier, to meet yesterday with James Grant, the Executive Director of UNICEF, to discuss with him a series of options that would indeed help children in these circumstances. Canada made at that time a signal to the Executive Director our intention to make a very substantial financial contribution to assist the progress of the UN plans along this way.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister would agree that a commitment of $300,000 to UNICEF is not exactly the kind of commitment that would meet the proportions of the tragedy we now see of the tens of thousands of children who are suffering.

I think what we have to understand is that this is not just a problem of immediate relief, but is a long-term problem dealing with resettlement, refugees and reconstruction. In that case, in addition to the actions that I am asking the Prime Minister to take as Chairman of the Children's Summit, would he also agree to set up an all-party parliamentary delegation to go to the region, to look at the issue, to come back with recommendations about how Canada—

• (1440)

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I suppose Tory members are not concerned about the case. It is tragic that on that side of the House they are so indifferent.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Will he set up a delegation in order to go over there and come back with a unanimous recommendation on how Canada can make a commitment on the long term to help the Kurds who are currently suffering the kinds of tragedies we all see daily on our TV sets?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no difficulty at all in asking the government House leader to examine the suggestion made by my hon. friend.

I think in the circumstances, all of us who have been watching television know the enormity of the tragedy there. Perhaps the money that we would spend for that parliamentary trip would best be spent by sending it right to the children and their parents.

I can tell my hon friend that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I view, as do all members of the House, very seriously this enormous tragedy that is unfolding. I will acknowledge that our financial resources are tight. We are strapped, like many other governments around the world.

This will not be an excuse for the Government of Canada not to do more than its share to make sure that this enormous burden is alleviated and that children, and innocent men and women who are fleeing oppression are not made to pay the price.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister about the economic situation in Manitoba, which is grave.

Unemployment has soared in my province in the past year. There are 48,000 Manitobans who are looking for work. When it comes to attracting private investment, Manitoba is dead last in Canada.

In other words, Tory policies are killing Manitobans. I want to ask the Prime Minister: When is this government going to become pro-active and devise a plan that will produce jobs and investment for Manitobans?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that this government has been as generous with Manitobans as any government in history. It is certainly doing well relative to the rest of Canada.

We understand very significantly the needs of Manitobans. That is why we have increased our job-training funds there under the CJS, and will do more through our new programs under the unemployment insurance program.

I should say that Manitobans as well will benefit from economic policies that include lower inflation, lower interest rates and greater housing starts and better construction permits. The kind of economic recovery that this government is encouraging will benefit Manitoba as well as everywhere else.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell this minister that the very future of Manitoba is at stake.

Our young people, who see little incentive to stay in our province, are being punished by a 20 per cent increase in their university tuition fees. On top of that, we are now told that we face massive lay-offs in the provincial civil service.

All of this comes after this government reduced federal transfer payments to the provinces. I want to know from the Prime Minister: When is the government going to move? Is it going to wait for more economic disaster?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, what the hon. member is doing is fearmongering, and all this is pre-budget speculation.

What he might consider looking at are things that are happening in other provinces, including under the Liberal Government of Newfoundland.

What this government wants to do is ensure that Manitoba and other provinces will benefit from the kinds of programs we put in place. I think that the hon. member, rather than speculate, should look at the tangible benefits that have come about.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister.

The Conference Board of Canada has, I guess, confirmed what Canadians already know. This government's fiscal policies and in fact all policies are a dismal failure.

I cite a litany of these failures. The latest federal budget is contributing to the weak outlook for 1991. The real Gross Domestic Product is forecast to decline. The Consumer Price Index rate is forecast to increase to 5.7 per cent. I could go on.

When is the Prime Minister and this government going to admit that its policies are incorrect and address the issues to give Canadians some hope rather that despair?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, what the Conference Board of Canada has done is essentially come into agreement with the Government of Canada concerning the outlook for the economy. We know that the country is going through difficult times. That is why we have a plan for economic recovery.

Even the NDP Treasurer of Ontario says that the government cannot create jobs for everyone. Even the treasurer of the NDP Government of Ontario says that it is time that people were better trained, that interest rates came down, so that the economy could move ahead.

Surely the kind of economic recovery that we have put in place is the kind of thing that even the NDP talks about in those few moments when it has an intelligent comment to make.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): I do not think that is an answer, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think Canadians will accept it.

I want to talk about the North American free trade agreement which will only exacerbate the Canadian problem. Sugar producers are now on side with wheat producers, pork producers and steel manufacturers in this country. With regard to pork producers, the Minister for International Trade said: "We won a great victory". That victory is going to be superseded by American political intervention.

When will this government protect Canadians and develop the political will and stomach to deal with Americans as they deal with us in trade issues?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not know when between the question of the hon. member's leader and the question of the hon. member opposite the NDP lost its interest in developing countries and in poorer countries that need our help and need work.

I remind the hon. member as well that, when we brought in a bill with job training in it, they stood in the way and did everything they could to ensure that the bill did not pass and that we could not provide adjustment and training for our workers in a new global training environment.

We know that this is important for the future of Canada. We know that we cannot wish away the deficit. We know that we have to trade in order to survive and that trading with the United States and Mexico under these agreements is going to be good for Canadian workers. If that member's party had not stood against our training programs, we would be much further ahead today.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, just part of the ongoing tragedy of this government's program for deindustrializing Canada is our steel industry. Over the past two years it has lost 8,400 or fully 19 per cent of all its permanent jobs. Last year American steel producers more than doubled their share of Canada's domestic market.

What will the minister of industry do to restore these 8,400 steel workers jobs to Canada?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, obviously that was the same kind of question that the member for Willowdale asked me at a committee recently. He knows very well what the steel industry has faced recently, in fact more than in the last 20 years, much more competition than before from many developing countries. For that reason the industry has to be restructured.

What we see today, particularly in Ontario, are consequences of that reality. We are working with the industry. The member knows very well what we did for Algoma. We are trying to find, particularly with the government of Ontario, answers to that kind of question.

He knows very well that the steel industry, as with any other industry in Canada, particularly exporting industries, has to have good conditions, including interest rates, the dollar and the inflation rate. With those kinds of conditions, they will face the reality they have to face and the industry agrees with us.

The member knows well that in the years that the dollar was higher than it is today, the steel industry did not face any problem because conditions were different. I believe he knows that very well.

• (1450)

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): I am incredulous. Our steel industry has for a long time told us that it is more modern than the Americans. Our steel industry has repeatedly told this government that it's high interest rate, high dollar policy, has cost it a 20 per cent decline in competitiveness.

When will this government stop delivering on rhetoric and start delivering on jobs? When will this minister for industry stop his deindustrialization of Canada?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): I am sorry, but I will have to give a few figures to my friend so that he can be very well informed as to what happened. In the 1960s the dollar was at $1.05 and the steel industry did not have any problems. But amazingly, the worst period for the steel industry in Canada was when the dollar was at 70 cents in 1982. That was a one-year period.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. The free trade agreement does not define as yet what a subsidy is. Yet, Sydney Steel Corporation has been countervailed against for having received a subsidy—not after the free trade agreement was signed, or even while it was being negotiated, but long before it was even contemplated.

Why is this industry being punished retroactively for having in good faith accepted federal and provincial assistance which was in accordance with Canadian laws and international agreements? Why is this government not standing up against this injustice?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member on reconsideration would recognize that there is not prejudicial action being taken against the Canadian steel industry. There is, as my colleague has just indicated, a period of difficulty being experienced by that industry now in various parts of the country. We are in close regular contact with leaders of that industry, and indeed others involved in the industry, to ensure that full access is had to all government programs, and that they are able to take advantage of provisions set out under Canadian trade law.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to suggest to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that there is a double standard here.

During the 1980s, the U.S. steel industry received $30 billion in assistance from governments in the United States, while in Canada, Sydney Steel was the only one to receive such assistance.

I want to know when the government is going to organize a countervail against the importation of U.S. steel into Canada.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I know the hon. member is a serious member. I would be interested in considering a response to that question in two pieces of information. First, I would like him to provide me with documentary indication as to the extraordinary sum of the subsidy that he alleges, and second, I would be interested in knowing about what I take is a new Liberal policy of retroactive countervail measures.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The day after April Fool's, CIDA delivered by hand letters to CUSO and other NGOs announcing that their grants would be effectively cut from 3:3 for each dollar to 2 for each dollar, an effective cut of 25 per cent, and other amounts for other NGOs.

These NGOs had contracts with CIDA, some signed very recently. Yet CIDA has summarily broken those contracts, forcing NGOs to renege on some of their own development contracts for development and to lay off staff.

Will the minister tell us why the government has targeted development NGOs, our most effective and efficient ODA delivery system, for such massive cuts?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, let me first say that I will want to look into the detail of the question. The Minister for External Relations is not in the House but she and I will look at the details of the question.

Let me say that there is no targeting of development NGOs. This government has demonstrated a very real reliance upon those organizations in a variety of ways, including facilitating development assistance to countries with which we do not want to have, for various reasons, a government-to-government relation.

The hon. member knows that the country faces very serious economic conditions. We have to deal with them. That requires some policies of restraint. No part of Canadian government activity, indeed no part of the Canadian community generally, can be exempt from the implications of trying to put a Canadian economy in shape today so that it will serve the interests of the Canadian future.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, our concern is with the people who require this aid in the Third World countries. In order that the NGOs can plan in the future, will the minister commit this government to review these cuts in consultation with the NGOs, and will he commit the government to ensuring that no further cuts will be made in this particular manner?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The government is always prepared to engage in consultation with NGOs and with others.

I would not want to leave a misleading impression in the House. We are dealing with certain very difficult conditions of restraint. We are taking account of those. I would not want leaders of any NGO organization to think that a process of consultation would be put in place that would reverse the necessity for CIDA, like other parts of the Canadian government, to be affected by the restraint program that economic circumstances and the profligate practices of past governments have placed upon the country.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Perhaps in the absence of the Minister of Finance I could bring the Prime Minister up to date with some housing statistics from his own housing agency, CMHC, and including the Minister of Employment.

Released reports today indicate that housing starts across this country are down 21 per cent in Ontario, and in western Canada and Atlantic Canada there has been absolutely no improvement, contrary to what the Prime Minister has indicated today.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister when his government, instead of making false assurances and giving hopeless rhetoric to the people of Canada, will admit that its policies on the economy are too little, too late and too painful?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the policies of the government are neither too little nor are they too late, nor are they too painful.

We are very sympathetic to the people who have lost their jobs. That is why we are trying to bring our training programs into line with what people will need for jobs in the future, not for jobs in the past.

I would like to point out to the hon. member that housing starts are running at a rate of 106,000 versus 104,000 the month before. It is very clearly the beginning of some signs of life.

There are also other signals that the economy is turning around in terms of new investment that was in The Globe and Mail last week, and so on. That shows that our policies are working.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): A hundred and six thousand housing starts this year is 56 per cent less than last year—56 per cent less—and 100,000 jobs have been lost in the construction industry in this country.

I want to ask the minister, or whoever speaks for housing in this government, when will the government put affordable housing in the neighbourhoods for this country and for the people who want to buy them, and put construction workers back to work?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, this government has been working on affordable housing. It will continue to work on affordable housing.

The housing market is starting to turn around. Multiple bids are now being made on houses that are on the market. The real estate people see a turn-around, and that turn-around will come. If the member will be patient, he will see that the statistics will continue to improve over the next few months.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the members' attention the presence in the gallery of Mr. Frank Stock, Solicitor General of Hong Kong.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I have a question of privilege from the hon. member for Verdun—Saint-Paul. I just might advise that there is another question of privilege and I will get to that hon. member in a few minutes.

PRIVILEGE

MEMBER FOR VERDUN—SAINT-PAUL—CHANGE OF AFFILIATION

Mr. Gilbert Chartrand (Verdun—Saint-Paul): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a short statement. On May 22, 1990, I rose in this House to announce my decision to leave the Conservative caucus. My action was motivated by my deep frustration with the process to ratify the Meech Lake Accord. A month later, Clyde Wells confirmed my apprehensions. He let Quebec down and endangered Canada's very existence. Such a dastardly act deeply disgusted me.

I have worked with the Bloc Quebecois for a year and I note that its parliamentary motivations are basically negative and aimed only at destroying the country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chartrand: Mr. Speaker, being an essentially positive individual, I do not want to work with a group that has such a motivation. Furthermore, I am convinced that the Bloc Quebecois's strategy will ultimately divide the votes of Quebecers and make Jean Chrétien Prime Minister of Canada.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chartrand: Now one of the reasons I entered politics was and still is to fight everything that Mr. Chrétien represents.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chartrand: The forceful unilateral repatriation of 1982 and the desire to put Quebec in its place.

Mr. Speaker, as a member from Quebec, I cannot go along with such a strategy and I can no longer allow myself to remain in the Bloc. Last May 22, I told the House: "I still consider the Prime Minister to be reliable and honest, because he made every possible effort to have the Meech Lake Accord respected in full."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chartrand: On this point, I have not changed my mind. Despite everything, the Prime Minister has always behaved with dignity and has always been the only leader to seek new ways for a positive resolution of the Constitutional impasse.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chartrand: –an editorial of March 30, and I quote: "We unreservedly support the leader of the government of Canada who so far has been—".

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is rising on a question of privilege, but is getting very much into debate. I would ask the hon. member to come to his point and close off his remarks.

[Translation]

Mr. Chartrand: Of all the Prime Ministers of Canada, he may be the one who has made the most sustained efforts for maintaining national harmony and Quebec's full participation in the common destiny of Canada.

Finally, I fear that the Bloc Quebecois is becoming a subsidiary of the Parti Quebecois. That worries me even more because two respected commissioners of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, Mr. Béland and Jacques Proulx, said recently that the Parti Quebecois places its partisan interests above the interests of the Quebec community.

I was not elected a member of a great Parliament to become a puppet of a provincial party.

Mr. Speaker, I inform you today that I have spoken with the chairman of the caucus and we agreed that I can return to the political party for which I was elected.

In conclusion, the only question I want to leave with all Quebec families is the question families really ask: Will I just act instinctively or will I really think before destroying it?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

OFFICE OF THE MEMBER FOR RICHELIEU

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, when I rose yesterday on a question of privilege—it had to do with my rights and privileges as a member of Parliament—you answered rather briefly that it was an matter of administration. It is indeed, Mr. Speaker.

Nonetheless, I would like to take a minute or two to clarify this administrative matter. You will recall that members complained a number of times about things like the bus schedule. That was a matter of administration, but you settled it by talking to the management in an effort to help preserve the rights and privileges of the members.

Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, with regard to my office being moved in my absence and without my staff being present or notified, that I had written you on March 5 to advise you that there were people lurking around my office. Your secretary told me I would be receiving a letter from you stating your position since I was asking you to intervene to make sure that the assignment of offices to members of Parliament would be processed in an unbiased fashion.

You told me it was a matter of administration. Let me remind you that Mr. Riedel wrote me on April 7 informing me that the authorization to move on Sunday morning, without my consent, came from the Chair.

My question of privilege—and I would like you to answer my question, Mr. Speaker, not necessarily today but perhaps at a private meeting where we could clarify the matter—was this: when you gave by phone the go ahead to Mr. Riedel to move my office, did you also authorize him to open it without permission and without a warrant, while the RCMP cannot even do that?

In my assigned office, I found my papers and confidential letters in envelopes such as these with a plastic tab on them. I brought two or three to show you. I found in boxes the entire contents of my own office which had been moved in my absence.

That is what I am concerned about, Mr. Speaker. I know it is a matter of administration, but I am asking the Speaker of the House to protect me against administrative decisions that affect my rights and privileges as a member of Parliament and give people access to my office without my permission, without a warrant, tamper with my computer system—they did—disconnect my telephone lines, take away my desk, open— I was even handed a new set of keys for my drawers after moving all that was under lock and key in my office. The locks were changed and I got the new keys only the following day. It is unacceptable to do that on a Sunday without notifying me. It is in that context that I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to look into this problem so that no other member ever has to go through the same ordeal. Never in the history of this country has a member of Parliament been insulted in this way. I trust your fairness, Mr. Speaker, in settling this matter when we meet so I can regain my full privileges as a member of Parliament even if I do not sit with a party with a whip— You, why don't you shut your face!

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Richelieu raised this matter yesterday and, as he correctly states, I felt it was not a question of privilege but a question of administration.

However, I have received very courteous messages from the hon. member for Richelieu. I have listened carefully to what he said and I would be very pleased to meet with him and also to arrange a meeting with some of the officials who took part in the move. As far as I am concerned, his right to hold his place open on this question of privilege will remain.

I will make arrangements with the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I would like to withdraw something I said at the end. A member pointed his finger at me and insulted me and I added one last word to my sentence which was not at all meant for you but rather for him. Nevertheless, I wish to withdraw that last sentence.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, further to the remarks of the hon. member for Richelieu, I do not think that we have to make it an emotional issue, or politicize it, but I believe that it raises a problem which should be resolved in that Parliament is a place where members have rights that must be respected and are protected by the Speaker of the House. We know the Speaker. We know you and hold you to be a democrat and someone who is particularly devoted to the interests of Parliament and the protection of members' rights.

But the question was raised, Mr. Speaker, and it is as follows: Does the Speaker of the House have the absolute right to have his assistants and subordinates enter locked offices when the member is absent and without his knowledge. The question might not concern members much today because it happened to a Bloc Quebecois member, but if it happened to a member from another party, perhaps members would be a little more concerned. I would ask this House to deal with the issue. Some administrative body should look into it, but there is a fundamental distinction between the administrative right to assign office space and the right to enter a locked office without a warrant.

Does this mean that members must from now on protect themselves by installing their own lock and having their own key?

Mr. Speaker: I listened with some concern to the statement by the hon. member and naturally I took some interest in the subject. As I said, maybe after meeting the hon. member for Richelieu, we can find a satisfactory answer.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENTS TO STANDING ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 19027) and amendment of Mr. Dingwall (p. 19156).

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On Tuesday, March 26, 1991, when Government Motion No. 30 to amend the Standing Orders was first before the House, the hon. member for Kamloops rose on a point of order to ask the Chair to rule that certain aspects of that motion were "in whole or in part improperly before the House" and "in whole or in part out of order".

His focus of attention was on paragraph 30 which he characterized as proposing "to amend the right of the Commons to debate supply before it is granted to the Crown", and on paragraph 20 which he said introduces "a new Standing Order which can over-ride the failure of the minister to obtain unanimous consent from the House".

The hon. member sought to establish four points which he set out as follows:

> First, that these provisions seek to erode the historic authority of the House and the rights of its members and are thus contemptuous of the House as they will tend to diminish its dignity and impede members in the discharge of their functions.
> Second, these proposals exceed those limits imposed by the Constitution and by statute and the power of the House to regulate its internal affairs.
> Third, adoption of these proposals would be a de facto amendment to those limiting statutes and are thus an attempt to achieve by simple motion changes which should both be statutory and constitutional.

and,

> Fourth,—our traditions and practice require that they be found out of order.

The hon. member's second and third points involving as they do a definition of the limits of the Constitution and other statutes have given the Chair some pause. The hon. member argues that acceptance of the proposals at issue would make a de facto change to the Parliament of Canada Act and to the Constitution Act by amending our privileges by means of simple Standing Order changes.

In his ingenious argument the hon. member likens this to changing statute by means of an appropriation act and based on the Chair's own recent decision prohibiting such a practice, invites the Chair to make a similar ruling in this instance.

[Translation]

The problem with that is that, were the Chair to agree to the hon. member's request the Speaker would then be placed in the situation of having to interpret the Constitution and the Parliament of Canada Act. There are many precedents showing that the Chair should not venture into such an area.

[English]

As my predecessors have so often reminded the House, the Speaker has no role in interpreting matters of either a constitutional or legal nature. On May 2, 1989, I had occasion to refer hon. members to citations 117(6) and 240 of Beauchesne's fifth edition and to a decision of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux of July 8, 1969. At that time I explained:

> The reasons for these citations are straightforward. The Speaker should not sit in judgment on constitutional or legal matters. That role belongs more properly to the courts and to the administration of justice. Previous Speakers have been very careful in strictly addressing themselves to matters of a parliamentary or procedural nature while avoiding dealing with constitutional or legal matters.

Again, on February 7, 1990, as recorded at page 7954 of Debates when the hon. member for Kamloops had presented a detailed, intriguing argument, in fact, one not dissimilar to the present argument, to the effect that closure contravenes the Constitution of the country. I said:

> I am not prepared to rule on it because if I did I would be straying into an area in which I am not allowed to go. He states that our rule in the House contravenes our Constitution. That may or may not be, but the authorities for many, many years back make it quite clear that I cannot rule on a legal or constitutional issue.

[Translation]

Likewise, the Chair must avoid interpretating in any way, even indirectly, the limits set in the Constitution or the Parliament of Canada Act. It must be noted however that the constitutional limits relating to our quorum and the need to get a Royal recommendation in relation to any appropriation bill also appear in the Standing Orders of the House, being prodecural matters of course.

[English]

Accordingly, I would set aside the second and third points advanced by the hon. member for Kamloops. I hasten to add, however, that these arguments have not been dismissed lightly, nor is their disposition fatal to the hon. member's case for there is ample substance still to be considered in respect of the remaining two points he formulated.

The hon. member argues that the provisions in paragraphs 20 and 30 "seek to erode the historic authority of the House and the rights of its members and are thus contemptuous of the House as they will tend to diminish its dignity and impede members in the discharge of their functions". This aspect of the issue involving as it does both privilege and contempt is clearly and area into which the Chair not only may, but must, venture.

The hon. member for Kamloops takes objection to that part of paragraph 30 of the motion which proposes that:

> —if the House does not sit on days designated as sitting days pursuant to Standing Order 28, the total number of allotted days in that supply period shall be reduced by a number of days proportionate to the number of sitting days on which the House stood adjourned—

The hon. member is quite clear in distinguishing between those aspects of the proposal which reduce the number of supply days in an ordinary session from 25 to 20 and the proposal to reduce the number of allotted days in proportion to the number of sitting days. The former, he quite properly recognizes as quantitative change which is not a procedural concern; the latter is, he submits, a qualitative change to the rights of the House over supply. As the Chair understands the hon. member's argument it is that in tying the number of supply days to the number of sitting days, the proposal ruptures the linkage between allotted days and the granting of supply and consequently infringes upon members' historic right to air grievances and petition the Crown before supply is granted. The hon. member supports his claim that the proposed new Standing Orders might lead to the government claiming supply without hearing grievances or resort to a hypothetical example.

• (1520)

Although the Chair has no intention of dealing with hypothetical matters—that is not the role of the Speaker—and should not lay the rules governing House proceedings, the Chair does take seriously any claim that the fundamental rights of this House have been or could be misrepresented. So, the Chair has examined the proposal in question and its potential effect on the supply process.

[English]

The purpose of our existing Standing Order 81(8) is to establish for any calendar year three supply periods ending December 10, March 26 and June 30 in which different aspects of the business of supply are considered. In the proposed amendment, Standing Order 81(8)(a), this purpose remains unchanged, but the date of the June supply period is altered to June 23. The number of allotted days is reduced from 25 to 20, proportionately, within each period. Proposed new sections 8(b) and 8(c) are also added to the Standing Order. Section 8(b) introduces the concept that should the House not sit on days designated as sitting days in the Standing Orders, then the total number of allotted days in that supply period would be reduced proportionately. New Section 8(c) provides that should the House sit more than the prescribed number of days, extra allotted days would be added, again proportionately.

Viewed in context, it is very difficult to see these changes as any more than an adjustment to the supply process. Arguably, rather that divorcing the allotted days from the supply period, the proposed changes might make them a more integral part of that process by adding a condition which makes them more responsive to the actual process. In the past, when the House did not sit for extended periods during a supply cycle, as, for example, when a new session of Parliament opened in the middle of a supply period, adjustments to the number allotted days were subject to negotiation and were usually achieved through special orders of the House. Such special orders were passed in 1971, 1974, 1980 and 1989.

[Translation]

It seems that the proposed changes, by establishing a set formula to determine how such adjustments are to be made, would add an element of certainty in what has been, admittedly, an ad hoc process.

[English]

In this way it appears to the Chair that rather than detracting from the right of members to air grievances before supply, it might be argued that the proposed changes secure that right. Accordingly, the Chair cannot find that particular aspect of the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kamloops is well taken.

I turn now to that aspect of the hon. member's point of order which dealt with proposed Standing Order 56.1. This would be a completely new addition to the rules of the House. It provides that if, at any time during a sitting of the House, unanimous consent is denied for the presentation of a routine motion, then a minister of the Crown may request during Routine Proceedings that the Speaker put the motion. If 25 or more members rise to oppose the motion, it shall be deemed withdrawn otherwise it shall be deemed adopted.

The routine motions to which this new process applies are delineated in paragraph (b). They are those motions made upon Routine Proceedings, which may be required for the observance of the proprieties of the House; the maintenance of its authority; the management of its business; the arrangements of its proceedings; the establishing of the powers of its committees; the correctness of its records, or the fixing of its sitting days or the times of its meeting or adjournment.

Accordingly, there is a very limited range of motions to which this proposed process can apply.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Kamloops claims that the proposal would "override unanimous consent". In his opinion, that clause "proposes to change our notion of unanimous consent and to enable the rules of procedure and operations of the House to be changed by an agent of the Crown unless 25 members of the House object." He also pointed out that the proposal would establish "two classes of members, those who by virtue of being ministers of the Crown can obtain unanimous consent as long as 25 members do not object, and those ordinary members for whom unanimous consent means no one objects".

[English]

In considering the hon. member's claims, the Chair's attention was drawn to the fact that there are precedents for the type of process suggested in the new proposal. Standing Order 26(2) deals with the conditions under which any member may move to extend a sitting and sets at 15 the number of members required to foreclose a move to extend the sitting. Similarly, Standing Order 53(4) provides for the suspension of certain Standing Orders to deal with a matter of an urgent nature. Only a minister of the Crown can propose such a motion and if 10 members rise the motion is deemed withdrawn; otherwise, the motion shall have been adopted. Similarly, Standing Order 98(3), which sets out the terms under which an extension of sitting hours during report and third reading stages of a private members' bill may be sought, also stipulates that if fewer than 20 members support the motion to extend, the motion is deemed withdrawn.

There are certain similarities also between the proposal and existing Standing Order 78 respecting time allocation in that both use a ladder-like type of approach depending upon the extent of agreement forthcoming to securing the right to propose a motion.

Examples also abound in our Standing Orders of discrimination among types of members. Ministers of the Crown have certain prerogatives that private members do not; private members may put questions to ministers of the Crown during Question Period, but ministers may not question private members; party leaders are afforded certain recognitions denied to all other hon. members; the government and opposition Whips have certain rights peculiar to them alone and finally, and perhaps most personally pertinent, the Speaker is denied the right to participate in a debate or to vote on any question before the House, except in the case of an equality of voices. So, the concept of affording differing powers to various groups or individuals is not foreign to our Standing Orders, and, while it may well be the subject of debate, is not reason enough on its own to cause the Chair to intervene on procedural grounds to prevent the proposal from being debated by the House.

During his intervention in the discussion of this point of order, the hon. Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons emphasized that the type of motion envisaged in the proposed new rule could only be introduced during Routine Proceedings when this House is habitually full. He termed the 25 member requirement a significant and major inhibition to the abuse of the rule.

The hon. member for Kamloops is quite correct in stating that proposed new Standing Order 56.1 would "over-ride unanimous consent"—indeed, it is a condition precedent to putting the motion during Routine Proceedings that unanimous consent must have been previously denied. However, this "over-ride" provision can operate, as the Chair understands it, only with respect to a certain very limited range of motions offered at a specific time in our daily agenda by a minister of the Crown. What the Chair must decide is, is this proposal so offensive, does it challenge the authority of the House and impede members in the performance of their duties to such an extent that it should not be allowed to be put to the House for debate and decision. Based on the fact that we have similar procedures existing with respect to other types of motions and given the very limited application of the new proposal, the Chair cannot accede to the request of the hon. member for Kamloops that paragraph 20 of the motion respecting the Standing Order amendments be ruled out of order.

The Chair commends the hon. member for Kamloops for bringing his concerns to the attention of the House and for the cogency and seriousness of his argument. The Chair does not take lightly any decision respecting the privileges of this Chamber or of an individual member of it. It is only by constant vigilance that we can ensure the preservation of the privileges necessary to the carrying out of our responsibilities as elected representatives. In citation 21 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, it is stated:

> The most fundamental privilege of the House as a whole is to establish rules of procedure for itself and to enforce them.

• (1530)

In coming to a decision on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kamloops, the Chair was very much aware that this House is about to embark upon an exercise of that fundamental privilege. In the view of the Chair, it would be incongruent to deprive this Chamber, by fiat from the Chair under the guise of protecting privilege, of the opportunity to fully explore the options available to the House in the exercise of its most basic privilege. The privilege which this House enjoys to set its own binding rules of procedure and to regulate its own internal affairs must be guarded just as jealously as the rights, immunities and privileges of individual members of the House of Commons. When the two are in conflict, or apparent conflict, it should be the House and the members thereof who resolve the difference.

Traditionally the House has accommodated concerns about the text of its current and proposed Standing Orders through the process of debate, amendment and clarification through agreement. Furthermore, the House and all hon. members may seek to clarify, to modify and to interpret House rules and practices by recourse to points of order, questions of privilege and to the committee charged with the review of and report on the Standing Orders and procedures in the House and its committees.

So seriously does the House view its duty to review and to evaluate, to establish and revise its Standing Orders, that it has even designated by Standing Order 51 that they shall be automatically reviewed and debated at the beginning of the first session of every Parliament.

While the hon. member does not have a point of order, he will have several future opportunities to propose changes to the Standing Orders.

Again, I emphasize that the argument raised by the hon. member for Kamloops was obviously very carefully considered. The matters are important matters and I hope that he will be able to accept the basis of this ruling, which is that ultimately it is the House that must make up its mind as to the orders by which we are governed.

I thank the hon. member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, I have a decision——to give you on the amendment or motion by the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

Unfortunately, I must rule the hon. member's motion out of order, because Citation 437(1) of Beauchesne clearly states: "An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved."

We resume debate with the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

AMENDMENTS TO STANDING ORDERS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, in participating in the debate on my House Leader's amendment, I would begin by saying that basically, any privilege is based on a citation from Beauchesne which reads as follows:

[English]

I believe, from memory, the most fundamental privilege of the House is to establish rules of procedure for itself and to enforce them. I think that basic tenet is important to the debate today. I recognize the importance of the evolution of the rules and the procedures of this House; the written rules and the unwritten rules because we have unwritten rules, unwritten conventions. But I deplore the fact that this substantive proposal to change the rules of procedure of the House was not put to a committee of this House for study and consideration as it should have been by the government.

In 1985, the McGrath commission was asked by the House to look at in-depth change to the Standing Orders. A committee of the House worked hard and long, looked at the evidence and made some serious proposals which were, in large part, accepted by the House and adopted by us. I deplore that we did not go that route again and ask the House, through its committees, to give us the benefit of a serious scrutiny of the proposal put to us by the government.

The proposals are indeed serious and will probably cause some great difficulties for many of us.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, since the first day of this 34th Parliament, April 3, 1989, which is already two years ago, the present Standing Orders have all in all served Canadians' interests well. Minor modifications might be useful, no doubt, sustantial modifications, perhaps, after study and consideration, but not, to lessen the privileges, the legitimate right of members to participate in the Canadian democratic process of parliamentary debate—not at that cost. In the few minutes at my disposal, I intend to show you that these measures, this bill, if adopted, would gag members by reducing the time allotted to them to debate legislation proposed by the government.

I think that the effectiveness of Parliament would thus be reduced. The quality of legislation would suffer and, again the role of legislators would be diminished in public opinion.

With the present Standing Orders, the House has not at all been idle. We need only look at what has happened in the past two years. The House has not been paralysed, it has not been held up by the delaying tactics of the opposition as the government leader would have us believe. Since April 3, 1989, the House of Commons has sat 299 days. In that time, we have studied 100 bills and 30 government motions. We have had 48 opposition days. Nearly 150 public bills and 712 motions from members were presented. From April 3, 1989 to December 31, 1990, members debated 96 government bills for 569 hours and 37 minutes, an average of roughly 6 hours per bill, which is not excessive, Mr. Speaker. It is not what I would call delaying tactics by the opposition. Members made 3,701 statements under Standing Order 31. They asked 6,108 oral questions. One hundred seventy reports from standing, joint, special and legislative committees, were tabled. Eight thousand thirty-seven petitions were presented in the House. Mr. Speaker, in two years, that is a lot of work. Delaying tactics did not prevent members from working. Just look. Just ask. It is there, it is public. The records are open to everyone.

Therefore, it is wrong to say that the present Standing Orders have served this Parliament badly. And I ask why then, Mr. Speaker, repair something that works and that works well? To calm some people on the government side who are losing ground in public opinion? That is no reason. To hide the government's desire to muzzle legislators, the Standing Orders are being used to have us believe that it will improve the situation. Mr. Speaker, we are not that naive.

The most important privilege given to a member so that he can perform his duties freely is the freedom of speech, Mr. Speaker, and that is what we should strive for, to let more members express themselves and tell the House what their constituents are telling them, to express their constituents' opinions in the House.

With these proposals before us, the federal government is restricting the right to speak and, I think, hindering us in the performance of our duties.

• (1540)

[English]

The government has brought forward substantial changes to the rules. We in the Liberal Party oppose several of these changes, not all, several of them, and I will touch upon the main ones.

Many Canadians do not understand, and I do not blame them, all the rules of procedure of this House, the intent, the impact, and therefore cannot appreciate the changes. But take it from me, these changes will not improve debate. These changes will not give more members of Parliament more time to debate questions of importance to this country. We believe that Canadians must be made aware of what is going on in Parliament and to do that, we believe, Parliament sits and should sit longer.

I was here from 1972 until 1978-79. We used to sit at night. We did not like it very much but we sat until 10 or 10.30 p.m. and we thought we would improve things. We changed the system. We improved it by allowing members of Parliament to go home for supper with their children, by allowing members of Parliament to go to their ridings more often. It was an improvement which I think was successful.

Yet, here we have a proposal that in my view does nothing to restore or improve public faith in Parliament. In The Ottawa Citizen of March 23, the government House leader is quoted as saying: "The changes are needed to rekindle public faith in the institution of Parliament". He goes on: "The excesses of the adversarial extremes have brought disfavour on the House and reduced our reputation".

Coming from a member of a party that stormed the Chair, that rang the bells for two weeks, how much credibility does that have? Not much.

In The Globe and Mail of March 23 the same person, the government House leader, was described as believing, and I quote: "that Canadians are jaded with perpetual political bickering in Parliament. The people want their politicians to make a difference and they want them to spend more time closer to the voters".

The government House leader, as usual, misreads Canadians and public opinion. What Canadians want is better leadership from the government. They are indeed tired of empty promises and secret deals and dice-throwers. That we agree with, but it is time we saw some leadership over there and less of this nonsense about people wanting to see their members in their ridings.

Mr. Speaker, I can tell you from having been elected six times to this House that if you are not in your riding, and if you do not work, you do not get re-elected by the community. I would hope that most members here have that experience, that if you work, you get elected. If you do not work, you do not get elected. It is a heck of a privilege to represent 100,000 people as I do in Ottawa—Vanier, and I take it very seriously.

I do not think it improves my work in my riding, which fortunately happens to be close to this place, by saying to me that members of Parliament are demeaning Parliament by having adversarial debates. That is what debate is all about.

The proposals for change were put to the opposition in January of this year. Just to rectify some of the facts that were put to the House yesterday by the House leader, he said we have been dealing for a year with these proposals. That is nonsense. They were put to me as House leader of the opposition in January 1991, and I immediately circulated them to the members of my caucus for their consideration.

This battle is not for show. This battle is because we oppose the suggested changes, because we believe they will not rekindle public faith in Parliament. Possibly less partisanship as we saw this morning by the government Whip would help. I could agree with that. Possibly a little less gagging of Parliament. This is the government that in five years used the gag 34 times. Unbelievable.

The government is proposing to reduce the time of the opposition that represents the views of the millions of Canadians who may not always agree with government policy. They want to shorten the number of sitting days from 175 to 134 days. They are cutting many of the days of the Official Opposition, traditionally used to voice the concerns of our constituents in this House on the 25 or so days a year that the opposition has at its disposal to call the debate on a supply day of the government.

By cutting 41 sittings days, the government is sparing itself 41 question periods. Perhaps that will be an improvement, but I do not think it will change anything. It might do a little more to put to sleep the media concerned only with question period, this daily 45-minute exercise in partisanship, those who are not interested in following the proceedings of the House the rest of the time and who never or seldom attend committee sittings to see what is being done there, where in fact the bulk of the work is done by responsible members working on legislation, bills and reports referred for their consideration. No one talks about that, Mr. Speaker. Heaven forbid! During these 45 minutes when there can be a run-in between two members, if it is funny, they will laugh, but, if it is dull, if the opposition does not bring it off they will say that the opposition is not with it.

I wonder, if the cynicism—I am not sure this is the most appropriate term—that colours the media's perception of this Parliament and the House of Commons, is not indeed a serious cause for concern.

The government limits to 15 minutes per day the time allotted to presenting petitions from the Canadian people. This limit is pointless, considering the fact that petitions have taken on average 8 minutes per day over the past two years. Now the government wants to reduce it to 15 minutes. I fail to understand!

These petitions are drafted, circulated, signed and sent to be tabled in this House by Canadians from all walks of life, rich, poor, interested in politics or not. Petitions are a legitimate, legal and democratic means by which the ordinary citizen can make his opinion known on a matter that concerns him.

The government wants to reduce from 8 to 6 days the number of days to debate the throne speech. However, over the past two years, only 27 of the 1,611 hours of debate were spent to debate the throne speech. Yet, it is important. It sets the course for the opening session and indicates the direction the government intends to take. The members, both on the opposition side and the government side, find it important to take part in this debate, because it gives them the opportunity to address various subjects of interest to their riding.

Mr. Speaker, the government muzzles the members during the debates, imposes time allocation on them and, on top of that, reduces without reason the time to debate time allocation. In five years, this government attempted 31 times, as I mentioned earlier, to impose time allocation, Mr. Speaker, a measure which had previously been used only 29 times over 19 years. It was not used more than 29 times over 19 years and they used it 31 times over five years!

The government reduced by two hours the debate time when closure is applied. This is by virtue of the motion dealing with Standing Order 57, which puts an end to the debate. During this 34th legislature, closure was applied 8 times on very important bills, namely the bills on capital punishment, free trade, the goods and services tax, unemployment insurance. The intent, I gather, was to give the greatest number of members possible a chance to be heard. That is not what happens when closure is applied.

The government is reducing from 25 to 20 the number of sittings days allotted to the business of supply, designated as allotted days. These days are a fundamental aspect of our work. Allow me to quote a few more statistics. Out of the 1,611 hours the House sat between April 3, 1989 and December 31, 1990, only 174 hours, or 10.8 per cent of the time, were allotted to this most important task of making the government accountable for the way it spends the Canadian taxpayers' money.

Also, Mr. Speaker, what irritates me in these proposed changes is the fact that if the House does not sit following a decision made by the majority, and the government as we know has the majority, then the opposition will have to give up one allotted day for every week the House is not sitting. In other words, we stand to lose allotted days if the government decides to adjourn the House for more than one week.

The government wants to reduce from six to four the number of days allotted to the Budget Debate. Can you imagine! Out of the 1,611 hours of debate we have had since April 3, 1989, the Budget Debate took only 43 hours and a half, that is less than 3 per cent of the time of the House. Yet, during the Budget Debate, members can talk about what policies the government wants to take to reduce the deficit, to decrease our national debt, to create a better climate and bring the Canadian economy back on track. Mr. Speaker, since 1989, we have barely spent 3 per cent of the 1,100 sitting hours discussing the Budget.

The only reason why the government is limiting debate is that it wants to hide its poor financial performance from the Canadian people.

An hon. member: That's right!

Mr. Gauthier: In fact, the government has not reduced the deficit which reaches $30.5 billion in 1991. It has increased the national debt to $380 billion, and so on. Mr. Speaker, we have got to have a serious debate on this issue.

An hon. member: Exactly!

Mr. Gauthier: One of the most important points in the changes to the Standing Orders has to do with a new parliamentary calendar. I know that I do not have much time left, but I would like to cover this point. The proposal in no way favours a member who must return to his riding every week to see his constituents and his family on the weekend. It does not encourage that, Mr. Speaker. It gives a week every three weeks, and we know that the government will wait for that week off to make its negative announcements and those they do not want to debate in the House because we will see ministers making punchy statements or issuing press releases that otherwise could be examined seriously here in the House during oral question period or in debate.

Mr. Speaker, I swear that that is what will happen. You will see. They will use that week to get their negative messages across or to announce things on which the House will not have a chance to speak.

An hon. member: That is true!

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, in my years here, I have suggested some things and I would like to conclude on that because what I have to say is positive. A while ago, I asked that any bill tabled in the House have a summary on the first page to help understand what the bill is about. Every legislature in the world that I know like those in France, England and several provinces do the same. They have the bill with a description, a brief concise explanation of what it is about. We do not have that here, eh? Many people spend their time unable to understand what it is about. If the bill were accompanied by such an explanation, we would be further ahead.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are about to rise. Thank you for your attention.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments?

Mr. Baker: A question, please.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): A question?

[English]

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member.

I wonder if he could relate to the House what he was going to say before he got cut off.

Mr. Gauthier: That is a very good question. I was about to say that I have, over the years, given notice on the Order Paper of several changes which I would like to see. For example, I would like to see that when the bells of the House are ringing to call members for a vote that standing committees of the House should interrupt or suspend their sittings to allow members to come here and vote. There would be no great harm in doing that, and it would allow all of us to be here and do what we are supposed to be doing. I think it would be a positive step that committees would adjourn or suspend when the bells are ringing, calling members to the vote.

An hon. member: Tell us more.

Mr. Gauthier: I think that the changes proposed here would also be improved if, for example, the transparency of our work was more evident. I think committees could be televised. I believe that we should choose two or three committee rooms and improve the message by possibly televising more proceedings.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, one of the most important points in this reform proposed by the government is that it will reduce the time of debate; they would have us believe that by sitting less, we would give the people of Canada better value.

[English]

May I just end my remarks by referring to an editorial which the House leader used yesterday in this House which I think needs to be responded to and that is the editorial in The Ottawa Citizen of yesterday. The Ottawa Citizen had an article stating that the reforms may aid credibility and it goes on and gives its support to these proposals.

This may be the opinion of the editorial board of The Ottawa Citizen, but they should try to demonstrate for us in this House how these proposed changes could restore the credibility of the House of Commons. I doubt very much that these changes would do this.

The proposed changes they mention give MPs more time to spend away from the House, reduce sitting days, cut the length of speeches, limit the time for debating bills or borrowing authority, limit the number of Commons committees meeting at one time or other. Does all this improve the credibility of this House? No, Mr. Speaker.

There are perhaps other changes that could restore credibility: a reduction in the level of partisanship, for example. The majority of MPs here are dedicated, hard working, serious men and women who do their best to represent their constituencies. Perhaps, and I alluded to that a few minutes ago, the media feels there is a lack of credibility. Maybe the cynicism that colours their perception of this House should be changed. That is possible also.

As well, they find it difficult to move, as I said previously, to more than the Question Period. They have not, in my view, given serious coverage to the committee work of this House. If Parliament is irrelevant, and I disagree with that statement that The Ottawa Citizen makes, it is in my view time for us all here, the four estates, to look at ourselves seriously. The editorial states: "Our political leaders are diverting attention away from the seat of democracy by relying on commissions". That is possible.

The Ottawa Citizen should be able to make the connection between the intent of the proposed rules and the desire of the government to draw less attention to its vastly unpopular policies and fiscal mismanagement. I do not think this editorial is very helpful. If the editors of The Ottawa Citizen could only have gone back to their drawing board and, very seriously, put this proposal before a group of persons who could have helped them understand it, it would have been much better and much more fruitful.

In closing, I have one proposal. There are, as I said at the beginning of my speech, two sets of rules: the written rules, the Standing Orders, and the unwritten rules, the conventions, the practices, the methods and everything else. In the unwritten rules it is said that the opposition chairs three standing committees of the House of Commons: Scrutiny of Regulations, Public Accounts, Management and Members' Services. Those three committees have traditionally been chaired by the opposition.

I do not doubt the government's intention here. I suspect that it will hold to the convention that the opposition members will have the chair of these three committees. I would hope they would. I am worried because one of the committees, Management and Members' Services, is in an envelope and it kind of disappears within the management committee of the House. Therefore, I would like to ask publicly if the government intends to change this long-standing practice of appointing a member of the opposition as chair of those three traditional standing committees. There is no rule that says we have to act that way, but there is a convention, a practice, that has been with us for a long time. I would hope that they will continue this practice.

• (1600)

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to address the House on what is obviously a very important subject to all members of Parliament.

I represent the constituency of Crowfoot. One of the rules that is recommended for change is that members would be serving in the House of Commons for a period of about three weeks, and then would have a week to receive constituency representations.

Mr. Speaker, when I look at my constituency, I see that my riding is larger than 33 nations in the world. Within my constituency are 113 individual communities and therefore when I am at one of them, there are 112 at which I am not. It should be obvious that that rule, bearing in mind that mine is far from the largest constituency in the country, if Parliament is to work, if we are to represent the people, we must be available to hear the views of our constituents in order to come here to place those views before Parliament.

I was in the House of Commons when the hon. member for Skeena made the comment that he had no difficulty in going home every weekend. For those persons who do not know where that member's riding is, he would have to fly to Vancouver, and I am not sure of the route today, but he would either fly north to Prince George, and then from Prince George into Prince Rupert and, not knowing where he lives, would probably have a car drive thereafter.

It may well be that this hon. member can travel some 12 or 14 hours and attend, as he said, some six meetings on a weekend. It may be that he, with his pectorals rippling, his latissimus dorsi all bulked up, crawling with power, and his deltoids and his triceps and his biceps all bulging and knotted masses of muscles, hardened, and going with his tight T-shirt on with a big S on it, is more powerful than a locomotive and faster than a speeding bullet and that big S stands for super-Skeena.

Everybody will not be like that member. Everybody will not be super-Skeena. I remember the predecessor to the hon. member for Skeena, the Hon. Iona Campagnolo. I sat beside her on the plane once, shortly after she was appointed to the cabinet. She went home every weekend. She lamented the almost five-hour flight to Vancouver, waiting, then getting on the flight to Prince George, waiting, taking a small plane to Prince Rupert, and having a two-hour car drive to get home. She went home every weekend. However, she lamented how difficult and how hard it was on her.

Let us suppose that the hon. member for Skeena can go home every weekend. Let us suppose that no one cares about our physical condition when we do arrive. Is it not legitimate to ask the question: what about a Chamber of Commerce that meets, perhaps, every Wednesday, or a Rotary Club that meets every Tuesday, or an organization of professional women that meets every Thursday. If we go home on weekends, do we presume that everyone in our constituencies who invites us to address them or to make representations or to listen to hearings has to schedule the country within a Saturday and a Sunday time frame?

What about those persons who are somehow going to be elected to Parliament? Are they to go home every weekend and to have six or seven meetings as the member for Skeena attests, and then never once have an opportunity for some co-existence with their families? Yet, to be able to come down here and as one of the policies of an institution, to support Parliament and its move to help and assist and strengthen the families when, in fact, they are detracted from them by the very demands of the job. My constituency is large, but is not nearly as large as the Western Arctic or Eastern Arctic. It is not nearly as large as two other constituencies in my home province of Alberta or as large as most of the northern ridings of the provinces or even some parts of the central provinces on the prairies.

It is appropriate for us to look at the whole matter of how we represent our constituents, our availability to them and the opportunity to be real representatives by the fact that we are among our people on a regular basis and can schedule meetings to hear their views.

What I also wish to address is that while there are some who lament the new rule changes that are being proposed, I am one who believes that this institution must focus more sharply on the rules that are already in place. We who have been here for a long time—and I have now been here for some 17 years—lament that there is a decay of Parliament. It came most predominantly when television came to this institution.

What has happened is, I think, an utter disgrace to the nation of Canada. Every member of Parliament should pause, reflect and to ask the question: Who is being served by how we behave here? I do not think it matters much if one member calls another a slanderous name or imputes a motive or suggests that they lie with respect to any of us as individuals. Obviously, it is a discourtesy, but to the extent that it weakens the institution of Parliament it is a national tragedy.

We must take a look at the rules of this place and examine the conduct of all members of the House, particularly when it comes to Question Period. There is real reason for further examination, for asking ourselves to enforce the rules that we have above and beyond the simple examination of some new rule changes. The notion that a question cannot be argumentative, the notion that questions cannot be repeated, the notion that we are not allowed to impute motives one to another, or that a question cannot intend to slander another person, those are all part of Erskine May or Beauchesne. Yet we feed, in a daily diet, of verbal conduct that simply would not be accepted in any other form of civil meeting procedures in some other part of our society.

This Parliament is the mirror through which Canadians see themselves. How we conduct ourselves here is how Canadians ultimately end up feeling about Canada. I might be accused by members of the New Democratic Party of being somewhat pro-American when I give the following example. I hope they will forgive me but it is not my intention. Many Canadian citizens leave Canada to take graduate degrees in the United States. They enter into cultural readjustment when they come home because they sense, after a period of time of working in the United States, that there is a negativism in this country which permeates through the society and leads people to the perspective and to the view that somehow we, in this nation, simply are a group who want to complain and complain about almost everything and anything. Whatever degree there is to that perspective of those who re-enter Canadian society after being away for a while elsewhere, it starts right here in this place. We have an adversarial system, separated by two sword lengths in which we develop as professionals in finding the negative.

I have been here 17 years, more than half of which I was on the opposition side of the House. When we watch the news and when we read the newspapers, we very seldom come away with a sense of what is good about our country. So seldom do we sense the pride and the joy of being Canadian. Very seldom do we accent the positive and certainly not on a continuous basis or in a full-fledged basis on a wide variety of issues. Instead, no matter what we all might be going right, there is a grovelling towards finding the negative. That is because the central institution, I believe, is one whose design is to find the negative. That is how Parliament was established, to find the negative.

While it may well be that there is some advantage to that—and I would be the first to concede that there is advantage in focusing in on those policies and acts of government that need to be improved. I also submit that the rules that have been developed over the years that we will find in Erskine May and in Beauchesne say that questions should not be argumentative, should not have preambles, should not impute motives. If we turn a deaf eye or ear to that, then what we are doing is ignoring the reason the rules were put there in the first place. Those rules are there because we must act with civility in this place. We must conduct ourselves in a manner that Canadians will feel pride in their country. We have to be able, through this institution, to reflect Canada in a way that Canadians can see this nation for the blessed advantage it really is.

The truth of the matter is that no one is more Canadian than at that moment when they arrived home from a trip elsewhere. When they come back to Canadian soil, when they have compared us with whatever else might be on earth, that becomes the point at which they say: "This is the land in which we have the greatest of opportunity".

We need to revisit not only the rules before us in this debate, but we need to expand beyond that to the whole question of individual relationships and conduct. We must treat each other with the kind of dignity that will come from orderly, parliamentary conduct. We need not enter into innuendo, into slanderous comments.

As an example, I think of a comment made by an hon. member some many years ago. He rose in this House and accused another hon. member of not having the morals of an alley cat. When Mr. Speaker asked him to withdraw his comments, he admitted that he was wrong and said: "Mr. Speaker, I withdraw. The hon. member does have the morals of an alley cat".

I use that example because it is of a period long before this present one, but the example can be found today. According to Erskine May, it is all inappropriate, you cannot do indirectly what you cannot do directly. As an institution we need to focus on those kinds of statements. We cannot allow members, in some slanderous way, to simply twist things and achieve points in a political debate when the fact of the matter is that we are here for one purpose and that is to serve the common good of all Canadians.

We are entering now into a very interesting period of time, a constitutional crisis of our nation upon which this institution is going to be looked at for its relevancy and its capacity to be able to resolve issues.

If we took the Canadians who think Question Period is a wonderful part of the parliamentary process, that it really reflects their views, that it is a positive period of legislative process, and put all those Canadians on Vancouver Island; and then we got those who thought it was a negative process, that it was disadavantageous to Parliament, and we put them on Prince Edward Island, the weight distribution of this country would so change that the poor people on Vancouver Island would be 30,000 feet above sea level.

There is virtually no one who will stand up and say, I saw Question Period last week on television and I just wanted to report to you that I thought it was tremendous, it was a great display. None of us hear that when we go home. People do not come rushing up, but every one of us when we go home hear criticisms about the conduct here.

We, as a chamber, need to look at the rules again, about how we conduct ourselves in this House. That has to be an aspect that must tag along with all of the other rule changes that are coming at this very sensitive time, particularly as we enter into this constitutional crisis in which Canadians are asking whether or not we want to remain united, whether we want to remain a nation.

Frankly, I don't think Canadians are asking that question; they already have the answer. What they want to know is that this place will conduct itself in a manner where they can look towards it with respect and with the full and absolute belief that we are all here with the common interest of each of them in mind. We are not here to subrogate any one individual, to impute motives to another, to use long preambles that are argumentative when Erskine May says that they ought not to be, and to use our time in Question Period simply to embarrass the other person as a person. It is time we quit debating personalities and started debating issues. That means you stick to facts and to statistics. It is a drier and duller debate, but, sir, I can tell you this; it is a lot more profitable and advantageous for all Canadians when that is the way in which this institution conducts itself. I would commend it to every member of the House of Commons.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks and comments of the hon. member for Crowfoot. He has been a member of this Parliament for a long time. I listened particularly to his comments about Canada and think they would be well received on all sides of the House.

I would ask him this. He is the chair of the committee on which I sit, the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs. I would like his comments on the impact of these rule changes on the work of the committees, as well as what is being left out, in terms of making this institution work more effectively for the people of Canada.

• (1620)

Let me call his attention to a very particular aspect of the committee work. First of all, as I understand the proposed changes to the Standing Orders, the effect would be that the various committees would go into what are called envelopes. Only two committees within the envelope can meet at the same time. If one of the committees is meeting virtually around the clock, this will put great limits on the time available for the other committees to meet.

The reform of the committee structure in Parliament before I got here back in 1984 was intended, as I understand it, to permit even closer scrutiny to the workings of the various departments than had been possible before the rule changes of 1984 went into effect. However, it strikes me that the rule changes proposed here will even further restrict the committees from doing the job that they were earlier intended to do.

The effect of the rule changes in 1984, before the current rule changes come into play, is as I see it, to really hobble Parliament in the role that it may have in scrutinizing expenditures.

Our committee is responsible for reviewing the expenditures of the Department of National Defence, $12.5 billion a year, billions of dollars on expenditures for military equipment which as far as I can see, given the end of the Cold War, are obsolete. Yet our committee has virtually no time, even under the present structure, to review these billions of dollars worth of expenditures. We have had one meeting at which the Minister of National Defence came to address the question of estimates.

As the spokesperson for our party, I had 10 minutes worth of questions, and that included the time given to the answers. We have a good chairman. He was ready to try to find extra time for us, but the minister's availability ran out.

We have very limited time to do that function. We also have limited time to study general policy. In particular, I would like him to address how these rule changes are going to make it possible for the committees to do the job they have to do. Surely, the direction of these changes should have been to expand the capacity of the committees, rather than restrict them.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, my first comment to the hon. member—I anticipate that there will be some laughter when I say this—is that we do not live in a perfect world.

Having said that obvious fact, the truth of the matter is that we are not going to be able to do everything that we think ought to be done in every condition in all situations and at all times.

The hon. member for Victoria states that this is going to restrict the committee's capacity and then he said: "as was the case the last time that the rule changes were there". Maybe the hon. member is as mistaken this time as he was with respect to the last time.

I was here before the present rules changes came in. We could not study anything in any committee unless the minister mandated us to do it. If it was controversial, we simply could not get a mandate.

What happened with the rule changes out of the McGrath committee is that now committees on their own discover and develop their own subject area. That is what they researched. That is what they put forward.

When the hon. member says that this is going to restrict us like the last changes restricted us, first of all we need to bear in mind that he might just as well be wrong about this one as he was the one before, because it is a lot better now than it was in that first situation.

When my good friend from Victoria says that $12 billion of expense money is obsolete spending now that there is peace in the Middle East, he is absolutely right. As long as he can guarantee me that there will never again anywhere ever in the world be another agitation of one nation against another, then spending on military defence is absolete. I want a greater guarantee than somebody's word that somehow that expenditure is obsolete. The Kuwaitis sure do not believe that it is obsolete. We had the capacity within the world to give them back their nation after they were intruded upon by a dictator. I would submit that the obsolescence that he would attach to the federal expenditures for national defence are only accurate if there never again was to be a provocation by any nation against another.

He talks about the importance that he attaches to the estimates. He may very well attach importance to the estimates. Many members do. The hon. member is saying that I do not. Now I have not said I do not. He is saying that. That is the old thing I asked him not to do a few moments ago and that is to impute motives, because I have not said that.

At the end of the day, I think it becomes of equal importance, not only to examine the estimates, but for members of Parliament to help in the designing of policy by undertaking studies and by thoroughly investigating that policy with witnesses before committees. In the long run, I believe the emphasis ought to be placed on this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. There are other members who want to ask questions or make short comments.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to a comment made by the member for Crowfoot. He stated that he does not hear in his constituency, compliments about Question Period. He said that he believes we should stick to facts and not be argumentative and so forth.

I would suggest to him that is a somewhat Pollyannish way of looking upon Parliament and the responsibilities of members of Parliament. Apart from my opinion of his comment, is it not really the voters who should decide upon the performance of members of Parliament and of the parties that are represented in this House? I thought that when I was elected to Parliament I was elected to come here to articulate the views and needs of my constituents in the best manner that I am able to, that I was elected to debate and I was elected to ask questions.

Does he not agree that is the role of a member of Parliament? As he knows, the rule changes he claims to favour, which were proposed by the Conservative government, will precisely provide fewer opportunities for MPs to ask questions, to debate and to articulate the views and needs of their constituents.

I would like to ask him how he feels that providing fewer opportunities to MPs will enhance the status of Parliament in the eyes of his constituents and in the eyes of all Canadians?

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, of course the hon. member is correct when he says that his role is to come here and articulate views to the best of his ability on behalf of his constituents. That is right. That is why we are here.

But the hon. member represents a constituency that is very close to this Chamber. He does not have to travel very far. Canada is the second largest nation in the world; 4.5 time zones from east to west. Constituencies are long flight distances away. One of the rule changes will allow for a period where we can go home to be in our constituencies and to hear representations.

The hon. member who asked the question said: "Isn't he right to be able to articulate on behalf of his constituents?" I submit to him who lives very close to his constituency that he has an opportunity that I, the hon. member for Edmonton East, the hon. member for Victoria and the hon. member for Arctic West do not have, and that is to get home with the same frequency, or even mid-week for important events. We are extending an hour every day so that the period we are at home is virtually made up in debating time by the length of time we have extended the debate here.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming the debate, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the Hon. Member for Hamilton West—Airports; the Hon. Member for York Centre—Harbourfront Corporation; and the Hon. Member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso—Fisheries.

• (1630)

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could add a few words to this debate.

We have in our Canadian House of Commons a procedure for changing the rules that is not present in any other legislature, as we call it. This is a legislature. In the world, that I know of, we are part of the British parliamentary system. Parliament comes from the word parler, to speak. This is a speak shop here.

They have a procedure set down to change the rules. We do not have any such procedure. So, we cannot as government members do in this debate. They say: "Well, how about if you had Question Period and you had the British system where there is a question from the opposition and then a question from the government". That is what they do. In every question period in the British House of Commons, the questions go to the opposition member, to the government member, to the opposition member to the government member.

The House leader says: "Why do we not have that"? Then the deputy House leader stood up and said: "How about if we had a system like they have in Britain where the Prime Minister is only there for three days". That is true. Cabinet ministers only have to show up for one day, and you give notice to the minister about your question. You must give notice.

You do not tell the minister what your supplementary question is going to be, but you give him notice. The deputy House leader said: "How about if we had that in the Canadian House of Commons?". Then the Whip stood up and suggested the most revolutionary thing of all. I'm sorry, it was the member from Surrey, British Columbia, who suggested: "How about if every motion and every debate came to an end, not in seven days, but in seven hours as they do in some of these other parliaments". Of course that is true in Britain, New Zealand and Australia. Motions come to an end at the end of every sitting day. That is true.

But what these members did not say to this opposition was: "How about if we had the system of committees that they have in the British House of Commons? How about that system"? That is what they forgot to say. That is where the action is.

The committees are completely divorced from the House of Commons. They do not need terms of reference. They operate completely autonomously. That is where the action is in those legislatures throughout the world which have a system in place for changing their rules of procedure.

By rules I mean all of the rules. Some of our rules, as the hon. member before me pointed out, are by custom. For example, somebody bows to you, Mr. Speaker, in the chair. You often wonder why somebody bows to you. I mean, it is very unusual to have a member walking across the floor and he bows to you. He bows. You often wonder why, when the Speaker comes in, the Sergeant-at-Arms says: "Take your hat off to the Speaker". You often wonder why you cannot sit up in the gallery up there without having a tie on. You are not allowed. If a man tried to come into the House with a leather jacket on, with a shirt and tie, he would not be allowed. There are certain rules that are sometimes very difficult to understand.

I imagine it must be difficult for people in the gallery to understand. If they took out a pencil right now, at this very moment, and started to take notes, they would be told they are not allowed to do it in any part of the gallery.

An hon. member: Except in the press gallery.

Mr. Baker: Yes, except in the press gallery, and except a portion of the gallery here to the right of the Speaker for ministers' assistants and a section of the gallery just next to the gentleman up there who is operating the console, operating the microphones, and there is a little section where the Speaker and the guards allow somebody to take notes.

The Canadian House of Commons has been very slow to change. I suppose we have been the slowest to change of any legislature under what we call the British parliamentary system. It was only in the 1950s that women were allowed to come into the House and sit here without a hat on. Members might be interested to know that at that time when two female MPs in the House of Commons stood up and asked why it was that whenever a woman comes to this House and sits in the gallery, she must have a hat on, the Speaker in a classic ruling for the Canadian House of Commons recited St. Paul in the first epistle to Timothy.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): No, no, then he made reference to the first epistle to the Corinthians, which I will not repeat here today. He made reference to those particular proclamations in giving his judgment. The Speaker then set the precedent by saying that as far as he was concerned, a woman should be able to come to these galleries and wear whatever she pleased. So that was the precedent that was set.

Mr. Speaker also in that judgment answered my question as to why people bow to you. It is because the first House of Commons was in a chapel and the Speaker's chair was on the altar. Because it was on the altar, people had to bow. They had to bend their knee when they came in front of the Speaker. That tradition has held until today in this Chamber. The tradition of not allowing anyone to take notes in the gallery stems back to when they did not want people to be sending out newsletters about what was supposed to be going on in the House of Commons.

Today, that is a rule in the Canadian House of Commons. You are not allowed to take a note when you visit the House of Commons.

We have been slow to change, to put it mildly, some of the rules of procedure that we have in this House. I believe that drastic changes are necessary in the way that the House of Commons conducts its business. Changes are necessary, but not these changes that have been brought in today. These changes that have been brought in today would not address the concerns that I as a parliamentarian have had for many years.

• (1640)

My concern is this. No matter how you look at it, this House of Commons has two main functions. You could draw up a list of 10 or 12 functions that we have, but there are two main ones: to pass laws and to arrange things in our rules that make the government accountable to the people. There is no other way that the government can be held accountable to the people of Canada, except through the Canadian House of Commons and the press.

What has happened over the years to our rules is that we have changed drastically in what we have accepted as acceptable. No longer can a government be defeated according to our precedents if a vote on a money bill is defeated. Mr. Speaker, you know the precedents that we have set there. No longer can a cabinet minister be held responsible for what happens in his department.

If we go back over Canadian history, we would recognize that cabinet ministers had to resign from time to time for things that happened in their department. I remember one case had to do with customs. Another case had to do with the post office. The assumption was made in our rules that a cabinet minister was held responsible for what happened in his department. If something happened that was completely unacceptable, that cabinet minister had to resign.

Today we not only do not hold ministers responsible for what happens in their department, but they need not even know what goes on in their department. That is what has evolved over a period of years.

I suppose because the departments have grown so big that it would be ridiculous to suggest that the Minister of Transport would be expected to know every little thing that goes on his department. The rules have changed, the procedure has changed so that a minister does not have to know. He does not have to answer a question in the House. He could stand up and say no to every question. He need not stand up at all. He is not held responsible for what happens in his department. A government cannot be defeated as a government and have to call an election because of the defeat of a money measure. The accountability of the Government of Canada to the people of Canada has now become practically non-existent in the House of Commons.

The other thing which really bothers me, and I sure some of the other members, is the completely unacceptable manner in which we pass bills and some of the tragic errors that have been made. We passed an unemployment insurance bill the other day. Now we see under that unemployment insurance bill that if somebody were collecting unemployment insurance and if they worked part time and reported their earnings, and their earnings meant that the unemployment insurance was reduced by a dollar or two every two weeks, if they quit that part-time job that they were reporting the earnings from, they would now lose all of their unemployment insurance for 12 weeks. That is what was passed in this Parliament. The Parliament of Canada passed that law just recently.

It was under the provision that dealt with quitters. Nothing was said in the legislation that I could see about part-time workers who were working while they were collecting unemployment insurance. It did not say that when they were reinstated after 12 weeks they would not get 60 per cent of their income but it would be reduced to 50 per cent.

It was the former Minister of National Health and Welfare, who was around just a moment ago, who brought in the bill on the advance child tax credit payment. What an outrageous situation that has created. We passed a law in the Canadian House of Commons that said we were going to give people an advance on their child tax credit. The Government of Canada did not even think about the fact that the qualifications for receiving that would be determined the following January, because that is what was in the old legislation.

We have in Canada today this outrageous, completely unacceptable situation. Say a fire occurred in the house over Christmas and the children were away for the first week in January and not under her care. Now she, by law, has to pay back every bit of the advance child tax credit given by the Government of Canada.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Baker: That is what the Government of Canada passed in this Parliament.

The legislative function of the House of Commons has deteriorated considerably because bills are no longer examined as they used to be when the system was much simpler in this House of Commons. It should be the job of members of Parliament to have complete hearings on issues. If you are going to give a child tax credit you bring in the people who are to receive the child tax credit. If you are going to change unemployment insurance, you bring in the people who are going to get it and who know the system. Then you do not make those mistakes.

There are two main functions of the House of Commons. There is accountability to the people of Canada through the House of Commons. That has practically disappeared over the years. As a legislative body passing laws, we should not be proud of some of the laws that have been made by this legislature in recent years.

Because of that, Mr. Speaker, we have to change our procedures, but in the opposite direction to what is being proposed here today. We cannot take a portion of the British House, or as the hon. member said a few moments ago, what is happening in New Zealand, and transplant that rule to the Canadian House. You cannot take a spoke unless you take the whole wheel. And maybe what is in the socket is not going to work.

In my final minute, what I want to suggest to the Government of Canada is this. Let me say that this has been done in every legislature under the British parliamentary system and is quite a simple procedure. If you go to the British House and you ask them: "How do you change your rules?", they will tell you that they have a committee, not of parliamentarians, but a committee that is there all the time examining the rules of procedure and constantly making suggestions for change.

You cannot judge another legislature.

• (1650)

You may go to another legislature in Britain, New Zealand or Australia and say: "Oh boy, this looks great.", but does it really? Do you know the rest of the story?

The rules have evolved to meet that country's requirements and those circumstances. I do not know why the Government of Canada would not then put in place this year a permanent mechanism for changing rules of procedure. I have been in this House for 17 years. I have watched the motions come forward one after the other as the years go on.

There are little games played with this rule, that rule or some other rule. Usually, as is the case here, the government is simply trying to remove a little more of the accountability from the House of Commons and its accountability to the people of Canada.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I know there is a lot of interest in this subject, and I am wondering if there might be unanimous consent of the House for us to extend the sitting this evening to allow more members to participate in this debate.

Some hon. members: No.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent. The Hon. Member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception for a question or comment.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have a comment and a question.

First of all, I want to say how much I have enjoyed the usual excellent presentation of my colleague from Gander—Grand Falls. I certainly found his comment, in a general sense, very instructive and very interesting.

Knowing perhaps a little bit more of my colleague's background than other members of the House, I know he speaks with great authority from both the House of Commons and indeed from the provincial legislature of Newfoundland.

His experience gives me even more confidence in the comments that he has made in a general sense.

If I may be permitted a comment, and one tries not to be very partisan about these kinds of things because there is give and take on both sides, what I have trouble understanding is that for as long as this country has existed, we have had changes in rules.

I find it very difficult to understand in the days when we are sending men to the moon, when we have telephones, video sets and conference calls why all of a sudden in this particular year of our Lord we need to now do things differently. I find that very difficult to understand.

An hon. member said last night: "You can do face to face what you cannot do by telephone." Yes, indeed. I would like to do all my business face to face, but by necessity of time, I have to do a lot of things by telephone.

I know also that the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls does a lot by telephone as well. I suppose one is never totally comfortable with rules. As human beings, I suppose we would always like to have total freedom, but I see rules as things that are applied to organizations and individuals which allows them to operate in a concerted, agreed manner that produces a better effectiveness in the over-all system.

Sometimes people suffer a bit. Sometimes people gain. I am not in favour of the rule changes, but I do not want to get into that right now.

Really, what I wanted to do was ask the hon. member if he could perhaps talk about some of the specifics that he is not very happy with. He may even be able to suggest in his vast experience and knowledge on this subject some of the things that he would like to see.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member from Newfoundland for his question.

I want to point out to the House that we do a lot of things in Newfoundland differently than we do them here in the House of Commons. I suppose I could use up my six minutes to tell others about the differences.

One of them that just occurred to me is that the government, in the House of Commons and everywhere under the British parliamentary system and in the provincial legislatures, always sits on the right hand of the Speaker. In the legislature in Newfoundland they sit on the left-hand, and the reason for that is interesting. When you look at all the procedures, there are various times when you refer to the person on your right. In this particular case you have to translate that because as you know, all of our rules in the provincial legislatures, and really federally, all refer back to Erskine May. Provincially they refer back to Beauchesne and in between we have our Standing Orders.

Anyway, the reason for the change in Newfoundland was that back in the days when the first legislative building was built, there was only one fireplace. This was before the days of central heating. That fireplace was to the left of the Speaker. Of course, the government always claimed the warmer side of the House. That is where our tradition came from as far as sitting to the left of the Speaker rather than the right of the Speaker.

The hon. member asked me what changes I would like to see.

An hon. member: I want to sit close to the fireplace.

Mr. Baker: I want to sit close to the fire.

I will make reference to one change. Perhaps somebody might be reading this transcript, or might be in the process of changing rules provincially or federally. It refers to decorum here in this and other legislative bodies.

Mr. Speaker, have you ever looked at the decorum in certain provincial legislatures on television when they replay portions of their proceedings at night? You notice the considerable difference between that decorum and the decorum here in the Canadian House of Commons. It appears as if we are more orderly. It appears that way.

I want to say that where you find legislatures that have very poor decorum it is because the House rules permit the use of the word "you", y-o-u. That is interesting. The next time you visit a provincial legislature or visit another country that has a legislative body derived from the British parliamentary system, wherever you have a chamber that permits the word "you" to be used during Question Period or at any other time, the decorum is completely terrible. It goes out the window. It is personal.

That is why all of the traditions of the House, all of the rules of the House, have an intermediary. People sometimes ask why we are always talking to the Speaker when we are speaking in the House. Why do we not talk to the minister? Why do we not talk to the people? Why are we always talking to the Speaker?

Mr. Epp: He's the only one who listens.

Mr. Baker: The hon. member said that perhaps he is the only one listening.

That is one suggestion I would make. That is to make the use of the word "you" completely unparliamentary, and if a member stands up and says "you", he should be told to sit down.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief question for the member for Gander—Grand Falls.

The number of members required to refuse consent, and this was put to you two or three times today in this House, to extend the hours past the normal adjournment is 15 under our present rules. It is proposed to increase that to 25.

When we were in opposition from 1984 to 1988, it was 25. There were 40 of us in opposition. The member for Gander—Grand Falls was there with me and he knows that it was difficult for us sometimes to get 25 members in the House. We are going back to that 25. Is that not what I would call an anti-democratic way of handling the smaller parties of this House? Is that not what I would call an anti-democratic way of handling the smaller parties of this House? Is that not the tyranny of the majority by asking those of us who have less to do more?

• (1700)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CRIMINAL CODE AND SUPREME COURT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, December 6, 1990, consideration of the motion of Mr. Domm that Bill C-210, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Supreme Court Act (habeas corpus) be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak to Bill C-210 on the subject of Canada's extradition process as I was the seconder of the motion.

Extradition defined is the "handing over by one government to another government, upon the latter's request, of a person accused of or convicted of a crime in the requesting country."

Canada has entered into an extradition treaty or arrangement with 40 countries, including the United States. Our proximity to the U.S. underscores the importance of having an extradition agreement wherein fugitives fleeing from the U.S. into Canada and vice versa can be returned to the country where the alleged crimes took place and justice served. A fugitive must not be allowed to assume that by crossing a border into a foreign country that he has found a safe haven, free from prosecution.

Recently, Canadians were reminded of the alleged heinous crimes of Charles Ng, charged with the sex slayings of 11 people in California. We were reminded of these crimes because the families of the slain victims, the whereabouts of the remains of some of them are still unknown, came to Ottawa to request that the federal government extradite Ng to the U.S. so that he could be tried. I, along with others members of Parliament, met with these distressed families, at the invitation of the hon. member for Peterborough, the sponsor of the bill.

We are reminded as well, because on February 21, 1991 arguments were being presented before the Supreme Court of Canada as to whether or not Charles Ng and convicted killer Joseph Kindler should be extradited to the United States.

Canadians who have been following the case of Ng know that he fled to Canada illegally in 1985 and was then arrested in Calgary for shoplifting. Ng was sentenced to serve four and a half years in a Canadian federal penitentiary. Canadians have been awaiting a decision on Ng and Kindler since 1985. It has taken five and a half years of appeals to get this far.

Why are Canadians saddled with the presence and the cost of incarcerating these individuals? While Ng, under the present extradition treaty with the United States, cannot be surrendered to American authorities until he has served his sentence in Canada, most would argue that our extradition process is too slow and in need of significant modifications.

The member for Peterborough has introduced this bill which would provide for changes to the Extradition Act, the Criminal Code and Supreme Court Act to make extradition to the U.S. a speedier process. I support and encourage the thrust of his bill because it reduces the number of appeals available to a fugitive.

Fugitives like Ng have more judicial options and opportunities open to them than does a Canadian citizen who is accused of committing a crime here in Canada. Clearly, there is a grave danger that our extradition process is being taken advantage of by fugitives who see Canada as a haven from justice where they can avoid possible execution, as in the case of Ng, where in the state of California he could face the death penalty.

I would like to quote from The London Free Press, February 7, 1990.

> Capital punishment is a relevant issue. But while the death penalty has been abolished in Canada, that is no justification to impose our legal or social values on a neighbouring democracy, which guarantees fair and open trials.

These are surely the thoughts of the relatives of Ng's victims; after all, justice delayed is indeed justice denied. It is also the sentiments of 100,000 Canadian petitioners who are in support of my colleague and seatmate, the hon. member for Peterborough.

Bill C-210 will limit to one the number of appeals available to such fugitives prior to the case going before the Minister of Justice for a decision. Canada's extradition laws have not undergone any significant changes or a review for over a hundred years. This bill will reduce the number of processes and procedures currently at the disposal of an individual.

If these changes are instituted, a person attempting to fight an extradition order will only be entitled to the initial extradition hearing and one appeal to the relevant provincial court of appeal.

These amendments will effectively eliminate the fugitive's right to appeal the extradition by way of a writ of habeas corpus. It will also eliminate any possible appeal of the decision to the Supreme Court of Canada before the case goes before the Minister of Justice.

If these changes are adopted, the two court proceedings which will be available to the fugitive to argue his case will be as follows: first, an extradition hearing which is presided over by a superior or a county court judge will decide whether the fugitive should be committed to prison in view of the extradition; second, an appeal of the extradition judge's decision to the court of appeal in the applicable province.

Let us use the Ng case as an example of how these amendments then would be applied. With the amendments in place, Ng would have had only an initial extradition hearing and appeal of that decision to the Alberta Court of Appeal. Ng would not have been able to apply for a writ of habeas corpus, nor be allowed to ask the Supreme Court of Canada for permission to hear the case. After these two court proceedings, the case would then automatically go before the justice minister for a decision.

By eliminating these two steps, the time frame involved in an extradition case would be substantially reduced.

I want to conclude my remarks by saying to the House tonight that here we have an opportunity to let this bill go to a vote. I hope that as has happened previously the NDP will not continue the debate and will allow the House to vote on this very important bill.

Mr. Waddell: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to put on record that it is not the members of the NDP who have spoken on the bill, it has been the government as well as some of the Liberals, but mainly government supporters. So please do not tell us falsehoods in the House, and check the debating time./

Mr. Fretz: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to speak on this same point of order. If that is the case, we will watch the clock closely and see who is the last member to speak in the House in this debate.

Mr. Riis: This is a very important issue and I just want to re-emphasize the point. I have just looked over the record and it seems that day after day when we debated this issue it has been members of the government that have been carrying on the debate.

Mr. Waddell: Right on. Right on.

Mr. Riis: Just to keep the record very factual, the overwhelming number of people who have "spoken out the bill" have been government members. Very few opposition members have spoken.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, the record is also clear, that the government and the Liberal opposition support the speedy passage of this private members' bill, and it is the NDP that opposes it.

Perhaps the House leader of the New Democratic Party could stand up and indicate whether his party supports the private members' bill that we are debating this afternoon. If that is the case, then we can end the debate right now and call the vote.

Some hon. members: Question.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I wish all honorable members could cooperate. I think all parties have expressed their opinion. Messages have been sent from either side, so that we could come back, as required by the rules, to the heart of the debate. Has the hon. member for Erie finished his speech? Resuming debate?

Some hon. members: Question! Question!

[English]

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I have noted with interest that no member of the New Democratic Party rose to speak on this bill when you called for speakers. I suspect that when we near the hour of six o'clock, New Democratic Party members will rise in order to kill this bill, in order that it not proceed.

• (1710)

I do not intend to hold the bill up. A member of the New Democratic Party says that it is my intention to hold the bill up. That is not my intention.

I would simply indicate to members of the House that I support this bill. The Liberal Party supports this bill. The Liberal Party believes that the present extradition procedure is cumbersome. It is unacceptable. There are unacceptable delays within the extradition procedure and as an interim measure we would like to see this particular private members' bill passed in order to expedite the procedure.

We are dealing here with Bill C-210, which was introduced by the hon. member for Peterborough. This bill, in effect, would streamline the process. The explanatory note indicates that this amendment, which is an amendment to the Criminal Code and to the Supreme Court Act, would limit to one the number of recourses available to a fugitive committed to prison under the Extradition Act.

Under the rules of the House, this particular private members' bill is given an opportunity to be debated in the House. We are dealing with this bill at second reading stage. If no further member rises to further debate the bill at second reading stage, it is referred to a legislative committee. The legislative committee has the authority, the jurisdiction to call witnesses and to examine the bill.

If any political party opposes this bill or opposes any private members' bill, they can talk it out. In other words, an hour has been set aside. It is now 5.12. If no other member rises prior to six p.m., then the matter is put to a vote and the matter is referred to a legislative committee.

The government supports the bill. As I indicated we support the bill. The New Democratic Party is on record as opposing the bill. If I am in error, if I am wrong, then I am sure that once I have finished speaking, the New Democratic Party will correct the record.

As an hon. member has indicated, the Extradition Act has not been amended in over 100 years, notwithstanding the fact the extradition procedure in Canada is a cumbersome procedure. It allows for criminals to come to this country and, in particular, from the United States and seek safe haven, knowing that the extradition procedures, as cumbersome and lengthy as it is, it is possible for a convicted criminal, let us say a convicted murderer to come to this country and to escape justice.

It is also possible for a suspected criminal, someone who could be suspected of a mass murder in the United States, for example, to come to Canada and avoid facing the music in the United States for a lengthy period of time because of the extradition procedure. The delays are unconscionable.

In Canada today we have two very celebrated cases, two high profile cases involving individuals from the United States who have come to Canada to seek save haven. They have used the extradition laws of this country in order to avoid facing due process in the United States. In particular, there is an individual in prison here in Canada who has been in prison for the last six years, one Charles Ng, who is suspected—he is not convicted— of having committed multiple murders in the State of California in the United States.

Six years ago that individual attempted a robbery in Alberta, was apprehended, convicted and sentenced to a period of incarceration in Canada. Since that time, the government of the State of California has sought the extradition of Mr. Ng to the United States in order to face trial for those murders, a far more serious crime than the crime that was committed here in Canada.

Given the procedures available to any individual, including Mr. Ng, here we are six years later and that individual has still not been subjected to due process in the United States. A trial has not yet taken place in the United States.

That is unacceptable and it is unconscionable. Justice delayed is justice denied.

Canadians, and in particular people living in the province of Ontario, will know of the Askov decision. The Supreme Court of Canada has said that if an accused person is not brought to trial within a reasonable period of time, then the state, or the Crown, could no longer prosecute, that these cases ought to be thrown out of court. In fact, thousands upon thousands of cases in the province of Ontario and elsewhere in this country have been dismissed because of the Askov decision, which says that because of lengthy delays involved in the prosecution of an offence, an individual is denied a fair trial.

That works both ways. If an individual, who might ultimately be held responsible for a serious crime, is not brought to trial within a reasonable period of time, the likelihood of the Crown being able to prove beyond a reasonable doubt, which is a very high standard indeed, and able to convince a jury beyond a reasonable doubt that the person is responsible for that crime, that likelihood is diminished. With the passage of time, memories fade, witnesses disappear, witnesses die, and it becomes that much more difficult to secure a conviction.

In the Ng case, the suspected crimes took place over six years ago. With every passing day, the State's case is weakened in the State of California. Is it any wonder that people like Charles Ng are using the Canadian judicial system in order to delay the trial in the State of California.

It is not acceptable. For that reason, I support and my party supports Bill C-210. I should point out that I am a member of the standing committee on justice and that the chairman of the standing committee on justice, the member for Mississauga West is also present in the House today. The standing committee on justice has considered the issue of extradition and has made recommendations to the government in order to streamline the procedure.

On November 23, 1990, the Minister of Justice indicated in a press release and in a statement in this House—in fact, it was a response to the report of the justice committee—that an extensive and major review of extradition law was under way.

That was three or four months ago. The government has been in office for over six years now, and I think Canadians can justifiably ask where is this much-needed legislation that would streamline the procedure, allow for due process and justice in cases where individuals come to this country and are suspected of having committed crimes in other jurisdictions, or have been convicted in other jurisdictions and have escaped to Canada.

I know that I have but a minute left in my submission. In view of the urgency of this particular matter, in view of the cases that will in future come before Canadian courts, I would ask all members to support this private member's initiative. Also I would ask members to try and convince the Minister of Justice to have the government bring in other amendments that would streamline the procedure and make it that much fairer.

I would hope that prior to six p.m. today, a vote could be called at second reading stage and that the matter can be referred to the standing committee on justice. The standing committee on justice could then expedite consideration of this bill.

• (1720)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, having spoken in this debate, I am not entitled to speak again, but I wonder if I could seek the unanimous consent of the House to pose a short question to the member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): I wonder if the member would answer this. I am concerned that because the member for Peterborough's bill really drastically reduces the process, the extra number of extradition hearings, including removing the process of habeas corpus, which is an ancient part of British and Canadian law, does the hon. member not think that this would probably make the bill unconstitutional?

Mr. Nunziata: I do not believe that the bill is unconstitutional. The hon. member is a lawyer. He has his own legal opinion as to the constitutional validity of Bill C–210. He will have the opportunity, as will the Department of Justice and all other interested individuals, to make submissions before the justice committee as to the constitutionality of this particular bill.

The bill does streamline the procedure. It only makes common sense to allow an individual one hearing and several appeals, to the court of appeal in the province where the extradition hearing is held and ultimately an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Under the present procedure there are a number of different avenues of appeal open to an individual that is subjected to the extradition procedure.

Surely any reasonable person, including the nine justices on the Supreme Court of Canada would agree that an individual should have one avenue of appeal. If a person is convicted of murder in Canada today they have an appeal to the court of appeal in the province in which they were convicted and a further appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. No one is suggesting that the person should have a further avenue of appeal either to another country or to the Federal Court of Appeal. There should be one streamlined procedure. That is all we are suggesting.

If the member has an opportunity to speak again, we would like to know whether the New Democratic Party will allow this bill to get to committee, so we can more fully answer the question he put.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, Canadians were shocked by revelations of the Charles Ng case as referred to by the member for York South—Weston and by my colleague, the member for Erie.

Charles Ng was captured in Calgary in July 1985 by a friend and constituent of mine, Sean Doyle. Mr. Doyle had little idea at the time of just who he was capturing when he apprehended Charles Ng.

Canadians have been frustrated by the extraordinary and extended delays in the extradition of Mr. Ng. The U.S. requested extradition of Charles Ng in February 1987. Still Ng remains, at the expense of Canadian taxpayers', harbouring this fugitive in Canada.

The case raised a lot of attention in Canada and a lot of people were upset by this ongoing process. Many of us followed the cause taken up by the member for Peterborough in championing this cause to expedite the extradition process in cases such as the Charles Ng case. Like many members here, I circulated petitions in my constituency to encourage revision and repeal of some of these extradition matters.

The hon. member for Peterborough proposed Bill C–210 which is before us in the House today. The intention of the Domm bill is to streamline Canada's extradition process which currently provides a multi–tiered system of appeals. Specifically, this bill attempts to limit one of the number of appeals available to a fugitive in an extradition case before the Minister of Justice renders a decision.

The objective of the bill, to avoid delays in handling requests for extradition, is clearly commendable, just what all those who signed petitions were demanding. No one wants to allow excessive delays in the extradition process which could turn Canada into a haven for fugitives who have been accused of serious crimes in other countries. On that matter I expect we will agree, having heard the media attention that the well–publicized extradition cases have received during the last year.

Beyond that, however, what we must seriously consider is how to best achieve the goal of sound and effective extradition law for Canada. Upon receipt of the hon. member's bill I asked the Department of Justice to examine its implications and the likelihood of achieving what we are attempting to do.

The Department of Justice advised that Bill C–210 would amend the Criminal Code to preclude appeals from decisions and applications for habeas corpus. At first glance the proposal appears to eliminate appeals to provincial courts of appeal and to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The reality of the bill is that behind the optimistic facade lurked grave dangers. When one goes beyond a superficial survey of Bill C–210 it quickly becomes apparent that the bill would create profound problems. Not only does the bill have the potential to exacerbate the problem of delay in extradition cases, it could have detrimental consequences which extend well beyond extradition cases.

Simply put, the bill is not what it seems to be and unfortunately does not accomplish what it was intended to do.

Allow me to provide some examples of the dire impact of passing Bill C–210 which on the face of it may seem to be what we have worked for, a positive response to the problem of delay. The bill appears to remove appeals from decisions concerning habeas corpus. However, these decisions would then become final decisions and according to section 40 of the Supreme Court Act, final decisions can be appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada if leave to appeal is granted by the court.

Therefore while the bill appears to remove two steps of appeal it opens up the possibility of a new level of appeal.

Furthermore, independent from appeals of judicial decisions in extradition cases, appeals of the decision of the Minister of Justice remain available.

I am trying to emphasize here that the appeal process in extradition matters is a delicate and complicated legal process. A slight legislative adjustment can create a ripple effect which impacts on related statutes, in some cases by opening up new avenues of appeal.

For example, Bill C–210 would repeal paragraph 39(a) of the Supreme Court Act. This amendment is simply supposed to be consequential to the amendments proposed to the Criminal Code. In reality the amendment would have serious negative results.

I am advised that Bill C–210 would remove a paragraph from the Supreme Court Act. That paragraph, however, is a particularly important paragraph because it removes two possible avenues of appeal that are created elsewhere in the act. Therefore, by removing that paragraph that prevents appeals in habeas corpus matters, the bill opens up two new appeal steps that are provided in sections 37 and 38 of the act. In other words two avenues of appeal would be open which do not currently exist. They are prevented at present by the paragraph that Bill C–210 would remove.

The Department of Justice informs me that another adverse consequence of the repeal of paragraph 39(9) of the Supreme Court Act is that it would not only aggravate present delays in extradition cases, the possibility of new delays extend beyond extradition cases.

It would not only open up the possibility of new appeal routes in extradition cases, but would also open up the same two avenues of appeal in any criminal case.

By creating new avenues of appeal that did not previously exist, Bill C–210 may increase the workload of the Supreme Court of Canada for all criminal cases and not simply extradition. Hence the bill which at first blush attempts to eliminate a single appeal route could have the opposite effect. It could create new avenues of appeal and have a far–reaching detrimental impact on the criminal justice procedures.

A further negative impact of the proposed amendments is that it could raise constitutional issues and be challenged in the courts on the basis of the Charter of Rights. Such challenges could increase the delays involved in the extradition process which would intensify the problem of delay which the bill professes to ameliorate. This demonstrates once again how the bill is not what it seems to be or what was intended.

Furthermore, Bill C–210 which purports to conclude appeals from habeas corpus decisions does not necessarily preclude such appeals. The bill allows for appeals in certain cases. There is an exception created by the bill; it allows for appeals arising from section 28 of the Extradition Act. This means that when a fugitive has not surrendered within two years after a habeas corpus application the fugitive may appeal the habeas corpus decision. Therefore appeals from habeas corpus applications are not necessarily precluded by virtue of the proposed amendment.

• (1730)

Instead of facilitating extradition, Bill C–210 could result in fugitives being freed because the Crown also is left without the ability to appeal a habeas corpus decision. This could occur due to the fact that any arguments based on the Charter of Rights may be raised for the first time at the application for habeas corpus.

A judge at an extradition hearing does not have the authority to consider such arguments, given the nature of the proceedings. Consequently, if an error is made concerning a charter issue, or other legal issue, the appeals would not be available.

On one hand, if an error is made in favour of the fugitive, the fugitive may be released without any possibility of appeal by the Crown other than to the Supreme Court of Canada, if leave is granted by the court.

Of course, the fugitive might very well have left the country by the time the case is heard. Fugitives may be inappropriately released according to Bill C–210. On the other hand, if an error is made in favour of the Crown, the Minister of Justice may be faced with ordering the extradition of a fugitive on the basis of a questionable judicial decision.

By trying to plug a hole in the dike, Bill C–210 knocks down the dike. I trust that I have exposed the dangers in proceeding immediately with piecemeal amendments of limited effect to the extradition process such as Bill C–210.

It would be a grave error to adopt the bill which is not, unfortunately, what it seems and which, when closely examined, has unintended adverse effects. The bill in its present form is inadequate. It raises serious constitutional questions and is ineffective in streamlining the appeal process. Unattended ripple effects will undo the benefits the bill is trying to achieve.

In view of the complex nature of the appeal process for there to be sound and effective legislation, a comprehensive review which would fully examine all of the ramifications is required.

I am advised there is a comprehensive review currently under way which is considering a broad range of issues including, as its first priority, the means to streamline the present appeal process. In view of the ongoing review, it would be a mistake to adopt the bill now. It will not accomplish what it sets out to achieve.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I just have a few remarks to make.

The previous speaker has simply vindicated the position of the New Democratic Party on this bill. We have not been standing in our place arguing against the government's attempt to get Ng back into the United States.

We do not want people like Ng to remain in Canada, but we have said consistently that this bill is just bad law. That is all there is to it. It is bad law. It is a bad bill that is badly written.

Frankly, I think it should be withdrawn.

What we have asked for in this Chamber is for the Minister of Justice to expedite her processes in her department to bring forward to this House a bill that is not only constitutional, but that is workable. That is what we want, and that is what we have been arguing.

The hon. member for Peterborough has tried to use this bill for cheap political purposes. He has tried to spread the word across the country that the New Democratic Party is soft on alleged criminals like Ng. That is what he has done consistently. He said that in committee, elsewhere and in this House.

What we are asking for is better legislation. If the hon. member for Peterborough wants this bill to go to committee, fine. He can have it today. I am going to sit down in about 30 seconds, and I hope nobody else stands up. We will let it go on division, but if you want to vote, fine.

I think the hon. member for Peterborough and the hon. member for Erie know now that it is a bad bill. It is badly written, and it should be withdrawn.

I am asking at this point in time if the hon. member for Erie, who spoke a few moments ago, is prepared on behalf of the hon. member for Peterborough to withdraw this bill. His own party wants him to withdraw it. His government does not support the bill. It has made that abundantly clear. I do not know where we go from here.

I am going to put it squarely back on the lap of the hon. member for Erie or whoever else wishes to speak at this time. We have no intention of blocking this bill, and from proceeding further.

Mr. Horner: I do not know on what basis the hon. member states that this party does not support the bill. I believe that this bill should come to a vote right now and be referred to committee where it can be amended. I support the bill entirely. I do not think it is bad legislation. I want to say that the next speaker who stands up will have the voters to answer to because this is a bill that is sorely needed.

Some hon. members: Question.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, I rise to commend the initiative of our colleague the member for Peterborough who is trying, with this Bill C-210, to expedite judicial proceedings for extradition.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I cannot support the approach taken to make such proceedings as expeditious as possible. Therefore, I cannot support this bill, however commendable the intentions of our distinguished colleague. I intend to use the few minutes I have to explain to the hon. members present what makes this initiative commendable and more particularly why I cannot support it.

Over the past few years, it has become clear that crime knows no border and that appropriate measures must be taken to prosecute criminals where they committed their crime. I am sure my colleagues will agree with me that when I say Canada should not assume the legal costs relative to crimes committed abroad by a fugitive.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, the fugitive suspected of having committed a crime in the United States, for instance, must be extradited to that country to be tried and, if convicted, serve his sentence there.

Modern means of transportation allow fugitives to easily cross borders and find refuge in a foreign country. Canada prides itself for its open style of government and the fact that all can travel freely in the country. It is quite easy to enter Canada since we promote foreign exchanges and do not go out of our way to make entering the country difficult. Our fellow citizens who would the first to complain about long line-ups at the border upon their return from abroad.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, this really makes it easy for a fugitive criminal to find refuge in our country and take advantage of the freedoms we cherish and all enjoy.

These past few months, we saw some fugitives come to Canada and try to prolong their stay as much as possible by using all sorts of legal appeals to delay the final decision regarding their return to the country requesting their extradition.

Therefore it became pretty obvious that we should try to limit the means of appeal and to avoid duplication and all the various levels which allow several years to go by between the extradition request and the time when the fugitive can be extradited.

So, Mr. Speaker, we try to keep our borders open while making sure that those who are foolhardy enough to take refuge in Canada will be promptly extradited. I am not unaware of the fact that appeals are necessary for justice to be done but also to appear to be done. I think it would be wrong to think of deporting someone by means of extradition without allowing this person to challenge the legal principles on which this extradition is based. However, we must keep a balance between repeated appeals and a complete lack of remedy.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I consider bill C-210 as a very worthy initiative since its objective is obviously to speed up the appeal procedure in case of extraditions. The sponsors of this bill wanted to keep certain appeals possible while preventing others.

• (1740)

Unfortunately I cannot condone the approach taken in Bill C-210 because, in my humble opinion, it does not meet the desirable goal it had set. You have heard, Mr. Speaker, my colleagues try to explain the difficulties of revising the extradition appeal mechanisms. I have no intention of going back over this, except to say that I do recognize its validity.

Mr. Speaker, by trying to do away with certain extradition appeal mechanisms, we would create even greater difficulties which would make the extradition laws still uncertain for a long period, and this would of course benefit those who want to use the laws to their advantage to take refuge as long as possible in Canada. Indeed, it is well known that uncertainty in the legislation fosters litigations which ultimately may have to be dealt with the Supreme Court of Canada. While these questions of principle are debated as they should be, many cases remain in abeyance. Surely, such a result is neither desired nor desirable.

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Justice will be able to introduce in this House a bill dealing with this thorny issue of extradition appeals in the most orderly fashion possible. I understand that this legislation is in the makings and that this House will have the opportunity to examine it before long. This difficult issue must clearly receive special consideration by this House on a priority basis. However, I cannot agree with such a narrow approach as the one followed by Bill C-210 which would add new uncertainties to the act. Far from resolving the issue, Bill C-210 would be adding to the problem, and for this reason I cannot endorse it.

In closing I want to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that our colleague's initiative should be commended by the members of this assembly and that it is more for technical reasons than because of the philosophy behind this legislation that I will have to vote against Bill C-210.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, as you noticed, I did try to get the floor quite a few times. Because this is a private members' bill, I feel it is my place to express the views of my constituents on this bill. They have lobbied very hard that the government do something to change the legislation so that someone committing a crime in one country will not look for haven in Canada or in other countries. So my constituents of Parkdale—High Park want to fully support this bill.

I do not buy the nonsense that the government members are giving, that it is not a good bill. That is why this process is referring it to a legislative committee. That is where all the kinks will be worked out. Anyone who will get up now and speak against this bill just to kill time should search his or her conscience and should report back to their constituents, because the message I am getting from my constituents is: "You politicians do something about this". They are fed up with criminals like Ng taking refuge in Canada.

PROCEEDINGS OF ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

AIRPORTS

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged, as I always am, to rise this evening in debate on the adjournment proceedings.

On May 15, 1990, I rose in this Chamber on a question in an area of great interest to me, my constituents and to many Canadians. The question I asked was in response to the series of tours the Minister of Transport undertook of federal airports at the time of his appointment to that portfolio.

The minister was interested in examining Canada's major airports with a view to not only learning about the capacities of the facilities, but of examining the problems with respect to air transportation of which, of course, there are many. However, no such action has been taken by the minister in relation to either solving air traffic problems or in developing an over all transportation system for the 21st century.

There have been many changes in the direction of air transport policies since I raised the issue a year ago. Negotiations into updating the 1974 bilateral air transportation agreement into an open skies agreement between Canada and the United States are set to begin this week here in Ottawa, which will significantly alter the way air transportation has managed in both Canada and the U.S.

While these negotiations will probably result in a new agreement that will bring increased air traffic into Canada, the government and the Department of Transport have not given consideration as to how they will deal with the problem. The shortage of air traffic controllers for one is well documented.

I believe that two things are essential in this debate. First, Pearson International Airport at Toronto is at maximum capacity and needs to have pressure taken off it. Second, Canada is a country built by transportation networks, first by sea and by rail, now in air transportation and, accordingly, Canada needs some kind of multi-modal system of transportation which will work effectively.

On the first point, I have suggested many times in this place that the government must consider alleviating pressure on Pearson International Airport by diverting some air traffic to Hamilton Airport. There are many reasons for diverting traffic from Pearson International and there are many more reasons why the traffic should be diverted to Hamilton.

As you may recall, because of three losses of separation incidents at Pearson which occurred within a month of each other, a cap was placed on the number of flights that could arrive and depart from the airport, commonly known as aircraft movements.

There are presently only 76 movements per hour allowed at Pearson. Such a situation developed, some analysts say, because of the lack of adequately trained air traffic controllers at the facility.

In addition, testimony from the investigation into the Dryden inquiry air crash indicates that because of delays on the runway at Pearson International during the winter months, planes which are de-iced risk the reoccurrence of ice buildup as they wait on the tarmac for take-off.

Transport Canada has acknowledged that it will deal with the problem by installing more de-icing machines, but the implications for tragedy are obvious. Pearson has outgrown itself. Terminal 3 has added another 24 gates to Pearson and proposed new runways promise increased traffic.

As the President of the Air Transportation Association of Canada noted: "Runways at Pearson have a finite limit. That limit has been reached."

• (1750)

Practically everyone but the Minister of Transport is convinced that what is needed in southern Ontario is a second principal airport to meet the needs of the region to take pressure off Pearson. In fact, in his annual report ending March 31, 1990, Auditor General Ken Dye criticized Transport Canada for failing to deal with deregulation and for funding the network of airports in Canada without clear rationale.

One way to rationalize the system is to develop a network of transportation that meets the needs of the future. In addition, the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Panel charged with studying the environmental implications of new runways at Pearson stated that Transport Canada lacks a master plan to deal with the system of airports in southern Ontario and questioned whether it was appropriate for Transport Canada to be building new runways in the absence of such an over-all master plan. The review panel suggested to Transport Canada that it develop such a plan and consider the roles of other airports in the region.

This is the same view I have taken since having the privilege of becoming a member of Parliament and serving as a member of the transport committee.

In 1989 I chaired a task force meeting in Hamilton at the airport to examine its capacity to accept increased traffic from Pearson. Hamilton airport has all of the basic infrastructure necessary to handle more air traffic.

When I hear the distant rumblings from the Department of Transport about building a new airport at Pickering or Buttonville, I cannot imagine why. Building a complete facility with all of the necessary modern components would cost hundreds of millions of dollars and would be a waste when all the region needs is improvements at Hamilton.

Even in a Transport Canada study Hamilton airport was shown to be the best alternative, priority number one, to Pearson International over Toronto Island, Buttonville, Oshawa and Downsview. The government may scoff at the idea of a second principal airport in the region, but by looking at many similar situations in cities across the world, we seem to be the only one saying that bigger is better.

For example, one analyst explained that Hamilton airport was unacceptable to handle more traffic than Pearson because it was too close. On the contrary, Hamilton is only 70 kilometres from Pearson, but that is much farther than the mere 16 kilometres that separates two of the world's busiest airports, JFK and Laguardia in New York. They transfer between each other by road for connecting flights.

Then there is the example in California. Passengers transfer between San Francisco International and Oakland International by both road and rail to catch connecting flights. Passengers also connect from San Jose from San Francisco, meaning that there are actually three principal airports in that region.

In conclusion, airline passengers are looking for alternatives. The alternatives are that there are other ways in which this government can help to establish a rational system in this densely populated area of southern Ontario which will see positive effects right across the country, a second principal airport and a multi-modal approach to travel between them and right across this country.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from Hamilton poses a very important question for him as a member for the region. He suggests that the Hamilton airport be a second major airport in the region.

I wonder if he has considered at least two very important questions in posing that as a solution for what he says is the large number of people who want to use that as a passenger terminal. One, if the air carriers themselves do not want to land there, or have not suggested they want to land there, how does he propose to divert the flights from Air Canada or CP to Hamilton if they do not want to go there? Does he want to have compulsory landing patterns or instructions for those airlines so that they have to land in Hamilton whether they want to use Pearson or not?

They may want to land at Pearson, but they have got to go to Hamilton. Is it going to be another Mirabel pattern? Is that what he is proposing? And if he is going to make it compulsory, for whom? Is it going to be Air Canada? Is it going to be Canadian, or is it going to be feeders? How does he propose to handle the whole matter of choice for the airlines if all of them want to go to Pearson, and presumably that is where the passengers want to go? How is he going to divert them to Hamilton? That is a legitimate question and he has not dealt with that.

The second question is what about the neighbours to Hamilton, his neighbours in Ancaster? I understand and I have here a clip from his own local newspaper, The Hamilton Spectator, of May 24, 1990. The headline reads: "Ancaster may sue regional Hamilton airport nuisance". Are the people of Ancaster going to be happy with having increased traffic and landings at Hamilton?

I think those are two legitimate questions that we can ask the member if he has given thought to them. But it would be wrong to leave the impression that I think the member inadvertently left and that is that the minister has been ignoring the fact of Hamilton airport. In fact, the airport receives an annual subsidy for operations and maintenance which amounted to $700,000 in 1989, and $1 million in 1990. The facilities at Hamilton have also been upgraded and expanded by the department, including a $65 million program in 1987, and a $900,000 project to extend the regional trunk sewer in 1990, thereby increasing the airport development capacity. A $1.5 million program for apron and taxiway expansion was completed in 1990, and a $2.5 million modification to the air terminal building is virtually completed.

When you have those kinds of expenditures, you cannot say that the minister has been ignoring.

One more point, Mr. Speaker. I know he has raised questions about the ILS on runway 06. Yet the regional municipality has accepted the decommissioning of the ILS. It should be noted that it does not degrade the available level of service as an ILS is available on the 8,000 foot runway.

I think that the member, in order to be fair, ought to concede that the minister has been giving due attention and we ought to let the airlines do some choosing as to which facilities they want to use.

HARBOURFRONT CORPORATION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, like the previous speakers, I am very happy to have a chance to expand on some points that are really hard to make in the context of Question Period and the issue about which I am glad to have this extra time is the developments at Harbourfront in the city of Toronto.

Harbourfront had a somewhat controversial launching, but there is absolutely no doubt that it is a very valued asset in Toronto today, something appreciated by the people to the point where traffic jams on weekdays and weekends are more the issue than lack of use.

There have been problems with Harbourfront. Its policies have been criticized, but none of them have been criticized as much as the criticism of the federal government's proposed solution to the problems at Harbourfront.

We rose in December to ask some questions about the government solutions to the Harbourfront problem and we certainly did not receive satisfactory answers. The minister told us that the mayor of the city of Toronto was happy about the solution of Harbourfront. He failed to mention that of the 16-member council only one member, the mayor, was happy about it. All the other members of council had objected to the imposed solution of the federal government and, in fact, as I rise now we are awaiting one further study—maybe one study too many—of what the solution to the Harbourfront problem should be.

I do not have a whole solution fleshed out to put forward. It is not the function of the opposition to do so, but I want to draw attention to the serious problems with the government's so-called solution and I ask these questions in the spirit that three months later, almost four months later, that have elapsed since the question was asked, the government may well have come to recognize the problems with its so-called solutions.

This is a solution by the way which will result in the federal government, which once owned at the beginning when Harbourfront was established, 100 acres of land. Now at the end of it, if this solution is implemented fully, the government, the Harbourfront non-profit corporation, will only own 10 acres of land.

We are giving the park back to the people. We are going from a federal landholding of over 100 acres to a federal government landholding of 10 acres. We have complained that the cultural and recreational programming, which the government says it guarantees will continue, will in fact not be guaranteed.

There is not enough funding provided to ensure that these programs will continue. The government has made a commitment to maintain that programming, but the funding that they have provided will not do it.

It needs a better solution. It wants to pass the burden to the city of Toronto to sustain this programming, but the programming could be sustained by the use and development for commercial and other purposes of the rest of the land.

The second problem that I want to focus on is that instead of using the surrounding land to its full economic advantage for the programming at Harbourfront, the government is basically embarking on a program which gives it away.

Naturally, there is going to be some consideration paid for it by the private developers who are going to be acquiring some of this 100 acres of land. Coopers and Lybrand, an independent appraising firm which did an appraisal of it, found that the land that the corporation is disposing of to private developers in return for what we call the pipeline land is the land that is on the south side of Queen's Key and actually facing the water. It is actually worth $36 million more than the federal government is going to be getting for the favours that it is giving in return.

In other words, $36 million which might have been available for funding of the Harbourfront programming is instead being transferred to private developers. When I raised that question with the minister, you will not believe what he said in reply to me. He said: "We had to pay a premium to get that land back from the private developers to whom long-term leases had been given by the former Harbourfront board."

I asked the question: "Why should the federal government pay a premium to get land back?", meaning pay more than it is worth. The federal government has the power to expropriate land. If the owners of these leasehold interests do not want to sell them back to the government at fair market value, instead of arranging to give them a premium, more than fair market value, the federal government has the recourse of taking the land back and having the court determine what a fair value is.

I think a fundamental error has been made in moving from dealing with land at fair market value to paying premiums to developers to get land back that it is determined should be put back into recreational and other activity related uses for Harbourfront.

I also feel—we raised this in our questions—that it is a mistake to give fee simple, that is, permanent ownership of this land to developers. The way in which the former Harbourfront board of directors was proceeding was to just give long-term leases. Eventually, these interests would revert to the people of Canada.

After the period when I asked my question took place, the board of Harbourfront, the members of which were all appointed by the federal government, refused to adopt the solution that the federal government is trying to impose. It refused to play ball with the government in allowing this transfer to take place. Even though they were federal appointees and good Tories, they refused to go along with it.

The government had to wait for the term of office of the Harbourfront directors to expire and then appoint nominal people who were committed to the government's agenda and to their transitional program to try to carry out this unpopular solution which is no solution because it will not work.

Hopefully, today we will be able to hear that the government is at least waiting for the city of Toronto's report and will not proceed with the program which we were so critical of last December.

[Translation]

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the new approach to the management of Toronto's harbourfront announced last November by the Minister of Public Works is a fair, intelligent and progressive solution to a rather complex problem. It is the result of months of consultations with many interested organizations. It shows the foresight, imagination, and sustained effort of many groups and individuals.

The most important feature of this new plan is that it will give the Toronto waterfront back to Torontonians. As David Crombie recommended, all new construction south of Queen's Quay-West must cease, with the possible exception of small buildings that the city considers to be in the public interest. From now on, this area will contain only public land and buildings. It will be given over to Torontonians and the many visitors who go there every year.

Under this new plan, a public charitable foundation will be set up to fund the very popular, cultural, recreational and educational programs of the new Harbourfront Corporation.

This will allow its new programs to be put of a sound financial basis enabling the Harbourfront Corporation to plan activities more freely and with confidence in the future.

Mr. Speaker, the plan being implemented reflects the remarquable consensus arrived at by those who formulated it. It reflects the opinion of the hon. David Crombie who, for over two years, has been playing a major role in defining what lays ahead for the Toronto waterfront. The key elements of this plan were first set out in August 1989 in the first interim report of Mr. Crombie's Royal Commission on the future of the Toronto waterfront. This plan also contains ideas expressed in the study Mr. Duncan Allan, the Premier of Ontario's advisor on the development of the Toronto waterfront, commissioned by of the Ontario government. Throughout the development of this plan, there were consultations with the City of Toronto, including the mayor, the aldermen and representatives from various municipal services as well as with the Toronto Urban Community. Discussions are ongoing concerning the implementation of this plan.

Mr. Speaker, it is unusual for such a complex question issue to be endorsed with such unanimity considering the many organizations involved. In this case, it is really no wonder, since it is generally recognized that this plan will mark the beginning of a new and better era for Harbourfront. In this context, the people of Toronto and the millions of people who visit the city will benefit from a more accessible waterfront, more parks and recreation facilities as well as a cultural and educational program, the funding of which will be guaranteed.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to give voice to the tremendous frustration felt by the 6,500 residents of the island of Isle Madame, which lies off the southeast coast of Cape Breton Island in my riding of Cape Breton Highlands—Canso.

This frustration stems from a series of decisions taken by the Minister of Fisheries last December. One such decision reduced the offshore share of the cod quota in 4T–VN by 9 per cent, from 53,000 tonnes to 48,000 tonnes.

Isle Madame and its 6,500 residents are particularly reliant on one fishery, located in Petit De Grat, on Isle Madame, namely Richmond Fisheries, which happens to be the sole employer in Petit De Grat.

Imagine the horror of the people of Isle Madame upon learning last December that the Minister of Fisheries had reduced the enterprise allocation for Richmond Fisheries in 4T–VN, not by 9 per cent but by 37 per cent of the total allowable catch.

Since that time, the residents of Isle Madame and of Petit De Grat have asked one question of the Minister of Fisheries: Why? Why have you singled us out? Why are you putting at risk our very way of life?

Since that time the Minister of Fisheries has maintained a stony, almost contemptuous silence, as if to say "I don't owe you an explanation, I am the minister".

Since that time, I have risen in the House time and time again, asking the Minister of Fisheries for an explanation and asking him to reverse this disastrous decision for the sake of the people of Isle Madame. He has either been unwilling or unable to provide an adequate explanation for his actions.

• (1810)

The last time I rose in the House on this issue was on Friday, March 15. That morning, Richmond Fisheries announced that it was tying up two of its four trawlers, putting 26 trawlermen out of work. The minister was not in the House at the time, but his parliamentary secretary responded to my question.

The parliamentary secretary conceded that, "the effects on Richmond Fisheries and so many others, are unfortunate, but they are in the long-term interest of all those who depend on the fishery."

It is indeed unfortunate that neither the minister nor his parliamentary secretary have provided an adequate explanation to either Richmond Fisheries or the people of Isle Madame as to why this company was singled out for a 37 per cent cut in its enterprise allocation, nor have they even attempted to.

I wrote to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on January 7 asking him for an explanation of why he had taken this action. I also pointed out to him that his action was in violation of his own management plan, specifically principle 10. I have yet to receive a reply from him to my letter, or an explanation as to why he has chosen to violate his own plan.

On December 18 of last year I rose in the House of Commons to question the minister of fisheries on the subject of these cuts and their potential impact on the people of Isle Madame. I asked the minister then if he realized that he risked forcing Richmond Fisheries out of business. I also asked him that as the sole employer in Petit de Gras why he did not provide the people of this village an explanation beforehand.

Did the minister believe that the community was not worth saving. In the minister's response, he did not even mention the people of Petit de Gras nor Isle Madame, nor did he provide me or the people most affected with any sort of explanation.

At a time when Canadians in every part of the country are fed up with the way their views are ignored, and with the seeming inability of their elected officials to represent their concerns, could there be any greater symbol of that widespread discontent than the minister of fisheries' refusal to listen to the people of Isle Madame and the representations of Richmond Fisheries. These people want an explanation from the minister. The minister has simply not bothered to respond, most probably because he does not have an adequate explanation for his actions.

To virtually ignore the people of Isle Madame, to refuse to listen to their heartfelt concerns about the survival of their community and their way of life, represents the most dangerous form of arrogance and self-satisfaction on the part of the minister of fisheries.

In their communication with the minister the representatives of Richmond Fisheries and the people of Petit de Gras and Isle Madame have shown a tremendous degree of restraint. At a time when they could be angry and contemptuous of the minister, they have remained cool and collected. They have done so, because they realize the continued existence of their community may depend on their ability to convince this minister that he is dead wrong and that the results of his folly could be catastrophic.

Let me quote from correspondence sent to the minister by a community action committee in Petit de Gras, formed for the reasons I have just cited.

In a letter dated February 22, they write in the most plain and simple language as follows: "Our economic welfare is at stake and its fate is in your hands. The 1991 management plan, should it remain as it is, will destroy the economy of Isle Madame. We are not asking, Mr. Minister, for gifts of money, nor are we asking for make-work projects or grants or assistance packages".

Indeed they are not. They are asking for an enterprise allocation for Richmond Fisheries which is more in line with the total allowable catch for the 4T-VN region. Is this asking very much? Why is the minister doing this to Richmond Fisheries and to the people of Isle Madame? Again, I quote from the community action committee's correspondence:

> We submit to you, Mr. Minister, that Richmond Fisheries is the model for the survival of the industry. On the capacity issue, look at the number of destructive bottom drag licences they have taken out of the fishery. Look further at their total compliance and agreement in stock-preserving cuts that have been applied to certain troubled quotas. Study carefully the rate of observer coverage maintained by Richmond Fisheries and compare it to any other element in the 4T-VN fishery. Seek out, if you can, any other operation which has an in-house, totally reserved, D.F.O. inspection team.

Richmond Fisheries is a model for the industry to follow, and yet it is being forced to tie up its trawlers and lay off its employees simply because the minister, for some unknown reason, has it in for them. Why? Why does he seem to harbour a grudge against Richmond Fisheries? They and the people of Isle Madame who rely on Richmond Fisheries have shown the minister courtesy time and time again.

The minister has taken this disastrous decision in contravention of his own management plan, in contravention of all available scientific evidence and despite the urgent and reasonable appeals made by Richmond Fisheries and the people of Isle Madame for him to consider.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada)): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the hon. member that it may be that the answer given by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans or by myself may not be the one that the members in his community of Richmond or Isles Madame are looking for or can provide comfort to them. That may be. That is not to say, though, that the minister has ignored them or that he is arrogant or that he has singled them out.

I think it is grossly unfair for the member, who I think understands, to accuse the minister just because he cannot provide the kind of an answer he wants. He is accusing him of ignoring them or of being arrogant or having other things to do. I do want to provide an answer. Again, it may not be the answer that the constituents whom he represents are looking for, especially in the short term. I do think it is the answer in the long term.

The 1991 groundfish management plan has provided a reasonable balance between the conservation of the resource and stability for participants in the industry and for the economy of Atlantic Canada. The total allowable catch, the TAC for the southern Gulf of St. Lawrence cod in are 4T-VN, January to April portion was reduced from 53,000 tonnes in 1990 to 48,000 tonnes in 1991 and 43,000 tonnes for the years 1992 and 1993.

The decision to reduce the TAC for this stock was based on scientific information which suggests that most of the cod harvested in the deep waters of 4-VN during the period January to April originate from 4-T. The reduction in the offshore share was undertaken to preserve the cod stock at 4-T, as 4-VN, JA and 4-T are both part of one large cod stock.

The decision to reduce the offshore share of this stock does not violate Principle 10 of the groundfish management plan. This stock is now under multi-year management. Over the next three years, 1991 through 1993, the TAC will decrease by more than 15 per cent. Under such conditions, guidelines in the groundfish management plan state that adjustments to the inshore-offshore ratio can be considered.

The effects on Richmond Fisheries are unfortunate, but the decision taken was part of the groundfish management plan for 1991. These decisions are based on the long-term interests of all those who depend on the fishery. For the cod stock in question the quota sharing arrangement between fleet sectors has not been decided upon for the final two years, 1992 to 1993, of the plan.

Departmental scientists are closely monitoring the fishery and should biological indicators suggest a change in the TAC, this advice will be considered. For 1991, an additional 500 tonnes of 4-VWX redfish will be available to Houston Fisheries as a result of the removal of 4-VWX redfish from the groundfish developmental program in 1991. This fish could potentially be processed at the Richmond plant.

For fishermen, plant workers and communities affected by quota reductions and stock depletion, the Government of Canada has developed the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program. This program has elements which will help rebuild fish stocks to ensure an abundant resource base in the future, provide adjustments to current realities through assistance to plant workers and trawlermen and economic diversification within the fishery and for fishery dependent communities affected by quota reductions and stock depletion.

Unfortunately, there is not a magic wand to make fish appear or reappear. This government is very sympathetic to those who are suffering from the effects of lower quotas. This government has taken measures that are responsible and sensitive, conservation for a sustainable and viable future and a comprehensive adjustment program for Atlantic Canada.

I hope the member and the members of his community will appreciate the fact that conservation is a very important ingredient in the management scheme, so that the people in his community in the long-term can have the livelihood they so richly desire and deserve.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, on April 5 Environment Canada released a report on the levels of dioxins and furans found in stream and marine deposits in the vicinity of 47 paper mills using chlorine bleaching agents. This report shows very clearly that Canadian paper manufacturing companies that use such an agent discharge these extremely toxic chemicals in the environment, in our rivers in particular Several of these pulp and paper industries are located in Quebec and in the Abitibi–Témiscamingue region, including Domtar in Lebel–sur–Quévillon and Tember in Témiscamingue.

So, Mr. Speaker, I urge the Minister of the Environment to put out regulations as soon as possible concerning these industries in order to eliminate dioxins and furans and put an end to this daily contamination of our environment, especially our rivers.

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, at this opportunity I rise to condemn Canada Post for continuing to turn its back on the needs of Canadians. Under the direction of this government, hundreds of rural communities are losing their post offices and post office boxes are being removed from outside senior citizens' residences. While the post office spends millions of dollars changing its uniforms and logos so as to remove any mention of Canada, hundreds of community newspapers have been forced out of business by increased postal rates.

Canada Post must have a goal to serve Canadians. The post office helped to build this country and bind it together. It is truly a shame that the words and concepts of service and of bringing Canadians together are no longer important to Canada Post or this government.

FISHERIES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, Northern Ocean Resources, a consortium of fish companies in Labrador, has asked the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for a 7,000 tonne allocation of cod and turbot off the Labrador coast. These companies, the largest of which are co–ops, represent all the fishermen and all the plant workers in Labrador. This allocation is urgently needed and absolutely essential to keep in operation the plants on which these people depend.

This is virtually a matter of economic life or death for the Labrador coast. These native people have lived there for centuries and their livelihood depends almost wholly and solely on fishing. They are closest to the resource, they have historic dependence and they have rights.

It would be the height of political immorality for the Government of Canada to grant fishing rights in that area to French ships while denying a quota to Labrador people. They desperately need, they unquestionably deserve, and they unequivocally demand their rightful share of offshore cod and turbot.

I trust the minister of fisheries will act with fairness and justice and say "yes" to the request. And as the season is fast approaching, he should do so immediately.

S.O. 31

CANADA POST

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that Canada Post is thinking of closing the Thorold post office.

It disturbs me that none of this was discussed with the workers or the union officials. The minister responsible has not come forward openly to my constituents to tell them of these plans. Why must this degenerate into a situation where my constituents must try to ascertain the facts from rumours and half truths only hinted at by local management? The hon. minister should be above such cloak and dagger methods.

I come to the point. My party and I are most adamantly opposed to such a move. The Thorold post office has been in operation for 40 years. The level of service has been exemplary. The workers have been able to provide many services that were not available to people in many larger communities. Here we are, faced again with the destruction of small town Canada, the backbone of this nation. We will have more centralization, higher prices, more line-ups and less service. This scenario is just not good enough for my constituents.

This move was attempted four years ago by this government. My constituents are as incensed now as they were then. I say again, do not close the Thorold post office.

REFUGEES

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, the region of Peel is breaking under the strain of providing welfare for the largest refugee population in all of Canada, and they are getting no relief from government.

Well over a dozen reports have been developed by the region and have been submitted to all levels of government requesting that a way be found to accelerate the process of refugee determination so that refugees may then have the freedom to seek work and support themselves.

Every year, the region finds the burden of providing welfare services a greater and near impossible responsibility. The region is justifiably confused. What is its obligation under the general welfare act to provide for an increasing number of refugees who must use overburdened welfare services to survive? More importantly, should the regional government have to pay while the government tries to improve the system?

I urge the government to work closely with the regions and the provinces to find a better solution now before the system becomes irreparable.

LABOUR RELATIONS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, an agreement was signed this week, with Premier Bourassa in attendance, by the management of the Korean company Sammi-Atlas and representatives from the CNTV to allow the investment of half a billion in Tracy, Quebec.

This special agreement could have major significance not only for labour relations, but also for the future of the Quebec economy.

Over the past several months, the Quebec Minister of Industry and Commerce, Gérald Tremblay, set out on a mission to convince people of the merits, benefits and necessity of a new social contract in Quebec.

The union approved a six-year collective agreement whereby in three years' time, only salaries will be on the table for negotiation avoiding the possibility of a strike or a lockout, while the company is committed to invest in manpower training and to set up a joint committee on training.

A big cheer for the people of Tracy!

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is carrying out a scorched earth policy against the CBC. He has finally shown his true disdain for our public broadcaster by appointing John Crispo to the CBC board of directors.

Mr. Crispo, as we know, has repeatedly shown his contempt for the CBC, and by his appointment can only hope to wreak further havoc.

All Canadians are threatened by this thoughtless and irresponsible decision which gives obvious preference to a Conservative supporter from central Canada.

Canadian media, officials and citizens have adamantly protested the recent cuts to the CBC. These people are now watching a continuing government vendetta to kill the CBC from the inside.

It is time that someone stops this barrage of hatred against our national institutions. It is time that this government provided the CBC with the money to do the job properly. And it is definitely time to remove John Crispo from the board that he was put on without any consultation.

NATIONAL GALLERY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, the meat dress at our National Gallery is placing our artistic community in the slaughterhouse.

Politicians across the country have been barbecued for acting like hot dogs over the dress, and have been the butt of some criticism on the matter. Newspaper columnists have turned critics of the steak apparel into hamburger and many have been roasted for daring to question the appropriateness of meat art.

The issue is not whether or not tainted meat on a hanger is art or simply beef jerky.

The average Canadian who is concerned about bringing home the bacon sees the sausages who run the National Gallery as living too high on the hog. While the gallery openly displays its rib-eyes, some Canadians in soup kitchens remain picking over the bones.

• (1410)

Mr. Speaker, the good book says that you cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear, but a Canadian artist has now proved that you can make a dress out of $300 worth of flank steak.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians should know that conflict of interest still exists. This government will just never learn. On March 5, Telesat Canada, a virtual Crown corporation with Canadian taxpayers as 52 per cent shareholders, filed a secret appeal asking cabinet to ride roughshod, by granting higher rates than the CRTC had granted.

So far, we have uncovered at least three cases of conflict; first, senior government officials are party to this appeal, as Telesat board members, while they also act supposedly as unbiased senior advisors to Cabinet. Second, in reviewing this appeal, the government could manipulate the value of Telesat shares to suit its announced privatization plan.

But it gets better. Third, Telesat has coincidentally, just days after filing its appeal, hired prominent Conservatives Bill Jarvis, former PC party president, Bill Fox, the PM's former press attaché, among others, to help persuade their former bosses, the cabinet, to up Telesat's rates.

Does the Prime Minister not recognize these glaring cases of conflict of interest? Will the Prime Minister end these conflicts today and have this review sent to a more appropriate forum, the CRTC or the Federal Court? In all decency, will the Prime Minister do just that?

CONSERVATIVE MEMBERS FROM QUEBEC

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, in 1981, the Liberal members from Quebec were called gutless and sheep. That is inaccurate and unfair to them. When you are a member of a Canadian caucus, your only option is to keep quiet. You must avoid shocking and disturbing the members from other provinces. The Conservatives from Quebec are in the same situation. Today I found a name for them: the quiet ones from Quebec in Ottawa. I say that without malice. The Conservatives from Quebec work hard. They are preparing all sorts of constitutional projects. But when the time comes to talk about them, they are very quiet. I admit that the Conservative members from Quebec have the right to say nothing, but I doubt that is an effective way to defend Quebec's interests in Ottawa.

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, fundamental to Canadian unity are the issues of language and culture.

French speaking Canadians believe that Canada is a sacred contract between two founding peoples, French and English. More and more English speaking Canadians believe that this concept fails to recognize the legitimate place of native Canadians and the growing number of Canadians whose heritage is neither French nor English.

Can we reconcile these dramatically differing points of view? I believe we can if we face reality; the reality of a country in which English speaking Canadians are concentrated outside Quebec but also live in Quebec; in which French speaking Canadians are concentrated in Quebec but also live elsewhere in Canada, and in which native Canadians and Canadians whose heritage is neither English nor French live everywhere in Canada.

This reality defines the fundamental characteristics of our country. The reality makes not one part, not each part, but rather our entire Canadian nation, a distinct society.

FORESTRY

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Forestry tabled the first annual report to Parliament on the state of forestry in Canada.

I found the report to be somewhat misleading. It leaves the reader with the impression that our forests are in good shape. I believe that the figures in the report understate the problems of reforestation. The report emphasizes the progress and the laudable efforts that have been made in the last 10 years but seems to have forgotten that some 220,000 hectares of harvested forest land has not been sufficiently restocked.

Even though the net growing volume of our forest capital increased by 2.5 per cent between 1976 and 1986, Canada's productive forest land has decreased by 4.7 million hectares an area almost the size of Prince Edward Island.

I recognize the minister's good intentions. Yet, I also sympathize with him for not having the budget to support the initiatives that should be taken today to ensure the sustainability of our forests. The fact remains that we still have a lot of work to do.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on our recent visit to the Baltic states and Moscow, our parliamentary delegation was assured by an advisor to President Gorbachev that negotiations with the Baltic states, which had been stalled for five months, would resume.

Five days ago the Soviet and the Lithuanian negotiation teams went back to the negotiation table. Yesterday morning in Lithuania, Soviet troops moved in and began the occupation of a driving school, part of which was being used to house the national defence department of the democratically elected Lithuanian government in Vilnius.

This is not negotiation in good faith. The international community must not sit idly by while intimidation tactics are used and the rights of a democratically elected government are being violated.

MEMBER FOR VERDUN—SAINT-PAUL

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon in this Chamber we all heard the words of the hon. member from Verdun—Saint-Paul as he informed us he was leaving the Bloc Quebecois to rejoin the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada.

As an English speaking Canadian member of this House, I rise to salute the courage of the member in this most difficult decision. I rise to thank him. These kinds of actions by this kind of person will, in the end, help us save Canada.

All of us in this House, outside of the remaining few dwindling members of the separatist Bloc Quebecois, stand for a united, free and strong Canada.

ORAL QUESTIONS

[English]

DE HAVILLAND

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In 1985, this government said it sold de Havilland of Toronto to Boeing for $90 million. In fact, by the time the deal was completed, Boeing got de Havilland free, plus $60 million in cash. We said then it was a bad deal and we still believe it was a bad deal.

Boeing has now announced it has sold de Havilland to companies controlled by the governments of Italy and France.

Will the Prime Minister tell us what action he is taking to prevent a bad deal for Canada from becoming a disaster for Canada? Can he assure us that these high technology jobs will be kept for the workers of Canada?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, obviously I will not start today by discussing the figures mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition because it would be very easy to contradict what he said. I just want to say that Aerospatiale in France and Alenia from Italy have reached an agreement with Boeing. We will be made aware of any proposal that is submitted to Investment Canada and at that time will apply the appropriate rules governing such a transaction. We will then be in a position to comment on something which is not at the present time a reality.

I would ask the Leader of the Opposition to just follow the rules of Investment Canada and wait for the proposal.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would tell the minister that we want action immediately, not to wait until all is lost before being able to ask questions. He knows very well that transportation and aviation are important industries for the Canadian economy, especially for the province of Quebec. He should also know that dozens and dozens of companies sell goods and services to de Havilland in Toronto. So can the minister seriously tell us that he believes that the governments of France and Italy will give priority to Canadians' jobs instead of taking those jobs back to Europe?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am always pleased and eager to follow up the comments of the Leader of the Opposition when he talks about the aerospace industry in Quebec. Canadair is another company privatized by the Conservative government and its president could assure the Leader of the Opposition that it is a wonderful success for Quebec.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): And, Mr. Speaker, can we overlook the announcement of $300 million for the Canadian Space Agency in Saint-Hubert—but the opposition leader must know that, despite his impatience, governments must work within the rules. And the rules say that companies acquiring a Canadian company must make an official application to Investment Canada. I tell him that once the official application is made and the company's business plan is submitted, we will be able to deal with the issue coherently and logically. Until then, you can frighten people as you are in the habit of doing, but that is not how we solve problems.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to answer the hon. minister that when the private sector let de Havilland and Canadair down and I was President of the Treasury Board, we were forced to take those companies back.

• (1420)

[English]

Now the same thing is about to happen. The private sector will cream the companies. They will go and the government in Canada will have to take these companies back. I think it is ludicrous for the minister to get up in this House today and tell Canadians that it will be the Government of France and the Government of Italy that keep high technology jobs in Canada.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, we know the former government took over a lot of Canadian companies, but Canadians know of the disasters as well. They remember. We do not have to explain to Canadians what it means when the Liberal Party leads Canada in terms of the economy. They know the disaster very well.

I will repeat what I said. You can start a fear-mongering campaign in Canada. That is not what we say. We say: "Let us have a proposal. We will look at the proposal, and don't worry, we know how to manage Investment Canada."

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, let us look at our record. Canadians have invested over $1 billion in the Dash-8 program and now the governments of Italy and France want to acquire de Havilland in order to enhance their own aerospace programs. What is more, on March 8 of this year the minister for industry said that he was prepared to consider financial assistance to those two governments to help them acquire de Havilland.

Some hon. members: What?

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, is it not time that this government stood up for Canadian industry and Canadian workers in the same way that the French and Italian governments stand up for theirs?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend makes an interesting point and perhaps a very significant one about the role of these governments with regard to possible employment opportunities in Ontario, very important and very significant. It had not come up, but I can tell him now that the Government of Canada would entertain very seriously an offer from the Government of Ontario to take over the de Havilland operations.

An hon. member: What a mean spirited answer.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, just look at what will happen when the French and Italian governments are the new owners of de Havilland. They will have to choose between production of the ATR series, their own aircraft, or the Dash-8 of de Havilland. They will have to choose between jobs for French and Italian workers or jobs for the 4,900 de Havilland workers at Downsview. They will have to choose between Italian and French suppliers or the 85 Canadian suppliers of de Havilland.

There is no quicker way to ruin de Havilland than to sell it off to our major international competitor. We ask the government today to say no to this, the worst of all business deals for Canada.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I said in my first answer, and I repeat, there is no proposal yet by Alenia or by Aerospatiale.

As soon as it is received, Investment Canada will consider the business plan. Of course, we can do what they do. We can try to get the feeling of people in Ontario to determine the future of de Havilland.

As a minister, I prefer to be coherent. I put the rules of Investment Canada, and I want to respect them. There will be a proposal and we will consider it. Then we will give the answer. Is this not coherent?

OPEN SKIES

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Tomorrow, the minister and U.S. Transport Secretary Skinner will begin renegotiating the Canada-U.S. bilateral air agreement. The minister knows that there is strong support for improving that agreement, except for the "c" word cabotage which gives American carriers the right to compete for Canadian traffic within Canada.

Will the minister remove the threat to the Canadian airline industry and take cabotage off the table tomorrow?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I suggested yesterday to a group of industry and labour representatives, Open Skies is part of a solution and not part of a problem.

I said at that time that there is a great temptation in troubled times to try to hide away from competition. That is not the way we can expand our airline industry.

We are going into these negotiations in an effort to expand our airline industry, and we intend to do that.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in his speech, the minister used the unanimous report of the Special Committee on Transport to support his position.

In making a decision to include full cabotage on the table, the minister blatantly ignored the same committee's view which said that if the mega-American carriers were given cabotage rights, it would devastate our airline industry. We do not think that American carriers should be given cabotage rights under a new agreement.

I ask the minister again: Will he take cabotage off the table?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend would agree that there has been perhaps a slip in the words.

My hon. friend refers to the parliamentary report. I would refer him to the place where he says that the report makes an observation. The status quo is not acceptable.

The report makes another observation. We would encourage our negotiating team to explore the feasibility of obtaining exclusive cabotage rights for our Canadian carriers.

We are in these negotiations to get a better deal for Canadian consumers, a better deal for Canadian communities and more opportunities for our airlines. We intend to do that.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

The minister does not seem to understand that there is a difference between cabotage for Canadian carriers and across the board cabotage which would allow the Americans to not only compete head on head, but would eliminate the Canadian industry.

Given this government's record in the transportation sector, whether it is marine, shipbuilding, air or road, it has systematically destroyed our infrastructure. When is the minister going to finally stand up and fight on behalf of the Canadian industry instead of working for a better deal for the Americans and the Europeans?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): To my friend of the status quo, I would say this.

First of all, if we understand the situation, cabotage is a red herring. The real issue here is improved access: slots, gates and preclearance. The full issue has to be examined.

I said to my friend: We are in these negotiations to get a better deal. Any time I ever got involved in negotiations, I did not take anything off the table before I got in the room.

DE HAVILLAND

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

I would like to recall to him his words when he blessed the fire sale of de Havilland to Boeing more than five years ago. I quote: "What we are doing today is saving de Havilland and securing jobs for de Havilland workers. There will not be fewer jobs, but more jobs."

According to the union officials today, the direct result of this decision to consummate a new sale will be the loss of 1,700 jobs in Toronto alone.

• (1430)

Instead of hiding behind the guise of Investment Canada, which has never taken its responsibilities over the last six years seriously, will the Prime Minister today send a message that this sale will not be sanctioned, that he will have the courage to stop this sale?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology has laid out for the Leader of the Opposition the requirements that one must follow in seeking to deal with the problem that is raised.

There are rules and regulations that follow from the Investment Canada Act, all of which must be respected in considering this matter, and that is what the minister is in the process of doing.

I point out to my hon. friend, since she refers to a statement made in the House some five years ago, that at the time the company was in financial difficulty. Since Boeing took over it has invested some $1 billion, I believe, of new money in the company. The number of jobs was increased to 4,600, I believe, from 3,600. So, the experience that was opposed by the Liberals at the time was not unfavourable for the workers of Toronto. Their jobs concern us a great deal.

I do not think that the jobs of workers in Ontario or elsewhere are helped by a xenophobic attack on foreign investment, because Canada needs foreign investment across Canada, from Atlantic Canada to British Columbia. We are going to invite foreign investment and create national investment rather than put up borrowed taxpayers' money across Canada.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the difference between the Liberal Party and the Progressive Conservative Party is that we have a policy on the Canadian aviation industry. You don't get it. It is certainly not France or Italy that will guarantee jobs for Canadians; it is up to the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada. So I again ask him: Is he prepared to meet his responsibilities and announce today that he will block a sale that, to begin with, will cost 1,700 jobs across Canada and result in even greater losses in Montreal and other Canadian cities? Is he prepared to block the sale?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should not get excited. The Minister of Industry, Science and Technology has just explained that there is a specific procedure to be followed. The hon. member tells me it is a question of philosophy. She may be right. I told one of her colleagues that the government would not be averse to receiving an offer in such a circumstance from the Government of Ontario, for example, or a Canadian consortium. On the contrary, we would like that. For now, proposals have come from international investors. Is the position of the Liberal Party that we must refuse offers because they come from foreign countries?

Oh, that is interesting! Say no offers made by a foreign government! Say no to foreigners and add to the debt!

Ms. Copps: Say yes to Canada!

Mr. Mulroney: She says, "Say yes to Canada." I can tell you that faced with the choice of free competition and international investments that will guarantee jobs in Toronto and elsewhere and charging it all to the national debt, we will chose private international investment.

OPEN SKIES

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport who tomorrow will begin the Open Skies negotiations with the United States.

The minister knows that our two major airlines are facing severe economic problems and that our fragile Canadian air industry has recently experienced over 4,000 job losses and many other lay-offs are imminent. Will the minister assure this House that in any deal with the Americans the Canadian bottom line will not be to grant the giant American air carriers cabotage so that we can protect our own Canadian jobs, our own Canadian airlines, and protect and advance the sovereignty of our own Canadian industry?

Will he give us this undertaking on the eve of these important negotiations?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): The undertaking that I gave the airlines, which I have reiterated time and time again in public, is that there will be no deal unless it is a good deal for Canadians; for Canadian consumers, for Canadian communities, and for Canadian airlines. I have every confidence in our negotiators. I have every confidence that as the negotiations unfold they will strike that good deal. I have that confidence. You have my assurance.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, this is dejà vu. That is what they told us before the free trade agreement and they obtained a deal at any cost, and the cost is now being paid by thousands of displaced Canadians after you, sir, said we were going to have the greatest displacement program the world has known.

Given that Canadian Airlines does not want cabotage, Air Canada is conditional on it, the all-party agreement including Tories had universally rejected it, and our industry fears it, what interest, and whose interest, is the minister pushing by pursuing cabotage? And why is this government so bent on getting any deal at any cost?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend referred to dejà vu. It is dejà vu all right. The Liberals were afraid to compete under free trade. We are not. The Liberals were afraid to compete under a new bilateral agreement, we are not. Neither are the Canadian airlines.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

HEALTH

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health. U.S. Food and Drug Administration researchers have found significant amounts of a cancer-causing chemical in the Meme breast implant. The researchers were so surprised at how much of the chemical 2-4 toluene diamine was released by the implant's foam covering when it decomposed that they repeated the testing and found equally large amounts of the chemical.

Will the minister finally give women of Canada a commitment, since one in 10 already faces breast cancer without having the additional risk of dangerous implants on the market, that in light of this research he will take the Meme breast implant off the market?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I assume that the hon. member's question comes from the article in today's Montreal Gazette.

The department has not had the opportunity as yet of studying the American report. I do not know whether the hon. member has. If she has not, she is recommending that we take the device off the market before we have had a chance to study the evidence, while it remains on the market in the United States. The FDA has left it on the market.

We do not proceed in that fashion. What we do instead is to ask for the evidence, which we have done, and to ensure that we have the opportunity ourselves to analyse that evidence. If any of the evidence indicates there is a threat to the health of Canadian women, we will take such a device off the market, which has been our policy since the outset.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it is nice to know that the government is not prepared to any longer be the wagon on the train.

Will the minister give us a time-line on how quickly it will come off the market? Once he has the evidence and has looked at this report, will he give us his commitment that women who have been the victims of the Meme implant will be warned about the dangers of the implant, as well as having it withdrawn, and will he give us a commitment that proper testing will be done on all implants?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to respond to the hon. member's three questions.

The fundamental issue here is whether she believes as we do that before you pick a date for pulling the implant off the market, you should see the evidence and make a judgment based on the facts.

If the hon. member is so convinced that this evidence has been in place for a long time, why has the FDA left the device on the market? Both in the United States and in Canada a review is being done of all implants that are on the market. The position remains the same. If any evidence comes forward related to any implant on the market that represents a threat to the health of Canadian women, it will be taken off the market.

• (1440)

The difference between the hon. member and members on this side is that we believe we have an obligation to see the evidence first, not simply to act first and then look for the evidence afterward.

REFUGEES

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The human tragedy of the Kurds is worsening by the hour. Indeed as we speak some will die.

Iraq has already stated unequivocally that it will oppose any UN protected enclaves for the Kurds. Time is running out. The countries of the world must respond now in a humanitarian and compassionate manner.

Will the minister respond to the request of the Turkish government and the pleas of the Kurds that Canada, in concert with other countries, accept as refugees some of our fellow human beings whose lives hang in the balance?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this House and this country are shocked by events in Iraq and are very much preoccupied with the situation of the Kurds.

We all recognize that the most effective solution to this tragedy would be for the attacks to stop and for there to be some sense of security among Kurds so that they could return to the land that was traditionally theirs and live there in peace and security.

What we have been doing has been first of all to send financial assistance. I am pleased to announce today that we are prepared to increase financial assistance through UNICEF and other international organizations to those areas on the border between Iraq and Iran where there is also a crisis.

The other dimension of our response at the moment upon which we are focusing is to take account of the problems that exist with the proposal put forward by the European Community for an enclave. That may not prove acceptable.

For that reason, Canada beginning last Saturday was putting forward an alternative proposal, the details of which I outlined to the House yesterday and which I discussed yesterday afternoon with the Secretary–General of the United Nations.

We hope that proposal by Canada, that alternative Canadian proposal, may contribute to a UN presence that would both co–ordinate the delivery of assistance much more reliably and provide some sense of security as to the fate of the Kurds in the region.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. I am sure everybody in this House wishes that the problem will be solved as quickly as possible. In the meantime, while the government is considering its options, men, women and children particularly are dying.

Long–standing Canadian tradition has been to meet our responsibilities as a global citizen and accept people from around the world who are suffering personal physical torment. Canada's past response to the plight of the Vietnamese after the fall of Saigon offers a good example.

While the minister is considering these various other options, will he assure the House that this request of the President of Turkey that countries around the world accept refugees will be considered on an urgent basis so that Canada can take a leading role immediately in rescuing people from certain death?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the question certainly reflects the urgency the government feels around responding to the situation that exists with the Kurds.

We have certainly actively looked at the possibility of assisting through some refugee program. At the moment I would regard the situation as being volatile for determining what the final outcome may be.

It is certainly our intention to be in touch with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. I know that anything that will be done will have to be co–ordinated on an international scale. As I said yesterday I am not ruling anything in, but I am not ruling anything out either. We certainly are actively looking at this matter.

PETRO–CANADA

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of energy. It relates to the matters which led to the resignation of Premier Vander Zalm.

Bill Hopper, chairman of Petro–Canada, told the Hughes commission in B.C. of his dealings with Premier Vander Zalm, and I quote: "a premier of a province demands some attention" and further that the premier's involvement "helped open the door for" the purchasers with respect to the Fantasy Gardens Petro–Canada lot.

Will he tell the House if there are federal guidelines dealing with the sale of public assets by Crown corporations and if they were applied in this case?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, Petro–Canada operates as a commercial interest. That is the manner in which its mandate is fulfilled.

I simply point out to the hon. member that in an article in The Vancouver Sun of April 4 it is indicated that federal Liberal energy critic David Kilgour said Hopper couldn't be blamed for taking the call from Vander Zalm.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): The minister should realize, Mr. Speaker, as he has also said to The Vancouver Sun, that he holds the only share in Petro-Canada as a trustee for the Canadian people.

Mr. Hopper has blatantly refused to talk to anybody since the report came down from Mr. Hughes. Will he, as the trustee for the Canadian people, ask the chief executive officer of Petro-Canada to come clean on this statement so that we can all know what, if anything, is the explanation?

While he is answering that question, will he tell us if he thinks this sale was closed for political reasons and not for commercial reasons?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I take what the hon. member says seriously. In fact on February 27, the NDP member for Port Moody—Coquitlam rose on a point of order and attempted to ask about this issue. He was not able to proceed with it further.

However, immediately upon that point being made in the House, I contacted Mr. Hopper and I asked for the full details. They are also in the Hughes report, as the hon. member will know. I can only refer to the Hughes report on page 49 where Mr. Hughes writes: "Nor would I presume to conclude that if Petro-Canada did provide this first right of refusal to the premier that it was necessarily improper".

DE HAVILLAND

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology who, in responding to questions about what the government intends to do about the sale of de Havilland to the European consortium, says: "Just wait and we will see Investment Canada does".

In view of the state of deindustrialization of Ontario already with massive job losses and the prospect that 1,700 jobs will almost certainly be lost as a result of this acquisition, and in view of the loss of technology in research and development that will occur as a result of this sale, does the government not think it should now state its clear position that it will not allow any further deindustrialization, any further loss of jobs, any further loss of research and development?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I hope the member from Windsor is not going to ask me not to apply the rule. We are all worried about the industrial problems in Ontario and in all parts of the country. However, when there is a proposal, particularly by a foreign company or companies like Alenia and Aerospatiale, it is the rule to make the proposal to Investment Canada. It is what we do. When the proposal is made we have 45 days to analyse the proposal, give an answer and maybe an extension of time if it is necessary.

I believe the member will agree with me that in that kind of proposal which involves one of the most important aerospace industries in Canada we have to apply the law. We have to consider the way in which we can deal the best with that company. I would be surprised if the member does not agree with that.

• (1450)

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I would agree with the minister if the minister would at all indicate what is his intention as a minister of the government to do.

My question to him is rather simple. Does he not agree that it is a responsibility of this government? By the way this is not a sale to companies; it is a sale to governments. Does he not agree that there should be applied conditions that will ensure the preservation of research and development, of engineering and design, of jobs and of the construction of whole airplanes rather than parts for a competing airplane already produced by those two companies?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the first responsibility of any government is to respect the law it makes. It is the first responsibility.

We put forward Investment Canada to replace the very sick FIRA that we had before, put forward by the Liberal government. Investment Canada, unlike what is said by the member for Hamilton East, works very well and gives the services we expect from that kind of organization.

I say to the member that there is no way that the government will interfere in a process which consists of providing a proposal to Investment Canada. It is the process, and it is the process I will follow as minister responsible for Investment Canada.

Oral Questions

LAND CLAIMS

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The aboriginal peoples in Canada have had their native communications program squashed, their organizational core funding threatened, their land use planning programs scrapped and their social assistance for off reserve Indians threatened, all due of course to economic restraint and this government's budgetary butcher block.

How then does this government have the audacity to justify and extend the very juicy $152,000 contract with Bernard Roy, a negotiator for the Oka land deal?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member, I would like to point out that the budget of this government introduced a few weeks ago showed a $200 million increase to the program support for aboriginal people, an increase of over 8 per cent at a time when all government department's are being held to a 3 per cent increase.

Second, that is not to mention the several hundred million dollars of additional new initiatives committed in the native agenda which the Prime Minister unveiled in this House last September 25. Many of those initiatives have already been announced and further are to be announced in the coming days.

Third, there have been dozens and dozens of agreements on land claims and new capital infrastructure in the native communities across Canada that I and my colleague, the minister of state, have signed in recent months. The premise on which the member's question is based is faulty.

In regard to Mr. Roy, the billings to the end of the past fiscal year were $33,000. He concluded the signing of a framework agreement with the Kanesatake community in February and continues very important work to secure a lasting settlement of the land issues at Kanesatake.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it does not matter how this government throws money at the aboriginal problem, until this Prime Minister meets with the leadership of the aboriginal community. The Prime Minister has met once with Georges Erasmus in six and a half years.

The Ottawa Citizen quotes Mr. Roy's lucrative contract as including $4,000 for hospitality and $15,000 for travel. It is only half an hour from Oka to Montreal, and the average income for an aboriginal female is between $12,000 and $15,000 a year. With administrative costs of $9,000, how can the government allow Mr. Roy to profit so extravagantly over only an eight-month period and this problem has yet to be resolved?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that my friend said in her original question that we were not doing enough financially to assist the aboriginal people, and when the minister responded with indications of what we are doing, my hon. friend said money was not what she was talking about. Now the implication is that there is something improper with Mr. Bernard Roy—

Ms. Blondin: Well, no. He is your friend.

Mr. Mulroney: Well indeed—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps members would want the Right Hon. Prime Minister to be able to complete his answer.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, now I understand why my hon. friend raised the question; not because Mr. Roy is unqualified—because he is one of the most distinguished members of the bar of the province of Quebec and one of the leading barristers—but because he is my friend.

Well, fine, that is true. So is the Leader of the Opposition. We have had friendly oppositions, and he has had a lot to do in representing aboriginal people. I have never once questioned the large fees received by the Leader of the Opposition, because I am sure he was worth every nickel of it

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

REVENUE CANADA

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, we are now in the fourth month since the GST came into effect. The government made a pledge that the new tax system would be fairer, especially to small business people, through the removal of the old federal sales tax. However, some of these business people are wondering what went wrong.

My question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Why has it taken in some cases more than 90 days for tax rebates for the old FST to be issued on inventory these businesses had when the GST took effect? Can the minister assure this House that in a time of recession and intense competition he is doing all he can to help these cash strapped businesses?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that the change to the GST itself is going to bring better cash flow opportunities to the majority of Canadian businesses, plus make them more competitive.

However, in as far as the federal sales tax rebates on inventory are concerned, as I have stated in the past we have experienced some problems in some areas, the automotive industry being one, for the very simple reason that in some instances inadvertently manufacturers, dealers and distributors send in claims for the same vehicles.

Of course we are not going to send out money blindly. We have to take the advice of the Auditor General and check it very carefully. We have streamlined the operations, and now I am happy to report that as of the end of last month some 75,000 claims for over $1.5 billion have been sent out. The majority of businesses now are receiving the claims within the 21-day prescribed period.

DE HAVILLAND

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, in answering questions on the sale of de Havilland, said that the first responsibility of the government is to follow the law very carefully.

During the course of Question Period the Prime Minister said to members on this side, across the floor, that "we", the government, "have no intention of turning down this sale".

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has already made up its mind that de Havilland is to be sold to ATR, a company controlled by the Governments of France and Italy. Yes or no.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I see my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, agreeing with the statement. He was not in the House when it was made and neither was the member who has just raised the question, I believe.

The statement I made in response to a very unusual situation that occurred, namely some heckling from the member for Hamilton East—it was so unusual that I was shocked into a response— was that the Government of Canada had no intention of frivolously turning down foreign investment that is coming into Canada.

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker, I went further. I said we are entertaining a possible investment of $100 million that foreigners want to invest in Hamilton, Ontario, and I plan to encourage it.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. To be perfectly clear, is the Prime Minister of Canada telling the workers at de Havilland, the people in the aerospace industry in Canada that it is the intention of the Government of Canada to transfer that industry, in particular de Havilland, into the hands of de Havilland's major competitor, thereby losing high-tech jobs in Canada. Is that what he is telling the House today?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that I said no such thing. I said no such thing, directly or indirectly. He knows that.

What the minister has pointed out is that when this government came in we abolished FIRA, which we thought was sending out anti-investment signals around the world. We believed that foreign capital was needed in Atlantic Canada, in Newfoundland, for example, to help us develop Hibernia. A vast amount of foreign capital is needed.

I want to tell my hon. friend that in Ontario and in Newfoundland, when a foreigner wants to come in and invest capital in Newfoundland to create jobs in Newfoundland, if he follows the rules, we are going to give him the benefit of the doubt. The rules of Investment Canada are there, and we believe those rules are going to benefit the workers in Ontario. We care very much about the impact on the workers in the aerospace industry in Toronto and in Montreal, and we plan to work very hard to make sure they are protected.

MINING

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

The Canada-Quebec Mineral Development Agreement expired in 1990. This agreement met effectively the objectives that were set by the Mulroney and Bourassa governments, but much more needs to be done in mining research and development in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this: Will the minister confirm today that discussions are ongoing with the Quebec government to renew this Canada-Quebec agreement to support the Quebec mining industry?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Well, this is an excellent question, Mr. Speaker.

I can confirm to the hon. member for Abitibi that the sectorial agreements with Quebec have indeed expired in March 1991. We are now exploring an agreement with the Quebec government, but resources are extremely scarce.

We have already explore the ground regarding the forest industry, as I mentioned earlier. We are looking at the possibilities, Mr. Speaker, and, depending on the outcome of our discussions with the Quebec government, we may eventually come to some form of agreement regarding the mining industry as well.

POINT OF ORDER

DECORUM IN CHAMBER

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have a growing concern with respect to the lack of decorum shown by members in the House of Commons, particularly members who have some previous federal experience.

I happened to view quite by chance Monday evening, while some 2,000 miles away, a speech given by the Liberal House leader, the member from Cape Breton—East Richmond. During his discourse I viewed a most obscene gesture made by him, a gesture no doubt that he felt would help make his point. I believe, Mr. Speaker, this occurred at about 5.34 p.m. on Monday. I found his gesture to be demeaning. It was an anti-feminist gesture. As a result, I find it repugnant, insensitive and cruel. As a Canadian and member of Parliament, Mr. Speaker, I would urge you to review the video of Monday's proceedings and see if you agree.

I have witnessed as well another member yelling profanities in this Chamber. The Speaker at that time ignored these off-microphone comments. In this particular circumstance, the member returned to apologize. Prior to this, another member refused to take his place when called on by the Speaker. Again off-microphone the member berated the Speaker as well as members in the House.

Mr. Speaker, it is my respectful opinion that if members continue to resort to sensationalism to make headlines, this Chamber may soon become uncontrollable. I sincerely urge your intervention in this matter. Mr. Speaker, is it any wonder that the public is withdrawing its respect for politicians when politicians themselves have no respect for one another.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member, as well as other hon. members, knows there was no intention with that particular gesture to in any way make reference to any sexism whatsoever. If it offends hon. members, including the one who has spoken, I wish to withdraw.

TABLING OF 1990 ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, in my capacity as Acting Minister of State for Housing, pursuant to Standing Order 32(1), I have the honour to present, in both official languages, copies of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation's 1990 annual report.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

TABLING OF REPORTS

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), on behalf of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, copies of a report entitled Report to Parliamentary Committee on the Exclusions to the Workplace Hazardous Materials and a report entitled Report of the Senior Advisory Committee.

PETITIONS

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions I would like to table today.

The first petition is from a large number of my constituents and calls on the government to further strengthen, rather than continue to cut, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, noting that the CBC provides a very important service to unity in Canada.

RAIN FORESTS

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Second, while I am on my feet, I would like to present a petition in which the signatories, again from Ottawa South, call upon the Government of Canada to develop policies which would ensure that Canadian funds not flow into the destruction of rain forests in Brazil and other countries which have tropical rain forests.

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my final petition is signed by a number of my constituents and calls on the House of Commons to express its lack of confidence in the government; a sentiment which I share wholeheartedly.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by several hundred of my constituents who claim that the government has cut CBC funding by $140 million over the next four years, resulting in 1,200 job losses and the closing of 10 regional stations.

My constituents urge the government to restore proper funding to the CBC so it can fulfil its mandate and role as the heartbeat of Canada.

CANADA POST

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present a petition calling upon the Parliament of Canada to review the downsizing of Ridgeway post office in Coquitlam, British Columbia.

It is truly extraordinary. There are 1,800 or so signatures on this petition. It was gathered by Eileen Cassidy, who put a great deal of work into getting this petition.

The petition outlines the decline in service because of privatization and so on. I just want to read one clause, then I will finish with this. "Whereas having the postal service as a department of the federal government provides a link between the various areas of Canada and a needed boost to Canadian unity".

That is only one small post office, but a symbol of what this government is doing to Canadian unity and to services in Canada.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege to present two petitions signed by hundreds of people from my riding and adjacent ridings, protesting the discriminatory practices of Immigration as it pertains to people coming from India, particularly from the Punjab.

• (1510)

This petition points out that 85 per cent of the people seeking service in New Delhi are from the Punjab. It is difficult to travel from the Punjab to New Delhi and in some cases, it is dangerous.

The petitioners are requesting that the Canadian government establish a new Canadian consulate and immigration office in the Punjab to provide service.

The second petition points out that it now takes three to six years for a person from the Punjab to bring his or her spouse to Canada. The petitioners are calling on the government to establish a system where in a bona fide marriage a person may bring his or her spouse immediately, pending the processing of landed immigration applications.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition on behalf of a number of farmers from Saskatchewan who are very concerned with what this government is doing with the orderly marketing system in this country, namely the Canadian Wheat Board.

The petitioners are very concerned that oats have been removed from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. They call upon this government to place oats under the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board and to give oats and barley the same protection under the Canadian Wheat Board that wheat now has.

That would mean that neither oats, barley nor wheat could be removed without Parliament deciding they should be removed and without proper consultation with the producers in western Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Could I have unanimous consent to revert back to Presenting Reports from Committees?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

FINANCE

REVISED 11TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the revised 11th report of the Standing Committee on Finance in relation to Bill C–83, an act to revise and amend the law governing federal loan and trust companies and to provide for related and consequential matters.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENTS TO STANDING ORDERS

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 19027) and amendment of Mr. Dingwall (p. 19156).

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to speak on the Conservative government's proposals to change the rules of the House, I cannot help but reflect on the tremendous contrast between the spirit and tenor of these proposals and the spirit and tenor of the McGrath report on parliamentary reform which was tabled in this House in 1985.

Let us, for a moment, cast our minds back to 1984–85. We had a newly-elected government, bright-eyed and bushy-tailed may I say, trying to figure out what it could do to enhance the role of Parliament and private members of Parliament. The government struck a committee chaired by the member from Newfoundland, Jim McGrath, which came up with a series of proposals.

The committee was concerned about a lack of confidence in the House of Commons which it referred to as our central democratic institution. In its report tabled in 1985, it said: "We must strengthen the role of the House of Commons, and the key to restoring confidence in our central democratic institution is to enhance the involvement of the private member of Parliament in a number of areas."

That was the spirit which prevailed in 1985. Today, in 1991, some six years later, the government is in its second mandate. It has reached historic lows in the public esteem. I get the distinct impression from the Conservative government's proposals that its principal concern today is not to enhance Parliament, not to enhance the role of the private member of Parliament, but to diminish Parliament, to reduce the role of Parliament in our system of government. The Conservative government's proposal would reduce by 40 the number of sitting days in a year, from 175 to 135. This would reduce the number of Question Periods by 40 during the year. The number of opposition days, the days on which the opposition can choose the subject of debate in this House, would be reduced by five. The budget debate and the throne speech debate would be reduced by two days.

As I see it, these changes will strike at the very foundations of parliamentary democracy. I would like to explain what I mean. From an early age most Canadians learn that we live in a parliamentary democracy modelled after the British system. The distinguishing feature of a parliamentary democracy is that government is accountable to Parliament. One of the principal means by which this is done is through Question Period. It is the occasion par excellence for members of the opposition to question the government about its policies and administration. It is through Question Period that an opposition can uncover weaknesses in government policy, or contradictions between cabinet ministers, and where cabinet ministers must respond for their administration of their departments.

We can all remember occasions where governments have been defeated after having their failings exposed during Question Period. That is how important Question Period is to our system.

What often makes Question Period so effective is its unforgiving nature. Day after day the Prime Minister and the members of the cabinet are required to be in the House of Commons and answer questions. When a government is on the ropes, when a minister is under attack, there is no avoiding Question Period.

Yet the Conservative proposal to change the rules of this House will do precisely that. It will allow the government to avoid Question Period by providing for one week off in every four. It is not difficult to imagine circumstances where this week off will allow a government to regroup or will allow a minister to regain his or her composure, to better prepare his or her responses, if the government and if the minister have been coming under heavy fire. It will allow the government or a minister to save his or her skin. That is what having one week off in every four will do.

I can remember in my few years in this House a number of occasions, whether one wants to refer to some of the unfortunate episodes where cabinet ministers of this Conservative government were forced to resign; or to episodes prior to the 1984 election where the Minister of National Revenue in our government, the Liberal government, came under fire for certain practices of Revenue Canada at that time. Cabinet ministers would have loved to have been able to get out of this House and to get away from the lights and the questioning during Question Period. That is exactly what these rule changes will allow a minister to do.

I do not think it is overstating the effect of this change to say that the Conservatives will be undermining one of the principal foundations of parliamentary democracy, namely the accountability of government to Parliament.

• (1520)

The Conservatives also propose to reduce the number of days on which the opposition can choose the subject of debate.

[Translation]

To explain the importance of so-called opposition days, I would like to go over some features of our parliamentary system.

In a parliamentary system, it is the government's responsibility to present a legislative agenda. This distinguishes our system from the American one, where bills are sponsored by members of Congress themselves.

Those who follow the sittings of this House on television often see the words "Government Orders" followed by the name of the bill in question at the bottom of the screen. That means that the House is debating a government bill. That is the general rule. The government determines what is debated by this House. Only exceptionally does the opposition set the agenda for the House.

At present, the Standing Orders of the House allow the opposition about 25 days a year, but the government proposes reducing this to 20. Opposition days enable a member in co-operation with his party to choose a subject of interest to the riding he represents, a particular region of the country or specific groups. For example, these opposition days have given us the opportunity to deal with issues concerning people in the Atlantic, the West, fishermen, farmers or education, to give only a few examples.

Mr. Speaker, you well know my interest in issues related to science and technology. You also know that science and technology hardly receive the attention they deserve. Many experts attribute this lack to the fact that we have been unable to develop a scientific culture in Canada; that is a culture that favours science, education, knowledge and the development of our human resources.

The reason is clear. Because we are very rich in natural resources, we were never forced to develop this scientific culture. In short, education and research are not priorities if we can always cut another tree or dig or export more oil to solve our balance of payments.

Several times in recent years, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party has used opposition days to raise issues of science and technology. These opposition days have made it possible for us in the opposition to ensure that the House deals with these important questions. On March 14, 1991, I presented a motion to remind Canadians of the Prime Minister's promise to double Canadian spending for research and development.

Mr. Speaker, we had a good debate that day. Many members told me that they appreciated the opportunity to deal with these issues. Also, I received many calls and letters from Canadians who share my interest for these matters. They told me that they also appreciated the debate.

Nevertheless, the government wants to reduce the number of opposition days, Mr. Speaker. This means that the opposition will have less opportunity to choose the questions to debate and these issues would not be raised if we had to depend on the government.

[English]

Similarly, the Conservative government's proposal will reduce the throne speech debate by two days and the budget debate for two days. Canadians who are not members of Parliament may not know that it is not always easy to participate in a budget debate. There is always a long list of members who wish to speak and there is often not enough time for all members to do so.

Reducing the length of the budget debate by two days will of course mean that far fewer members of Parliament will be able to participate in the debate. And what is more important to our constituents than the budget?

I cannot figure it out. I thought that my primary role as a member of Parliament was to come here to Ottawa to this House of Commons and try to articulate the views and needs of my constituents in debate. I was to question the government and hold it accountable in debates. Yet, with the Conservative government's proposal, fewer members of Parliement will have the opportunity to ask questions or to intervene in debates.

The Minister of Finance, who is sitting opposite, just asked me how I will find out what is on the minds of my constituents if we do not have more time away from this House. Well, I can answer the Minister of Finance that I do not need more time off to find out the views of my constituents on the various subjects on which I speak in this House. I have plenty of time under the current arrangements to be in my constituency, to meet with constituents in my constituency office, to organize public meetings, to send out questionnaires. There are many resources at our disposal.

I do know that it is often difficult to participate in debate in this House because the occasion is not provided under the rules of the House or because there is a shortage of time. What the government proposes to do is shorten further the time available for members of Parliament to participate in various debates such as that on the budget as I have just explained.

I want to end where I began my comments by referring to the recommendations of the McGrath report of 1985. The authors, all members of Parliament who were elected to this House in the 1984 general election, some new members and some experienced members, were all concerned with restoring confidence in the House of Commons. The key to it, they said, was to enhance the involvement of the private member of Parliament.

The Conservative government has come a long way since 1985 and is now in stark contrast to the recommendations of the McGrath report which indeed sought to enhance the involvement of the private member of Parliament and did so in a number of ways such as increased powers for committees, and rules which permitted private members' bills to come forward for debate in this House in a much more expeditious fashion. That was the spirit that prevailed in 1985, enhancing the role of the private member of Parliament.

Today, a scant six years later, the Conservative government is proposing changes to the rules of this House which will diminish the role of the private member of Parliament, and will indeed reduce and minimize the role of Parliament in our parliamentary system.

I must say that I find it obscene that we are even dealing with this subject this week. There are 1.5 million unemployed Canadians. Unemployment has reached levels which we have not seen since 1985. Canada is losing its ability to compete in the global economy. Last week the chairman of the Science Council of Canada wrote in an article published in The Ottawa Citizen that Canada does not have a science policy and that in the global economy in which we live, Canada is falling further and further behind.

I need hardly remind members that we are embroiled once again in a national unity crisis and that the opposition has been asking the government to include the House of Commons and all members of Parliement in the process of finding a solution.

Rather than debating these questions, we are debating a proposal by the Conservative government to diminish Parliament and to diminish the role of Parliament in our parliamentary system.

I would hope that government members, the Government House leader in particular, who is responsible for these proposals, will listen to the debate, listen to the carefully thought-out comments of members and that they will go back to the drawing board, withdraw these rules and come up with proposals which again will enhance the role of members of Parliament, as was recommended by the McGrath report six years ago, rather than seeking to diminish the role of members of Parliament and to diminish the role of Parliament together in our parliamentary system.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague on an excellent address. Perhaps he could explain for us, as we listened to what he had to say, about the McGrath commission and the fact that that was only a few years ago.

What really has taken place to cause us to have to revisit these rule changes. We just really started to work with them, and we were making some progress so that some parliamentarians had an opportunity to try to represent their constituencies. We see again the heavy hand of the government with the abuse of closure, and the abuse of process here in the House over the last number of years, and now these rule changes moving in the same direction.

Can he identify anything that causes us to really look at changes over and above what McGrath had suggested to us?

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, it is hard for me to read the mind of the government and to try and conclude, or try to figure out why these changes are being presented to us here today. All I can say to the hon. member is that it did not take a long time after 1985 for the enthusiasm for parliamentary reform to wane. I remember that in 1985 one of the changes was the establishment of much smaller committees where committees of six or seven members were struck. That was supposed to enable greater specialization by members, and it was supposed to permit the development of certain teamwork among members of Parliament from all sides.

Again, to give the specific example of a committee I am familiar with, the House established a committee on research, science and technology, because it was perceived, and indeed the Prime Minister had promised in the Speech from the Throne, I think in 1984 or 1985, to establish a specialized committee of this House to deal with questions of research, science and technology because they were considered to be so important for the country's future.

About two years later, a number of these small committees were put together in much larger committees. Research, science and technology disappeared and it was grouped together with Industry, Small Business, Northern and Regional Development. The specialization which just a year or two before had been regarded to be so important was thrown out the window.

I can only assume that the government really did not like to have specialized committees. They really did not like to have committees of the House getting to be too knowledgeable about various policy matters so that they could serve as a counterweight to the bureaucracy or to the decrees that come out of the Privy Council Office.

It is also interesting to speculate that the government could no longer find the members required to staff these committees. Indeed, that is the distinct impression that one gets today. With this government at, as I said in my remarks, an historic low in the opinion polls, the Conservative members really feel they have to spend more time back home attending to political organization rather than doing what they were supposed to do, which is to participate in the work of what the McGrath committee referred to as the central democratic institution.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to participate in this debate, but some of the remarks I make may not make everyone on all sides of the House happy.

I had an intervention the other day when the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, who is certainly one of the more active and conscientious members of the House and has certainly done a lot on procedure, started to look around the House and casually mention that there was no one around when the fundamental rule changes of 1969 came down the pike.

I happened to be here when the then House leader from the Liberal side, Mr. Macdonald, made the present government House leader seem like a Sunday School teacher at a Baptist picnic in terms of his very firm and determined approach to force through fundamental rule changes. One that I am going to concentrate on is the one that I wish the opposition had really got together on, instead of running the clock as we are running, although I am not suggesting motives because there have been some very good speeches here. This is the type of thing that should entertain members because it is our fundamental lifeblood and the bread and butter of the rules that make this place work.

I certainly subscribe to the comments from the opposition that on another day, in another way, this government has again done what it could have left undone by doing properly what it has done improperly by having rule changes vented in a committee and having a debate in a very intense and detailed way within a committee.

I know all the history here about the procedures and the consultations between House Leaders and the different people. They were trying to work out a program. That was fine as far as it went, but whatever they came up with should have been referred to a committee with a broader group of members to vet the proposals of House Leaders and all the staff who work with House leaders and then bring it before the House. If the debate went on and on and on, then the government would be in a better position to do what it is likely it will have to do here. There will be a little howl of protest or a loud howl of protest of using closure to force through rules, but the fact of the matter is, back in 1969, after, as the member for Kingston and the Islands quite correctly pointed out, there was closure. I think it was in the summer, July I think. I remember being around here and having pep rallies in the different corridors and behind the curtains just to keep the thing going.

There was fire in the opposition then against those fundamental rule changes. After 12 days, the government of the day brought in closure and we lived with all the apprehension that the opposition of the day, and I was one of them, said would happen to the state of Parliament. There was the rape of Parliament then and somehow the rape seemed to get over and Parliament stumbled along in its form until we came to the next main cycle of reform which was the McGrath reform, which we all know about and some of us participated in some of those committees. That brought in very fundamental rule changes that I do believe helped this institution. It was pointed out by other members that it certainly changed the whole rule book in terms of committees. Having been a chairman of one of the better committees and I think one of the more active, conscientious and constructive of the committees, the transport committee, I can say that with the new rules changes in the McGrath report there was the power and still is the power for committees to initiate procedures and initiate studies. They do not have to wait to get an order from the House. They were hamstrung and hand tied with every procedure the committees used to have to do before, until the McGrath report.

That was very good and the government of the day should be complimented on that. There is no doubt that I share the views of members basically on all sides. Certainly the government House leader in his opening statement, and I think the opposition leader too, talked about the deplorable state of Parliament and/or the politician. Let no one think that because one is wearing a particular party stripe one is going to avoid absolute disfavour in the public mind of that generic term the politician.

I don't care whether you are a Tory. I don't care whether you are a Grit. I don't care whether you are an NDP. I tell you, in terms of the three national parties, never for a variety of reasons has their opprobrium been lower in the public mind and frankly I do not know of any rule changes that are ever going to improve that situation.

My belief has been and still is that you can pervert or prostitute any procedural rule unless there is some good faith and respect between the parties involved. It is unfortunate what has happened in this forum over a period of years. It is not through the advent of any one government. I have been here for 25 years and I can say that I have seen a decline in the respect among members on all sides.

Yes, we have to have our floor fights and debate issues when we differ. There are exceptions—and I can see some right here in the Chamber today—where you can have your floor fights and debate with intensity, vigour and sometimes some logic, and yet you can still respect that member off the floor. Often there was more done off the floor in sort of agreements. They can talk about the old boys' club or name it what you will, but I can tell you that is when things really started to get done and helped the procedures of the House by the respect in a collective way that all members had. That is sorely missing, and rules changes are not going to change it.

Time moves along pretty fast here. In fact one of the rules changes which gives me concern is that we are going to be reduced to 10 minutes after a certain five-hour period, I gather. Ten minutes for me is just an introductory preamble in so many cases, so I don't really know how I am going to be hamstrung once those rules come into effect.

I have listened and everyone has spoken sincerely, but I really have been bothered to hear some of my colleagues talk about the state of Parliament and how this potential package of rule changes is going to be a further rape of Parliament. We are going to reduce the time for the Speech from the Throne and the time for the budget debate. Opposition days are not going to be quite as numerous.

Well, I am going to make a confession. I don't expect any member in the opposition or the government to make a similar confession. There were days when we were in opposition—and we had a pretty good opposition that knew what it was doing—and we had to fumble around in the latter stages of supply to get a proper topic to throw before the House, to fill the calendar, to have a debate.

I would venture to say, if members looked in their mirrors and did not have to confess publicly, that every one of them have sometimes wondered: what in the name of salvation are we debating this topic for, or why are we filling the calendar with this issue when in effect we could perhaps be doing more constructive things to help the nation?

I thought supply days would be the greatest thing since sliced bread. There are some good purposes for it. We have to have supply which, as everyone has said, is the whole reason we are here. There is no doubt that the whole element of accountability in supply of a massive government of no matter what stripe is very difficult for average members to get their teeth into. That is why I think committees are going to have to have perhaps a more powerful role so that they can analyse those estimates. Whether it is committee of the whole House which became a charade or even now with the present committee structure, there are many imperfections.

It is because there is not collegiality and the common respect of members prepared to put aside from time to time their partisan stripe that I think this place has been affected more than by any rule changes in the past or in the present.

I want to come to the package. I cannot go through it all because of the time limit, but I really want to stress one point. I know what is going on here. A lot of members want to speak. Perhaps they want to make sure the government invokes closure. I am going to surprise them, because I think I am correct. There is not going to be a big hullabaloo outside if the government invokes closure after so many days of debate on these rules. This is a very internal debate. It is not going to excite the public. It is not that there are not good things that should be said, but if there were ever an internal debate it is on House rules.

I for one, coming from the east, can certainly empathize and I think support the suggestion, admitting that there are less days of debate, of three weeks on and one week off. It has been kicked around for years and years in all procedure committees I have been exposed to. I think it is a very constructive idea.

I am not going to get involved in a personal way with other members who have made their comments, but it is very easy if you are sitting in the central part of Canada to get back to your ridings. I have a pretty good flight now, but it used to take eight hours and ten minutes, always trans-planing in Montreal, the old Viscount Vanguards, to get back east. Then the worst part was the drive on the old No. 1 Highway. Parts of it are still left, and I wonder how I ever drove on it for first five or six years until the highway was improved. Fortunately the air service has also improved.

We in the east have it relatively easy with direct flights, two in the morning and two at night, direct if you catch the right plane to Halifax and direct return. This has made a tremendous difference in terms of travel.

I still say that it is not just the mechanical paper ways we communicate with our constituents. I still think it is going to be a heck of a lot better if members get back in their ridings and talk to the people there.

I would venture to say that I think it is worth the experiment to try to put it in place. Perhaps members will come back and be a little more realistic and not quite as partisan after they have been with their people and find out that the public are sick and tired of rank partisanship day in and day out, especially on some of the larger issues which affect this country.

I think that is very constructive. Yes, it is going to change some of the time of debate in this House. The problem, I confess in sadness, is that very few people pay any attention to debates in the House anyway. Perhaps to shorten time, where we will have to have a better focus, will perhaps rehabilitate this forum which has to be the conscience of the land with all the problems the land has today.

There is no doubt there has been a deterioration. I don't think it is because I am getting older and was more impressed when I was younger. I think it is there and perhaps there should be some change in the rules. The rules are not going to do it by themselves, at all, no matter what we do. I have heard all the stories about the rape. This Parliament will survive.

A funny thing happened on the way to the circus. I say this to my friends in the opposition. The polls are bad for the government. They are horrible. They have never been worse. I am not going to get too political, but some leaders in the land say: "We will come out of this because we have been in this valley of travail before". The Tory party has never been at rock bottom. Perhaps this is the time. I give full credit to the government for trying to bring in some rules. If things are so horrible, perhaps some members on the opposition side will be in government benches and have an expedited procedure and process to get government laws through. If these things are as horrible as some members have said, certainly the new government of the day can bring in its own rule changes. These things aren't in stone forever.

I can say to the member for Kingston and the Islands because he was not around then that this is one of the reasons the McGrath report found favour with all sides of the House. At that time when no one party was way down at rock bottom, all parties were of a pretty shaky nature. There were times when each of the three main line parties thought they were going to be in government in the 1980 period.

I say to my friends in the opposition who use the general broad brush of rape of Parliament on everything in the package that they may be in the reins of power themselves and they may want some of these expeditious moves. If they are not working or are not going to work, they are going to be in a position to change them.

I am not going to go through them all because time is moving on, but I want to talk about television. I think that is one of the reasons this place has gone down the pike, although I agree with my friend from Crowfoot that modern television technology is there. I was on the committee that studied it in opposition. We did all our studies then and felt why should our constituents have to pay money to come to Ottawa to see the place in action when they can tune in the TV tube and see it in a certain way in homes. We have to recognize modern technology, but it definitely has affected this place.

Again, having had some experience in committees, I am quite apprehensive about the extension of television to committees. I am prepared to make a prediction. Committees are now basically doing pretty good work in a non-partisan way. I am apprehensive that when we get the old camera in the committees it is going to foul up and affect in an adverse way committee work.

Another funny thing happened on the way to the circus and some members have mentioned it, that the ham will monopolize the camera. That is why this place is in disrepute: perhaps there are too many hams here and the hams will be in the committee. Members may not appreciate that there is no doubt the penetrating eye of the television camera cuts through an awful lot of floss and gloss and, if it is not real and relevant, the camera shows it, the spectator sees it or the viewer sees it.

I just point out that perhaps it is a matter of typing me in terms of time. Even good old Carol Burnett and her comedy hour—she has had a rehabilitation and has come back in another way; it is a great half-hour now I think—only lasted for 10 years. Finally the old camera saw enough and people had a change.

I am very concerned about television in the committees. I am not too consistent in saying that I know it has to be here in the House and why not perhaps in the committees. I do think it will adversely affect committees. I think members have to be very careful as they appear before the screen, whether it is before a committee and/or here, because that penetrating eye can leave quite an impression. That is on television.

I am glad the parliamentary secretary to the House leader is here. I know the opposition has used the general broad brush of total Draconian, Fascist, rape of Parliament. Everyone is referring to the generalities of the calendar and all those things, some of which I have mentioned and some have some good points. However, I am very sad that the opposition instead of just forcing the government to use closure, which will be its natural right to do in time, in effect did not focus more on this debate to try to get some changes even at this late date. One element in the rule changes that is going to affect this place more adversely as far as individual members are concerned is the clause on unanimous consent and its disposition under this new projected rule.

It is interesting to me. I know there are not too many government members around today and I can understand why.

An hon. member: They are hanging their heads in shame.

Mr. Nowlan: No, I do not think so, but they are prepared not to fill the docket and they want the debate to conclude.

I have in front of me in my hand the memorandum the government House leader sent to the PC caucus, which did not come to me directly. It is dated March 26 and is a good summary of the rule changes. On the one that I just referred to, if I read this and had not been around here for a little while, I guarantee that nine-tenths of the government members do not appreciate the effect of this change on consent of the House. In the list there are other things mentioned: closure, time allocation, recorded divisions, quorum, and extension of sitting. On the consent of the House, it is written in the explanation, "on matters of House sittings and activities of committees 25 members rising during Routine Proceedings can prevent adoption, not applicable to changing other Standing Orders".

I do not think it was done intentionally, but that is almost one of the most misleading explanations of the potential effect of this change in the unanimous consent that I could ever believe. I am suggesting that I take exception to the Speaker's ruling yesterday when, on the point of order raised by the member for Kamloops on the unanimous consent part, the Speaker mentioned in his explanation that this is very restricted. I do not accept that, Mr. Speaker. This business of unanimous consent is not restricted. The suggested Standing Order says in paragraph 56(1)(b):

> For the purposes of this Standing Order, "routine motions" shall be understood to mean any motion, made upon Routine Proceedings, which may be required for the observance of the proprieties of the House, the maintenance of the authority, the management of its business, the arrangement of its proceedings, the establishing of the powers of its committees, the correctness of its records or the fixing of its sitting days or the times of its meeting or adjournment.

This is broad and powerful and in effect will remove any leverage—I guess that is the word to use—that individual members will have unless they can get 25 members to come up and say no. With this power in the hands of a government, a government is going to be able to get through its business in an unholy fast fashion.

There was a suggestion from the government House leader in his introductory remarks: "Oh, well, don't worry about this, members of the House of Commons. This can only be moved in Routine Proceedings and if someone says no it has to come back to Routine Proceedings".

Mr. Speaker, you and I know how this place works. I see you indicating that I have to conclude, and I will conclude. You can try Routine Proceedings on a Monday morning when not too many people are here, and then someone may say no to the motion. A motion can be broad. It could affect the workings of committees, special committees, the Meech Lake committee, any committee you want, and you may get a no because one member may feel very strongly about it.

I appreciate from a government point of view that there has been an abuse of no, perhaps because there are a lot of Independents in this House and there were a couple of times recently where no was given. You say no once and, when the person who said no leaves the Chamber, the government House leader can quite properly request unanimous consent to revert to Routine Proceedings. Then there will be consent and you get back to Routine Proceedings, as the order says, and you can move the motion to do anything. With this provision and without 25 members on guard all the time, you could put a GST bill through this House in less than two or three days, et cetera.

It is for that reason alone that I wish there was focus from the opposition. I am glad that members are debating this matter. It is the most invidious projected rule in this whole package as far as I am concerned. I think it will have a large adverse affect. Quite frankly it is basically and totally against the McGrath report which was for private members. As other members have said, it totally eliminates any power or authority of individual members. I am horrified that the Liberal amendment did not include it in its deletion. I really think this and this alone—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I always like to hear from the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants. He has been a great contributor to the parliamentary system for many years. I am proud to be able to say that he is a fellow Nova Scotian. He has represented the people in his area and the people in the rest of the province of Nova Scotia well over the years.

He certainly knows this place, I guess better than I because I am a newcomer here. I guess I share some of the frustrations that are evident many times when he gets up to speak in this place. There is a great frustration that I feel. I want to share it with him, and perhaps he can comment.

The people back in my riding in the great city of Dartmouth, which is not that far from the riding of the hon. member, are getting pretty fed up as well with the way that this place works. The hon. member made a comment that the television camera does not lie. I think that has been a great change in how people perceive this place.

It is fine for us to be debating here. It is important that we get a chance to debate these rule changes because they are important rule changes. They certainly do impact on the ability of individual members of Parliament to participate and represent their constituents in this place, the highest court of the land.

The hon. member raised one particular instance about the provision for unanimous consent, the change that that will mean in this place, and the potential abuse of that by a majority, by a government. As an individual member of Parliament I feel, as do my constituents many times, that this place is becoming increasingly irrelevant.

I know we are debating rules and changes to the rules and how they will affect the business of this House. I wonder how some of these rule changes will affect the respectability this place has lost, whether or not we can gain it back, and whether or not it really is making us even more irrelevant as individual members of Parliament.

The hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants who just spoke so eloquently knows full well that there are more reforms needed than just those that are in this package. One of the problems we have—and I would like the hon. member to comment on it—is that a lot of people watch us on television and the camera does not lie. They see us all going around blindly like sheep with rings through our noses.

• (1600)

If you remember, the government side comes in and says Tuesday is Thursday, and you are supposed to go with the party line. You will remember that on the opposition side, if they say that Tuesday is Tuesday, we will probably get up and say no, it is really Thursday.

One of the problems we have is not just reform of the rules of this place, but a true reform of the political system and how we allow our members to contribute in a positive way so that we can have better legislation for this country.

We work under a system of party discipline. It is not there to make this place work better but to preserve the leadership of the party. Perhaps the time has come to allow Canadians to tell members of Parliament about how we can be more relevant.

I would like the hon. member to comment on whether or not he believes there is a further need for reform of the caucus system and the party system so that members can get up—and I know he has done it many times and maybe that is why he is sitting as an independent Conservative—and speak and contribute in debate in a way that does not threaten the demise of the government if you are a government member, and does not threaten the authority of the Leader of the Opposition or the leader of the New Democratic Party or the members of those parties. Does he believe there is a further need for reform in a real way that would allow members to get up and contribute during debate in a spirit of co-operation. Also, it is a combative place here.

I would like him to comment on that because I think all the rule changes we are talking about here are wonderful. It is great that people have different ideas. I do not like most of the rule changes I see but I like some of them.

I would like the hon. member to comment on whether or not he would like to see further reforms so that, as individual members, we are more relevant in this place and we are more responsive and reflect the needs of our constituents.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of my hon. friend from Dartmouth. My riding goes right up and actually goes right by the airport. We actually meet, believe it or not in one corner.

Obviously, this is about more than just reform of the rules. The question posed could have a very long answer, so I will try to be brief on this point. I guess I am a living example of the thrust of the question about reform. I have often felt like this and that is why I liked the McGrath report. In part, at least, it did come out with having less confidence votes. I mean, this business of having supply days, and it happened when we were in government and when we were in opposition, so nothing new has happened over on the government side. This is part of the frustration of the public. They have been disappointed because they thought that perhaps a new government was going to change its ways. When we were in the opposition we would say: "Please, government, do not make this a confidence vote." We put it right in our motions, the same as the NDP and sometimes the Liberals put it in the present opposition motions, "not a confidence vote". And yet, the government each time, to make sure members toe the party line, have made it a confidence vote and vote the party line.

I really believe that other than speeches from the throne, budget speeches and perhaps tax bills, every other subject matter bill should be a free line vote and not a confidence vote.

I am quite happy to sit here as an independent, and I do not have to toe the party line.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Another questioner. Another question and comment from the hon. member for Vancouver North.

Mr. Nowlan: I just want to conclude.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I admire the member from Annapolis Valley—Hants very much. The only thing is, every once in awhile he is full of it. When he talks about committees not being telecast, he does not know what he is saying. In every legislature where it has been done, it has improved the committee system, not destroyed it. It means, sir, that when a member walks into a committee and does not know what he is talking about, if that committee is being telecast, the world knows it.

The hon. member is also overlooking one other factor. People have a right to know, and not telecasting committees means denying the people the right to know.

I would like to hear the member explain to me why, and on what basis he can possibly deny the people the right to know, really what takes place in this place. Put television in the committees and then we will see who knows their stuff, who has done their homework and who has not. It gets rid of, with the greatest respect, bombastic oafs from sitting on committees.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I hope the hon. member can wind it up in a minute.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I will try to wind it up. I always appreciate the intervention of my hon. friend from the west coast.

I do not believe the hon. member for North Vancouver was in the House when I was speaking about this. I do not know because, as I said, I have conflicting thoughts about this.

I do believe the public has a right to know. As I said in my opening remarks, I was a member of the committee that recommended that we have television in the House. Obviously, it has had some effect in the House, but I have apprehension about the committees. We are each entitled to our view.

The technology is there. I also said that the penetrating eye of the camera would cut through the bombasts and all the blarney. Perhaps it will produce.

Having been on a committee as long as my hon. friend, in fact I have been participating longer, I have found that committees do work pretty productively in a non-partisan way because they have not had the attention of the reporters. They certainly have not had the cameras until today.

I must confess that the Constitution committee in 1982 in Room 200 was televised. Of course, that was a very fundamental subject, but televising that committee was very educational for the public.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, just when I want to say I am glad to be able to have an opportunity to participate in a debate, I am not really. I wish we were not having this debate.

I wish we had been able to come to some understanding with respect to the changes that are needed in the Standing Orders, because I think that is the way the Standing Orders of the House of Commons should be changed: by unanimous consent and agreement between the parties. That is what happened in 1983 as a result of the committee chaired by now Senator Tom Lefebvre, and in 1985 as a result of the work done by the Special Committee on the Reform of the House of Commons which was headed by Jim McGrath, now the Lieutenant-Governor of Newfoundland.

I had the opportunity to work on both those committees. I want to reflect on the changes we have before us here, in light of the parliamentary reform process that I have seen unfold since I arrived here in 1979.

It is always hard to determine just where things began to unravel. Certainly, the Lefebvre committee had its origins in the unravelling which occurred in this Chamber as a result of the debate over, first of all, the constitutional changes, the unilateral patriation package in 1980, the National Energy Program and the behaviour of the opposition at that time. The Official Opposition at that time is the party which is now the government.

It was difficult for some of us the other day to listen to the hon. government House leader speak, presumably sincerely, about his concern about what had happened to Parliament when some of us know only too well, and remember even better, that it was that member who, among others, stormed the Chair and did that sort of thing.

Mr. Cooper: He did not. He was not there.

Mr. Blaikie: I am told that he was not there. It was certainly the case that members of the Conservative caucus at that time were very instrumental in beginning a process which led us to a sorry state then and which was reformed to some degree by the Lefebvre committee and improved upon by the McGrath committee.

I see what is happening here now as stepping back from some of those reforms. I know that the hon. member for Peace River was also on that committee. There are a number of McGrath alumnae in the House. There are a few of us left. He does not agree with me with respect to how this reform either deviates from or is consistent with the McGrath committee. I am going to give my views on how I see it, because I do think that it does take us back from the McGrath reforms.

First of all, with respect to the calendar, as I said the other day, there are good arguments on both sides. One argument is whether or not members should have a week in their ridings when the House is not sitting on a periodic basis, particularly for those who have long distances and for all of us who have had the experience of setting up things in the riding and then having to cancel them or to come back because of some event here. I can certainly see advantages in that. I do not think that should be the main focus of the debate. There are other things going on here which are more important.

The government, by moving to make the process for getting legislation through the House much more efficient, to use their description of what they are doing, has gone overboard. It is common among lawyers to say that hard cases make bad law. I think that the government, out of fear of what might be done by independents or the Bloc Quebecois or the Reform Party or whatever, has moved to change the unanimous consent provisions in a way that all of us will come to regret and which certainly goes against the spirit of the McGrath committee which set out to increase the power of private members. This certainly takes away the power of the private member or members, unless they number 25, to get in the way of the government steamroller, should the government want to use this provision to put legislation through in one heck of a hurry.

At the time we all agreed with the McGrath committee that delay is not necessarily a bad thing. Delay is one of the features and functions of parliamentary democracy. This is something that the public does not always understand. Oppositions, when they try to delay things, are not always just sort of puffing and huffing and blowing off steam. They are providing crucial political time for the public to mobilize against something which they may or may not regard as something they want to oppose. Oppositions provide that time. Sometimes we provide a few days and then we see that people are not interested and we say: "All right, time to move on". Sometimes when we provide a few days' delay, we find out that people are really angry when they hear what is happening, so we provide a few more days. Sometimes we provide weeks. That is how the system works. There is nothing wrong with that. It irritates governments, but that is one of the ways in which parliamentary democracy works.

The role the opposition can play is sometimes underestimated by the public. Sometimes we delay things and people are not interested, so be it. Other times that function of delay has been very, very critical. The government, by moving to even further expedite the legislative process, on top of what was done in 1969, 1983 and 1985 and not putting it in the context of a package in which the opposition receives other powers, I think leaves itself open to some of the charges that have been made against it which they find so offensive.

If they want to make this place more efficient, then at the same time they have to introduce more real power and real meaning into what we do here when we are here. That they have not done. If they were to do that, then it might be the case that the killing of time and the use of delay as a primary parliamentary function would not be so absolutely crucial to the role of opposition, if there was more meaningful input. But that they have not provided in this particular reform.

This reform, had we tried to go ahead and make a real package, could have dealt with some of the things that are really frustrating people here. That is the way that Question Period has deteriorated and the way that everything we do here seems to be very, very selectively filtered out to the public.

There was a lot of talk about TV. One member said that TV does not lie and others said that the TV shows up people for what they are. I think that TV does lie. I think that TV, as a medium, does lie in the sense that it does not completely reveal all that goes on here. Maybe TV does not lie if you are one of those people who may be watching now, who has the time to watch the parliamentary channel all the time. But if you only watch those things which make it into the news from Parliament, then the TV does lie about what goes on in Parliament.

The hon. member from Annapolis Valley—Hants said that people are sick to death of the partisan bickering. Well, it is no wonder. That is the only thing that makes it on the news. You could get up here day after day after day and ask substantive, non–partisan, meritorious questions and the only thing you would be guaranteed is a life of absolute obscurity. Nine times out of ten, the cheap shot, the partisan remark, the lowest form of political activity will be what is selected out for that 15 or 30 second sound byte on the news. I think that is part of the problem here and we need to examine that. So I have some of the anxieties that the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants has about TV in committees. Maybe it will have the meritorious effect that the member for Vancouver North spoke about, but maybe it will not not. I guess the only way we are going to find out is to bring it in.

I want to talk about the way in which these reforms go against what I think was the spirit in the recommendations of the McGrath committee report. Now McGrath is not sacred. There are things that we recommended that did not work out all that well. I do not stand here saying that this snapshot of parliamentary reform that was taken in 1985 should stand for all time and be unquestioned and always used as the benchmark against which we should judge everything else.

But one of the things that the McGrath report did was try, by its own admission and by the instruction given it by the government at that time, was to invest more power in the role of the private member, not just as a private member, but as private members gathered together in committee. I think this reform steps back from that in a number of ways.

It steps back, for instance, with respect to the control that the government wants to exercise on standing committees by having the parliamentary secretary sit on the standing committees.

The parliamentary secretary to the House leader will say: "It is not for control, it is for information, contact and communication, et cetera." Well, if those things were to be achieved that is fine, but the fact of the matter is that the parliamentary secretaries used to act like referees and coaches for the government side. The government wants to argue now that they will also be a source of expertise. Well, heaven help the government, in a caucus of 150 or 160 people, if it is only the parliamentary secretaries who know what they are talking about when it comes to a particular subject area represented by a committee. Surely the government should be able to find other members who are conversant with what is going on in that particular area.

I think that putting five or six committees into various envelopes and giving them only two rooms to meet in will limit the powers of committees on their own to say they are going to meet, they are going to do this and they are going to study this because there will come to be a brokering of time and of rooms which will enable the people in power to decide which committee is going to be working and which committee is not. That is an inevitable fact of life when you have that kind of allocation of resources with respect to committees.

Giving more power to the government to determine whether things will go to a standing committee or a legislative committee and limiting the rules of legislative committees to hearing only technical witnesses is a step back from the McGrath reform. If we cannot hear non-technical witnesses at second reading, when can we hear them. When can we hear the people who are concerned about a particular bill unless we have, built into the Standing Orders, a guaranteed provision for hearing those kinds of people some other time at some other stage of the process and yet that is not here.

So to simply say that because something is approved in principle it is now longer to be debate except in its technical dimensions, I think it is not just an abrogation of what the McGrath committee had in mind, it is an abrogation of the parliamentary tradition. Even before McGrath, although things had been passed in principle at second reading, when the standing committee had it people were there commenting on the principle and the technical details of the bill.

The member for Annapolis Valley—Hants will remember only too well travelling across the country with the standing committee. The second reading of the Crow bill had been passed, but people were still talking about whether it should have been passed at all. That is an appropriate role for the committee it seems to me, and that is being removed by this particular reform.

Finally, this reform gives more power to the Whips with respect to substituting on the committees. If I understand it correctly, people can still appoint alternates which they can designate as their substitutes, but they may also choose not to appoint alternates, in which case it would be the Whip of the various caucuses who would decide, from a vastly increased number of members, who will substitute for those members who are unable to participate in a particular committee at a particular time. I predict that what will happen is you will find that government members will not name alternates. The government Whip can then name his own alternates from this large pool of backbenchers. That will have the effect of diluting rather than building up expertise on the committee. We will, in effect, have gone back to the old system where the Whip would have the power to simply flood the committee with people who did not know what they were talking about to be there for a crucial 15 minutes prior to a vote, vote down what the people are proposing who do know what they are talking about on the committee, and move on again.

I think that is another step away from the McGrath report.

We saw a further erosion a couple of weeks ago of what I thought we had established through the McGrath reform. It is not related to this package. Twice I rose in this House on a point of order complaining that the government was interpreting opposition day motions as matters of confidence. We went to great lengths—because free votes are one of the ways in which you increase the power of the private member—to get the language of confidence out of the Standing Orders with respect to opposition motions. And we took it out. It is not there anymore. Those motions which are votable are no longer described as confidence motions, they are simply described as motions that will come to a vote. That was deliberate.

Two weeks or so ago, just before the Easter break, I heard members getting up and saying: "Well, these are matters of confidence", and repeating the same old argument as if the McGrath committee had never met, never mind recommended it. It was at that point that I finally came to believe, because I resist believing these kinds of things, that the government is intent—I hope not deliberately, but it certainly is having this effect—of completely eroding the spirit of the McGrath committee.

They had a very simple motion before them to reaffirm medicare. It did not imply any criticism of anybody. We all could have voted for it, Mr. Speaker. The House of Commons could have expressed itself unanimously with respect to an important social program. Instead, we were treated to this very disappointing argumentation on the part of the government that this was, after all, a motion of confidence.

One of the crucial breakthroughs of the McGrath committee was that those opposition day motions procedurally were changed in such a way as to create the freedom for government backbenchers, and for that matter for members of other parties, to vote as they chose on those motions.

We have not seen that. It is not just the government's fault, it is the fault of our whole political culture which focuses on dissent as weakness rather than as a possible sign of strength. So we have not seen the kind of free thinking that we had envisaged at that point.

But to have the government get up and basically kill it by giving that interpretation of opposition day motions, I think was really unfortunate. It had not worked yet, but it might have worked. If the government holds to the position that it held two weeks ago about opposition day motions, it will never work.

With respect to committees once again, the government argues that it wants people to have this week in their ridings so that they can talk to their constituents, while at the same time it is changing the rules with respect to committees so the people will find it harder to talk to their members when they are on committees that are actually dealing with things, for instance, if they are on legislative committees.

There seems to me to be a contradiction here. Do you want members to be able to talk to people who are concerned about things? Then you should not just provide more time for them to meet with them in the coffee shops, the school auditoriums and the church basements. You should at least maintain what time there is for them to talk to members who are concerned about a particular bill and who are sitting on a committee which is looking at a bill that may concern people. They may want to talk to their member or to the members on the committee about it.

Again with respect to committees, I think part of what is happening here is that the government has had a hard time maintaining its membership on committees, that many times the government side is drastically under-represented on committees. I think one of the reasons for that, and this affects not just government members but everybody, is that the high expectations of the 1985 McGrath committee report that these new committees, founded on these new rules, would be listened to have foundered.

I look at the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants and I remember when he was the chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport. When the Standing Committee on Transport unanimously recommended against the VIA cuts, they might as well have jumped off the Peace Tower because nobody paid any attention to the unanimous recommendation of a long-standing, well respected committee.

An hon. member: Was it the whole committee?

Mr. Blaikie: The whole committee recommended against the VIA cuts and the government paid no attention.

A committee unanimously recommended certain things with respect to food irradiation and the minister of health at the time, now the minister of energy, ignored them. The list goes on of times when committees felt that they were going to make a difference, and they made no difference.

The government does not pay any attention to what is going on in committees, unless it happens to expect that it is going to agree with it. I sat on the Standing Committee on External Affairs. We went to the Soviet Union and the Germanys, now Germany. We made a report with certain recommendations with respect to Canada's activity in NATO, et cetera. Several months after the report came out I met Canada's Ambassador to NATO. I said: "What did you think of our report"? He said: "What report?" He asked "What report" because there is no will on the part of the government or in any government department to take seriously the work of committees. Yet the very best work that goes on here often goes on in committee, as members have said, and they are not just blowing their own horns. A lot of good work does go on in committee.

That work does not seem to have any effect. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because more and more of the political process is captive to a smaller and smaller group of people who are advisers to the Prime Minister: the Prime Minister's pollster, the Prime Minister's image maker, the Prime Minister's adviser on this and that. We in effect have what Canadians are coming to realize and what I myself am coming to realize very reluctantly, a kind of four-year elected dictatorship of a very small number of people, and the rest of us here are just froth. We are just sort of icing on the cake. We just keep up the appearance of democracy until the next election.

An hon. member: That is right. That is the way it is.

Mr. Blaikie: We are all being used in that way to varying degrees whether we like it or not because the real decisions are being made somewhere else. They are not just being made in the Prime Minister's Office. Some of the decisions that affect what goes on in the Prime Minister's Office are being made in the corporate boardrooms of the country.

That is part of the over-all malaise it seems to me. I do not know the answer short of a general rebellion on the part of the people by which they demand authentic political processes, an authentic political debate and an authentic Parliament. I think that is the kind of alienation and anger on which new political phenomena like the Reform Party feed. I do not think that they are the answer, but they certainly feed on a legitimate anger about that.

Mr. Speaker, I see you giving me the high sign or the low sign, I am not sure. I could certainly go on about this. I think I have said why I think this reform goes against what we had in mind in the McGrath committee. I think there are members on the government side who at least must feel ambiguous about these reforms and see the argument I am making, even if they cannot agree with me.

I would hope that very soon we would get around to dealing with some of the really tough questions which the Lefebvre committee ignored, which the McGrath committee ignored and which this reform ignores and that is, how to deal with Question Period to make it more substantive and make it an opportunity for more members rather than fewer and fewer members. That is part of the problem around here. If you can never get on in the only forum that anyone ever pays attention to, then what is the point of being here? If no one is paying attention to debates and Question Period is the only place that anyone pays attention to, and fewer and fewer people get to ask questions, then it is no wonder the people want to be in their ridings where they can at least have authentic conversations with people. So there is the problem of Question Period. Finally, and I say this to the hon. member for Peace River, there is the whole question of legislative planning, which is the real alternative to all this machiavellian stuff we have in this reform which enables the government to jam through bills as it pleases.

• (1630)

I will finish in a minute, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time is over–expired now by two minutes. I will let him have another 30 seconds to wind up.

Mr. Blaikie: What we need here is a real will to do legislative planning, to have people sit down and say: "This is what we are going to give to this bill and this is what we are going to give to that bill because this is important". That takes give and take on both sides. Then we will know when we are going to deal with them instead of always dealing with things on 15 seconds notice. No wonder people have a hard time paying attention or being substantive, when you never know from one day to the next or sometimes from one hour to the next what you will be dealing with.

I think the government could have done us a great service if it had come forward with a proposal as to how we could all put our heads together and plan our life here in a way that did not subject some of us to the will of others, but instead subjected the whole process to what collectively we thought might serve the interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's discourse with great interest. He and I have had the privilege of working together on a number of parliamentary reform packages. I have always admired his work and his intellect and this time is no exception.

He began early in his remarks by indicating that he and I have had some discussions and that we do not agree on how we view this particular package. He speaks the truth. That is true.

I do want to comment on a couple of things. I am really pleased to hear him say that it is time for some reform in terms of Question Period. I hope by that he is meaning a real balance to those reforms in that we treat backbenchers on this side with, maybe not total equality, but at least giving us some opportunity to put questions.

For example, in this last week we have tried to have I think a total of eight members rise to ask questions. Out of that we got two in three days. I agree with him that we need some reforms there. I am glad to hear him say that. I want to pursue it.

The second thing he said should have been in this package was legislative planning. He should talk to his House leader. We have tried on several occasions in the two years I have been in this job to encourage just that, but it does not seem to be working. The will is not there and I hope that he would consider that.

I have a quick question for him on legislative committees. It seems to me that the McGrath task force indicated that it should be technical witnesses. I am wondering if he had forgotten that or whether he does not agree with what we had originally designed there, which is in place now.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, first of all, with respect to Question Period. The member should be careful to realize that when we talk about the reform of Question Period we are not only and perhaps not even, but I take the point, talking about providing more opportunities for government backbenchers. I would see more promise in that if I had seen more willingness on the part of the government to entertain real criticism within its own ranks or within its own caucus. But only two weeks ago I had to listen to arguments about why motions which were not procedurally motions of non–confidence were motions of confidence and why everybody had to vote against medicare because the government House leader thought this was a motion of confidence.

It does not give me a lot of confidence that if we had a reform of Question Period which provided government members with more opportunities to ask questions that those questions would be real questions.

I think that we do have to reform Question Period. Perhaps we have to make it a little longer, I do not know. We certainly have to shorten up everything that goes on. I remember a time when there were all kinds of different questions asked here and backbenchers could do their job. They could get on and ask about something happening in their riding or their region. It is pointless now, I am sure, for a lot of members. They just do not have a chance. That is true, not just for government backbenchers.

That is true of opposition backbenchers as well. If they cannot go back to their people and say: "I raised this in the House of Commons", what are they to do? I think Question Period should be reformed.

Maybe we should look at more predictable ways of saying: "On this day, these kinds of questions will be asked." We have a ridiculous way in which everybody has to be briefed on every possible combination of questions every day. It must be horrible.

I think we could have some planning in the Question Period, but it has to be a package. It has to be something that corrects what is wrong with Question Period for that side of the House and for this side of the House. It cannot be something that is unilaterally imposed.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a comment.

I was watching the hon. member on television in my office, and he made a comment which I do not take exception to in the sense that I believe he made it in all honesty believing it to be true that I am one of the members who charged the Chair.

Very briefly, I would like to explain that particular incident when the Hon. Lloyd Francis was in the chair talking about the constitution. Indeed, there were members charging the Chair.

I was seated right about over there and came out of my chair to intercept a Liberal member who I thought was menacing my leader. That particular shot came on television and Bill Fox of The Toronto Star wrote up that "Andre was rushing the Chair".

In fact, I did not and some citizen of Toronto who happened to see that scene took exception to that article by Bill Fox in The Toronto Star. He took it to the Ontario Press Council and they said that yes, it was an article that was improper and inaccurate. Indeed, a correction appeared in The Toronto Star in a small column.

Unfortunately, by then every computer in the country that carries this kind of information had in it that Andre rushed the Chair. I do not know how to get it out of the darn computers.

What I did finally was to go into the Archives and get the videotape of that whole incident. I have it in my office, and to anybody who believes I rushed the Chair that day, I would say: "Come to my office. I will show you the whole videotape and you will see that in fact I did not do that."

I raise that because there is no reason that the hon. member should know anything else. It is in every computer. Any time anybody does a semi-biographical article on Yours Truly, they contain in it "who once rushed the Chair". I will probably go to my grave with that, but I did not want to miss this opportunity to straighten out at least one member, and hopefully any others in the House who may be under that illusion.

Mr. Blaikie: I did say when I was corrected by the hon. member for Peace River that I accepted the correction. I accept in the presence of the hon. member that I was mistaken as to which Liberal he rushed and for what reasons.

When I think of those days and of some of the things that went on, the hon. member will have to ask himself, even given this correction, why he always comes to mind.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A very short question and a very short answer, please.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, it is really a question that the hon. member for Peace River asked. I had some others, but time is moving on.

I was surprised too about the comment on legislative committee versus standing committee, technical and not witnesses. Certainly, in the McGrath report, the legislative committees were not to have witnesses and/or travel. That was to be done by the standing committee on the issue. That is what I thought and that was the purport.

My real question which will have a short reply is: Having had the experience of the legislative committee and/or the standing committee,—this disappoints me and not that I am that upset with it but let us see how it works—I really cannot see this whole envelope thing. The hon. member pointed out some interesting thoughts of how I think there is going to be a breakdown and how it is going to work.

I, for one, am totally negative to the legislative committee and the standing committee. I think this is a duplication if ever, that puts more strain on government members. From the hon. member's practical experience, how does he assess the legislative committee and the necessity of it with a viable standing committee?

• (1640)

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I tried to answer that by saying that my understanding of the McGrath committee recommendations was that if legislative committees were to concern themselves only and strictly with technical matters, this was to be part of an over-all package whereby certain policy principles or whatever would find the opportunity to be examined in other ways. That has happened. Standing committees have looked at things and then when a bill has finally appeared it has gone to a legislative committee, but it has also happened without that.

The concern is that the government will simply bring in a bill, the subject matter of which has not been previously studied by a standing committee, put it into the legislative committee and say "I am sorry, according to the rules we can only hear technical comments" and, bingo, the process is incomplete in that way and expedited in a way that we find offensive.

In all honesty I have to say that I do not have a great deal of experience on legislative committees because it just so happens that given my critic areas I have not sat on a lot of legislative committees. I was the external affairs critic for three years. There is not a lot of legislation in external affairs. Prior to that I was the environment critic. Just as the environmental legislation came along in the fall of 1987, I went to external affairs. I do not profess to have a lot of experience on legislative committees, but my sense from a distance is they have not worked out as well as we thought they would when we conceived them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): /I regret that questions and comments are now terminated.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to a government motion which, if it is ever passed, will have a negative impact on future debates in this House.

I would like to begin by saying that the abuse of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons by this government is nothing new. We, opposition members, are used to the government abusing the rules.

The government claims that the proposed changes will make the proceedings more relevant and increase the efficiency of the House. First of all, we must realize that this is being proposed by the very government that applied closure 13 times and time allocation to important bills over eight times since 1988. How can we seriously take a proposal to improve the efficiency of the House made by a government which, in the past, showed contempt for the Standing Orders of this House? The figures regarding the number of times closure was applied clearly illustrate this point.

Of more concern is the fact that the proposed changes are contrary to the fundamental principles of the British parliamentary system that we follow. I would like to quote a short paragraph from the Précis of Procedure, third edition to show how such proposals run counter to the principles of our parliamentary system. The first paragraph of section 13(A) reads as follows:

> A fundamental aspect of the principles on which the financial rpocedures of Parliament are based is that Parliament does not grant supply before the Opposition has had the opportunity to show why it should be refused.

Mr. Speaker, to show the Canadian people why supply should be granted or not, the Opposition has at its disposal days called "opposition days" or "allotted days". On these 25 days a year, the Opposition can show the Canadian people how the government is spending their money. But it is now proposed to considerably reduce the number of opposition days. Fewer opposition days would means fewer opportunities for the Opposition to question the government actions and spending.

The role of an opposition party in a parliamentary system is to make the process more democratic by forcing the government of the day to be accountable.

One reason Parliament exists is to give the people a choice in who will administer public funds.

But reducing the number of days devoted to considering spending or cuts proposed by the government attacks the very principle of our parliamentary system, if I go by the third edition of the Precis of Procedure.

A fundamental aspect of Parliament is to give the opposition an opportunity to show why appropriations should be refused, but this can be done less effectively if there are fewer days to do so, Mr. Speaker.

Unfortunately, opposition days are not the only victims of the government motion to change the procedure of this House.

The parliamentary calendar is also a victim of the government's proposals. The motion proposes reducing the sitting days of the House of Commons from 175, Mr. Speaker. According to the present calendar, we should sit for about 175 days, although the government does not always stick to the calendar. The reform would reduce it by 40 to 135 days. That is a reduction of 23 per cent in the number of sitting days.

In other words, it would increase by 21 per cent the number of days that government members could travel in their ridings. I have the present calendar here with me, according to the present Standing Orders 24(1) and 28 of the House, and for 1991, if we adhered to this calendar, which we have not, Mr. Speaker—we are in April 1991. If we had adhered to the calendar, in January 1991, we would have sat only three weeks; in February, the same, three weeks; in March, three and a half weeks; in April, three weeks. Only in May would we sit four and half weeks, and three and a half weeks in June. In September, we would sit three weeks, and in October, five weeks, in November, three weeks and in December, three weeks.

In most of the months that we sit—and it must be said that we do not sit at all in July and August—we sit on average three weeks a month when we follow the calendar, Mr. Speaker. So why these changes? If we are unable to follow a calendar that already gives members some time to go to their ridings and meet their constituents, if that is the real intention, and I doubt it, but even if it were really the government's intention, we already have the time needed to go to our ridings and hear from our constituents. So as you see, there are definitely other reasons for taking 40 sitting days from a calendar which only provides for 165 sitting days out of the 365 in a year.

There is another important fundamental principle of our system and it involves the role of Parliament. Its role is to make the government face its responsibilities. For the less we sit, the less the government is forced to face its responsibilities to the people.

The forum Canadians have to force their government to answer for its actions is Parliament. Mr. Speaker, this is an essential component of responsible government.

The Conservative Members ask for more time to visit their ridings, because as you know, Mr. Speaker, the popularity of the Conservative Party is at the lowest level since polls were taken in Canada. This government is the most unpopular of any since polls were first taken. We understand that very well. That is why I was just wondering whether the real reason is that they want to hear from their constituents or that they want to go back to their ridings and start campaigning two years before the next election because they have completely lost the confidence of the Canadian people.

• (1650)

So Mr. Speaker, let us call a spade a spade. This proposal is purely political. It does nothing to improve the effectiveness of the House of Commons. The Conservatives want to boost their popularity and are hiding behind the idea of improving how the House operates. It is hypocrisy.

Reducing the number of days the House sits would limit Canadians' power to force the government of the day to answer for its actions to the people. It must be said that the motion proposing changes to the Standing Orders includes several examples of the point I just made: limiting the power of Canadians to force the government to explain itself in Parliament. Reducing the number of sitting days in itself reduces the ability of elected members to question the government of the day.

Mr. Speaker, the proposed reduction of 40 days includes reductions in the days for debating the budget and the speech from the Throne, two extremely important subjects for all Canadians.

First, the government asks the opposition to give up two of the six days for debating the budget. As we know, the budget is one of the most important means at the government's disposal for revealing its economic and social policies. The budget statement tells the people the general economic policy that the government intends to pursue.

Mr. Speaker, that is how important the budget statement is. It is regrettable that the motion before this House proposes reducing the number of days to debate the government's general economic policy from six, as it is now, to four. We believe that four days of debate on the government's economic and social policy is not enough. The budget shows us not only the economic policy that the government intends to take but it also brings in tax changes that take effect immediately after it is presented. So the budget affects Canadians immediately after it is presented through the many tax changes in it. It deserves more than 3 per cent of the sitting days.

Mr. Speaker, in 1985, when the budget was presented and deindexed old age security pensions, by raising questions in the House and debating the budget we succeeded. That is how important Parliament's role is. It is at a time like this that we are reminded of the importance of Parliament and of being here to debate current issues. It is in this Parliament that we made the public aware of the unfairness of the government action. People came down here and demonstrated in support of the Opposition and the government had to do an about-face. As a result, we still have indexed old age security pensions. That is why it is important to debate the economic and social statement contained in the government budget and to have enough time to do it.

Once again, the government is restricting the capacity of the elected members to make it accountable to the people. A government that restricts the capacity of the Opposition to question its actions is a government incapable to defend itself, a government that has failed and that should step down.

This becomes even more obvious if we look at the effect of the reduction in the number of sitting days on the oral question period. As I said earlier, it is because of question period that the government had to change a social and economic policy, set out in the budget in 1985, which would have adversely affected senior citizens in Canada. So, it is important, because we must remember that cutting 40 sitting days takes away 40 question periods. Given the number of questions asked daily, the government may have 300 to 400 fewer questions to answer every year. Let us not forget either the number of ministers who had to resign because of questions asked during question period over the six and a half years this government have been in power.

So, not only does the government want to reduce the number of days when questions can be asked during question period, but it is also trying in a way to cover up its unreliability.

Another important point I would like to make has to do with the restructurating of the House of Commons committees. The motion before us calls for a structure in which the standing committees would be grouped into five envelopes, each of which would include several standings committees and two legislative committees. This new structure would report to and be administered by a new standing committee called Standing Committee on House Management. The proposed structure, Mr. Speaker, will require a high degree of co-operation from all the parties represented in this House. As you know, it will be difficult at times to have an inspiring atmosphere of cooperation and trust, considering the difficulties our country is now going through.

Members of Parliament are aware that, since last September, the normal workings of our committees are impaired. You can ask members of all three parties, and even independent members, how many committes have been sitting since September. There are always excuses and, under the control of the government majority, there are no sittings. For example, the government was forced to designate some chairmen because there had been some resignations, but the government did not want to replace them as this was providing an excuse for not sitting. So, that explains the situation we are now experiencing.

In order to create a climate of trust, I wish all members of Parliament will do their best to ensure that this type of event will not recur. To that end, Mr. Speaker, we will need a lot of co-operation—and that is my worst concern. I personally see two reasons why co-operation will be required for this committee restructuration. First, this new Committee on House Management will apparently have great powers and plenty of work. As a consequence of the government proposal, the Committee on House Management will have many responsibilities and we, the Liberal members, think there is a risk that it won't be efficient, precisely because of that heavy workload. That, does not match our definition of efficiency.

The government will have a hard time to convince Canadians that efficiency will be enhanced by overloading a committee with work. In my opinion, that is not logical. One has only to look at the tasks that will be given to this new committee to know that it will be overburdened and, consequently, inefficient. The committee will be responsible, among other things, for the management of committees, consideration of the administration of the House, administration of private members business and checking of all questions of procedure. These three functions alone are too much for one committee, a situation that will completely paralyse the business of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I refer to the old tradition of the House which says that the rules and composition of a committee must be established in an objective way. Presently, all committee dealings are regulated by Standing Orders 100 to 122. I would like to quote the Précis of Procedure, third edition, chapter 14: "The House of Commons establishes, in conformity with Standing Orders or, occasionally, with a special order of the House, a mandate defining expressly the extent of the committees' business."

• (1700)

Now, if there are technical problems with the operation and composition of the committees, the answer can be found in the Standing Orders. In short, the Standing Orders are neutral and are not controlled by any political party in particular.

It would seem that if this government's motion is adopted, the House Management Committee will have precedence over the Standing Orders for matters concerning the operation of the House Committees. There is nothing positive about that.

Standing Orders control the committees, as I have just emphasized, and, as we know, the Standing Orders are neutral and are not controlled by anybody, but are applied by you, Mr. Speaker. According to the government's proposal, the new management committee would control the committees. This Committee will be controlled by its members and, because of the make-up of the House, by the governement who holds a majority, which means that every operation, every structure of this committe will be controlled by the government. So, with our current system, everything is done in cooperation with the Chair who renders its decision—and we know, Mr. Speaker, you are neutral. We will loseout. Therefore once again, instead of helping us to have more civilized debates, we will have to follow party lines and quibbling will prevail over efficiency.

Mr. Speaker, I have the feeling—and it has been the case since September, as I have said earlier—that our standing committees do not work very well and I wonder whether, until the election, the government really intends to make them work. Mr. Speaker, the Standing Committee on House Management proposal could very well end up clogging the whole system.

That is why Liberals in the Official Opposition object to that proposal.

There is also the whole question of legislative committees. We are told that legislative committees could only hear technical testimonies. What is that supposed to mean, Mr. Speaker? And who is to decide that any given testimony should be considered technical? The government, obviously. Members in the opposition could very well hold a different opinion. Once more, the government majority is going to crush the minority.

You are signalling that my time is over. But I wanted to contribute to this important debate on a parliamentary system that we should strive to preserve. I hope that government backbenchers will remember our parliamentary tradition and vote with the opposition to defeat this motion.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to be able to address this House of Commons on the subject matter of motion number 30, which deals with changes to the rules of this House.

Mr. Speaker, we call our rules; Standing Orders. Canadian parliamentary law began, of course, in 1867 and, in the last 124 years,—

[English]

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, point of order. My colleague and friend from Saint-Léonard has just given a good speech. I understand the haste of the minister for youth to make his maiden speech in the Chamber, but I wonder if he could just relent for a moment because we did not get an opportunity to put some questions to my friend from Saint-Léonard. I understood the minister was rising on questions. Could we revert?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, is there unanimous consent to revert to questions and comments? I did ask whether there was questions and comments. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments, the hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to commend my colleague from Montreal on his excellent submissions to the House. I would hope that his submissions will serve to convince hon. colleagues opposite of the unfortunate nature of the proposals that are before the House today.

I note that the hon. member for Saint-Léonard was elected to this House six and a half years ago in the general election of 1984. I also was first elected in that general election. The House will note that this hon. member has been a very active participant in the debates in this House, and in fact in all the workings of Parliament Hill.

Could the member indicate in his now lengthy experience in this House whether he believes that the present number of sitting days are adequate. Could he also tell me whether this Chamber itself is relevant to the workings of our parliamentary democracy? Could he advise the House whether in his personal view the people of Canada will accept the government's proposal that might suggest to some that members of Parliament are seeking to have one week's holiday for every three weeks worked. That is the concern among some of my constituents, that is the perception out there. Would the hon. member not agree with me that when this Chamber is not sitting, there is a perception out there in the public that members of Parliament are on holidays? Does any of his constituents share that particular concern?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for his generous words. My constituents in Saint-Léonard elected me for the second time in 1988. They elected me to come to this place to fight for their rights and to represent them. We see the situation that the country is in today. This country is on the verge of breaking up. We see thousands and thousands of not only Saint-Léonard constituents but Montrealers and Quebecers and Canadians all across the land are losing their jobs every day, businesses are closing, people are fed up the way the system is run.

Here this week, after taking an Easter break of 10 days—and I wonder how many Canadians take 10 days' break because of Easter—what are we debating? We are not debating how we are going to solve the crisis of how we are going to keep this country together. We are not debating how we are going to find jobs for Canadians who are losing jobs, or children that are starving. We are debating that we need 40 days extra to go to our ridings. That is what the government says, but I am wondering whether we will go to our ridings to listen to Canadians or try to take some days off or even try to sell some policy of the government that are not saleable.

That is what my constituents tell me. That is the message I tried to deliver in the 20 minutes I spoke. If we have enough time, I will make the point that the actual calendar, which is about 175 days, the government claims that we need a week a month to go to our ridings. We could have followed the actual calendar. We came back on February 25. What happened to the three weeks we were supposed to sit in January? We came back because of the war. Then we declared war and we went back home. On February 25 we had the budget. We had a couple of weeks of debate. Now we are debating because we want to go home and maybe we are going to come back in the middle of May.

How many Canadian workers have all this time off? We have all sorts of tools to help us in our work, for example, telephone calls, television, householders. We have a budget of over $150,000 to hire people to answer all of the problems that we have in the riding. We are elected to be in this place to present the legislation and solutions to have people working, to have a better place for our children and our grandchildren and keep this country together.

• (1710)

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I would like the previous speaker to comment on some of the things that I see in this legislation, particularly as it relates to discussions of budgets.

My only other experiences as an elected official prior to being elected to the House of Commons was on Surrey Council. There the council sat several times as a committee of the whole, probably in total six or seven days, looking at the budget.

I am on the health committee. We get to examine the budget for one hour because that is all the time the minister is coming before us. We would debate the budget in Surrey Council maybe over three or four council meetings; here it is now going to be restricted to four days.

What I see happening in these changes is that the government is trying to say that it can spend less time on a national budget, debating, looking and examining the expenditure of the country's money, than the Surrey Council will spend looking at a municipal budget.

So I would like the member's comments as to how he sees these new rules affecting our ability to look at the national budget.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, the budget is not simply a statement of figures. In the budget the government will show where it wants to take the country, where it stands on economic matters and social matters. It is very important that this House has all the time necessary, whether through committees or in the House here, to go item by item through the budget.

The member was telling us of his experience on a municipal council. I had my experience on a school board council. We had a budget of about $80 million and we used to take a week, close ourselves in and study the budget, and take it item by item. We used to prepare the budget. Here, we have a minister who gives us a speech which may be an hour, an hour and a half on national television, announcing that immediately people are affected by that.

We now have six days to debate the budget. The government wants to reduce that number to four, and then that is it.

An hon. member: That is it. And then they want to cut that back.

Mr. Gagliano: Yes, I agree with the member. I think we will have to have enough time, all the time necessary, because the budget is very important. That is where the government tells us what decisions it has made.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate, the hon. Deputy House Leader.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to be able to address the House of Commons this afternoon on the subject of motion number 30, which deals with changes to the rules of this House. We call our rules Standing Orders. Canadian Parliamentary Law began, of course, in 1867 and, over the years, we have evolved a set of rules about how to behave, how to enact laws, how to govern and how to ask government to be accountable to the nation.

Mr. Speaker, our rules, our standing orders, were first put together by J.G. Bourinot, who was the clerk of this house for 22 years, from 1880 to 1902. He relied to a large degree, on precedent and practice which came from the British House of Commons.

Once we had a clear idea of our rules, we began, as Canadians, to outline our own way of proceeding in the House and the Senate. Some would now term us well organized, rational, clear in our use of language and procedures and, Mr. Speaker, concise. Others may apply different epithets to their descriptions of the way this House operates. Being a dynamic and ever–changing group of men and women we, as parliamentarians, exhibit dynamism and willingness to change, in the ways in which we make laws.

We have produced, over the last 124 years, a plethora of rules and procedures. These are motivated by politeness, by legal simplicity and by history.

Motion 30, debated now, is one of the occasional attempts to change and modernize how this House operates. We have 159 Standing Orders, many of which are sub–divided into several parts. A lot of words govern our lives in this Chamber. Many of these are more than 120 years old.

Let me read, as an example, the very last standing order, number 159, written in 1867.

> It is the duty of the officers of this House to complete and finish the work remaining at the close of the session.

This rule came about because employees of the House were only engaged for the few months when members were in Ottawa, having arrived on horse-back, by boat, or by train.

Life has become far more complicated. People across this nation now have instantaneous information, via television broadcasting, and the staffing requirements in the House in this modern electronic age mean that specialization and dedication are full time requirements.

[English]

Some may have the opinion that we would all be better off if we had never heard, say for three months, what actually transpired in the House of Commons. That, of course, is not possible. We cannot go back as we move away from the agrarian age through to today's electronic age of information towards the 21st century in eight and a half years. We see a need to change the rules.

[Translation]

Indeed, this package of rule changes is one which has taken over 18 months to negotiate among all parties. It was outdated before we even adopted it, because we did not cover all the changes to be covered. Standing Order 158 says that, if the sergeant at arms takes someone into custody, that person cannot be released until a fine of $4.00 is paid to the sergeant at arms. Again, a rule from the nineteenth century. We are gradually modernising our rules, and, with or without the cooperation of the members opposite, we will continue to bring this House into the modern age.

[English]

Mr. Bourinot began the process of codifying our rules. He was followed by others and today, we use, as our reference, the sixth edition of Beauchesne for our rules, precedents, examples and expectations. I cannot, for instance, call the hon. member opposite an ass or a donkey. These are unparliamentary terms. Members of the equine family, small size, may not get approval either. I cannot even compliment the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on his dress. All these constraints are codified by our Standing Orders and Beauchesne.

[Translation]

Now let me come to the present set of proposals, Mr. Speaker. I would especially like to explain several of these proposed changes in detail.

As a first example, let me quote Standing Order 37(3). This rule relates to the provision of answers to questions by members. If a member is able to get on the priority list to be able to ask a question and the member is not happy with the answer, the member can appeal to the Speaker for an elaboration.

I won't read the entire rule, but the important proposal is the new sentence we want to add to 37(3). I will read this—

> Unless previously disposed of, the said notice shall be deemed withdrawn after the forty-fifth sitting day from the day of notice.

Mr. Speaker, with the present rule, a member could give notice today about unhappiness with an answer and ask the Speaker for it to be considered for a fuller answer. This process is called the late show and usually 3 requests are chosen, to be dealt with in the 30 minutes after the close of daily business.

• (1720)

Now, that sounds okay. But the reality is that these requests can languish on the list for a day, a week, a month or, Mr. Speaker, up to two years. This is absurd. The honourable member has probably completely forgotten about the request or the topic has become irrelevant. Obviously, the system needs changing.

The new proposal suggest that, if a late show question cannot be dealt with within 45 sitting days, and I emphasize that this is still more than 2 months, then the issue is dropped in favor of a more topical question.

[English]

That is quite a reasonable proposal, Mr. Speaker. This is only one of a negotiated 64 proposed changes. They were negotiated with the members of the opposition and our members, negotiated, examined and refined by procedural experts in the House. These have been examined in fine detail by platoons of lawyers, politicians and procedural clerks.

Of course, with those credentials, thousands of Canadians may say: "The devil with it, throw the lot of them out, the politicians and the lawyers." I am sure that no one here wants to discard the rules.

[Translation]

Of course, the opposition wants to discard these changes. The Liberals have proposed throwing out twenty one of these negotiated changes. The socialists over there on the left had many more that they wanted to throw out, and I say wanted, the past tense, Mr. Speaker, all, after negotiating and discussing and nodding and agreeing.

[English]

The only reason the NDP were late with their proposed throw-aways was because their House leader, the hon. member for Kamloops, forgot when he was supposed to make the amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I really feel sorry for him because it is very embarrassing. Now, if he would agree to this package of changes, perhaps the simplified rules would be easier to understand and remember. We all know, Mr. Speaker, that memory begins to fade as we grow older. I know that the Minister of Justice finds the hon. member for Kamloops very young, but one would not know that, judging by his memory.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, while we are on a roll and while we are moving quickly, I look forward to a resolution of this debate and the adoption of these simple, rational rule changes. Why don't we agree to begin work on the next package of rule changes? The next package could be looked at in the coming weeks and discussed and negotiated and tinkered with and we could adopt them by the end of June.

Perhaps 18 months was too long for discussion and negotiation, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps that was too much like the 19th century. Let us be realistic. We are now eight and a half years away from the 21st century. Maybe we can speed this up a little and modernize even more in the next six weeks.

Mr. Speaker, let me give the House another example of one of the proposed changes. This proposed change, Mr. Speaker, has to do with the use of television. We all know that the majority of Canadians absorb news solely from television and not from newspapers, radio, magazines or even gossip—they rely on television. TV, whether we like it or not, is the major dispenser of news and information in our modern age.

[English]

The best way for Canadians to watch and judge their legislators is to watch the proceedings on television. Not many persons may watch the House of Commons debates.

Mr. Butland: Not right now. They would be making a mistake now.

Mr. Danis: Perhaps people prefer programs such as Watching a Flower Grow. Some may say that watching the House of Commons is preferable to hot needles placed under finger nails. At least we can give people the opportunity to choose for themselves whether they want to watch the House or not.

[Translation]

One of the proposed changes, Mr. Speaker, Number 56 of this motion, proposes adding a new rule to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons. It reads:

> 56. That the following new Standing Order be added after Standing Order 119:
> 119.1(1) Any committee wishing to use the facilities of the House of Commons for the broadcasting of its meetings shall first obtain the consent of the House.
> (2) The Standing Committee on House Management shall establish, by report to the House of Commons, experimental guidelines governing the broadcasting of committee meetings. After concurrence by the House in such a report, any committee may permit the presence of the electronic media at its meetings, subject to the said guidelines.

Mr. Speaker, this proposed rule would broaden the reforms of the House begun by the McGrath Committee in 1985. Members of the House of Commons who work hard in committees deserve the chance to be seen and heard by their electors. It is often a criticism of this House that at any one time only 10 to 20 members may be there during a debate on a bill.

At that same time, however, there may be as many as seven Standing committees meeting on Parliament Hill. These committees of from 8 to 15 members hear witnesses—ordinary Canadians with a point of view. They could be analyzing and discussing policies which impact on all Canadians; they could be planning for future legislation; and they could be questioning bureaucrats and senior officials on details of the operation of government. This is a major and vital part of the duties of a member of Parliament.

This proposed addition to the rules will allow the broadcasting of committee proceedings. Now, not everyone, Mr. Speaker, likes this proposed rule. It would show who is in attendance at committees. It may show that good questions could get swamped by asinine showmanship.

Like the committee members themselves, all Canadians would have the chance to be involved in the legislative process. We can choose to be responsible and efficient. We are elected to be efficient, Mr. Speaker, and we are equal to that task.

Bring television into the process of the House. Then the television media persons would have the choice of showing clips of the work of members who do not normally qualify for consideration. You can sit at home and watch your member at work.

[English]

This is visible democracy, Mr. Speaker. It is accountability. It is seen to be responsible.

Some of the hon. members opposite may be rubbing their hands together in glee with the anticipation of a further chance for a quasi-Question Period. Indeed, some government members may not like this proposed change either. It may show a tie askew, a hair out of place, a look of bewilderment as a bureaucrat drones on about some esoteric point of legislation.

[Translation]

I don't think that will happen. I think that the reality of hard work, of knowledge, of dedication, of sincerity and indeed co-operation among members will show through.

Mr. Speaker, these proposals include various changes to the rules on Private Members' Business. I do not want to go into detail on these specifically, but I do think that some general comments are needed.

As a former Deputy Speaker and now as a minister, I know very well that members can produce relevant and well-thought out pieces of legislation. Some of these proposed laws eventually wind through the lengthy process now in place and become law. I cite as an example Bill C-223, in the name of the New Democratic Party member for Churchill, which concerns a day of mourning for persons killed or injured in the workplace. I cite also Bill C-239, changing the name of the riding of the Liberal member for the electoral district of Saint-Laurent. And the third example, Mr. Speaker, is the well-prepared Bill C-258 from the hon. member for Etobicoke, which established the Centennial Flame Research Award to publicize the contributions of persons with disabilities to Canadian public life.

I cite these as three examples of private members' legislation which received royal assent and are now Canadian law. But, and this is a big but, at this moment, more than 150 bills remain on the Order Paper, along with more than 700 motions of private members.

• (1730)

Mr. Speaker, something must be done. It is a lottery, a game of chance. It is what ordinary members know as the dreaded time to choose. Will my motion be chosen? Will my bill ever be debated through all stages, through to becoming law? The answer, sadly, is that there is very little hope of this happening in the limited time available. So we propose sitting longer in the day. We propose smoothing out some aspects of Private Members' Business. What we have before us are proposals that have been discussed and negotiated and talked over and changed and modified.

We must do two things, Mr. Speaker. First, complete this debate and vote on these changes.

Second, begin the next round of negotiations to have a second package of changes to the Standing Orders for June.

Given the statements made in the speeches by the House leaders of the New Democratic Party and the Official Opposition, pursuant to Standing Order 57, I give notice that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the calling of the Order of the Day for resuming the debate on Government Motion 30 conerning amendments to the Standing Orders of the House and on any amendment thereto, I shall move that the debate not be further adjourned.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the minister's speech. I will reserve my comments on the closure he has given notice of until another time. It may or may not happen.

What I wanted to talk about are two of the changes he mentioned in his speech. First, he discussed the question of Private Members' Business and he indicated how the private members' rules changes had been developed through lengthy discussion. I agree with him. That discussion took place in a standing committee of this House where, in my view, all of these rules should have been discussed.

My first question to him is, why is he unwilling to refer this motion to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections where the matter could be viewed, opinions from interested parties heard and a report made to the House in due course? As he knows, every private members' rule is verbatim from the report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections that was adopted in June 1990.

The second question has to do with televising the standing committees. He talks about the new rule and what a fine thing this is. He must be aware that Motion No. 11, on the government's list of orders on the Order Paper, is a motion moved by me, seconded by one of his own members, the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona, moving concurrence in the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. That report provided detailed rules for the televising of committees of this House. If it had been adopted by the House and if the government had called it for debate, it would have solved the problem he has proposed in the order and, in fact, would have guaranteed the right of committees to have cameras in the committee sessions, which is not guaranteed under the rule changes the government is proposing today.

It is clear that the government will, in fact, control the televising of committees in a very authoritarian way, typical of this authoritarian government.

I wonder if the minister could tell us why it is he has refused to deal with the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections which was an all-party committee, an all-party report, recommending televising of committees in a comprehensive way, instead of doing it in this piecemeal fashion in the Standing Orders.

His speech was sweetness and light. To someone who had just tuned in and watched that, one would think that the rule changes proposed were going to bring about the annus mirabilis. I can tell him that I think he could benefit from having studied the committee reports and refer these rules to committee in order to assist in their implementation.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments.

He put a number of questions. The first one was: Why was this rules package not referred to committee?

• (1735)

The hon. member, the member for Kamloops and the parliamentary secretary for the House Leader are very well aware, as are the Whips, of the difficulties caused by the opposition parties with regard to the committee structure that we have had in this House for a few months. The hon. member would know that this rules package has been on the table, negotiated, for approximately 18 months. Every single one of those rule changes, all 64 of them, have been negotiated with both opposition parties. There has been plenty of time to deal with those.

Mr. Milliken: No public input.

Mr. Danis: The member says there has been no public input. The hon. member represents by himself probably over 100,000 people. The hon. member who asked the question is very well versed in House procedure. I know that he was a participant in the negotiations that were held with mainly the parliamentary secretary to the House leader, so he was there—correct me if I am wrong—negotiated and dealt with the 64 points.

That is not the original package. The original package was changed by the government House leader at the request of the the Official Opposition. Some things were taken out at the request of the New Democratic Party. This is the package we believe to be a fair and honest package that we have proposed to the House. The member for Kingston and the Islands, who is an expert in procedure and has been for a number of years, even before he was in this House, if he could vote on a free vote, I am positive that the hon. member would support our package.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a couple of things on the record.

If television coverage of House committees comes, I will welcome that. But I hope that this government will not be authoritarian and will allow the media to decide which committee meeting will be covered. If we give that decision to politicians on the government side or on any side, we are looking for trouble.

Right now, when the newspapers want to cover a particular story in committee, they make the decision. We do not do that. There should be no difference when it comes to television coverage.

I also want to say that I am concerned about these changes because I think their main thrust is to limit debate. One of my concerns is that these changes are going to backfire from this point of view; they will increase public cynicism. Take, for example, the proposal of three weeks on and one week off. There will be a lot of Canadians who will identify the one week off as some kind of a break, some kind of a holiday. You and I know that that is not going to be true. But I am afraid it is going to contribute to cynicism. It is going to contribute to that very jaundiced, negative view that people have of this particular House.

I would like to ask the hon. minister a question. It has to do with these proposed rules changes and with the failure to deal with legislative planning.

As someone who was elected for the first time in 1988, I find it offensive the way the House works when it comes to planning legislation. I know the Liberals did it when they were in power and the Tories do it now that they are in power: Never give the opposition one extra moment to prepare; drop something on their desks 15 minutes before it happens, an hour before it happens, maybe sometimes a day, sometimes two. To me, that is not planning, and that is not a way to run a House. It is not a way to run Parliament.

My question of the hon. minister is this: Does he not recognize that this was a failure and that there has to be a lot more work done to allow for legislative planning?

• (1740)

Mr. Danis: I agree with my hon. friend that there should be more time for planning legislation. I just wish that he could attend some of the weekly meetings we have with the House leaders, the deputy House leaders, and the whips to see how hard the government House leader tries to get the co-operation of the opposition to do exactly what the hon. member suggests.

My reply to the hon. member would be to talk to his House leader. We are certainly ready to co-operate. We have tried many times, but we have been unable to do so and certainly not through lack of co-operation on the part of the government House leader. We know how flexible the government House leader is. He has been trying to co-operate.

The hon. member made two other comments. I am glad that he supports our rule changes which will have the effect of more TV coverage in committees. I certainly thank him for that. He has made negative comments with regard to the three weeks and one week. He knows as well as I do that when we consider the total number of hours they will be the same.

However, if I could speak for myself on that issue, I represent a riding in the province of Quebec which was one of the seven ridings that voted yes in the Quebec referendum on separation. There were only seven in the whole province. I also have MNAs who all represent the Parti Quebecois. They are trying to win their election and ensure that Quebec separates. The people in Quebec City sit, at most, six months a year from Tuesday afternoon—

Mr. Prud'homme: Four months.

Mr. Danis: The hon. member for Saint—Denis mentions four months. It is about that but certainly not more than six months a year. They sit from Tuesday at noon until Thursday at noon. The rest of the time they are in their ridings trying to make sure that Quebec separates. In the meantime under our system I have to be here five days a week all the time, from Labour Day to the end of June. I support the three weeks and one week. It will at least give me one week in the month where I can fight for Canada in my riding.

That is what I want to do, and that is why I support the change.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say on this subject we are debating. Just to remind the House and those who may be watching, we are debating some pretty far-reaching changes to the way we do our business here and the extent to which we will be able to do our business once the government rams this through.

There are a few specific points I want to make, but before doing so let me reflect on what my friend, the minister of fitness and amateur sport, has been saying. More to the point, let me reflect on the signal which he sent today. I thought it was, I say to him, a fairly sad day for him. Here is a fellow who has the reputation of being quite a brilliant lawyer, a man who in his former capacity as Deputy Speaker was one of the guardians of this place, one of the guardians of Parliament, of the rights of Parliament, and of the rights of private members. Here today he had really come full circle, with the spectacle of his standing there and saying something that he clearly does not believe. He read it well, but his heart was clearly not in it. The proof of the pudding, I say to my friend from Kamloops, the House leader for the third party here, was the minister's fairly nasty aspersions aimed at the member for Kamloops. That is not the minister of fitness and amateur sport. That is not the former Deputy Speaker whom we have all come to know and to like. We understand. We do not condone, but we understand that the man is not in his element today. He has been shoved a piece of paper and he has been told to stand and read it, or else. He does not believe what he said. Certainly he does not believe that we ought to have less opportunity to hold a government accountable, one of the principles that in his former capacity as Deputy Speaker he not only espoused but defended.

I am particularly disappointed in his performance today. On reflection, I say to him this is one night he should watch the rerun. He should really, before the night is out, sit back and watch when they play back today's proceedings of the House on television. He might want to come in tomorrow and not only apologize to the House, but to himself for that unseemly performance a few minutes ago.

If we were looking for some evidence that maybe the government is not stating up front what its real agenda is, or if we were looking for some proof that maybe there is something here that does not meet the eye or that on first blush does not look to be the case, it seems to me the proof of it is in the minister's final act before he sat down.

Here is what I mean. We hear the government spokesmen, the people on that side of the House, defend this in particular terms. They defend it as an improvement. That is the first argument. This is an improvement over what are the existing rules of Parliament. That is one of their arguments.

These people defend it in terms of more accountability and more opportunity to do the work that we are sent here to do. They defend it as a good idea that ought to stand up under scrutiny. They do all that, but then we watched what the minister did in his final act just a moment ago before he concluded his speech and sat down.

What did he say after a couple of days of debate? This is just the third day of debate on this issue. We have had a total of five or six hours altogether on an issue which will impact on the rights and abilities of every member of this Parliament, all 295 of us. It is an issue that will infringe on the ability of all 27 million Canadians to petition this place to have their issues raised in this place. An issue that important ought first of all to be debated more than four, five or six hours. That is all we have been debating it.

The minister espouses the importance of accountability in Parliament, says that we must do it right here and that the ideas he promotes on behalf of the government can stand up to scrutiny. He has done in his final act today something which puts the lie to everything he and his colleagues have said. He said that we have to rush this through, that we have to bring in closure and that is what he did in his final act: he gave notice of closure.

He said in unvarnished and unquoted terms to us and to the people of Canada: "Enough is enough. Tomorrow we are going to shut this place down. Tomorrow this debate is going to be over". That is in effect what he said in his last sentence or two.

He is the same man who in all his other mouthfuls in that 20-minute speech had been saying that we ought to be accountable, that we ought to scrutinize this. "This is such a brilliant idea", he is saying, "it will stand the scrutiny and the light of day". Having done that, he rushes in and says: "Enough light of day. Let's ram this through. Let's let the government use its majority as it did on the goods and services tax, on the free trade agreement, and on so many issues that are unpopular across this country". It just moves in its majority and rams it through.

That the minister who did that should be a former Speaker and should be a man who holds Parliament normally in such high regard is a particular disappointment for me, I say to him, and I believe for all members of this Chamber.

If there are some ideas here worth debating, let us take the time to debate them. I realize that appeal will probably fall on deaf ears too because the government has set things in motion. According to the minister's notice of motion, come tomorrow we will be punching our last few hours and having our last kick at the cat, as it were, in terms of saying what we believe is wrong with this. In the interest of having my opportunity to say what is wrong with it, let me move on.

• (1750)

By way of background, it was my privilege to have been a part of the committee that preceded the McGrath committee after the 1984 election. I was part of the earlier committee of which His Honour, the now Lieutenant–Governor of Newfoundland, was also a member. The minister of energy, the Deputy Prime Minister, and the gentleman who is now the Governor General were members. The former member and now senator Tom Lefebvre was the chairman. The member for Peace River was a member. The gentleman from Winnipeg Transcona was a member and, as I say, I was a member. I think there were 18 of us altogether who over a two–year period in 1982–1983 did under the chairmanship of Tom Lefebvre, a very thorough job of revamping and reviewing the rules of the House to ensure they would better serve the people who sent us here.

Indeed the committee did its job so well that after the government changed in 1984 and the new administration under the present Prime Minister took over it essentially restruck the committee. Given that the government had changed, it obviously made a government member chairman in the person of Mr. McGrath. It restruck the committee with almost all the same members and the committee in short order, in a matter of several months, brought in under Mr. McGrath's leadership essentially the same package of recommendations that the former committee under the chairmanship of the now Senator Lefebvre had worked on for a couple of years.

What does that tell us? First of all it tells us that the job had been well done. It also tells us that the job had the acquiescence or the support of two different parties which subsequently formed the government: one before 1984 and one after 1984. It goes without saying that it also had the support of the third party, the NDP, that had a couple of members on both the committee prior to 1984 and the one after 1984.

For the first time in literally decades we had an all–party consensus on a number of far–reaching measures which would not only streamline this place but make it more accountable and give more power to the private members. In general it would streamline the place in a way that would redound to the benefit of the people across this country who sent us here. That is the background.

The sad truth is that today, less than five or six years after those proposals were put through under the sponsorship of the present administration, we now see a wholesale gutting procedure. You can call it nothing else. You can put the best face on it you want to. You can sit there and tell me that you have come up with a good package, but I know the difference.

I know that the member for Peace River, the deputy government House leader, who was on that committee in 1982, 1983 and again in 1985 made a very worth–while contribution. Indeed, if we were to go back and check the minutes we would find a number of places where the very procedures he is now scuttling are ideas that he promoted. I remember particular occasions where he was the mover of motions to bring about some of the changes that he now is party to undoing.

If we are concerned as individual politicians why it is people out there have a certain cynicism about us at times, is it any wonder when they see a gentleman like the gentleman from Peace River do a Jekyll and Hyde on this one and when they see the minister of fitness and amateur sport do what he did just now, he a former guardian of this place as the Deputy Speaker.

I have listened during the last two or three days to the debate. I have heard Tory MPs say with great passion how they want to get back to their electorate. They want to go home. They want to go to their constituencies. They want to go back and actually talk to their electors. They are actually admitting in public that they want to talk to Canadians.

That alone ought to be reason enough for us to embrace this whole thing so fast, before they change their minds, because we now have an army of men and women numbering more than 100 over there who actually had a road to Damascus experience.

• (1755)

They actually want to talk to the people they have been running away from for the last couple of years, to people out there who want to talk to them about the GST, to tell them what they feel about the GST, to people who wanted to tell them what was on their minds about closing rural post offices but could not find them. They were not answering their telephones or their letters. These people could not have their petitions raised in the House of Commons. People would send petitions over there and not get a response. So they sent them to us and we would raise them on behalf of the people of St. John's East, Peace River, Calgary and all these other places across the country. These were people who were disenfranchised, in effect, people whose members had abandoned them for the last two years. Now, thanks be to goodness, miracles never cease to happen. Those same people over there have had their road to Damascus experience. They have seen the light and now want to go home and talk to the same people who heretofore they kept running away from on GST, on fisheries issues, and on so many other issues.

I see that for now my time is up. I thank you for your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, and will have a little more to say another day.

SPEAKER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member. At another moment of course he will have the right to continue. However, now I am called upon to report to the House on a matter that was raised on Monday.

On Monday, April 8, 1991, the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing rose on a point of order concerning Government Motion No. 30, the motion dealing with the proposed changes to the Standing Orders of the House.

The hon. member argued cogently that this motion contains many distinct propositions. He then went on to ask the Chair "to divide Motion No. 30 into five distinct motions and to permit each to be debated, amended and voted on separately".

The hon. government House leader, the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Calgary West contributed to the brief discussion that ensued. The Chair took the matter under advisement and undertook to return to the House as soon as possible. I am now prepared to rule on the matter.

Government Motion No. 30 now being debated consists of 64 separate proposals, as well as paragraphs relating to its coming into force. I have carefully considered the motion and the arguments put forward by hon. members. I have equally carefully reviewed the weight of precedent and practice with regard to the Chair's discretionary power in such a situation.

Although it is clear that the Speaker has the authority to divide complicated questions, it is equally true that this power has only very rarely been exercised. In this situation, I have been guided by the cautionary note sounded by Speaker Lamoureux in his ruling of March 23, 1966:

> It is only in exceptional circumstances and when there is little doubt about it that the Speaker can intervene and, of his own initiative, amend the resolution proposed by an hon. member.

Therefore, after serious reflection, I undertook discussions with the leadership of the three parties. Following those consultations, I wish to inform the House that the Chair proposes to deal with Government Motion No. 30 in this manner. All proposals will be debated together but they will be voted upon in three groupings, those groupings being: proposals relating to private members' business, namely those numbered 38 through 45 and 60 through 64; proposals relating to committees, namely those numbered 46 through 59; and all other proposals, namely those numbered 1 through 37, as well as those separate un-numbered paragraphs relating to the terms and conditions of the coming into force of the motion.

With regard to the amendment of the hon. House leader of the Official Opposition, a division on that question will precede the divisions on the groupings I have just outlined.

In summary, then, there will be a single debate on Motion No. 30 and the House will vote on the motion in the following manner: (1) a vote on the amendment of Mr. Dingwall, (2) a vote on the proposals relating to Private Members' Business, (3) a vote on the proposals relating to committees, (4) a vote on all other proposals including the paragraphs relating to the coming into force of the motion.

I wish to express my sincere appreciation to all hon. members for their contribution to the Chair's consideration of this question. Your co-operation does great credit to this place and obviously obviates the necessity of the Chair to make unilateral interventions that might be of some difficulty in terms of precedents to both sides at some later date. I thank hon. members.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to clarify the situation. If the vote on the amendment that is now before the House were to take place early tomorrow, is it then possible to move other amendments to the motion that has been proposed? If so, I presume that Your Honour is allowing that to take place and the amendments would not necessarily have to follow the groupings that Your Honour has divided for the purposes of the vote. In other words, any amendment would be disposed of first.

Mr. Speaker: If I understand the hon. member's question correctly, I think that the answer is in accord with the hon. member's suggestion. I would however ask the hon. member to discuss the matter with me, perhaps just after adjournment, or with one of our table officers just to be sure that we completely understand the issue.

I think that I do understand it and I do not think that there is a problem, if I can put it that way.

It being six o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24 (1).

The House adjourned at 6.01 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I seek your clarification on a point of order. I refer to Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 335 on the sub judice convention. It says:

> Members are expected to refrain from discussing matters that are before the courts—It is a voluntary restraint imposed by the House upon itself in the interest of justice and fair play.

It goes on to say in citation 338 (3) that the convention applies to motions. As we sit, the issue of closure is before the Alberta Court of Appeal. The Ontario Attorney General has asked this court to rule that the use of closure is unconstitutional and in violation of section 18 of the Constitution Act.

I seek some guidance since this is before the courts, the whole matter of what we have just done. Is it appropriate that we proceed when closure is still before the courts, in recognition of the sub judice convention?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make two comments.

First, I think it was very clear from the Speaker's ruling of just 24 or 48 hours ago—I have forgotten the exact time—that one of the prime prerogatives or privileges of this House of Commons is to make and enact its own rules. It was a very important ruling in relationship to the particular issue we have before us, and it is a ruling which I think applies in this particular case.

Second, the NDP House leader should be very careful in raising a point of order such as this one today when he will know that his own colleagues and kissing cousins in the Ontario House moved closure last night.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to thank the hon. member for Kamloops for raising that and the parliamentary secretary. The sub judice convention only applies in criminal cases and when a trial has begun in civil cases. I express regrets that we must carry on.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if it is another point of order, but I ruse just for clarification.

The parliamentary secretary to the government House leader was inaccurate. Closure was not introduced in the Ontario House at all. He had better do his homework.

AMENDMENTS TO STANDING ORDERS

The House resumed from Wednesday, April 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 19027) and amendment of Mr. Dingwall (p. 19156).

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in the debate today on what I consider to be an extremely serious matter.

It seems that this government's public relations expertise has just fallen to rock bottom. Here we are debating rule changes in this assembly that would create a better atmosphere in the House and would attempt, at least in part, to re-establish the one element upon which parliamentary government depends in order to be successful.

That element of course is the element of trust. Here we have this morning, just two and a half days into a very serious debate, the government bringing down closure and not allowing those members who wish to speak in this debate the time to make their presentations.

This Chamber will be shut down on the debate tomorrow at 1 a.m. It is not a very good principle to set, in my view, at a time when we are debating changes to the Standing Orders.

I have listened for the last couple of days, both in the House and in my office via television, to the various speeches that have been made. I must say that a lot of very excellent ideas have been put forward.

The speakers who have preceded me have attempted to use a band-aid approach on a very serious wound or have tried to treat a disease when in my view the animal, that is the House of Commons, is dead in terms of its being a democratic and viable legislative body.

For the life of me I cannot understand or appreciate any element of the work we do here as ordinary members of Parliament to have any bearing or relationship whatever on the legislative process.

The reasons for this are many, not the least of which is that we are saddled with an archaic institution that still insists on allowing the executive branch of government not only to be part of the legislative branch but in fact to dominate the legislative branch and indeed to control it. Nothing could be more absurd than that kind of situation.

In order to reinforce or to maintain that control the government of the day, whether it is the present one or all the previous ones, uses the ancient institution known as confidence. In order for the government to survive we have allowed the myth to continue in this Parliament that says: "If the government loses the confidence of the House, it must resign."

Yet, in practice this myth in terms of confidence has not been applied and has not been used in this Chamber for I do not know how many decades. Really, it is a hollow myth, a hollow threat, that every Prime Minister and every cabinet uses in order to maintain solidarity in the ranks of the government of the day.

In the meantime it deprives—I am speaking now of confidence—us as members of Parliament to act as legislators. All we do is debate, discuss and vote. If you are in the opposition, you almost always vote against the government. If you are on the government benches, you almost always vote with the government. If you decide to bolt the party line on a given vote and you are a member on the government side, you make absolutely certain that your vote will not bring down the government and that there are enough government members in order to maintain its majority in the House.

I preface my speech this morning with this general overview on confidence and the fact that we are not really a legislative body of government any longer but strictly a rubber stamp. We are in the midst of change in this country. Whether we like it or not this country is changing radically. At this point in time we do not even know with any degree of certainty whether we are going to have a country in two years' time that includes, for example, the province of Quebec. We do not know if Quebec secedes whether we are going to be part of the west, or whether the maritimes are going to remain within the old Dominion, as it was once called, or the Commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker, this change obviously is coming to the House of Commons as well. Members of Parliament are feeling more and more frustrated. I notice a malaise in this Chamber every day. Next month I celebrate my twentieth anniversary in this House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Thank you very kindly. I was elected on May 31, 1971 in a by-election. My opponents back home said: "Oh, well, by-elections are by-elections; you win one and when the general election comes along you will be defeated". I don't know why I have been re-elected so many times, but I know I am not the only one in this Chamber to experience this.

I have been here long enough to know that when I sense this malaise developing in this House—that has been here for several years in fact—one of the reasons for it is because we do not feel as though we are part of a legitimate legislative process. We do not write laws. We are not directly responsible to our constituents for the laws that we vote for or against in this Chamber. When was the last time anyone wrote a bill on this side of the House, or a backbencher on the other side of the House, that actually became the law of the land?

Members say: "Oh, well, committees have been reformed, you can go to committees". What are committees? Committees are just a reflection of this Chamber. Why does the government find find it so difficult to maintain its membership in committees on a day to day basis, and therefore wants more time off? It is not so much that members would rather spend their time in their constituencies—certainly that is one reason—but the other reason, I am convinced, because I feel it on this side of the House, is a sense of uselessness. It is a sense that you can produce the best report that committee has ever produced, and all it does is gather dust on the shelf.

It is not just the fault of this government. I have seen it with many governments. In all likelihood it would happen—I am quite quite sure it would happen—if my party was in power at this time under our present rules.

The first point I want to make is that I do not like the idea of the executive branch being part of the legislative branch. I think it should be separate. It should be appointed by a Prime Minister who is directly elected by the people. Cabinet should be responsible to him and not to the House. Its duties and responsibilities should be limited, as in the States, as in France, as in West Germany or Germany as it is now called, to simply writing policy and giving policy directions for the legislative branch to legislate for. We should be the framers of bills in this House, and that should be our only job.

Well, how do we do it? It should be done in committees. Committees, should draft bills, or subcommittees of committees should be the real drafters. That is where lobbyists will be heard, that is where technocrats will be heard; that is where individual Canadians and the groups they represent, powerful and less powerful, will be heard. They come to the subcommittees and present their briefs on a given policy. From there, the subcommittee, with its drafters, drafts a bill. The bill then goes to the full committee which examines that bill thoroughly—and I mean thoroughly. That is where the work is done.

Then the bill is presented to the House by the chair of that committee and the subcommittee, the two chairs.

Then we debate the merits. Throw the whips out. They are not needed. Are we not intelligent enough to know after several months of intense scrutiny whether a bill is a good bill for our constituents, for the constituents in Newfoundland as well as northern Ontario, the interior of B.C.? Do we not know as well as the technocrats who draft the bills now whether those bills are going to be accepted?

In a democracy, as I understand it, we should not be telling the people what we think is good for them based on the expertise on the treasury benches and their executive assistants and their deputy ministers and all the other experts. The people of this country should be telling us what they think is good for them. We should be, after listening to them, drafting the legislation and debating it here in this House, not with the threat of confidence hanging over us, that some political party's platform is going to go down the tube if the bill is defeated, but debate it here on its merits as we see fit.

I will give you an example. I am an abolitionist. I am opposed to capital punishment on many grounds, but I know that if a bill came to this Chamber, under what I am suggesting is the proper legislative approach, that it will in all likelihood pass. I would still vote against it, but when I went home I would have to assume total responsibility for the position I took.

I could not say it was party policy. I could not say that the New Democrats, generally speaking, across the country, as I understand it, are opposed to capital punishment. I would have to say: "I am sorry, Derek Blackburn, your member of Parliament, is opposed to capital punishment. Even though I know that the will of the nation was expressed in that vote, I went against the will of the nation and the majority. I am prepared at this point in time with the upcoming election to take my chances." That to me is real democracy. That is one example. There are many, many other examples we could use.

I am quite certain that I would not be happy with the outcome of the vote, but I would have to accept it just as our citizens today are anything but happy with the way we legislate up here on many occasions and they are getting tired of sitting back and saying: "Hey look, I don't like what you are doing, but I guess there is nothing I can do about it."

My friends opposite know and we know on this side of the House that the citizens of this country are saying we are tired of not being listened to. We are tired of exercising democracy every four years by going to the ballot box and then it is gone. Nobody is listening to what we think is right. Nobody is listening up there in Ottawa to what we think the country should be doing or where it should be going.

One very large reason for this is because we are not legislators anymore. I am quite convinced that on any given day of any given year regardless of what party is in power, about 20 people run this country. We have executive democracy. We have allowed this country to go from absolute monarchy over the centuries to an absolute prime ministership as long as there is a majority sitting on the government side.

If I feel frustrated sitting on this side, I am only imagining how I would feel if I was sitting over there. I am not trying to be mean when I say that. There must be complete and utter frustration on both sides of this House because I feel it day in and day out.

I want to give you an example. I went across the street the other day to one of our Parliament Hill offices to have a fairly simple bill—there is a series of private members' bills, that I want to introduce some time in the next session, but the one that I discussed with the woman across the street, the law officer, was a fairly simple one. She said it will take at least two months and possibly four before she would have it for me. I was absolutely shocked. I thought maybe a couple of weeks. I said: "Well, what's the problem?" She said: "I am the only one at the present time employed to draft private members' public bills. There is one other vacancy in the office, but it hasn't been filled." I said: "I wonder how many law officers are employed by the Crown to draft government bills." She said: "a little over 1,700."

• (1210)

That gives us a very realistic aspect of what is wrong in this House. We have 1,700 law officers of the Crown—give or take 100—whose primary responsibility it is to draft legislation for the government. We have one law officer to take care of all the private members' public bills needs in this Chamber. That really should be a question of privilege. I think it is a legitimate question of privilege because that prevents me from carrying out a legitimate function of my office. I will leave it at that for the time being.

Another aspect of what is wrong around here is that committees have no power and no clout. We cannot threaten senior civil servants. When I say that we cannot threaten I mean that we cannot order senior civil servants to do what we think is right.

I went to a meeting of the Standing Committee on National Defence on estimates—I am no longer a permanent member of that committee—a couple of weeks ago. Estimates of $13.2 billion this year for defence, I believe. I had seven minutes in which to question the Associate Minister of National Defence, on $13.2 billion.

After she had finished her opening remarks, the committee of seven members, I think, had about one hour and ten minutes in which to question that minister, who comes before the committee once a year on estimates. Could you imagine this sham, this charade happening in the United States, in the United Kingdom, or in Germany?

We could begin reforms in this House if we had a real supply power in this House to withhold supply. In the German system the Minister of Finance brings in a budget, the budget goes to a budgetary committee of the lower House, that committee has 30 days in which to revise, add to, or subtract from in order to achieve a majority vote in the House. If it does not receive a majority vote, the budget is dead. It does not go back to the Minister of Finance, but is re-written by another committee of the lower House. That original budgetary committee is dissolved. It has no political debts and owes no favours to anyone. When its duty is done it is finished.

Mr. Speaker, I have only 20 minutes today and I think most of my time is gone, if I am not mistaken. I simply wish to sum up by saying that unless we, as members of Parliament take hold of this institution and shake out the cobwebs and get rid of these archaic, irrelevant Standing Orders—and I do not care whether our speeches are five minutes or 50 minutes long, that is not the issue—. The issue is that this should be a legislative body, where bills are truly initiated. The Executive has no business being part of the legislative process.

We could have an Executive outside this House with 10 Cabinet ministers for policy direction and the formulation of policy. The bills should be initiated in subcommittees and committees, be passed in this House, and not be based stringently on partisan political lines. The people of this country are fed up with partisanship. They are fed up with us scoring brownie points in debate here. All we are is a pale reflection or imitation of the Oxford Union 50 years ago. My God, if that is not an indictment of this body as a legislative body, I do not know what is.

We have to change our ways or our ways are going to be changed for us. We are going to lose what minuscule influence on the legislative process we now have. Then I am confident and convinced that the yelling, the screaming, the lack of decorum, and the way we act like chimpanzees—and I am sorry to insult chimpanzees when I say that—because Question Period is a jungle and a zoo, would disappear or certainly dissipate. After all, when you have no power and no influence and no clout and are paid $100,000 a year, what is left to do but to get up and scream, shout and holler. I am disgusted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate. The hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

I would like to inform the House that, under Standing Order 57, there are no questions or comments from now until 1 a.m.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to continue the debate on the rule changes now before Parliament. They have been proposed in a way and are now are in the process of being imposed, I think, now that the government has invoked closure.

The rule changes here do not follow the same procedure as a piece of legislation would follow in the House of Commons. When the rules change this time it will happen on one reading, so to speak. That approach is very different from a bill, because these pieces of legislation are reviewed two or three times at committee and in the House before finally being approved.

I heard the remarks of the last hon. member and I enjoyed them. However, I would like to separate myself from the portions of the remarks that apologised for some of the rough edges in our democracy. I think democracy should have a few rough edges. We have rules that reflect some of those rough edges.

I recently noted that the member for Gander—Grand Falls pointed out that the reasons why the benches down here in the House are not capable of being moved up closer or rearranged is because we have to have two sword lengths between the front benches. That is a manifestation of the reality that things can become a bit rough and tumble once in a while in a democracy. I would not want to see it tidied up so much that we could not have some real aggressive debate.

In any event, I want to point out at the outset that I and my colleagues are not opposed to changes in the rules. I know it is fair to say that we are not even opposed to each and every one of the rule changes proposed here.

There are some reasonably evolved, logically written, new rule changes that will improve the functions of this House. We are not opposed to rule changes that will make committees of the House more permanent or better targeted in their use of resources. The proposed rule change that would abandon the bell ringing when two votes are scheduled at the same time is so terribly logical that one would wonder why the bells were capable of being rung twice in the first place.

Having said that, I want to point out another item. The object of changing these rules is Parliament, not government, and that is a very important distinction. Parliament, oversees and generates the legislation and oversees government. That oversight function is something I want to mention later in my remarks.

Throughout all this I suppose we should not forget the Senate, which also has a legislative and oversight function.

In our House we have two structures that carry on this oversight function and the legislative function. One is this House of Commons and the other is our committees. In dealing with these proposed rule changes we have to assess the impact of these changes on the House, on committees, on the effectiveness of the legislative function, and on the oversight function.

The area I want to address more particularly today is the oversight function of committees. I have to note, sadly, that as we address these rule changes we appear to have abandoned consensus as a necessary part of the rule change process. Why is that consensus important? I would hope that all members would agree that it is important. It is because each of us in this House were elected as equals and we sit here as equals with the same goals. We are all in the same boat as members of Parliament.

There are some basic principles that do not always get articulated that lie at the root of this structure here in Parliament and why we have rules here. For example, what if the government proposed to reduce the number of sitting days from the current approximately 175 down to, let us say, 10? We know that our Charter of Rights requires that Parliament sit a minimum once per year, I believe it is. Let us say the government proposed 10 sitting days per year. There really is not any other legal obstacle to the government doing that. I am not suggesting that the government would, but in the current rule changes the sittings are reduced from approximately 175 days down to about 135.

Those principles that underlie the rules in this place are a lot older than this House itself. I just want to articulate a few of them because I have not heard them read too often in the House. Most of us read them, but we have not memorized them. They are of course contained in Beauchesne and probably contained in other parliamentary documents going back years, but they are the rules. I quote:

> The principles that lie at the base of English parliamentary law, have always been kept steadily in view by the Canadian Parliament; these are: To protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority; to secure the transaction of public business in an orderly manner; to enable every Member to express his opinion within limits necessary to preserve decorum and prevent an unnecessary waste of time; to give abundant opportunity for the consideration of every measure, and to prevent any legislative action being taken upon sudden impulse.

There are some buzz words that I know members on the government side like to hear, like rules that would prevent waste of time. There are words in there that I in opposition like to hear, words that would give me all the time I need to discuss and debate rule changes and legislation.

I know I have 20 minutes here and I accept that limit. I accept my limit and I am going to use most of it here. However, those principles are very important. I think that the government has abandoned some of those principles in proceeding the way it has with the rule changes, not just in imposing closure but in the way it has decided to proceed without consensus.

We have three functions here that permit our parliamentary democracy and our democratic country to carry on. They are the legislative, executive and judicial functions. That is pretty basic high school political science. Let us not forget that we in this country and others before us, our forefathers, had to fight for the legislative parliamentary function. We had to fight for it and our fathers died for that.

It happened not that long ago in Upper Canada and in Lower Canada, historically referred to as the Papineau and the Mackenzie rebellions of approximately 1837. Those were important events. In that sequence of historical events our forefathers had to pick up guns and went out to fight the King's Privy Councillors who were called the Family Compact and they were through the Governor imposing rules and laws here on the people of what was then Lower Canada and Upper Canada.

They had to go out and fight, and a number gave up their lives. Some were hanged later for treason for fighting for that parliamentary right, that legislative function that we have here now. This Parliament is charged, I assume, with carrying out that continuing legislative and oversight function. That is our job. I get a little nervous here when I see the Queen's Privy Councillor standing in this House moving closure on rules governing Parliament. Somehow, that is a conflict. I almost want to say it is a point of order. I almost want to say it is a matter of privilege. Somehow it is inappropriate for a Queen's Privy Councillor, a member of the executive branch, to stand in this House in the face of all the rights and freedoms we fought for and move closure to impose new rules which impair or run up against those principles I read earlier.

In many respects, as I think about that, I see the government ministers treating the legislative function of Parliament as a branch of government. I have heard that stated in this House before. How could one see it otherwise when in order to accomplish the executive function that the Queen's Privy Councillors have, the minister finds it necessary to come to this House and change its rules and to impose them on this House and to use closure in doing that.

That is why consensus is important. That is why I regret that it is not there.

I submit that we in this country cannot permit the executive branch of government to make the rules for Parliament. They did not let it happen at the time of the Magna Carta, they did not let it happen in 1756, and we should not be letting it happen now. We should not be permitting the incursions of executive authority that have occurred. I accept that they have occurred over the years. It has been a slow process. To the extent that they have occurred, they are impairing the functions of this House.

In any event, we have to make our own rules in this place and we have to do it based on the principle that we protect the minority from the tyranny of the majority. That is why consensus is important.

I ask who is speaking for Parliament in this debate. If anyone hears from the other side, and every person on the other side of this House is a member and a player and a voter in this House, that we have to change the rules because government needs these rule changes to get legislation through, or our party or caucus in this House needs these changes, I say do not listen to them. It is not the government that needs the rules. It is Parliament that needs the rules. I suggest that I am seeing too much of a tilt here in favour of what government needs and not what Parliament needs.

In doing a bit of preparation for my remarks, today I stumbled on a little discussion on the state of affairs in the Australian parliament. It is a little outdated, a little simplistic, but the writer noted as follows:

> In discussing Parliament, it is necessary to separate its key constitutional position from the rather subsidiary role which it now performs.

He is saying that in theory it has a pretty good looking role.

> Constitutionally, Parliament is the linchpin of the democratic system, a great debating forum in which legislation is discussed and amended, in which policies are debated and criticized, and in which the actions of the government are overseen.

Sadly, he goes on to explain why that is really not what is going on now, and he says:

> The government, through its majority, can restrict debating time and force the rapid passage of legislation. Members of Parliament have few staff or research facilities. The "committee" stage of legislative procedure, in which a bill can be examined clause by clause, has proved ineffective as a means of scrutinizing the huge volume of legislation.

Then he goes on. That was a sorry state of affairs. I almost felt a little sorry for them there in Australia. I do not think things are quite that bad in the Canadian Parliament, but I am nervous. We are close.

• (1230)

I was elected in 1988. Since I have been here I have had a feeling that Parliament is not fulfilling all of the functions that it should be. While I am still a rookie, and maybe there is more going on around here than has caught my eye, I feel that there is not enough going on.

Among the three branches of the democratic system, we have the legislative, the executive and the judicial branch. Parliament is the one that we, the people, had to fight for and put in place, not the judicial and not the executive. We had to fight to fight for, build and create Parliament. Any rule change that is going to impair parliamentary function is an error and should not be passed.

In a funny kind of way, as we all should be working to protect Parliament, maybe we should be a little frustrated by these evolutionary changes in Parliament that have diminished its role. If you look over your shoulder and look out on the street and read the editorials, maybe you see just a little bit of the fire and of the impetus that gave rise to the rebellions in the last century. Not that we are close to that now, but the people can get angry. I think that a little bit of that is happening right now.

I would like to address more specifically a couple of the rule changes as they relate to the committee oversight function. An example is item No. 52 governing Standing Order 113. Here the government has suggested that witnesses who come before a legislative committee to review legislation after second reading should only be called on technical matters. Where did that term come from? I do not think anybody knows where that term came from. As I search for a rationale or a logic for the term "technical matters", as a lawyer I become a little bit curious about that. It does not come from tradition. I have not seen it as a precedent and I have not even seen a definition, but it means something like dotting the i's and crossing the t's. Somehow that is a most inappropriate restriction to put on a legislative committee. If you have a change in a bill governing tax credits to seniors, surely you have to ask seniors what they think about the bill or how the bill will impact on them and not restrict that group to whether or not the government lawyers have dotted the i's and crossed the t's. There is much more than that.

I am going to move on quickly to a second area that was brought to my attention by the chair of the Joint Standing Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations. There is an apparent omission in item No. 53 governing the selection of alternates who would sit on committees. The new rules apparently require that the alternates be selected from the envelope involved. Unfortunately, that particular standing committee, the Joint Standing Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations, is not in any of the envelopes. It is a joint committee and, therefore, the restriction on selecting alternates from an envelope has no place.

In discussion with the parliamentary secretary to the House leader, there was an understanding that alternates for that committee could be selected from the entire opposition caucus or the government caucus, as the case may be. I want that to be on the record.

Another of the proposed changes deals with the reduction of sitting days from 175 days to approximately 135. I have already discussed the principles that should provide ample time for debate of issues, but how does that change affect committees?

I suggest that by squeezing more government business into fewer days, this rule change will take away sitting days from committees. That may result in committees abandoning some of their oversight work. That oversight work is extremely important. One of the committees I sit on, the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General, is about to look at estimates involving the expenditures of sums greater than this country has ever spent before. We are advised it will take 13 days just to skate through it.

As I look at the possible parliamentary calendar here, with a possible adjournment foisted upon us, or planned by the government, I am getting a little nervous that we will not have an opportunity to look at those estimates. This is at a time when our government is spending its brains out. The public assumes that Parliament is exercising some scrutiny or oversight on spending. I can tell them that we will be lucky to get a half dozen committee meetings in scrutinizing this expenditure in the Justice and Solicitor General area. So I am a little nervous about that and I hope that members opposite will take that into consideration.

Just because we reduced the sitting days to 135 does not mean, of course, that Parliament cannot sit longer. It is quite possible that the government and all members would decide to sit for greater than 135 days. But I do not like the principle of squeezing the sitting days of Parliament to a minimum. If it serves government, that is great, but, as I pointed out earlier, if it does not serve Parliament, it is wrong.

What about some rule changes that would assist Parliament? There are many of those currently being discussed. They have not made their way on to the Order Paper.

I want to conclude by saying that the absence of consensus here is a serious mistake by government members, if they proceed without it. A good rule should sell itself in this House because it subscribes to logic and common sense. If it does not, it should not be passed without consensus.

Those are my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, prior to being elected to this place in 1988 I, through the course of my lifetime, had followed Canadian politics and Canadian history to a extent. Through the course of my readings I read biographies of John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Tommy Douglas, Mackenzie King, to name some of them. Through the course of each one of these biographies I came to look on this place, the House of Commons, as a place where the elected members could come and present arguments of their constituents, arguments of groups they were interested in, and in fact their own arguments, before the House of Commons.

I had the impression, perhaps wrongly, that these remarks were important. They were part of our history. Often we look back to speeches of various people within the House of Commons and we hear quoted past remarks of our great politicians.

These politicians have moulded what we have today in Canada, what we as Canadians are proud of in being Canadians.

• (1240)

It has changed the way this country has operated, with the effect of its social programs and its social safety net that is unlike anything else in North America and certainly second to none, I would suggest, in the world.

This was part of the parliamentary process, the process of debate, the cut and thrust. I agree that as times change rules and regulations must change. In law it is the growing tree analogy: as the tree grows so must the branches tend to reach out and encompass or take in the changes of changing society.

The changes that should be brought in are changes, particularly in a parliamentary process, that assist the vast majority of people in Canada to be heard in Parliament, to have their input put before the House of Commons. In looking through these books of history I saw the job of a parliamentarian, the job of an elected member of Parliament: to listen, to sift out and to bring back to Parliament the views and ideas of his or her constituents and to be able to present those to the governing party, if you were in opposition; to your cabinet, if you were a backbench member of the governing party; or, as a cabinet minister, to your cabinet colleagues and to your caucus.

What I have seen since I have been here has shattered some of those illusions I had. What I have seen since I came to this place in 1988 was not free flowing debate, a free flowing exchange of ideas, a free flowing exchange of constituents' ideas and the ability of constituents to have their say through their elected member of Parliament. What I have seen is what has happened here again today: a constant cutting off of the flow of debate by the rules that were set up to streamline the system somewhat, rules that were set up to ensure that legislation ultimately and eventually did get passed.

In the case before Parliament today in the Standing Orders, I believe this is the fourth day of debate on a very important matter not only to parliamentarians, but to all people of Canada.

As I recall, from 1913 through to the election of November 1988 closure was used 21 times in total over those 75 years of Parliament. Since I have been in Parliament, counting today closure has been used 14 times in just 2.5 years. In one case, as I recall, closure was even used in anticipation on an agricultural bill that the opposition might want to debate further. That was a case where although the opposition would have liked to have seen some expansion of the legislation, neither of the two major opposition parties was against the legislation in principle. In fact they were going to put up only a couple of speakers and then let the matter go to a vote.

The government in its arrogance simply ignored discussions with the opposition and invoked closure. The matter was passed on a voice vote without the necessity, but Parliament was not meant to have these matters pushed through or rammed through without proper discussion, with proper airing or without the adequate ability of the 26.5 million Canadians being given the opportunity to look these bills over, give them some thought, to ruminate on them, and to talk to their members of Parliament, their elected representatives, to give their feelings so that the member could come back here and in a speech to the House or in a representation on committee could have input on behalf of his or her constituents.

That has not happened. If we go through the free trade debate in late December 1988, we see that we had closure at every stage of that bill. The goods and services tax, perhaps one of the most unpopular tax bills in Canadian history, is opposed, the polls show, by 85 per cent of the people of Canada. Yet we had this government bringing in closure at every stage of the bill, to the extent that on third reading my leader, who would have been the first speaker for the New Democratic Party at third reading, was not even provided the opportunity of making her remarks on the record.

This is an example of a government with a majority that thumbs its nose not only at the opposition but at the people of Canada. It says: "We were given a majority to Govern and we are going to govern regardless of what the people of Canada think or want". The government also says: "We have been given a majority. We know what is best for the people of Canada. That is what we are going to do and we want to do it in the fastest possible manner without giving people an adequate opportunity to properly digest what we are doing".

The goods and services tax was an example where a schedule was set out and be darned if they were not going to keep to that schedule regardless of the fact that people wanted more information, regardless of the fact that bureaucrats were having trouble keeping up with the legislation and keeping up with the changes as the problems were pointed out in the legislation.

What we have before us are changes to the Standing Orders. Perhaps the majority of people in Canada do not understand exactly what they are; they were just brought before us in late March. They show once again an erosion of the democratic process, an erosion of what I have talked about in history as my belief of what this place is supposed to be about: democracy and the opportunity for people of Canada to have a way.

We do not live in a dictatorship, although I am sure that is what our Prime Minister would prefer us to have because then he would not have to listen to the opposition at all. When I look at these changing standing order rules, I have become somewhat concerned that my voice as an opposition member of Parliament is being cut off.

The people of my riding are not going to be given an adequate opportunity to be heard through me in Parliament because of some of these restructuring changes.

It is interesting, in looking at a recent article in The Ottawa Citizen this morning by Frank Howard, that he refers back to when this government first took office in 1984. Having spent a long time in opposition, it was very aware of the difficulties of the opposition and the need to give opposition members a voice and to make them feel that they were responding to their constituents' needs and wishes. I would like to quote from that article. Mr. Howard said:

> The McGrath reforms gave committees more freedom to initiative inquiries to call witnesses.
> They were brought in after the Tories had been out of power for most of the previous two decades and still felt sympathy for the ordinary members of Parliament.

• (1250)

He quotes McGrath and says:

> I wanted to put in place a system where being a member of Parliament would be seen to be an end to itself and not a means to an end.

Mr. Howard goes on to say:

> Too often, MPs felt like nobodys in Ottawa, unless they became cabinet ministers or parliamentary secretaries.

I for one want to have input on behalf of my constituents while I am elected member of Parliament. I want to have opportunity to speak here in the House and to be able to put my case to the House of Commons in a 20–minute speech. I want my party to be able to have the same amount of time as the other two parties in so far as the leaders are concerned. I would like to have the ability to have input from my constituents into committees such as was originally set up by the committee structure and improved by the McGrath commission.

What are these changes? One that I think is totally devastating to opposition and very repugnant is the proposal to reduce the numbers of debate on the throne speech down to six from eight. This gives the opportunity to all members of the House, the government members as well as opposition members, to have some input into the plans of the government for the future. It is the first opportunity at each new session of Parliament for members of Parliament to analyse what is the government's proposal for that next sitting. It is the opportunity for the member to get on record, on behalf of himself and his constituents, in the discussions of where this country should go into the future.

The next suggestion is to cut down again the numbers of debate on the budget from six to four. Once again the budget debate provides the opportunity for all members of Parliament to speak on future government projections for the following year, where the money is proposed to be spent and where the money has been spent. When we cut that down and speak in numbers, six to four days, it does not seem all that bad; but when we think about the number of people involved, it substantially cuts down the opportunities of those members to speak.

Turning to the proposal to cut down speeches from 20 minutes to 10 minutes, I think most people in this House know that in 10 minutes you really only have the opportunity of putting forth your preamble and maybe getting to some salient points; but you have very little opportunity in 10 minutes to flesh out your arguments. However, 20 minutes with a 10-minute question and answer period give the member an opportunity of adequately expressing once again his constituents' ideas, his ideas, as well as putting forth perhaps some platforms of groups from whom he has heard within his riding or within his critic area, if he is an opposition member, or within his interest groups, if he is a backbencher of government.

What happens if we also cut down the question and answer period? I personally know that is a section of the debates which I treasure and treasure dearly. It gives me the opportunity of sitting in the House, listening to members' speeches and responding to those speeches with more ideas from my riding or more ideas from my past knowledge or from the history of Canada to try to bring out from other members some of their thoughts. It allows us again an extra thrust that we do not get.

Further, the one thing that upsets me as any, I suppose, is the thought that although I can see the government's point of view and the government backbenchers' point of view in wanting to have scheduled one-week periods in which to work in their ridings—and I do not deny that that on the surface is an excellent idea—it is very difficult, particularly from the perspective of one who lives in the interior of the province of British Columbia, to travel back and forth trying to get into your riding on a regular basis to do the job or the second part of the job that you as a member of Parliament are expected to do: the job in the riding of looking after the case work and looking after the public relations aspects of this job.

The down side of that is the fact that it will cut substantially the number of days that this government is held accountable to Parliament.

As I understand it, the proposal is to drop from a 175-day year to 135-day year. Although with the addition of hours the parliamentarians will spend approximately the same time in Parliament, they will not be given the opportunity of those additional days to pose questions to ministers of the Crown. They will not have the opportunity of requesting things from the minister. They will not be able to put forward their suggestions and their questions to the press, to the media.

All in all I would suggest, again as I started out, that this is a cutting back of democracy. People want change, but they want change to a more democratic society, a more democratic Parliament. These Standing Orders are a further whittling away of that democracy and cannot proceed as such.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

THE DISABLED

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, despite advances in recent years in services to disabled persons, there are still many areas of federal legislation that must be amended in order to address their rights. While appearing recently before the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, representatives from various disabled groups repeated their demand for some form of omnibus legislation to address these concerns.

I call on this government to introduce omnibus legislation to include, among other things, amendments to the Canada Elections Act to ensure the accessibility of polling stations, amendments to the Immigration Act to eliminate discrimination on the basis of disability, and amendments to the Access to Information Act to allow disabled persons equal access to information.

Disabled persons are tired of having their interests put "under consideration". It is time for this government to finally take action that will really help our 3.2 million Canadians who are disabled.

MEDICARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, what next for medicare, our most valued national program?

In February, the Minister of Finance froze federal contributions to health. Since then we have had four provincial budgets which have brought about the lay-off of 300 nurses and closure of hospital beds in Newfoundland, a 16 per cent increase in health premiums in Alberta, a freeze on nurses' salaries in New Brunswick, and the determination by Quebec to proceed with user fees.

Yet the minister of health has repeatedly said he will enforce the Canada Health Act to ensure that national standards for medicare are met.

Will he restore universal medicare in Newfoundland and give the residents of Port-aux-Basques back their hospital? Will he restore accessibility to the middle-income families in Alberta who cannot afford medical premiums? Will he prevent the imposition of user fees on the poor in Quebec? Will the minister enforce national medicare standards and will he indicate to the provinces where they will obtain the funding to meet these standards?

CITIZENSHIP

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, there are few words used throughout the world which convey the vision of freedom and democracy more clearly than these two words, "Canadian citizenship". It is often said, for example, that a Canadian passport is the most prized document in the international community.

Among Canadians here at home there frequently seems an apathy about the values of our own citizenship, almost as though we have lost our meaning of country, our sense of pride in it, and our sense of patriotism for it.

Surely this is a state of mind that we must revitalize for ourselves and for future generations of Canadians. Surely the common denominator of Canadian citizenship must be reinforced as the mantle under which the rich potential of our bilingual and multicultural heritage can be attained and fulfilled. That is a current challenge for each of us, more important now than ever before.

Otherwise, without such a primary and premium commitment to the unifying spirit and deeper meaning of Canadian citizenship we shall be little more than a collection of separate languages and cultures existing together on Canadian soil. I believe Canada is much more than that and I am confident most Canadians believe so to.

REFUGEES

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, today, I and other members of the human rights committee met with the president and other representatives of Canada's Kurdish community about the genocide in Iraq which has killed 60,000 to 80,000 of their Kurdish friends and relatives.

Although Canada has responded with financial aid, to date no Canadian supplies have reached the Kurds. Canada needs to take concrete action to end this human tragedy and speak up for the Kurdish people. They suggested than an urgent appeal to the UN and President Bush would end the killings, that Hussein be ordered to cease immediately the genocide of the Kurds in the whole of Iraq, that Turkey and Iran be requested to open their borders immediately, that the UN convention on genocide authorize its signatories, including Canada, to take action on ongoing acts of genocide.

Canada should immediately exercise this right.

INDUSTRY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, industry downsizing, closures, and possible bankruptcies are now commonplace in this country. This can leave thousands of workers and their communities at economic risk, particularly single industry towns.

Employee ownership and/or buyouts are becoming very prevalent in the United States through employee stock ownership. These ownerships are made possible through legislated tax policies. Canada has no such positive tax policy, which encourage workers to have direct ownership, operation and generally control of their own economic destiny.

I am heartened to learn that this concept has been placed on the agenda for the finance committee and I thank them, in particular my colleague from Essex—Windsor.

Social democracy can thrive if given the opportunity. Through appropriate practical incentives, people can directly participate in their own employment future.

I trust all parties, given the present economic climate, will support any forthcoming initiatives.

NOISE POLLUTION

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, our homes are our sanctuary from the outside world, but there are times when that peace is disturbed by traffic and other annoyances of the urban environment. To minimize the impact, governments take precautions.

Recently, in new subdivisions in Etobicoke, noise barriers have been erected to protect the subdivision from arterial road noise. It is significant that a level of government has recognized the effects of noise on one's right to a certain quality of life.

In the future, I am sure that residents will forget the noise from nearby roads because their minds will be occupied elsewhere, by the take-off and landings of aircraft from additional runways at nearby Pearson International. No doubt residents will be wondering about those noise barriers and no doubt thoughts may drift to the inevitable question; if governments recognize the effects of noise on our communities, why do they allow subdivisions to be built so close to airports?

REFUGEES

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, it is important that we continue to focus our attention on the plight of the Kurdish minority of Iraq. Canadians are distressed and concerned by the loss of life and suffering which is affecting these people, particularly the innocent children.

Since April 5, 1991, Canada has contributed over $7 million to international organizations in support of Kurdish refugees. Canadians urge the Government of Canada to continue working with the Secretary-General of the United Nations to assist the Kurds in establishing peace and security in their homeland.

The Government of Canada should be commended on its efforts so far. Also Canada should encourage the governments of the coalition forces to transfer defence savings from a shorter than expected war to more humanitarian aid for the Kurds and other Iraqi civilians now suffering from civil conflicts.

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post is playing fast and lose with the truth again. In 1987 Canada Post announced its "rural conversion" program, a euphemism for the "shutting down post offices" program.

Canada Post did however promise that post offices would only be closed when there was a "natural opportunity" which occurs when the postmaster dies or resigns.

Now Canada Post is shutting down the post office in Glen Robertson in my riding. The postmistress is not retiring and, as far as I know, she is not dead and has no intention of quitting. She has been told that after five years of being an acting postmaster she is no longer required.

According to the new truth, acting postmasters do not count under the natural opportunity rule of the Orwellian offices at Canada Post.

The minister responsible for Canada Post should seize the natural opportunity to perform a conversion on the authors of newspeak. The savings could then be used to give back the post office to the people of Glen Robertson, Ontario in my riding.

RE-EMPLOYMENT PROJECTS

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I took part in a press conference to point out the achievements of a re-employment project by 3LM Consultants Inc. It is one of the first re-employment projects in Quebec. Under the Job Entry Program, the federal government contributed $94,380 to finance this project. With this funding from our government, 20 people in my riding who receive unemployment insurance can obtain training and experience to return to the job market.

Mr. Speaker, that is a good example of the effective employment policies brought in by our government with Bill C-21. Our programs meet the needs of the labour market and create interesting, steady jobs adapted to the requirements of our economy.

TAXI INDUSTRY

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, the taxi drivers serving Dorval Airport are angry, Pierre Bellemare tells us in an article in La Presse of April 11, today.

The representative of these drivers, Mr. Lucien Roy, tells us that each driver will have to pay 84 per cent more plus GST every year to Montreal International Airport in Dorval. These drivers say that income is down by 46 per cent. These costs are rising at a frightening rate, says the spokesman for taxi drivers at this airport. They are asking Transport Minister Doug Lewis to intervene and find a solution to this conflict.

[English]

It is the same thing in Toronto where the concerns of the Independent Limousine Owner-Driver's Association and the Airport Taxi Cab Association have fallen upon the minister's deaf ears.

I am pleased that our transport critic, the member for York West has intervened on their behalf. But if the minister will not go half way to meet the drivers, he may have to walk home the next time he wants a drive.

Mr. Speaker, the fee was $1,000 a year to work eight hours a day. It is now over $4,000, and that just to operate their cab. Also, the new flat fee is $6,000 for the limo drivers, which represents a 400 per cent increase.

I hope the minister will read by representation and act accordingly.

EXECUTIVE SALARIES

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the bits of information we have on Canadian business executives' pay must come from U.S. disclosure rules. This is unfortunate, for many of these earnings are obscene and must fall under public scrutiny.

For instance, the President of Aginco-Eagle Mines gets $5 million when he gets his pink slip.

Or Victor Rice, the man who dwarfed Massey Ferguson and moved it south of the border at the expense of Canadian taxpayers and workers. This job killer has a severance pay that amounts to four times his annual earnings of $2.6 million—over $10 million. That is 10 per cent of the 1990 company's profits, hijacked by an executive supposedly at the service of his shareholders.

They call it a "golden parachute". Imagine, a "golden parachute".

Mr. Speaker, I cannot see any parachutes opening on the labour side of the economic landscape. I see only workers falling to earth with lead parachutes, not golden parachutes.

THE DISABLED

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative minister from Pierrefonds—Dollard and Secretary of State of Canada has given a grant to the Val-d'Or disabled people's club for a project related to an independent living centre in Val-d'Or.

An independent living centre promotes and encourages the gradual process whereby disabled people take responsibility for the development and management of personal and community resources. It must be open to meet the needs of all disabled people, regardless of handicap or age.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the valuable work done by Anne-Marie Desmarais, Bernard Michaud and all those involved. The proposed activities will help meet the objectives of the Disabled Persons Participation Program in the Val-d'Or region.

ANCESTRAL LANGUAGE TRAINING

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, for many Canadians, the teaching of ancestral languages is essential for safeguarding and preserving their cultural heritage. Unfortunately, with the stroke of a pen, the government has told Canadians that this program will no longer exist.

Since then, the Picai Organization has circulated a petition in my riding, which has a large Italian community, and in the greater Montreal area. This petition asks the government to restore the funds necessary for heritage language teaching. My colleague from Laval-Est and I received this petition containing 22,000 signatures and will send it to the Minister responsible for Multiculturalism today.

I say to this Conservative Government, that if it really believes in multiculturalism, it will maintain the programs needed to promote it and ensure that Canada remains a multicultural country.

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, should one part of Canada have the unilateral right to separate?

If the answer is yes, doesn't it also mean that a region, district or county has the right to separate from a province, a city from a region and a neighbourhood from a city? What mechanism do we use to negotiate such a separation and how do we settle our differences if we cannot agree on the terms of separation?

If the answer is no, what compromises should we make to eliminate or reduce the grievances that have brought some Canadians to the point of wanting to separate or should they just have to lump it?

The answers to these questions are not easy for any of us, because in the very concept of separation we have a tiger by the tail.

WELFARE

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, Financial Post columnist Diane Francis has pointed out that in Ontario anyone earning less than $45,000 a year could be better off on welfare.

An unemployed couple with two children could receive the tax-free equivalent of that income through welfare payments, clothing, medical and other allowances. Such information is one reason why working people who pay taxes are so frustrated today.

The 17 per cent welfare increase adopted in January by Ontario's NDP government will be welcomed by those in genuine need. Unfortunately, there are some who abuse this program. These abusers are not just cheating government but dipping into the pockets of all others who pay taxes.

I call on all three levels of government to ensure our welfare programs not only are adequate but affordable and targeted to those in genuine need.

NATIONAL CITIZENSHIP WEEK

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, we are celebrating National Citizenship Week for the fifth consecutive year to remind us that Canadian citizenship concerns us all. It is more than a mere formality to obtain the right to vote or a passport. Bearing that in mind, Mr. Speaker, I would call upon the Bloc Quebecois members in this House to stop working at destroying our country, Canada, and to start working with us at rebuilding this country, Canada, on a sounder basis to ensure a brighter future to all Quebecers within Canada.

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the United States have challenged the decision regarding Canadian pork rendered by the binational panel on Free Trade. In the speech he gave yesterday in New York City, the Minister for International Trade stated that, if the U.S. appeal goes through it will be very harmful to the Free Trade Agreement and the participation of Canada in negotiations with Mexico and the United States. So, I would like the Prime Minister to tell me if his minister was stating government policy when he said in New York that the Free Trade Agreement would be seriously affected?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the exact words of the minister were:

[English]

"In the event that this extraordinary challenge was successful, it would be very harmful to the United States-Canada Free Trade Agreement and to any support for that agreement in Canada", Mr. Crosbie said: "Naturally, that will affect whether or not Canada enters into any other free trade agreements".

[Translation]

That is the minister's position and that is also the government's position. We take very seriously the Americans' decision to invoke an extraordinary provision in a regular case. This provision was negotiated for a very precise purpose, and the Canadian government does not agree at all with the decision of the American administration to invoke this extraordinary provision in this case. Such a decision dilutes the impact of an important decision-making process. We will watch and follow this very closely and vigorously.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for International Trade was not the only one to say that the free trade agreement will be called into question if the American appeal goes through. A week ago Simon Reisman, the chief negotiator of the free trade agreement said, and I quote: "If there is some way to undermine and attack (the binational panel), then I would say we have to have a fresh look at the whole agreement. That is how important it is".

• (1420)

Given that both the minister and the chief negotiator say that the trade agreement is open to abuse, will the Prime Minister admit that this deal is flawed and do something to correct these flaws rapidly?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know where the previous leader of the Liberal Party stood with regard to the free trade agreement. We are still waiting to hear whether the new Leader is in favour of or against the free trade agreement. We still have not heard.

The dispute settlement mechanism is an important part of the free trade agreement. Indeed, I think it is probably fair to say that the Government of Canada certainly would not have entered into a free trade agreement if there were not an impartial way to resolve disputes.

Among the negotiated provisions was this reference to an extraordinary provision. It was clear that this extraordinary provision was to be invoked only in the most exceptional circumstances by either of the parties. Fraud on the part of one of the judges is one of the kinds of exceptional circumstance.

We believe that the utilization of this particular clause in regard to the favourable decision to Canada on pork was an abuse of the process. Canada had won that case fair and square. This was an abuse of the process by the Americans, and that is the message I conveyed to the President of the United States. It is the message the Government of Canada is conveying to the administration of the United States.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what we have always said, that this was not a good deal and that it should be renegotiated.

We have proof today that on the first occasion the Americans have, they will abuse the process.

Does the Prime Minister agree that we should first clarify the kind of deal we have with the Americans before we enter into a deal with the Americans and Mexico? We do not know exactly whether we have a deal or not with the United States.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I see the member for Edmonton applauding. He was one of the supporters of the free trade agreement.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: He voted for it and he ran on it. We know he was in favour of it. We suspect his leader was in favour of it, and maybe one day he will let us know.

Mr. Chrétien: We will renegotiate the deal.

Mr. Mulroney: Now he says: "Renegotiate the deal."

He says the deal is okay, but he wants it renegotiated. We have a deal. It is not going to be renegotiated. We want it respected, and the Government of Canada is going to make sure it is respected.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, in 1988, the Prime Minister said the dispute settlement mechanism in the free trade agreement was a "genuine shield against new U.S. protectionism, whether from Congress or from the administration".

As the Leader of the Opposition has noted, the Minister for International Trade in New York yesterday said that the U.S. challenge to the bi-national panel's decision "is a response to protectionist pressures from Congress" and that "this move attempts to put politics back in trade."

Will the Prime Minister now acknowledge what the Liberal Party has claimed all along, that the existing free trade agreement does not in effect "shield" Canada from congressional protectionist interests and pressures? Is the Prime Minister saying that if the extraordinary judicial committee decides against Canada's interest that we should rethink the free trade agreement? Is that what he said just a moment ago?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is a spiritual supporter of the free trade agreement.

He knows full well that I said no such thing. I did indicate that the dispute settlement mechanism is indeed a shield against protectionism. It is not a guarantee against vexatious political behaviour. We believe that this is an abuse of the process. I have conveyed that personally to the President and we have conveyed it to the administration. We are going to deal with this matter.

We do not take the position, unlike some people, that when we run into trouble we are going to take our marbles and go home. That is not the way we conduct foreign policy and that is not the way—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to quarrel right away with my friend from Newfoundland about that statement. But with regard to the position of my hon. friend, obviously we are going to defend very vigorously the interests of Canada. We already won the pork case. The pork case was initiated before the free trade agreement. The problem was there before the free trade agreement. We won on two occasions the requirements of the pork decision. Now there is an abuse of process by the Americans against which we protest very vigorously. I believe the Canadian position will prevail.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): The Prime Minister knows perfectly well that the government accepted this process. It accepted it as an integral part of its acceptance of the free trade agreement. The government accepted it. It knew what it was accepting. It knew that this process could be triggered.

The extraordinary judicial panel in effect determines, with the Canadian government's agreement, whether or not the bi-national panel's decision conforms with U.S. law. In taking this step, the United States is not only undermining the dispute settlement mechanism, but it has again demonstrated that Canada did not in fact win secure access to the U.S. markets via the free trade agreement.

I now ask the Prime Minister this: How is any of this different from what was the case before the free trade agreement? Why did Canada cede sovereignty in the free trade agreement when clearly it did not win reciprocal action from the United States?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, let us just go back. My hon. friend said that the Liberal Party would blame every sparrow that fell on the free trade agreement. That is exactly what he is in the process of doing.

In a trade agreement which regulates $200 billion worth of bilateral trade—the largest trading partnership in the world between two countries—the free trade agreement is a very important civilising instrument in regard to the problems that that kind of trade normally engenders, free trade agreement or no free trade agreement. It is a major step forward in that process of protecting Canadian interests.

The dispute settlement mechanism was the first such mechanism ever concluded between the United States and another sovereign nation. No one suggested that it was perfect, even though everyone acknowledged that it was a major accomplishment.

With regard to the provision that my hon. friend raises, it was never intended for this kind of use because the circumstances were clearly considered by both negotiators. Its use in these circumstances is an abuse, and the fact that it has been abused once—and it is an important provision—by the Americans does not justify in our mind destroying an historic accomplishment like the free trade agreement. We will not throw out the baby with the bath water simply because the Liberals ask.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, this Prime Minister went across this country assuring Canadians from coast to coast that we had achieved secure access to the United States market.

I want to ask this Prime Minister now how he can stand up in the House of Commons and say this is a serious abuse, say that this is, as his Minister for International Trade put it, something that contravenes the intent of the FTA, without drawing some implications out of that. In other words, is this government going to do more than just talk about abuse? Is it actually going to do something? If so, what precisely is it going to do?

• (1430)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows full well that with regard to any bilateral document, any important document concluded either between individuals or between sovereign nations, depending on the interpretation that a body of adjudication could give, the letter killeth and the spirit giveth life. Any time that spirit is deformed and distorted, an important document can be affected in an unfavourable way.

This is what has happened. The provisions are good. They are not perfect, but the dispute settlement mechanism is widely acknowledged to be a very important one. Canada proceeded pursuant to the rules and we won at every step of the road. At that point in time, the decision ought to have been final. The Americans chose to abuse the process by taking it an extra step. They are going to lose by taking that extra step because the provisions of the free trade agreement require that this matter be resolved in Canada's interests.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said some very important things in that comment. He said that what is taking place on the part of the United States is unfair, an abuse. He has also said, and I hope I am not reading too much into his words, that there is an implication that an abuse of this sort puts at threat the free trade deal.

I want to ask the Prime Minister the question I put to him before: What precisely is this government prepared to do if in fact we see that the hopes of the Prime Minister do not come to fruition? What guarantee can he give us that in fact this abuse, which he identifies, is not going to turn out to be a successful abuse that hurts our pork producers right across this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend began by saying that he hoped he did not read more than was said into my statement, and then proceeded to do precisely that. I said no such thing. I said at no time that a failure to win in a given case would mean that we were going to proceed to revoke an important trade agreement.

I said that in my judgment the utilization of the invocation of this clause in these circumstances by the American government is an abuse of the process. It was an abuse of the process and this view is an important one on behalf of Canadians and has been conveyed to our American interlocutors on this.

We are going to follow the rule of law and we are going to advance at this stage all of the Canadian arguments that have successfully been advanced and deployed thus far.

My hon. friend then raises hypothetical questions about what if, what if, and what if. We began this believing we were right to proceed this way to defend the interests of Canadian pork producers. We did that. We won. We did it again and we won then. We believe that by following that same course, we are going to win again.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, what precisely this government is going to do is to go from one trade deal, which it is questioning for abuse, to a further trade deal with the United States and Mexico.

We know that a report has been prepared with respect to labour legislation comparing Mexico, the United States and Canada. It is a report by Labour Canada. It was supposed to be tabled today. I want to ask the Prime Minister why it is that this important document has not been tabled in this House today.

What is holding back this government from telling Canadians about this important study? Why is it holding it back?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is an unfortunate characteristic of the New Democratic Party to attribute the worst motives to everyone with whom they disagree. That is why they are trying to justify on trade grounds a position that at base is simply, in the worst sense of the word, anti-Mexican. That is why they are trying to justify on trade grounds a position that is at base opposed to everything they say they stand for in terms of international development and encouragement of the Third World. That is a despicable position for any political party.

The report will be tabled later today.

DE HAVILLAND

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I have in hand a copy of a study sent personally to the Prime Minister on February 5 which outlined the potential job devastation, not only for de Havilland, Toronto's largest industrial employer, but for companies across the country that supply de Havilland, the devastation that a foreign government takeover of the company could cause.

The study outlines that suppliers across the country account for $169 million in revenues, specifically $2.5 million in Alberta, $2 million in Atlantic Canada, $6.5 million in British Columbia, $11 million in Manitoba, $82 million in the province of Quebec and $65 million in the province of Ontario.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister why, having received this information personally two months ago, did he insist in the House yesterday that he was not going to reverse the takeover of de Havilland?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat what I said yesterday, that the application will have to go first to Investment Canada.

I would like to underline something that the member says. It is usual for her to make a presentation about effects may happen in two or three years. They are not there. What is there today is a company which Boeing proposes to sell to a consortium of European companies. It will have to be assessed very seriously by Investment Canada. The company in 1986 had 4,400 workers and today there are 4,900 people working in the company. We are trying to consider the way that we will deal with that in the future.

I ask the member to not just throw around figures which are not there. They are possible in her view, but for God's sake, could we have the truth, the real truth, here today.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it is shameful, because the Industry Minister himself received the same study on February 5. I will tell him what that study says. Suppliers in the province of Quebec alone account for 48.7 per cent, for a total income of $82 million, most of that in Montreal.

But the Industry Minister knows that Montreal is the unemployment capital of Canada, as was said today. I would like to ask him this question: In these two months, why has he not faced up to his responsibilities and refused the sale of a company which will be very costly across Canada, which will cost Montreal, Toronto and all of Canada very dearly? Why has he not refused it?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, even if the hon. member for Hamilton East shouts untruths in French or in English, it does not change the facts.

Again, what she is referring to, a study from two months ago, deals with a hypothetical sale because it was proposed to Investment Canada at some point but has not yet happened. Let them try to frighten people, Mr. Speaker, but not in the constant and illogical way that the member for Hamilton East is always doing in this House. I ask her to show the maturity that goes with the position she holds as deputy leader of a political party. She is absolutely unable to give people the straight facts.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, those are Liberal projections, but we had them for 20 years and that was enough.

• (1440)

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. It too concerns the sale of de Havilland.

Yesterday the Prime Minister boasted:

> Canada needs foreign investment and we are going to invite foreign investment and create national investment.

Will the Prime Minister level with Canadians and demonstrate exactly where that foreign investment is when his government practically gave away de Havilland in 1986 and now the French–Italian consortium will be paying big dollars not to Canada but to a giant American corporation, Boeing, based in Seattle, Washington?

How does that transaction benefit Canadians and Canadian workers?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, if my friend wants to listen to me, I will repeat what I said before.

In 1986 Boeing Canada bought a company for about $890 million which at the time faced big difficulties. Today this government put in about $90 million for 500 more jobs than it had at the time. The company spent about $700 million or $800 million on de Havilland since 1986.

It is what I call a good investment. I know that the Liberal Party is against foreign investors. I prefer the message I gave abroad about Canada and the way we want to see money in this country from all countries in the world, rather than the way you did it and almost killed the economy of this country.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, Liberals are not against foreign investment.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Marchi: Liberals are against foreign takeovers. Canadians expect this government to stand up for Canada for a change. That is what we are for.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchi: It is not the foreign investment; it is foreign takeovers.

I return to the minister. The Prime Minister laughs and continues to read householders while Rome burns, but this is his prerogative.

Given that de Havilland is the largest industrial employer in Toronto and that millions of dollars of contract work to Canadian firms are tendered each year across the country, can the Prime Minister or the minister guarantee that if the new deal were to go through present levels of employment will be maintained, research and development will be continued in Canada, the plant will continue to build a full and complete aircraft and Canadian suppliers will be maintained?

Will he give us this reassurance on behalf of Canada and not some Boeing corporation in Seattle, Washington.

An hon. member: Seattle, Washington.

Mr. Speaker: I have to point out that that becomes a very hypothetical question. The minister may want to deal with it.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, first I want to say that de Havilland is not a Canadian owned company. It is already American. It was sold. If I understood well, the member said that we are trying to sell out the Canadian ownership. It is not a matter of Canadian ownership anyway.

No reasonable manager would give that kind of a guarantee before having first seen the business plan of the company, what the company intends to do in terms of the future. The company already expressed the views that maybe it could invest $1 billion in the new company. I think that is the reasonable way.

I am sure that my friend, if he wants to be objective, will admit that the best way is to refer the case to Investment Canada, which will as it did— do you have something against Italians?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, and I would ask him to be careful.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCurdy: The minister has said that he will not accept a consortium purchase of de Havilland if it proves to be harmful. The consortium has already indicated that it plans to replace de Havilland's new 100-seater aircraft with its own, to leave de Havilland with some research and development and parts assembly, and to eliminate up to 3,000 direct jobs in Toronto and some 20,000 indirect jobs, most of which are in Quebec.

Is that harmful? Is that acceptable? Or, does the minister plan to act?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I answered exactly the same question the member asks today.

The deal has not yet been presented to Investment Canada. It will be done in due course. Investment Canada will deal with high-tech companies that have a lot of requests and different considerations and will take into account deals which will be acceptable to us.

I refer my friend to a deal which during the campaign the NDP Government of Ontario said it would refuse. It was the one with Consumers Gas. When Mr. Rae came to power he accepted the deal because it was a good deal.

I believe that we should have the same attitude about de Havilland, keeping in mind, I am proud to say, that Investment Canada did a wonderful job and will continue to do so.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, to most of us the evidence is clear: Investment Canada has done no job at all.

It is reported that the consortium is asking for between $500 million and $1 billion spread over 10 years in order to support research which is basically connected to the consortium's new 100-seater aircraft to replace the new Dash-8 400 series. That new airplane, by the way, will be assembled in Germany and the rest of it fragmented among four or five other countries.

My question for the minister is simple. Would it not make more sense to use that money to obtain an equity position, a golden share, which would ensure that not only the R and D is done in Canada but the new 400 series will be produced and assembled in Canada so that workers will benefit and Canada will benefit from having at least one plane left that is produced in this country?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the member, as his party normally does, is always in advance of any decision.

But what happens with that kind of approach? I believe, as I said yesterday, that we work and Investment Canada works with the presentation of an application by the company and any other application made regarding the deal with de Havilland. Investment Canada has already considered two applications, and it could do that again.

I ask my friend to be reasonable for once and to wait for the way we will work. He will see, as usual, that we work very well.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As he is well aware, the Minister for International Trade has been collecting data on the memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber for more than four years.

On March 4, the same minister was quoted as stating that he was ready to go to Washington before the end of March to negotiate the termination of the memorandum.

• (1450)

Given that a promise was given, can the Prime Minister indicate to this House and to Canadian lumber manufacturers if indeed the Minister for International Trade has met with his American counterparts and, if not, why not?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, understandably the hon. member takes a very active interest in this issue. He would know that the Minister for International Trade, on behalf of this government, has been consulting actively with the provinces of Canada regarding the position that we would put to the United States to change a situation which is unacceptable to Canada.

Our position is that it is going to be necessary for us to have the agreement and the co–operation of the principal provinces affected by this matter.

There is no announcement that I have to make at this stage on behalf of the Minister for International Trade, except to say that those deliberations in Canada are proceeding and that I think the position Canada intends to take regarding this question with the United States is known to the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The softwood lumber industry in Canada is paralyzed by the 17 per cent rise in the Canadian dollar and the 15 per cent export surtax, making a total surcharge of 32 per cent. A hundred thousand jobs have already been lost in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, because this government created the problem, why is it refusing to solve it to help workers in Northern Ontario and throughout Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is well known to all members who have followed this situation that this problem was not created by the Government of Canada but rather by the practices of some provinces. A problem arose and the government had to deal with it. Arrangements have been made with the United States. The present circumstances are not acceptable for us. That is why we began consultations with the provinces and it is also why we are seeking the support of the provinces most interested in the issue, so that when the Government of Canada makes representations to the Americans, it will be with the support of the great majority of the interests affected here in Canada.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, today Statistics Canada released the latest casualty list of this government's economic policies.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Department store sales are down by over $1.5 billion since December 1990. The combination of the GST and this government's kamikaze economic policies has led to the worst collapse in the retail sector in over 30 years.

How many more retail stores will have to go belly–up or how many more people will have to be thrown on the unemployment line before the Prime Minister comes to his senses and abandons his obscene economic policies?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have said on a number of occasions, we expect that the economy is going to stabilize by mid–year and that we will see a growth in the second half of the year. That is not an opinion that is exclusively held by the Government of Canada. The Royal Bank of Canada, the Conference Board and other economists have stated the same opinion.

There is a slowness in the economy right now, and we do not like to see that. We do see the policies we have been following, particularly the drop in interest rates we have seen continue today of about 4.25 percentage points since the peak last May. That is giving some life to the housing industry. We are going to see this carried through into other sectors of the economy, and it is that which will bring about that recovery.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, only this government would have the nerve to call a 42 per cent decrease in retail sales a sign of economic recovery.

My question is again for the Prime Minister. So far this year bankruptcies are up over 63 per cent. With the news of a one-half billion dollar decrease in retail sales between January and February, there should be no question that those bankruptcies will continue to rise unabated through spring and summer.

Since the Prime Minister and the government refuse to stop this assault on the economy, will they at least give some relief to the casualties by introducing in this House today reformed bankruptcy legislation to offer some protection to those Canadian businesses that are suffering so badly?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friends is very well aware of the considerable work that my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, has been doing in bringing about the introduction of the bankruptcy legislation. I would hope at some stage in the fairly near future he will be able to do so.

DECENTRALIZATION

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

I am encouraged with the logical relocation of the National Energy Board to Calgary. I am also encouraged by this government's quick action to fill the void in Summerside and similarly in Portage la Prairie.

Coming from Regina, I have seen not only a comparative lack of federal presence in the capital city but have also experienced the ravaging of federal jobs under a previous government, the majority of these jobs going east of our province.

The Conference Board of Canada states that Saskatchewan's economy contributes 3.7 per cent to Canada's Gross National Product, while the federal government spends only 0.8 per cent of its budget in Saskatchewan.

Can the Prime Minister give my community this government's assurances that the government intends to continue with a policy of logical decentralization?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member from Regina for a very important question.

In point of fact there is general recognition that the decision of the government to locate the Western Diversification Office in Edmonton has resulted, for example, by bringing the decision-making process closer to western Canada in the creation of some 26,700 new jobs in western Canada.

The decision by the government, for example, to locate the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency in Moncton has been described by Premier Frank McKenna as the most important contribution to regional development in the history of Confederation.

We believe that there is an important role for decentralization in Canada. Obviously the case made with such eloquence by the member from Regina would undoubtedly cause the government to examine Regina very carefully as a sight for any future moves of decision-making bodies west.

HEALTH

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He is finally sufficiently concerned enough for the safety of Canadian women to send an official to Washington to check out the recent U.S. Food and Drug Administration report on the carcinogenic threat of the Meme breast implant to women in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is putting a question which is clearly of very great importance to all hon. members in the House, and I would ask hon. members to listen to her question carefully.

Ms. Langan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister now willing to suspend the use of the Meme until he has a definitive report? He should be willing to err on the side of Canadian women rather than on the side of manufacturers of implants.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will be aware that yesterday she rose in the House of Commons based on a clipping from a newspaper and demanded that we withdraw the implant. My response to her was to request, if she had not yet seen the report, to wait until we have had a chance to look at the report and to analyse the results of the report instead of having a hanging first and having the trial later.

Our official has met in Washington with officials of the FDA. He was the only person there who was not an official within the FDA. We have done a preliminary analysis of the FDA report which shows essentially the same data as we found with studies that were done by the Department of National Health and Welfare and the University of Ottawa earlier.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, that would suggest to me that the FDA's report has collaborated those two reports that this minister continues to ignore.

At the same time as we have this kind of information from the FDA, the minister and his department are still circulating documents to Canadians saying that these implants are safe. I would ask the minister to withdraw these documents immediately.

• (1500)

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, possibly the hon. member is not aware of the two studies that were done, one by my own department and one by the University of Ottawa.

They found that no American threat was posed by the Meme breast implant. If the hon. member would like a full briefing with regard to either of those studies—they are on the public record—we would be prepared to make this information available to the hon. member or to any other hon. member in the House.

The key concern here is very simple. Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member who asked the question might listen.

The key concern is simply this. Our responsibility on all sides of this House is to protect the health and safety of Canadians. If, based on scientific information, there is any reason to justify the withdrawal of a medical device from the market, the government will do so. However, that action has to be based on scientific evidence.

TRADE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Next month Canadian farmers will be facing a flood of low quality U.S. grain coming into the country, costing Canadian producers millions of dollars. At the same time, the United States is using its Export Enhancement Program to steal Canadian markets overseas and to drive down world prices.

In view of the fact that it is violating the spirit of the FTA with regard to the Export Enhancement Program, is the minister prepared to hold up the access to Canadian markets of U.S. grains until the United States starts meeting its obligations under the free trade deal with regard to export subsidies?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is being somewhat premature in his conclusion.

The preliminary data has just been exchanged between the two countries. It is still being worked upon. Unless he has some news that I do not have, there has been no decision made. We will have to await the calculations, and then see what happens. There has been no indication that the Canadian border would be open to American wheat at this particular time.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Denis Pronovost (St. Maurice): Mr. Speaker, more than five weeks ago, Justice Rouleau handed down his decision recognizing federal government authority to hold a referendum on the governance question at Kanesatake.

[Translation]

Can the Minister of Indian Affairs tell us today whether he is prepared to announce the holding of a referendum for the people of Kanesatake very soon?

Point of Order

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Maurice has raised a very timely question.

As hon. members know, for several years there has been a serious problem of band governance within the Mohawk community at Kanesatake, where there has been instability and internal disagreement ever since the change in band custom election was introduced in 1969.

I am examining the judgment of Mr. Justice Rouleau of the Quebec Federal Court. I am inclined to favour the holding of a plebiscite very shortly on this question, to be conducted by an independent, impartial agency.

I will have a decision and more details early next week.

PRIVILEGE

OFFICE OF THE MEMBERS FOR RICHELIEU—SPEAKER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Speaker: I would like to make a brief clarification further to the statement by the hon. member for Richelieu in the House yesterday and his question of privilege raised on Monday this week.

I first wish to inform the House of the successful meeting I had today with the hon. member and with some officials who participated in moving his office. At that meeting, the hon. member said he was completely convinced that at no time were his rights and privileges as a member violated. It was recognized that such situations are exceptional and unique and it was regrettable if it caused him some concern.

Once again, I wish to thank the hon. member for his confidence and co-operation in this affair. The hon. member for Richelieu has the floor.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, in turn, I would like to thank you for having met with me in your chamber and for stating publicly that I had found myself in an unfortunate situation. I also wish to reassure the hon. members and my constituents about the confidentiality of the files that were moved from my office. I have received assurances from your legal adviser, who monitored the move, that it was done under police surveillance and that none of my files were tampered with. I have decided, with your permission, to stay in the office you have assigned me—or rather imposed upon me—because, for the same reasons that led me to object to having my office moved in the first place or to be asked to move, I think it would not be right to spend another $10,000 in this time of restraint to move me back to my old office. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your co-operation in this matter and for kindly accepting to see me so promptly.

In closing, however, I must once again denounce the decision of the Progressive Conservative Party Whip to give in to the whim of some 30 conservative members by moving their office at a cost of about a quarter-of-a-million dollar. The Canadian people will make them pay for that at the next election. Thank you.

REPORT BY LABOUR CANADA

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. In the House today, reference was made to a report by Labour Canada. I want to advise the House that that report is in the process of being delivered to the chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade, and also to the members for Etobicoke North and Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, who are the respective critics for their parties.

[Translation]

OFFICE OF THE MEMBER FOR RICHELIEU

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the member for Richelieu. He has just quoted some figures to which I strongly object. It does not cost $10,000 to move his three machines and a few files. I was among those moved and I know it did cost $150. I would not want the people to think that we spent $10,000. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I would not want them to think that we just moved for the fun of it. I moved ouy of necessity and to help this House.

[English]

REPORT BY LABOUR CANADA

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order that the Secretary of State for External Affairs just raised, can I take his comments to mean that the report now is a public document and that people are free to comment? Are copies available to all members, other than those he referred to specifically?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, they certainly will be. It is intended to be a public document. This was intended to be a process as undertaken by the government, to make that document public today.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, being Thursday, I would like the government House leader—I think I can guess what he is going to say—in keeping with the practices of this House, to tell us what the order of business is for tomorrow.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it really depends on when tomorrow starts, at midnight or 10 a.m. tomorrow. We will dispose of Motion 30 some time today or tomorrow; this sitting, let me put it that way, and then it would be my intention to call the adjournment motion for tomorrow. I guess any future will depend on what happens with the adjournment motion.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p.19027) and amendment of Mr. Dingwall (p. 19156).

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, this debate, even under the best political circumstances in normal political times, I submit to you would be a difficult one. As the history of Parliament shows, parliamentary rule changes are always a topic that is received with great suspicion by whichever party is in the opposition, quite rightly and understandably so. It is the role of the opposition in the British parliamentary system to keep the government honest and to play the basic role of a watchdog on the activities, the actions and the decisions of the government of the day.

Unfortunately, this task is made more difficult for two reasons; first is the nature of the proposal the government is advancing, which has been dealt with by colleagues and which I will deal with in a moment and second, because of the low popularity and the low esteem in which the government finds itself across the country in the opinion of Canadians.

The credibility of the government is at the present, as is shown by a variety of recent polls, extremely low. The credibility of the leader of this government is even worse. What accompanies this phenomenon is the fact that the popularity in the polls of this government is way behind that of the other two major parties. Political analysts are informing us that in the history of taking public opinion polls, the Prime Minister's popularity, at 16 per cent, has never been as low as it is at the present time.

One could even venture to forecast that if an election were called and held 60 days from today, the government party would be extremely lucky if it were to play the role of the official opposition as a result of such an election. Most likely, it would be in third position at best. This is because of the considerable erosion in popularity the Conservative Party is undergoing, as witnessed both in the west as well as in Quebec. Therefore, I submit to you that this government lacks the moral authority that accompanies credibility.

In asking that a package of new rules be accepted and adopted by this House, the government is really asking the impossible. It is requesting the acceptance of a package whose substance is very controversial and it lacks the needed authority to assert its viewpoint. It only has the numbers when it comes to a vote. That is the use of force, rather than the use of reason in parliamentary terms.

It is against this rather depressing political snapshot that I just gave the House that we are debating today the merits and the disadvantages of this package.

One must conclude from the absence of speakers on the government side today that even backbenchers of the governing party find it extremely difficult to defend this package. Not one has risen today in defence of this proposal. We are witnessing a profound lack of confidence on the part of the benches on the government side. That says more than anything else.

In all fairness, one has to say by way of a general comment that the government's package does contain a number of potentially helpful proposals and most of them, I submit to you, flow from existing practices. It would be building on existing practices that would lead to some of the changes that we have supported by way of an intervention made a couple of days ago by the Whip of the Official Opposition in this House.

The positive side of this package is poisoned by the over-all thrust of the suggested new timetable, which prevents the opposition from holding the government accountable in the manner that it ought to be in a modern parliamentary system.

As we have heard from other speakers, it is being proposed that we reduce by one-quarter the number of sitting days. This may appear to the average Canadian to be a matter of debatable significance, if we were not to add very quickly the fact that by reducing from some 175 to 135 the number of sitting days, Canadians, through the media and other channels, are denied the information that is generated through Question Period and the scrums following Question Period. We all know from experience that it is through that process of daily questions and answers that an assessment is made of government decisions, programs and intentions that relate to the public interest.

In that respect, therefore, a reduction by one-quarter of the number of sitting days is more than just a statistic, it is more than just a general number; it has a significance that, once translated into political terms, assumes a certain importance.

This leads me to comment also on the fact that this reduction in sitting days in the House of Commons seems to be motivated by an over-all attitude to the parliamentary democratic process which is rather stringent, discipline-oriented and, at times, I regret to say, rather repressive. I do not want to sound like a professional opposition member because we think that we will be, with the support of the Canadian voter, replacing the government. Therefore, we have to make speeches, keeping in mind the importance of governing in a parliamentary system.

But I would like to draw to the attention of the House that in the life of this Parliament, namely since the November 1988 election, the time allocation motions, in other words, motions of a kind that have restricted or placed a limit to debate in this House, have been invoked eight times. The number of times in which closure—which is really a guillotine—on debate has been invoked nine times, Mr. Speaker.

These numbers have significance if they are compared to a benchmark. I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that in the Trudeau government years—the last major change in parliamentary rules that I can recall before the McGrath commission—between 1970-71 to 1984, closure was invoked three times over a period of 14 years. Here, by contrast, closure has been invoked nine times over a period of nine years. Do we not detect a pattern of management of Parliament that is pretty severe and pretty restrictive in resorting to such extreme measures?

The question, of course, is why? It is a subject that we could perhaps debate on another occasion in analysing why closure has been invoked nine times in two years.

Evidently it is the nature of the measures this government has imposed on Canadians through Parliament that has made this type of strategy frequently necessary; namely, the resorting to closure. I submit that this is very regrettable.

The reduction of sitting days also means that Parliament is no longer being seen as the place where political leadership on the part of all the parties involved ought to be expressed, particularly in difficult times of the kind we are experiencing and witnessing today. We seem to be led by a notion, expressed through this package by the government, that Parliament is really not a place where credible thoughts can be expressed, where politicians have a role to play, and where the intellectual capacity of the elected members can come to the fore in a thoughtful and constructive approach to the issues of our times.

The message is in reverse and says that the number of sittings should be reduced and the members should be sent home and be kept away because, in the opinion of this government, Parliament is somehow becoming less and less relevant. That is at a time when Canadians obviously look for leadership from their politically elected members and it is a very distressing trend and a very distressing and disturbing pattern.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caccia: We on this side of the House do not believe there is a bankruptcy of ideas on the part of elected representatives. But the proposed changes are evidently a reflection on the government's assessment of its own capacity to produce that type of leadership through its own members. In that sense it is a very serious indictment.

Let me analyse for a moment the idea of having members in their riding longer every month, i.e., for one week. This scheme is one that could be described as the steam-engine era scheme, coming from the time when travel was very slow and electronic facilities of the kind we know today did not exist. Fifty years ago, it took two or three days to reach one's riding. You certainly did not have a fax in your office or the telephone facilities and other ways of communicating quickly with your electors, constituents and the like. Neither did you have the capacity to travel back and forth by jet.

So we have a package that seems to be conceived and developed with a steam-engine era in mind during the time of the jet engine and of the electronic era. Mr. Speaker, one wonders, therefore, what kind of historical context this government has in mind when it proposes this kind of parliamentary reform. Has it packaged the product of the 1990s for our consideration? Or is it a product of the 1920s?

Inevitably, even with the highest degree of charity we are capable of receiving from the opposition side sometimes, we have to conclude that this government is using a thought process in advancing these proposals that belongs to the steam-engine era rather than to the jet-engine era in which we live today.

Therefore, something is discordant, anachronistic, and out of sync, to put it in very simple terms.

A new system of committees, the so-called five envelopes, deserves a moment of attention, Mr. Speaker. One can understand that the government would want to re-organize committees in a manner that is more rational and reflects new values and new political policy priorities.

In that sense, I would applaud the government for having attempted to do so, but one aspect in that new scheme must be criticized and I hope the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment will perhaps take it into account; namely, the manner in which the envelope, which now comes under the heading of natural resources, has been conceived. Because you find the environment as a servant to natural resources in that envelope.

I or you or everyone would have thought, and even the parliamentary secretary, that environment would have perhaps been the heading of that envelope, under which all those natural resources would then have come.

Considering the far-reaching statements and declarations the Prime Minister of Canada has made on the environment, sustainable development, and other matters at home and abroad over the last six years, we do not see a carrying-through of the declarations that have been made in abstract terms, which do not find practical expression in the new committee organization. In other words, the environment is relegated to being just another horse, in competition with other interests, rather than being the over-all envelope that takes under its wings, so to speak, the various natural resources considered under that particular envelope.

I would suggest to you, in conclusion, the following thought. It seems to me that when we are elected we campaign and people vote to send their member to Ottawa. That is the idea on which an election is run to find who people will send to Ottawa. The package that is before us for debate and for a vote today does not contain proposals that would increase our accountability through the House of Commons, that would increase our parliamentary effectiveness in this Chamber, or that increase our effectiveness as legislators and our legislative role in committees. Unfortunately, the package seems to weaken these three specific roles. Therefore, the proposals will weaken us individually and collectively with respect to our electors and to the public interest, which we are supposed to protect, promote and enhance on behalf of our electors.

Secondly, as a corollary to that observation, I submit to you that Canadians expect or would expect a different kind of reform at this time in history. One that would turn us into better parliamentarians rather than political campaigners in our respective ridings, that would improve our ability to examine and improve the quality of legislation put before us, that would improve our ability to understand budgetary processes and the ways of better investing the tax dollars, ways of translating into programs and policies the ideas transmitted to us in a variety of ways by our constituents through this very place at the centre.

Mr. Speaker, I submit to you that we are elected to be active at the centre of this nation, namely on the Hill, in the capital of Canada, not in our respective ridings in the diffused manner being proposed by this package, because that is the essence or the quintessence of the purpose for which we are elected. This package not only disregards this basic fundamental point, it actually weakens the role of the parliamentarian. It is for this reason that, although we would like to be positive about parliamentary reform because it is in the interest of Canadian that parliamentary reform be a continuous process, we have to vote against this measure for a very clear reason, linked to the interest of the population of Canada.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 19027) and amendment of Mr. Dingwall (p. 19156).

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate dealing with the proposal to change the rules of the House of Commons. It is with foreboding that I do so.

My sense of unease is not brought on by the technical nature of the subject matter. I will admit, of course, that there are those who are much better versed than I in parliamentary procedure. But my trepidation stems from a belief that these changes are symptomatic of a more basic problem; a breakdown in the parliamentary system, brought on by a lack of understanding of the underlying principle of the separation of powers and of accountability.

Let us look at what is happening in this country. Provinces are increasingly demanding responsibility for legislation that the Constitution has assigned to the Parliament of Canada. Constitutional reform, once a retirement program for lawyers, has lately become a bitterly divisive issue. Western Canadians and Atlantic Canadians are increasingly demanding a reform of the other place. Certainly, British Columbia organizations are looking to California, seeing what is going on there, and demanding that the public initiate referenda.

I ask myself why this is happening? Why are so many demands to change the basic structures of our nation surfacing at the same time? The answer is simple. The public senses that the parliamentary system in Canada is breaking down and out of frustration are demanding action in their own ways and with their own ideas.

This is not a partisan issue. It does not surprise me that the system is breaking down. The British parliamentary system has been a battleground to fight the tyranny of autocratic governments since King John convened the very first one in 1213. Not a century has gone by without a major constitutional restructuring. In fact, the first signs of parliamentary authority were found only when Parliament took up arms against King Charles I and literally removed the head of government.

We are fond of saying that ours is the oldest parliamentary system on the planet.

We are fond of referring to the mother Parliament in London and to the millennium of history that gave rise to constitutional monarchy, and we are fond of showing that even the United States has based its system on the British system.

This is a re-write of history.

It was only under King William and Queen Mary that Parliament began to win supremacy over the government and only under Queen Anne that the Royal veto was eliminated. In short, it was only in the 18th century that the British parliamentary system began to emerge.

It is worth considering why the British parliamentary system emerged. Parliament had won supremacy over legislation and taxation through a bloody civil war. That civil war had resulted in the Hanoverians replacing the Stuarts on the throne. King George I required legislation and taxation in order to run the government. His claim on the throne was being questioned by the people and King George I was faced with a situation that might have made him more unpopular than our Prime Minister is today.

With hindsight, King George appears to have been the first modern politician. It was he who set the precedent of appointing ministers from the House of Commons. He realized that, by putting the most influential members of the House of Commons on the government payroll, he could have them fight for his legislation and moneys on the floor of the Chamber. Furthermore, the public would see these popular figures supporting the new monarch and thereby give him legitimacy.

A cynic would claim that the entire British parliamentary system is based on conflict of interests and would probably claim that today's rule changes are also part of this conflict of interest.

The government House leader states that these rule changes are necessary for members of Parliament to fulfil their duties. Some of these members are bored. They sit there day after day, having little or no say in debate.

I have heard journalists speculate that these rule changes are necessary to deal with the independents in the House, that the Conservative government is hoping for a minority in the next Parliament and wants to change the rules to ensure that legislation will pass through a multi-party legislature. I do not agree. I take the government at its word.

I am sure the primary motivation for the government is concern for the way Conservative members are occupying their time. The opposition benches are now riddled with members who occupy their time by participating in debate on the government's legislation.

By definition, the government does not want members to participate in debate. Let's face it, in the current parliamentary system, Conservative members do not want to participate in debate. If they speak against the government they will have to criticize the Prime Minister. If they oppose him they will be opposing the man who must sign their nomination papers, who will appear on their election literature, and who 80 per cent of the voters will think of when they see the ballot. Thanks to King George I, most of these MPs are in a conflict of interest situation.

The government's solution, which we are debating today, is to lessen the number of hours that Parliament sits. This is to permit, in the government's words, backbench members to have more time to be in their constituencies.

I am a member who recognizes the importance of being in the constituency and I spend virtually every weekend and every break we have in my constituency. The sole reason for this is to obtain advice and input from my constituents on important matters facing Parliament. I do this so that I can consider the bills that represent my constituents' best interests in this House.

The cutbacks in opposition days have reduced the number of issues that the opposition can raise. Therefore, the constituent voice will be greatly silenced.

I cannot support these rule changes. Parliament has a purpose and that purpose is to consider legislation. The government House leader is fond of saying that he was elected to govern. But he was not elected to govern. He was appointed to government and his appointment has put his colleagues in a conflict of interest situation. I urge them to rise above partisan politics and self-interest and vote against the motion.

There are issues that are fundamental to democracy: Are the rights of individuals paramount to the rights of the majority? Can the non-elected executive branch over-ride the elected legislature?

The issue of reform in the other place is not that different from the issue we are talking about today. The reason the public wants the other place reformed is because, first and foremost, the system is not working. They want the Senate to be elected to make these people accountable; they want it to be equal to be a check on the House of Commons; and they want an effective check on the executive branch.

I do not expect the government to suddenly realize, after listening to my speech, that the executive branch is different from the legislative branch. After all, just as King George I realized 100 years ago, a government can rule unimpeded by controlling the legislative branch.

I do hope that the members opposite will recognize that they are not the government. They have been summoned to this Parliament as legislators to consider government business that was set forth in the Speech from the Throne. The significance of the introduction of the pro forma bill following the first speech was to tell the government that we reserve the right to consider whatever matter we wish, not just the government's agenda.

I recognize that the members opposite may, out of ideology and personal interest, support much of what the government does. This item today, however, is not a partisan issue and not a government issue. It is an issue of interest solely to the legislative branch.

My honourable colleague, the member of Parliament for Ottawa-Vanier, one of the most distinguished parliamentarians around, has already pointed out to the House of Commons that rules should be initiated by a committee of the Commons. They certainly should not be initiated by the executive branch. This is an issue fundamental to our democracy and I beseech my colleagues to not let the non-elected government over-ride our elected House of Commons.

Regardless of political party, we must continue the fight of the first Parliament of 1213. We must protect Parliament from the tyranny of an autocratic government; otherwise, the Canadian parliamentary system has no future.

We would do well to realize that the only source of legitimacy the parliamentary system has left in the public eye lies in the democratic processes of this House. If the House Leader can change the rules to his political advantage this House would no longer be parliamentarian and he would have tampered with one of Canada's most fundamental institutions.

I say do not allow this government to force the public to lose their confidence in our parliamentary system.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege today to take a few minutes in the House to comment on the project submitted by the government to change the hours of sitting and work schedules of the House. I would also like to give you and the House the viewpoint of a member who represents a riding that is very far from Ottawa and also very large; it extends over nearly 750 miles of shoreline on the north side of the Gulf of St. Lawrence; it contains three large communities—Port Cartier, Sept Iles and Havre Saint-Pierre—within a distance of about 150 miles and 20 or so villages, some with fewer than 500 people, on another 550 miles of coast.

Mr. Speaker, my home is in Sept Iles and when I arrive in my riding, if I want to go to the eastern most part of it, the Blanc-Sablon region, I still have 550 miles to go, which means a day of flying to get there and another day to return.

I would also like to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of the House to the fact that the riding of Manicouagan also includes the Ungava Bay region, with Inuit villages located 600 or 700 miles north of Montreal and Sept Iles.

This is to tell you that for a member who represents a riding like that, a developing riding, a riding with countless needs, a riding where in some places we have to start from scratch, the present schedule of the House makes the member's work extremely difficult.

I would like to point out to the House that our constituents elected us not only to spend many hours in the House of Commons making laws, although that is important work; they elected us to be able to talk to us, to be able to spend time with us elected members, to be able to express to us their concerns and familiarize us with their needs and to work with them to set up services; to work with them in dealing with federal government bodies to prepare projects for improving conditions, improving federal government services in our regions.

I touched briefly on how one gets around my riding. I would also mention that the communities in two thirds of my riding are not connected by road. Some places in my riding are accessible by boat only in summer, or by plane, and in winter, when the boat service is discontinued, these villages in my riding are accessible only by plane.

I would also like to point out to the House, that the villages throughout the eastern part of my riding are not connected by road. So if I as member of Parliament for Manicouagan want to visit those villages, meet the people and spend time with them, in many cases, most of the time, I have to go by snowmobile, or by boat in summer.

Mr. Speaker, you will understand that for a member from a remote region, whose riding is extremely large, it is extremely difficult to travel there. Spending whole weeks here, week after week, day after day, while the House sits is very inconvenient and obviously makes doing our job as members of Parliament extremely difficult.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the changes that the government proposes to the schedule of the House make very important improvements. Sitting for three consecutive weeks and then being able to go to our ridings for one week, for me in any case, for a member from a remote region who has to represent a very large riding, for me—I will be able to work much more effectively and productively for my constituents, the citizens of my riding. During the three weeks that the House sits, when the members are required to be in Ottawa, during those three weeks, we will be able to work effectively, both in the House and in committees.

So, Mr. Speaker, being here three weeks at a time will enable us to deal directly and strictly with the business of the House, the standing committees and the legislative committees and concentrate our work and effort on the proceedings of the House, the committees, on the process of making, amending and reviewing legislation.

During the fourth week, we can return to our ridings, take time to meet our constituents, attend their meetings, arrange to meet them, help them prepare projects, help them in their dealings with various federal government bodies.

I would also like to give some thought to the future. It might be said that it is fairly easy for me to travel from Ottawa to Sept Îles or from Sept Îles to Ottawa every week because air travel that way is easy. It is true about commuting between Ottawa and Sept-Îles. But in a foreseeable future, someone from the Lower South Shore could be elected to represent the riding of Manicouagan in Ottawa. Imagine for a moment, Mr. Speaker, what it would be like for a person living in Natashquan, having been elected as member for Manicouagan, to leave Ottawa Friday afternoon on the 4 p.m. flight to Quebec City, then catch a plane to Sept-Îles and, Saturday morning, get up and travel to Natashquan, and to have to be back in Ottawa by Monday to attend the House proceedings.

You will understand, it would make it almost impossible for anyone from that part of the riding to efficiently fulfill his or her obligations as member of Parliament in the best interest of his or her constituents.

In that sense, Mr. Speaker, the proposed schedule is certainly making the job more attractive for people who live in small communities allowing greater flexibility and making the organization of their work schedule easier. This could encourage people from small localities to run for office and fully participate in the democratic process, the electoral process of this country.

The way the business of the House is scheduled at present, it is very difficult and, therefore, less interesting for people living in remote areas to run in a federal election.

• (1550)

Mr. Speaker, yesterday I heard the member for Kingston and the Islands make an extremely and outrageously partisan speech in which he mentioned that while Tory members were in the opposition they were free to go back and forth between Ottawa and their constituency, whatever the business of the House was. I found that remark, coming from an experienced parliamentarian like the member for Kingston and the Islands, not only extremely out of place, but also untrue.

I think that if we go back a few years, we will find that Tory members who sat as the opposition in this House formed a group of faithful parliamentarians who followed the democratic process, who followed the parliamentary and legislative process very seriously. Indeed, I am inclined to believe, Mr. Speaker, at the sight of today's opposition benches, that what the member for Kingston and the Islands said yesterday is true of the Liberals who are now in the opposition. Because, Mr. Speaker, we must realize that that is probably what they are doing now. There is no doubt they come and go as they please. Even when motions to amend a bill are introduced and come to a vote, we see members take part in the debate and then leave without caring to be present and vote when the vote is called.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I found irrelevant and astonishing to say the least, the remarks of my friend from Kingston and the Islands.

So I wanted to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and to tell the House and the Canadian citizens that when the opposition claims that the Progressist Conservative Party, the governement, present these changes to the rules of the House only for electoral purposes, it is completely erroneous, completely false. These changes will help to modernize the way the House conducts its business and to bring it up to date. I can understand why some Liberal opposition members are against these changes. I understand. I can understand them since they have been here for so many years, it is hard for them to accept changes that would make our parliamentary work, our debates more up to date, more efficient, and that would leave the members free to spend more time with their constituents.

Some are blaming us for not consulting our constituents, and are criticizing the government for submitting legislation to the House without having consulted the people. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I think the proposed changes will precisely allow members of Parliament to go back regularly in their ridings and meet their constituents, let them know the government's policies and hear their comments on policies and legislation being drafted.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, I close my remarks by telling you that I will vote against the amendments introduced by the opposition parties and that I entirely support the government's proposal suggesting changes to the rules of the House and of committees.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret there are no questions or comments. The hon. member for Hamilton East has the floor, on debate.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

At a time when Canadians are looking for real leadership in Parliament, I think it is disastrous that we are sitting here debating a motion that would cut 25 per cent from the heart of Parliament.

The Prime Minister and the Government House Leader claim they want parliamentarians to be more accountable to the people. Mr. Speaker, we also want Parliament to be more accountable to Canadians and want the Government of Canada to be accountable to Canadians, as we held the Prime Minister to account today, asking him why, when he had evidence in his hands two months ago about the devastation a foreign government take-over of de Havilland would have, he was blindly going ahead with the take-over. We held the government to account on the farcical statement of the minister of industry that he would leave it all up to Investment Canada.

Since the birth of Investment Canada there have been approximately 914 applications for foreign take-overs and do you know what the government's batting record is, for Canadians? It is 914 to 0. The government has never turned down a foreign take-over on the grounds that it might be against the interest of Canadians.

How accountable was the Prime Minister last summer when the barricades were up at Oka and he could not be found anywhere in the country? How accountable was the Prime Minister during the Christmas period when he was about to take us into a war, yet would not allow Parliament to speak?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A point of order.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, may I simply remind my colleague from Hamilton East that this debate is on changes to the working procedures of Parliament. It is not a trial on accountability of the government. I would insist the member come back to the real debate and stop politicking on this issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member is a long-time member. She knows relevancy when there is relevancy and I would hope that she would get back to her—.

The hon. member for Hamilton East has the floor.

Ms. Copps: I would argue most strenuously that the intent of the changes to the Standing Orders is to tear the heart out of Parliament.

Mr. Langlois: You know that is not true.

Ms. Copps: The member says it is not true. Sitting days of the House would be cut from 175 days to 135 days. There would be 40 days in which the government cannot be held to account during Question Period.

Canadians already feel that parliamentarians are overpaid and underworked and now the government is about to embark on a plan to cut the workload of this House by 25 per cent. The member says the cut is not relevant. I would say it is relevant that, when the government and the Prime Minister lead us into a war, we have a chance to debate the issue in Parliament. Surely that is the whole reason we were elected: to come to Parliament and to hold the Prime Minister and the government to account. We were elected to hold them to account for the fact that in every part of this country Canadians are asking this Prime Minister for an economic plan to bring jobs back.

We are talking about 1,400,000 Canadians who want to work, but who, because of the policies of this government, have no jobs. There is one place where those Canadians invest their trust in their members of Parliament to come and plead their case before the Canadian people. I dare say that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Industry will take their boot straps to the case of de Havilland and will pass that case along as another foreign take-over, like the 914 take-overs they have already passed, but we should have a right to question them in this place.

This government's portrayal of these decisions as reform is nothing less than a fraud. It is a fraud to say to Canadians that, by permitting the Prime Minister to hide behind the defences of the Langevin Block, we will get to the real issues facing this country. It is a fraud for the Prime Minister to say that by cutting our sitting days from 175 to 135 we will have accountability for the people of Canada. It is a fraud for the government to claim that it is making this change to assist in the democratisation of Parliament.

The government has a well-constructed plan to shut Parliament down so that the Prime Minister can continue in the presidential style to which he has become accustomed. He does not like Parliament. He would like to be like Ronald Reagan and George Bush. They do not have to come in and be accountable on a daily basis and the Prime Minister likes their system. He wants to move toward their system, where the presidential style does not call on the accountability of Cabinet, it does not even call on the accountability of Parliament. This is the first time in the history of the Canadian Parliament that rule changes are being brought in by closure.

• (1600)

This government is not interested in real debate. It is no wonder that reformers, or so-called reformers, are having an impact on Canadians when they say they want to democratize the system. They look at the Prime Minister and they see what kind of government he has run behind closed doors for the last six years. They see the role of Parliament being stripped away bit by bit because members on all sides of the House are losing the opportunity to state the case for their people.

My party will not stand idly by and watch the Prime Minister destroy another Canadian institution. We saw what he did with the trade agreement. The results of that were evident in the House today. In fact, we now not only have the Minister for International Trade, but the chief Canadian architect of the agreement and now finally, the Prime Minister, admitting that the Americans are breaking the spirit of the free trade agreement.

Well, surprise, surprise. What the Prime Minister does not realize is that as we speak, Canadians are crying out for the government to bring leadership out from behind the back doors and out to the front doors and to the floor of Parliament and to the floor of the union halls and meeting rooms across the country, but it is not going to happen by closing down Parliament.

[Translation]

I imagine the hon. member is interested in the background. If he is, he should know that it is the first time in the history of our country and of many governments that a government applies closure to ram through bad rules that will silence members in this House.

The Prime Minister claims to be modernizing Parliament.

Mr. Prud'homme: He wants to close it down.

Mme Copps: Mr. Speaker, he is not modernizing Parliament. This is a fraud, a sham. The fact of matter is that he would rather have a presidential system, with no question period. He wants to be like President Reagan and not have to be accountable. He does not want to come here and answer the real—

The hon. member is whining. I made the point in this House today that Montreal has become Canada's unemployment capital. We also know that, on many occasions, the policies of this government have brought the Canadian economy down. We know, for instance, that the mind of this government is already made up to dispose of de Havilland and to give Boeing the go ahead to sell the business to the governments of France and Italy. This will certainly cause many job losses in Montreal.

Figures have even shown that nearly half of the raw materials used by de Havilland come from Montreal and Quebec. When I raised the matter in the House, the so-called Minister of Industry said these were wroug figures, pure liberal fabrication.

Do you know what the source of these figures is, Mr. Speaker? These figures showing that 50 per cent of the raw materials used by de Havilland come from Montreal and Quebec were obtained from the Boeing company. They did not originate from the Liberal Party or the Opposition but from the Boeing company, and this is one of the reasons why we must have a question period, to expose the fraud and this government's lack of industrial policies.

I want to be in this House and do my duty and speak on behalf of the people who are unemployed in my riding and in Montreal, because, as you can see, not one conservative member has the courage to rise to speak about the failure of the economic policies of this government. They sit quietly, as if this was going to be the greatest parliamentary reform, when then know full well that, in fact, this means the closing down of Parliament.

Since this government came to power, the Prime Minister has attached our systems, our institutions, the economic and social fabric of this country on many occasions and now he is closing down the last place where we could really speak out for the ordinary people.

Mr. Langlois: That is incredible!

Ms. Copps: The hon. member shakes his head and says it is incredible. I think there may be a lack of respect for Parliament, because if there is one place where the unemployed of Montreal will be able to air their problems, it is here, in Parliament. When the hon. member claims that by cutting Parliament's discussion time by 25 per cent, we will help democracy, I would like him to tell me how that can be done.

Mr. Speaker, when Parliament was not sitting, when we were about to go to war and the Prime Minister remained behind closed curtains in the Langevin Block, without having the courage to recall Parliament on such a fundamental question as war, did the member speak up for the right of Parliament? Did the member get up to say there is one place where a decision should be made on this matter of going to war and it is not in Sherbrooke or in Montreal but here in the Parliament of Canada?

It is true that Canadians are becoming increasingly cynical because they see the Prime Minister and Cabinet ministers ignore Parliament's role. They ignore the role of Parliament, Mr. Speaker, even in constitutional matters. We saw the Prime Minister tie members' hands regarding the federal parliamentary committee. He told the Beaudoin–Edwards Committee to go and find out.

But instead of being able to examine the range of problems affecting us, as the Bélanger–Campeau Commission and even the Allaire Report did, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister allowed us to examine only one small point, the amending formula.

Mr. Speaker, if we really want to have what it takes to save Canada, which should ultimately be the responsibility of the Parliament of Canada, we should at least be able to have an all–party parliamentary committee that would have to look at all constitutional issues. Why is the Prime Minister still trying to deal with the Constitution behind closed doors? It is the same kind of attitude we find today with changing the Standing Orders of the House. It is an attempt to silence the minorities in Parliament.

The fact that he has the nerve to go ahead with a motion of closure, Mr. Speaker, is another expression of the contempt that he is showing for Parliament. Perhaps he could help me say it in French, but it shows contempt.

[English]

Introducing closure exposes the contempt that the Prime Minister has for Parliament, that on this most fundamental issue of our right to speak here in the Canadian Parliament. He does not care what minorities have to say. He does not care what the opposition parliamentarians have to say. We can see the evidence of contempt as he introduces closure at a time when we as minority members of Parliament want to have our right to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have six minutes remaining after we come back from royal assent.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Royal Assent

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1620)

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

> Bill C–79, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act—Chapter No. 20.
> Bill C–93, an act to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act—Chapter No. 21.
> Bill C–98, an act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose—Chapter No. 22.
> Bill C–97, an act to provide borrowing authority—Chapter No. 23.

AMENDMENTS TO STANDING ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 19027) and amendment of Mr. Dingwall (P. 19156).

Mme Copps: Mr. Speaker, I did welcome the interruption, and I will tell you why. On our way to the other place, the member for Abitibi told us the real reason why the Tories want these amendments to Standing Orders. Do you know what he said? The hard–working member for Abitibi said in this House that we should somewhat lay off criticizing the new rules because they will give him an extra week off.

An hon. member: A month!

Mme Copps: Yes, a month. That is what he said, Mr. Speaker. The Standing Orders are good because they give him an extra week off every month. How strange to hear the members opposite argue that they need that week to go and work in their riding, when we know that what they really want is to reduce their workload by 25 per cent, earn the same money and be less accountable in this House and across the country.

That is a disgrace, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that the member for Abitibi will address this point when he is ready to discuss his so-called reasons for supporting this motion for closure.

[English]

I would like to talk about one other element. I realize that I have a very short period of time left, so I will try to be as brief and as concise as possible. The Prime Minister and the government have stated on dozens of occasions that they would like to do everything they can to encourage more women to come to Parliament and, in particular, more women with responsibilities.

This particular motion is not only an abrogation of the rights of Parliament, it is also despicably anti-family and anti-women. I will tell you why. One of the reasons that the government is bulldozing ahead with this particular motion is so it can not only have a month that is cut by one-quarter in terms of the workload, but it is also planning on having evening sittings.

Mr. Belsher: My family lives in British Columbia.

Ms. Copps: I hear the member say his family is in British Columbia. I certainly have every sympathy for him spending time with his family. I also know that if he were the primary care giver for his family, he would find it extremely difficult to spend three weeks in one city and one week a month in another city.

In about a year my daughter is supposed to start school. Should I enrol her for three weeks in Ottawa and one week in Hamilton? Should I tell her that when we have night sittings: "Gee; I would love to spend time with you".

I want to bring women to Parliament, but in fact because of this crazy system that we are adopting, we have to sit later nights. We start at eight o'clock in the morning. We already sit until 6, 6.30 or 7 p.m., depending upon the evening. I can tell you as one who is trying to raise a child, it is not easy.

This particular measure will make it more difficult because parents of school-age children and parents who are the primary care givers of their children cannot live three weeks in one part of the country and one week in another part of the country.

The member says: "Who is the primary care giver". You are talking about bringing more women to Parliament. The fact is, whether we like it or not, women still tend to be the primary care givers for the children. I suggest that a new schedule which calls for later night sittings and which splits the parliamentary calendar into three weeks in Ottawa and one week allegedly in the riding, although we hear from the member for Abitibi that it is one week's vacation—

Mr. Langlois: You are talking for yourself.

Ms. Copps: Yes, I am talking for myself, and I am talking for other women who would like to be able to take an equal place in participating in Parliament. I hope you have a chance to speak for yourself. I can only speak for myself, and I can tell you that as a direct result of this measure, it will be more difficult for me to recruit good women candidates with dependent children to come to Parliament. The very simple logical question is: What do I do when she goes to school? Do I put her in school three weeks in Ottawa and one week in Hamilton?

The parliamentary calendar that we have has only been in existence for the last number of years. The Speaker will know this because he lived under the old days of the night sittings. In the old days with the night sittings the longer the evening went, the more the quality of the debate deteriorated as the quality of the libation increased. That is a fact of life. I am sure the Speaker and others who went through the experience of late night sittings in the past will know that later night sittings do not necessarily improve the quality of the debate. They usually improve the quantity of the verbiage.

I am suggesting that when we adopted the calendar that had a five-day week here in Ottawa and a weekend in the riding, it gave the chance for people like myself who have small children to spend some time with their children. This particular measure is going to take that away from us.

Not only that, but what about the employees of Parliament? What about those employees who are called upon every night to sit late, two or three extra hours late, because this government is changing the rules of Parliament? Have those employees been taken into consideration, and the fact that it will wreak havoc on their family life?

If this government is truly sincere about bringing more minorities into Parliament, and in particular allowing women of childbearing age to take their rightful place in Parliament, then surely the calendar of Parliament should reflect the capacity for an ordinary family life. Heaven knows, it is hard enough to carry on that life as it is, but this particular measure will set back the cause of bringing women to Parliament.

I urge you, and I urge government members with some backbone, to ignore the jackboots of closure that have been imposed by the Prime Minister today and to respect the fact that any time the parliamentary rules are changed, they should be changed by the consensus among all members, so that in fact we can raise the quality of debate in this place and we can also give all Canadians the chance to come here and represent their constituents.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on this bill today. It is a bill that is going to be very damaging to something that people have fought for long and hard for centuries, and that is the right to a parliamentary democracy.

People have fought and died. We must remember that others are continuing to fight and die for what we have, and which the government now proposes to diminish, the right to hold the rulers accountable for how they govern, how they use the resources of their people, and how they plan for the future of the nation.

What we have here is the tyranny of the majority imposing on the Canadian people and on their representatives in this House a gag for 25 per cent more of the time.

It is seven centuries since people first fought and risked their lives to establish parliamentary democracy. It is the reason why the distance between our two front benches is two swords' lengths, so that kind of destruction is not necessary in the parliamentary system any longer. We now want to give up a large portion of what has been so hard won over so many centuries.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General spoke the other day about the importance of being here to speak for the people we represent and the importance of a government being able to implement its agenda. He talked very eloquently about something that I agree with entirely, which is the importance of election campaigns, the importance of going to Canadians with a platform and a program.

• (1630)

He stopped short of what election campaigns are really all about It is not telling people what we are going to do and then going off blindly and doing it for the next four or five years, regardless of what happens or how circumstances change.

What it is really all about is listening to people and hearing the values that are important to them, letting them comment on what we are proposing to them and taking those comments into account when we come into this House to make the rules, laws and decisions about how we are going to spend their money.

The government claims it has a mandate to implement its agenda and a responsibility to ride roughshod over parliamentary democratic procedures to implement that agenda. In fact, that is not the entire responsibility of a government or Parliament. It is to reflect the views of Canadians about what kind of a country they want.

It is to reflect the values that members have heard from their constituents and it is to apply those values to changing circumstances. It is not to blindly follow a political agenda that does not have anything to do at times with what is good for the country.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General was right about one thing: We are here to speak for the people we represent. What these changes to the Standing Orders do is merely to strangle our right to speak on their behalf.

The tyranny of the majority is something that democracy always has to be on guard against. That is why we have a parliamentary system where there is a government and an opposition.

The role of the opposition is to hold the government accountable. When we established parliamentary democracies or as we developed them over the centuries, we did not say that once we elect a government it has the right to do whatever it wants to do.

It has the power. That does not give it the right to do whatever it wants to do regardless of what is said in this House and by Canadians. We have this Parliament where every day the government can be held accountable for its actions. It can be called upon to explain its actions. At times, it can be called upon to change its actions.

A wise government does that. It does listen and respond. Where possible, it attempts to seek the consensus of the nation and Parliament.

I do not know how we are going to improve our ability to speak for our constituents by being here eight weeks less a year. It may be very attractive to us not to be in the spotlight every day. I suspect it is more attractive to the government—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member for interrupting her.

There have been discussions among the parties, and I believe you will find consent for the following motion:

That on Friday, April 12, 1991 when Government Notice of Motion dated April 10, 1991 is called for debate no dilatory or superseding motions shall be receivable by the Chair and that at 2 p.m,. April 12, 1991 or when no further members rise to participate in the debate, whichever comes first, said motion shall be deemed demanded put and carried on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): So ordered.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could get some clarification from the government House leader on when the House is likely to reconvene. Can he give us an end point beyond which we will not recess? We appreciate that we are not supporting this motion, but at least we can give planning as to the maximum time of the recess period.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, it is the intention now to call the House back on May 13.

The reason for the flexibility in the motion is there may be a change in one or two days in either direction of that. There are a couple of things for which it would be useful to have that flexibility in order not to have to recall the House in order to get it.

I would give this assurance to the House leader of the New Democratic Party and to the leadership of the Liberal Party that should there be any change with respect to May 13, it will only be after consultation with the leadership of both parties.

Mr. Riis Mr. Speaker, I think that is the assurance we are seeking. However, I guess what the minister is saying is that it might move a day or two around May 13. It would not be a week or a month or two, but simply a day or two. We can at this point be considering returning on May 13.

Mr. Andre: That is correct.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope you would take into consideration that Mother's Day is on May 12.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENTS TO STANDING ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p.19027) and amendment of Mr. Dingwall (p.9156).

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, given the interruptions, perhaps you could remind me how much time I have remaining.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have until 4.40 p.m.

Mrs. Catterall: Can I clarify that, Mr. Speaker. I thought I had just barely started.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pardon me, the hon. member will have until 4.50 p.m. Sorry about that.

Mrs. Catterall: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Cutting our time in this House by eight weeks, by 25 per cent every year, means 40 less Question Periods. It may be very comfortable for the government to escape the scrutiny of Parliament and of the public, but I do not think it is in the interests of good government.

How do we hold a government accountable if it is not here? How do we ask the questions that our constituents are asking us every day on the telephone or in letters? How do we look at the spending? How do we look at the actions of the government, and insist on explanations for Canadians so that Canadians can understand what their government is doing, and understand what they like about it and what they do not like about it so that they can exercise their responsibilities as citizens to provide comment on what the government is doing and to judge it at the next election?

It is this House that is the medium by which Canadians are informed of the actions of the government and the meaning of those actions. It is by the House that the media inform Canadians. Without this House sitting, the agenda of the media is set by the government and the actions it takes outside this House.

That may be very convenient for the Prime Minister and it may be very convenient for the cabinet. I suggest it is not in the best interests of the Canadian public.

There are serious issues confronting this country. Close to four million Canadians will be unemployed this year. This government wants to be out of the House every fourth week so it does not have to confront that fact.

The economy of this country is in decline and this government wants to be out of the House one week out of every four so it does not have to deal with that issue. We are losing jobs in this country on a daily basis. No wonder the government does not want to be here to answer the questions of Canadians and the opposition about that fact.

We have seen what instability does. We have seen what on-again, off-again democracy does in the weeks since December. We have seen this government fail to call back Parliament at the regular scheduled time and we have seen this House in the ignominious position of debating the merits of a war, after our Prime Minister and our government had already committed Canadian lives to a war.

We have seen the House then adjourn. We have seen it come back weeks later for a very short period of time, and then off again. Now we see that we are going to be out of here again for another month. We only have to look at what has happened in those months since December to know that democracy does not work when you have a democracy you can switch on and off like a light switch.

I happen to sit on the environment committee. That is a committee that has done excellent work over the last two years. It has produced three very progressive reports on the condition of the atmosphere. There were strong recommendations and policy for the government with all party concurrence. Yet, that committee has met less than one-half the times it was scheduled to meet in the period of time the government has been pulling us into Parliament and pushing us out of Parliament. It has not once looked at the spending estimates for the environment department so that this government can be held accountable on how it is allocating the resources of Canadians to protect the environment, an issue that Canadians say is their highest priority for the use of their resources.

When is the environment committee going to have an opportunity to meet, to review those estimates and to have the minister in front of it and in front of Canadians to account for the priorities he is setting for the environment? It is not going to happen. Again, for the second year in a row, there is not going to be a report from the environment committee to Parliament on the appropriateness of those estimates and the appropriateness of the priorities for spending on the environment.

That is what happens when we get a Parliament in, Parliament out revolving door. That is what we are going to have.

I do not know about other members of Parliament, but I am pleasantly surprised by the number of my constituents who regularly and consistently watch Question Period. If they do not see it in the afternoon because they happen to be retired and have the opportunity to see it, they watch the reruns at night. They use the watching of Question Period to contact me about issues, with information and with their views. Yet, when Question Period is on this week but not on next week, I think we interfere with that rhythm of people keeping track of Parliament, keeping track of what each and every one of us is doing and holding us accountable to them for our actions in Parliament and our actions on their behalf.

In these changes to the Standing Orders we are told that committees are going to be able to call technical witnesses when they are reviewing bills. We are not here to pass bills because they are technically correct. We are here to pass them hopefully because they are in the best interest of the country and because they reflect some kind of policy and some kind of forward looking agenda for where Canada is heading.

We do not get that perspective on bills introduced in the House by hearing from technical witnesses. We get it from hearing from people who have knowledge, insight, and thoughtful analysis to bring to us on the purpose of a bill, on the implications of that bill and on the long-term effects and when we do that job conscientiously.

Numerous times in this House and in committees I have seen bills being put through a review by a committee which includes members of all parties and coming back to this House stronger and better. It is wrong to disrupt that process and to say that our only purpose is to look for the technical aspects of a bill and to hear from technical witnesses.

Legislative committees perform an important role. It is very clear from the fact that the Environmental Assessment Act went off to a legislative committee and has not come back to us that the inadequacies of that bill have become evident through that examination; not through an examination of the technical aspects of the bill, but of the implications for how well it does its job to protect the environment of Canada from now into the next century. It is evident that members of the committee have concluded that it does not do that job very well. That is why that bill is not back. That is why inevitably that bill will die before the next Parliament. The government itself through that examination has recognized that it is an inadequate bill.

The government wants to stifle the ability of the opposition to set the agenda in Parliament and to bring forward issues that are of concerns to Canadians that the government chooses not to bring forward. We do that through opposition days, as the members opposite know, where we the opposition parties get to choose the topic of the day and to put forward a motion. It is a rare opportunity, but it does happen. Now the occasions on which we will be able to do that are limited.

I want to talk about closure.

The word Parliament indicates that we are here to speak on behalf of our constituents. Yet, in this session alone this government has used closure to limit debate more often than any government since Confederation. In fact I believe in the first year of its mandate it used closure more often than all governments since Confederation.

That is stifling the ability of my constituents and the constituents in every riding across this country to be heard in the Parliament of their country. It is their Parliament; it is not our Parliament. That is what should guide our decisions as to how this House operates.

My colleague has talked about the implication for employees of the House of Commons. I have not heard one member of the government address that issue. I suspect that is the last thing that was given any consideration when these changes to the orders were brought in and the government decided that it was more convenient for its members not to be here every fourth week. The last thing it thought about was the several thousand people who work on this Hill to make our work possible and what it would do to disrupt their lives, their working conditions, probably even the amount of remuneration they receive in many cases.

Mr. Belsher: Parliament is not here for their lives.

Ms. Copps He does not care. "Parliament is not here for their lives" is what he said.

Mrs. Catterall The member opposite can say that he does not care about their lives. Any responsible employer cares about the lives of its employees, their ability to live a decent life, to make a decent living, but this government does not.

I want to close by talking about making the Government of Canada irrelevant. I spoke to a group of immigrants last week and they said: "Why do we have a government that seems intent on tearing things down instead of building things?"

I said: "That is your impression because the only government you have ever known in this country is the government we have now" That is not the kind of government we have always had in Canada. We have had governments that build. We have had governments that provide, that bring in pensions for seniors, that start a medicare system. We have had governments that built railways across this country because that is the only way to build a nation and built a national broadcasting system. Yet, we have seen a government now that seems determined to tear down the infrastructure that holds this country together from ocean to ocean to ocean.

We can think of the magic of a handful of people in the eastern part of this continent actually having the temerity to think that they could build a nation over a period of a century and a quarter and actually doing it. We can look at the infrastructure, the network of communications and transportation that helped make that happen. Another important part of what made this nation possible was the infrastructure of government.

Politicians had a vision. That vision was carried out by a Public Service which for many decades now has been known as one of the best in the world. Without it anything we decide in here would not happen. That infrastructure of nationhood is now under attack.

Finally with this item before us, with these changes to the Standing Orders, the very institution to Parliament itself is being eroded. Parliament will become a now you see it, now you don't institution, instead of something that Canadians know is there day after day regularly looking after their business, representing their views, hearing their concerns, reflecting their values, and building their future.

I oppose this motion. The consequences will be terribly damaging to freedom and democracy in this country. I regret that the government prefers not to be here, not to be answerable to the people of Canada, as much as it obviously does.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to rise to participate in this debate, though I am a bit dismayed by some of the comments made by the hon. member for Ottawa West. I cannot help but notice that maybe she is influenced in her observations by the fact that she does live in Ottawa and does not have a problem.

• (1650)

She just made the suggestion that this government wants to stay away from Parliament to hide from the people. Guess what, Mr. Speaker? The 77,000 people I have the honour to represent are not in Ottawa. They are somewhere between Hubbards and Woods Harbour in Nova Scotia. I can be accessible to the people who have sent me here by being in my constituency. I can be accessible to the people who want to be involved in the action, who want to have an opportunity to tell their member of Parliament their views, and who want to come to me with their problems, to seek my assistance, to seek my support, and to do the various things they have elected me to do.

What we are here to talk about today is modifications in the rules of the House. Quite frankly, I think that the government is to be commended for the initiative it has shown in trying to bring this about. It is regrettable that this was not brought about through a spirit of co–operation, notwithstanding the commitments made by representatives of other parties in the House on which subsequently they did not deliver.

It is unfortunate that we ended up in a debate. I could not help but observe this morning, as mentioned by the hon. member who just spoke, that it is regrettable closure is being used to implement these rules. On the other hand, if the name of the game from an opposition perspective is that you oppose whatever the government puts forward for as long as you can to prevent it from happening then you can establish, presumably in the minds of the public, that the government is not fit to govern because it cannot accomplish anything. What kind of message does that send to the public about the way its Parliament functions?

For example, I noticed that it was the New Democratic Party in particular which felt that, no matter what, Parliament had to come back this week to be here because these rules had to be dealt with, had to be fought. Yet, I noticed when the vote was taken this morning that 19 out of 44 NDP members voted. Where were the other 25 to stand up for democracy and justice? Probably they were where a lot of our government members would like to be, back in the constituencies, accessible to the people, doing what can be done to usefully assist.

We have a serious problem in this country with respect to the image of politicians and what the public thinks of us. In my judgment one of the main causes of that is the way this place functions. The adversarial nature of this place is phenomenal. If only as a fluke of fortune or luck, once in a while the government should luck into doing the right thing. Yet, I have noticed in the two and a half years I have been here that no matter what the government does, in the eyes of the people on the other side it is wrong. Not even by a fluke can it once in a while be right. It is always wrong. Everything the government does is wrong in the eyes of the opposition.

I could say what kind of credibility that sometimes lends to opposition members. They can run out and take opinion polls. If the government tries to act in a responsible manner, deal with the deficit, deal with the national debt that is going to cripple the future of our young people, they can stand back and say that they are against dealing with that. They say that they are not against dealing with that, that they are against cuts. However, it is pretty tough to get rid of a debt and a deficit without making cuts or, conversely, by raising revenues. They are against raising revenues and they are against making cuts, but then of course they would also criticize the government for the deficit.

How do we have any kind of credibility with the public if all we have is a situation of constant bickering back and forth between the parties on both sides of this House? I think it is incumbent upon all members of this House—one member earlier in the debate made the comment—to come here and represent people. They have a responsibility to stand up and be heard in this House. I believe very strongly that that is correct. I support the fact, however, that there is no reason that one need speak for 20 minutes to make the point. The notion of reducing the length of speeches from 20 minutes to 10 minutes gives more people the opportunity to speak.

It it is important to note that the rule changes being proposed here are not going to limit the number of hours this House will be available. Opportunities will be there for members to speak. I think the kind of thing we have to look at is how much of the time of this House is absolutely wasted with dilatory nonsense of one sort or another.

I was appalled, the week before Easter, to sit in this House and watch as my hon. friends in the NDP insist that we have the Speaker stand and read a motion into the record for an endless period of time. How do we engender the respect of the people who have sent us here if at a cost of thousands of dollars an hour we are going to use up the time of Parliament, time when members should be standing and speaking out on behalf of the people who sent them here, on foolish nonsense like that? That is why the public has lost respect for politicians. It has become so predictable that no matter what the government does the opposition is going to complain about it.

It is interesting that we have an opposition in this particular Parliament that not only complains about what the government is doing but rarely offers an implementive alternative to replace it. I think we have a very serious problem in this adversarial nature that seems to hold sway in the way this place works.

We have a further way to go. The business of votes and the manner in which votes are handled in this House have amazed and shocked me since I have arrived. First of all, we play this game of trying to keep everybody stuck in Ottawa because we never know when there is going to be a vote. It may be over something really important like whether we should adjourn or not adjourn or whether we should have a vote later or whether we should have a vote now. However, let us not let members of Parliament go back to where their constituents are because we can keep them captive here in Ottawa to do nothing instead of being accessible to the public.

It is eminently reasonable that we work out a system so votes only take place at certain times. After all, there is one vote that really counts, and that is the vote that takes place on election day. The nature of the political system is that the people have a choice. They have eight weeks during a campaign to decide who they want to govern the country for a mandate of four or five years. Once they have made that decision, members have an obligation to get on with the job. The name of the game and the way this place functions are such that opposition members will stand over there and make out that the government is doing such terrible things they have to defend the public.

We must bear in mind that the public makes the decision. It so happens that in 1984 and 1988 it chose the Progressive Conservative Party to lead the country. When the next election comes it has the option to chose somebody else. Who knows? Maybe it will, maybe it won't, but that is the right of the public and the essence of democracy.

When opposition members who are representative of the minority suggest that it is their responsibility to determine the nature of government in the country, surely we have an extraordinarily dangerous situation.

We have a responsibility to balance the need and the opportunity of members of Parliament to come to this place to speak on behalf of the people who have sent them here with at the same time the obligation of the government to govern. While the government in terms of the executive branch may be the cabinet, as members of Parliament we are part of the government in the eyes of the public. When it sees us standing here and bickering back and forth like a bunch of kids in the school yard it says: "What is that, a Parliament of fools, or are these the people we sent to represent us?"

I cannot help but be amazed from time to time by the attitude of the public toward politicians. As politicians we are them; each one of us comes because a group of Canadians for whatever reason chose us to come here.

Did Canadians chose us to come here because they thought we are a bunch of incompetents? No. The attitude toward politicians in society is amazing. They chose us for the right reasons. They chose us because they thought we were upstanding, they thought we were intelligent, they thought we were committed to the community, and they thought we were prepared to work hard. I happen to think that is why we are here. I think members on both sides come here with dedication to Canada, sincerity and concern to do the job.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXTENSION OF BENEFITS

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take the necessary measures in order that working spouses accompanying military personnel posted outside Canada may be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a very important motion in my view or I would not have put it on the Order Paper. We call upon the Canadian Armed Forces to give outstanding service for this nation and outstanding service in the international community and they give it well.

I think the Parliament of Canada and we who serve here should be prepared to look after the members of the armed forces and their needs and to try to make things smooth for their families. It is very hard on families of military personnel, not only when they are overseas on particular duties such as during the Persian Gulf war, but indeed when they are away from home for long periods of time on training exercises.

As I said, they perform these roles very well. We, as parliamentarians, should pay them the kind of respect during the normal times that we tend to suddenly give them when they are needed in the world or in the nation for specific reasons of great import.

This motion today has been one of great interest to me for a long time. I have had the great fortune to teach in a Department of National Defence high school and to be head of the history department and a vice-principal. As a matter of note, when I left that job on CFB Petawawa in December 1965, to take up my duties in this House, my first pay cheque as a member of Parliament was $5 less than I was getting as the vice-principal of General Panet High School, Canadian Forces Base Petawawa.

When spouses go overseas with their husbands they may have had a job here in Canada for five or ten years and they will lose all their unemployment insurance rights. If they go to Germany and are there for two or three years nothing is intact for them when they come back. They go out to look for another job and have no benefits during that period of time. The purpose of unemployment insurance is to bridge the gap between unemployment and employment.

So, not only are we saying to these spouses, when they go to Germany, for example, or to a military attaché's office in another nation of the world, that they will not qualify for unemployment insurance and that they can either stay back, separate their family, and keep their job in Canada, or not receive UI benefits when they go overseas.

There is an exception to this approach. The claimant who resides temporarily or permanently in any state of the United States contiguous to Canada is not disentitled from receiving benefit by reason only of such residence if he or she is available for work in Canada and is able to personally report at an office of the Unemployment Insurance commission in Canada at such time as the commission may direct.

Then a claimant who resides temporarily or permanently in the District of Columbia in the United States, in Puerto Rico, the American Virgin Islands, or in any state of the United States with which Canada has a reciprocal agreement is not disentitled from receiving benefit by reason only of such residence if he or she proves entitlement to benefit under the agreement between Canada and the United States.

So we have a reciprocal agreement. So, if a Canadian Armed Forces couple ends up going down to Colorado Springs, for example, to work in NORAD headquarters, the spouse can then collect unemployment insurance by virtue of this reciprocal agreement with the United States. This is not the case if they go to Europe, for example, where many members of our forces have been resident outside the country for a number of years.

There are some rather interesting items here that I do want to put on the record.

If you live in the United States, Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands, we mentioned that we had a reciprocal unemployment insurance agreement with the United States, which applies to all states in the United States, including the District of Columbia, which I mentioned, Puerto Rico, and the American part of the Virgin Islands. So if you are living in any of these places and were paying Canadian U.I. premiums before you became unemployed you may be entitled to Canadian benefits. It makes no difference whether you are living there permanently or temporarily.

The same thing applies to Americans or to Canadians who have moved or returned to Canada after working in insurable employment in the United States. They can apply in Canada to collect American unemployment insurance benefits.

There is one very important part that I want to get on the record. We have to keep in mind that Canada has no reciprocal agreements with any other countries. Canadians can collect regular U.I. benefits only in Canada, the United States, Puerto Rico, and the American Virgin Islands. How does the reciprocal agreement work for Canadian citizens in the United States? We have mentioned that. They can go to offices there if they are not close to the Canadian border. If they are close to the Canadian border they can go to UIC offices here in Canada.

Even if you live too far away to work in Canada you may still qualify for Canadian regular unemployment insurance benefits. You must have permission to work in the United States and, in most cases, this requires the possession of a valid work visa. You must be willing to work, be actively looking for work, and must have been paying Canadian U.I. premiums for the required number of weeks during your qualifying period. You would claim through state employment security offices and your claim is sent to the inter-state claims office in Belleville, Ontario. Eligibility rules and the rate of benefit you could receive remain the same as they would be if you were applying in Canada.

But claimants applying from the United States cannot receive benefits for as many weeks as claimants who are applying for regular benefits from within Canada. Qualified claimants in the United States can receive a maximum 38 weeks of benefits. They are not eligible for what are called regionally extended benefits, which allow claimants in Canada to draw benefits for up to 50 weeks.

There are some special rules for Canadian government personnel in the United States. For example, there are special rules for dependents, not only those of Canadian government personnel posted to the United States, but those of military personnel. Dependents include spouses, unmarried children under 21, unmarried full-time students under 25, and unmarried children who are physically or mentally disabled.

Under a 1980 agreement, dependents can look for work and receive a written offer of employment. The U.S. State Department must then approve the offer before the job can be accepted. You do not need a work visa and, as long as you are available and looking for work, you can be eligible for Canadian U.I. benefits. You can apply at an American employment security office; that is your privilege.

Another point deals with maternity benefits and that point is a rather interesting one. Maternity benefits can be paid anywhere in the world. This is a big difference.

During the last 52 weeks a person must have accumulated 20 weeks of employment insurance under Canadian U.I. rules and can then apply for maternity benefits at any state employment security office in the United States.

• (1710)

If someone qualifies and is going abroad she can claim maternity benefits in Canada before leaving or at any Canadian consulate or embassy around the world.

Mr. Speaker, you can see a rather interesting situation occurring here. Suppose a number of couples on CFB Petawawa, CFB Borden, in Halifax, or in Calgary, are posted to Europe. Before they leave, the spouse in house A may find out she is pregnant. So she can make arrangements to collect unemployment insurance for the period after she arrives in Europe.

The next-door neighbour may have four or five children in the family, which is a very expensive operation to run today, and the spouse has to quit her job in Canada, live on one income in Europe, and still raise those children, but she does not qualify for unemployment insurance benefits.

So this situation creates a real dilemma. I do not think it is a very fair way to have been treating the Canadian Armed Forces on this issue over the years. I feel we should be taking a very serious look at this issue again and should be reviewing the legislation accordingly.

We have to understand that jobs are very limited. For example, in Lahr, Germany, there might be a number of jobs at the Canex operation and at all its related facilities. Even teachers who go over find it very difficult to work into the system because, normally, when they get there the positions are already filled for the year and, unless someone becomes sick or must resign for one reason or another, openings do not come up very readily.

We are putting them in a situation where the competitiveness for the few jobs, compared with the large number of personnel and their spouses on the base, results in not a great deal of opportunity for them. It would be very humane for us to take a good look at this issue and let those forces families know that we do appreciate the kind of image they are projecting for Canada because I have always said that our Canadian forces are not only good soldiers, but also professional people, such as nurses, dentists, doctors, engineers, and some very well-trained tradesmen in every occupation. The Canadian Armed Forces are probably one of the biggest training schools we have in Canada, if we look at them in that way.

Not only are they good soldiers because of all this, but they are also good diplomats, because they know how to conduct themselves abroad and they give Canada a good image. They are also good politicians because they have to deal with people of many different nationalities. It is their job to try to bridge the gaps and get along with those people and they do it very well. I have always said that our Canadian forces are good diplomats, soldiers, and politicians combined, all rolled up in one ball of wax.

I am making two strong recommendations today, Mr. Speaker, and I know that your heart is in this issue because you have been very close to the forces personnel over the years, yourself. I recommend that we pay unemployment insurance benefits in a normal way to the spouses when they go into areas where they do not presently qualify. Or suppose they do qualify for unemployment insurance, having the required number of weeks, and all their records intact. Suddenly, the other spouse is posted out of the country and they leave.

Why is it not possible for the government and Parliament—I am sure it would be accepted on both sides of the House very readily—to keep all their unemployment insurance records intact during their absence from the country, be it for a year and a half, two years, or three years?

When they return to Canada their unemployment insurance records will still be intact, in the same way as if they had never left the country. Then they will be able to draw UI benefits when they return to Canada and use those as income until such time as they find a job. I think that is a fair solution if the government does not want to change the approach and pay unemployment insurance benefits overseas under the normal process.

The arguments that might arise against this recommendation might include that, first, we cannot afford to do so. We have to remember that the government has considerably increased the contributions for both unemployment insurance clients and the employers. We also have to remember that, under normal conditions, the Government of Canada would not be paying into that unemployment insurance fund nationally. So the government is a shareholder in the unemployment insurance field.

What about the spouses of business people who go abroad to represent a company, for example? The argument might be made that, if someone is posted to Mexico or Italy on behalf of a Canadian corporation why should their spouse not qualify for the same benefits? Well, perhaps we can look at the same approach, because we are living in a mobile world today.

There is a big movement today on the part of Canadian citizens around the world and we, as Parliament, must continue to update and modernize our legislation to fit those new practices that work their way into the operations of our nation generally, whether public or private.

Of course, we will hear the argument, as we did before the Public Accounts committee when we were studying Public Service 2000 and the foreign service officers came before our committee, as well as others in the Public Service and union groups, stating that they are in the same position. When their spouses go overseas they cannot collect any benefits. So you will hear about all those situations.

Today's motion deals with the Canadian Armed Forces and, because we depend upon the Canadian forces to do excellent work for this country, I think we have a duty to try to make things easier for their family lives. As we know, when people cut down from two incomes to one and go abroad, doing so does not make things easier for them. If they cannot draw unemployment insurance at the same time we are cutting back on their privileges there as well and are not giving them the same opportunity to receive income as people who do not have to fulfil those important duties abroad.

I submit this recommendation to all my colleagues in the House and to the government. I know the hon. member for Burlington has had a very soft spot in his heart for this type of issue, as does the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, who has been a distinguished serviceman himself and knows this subject on a very personal basis.

It has been my privilege to work very closely with virtually thousands of Canadian Armed Forces families. So I would ask that the House give this motion some very serious consideration and I hope that we can also look at the motion in a humanitarian manner to try to use it as a good morale booster for our Canadian forces in showing them that we, as a Parliament, do care about what they are doing, internationally and domestically.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Then I will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan.

• (1720)

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I was talking to the hon. member this afternoon and I told him I had put a similar motion down in this House in 1973. It had a little different thrust to it. My concern was that Canadians were overseas on some of our bases, working for Canadian contractors. Unemployment insurance was being deducted from their wages, but they could not collect it.

My point was, if it cannot be collected, do not deduct it. The matter was talked out by a parliamentary secretary who is now a federal court judge. So I will end the story there.

I rise in connection with the motion of the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke. The sense of the motion is that the government should make changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act so that spouses of Canadian military personnel posted overseas would be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

I recognize the validity of the problem the hon. member is addressing in this motion. The service man or service woman is transferred overseas, let us say to Germany, and the spouse who wants to accompany the serving member is forced to give up a job in Canada. That creates problems.

The dilemma, of course, is faced not only by the serving personnel of the armed forces and their spouses, it is also faced by people who work for External Affairs. It is faced by advisors who go overseas on missions for CIDA. It is faced by Canadians who work with international agencies operated by the United Nations. In the private sector it is faced by employees of an increasing number of Canadian businesses that do business abroad.

This is a problem with which we have become familiar, as increasingly greater numbers of families rely on two incomes. Nevertheless, the method proposed by the hon.

member for solving this problem is not one which the government can responsibly support.

The most basic difficulty is this. An extension of the unemployment insurance to cover these circumstances would render the program incompatible with the fundamental purpose of unemployment insurance. Unemployment insurance is designed to insure workers in Canada who have lost their jobs so that they can look for employment. It is structured and financed on the basis of certain assumptions.

When one works in the Canadian job market, one insures oneself for loss of work in that job market. Employers and workers pay into a fund to grant protection in these circumstances. If a person decides for one reason or another to live and work in another market, in another country, he or she is no longer covered. In that respect, the Canadian system is the same as the system in other countries. That is the way it works in the U.K., the United States, France, Germany and a multitude of other countries that operate unemployment insurance programs.

The second problem has to do with the basic criteria which apply not only to the spouses of service people, but to everyone who participates in the UI system. The fact that an applicant pays premiums and then loses his or her job does not automatically entitle them to unemployment insurance. One must be eligible and have met two basic conditions.

First, it is necessary to show that the applicant is actively and continuously trying to find another job. It is incumbent upon every person claiming benefits to confirm this on a bi-weekly basis.

Second, if a job does come along, one must be in a position to accept it.

Let us examine each of these requirements in the context of the particular situation referred to in the motion.

In the first case, I would argue that the need for an applicant to show that he or she is looking for work is not only reasonable, it is fair. That could be said because it applies, not just to one group, but everyone who participates in the program.

If we are to exercise a responsible degree of control, we need to enforce this basic requirement.

The question that arises is how can someone living in a different country and in a different job market meets this requirement. In the case of Canadian service personnel or his or her spouse posted in the United States, that obstacle can be surmounted.

Since the early 1960s, we have had a reciprocal arrangement with the United States. It allows continued coverage by the UI systems of both countries for the spouses of federal and military personnel serving across their home borders. Control is not a problem in that situation. American UI authorities have agreed to verify that Canadians in their system are in fact looking for work and that work is available. Once that is confirmed, the cheque is issued here in Canada.

Similarly, our Canadian employment centres perform roughly the same function for American workers on this side of the border. The system benefits both countries because there is a substantial exchange of human resources in both directions. It works well because we are neighbouring countries with similar labour markets and we are willing to make arrangements that are easy to administer.

Unfortunately these conditions do not apply to other countries in which Canada has military personnel. We have no such reciprocal arrangements with them. How could the spouse of a service man or service woman posted to Germany or Cyprus fulfil the requirement that he or she is looking for work? The machinery for verification just does not exist.

Let me now turn to that second requirement, namely that the applicant for UI is in fact a valid candidate for employment; that he or she can accept work. How do you meet that requirement? The answer is simple; you don't and you can't. In most cases, the wives and husbands of military personnel are not eligible to work in the host economy. They may be eligible to work on Canadian military establishments overseas, but eligibility to work for a foreign employer is limited. Exceptions can be made, work permits may be offered, but it is not automatic and it requires special authorization. It is granted only for selected occupations.

It may be said that we are mostly talking about work on Canadian bases overseas. Let us be realistic, not many opportunities exist in that area. A large proportion of the civilian jobs on Canadian military establishments overseas are held by nationals of host countries.

Another basic difficulty also arises. The motion says:

> —the government should take the necessary measures in order that working spouses accompanying military personnel posted outside Canada may be eligible unemployment insurance benefits.

I do not know precisely what measures the member has in mind. Presumably he is suggesting that we alter the rules so that employment abroad becomes insurable. We know what difficulties we would face on that measure. His other option is to extend the qualifying period.

My time is getting on here. He has 20 minutes and I only have 10. But I want to say there must be reciprocity in any arrangements we make. As far as I know, not a single one of the countries in which we have a military presence, pays UI benefits or anything like them to its own citizens while they are in Canada. An arrangement of this kind would have to be reciprocal and it could not and should not be done on a unilateral basis by Canada.

Let me say this to the hon. member if I could just get his attention for a moment. I think something can be done. I am not sure what it is, but we have to work within the act as it is and I am sure he understands that. There may be some way that we can put something in play within the regulations and, in fact, there is a book UI and You Outside of Canada.

We should look at the whole area and see if there is some way we can come to some arrangement on this. We may have to change some of the regulations in the act, but it is going to take some time.

• (1730)

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have some sympathy for the parliamentary secretary who had to respond to this. It is obvious from the way he spoke that he has a great deal of sympathy for the motion. The fact that he introduced a similar motion some years ago and suggested that maybe there was some way of changing it so that it could be accommodated within the legislation shows that he wants to do something. Yet he was given a script that tells him it is impossible and undesirable and should not be done even if it could be done.

As I listened to the mover of the motion, I could not help but think that perhaps his alternative was a better way of going. The parliamentary secretary talked about the problems of dealing with foreign countries, but the alternative proposed by the member suggested that the spouse who was moving, not because he or she wanted to go, but simply because he or she was following a spouse. It was not their choice.

That is the case certainly with the military services, especially during peacetime. They do not have a choice. They go where they are sent. The same thing would apply to employees or the spouses of employees of external affairs and perhaps even Crown corporations and organizations like that where the individuals concerned are not serving their own personal interests, are not serving the interests of a corporation, a private corporation, or a corporation held in the private sector, but rather they are serving Canadians. They are serving all of us.

For that reason, I think the mover of the motion and the parliamentary secretary feel that Canada should be able to do something. The fact that other countries do not have reciprocal agreements is not reason enough for us not to want to have them.

The mover of the motion suggested, as an alternative, that the spouse who is losing the credits that he or she has accumulated be allowed to carry those forward and when that person returns to Canada, it would be as though they had never left as far as UI is concerned. The time that they had worked would be to their credit. They would be able to draw on whatever credits they had built up and would be able to take advantage of unemployment insurance benefits if they had put in enough time. In that way, they would have something to carry them forward while they were looking for work. I believe it was the mover who said that it is not always easy to find work and certainly that is the case at the present time in Canada.

If a person could carry forward credits, when he or she returned to Canada it would be possible to start from that point in time as though he or she never left Canada. By carrying forward the credits, if work was found right away, so much the better for that person and for the UI fund. If work was not found, it would be something to carry the applicant on while he or she was looking for work. If that person's circumstances had changed to the extent that he or she did not want to look for work, then he or she would not benefit any more than anyone else would.

It seems to me it would, on Canada's part, be playing fair with people who are leaving the country for quite an extended length of time serving Canadians, not serving their own interests or serving the interests of a private corporation.

I would support this motion and urge the parliamentary secretary to carry back to his government the possibility of accommodating the goal of the mover of this motion by using his alternative rather than paying UI benefits abroad.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, just for the sake of the people back home listening, the motion reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take the necessary measures in order that working spouses accompanying military personnel posted outside Canada may be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

I guess most of us know what that means. It simply means extending benefits to those outside of Canada. With the exception of the United States, we do not recognize benefits outside of this country. In the case of the United States we do for a number of reasons, some of which the parliamentary secretary touched on. The reason that we do recognize that particular situation in the United States is because of a reciprocal agreement between Canada and the United States. The reason for that reciprocal agreement is simply this: There are some similarities between our labour force in Canada and that of the United States; there are similarities in labour laws, there are similarities in many of the other social programs that the Americans have and we have. The close geographical proximity of the two countries makes it a more manageable and a more workable system so that when individuals do receive their lay-off notices, being a Canadian citizen living in the United States, they are eligible.

In relation to our soldiers, our Armed Forces personnel overseas, certainly at no other time in the history of this country since the second world war does the sensitivity of this issue makes us reflect on the current situation. We know the role our Armed Forces have played in recent weeks and we want to ensure that they are given every opportunity, as other Canadians, to enjoy the benefits that we enjoy at home.

Let us go through just some of what the member who proposed this motion mentioned, and attempt to put a little logic into it. We do not disagree with what he is attempting to do. Perhaps, as the parliamentary secretary mentioned, at some point in the future we can accommodate this motion, and we can improve the situation we presently have. But the member mentioned, when putting forward the motion, and I quote him: "Jobs are very scarce in areas like Lahr, Germany, for example, where we do have a number of Canadian troops". That is an argument that none of us can dismiss, because jobs are very scarce for the spouses of military personnel in areas in Germany and other parts of the world. That is a reality we cannot dismiss.

But, in saying that, would a change in the Unemployment Insurance Act rectify a shortage of jobs in a foreign country? I suggest that it would not.

Although the emotion of the particular question is very acceptable, it does not change the circumstance. How we can accommodate that situation on foreign soil is beyond me. Many of the military personnel who are sent to other parts of the world go for three or four year periods, and that certainly goes beyond the qualifying period of unemployment insurance in this country.

If a solution in the short term is found, it does not completely eliminate the problem. Unemployment insurance only lasts for so long and after that the individuals are still in that foreign country in a labour market that is foreign to them.

Just to pose another element into the question, many Canadians who are serving in areas overseas are not eligible to work in those respective communities anyway, because of particular labour practices, questions of legitimacy of some of the workers in relation to their unions, for example, and the licensing of some of the individuals who would like to work in those communities in those foreign countries but for particular reasons cannot.

This motion does not recognize that under certain conditions the Unemployment Insurance Act does take care of Canadians serving abroad, and spouses of Canadians serving abroad. For example, there is no restrictions on the maternity leave element of the Unemployment Insurance Act. People who are serving overseas can plug into that particular aspect of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Maternity leave is very much a part and parcel of our present legislation, so we do not have to improve that side of the question. In relation to that, the adoption elements whereby parents who are adopting a child are given special consideration under the unemployment insurance act also apply to individuals and spouses of individuals serving overseas.

• (1740)

Those special benefits under the UI Act are there and have been there, but can we improve what we presently have, as the parliamentary secretary mentioned? I think we can. If you take a look at Europe and the European Economic Community, the closeness of that community and what they are doing, I think we have to take our hats off to them and say they have done a great deal in terms of labour strategy, industrial strategy and trading arrangements between those countries in Europe, but they have not come to grips with the situation which we are addressing here.

Despite some of the progress that countries in Europe have made, they have not overcome all of the hurdles that we are experiencing here today. In time they will. As the global community in a sense gets smaller, our policies sort of parallel each other and we come closer in our methods of doing business and paralleling particular laws and regulations in respective countries, I have to assume that part of that tells me that in fact we are going to make some progress.

The question that is before us is certainly a legitimate question and is one that is near and dear to all of us. Again, going back to my opening statements, if we frame this within the present context of what our military people have done for us in recent weeks, there is no question that improvements can be made, but we have to be very careful as to how we make them.

We cannot isolate one particular problem without addressing another. The arrangements we have made with the United States of America in relation to this perhaps in future years will happen between us and some of the Europeans countries.

The cost of the UI program is borne by all Canadians who are presently working. That is something we have to remember. Every worker in Canada is contributing. Every employer is contributing heavily to this plan. I think it is incumbent upon us to make sure that those dollars are spent well and spent wisely and that they are monitored properly. Presently we do not have a system to monitor a program such as that if it is extended into countries where we do not have the closeness and harmony as we do with our neighbours to the south at this time. A lot of it has to do with sheer geography.

I am convinced that as communications continue to improve, as does our ability to dialogue with countries across the world, we will in the very near future accommodate the question in the motion put forward by the hon. member.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by reading the motion so that we can start from the beginning of this very interesting and, I think, timely subject. The hon. member of Parliament for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke has proposed:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take the necessary measures in order that working spouses accompanying military personnel posted outside Canada may be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

To me this is a special motion for special people and I want to tell you why I say that.

I said earlier it was timely. If the members present in the House could remember as we stood here and sat here and debated the United Nations motion toward the end of November just before Christmas, I do not think there was any doubts in the minds of anybody here that the men and women who were serving in the gulf at the time and who would be serving over Christmas and beyond were very special people. They were very special people because they were representing our national interest, despite any political differences we may have had about sanctions or whatever. They were representing the interest of their country at a time when all families were together putting their lives, if necessary, on the line in the national interest of this country.

There is nothing more special in the world then that. But there is another special part of the Canadian Forces that, in my mind, relates to the time. If you count the rotations and consider the changes of ships' companies, I am sure we had well over 4,000 Canadians serving in the Persian Gulf if you totalled it all up. They were men and women of different ranks, different services and from every province in Canada working together for one simple Canadian cause, the national interest. They represent a microcosm of Canada and also represent an example that we could all follow in what they are doing, in what they have done and what they will continue to do in the future as long as they wear the uniform of their country.

If somebody would deny this particular motion on the basis that if we do it for one we have to do it for all, I would ask them to remember Christmas of 1990 when they were with their families and the men and women of the Canadian Forces were serving their country away from their families.

The second aspect of this that I think we should consider is that the members of the Armed Forces have already been short-changed by the unemployment insurance business. I do not remember the exact date and I regret I did not have time to check the records, but it was, I believe, in the mid-1980s, about 1985 when those members of the Armed Forces who, having paid into the unemployment insurance fund, at the end of their career in the Canadian Forces, were they not able to find employment, could not draw unemployment insurance. They were able to, previous to this change in regulations, draw unemployment insurance, which was a pretty sensible thing because they spent a lifetime paying into it.

This change removed the opportunity or removed this benefit from those members of the Armed Forces who had paid in as well as the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I recall vividly the disappointment that this had sent through the members of the forces, not only the disappointment, but the disbelief that their government would do this to them. I may say that there are veterans' organizations, including the Canadian Armed Forces Pensioners' Associations and two or three others, which are still trying to get more fairness out of the system by having this aspect of the Unemployment Insurance Act repealed. In fact, it was not a change in the act but a change in the interpretation. I know how tenacious they are and I know that they will continue to do it.

There were two things I heard here that concerned me. The hon. member for Burlington, and I know where his heart is on this particular issue, talked about people who decided to leave the country. I am sure that he would recall that those members of the Armed Forces whose spouses leave with them do not decide to leave the country. They do not have any options.

You may say: "Well, why should a spouse of any organization be entitled because of this particular move?" I think it is an acceptable thing today that people in all professions rely on two salaries. When you move to another country and cannot draw that salary, I do not think there is any question that despite any allowances, which seldom makes a difference in the income that people make as a family, that second income is going to be sorely missed.

This, of course, will have an impact on the morale of the people and how well they serve their country. Not that they would serve any less, but in my mind it creates another disappointment. It is the kind of disappointment that I think we can address.

The second objection I heard to this was put forward by the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte. He suggested that even if you did draw your unemployment insurance for one year, and if you were on a posting for two or three years, then you would run out in two or three years. I am sure he did not expect us to buy that logic. It was a good try, but we are not asking for anything that other Canadians do not get. We are just asking for the consideration of what the Unemployment Insurance Act does for people in Canada, and if a spouse has to move, to be considered essentially as if that move was forced and caused the loss of a job.

Another argument I heard was that it would be difficult to change the Unemployment Insurance Act. Well, we have short memories if we talk about the difficulty in changing the Unemployment Insurance Act. I recall sitting in this House when massive changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, called Bill C-21, were was brought forward. It did not bother the government to change the Unemployment Insurance Act for the things that it wanted, so I say that of the arguments put forward, this was the third very obviously fallacious argument.

It remains a fact of life. In fact, we will be talking about this very shortly when we talk about the changes in the Standing Orders of this House. The privilege of being in government is that basically, within reason, you can do what you set your mind to do. You get flak from the opposition and that is what the opposition is for, to keep the government honest.

The argument that you cannot change the Unemployment Insurance Act because it is going to be too difficult or it is going to cause impediments or this, that or the other thing, I do not accept. I think when government decides it wants to do something for any group of people or for organizations or for businesses, then that is what government does. That is why we are in the House of Commons, to debate the things the government wants to do. It is not the opposition that puts forward bills, it is the government that does this. So if we are dealing with principles, and if we are dealing with the logic that these are special considerations for special kinds of people at a special time, then I think the rest of the detail can follow without any difficulty whatsoever.

If one can accept that there should be changes, and if the changes cannot be as traumatic as is put forward by members of the government to actually treat a spouse as if that spouse had lost his or her job, then at least the consideration should be, as an option, that those who qualify for unemployment insurance when they were leaving, by having enough weeks to qualify, would be allowed to keep this status intact while they were out of the country. When they return to Canada, their UI status would continue again as if there had been no interruption.

I think this is fairly simple to achieve. I think the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke mentioned this as an option as he put forward his motion. I think as a minimum that the government should be able to do this.

There were other arguments put forward by members of the government, but I think I covered the major ones. By way of conclusion, I would just say one more time that this is a special consideration for special kinds of people at a special time, and I think because of that, it deserves very special consideration.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization): Mr. Speaker, I realize there are only a few minutes left in the debate, so I will just try to make two or three points.

I would like to compliment the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke for bringing forth the motion. I totally respect the good intentions that moved him to bring forward the motion. However, I do feel there are some very serious problems implied or underlying it that make it impossible, really, for this House to support it.

I have to assume that he was unaware of these when he put the motion forward. Otherwise, one might reasonably question his intent, and I certainly would not do that.

Such a motion if indeed implemented in law would quite frankly violate the Canadian Charter of Rights. It is my understanding of the Canadian Charter that all Canadians have a right to be treated equally before the law.

If there is a Canadian serving abroad in the Armed Forces to whom we are prepared to give benefits that we are not prepared to give Canadians serving abroad in other contexts, be they for the Government of Canada, with CIDA, with the trade missions or whatever or just serving abroad with commercial enterprises, then it seems to me we would definitely subject ourselves to a Charter challenge. It would not likely succeed.

It is important to point out that the disadvantage that accrues to the spouses of the Canadian Armed Forces when they are posted abroad and inevitably lose their employment at home is not a circumstance in which they are singled out.

This is something that happens to anybody if he or she is in a situation where their spouse is transferred abroad and wants to accompany that spouse. That is part of the process. Increasingly in this society, we have married couples in which both are working.

We have to recognize that the unemployment insurance program in Canada is intended to serve the needs of Canadians within the Canadian context and to respond to the labour market in Canada.

Unemployment insurance, by the way, is paid for in Canada by Canadian companies or Canadian companies working abroad. It is the people employed by these Canadian companies, the Canadian government or whatever and their employers who pay the premiums for unemployment insurance.

The idea of unemployment insurance is to protect them in the event of unanticipated job loss or discontinuity in their employment. It is in response to a Canadian circumstance that we have unemployment insurance. If Canadians go abroad, obviously they are taking themselves out of the Canadian marketplace and can hardly reasonably expect themselves to be treated as though they are within the Canadian marketplace.

I believe one of my colleagues has already made the point that we have a reciprocal agreement with the United States which allows Canadians to participate in the unemployment insurance program if they are in either a border situation or, indeed, if they are in the United States.

For example, if a Canadian was posted to the Canadian embassy in Washington, he or she could conceivably continue to draw Canadian unemployment insurance while at the same time checking in through the employment office in the United States. There is a reciprocal arrangement. Of course, he or she would have to be eligible for employment in the United States by having a green card or landed immigrant status, just as the reverse would apply as well.

I think it is instructive to note one improvement that has been made by this government and was made in Bill C-21, which I thought I heard the hon. member for Bona Vista—Trinity—Conception disparaging only a few minutes ago, was the provision that defined just cause to include a person who was forced to leave his or her employment because their spouse had been transferred.

Indeed, the issue is far more complicated than it might initially seem. I think it is important to note that Canadians who are abroad are not necessarily disqualified. Employment and Immigration Canada puts out a very instructive little pamphlet explaining unemployment insurance benefits for which Canadians employed abroad with Canadian companies are eligible such as, for example, maternity benefits or adoption benefits and so on.

I see the clock is winding down, Mr. Speaker, and I want to summarize. I want to compliment the intent of the hon. member but, quite frankly on reflection, he and other members of the House will realize that it is simply not possible to implement the precise change that he proposes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 19027) and amendment of Mr. Dingwall (p. 19156.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When debate ended, the hon. member for South Shore had spoken for 10 minutes. He has 10 minutes remaining in this debate.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization): Mr. Speaker, when the clock ran out on me, I was making the point that one of the biggest challenges we all face is as parliamentarians and as politicians. "Parliamentarian" sounds like a much nicer word than "politicians".

• (1800)

The point I was making is that the public has lost its respect for politicians. There is nothing more ironic in this fact than the fact that, if we all reflect on how we got here, we got here because people chose us to come. We are reflective of our constituents. They chose us not because they thought we were dishonest, sleazy, crooked or out to rip off the public purse. They chose us because they thought we were outstanding members of the community. They thought we were committed Canadians. They thought we were committed to serving our fellow citizens. They thought we were intelligent. They thought we could exercise good judgment. They thought we could participate as active, constructive members of a particular political team whose banner we represented in the election campaign.

It always amazes me that they chose us for all the right reasons and then it seems instantly we are transformed following election into people who are beneath public contempt. I cannot help but think, as I was mentioning earlier, that a big part of the reason for this is the manner in which this place often conducts itself.

That is why I support the proposed rule changes. I believe the intent of the rule changes is to make the time available to us in Parliament function more effectively so that as individual members we have an opportunity to stand and articulate the concerns of the people who sent us here to participate in important debates involving great issues of the day in our country. That is what we are here to do.

When we are not here doing that, I contend that where we should be is in our constituencies so that the people who elected us have an opportunity to have access to us on a continuing basis. They can see us. They can talk to us. They can have us meet with them in their places of business, in their homes or wherever, in order that we may have a better opportunity to understand their problems, to understand their views and indeed to bring them forth here and articulate them in this Chamber, in our caucuses, in committees or wherever.

One of the problems we have in the current system is what Canadians frequently see of what goes on in our jobs as members of Parliament. They see what goes on in this Chamber. They see Question Period, which seems sometimes to be less than a high level of intellectual debate. They see an opportunity for the same question to be asked five, six, seven or eight times in a row, even though it has already been answered.

They ask: "What is the point of all that?" They do not understand the amount of time that members of Parliament spend, for example, in their offices responding to correspondence and responding to telephone calls. Then there is the role we play in committees. These rule changes also propose some changes in the functioning of House committees.

I have been very distressed since I came here. Like a lot of new members, I did not know an awful lot about the committees and how they operated. I discovered we had standing committees and we had legislative committees. What I have found in practice is there seems to be an attempt to use committees not as a means to investigate problems or to do in-depth research, but indeed to continue the partisan game back and forth.

I have seen legislative committees frequently turn into national touring shows for the hearing of witnesses and so on. Clearly the intent of a legislative committee is to look simply at legislation in the context of the principle that it has already been approved by the House of Commons. The legislative committee has a technical function.

It is the task of standing committees, if they are working effectively, to identify key questions, concerns, problems, issues, or whatever within the context of the committees' mandates; to investigate thoroughly and comprehensively; to come up with recommendations that perhaps challenge government; to put forth constructive ideas; or to add to the volume of knowledge that may or may not exist with respect to serious problems in our country.

I think the rule changes will contribute to making Parliament a more effectively place.

One issue we often hear discussed is the subject of free votes. We hear demands that we should have more free votes in Parliament. Perhaps that is a good idea. I am not sure exactly how a parliamentary system of government would work if members of Parliament had the complete freedom to vote how they wished on every issue. Perhaps there is a circumstance in which it is possible for us to have far fewer questions of confidence and to have more members of Parliament who are members of the government, that is to say cabinet ministers or parliamentary secretaries, vote as they feel appropriate on issues.

I reflect on the very limited number of free votes we have had in this Parliament since I have had the privilege to be here. I note that we have seen a free vote on the government side, on the part of government backbenchers, but we have not seen it from the other side. We have seen pretty solid blocks on the other side. Obviously a free vote system would not work because it simply becomes a guaranteed means for the defeat of legislation.

I am troubled when I hear the comments of people who are not in this place. I am listening to the recent declarations of the Reform Party that is emerging in the west with simplistic values that seem to be popular with the public which do not delve a little bit deeper to see what is the implication of what is being proposed.

One that I find very extraordinary but very popular at the moment is: "Let's cut everything 10 per cent across the board in all government programs". That is what we are hearing from the Reform Party. Yet if we delve a little deeper, we find what that means. It means a 10 per cent cut in veterans' pensions. It means a 10 per cent cut in old age assistance and family allowance. It means a 10 per cent cut in EPF payments, transfers to the provinces.

We heard an incredible howl—and we are still hearing it—about the fact that the government has frozen the growth of transfer payments to provinces at 3.7 per cent. Can we imagine what the impact would be if instead of freezing the growth by 3.7 per cent we actually effected a cut of 10 per cent? I wonder if Mr. Manning and his Reform colleagues would be prepared to go around as part of their party platform and indicate exactly which universities would be closed, which hospitals would be closed, which schools would be closed, and so on and so forth.

Similarly with these issues with respect to how Parliament functions, I think we have to probe a little deeper. I think we need to have a little more respect for the people on the other side of that camera that is focused on me right now. I know there are a lot of people out there right now in my South Shore constituency, watching and judging their member of Parliament as to whether he is acting and speaking responsibly or whether he is acting in some other fashion.

We have to be mindful that what we do in this place is observed by our constituents from coast to coast, particularly our seniors. Since I have become a member I have discovered that many of our senior citizens watch the debates of the House of Commons. It is appropriate that they should, but what we should show them is a responsible group of legislators and parliamentarians not bringing forth a succession of dilatory motions, but increasing trying to use our time constructively and effectively to do the work of Canada and the business of Canada.

In conclusion, the purpose of this debate today and the purpose of these rules is to assist not only in making this place work more effectively, but in helping us win back the respect and confidence of the people of Canada who sent us here.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to join in the debate on the proposal brought forward by the government House leader to change our Standing Orders.

It is with interest that I heard the remarks by the hon. member from South Shore. I paid particular attention to his comments. In part I heard his frustrations as a member sitting in the back benches of government with how the House of Commons works. I heard his concern that to the Canadian public we look like a bunch of fools, particularly during Question Period, and his concern that this institution does not function in an efficient and effective manner. I feel certain from his comments that he genuinely believed these changes would correct all that he perceives to be wrong with the House of Commons.

I sympathize in many ways. When I first was elected to the House of Commons I certainly had a certain sense of idealism. I wanted to make a contribution, to help govern this country. I wanted to have some input not just in terms of speaking on the floor of the House of Commons, but also in the work of the committees to try to create better legislation. It was not from the point of view of trying to create political points for myself or my party, but a genuine desire to help and participate with my fellow Canadians who have been given this tremendous distinction and responsibility to represent their fellow citizens in this the House of Commons of Canada.

Over the 12 years I have been here I must say that I have grown disillusioned and at times even cynical. Certainly what the government is proposing with its changes to the Standing Orders just increases my sense of cynicism about how this place really functions.

I was one of those who had some sense of optimism after the report of a former member, Mr. McGrath. The major essence of that report was an attempt to allow members of Parliament irrespective of their political affiliations to play a more important role in helping to shape legislation. It proposed a more powerful committee system, a committee system that was more independent from the wishes of the government, a committee system that in fact could at times be used as a check on the government, a committee system that would allow its members, whether they were members of the opposition or government members, a more independent role.

Of course, what we have in front of us today are proposals that in fact go in the opposite direction, that would greatly restrict our committee system, that would give the government much greater control over the committee system, and that in many ways in fact even begins to choke off the important work committees can do.

We have seen how this government has dealt with committees in a most disdainful manner. When committees dare to oppose the government, even if they are controlled by government members and have a chairman appointed by the government—and there have been some examples where a committee in its investigation and its deliberation has come to the conclusion that the government is doing the wrong thing and has reported as such—this government has come down on them with a vengeance. Committee chairmen have been fired from their jobs. Committees have been shut down so they do not meet any more.

Part of the problem we are finding, to which the former speaker had alluded, comes from the fact that this government and this Prime Minister have a very thin skin. They cannot tolerate criticism. They cannot tolerate opposition. They will use whatever force is necessary to push through their legislative agenda.

The recommended changes that we have in front of us today are just an extension of the government's belief that it is here to push through its legislation. It is an extension of the government's belief that the opposition in this House of Commons has no legitimate role to play and that individual members of Parliament have no legitimate role to play.

The rules that are being introduced today limit the role of the committees and severely restrict the opportunity of individual members of Parliament to make some meaningful contribution to shaping policy. It is an executive government operated by a few public servants and a few select in cabinet. It does not want to see opposition. It can hardly tolerate the House of Commons. That is why it wants to restrict the number of days we will sit. Its only objective is to push through its agenda.

I was hoping when I was first elected in 1979 that a new age of politics could begin to be developed in the 1980s. In fact, what we have seen in the eighties, particularly under the rule of the Conservative government, is certainly not new age politics. It is reactionary politics. It is politics of a few determined to impose their will upon all representatives of the people gathered here in the House of Commons.

Let me get to a few specifics. Of the 64 amendments being proposed to the Standing Orders, there are some that are just window dressing. Others, however, are really important.

For example, the government is proposing that unanimous consent no longer requires what it states, that every member of this House being equal has to consent to changes in the orders of the day or whatever the government is proposing. There are certain parts of parliamentary procedure that require unanimous consent, meaning again that every member can say no, to ensure that the majority does not have its way, that this House operates according to certain procedures, and that any deviation from those procedures requires unanimous consent.

The government is proposing that we really do not need unanimous consent any more. It is proposing that unanimous consent means 25 or less members standing in their place objecting. That of course is a direct blow not only to the major opposition party or to the second opposition party, my party, the New Democratic Party. It is also a particularly severe blow to smaller groups: the Bloc Quebecois, the Independents and the Reform Party member.

The government is wanting to change the rules to protect itself against small—perhaps to the government they are irksome—splinter groups in the House. Democracy does not work that way. These people were also elected. They also represent their constituents. They should also have the same power and the same rights as any other individual member of this Parliament.

It is not a Parliament just of government members and members of the major parties. It is a Parliament of individual members of Parliament. We were elected not as Conservatives. I was elected as a New Democrat. My friend was elected as a Conservative. Our names are on the ballots. People vote for the person, not for the party. Otherwise, all we would have on the ballot is just the party name. Our names are foremost on the ballot. People vote for individuals and as individuals we occupy our seats in this House of Commons and, as such, we should all have equal status and equal rights. Of course the changes being proposed today would wipe out that basic concept.

There are also some other changes. The government reduces the number of committees and, to make certain that none of these "uppity" committees go too far astray, it is going to control how the committees meet. We have some 28 committees under the five major envelopes. There will only be some 10 committee rooms in which these 28 committees can meet. The government is restricting how the committees can meet by restricting the number of committee rooms they can meet in. How silly, how terribly silly.

Guess who will decide who is able to use the committee rooms? Some super committee that the government is proposing will determine what committee will be able to meet. How outlandish, how totally outlandish. What an idiotic way of trying to thwart the rightful work of committees of this House of Commons.

Then we come across another little change buried among the 64 subamendments. The government now decrees that the only people who can testify before the committee will have to be "technical witnesses". First of all, who determines who is going to be a technical witness. Of course, the government members will.

What does that mean in practical terms? It means that, for example, when we were considering the GST legislation, only tax experts and tax lawyers would have been allowed to appear before us. Senior citizens could not because they would not be considered technical witnesses. Farm people could not. Consumer association people could not. Working people could not because they would not be considered technical people.

What is the meaning of this change to the Standing Order? Might I suggest the change is to prevent ordinary Canadians from having any input into legislation. The government gets embarrassed when senior citizens storm up the Hill protesting the deindexation of their pensions. The Prime Minister gets personally very annoyed when some senior citizen wags her finger in his face and tells him: "No more, Charlie Brown". He does not want any of this. He does not want the riff-raff of the Canadian public to be up on the Hill, to be appearing before these committees considering legislation. No, he just wants to keep it clean. Only technical witnesses are going to be allowed.

For example, when we are considering plant breeders' rights, only geneticists will be able to testify, not farmers, not people who are concerned about the morality of this issue, like people from the churches, people concerned about the environment, no, because they are not considered technical witnesses.

I hear the gentleman from Ontario saying "I am out to lunch." When I was on the finance committee, he came before us with all those petitions that, when he was a columnist for one of the Toronto papers, he had garnered. He came in full flurry before the committee. What a change we see today. But under the change that is being proposed in these Standing Orders he would not have been able to appear before our committee because he was not a technical witness.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): That is not exactly right.

Mr. de Jong: It is absolutely right, my friend. It is absolutely right. Go back and have a look at the Standing Orders and see how they would have affected your performance back then when we were discussing tax reform. You would not have been allowed to appear before us because you were not considered a technical witness. A journalist is not a technical witness when it comes to tax reform. What are your credentials? Are you a tax lawyer or a tax accountant? Of course he is not, so therefore, he would not have qualified to have appeared before our committee, let alone introduce all of those petitions, the people's voice as represented in those petitions and those little pieces of clippings that people had cut out of his column and sent in. That would not have been allowed.

But that was the people's voice. That was the concern of the public about some of the tax changes introduced and they, of course, had a right to be heard.

I understand that the government is concerned about the Reform Party. I have been reading some columns in some of the daily press suggesting how the government is trying to co-opt reform.

I am not certain that this is reform or not. I am somewhat disappointed at the member of the Reform Party not opposing more vigorously these changes and realizing the implications of these changes. Certainly in my part of Saskatchewan we want to see parliamentary reform.

My constituents want me to become more independent as a member of Parliament. They want to see all members of Parliament become more independent. They want a greater democracy. They want to be able to have some input into their legislation. They want to be able to have a government that is sensitive to their needs. After all, this is in a democracy isn't it?

They are outraged when they see a government just blindly, in a pig-headed fashion, moving ahead despite the fact that the vast majority of the public might be opposed to things like the GST, the goods and services tax.

They are outraged when they see a government so pig-headed in its determination to drive through its legislative program that it totally ignores public opinion. That is the cause of the anger of the public. That is why the public thinks that Parliament in Ottawa is no longer an institution that can meet their needs. They are absolutely right.

Democracy has suffered in the decade of the eighties. The responsiveness of this government to public opinion has gone to zero.

Government members want to spend more time going back home to the constituents. I do not quite understand why. When they get back home and really meet their constituents, they are almost tarred and feathered. They say they have to be more responsive and therefore we need more time to spend with our constituents. I have no problem with that at all. I think it is a tremendous idea.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): It is time to listen.

Mr. de Jong: I hear Conservative members say: "It is time to listen." I wish these government members would listen. I do not know what they would do when they go home. If they really would have listened, we would not have the GST or the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. We would not have had the shut-down of VIA Rail and the plundering of the CBC or the destruction of the national institutions in this country.

The government does not listen. I suspect government members feel that if they spend a bit more time at home, they might somehow or other be able to convince their constituents of the rightness of what the government is doing. I doubt that very much.

We have seen a government determined to push through its legislative agenda. We look at the figures, for example, on the question of closure, which is the instrument that the government uses to shut down debates when it feels that debate has lasted long enough in the House of Commons.

We begin to realize that between 1913 and 1988, the time of the last election, closure was used 21 times. Since 1988, which is not quite three years, this government has used closure 13 times.

For Parliament to work and for this institution to regain the respect of the Canadian people, we need parliamentary reform that would allow individual members of Parliament to have a greater say and a greater input.

We need freedom from our Whips and the political tags. In essence, we are no longer living in an age of ideology. It is practicality, that new measures work. Are they practical? How do they affect people? Very often, public servants do not realize the effects of the legislation. It is through public input and communication that we begin to discover the effects.

Madam Speaker, you have indicated to me that my time has expired. Let me say in closing that we need genuine parliamentary reform. Unfortunately, what is being proposed to us today does the very opposite. In fact, it does not reform Parliament, it restricts Parliament even more. I am afraid that the passage of these changes to the standing orders will be known historically as a black day for Parliament.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I rise to discuss a subject that is very near and dear to the hearts of all parliamentarians.

I use the word "parliamentarians" advisedly as opposed to the vernacular of "politician". A politician may not necessarily be a parliamentarian, but a parliamentarian should be a politician by definition. Those of us who are speaking on this subject this evening, in days past, later on into the evening and tomorrow morning will be concerned about a number of things but I suppose the thing that would concern them all is the thing that concerns me the most. That is why I am here in this House.

I have heard it said many times by many members and many Prime Ministers, this is the highest court in the land. Madam Speaker, I know you share with me and with all other members the tremendous elation and feeling that you have been sent by, in my case, over 100,000 people to represent them in the highest court in the land. One derives a great sense of duty and responsibility from that feeling. It is a feeling of pride. It is a feeling of elation. It is a feeling of responsibility. It is a feeling of, I would not say fear, but the burden of that responsibility to make sure that you are representing your constituents in the best manner. I have yet to see one of my colleagues, from either party, not representing their constituents to what they consider to be the best of their ability.

I find it somewhat bothersome that the image of a politician as opposed to a parliamentarian has been undoubtedly, if we are to believe the media and if we are to believe our constituents, somewhat tarnished in the last year or two. Probably it has been going on since politics began. I find it disconcerting because we try to do our best but somehow the best either is not enough or the message does not get out that what we are doing is for the betterment of the country.

When I stop to reflect on it, I can understand the sense of frustration with the people who are running the country because the country is not in good shape right now. It is in very poor shape. I am one of 295 people who is responsible for that, and I have to take my share of responsibility. I happen not to be in government. If I were in government, I am sure I would feel the same sense of frustration. It is a feeling that our people, the constituents, have out there of why have you allowed the country to get into this kind of mess. The prime problem is the unity problem. It is the biggest problem that any country in the world could have. The next problem after that is peoples' needs. Do they have enough money? Do they have enough health care? Are they getting enough education and can they educate their children enough so that they can make it a better world to live in?

Those are the two basic problems I think our country is facing. At Christmas time we were faced with an international crisis and now we are faced with debating the rules that allow us to handle these problems, and the rules that hopefully will allow us as parliamentarians to cope with the problems in our country in a much more effective manner, a manner that gives credibility to those people who are out there watching us, who are watching me tonight, watching you, Madam Speaker, who watched our previous speaker and will watch the next speaker.

I am sure the question they ask themselves is whether or not we are sincere. Are we trying hard enough? Do we know what we are doing? If the answer to all these questions is yes, then why can we not do a better job?

I think how we work here, the rules that we follow should be related to how we do our work, how we do our jobs. What I want to do in the next 15 minutes is to create a highlight type of presentation to just run through my reasons for being here, what I think this House does, what Parliament does, why we need the rules and what they are supposed to do, and then maybe summarize some of the major rule changes that concern me, and some that I am pleased with.

Let me just begin by saying that in my mind, no matter how you look at it, it does not matter what the terms of references say or what the specifications say, the purpose of any Parliament is to run a country. It is to levy taxes, it is pass laws, but it is to run a country. To run the country you have to pass laws. In order to pass laws, you have to have some kind of rules. Otherwise you never have laws. Or if you do have laws, they may not be the right kind.

Parliament has an obligation to its people. We as elected members, as parliamentarians, have an obligation to ensure that no legal requirements are imposed on Canadians, except that Parliament itself has approved or authorized the executive to enact.

While we want the executive to enact these laws, and we delegate to the executive the authority to make these laws, it is still Parliament's duty to hold the executive accountable for the exercise of that awesome authority. That is the whole purpose of the rules, to hold the executive, to hold the government accountable for what it is it does.

The rules that have allowed us to go about our work began when this Parliament first sat as a country in 1867. Those rules in turn were derived from the rules of the legislative assemblies of Upper and Lower Canada which was the Canada before Confederation in 1867.

For the next 100 years, not a great deal of change took place. In the 1940s and the 1950s there was concern about parliamentary reform. My history books tell me that we had some procedural committees formed. It was not until 1955 that any change of note at all took place. That change, as I understand it, gave a fixed period of days for Parliament to sit and I am sure to the relief of many in the House and outside the House it limited the length of speeches that parliamentarians could make.

The next change that took place, if we look at it as a quantum change, was in the mid-1950s. There was a crisis when the government of the day was unable to get supply approved by Parliament and it had to resort to a Governor General's warrant. Like many crises, this caused a special committee to be struck on procedures and organization and resulted in 1968 in some important reforms. Many of these reforms are with us today. It resulted in for example 25 opposition days, it resulted in standing committees and Oral Question Period was institutionalized.

The rules that we have today were derived from the third, if you like, quantum change that took place in the rules of this House back in 1985, rules that I may say came under the auspices and the leadership and the guise of this present government which was in power at the time. They basically were contained in a special committee report of the House of Commons. While they were not all enacted, as I understand it, many of them were.

What are some of the changes? My constituents who have been watching this on television are probably fed up with the kinds of changes and some of the technicalities that we are discussing. I just want to summarize that we are looking at 64 amendments. Some of these amendments are highly technical, some of them are good, some of them are housekeeping, but I look at the changes in three major senses and in order of importance.

The first one is the parliamentary timetable. The proposals would have us reduce the annual sitting of this House from 175 days to 134 days. That is a reduction of 25 per cent. Some of the time would be made up by adding an hour of business to each sitting day. Under the proposals there would be a timetable set up. The end result is that we are going to be sitting for 25 per cent less time.

The theory, as I understand it from the speeches I have heard from the government side, is that the change would allow us more time to be in our ridings to listen to our constituents and that the streamlining would allow certain other things to take place here.

But I have spoken to my constituents about this matter and, almost without exception, their feeling is that, at a time when the country is facing a constitutional crisis—and, as I alluded to at the beginning of my presentation, there are also rising tensions amongst native peoples, we have international problems, a recession, unemployment in my riding is over 20 percent and there is a lack of jobs, there is concern about the goods and services tax, there are difficulties because of the freeze or reduction in transfer payments to the provinces, which, in the case of Newfoundland, means that, because we are not a wealthy province, we cannot make up the difference, so the loss has to be passed on by a reduction of the health services and the reduction of education services—my constituents find it very difficult to understand why a proposal would be put on the table that would allow this Parliament to sit for less time to discuss these overwhelming problems, at this, of all times in our history.

I just talked about the first 100 years since 1867 and if there was a time for this House to be sitting more and not less, I think people would understand that. But for me to go back to my constituents and tell them that I am not familiar enough with the issues so must spend more time in the riding and for them to say that I have been representing them here for two-and-a-half years and do not understand that one of the big problems in Newfoundland is the lack of good fishing policy, which is ruining the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada, then I think they would say that I should not be here.

I know what the issues are in my riding. I speak to my riding two, three, four, five, or sometimes twenty times a day. I visit the riding most weekends and last year I did so on 40 out of 52 weekends. I am not alone. Most other people do the same thing. You probably do so, Madam Speaker, in order to see people, to attend functions, to hold meetings, to act in your ombudsman role, to talk to people to show them you are there to discuss some of the difficulties Parliament is having and to try to explain some of the issues. I did a lot of explaining on Bill C–21 on the goods and services tax. You also try to give reasonably both sides of these arguments.

So it is going to be very difficult for me to explain that, when this country is looking for leadership—and they see leadership here, in the highest court in the land—the government is proposing a 25 per cent reduction through these rules. They believe such a proposal is unconscionable. They believe there is a recipe for the rebirth of Canadian values and it will not be found by choking debate in this House.

This new parliamentary timetable reduces the number of sittings the government will have to face during Question Period. Question Period is a movable feast. Sometimes, when people are watching Question Period, I am sure they wonder what their elected members are doing here and I wonder that myself sometimes; I have to be honest. I am sure that, from where you sit, Madam Speaker, you have to wonder more than perhaps we all wonder, because you have to adjudicate at times.

Well, you can understand, Madam Speaker, that a member can get carried away with an issue or may want to put some feeling into what you say. In holding the government accountable for some of the things we, in the opposition, do not like one gets carried away because there is emotion involved. We do not put an act on here. When you get up and hold a minister accountable and do not receive any kind of answer at all you would be less than human if you did not get mad. When you get mad you do things you would not do if you were operating under a normal emotion. It is not an act. We mean what we do here and I would like more time to hold the government accountable, not less.

If I were in government, would I want less time? I do not know and I am not going to make any statements about why the government needs more time in their riding; that is for them to say. I think the standard reply is that they want to spend more time with their constituents and it is related to the polls, but I am not going to draw any conclusions about that. I want to speak as a parliamentarian, not necessarily just as a Liberal politician, at this particular point in this debate.

The proposal to cut speech lengths to about one day's debate at second or third reading, I find very objectionable. I was sent up here by the constituents and by the members of the riding of Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. They elected me, presumably, because they saw in me someone who they thought could come and represent them as a voice in the House of Commons in Ottawa. That is what I am paid to do, to come and speak on their behalf. I have tried to represent them when I have the time to speak and the opportunity to speak, when I can get on during Question Period or make a statement in the House of Commons. It is not for me that I am doing so; it is for my constituents.

I believe, as an individual, without looking at rules or reading bits and pieces that have been put together by research staffs, I believe myself I am here to represent their views as often as possible. I think my constituents would expect that this House has traditionally recessed during the summer, during Easter, and during Christmas, at which time we have all returned home to spend some time with our families, visit our constituents, attend social functions, officiate, open buildings, mediate, and carry out the functions I mentioned earlier.

I would find it very difficult to try to rationalize or try to give a good reason why, at this particular point in time, I, as their voice in Ottawa, should have either a weaker voice or a voice that is heard less frequently. I do not think they would buy it, so I am not going to try to sell it. But I am not going to try not to sell it not only because they are not going to buy it, but because I do not believe it myself. I believe my job is to be here to follow the issues, to watch the legislation, and to do what I started by saying. In order for this legislation to be proper law and in order for the Executive to do its job properly, they have to be watched and they are best watched here, not somewhere else.

The second type of reform is the revised committee structure. I am a bit concerned about that. I belong to a number of committees in this House and am rather proud of what we have achieved, quite frankly. I am proud of the work we have done on the defence committee. We have put together three reports, two on maritime sovereignty, and have recently put together a report on arms control, both of which are very important subjects.

I am concerned that the new structure will be cumbersome. and that the committees will lose a very important principle they now have, which is essentially that they are not tasked by the government and are largely responsible for doing what they, as a committee, believe they should do. I would not want to change that principle for anything.

With respect to technical reforms, I would say that the most significant is the abolition of permitting votes on first reading of bills and the provision of a device to circumvent, in my mind, the requirement for unanimous consent to waive rules concerning the conduct of the business of the House.

I am going to summarise because I know a lot of other people want to speak on this subject. I also know that my time is very close to expiring.

I have a great deal of respect, and I know that respect is shared by all my colleagues in the House, for the late Senator Eugene Forsey. I perhaps knew Senator Forsey better than many others because he was born in Newfoundland and I had built up a rapport with him. I would see him frequently in the House and we would chat about informal things and sometimes about formal topics and subjects political.

I cannot do better in a conclusion than quoting Senator Forsey. He once said or wrote that Parliamentary control of delegated legislation is not possible unless there resides in the Houses of Parliament power to disallow such legislation.

• (1850)

I will read it one more time, Madam Speaker. "Parliamentary control of delegated legislation is not possible unless there resides in the Houses of Parliament—" in the other place as well as in the House of Commons "—a power to disallow such legislation".

That is why we are here and why we have rules. The proposed rules would, in my mind, detract from this very important and all-assuming principle.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I am really pleased to take part in this debate. We all know the Government House Leader has tabled a motion to amend the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, after a series of fruitful discussions with members of all parties—Liberals, New Democrats and Conservatives. The series of reforms includes in particular changes to the schedule and to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons so that it can do business more expeditiously. I would like to give a few statistics about changing the parliamentary calendar.

The present parliamentary calendar provides for 175 sitting days. The average number of sitting days in 1991 is 155. The new calendar provides for 134. The calendar always provided for an average of 155 days or 881 hours a year. The new calendar provides for 134 days or 897 hours a year. Madam Speaker, I would like to mention how many days other legislatures sit. Let us take provincial and territorial governments for a period of three or four years: the Yukon Territory, 39 days; New Brunswick, 42 days; Prince Edward Island, 45 days; the Northwest Territories, 51 days; Newfoundland, 59 days; Nova Scotia, 62 days. Alberta, 73 days; Quebec, 74 days; Saskatchewan, 79 days; Ontario, 84 days; British Columbia, 89 days; Manitoba, 98 days.

I could also give some statistics for Canadians who often ask us for figures, especially my constituents.

Mr. Della Noce: Don't forget Australia!

Mr. Saint-Julien: Now, for other countries—

Australia, as my colleague from Laval-Est was saying, 77 days in 1991. The U.S. House of Representatives sat 144 days, or 814 hours, a year on average from 1961 to 1989. In the United Kingdom, they sit 170 days on average.

Madam Speaker, the new schedule will enable members to divide their time better between their parliamentary obligations and their obligations to their constituents, thus meeting their constituents' desire for more direct contact with their member of Parliament. Although the reform provides for fewer sitting days, the number of hours per day will increase.

The situation today is very different from what it was when the Standing Orders of the House were written, Madam Speaker. These days, members are asked to be in their ridings more often and on the other hand, Parliament requires more of them.

The changes made to committees respond to members' desire for a better adapted and more efficient structure of standing committees and a clearer distinction between standing and legislative committees.

The committees of the House will belong to one of five categories, each with four or five standing committees and two legislative committees. Members will thus be able to hone their knowledge in areas covered by the various committees in a given category, because the substitution rules will be more flexible.

The proposals also contain a provision to allow cameras in committee meetings with the approval of a majority of members. The government proposes that the House of Commons accept the recommendations from the Committee on Privileges and Elections regarding the process for Private Members' Business, which will enable ordinary members to present more bills and motions.

Madam Speaker, Parliament's task is to debate issues and to make decisions and the Standing Orders of the House guide this process. They govern the proceedings of the House and establish a framework in which the government carries out its legislative program and the opposition holds it accountable. They were designed so that Parliament could do business in an orderly way and members could debate issues and make decisions by majority vote.

The modification to the Standing Orders before Parliament is the result of a year of discussions and great co-operation among the House leaders. It is the most important series of changes proposed in the modern history of the Canadian Parliament.

Madam Speaker, with the proposed schedule, the House will sit on average 134 days per year, as opposed to an average of 155 days over the past 10 years. But the members are expected to sit approximately the same number of hours during the year. The changes to the schedule will give the members, especially those from the West and the Northwest Territories as well as from Northern Quebec and Ontario, more flexibility in planning the time they can spend in their riding. Government policies and legislation are more complex and Canadians show an interest in an increasing number of issues. While the opposition can use an attendance reporting system and not have to worry about keeping most of its members in Ottawa these changes will help all members to fulfill their obligations in Parliament and their ridings, so that both Parliament and constituents receive all the attention and services they deserve.

Madam Speaker, I listened to the speech the hon. member for Manicouagan made today about the difficulty of serving a huge riding. The riding of Manicouagan covers 450,000 square kilometers. My riding of Abitibi covers 550,000 square kilometers, with a population of 85,000, and it is hard indeed. We spend a lot of time here, in Ottawa, Madam Speaker. As my records show, and the hon. members are welcome to check, I am often present during the week, but when the week-end comes, we leave on Friday evening, spend Saturday and Sunday working in our riding, then come back to Ottawa. We have huge ridings.

For many summer is a time for holidays, but we Northerners head out north, in northern Quebec, in particular in the Nunavik area, to visit the Inuits and Crees and work with them to find solutions to their problems. It is the same thing for the member for Manicouagan, because we cannot get away when the Parliament is sitting.

The opposition parties are fortunate. Both the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party had their leadership convention in the past few years. We know there is a secret pact between them. It is rumoured in town and at home. It is a "one third, one third, one thid" system. We saw it in action today, during the vote. There is one political party in this House that I will not mention which had only 18 members present out of 44 tonight to vote on this important issue, that is—

An hon. member: They can be mentioned. It is the socialists!

Mr. Saint-Julien: My friend said they can be mentioned, they are the socialists, the comrades. However, opposes the rule changes and that is the Liberal Party. Today, out of 81 Liberal members, only 44 were present. Madam Speaker, with the "one third, one third, one third" system, we notice which members are often in Ottawa. We look across the room and wonder where the members have gone. We know why that is. They spend two weeks a month in their riding, and as many as three in some instances, because they do not need to stay here, so they can travel. Now they refuse a change which would give us, the members from large ridings, the opportunity to spend a week in our ridings to meet with our constituents.

Earlier today, I heard the member for Hamilton East say that we had met, that is true, on our way to the Senate for the royal assent and that I told her that I would be happy to go and spend one week per month in my riding for a working holiday. Upon our return to the House, she forgot the word "working" and mentioned only the word "holiday". That is pure partisanship! But when she went away for the leadership convention, she was away for a long time. It was not mentioned in the House at the time, but now we can pursuant to the rules.

Madam Speaker, it is very important that we spend one week per month in our ridings. When I go back to my riding on Friday night, 50 weeks or so every year, I often work Saturday morning and afternoon to meet with my constituents or travel up North. I sometimes drive 400 or even 800 kilometers in one day and a half during the week-end to Matagami or Lebel-sur-Quévillon. I have a huge riding.

That is why, Madam Speaker, we must have the opportunity to return home because it is important. Therefore, I will vote in favour of that motion, those amendments.

There is another thing that I would like to say to you. The other day, I noticed that three opposition members, three liberal members were away on a trip to Taiwan in the middle of a budget period, when it was most critical to be here if they wanted to take the government at task for that budget. But they chose rather to accept the invitation of Taiwan Chamber of Commerce to go there, all expenses paid. In other words, during the budget debate, those three liberal members, who were here today criticizing the government and saying how important it is to be in Ottawa, were absent that very week.

Madam Speaker, I have another thing to say to you, namely that your servant, the member for Abitibi and several of my colleagues from the province of Quebec want to obtain the privilege that Liberal and NPD members already have to go away one week a month. I will vote for these amendments, for the people back home, for the population of Abitibi, Madam Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, this package of rules that we find before us today is really going to change the operations and the face of Parliament itself. I would like to deal with the many comments I have heard from several people in this House today, being very concerned about the image of politicians today. It is obviously bothering some of them. If members of Parliament are themselves prepared to face the issues, defend themselves on charges that are made about them, whether it be in the media or elsewhere, I think that we are doing ourselves a service. The members of this House have a tendency to sort of let everything flow by, but, you know, when you are in that kind of contest, some of the tar and feathering sticks.

There is another thing I want to really bring out here, and I do not think it has been emphasized enough in this debate. The hon. member for Vanier brought it out in his speech the other day, and it is this; rule changes in this House have traditionally been done by parliamentary committees. The members of this House are the ones who have to work in the system. They are the ones who know whether the system will indeed work or not.

Madam Speaker, it is just like you sitting up there in the Speaker's chair. You have to be able to read what is going on in the minds of members here on the floor of the House of Commons. You have to be able to judge that in order to keep a firm hand on the House. You have to sit out here for a while in order to be a good judge from the chair, and indeed it helps, as the Speaker himself has done, when you have had the privilege or opportunity of sitting on both sides of this House from time to time. You know what it is like to be in the opposition and you know what it is like to be in the government. As a result, our Speaker is able to judge the mood of this House very well and he is also a good judge of the mood of the Canadian people.

It is the same with members of Parliament, sitting here in this House. Many, many meetings went into the McGrath report. I remember Senator Lefebvre's report when he was a member in this House, and how hard he and a number of members worked in bringing in the Lefebvre report. The McGrath report was a follow-up to that one.

If those kinds of reforms had been introduced in this House, they would have worked very well. They were done by people who knew how the place operated.

I resent very much, as a member who has been in this House for 25 years and who has seen many rule changes taking place and many personalities handling those rule changes, and I think it is incredible that the government House leader has taken it upon himself to put his name, with the backing of the government, to a large number of rule changes and to enforce them on Parliament rather than doing it by a consensus which has been done in the past.

I was almost brought to tears yesterday when the Minister for Fitness and Amateur Sport stood in his place and was telling the House how hard the government House leader had tried to get agreement on rule changes. He could not get any co-operation. Give me a break.

I have worked with the government House leader in other capacities in this House. I know how he agrees. His agreement consists of it either being his way or the highway. That is the way he operates.

I remember very well, as an example, leading a delegation of parliamentarians from this House to one of several North Atlantic Assembly meetings in a European country. When it came to the plenary of the whole at the end of the three-day meeting, the member who is the present House leader of the Conservative government, the hon. Minister of State for Finance and Privatization and another person who was in this House at the time left the Canadian delegation.

They would not sit in the seats allocated for the total Canadian delegation and went over and sat about 50 feet away from the Canadian delegation. On some issues, they even voted against what the members in the official delegation were voting for.

The late Hon. Allan McKinnon was a member of that delegation. He sat with the Canadian delegation and did his homework as a gentleman should.

I know about what they speak about this House leader. No co-operation. If he does not get his own way, then he will ram it down the throat of Parliament.

That is why we are in this debate tonight. That is why we were in it yesterday and the day before. That is why we are going to have this debate choked off at 1 a.m. Closure is on the books.

That is the way this minister operates. Do not tell us that the system is going to be more efficient. Do not tell me that the rules are what is causing the disruption in this House. Do not tell me the rules are responsible for the conduct in this House.

I remember very well in that famous summer of 1984 when the present Prime Minister travelled around this country telling Canadians that he was going to bring a sense of decency and decorum to the Canadian House of Commons. We remember that.

I have sat in this House under five Prime Ministers and I have never seen one of them act in the arrogant manner in which this Prime Minister has when he ridicules other members of the House and expects to have decency and decorum.

The way the Prime Minister has operated in this House, and he has been an example to some of his other ministers, is what is causing the lack of decorum in this place. There is indeed a lack of decency in here and it comes down to the fact that the government is arrogant. It does not need these rule changes to make the House work. The Conservatives say they want to go home and visit their constituents. That is fine. I do not think there is anything more important than visiting our constituents.

There used to be a policy in this House where members in the opposition would pair with members of the government if they wanted to go home for a while. In those days that pairing agreement was absolutely honoured. That was when a handshake meant a deal. There was nothing wrong with it. If the member sat in his or her seat when the vote took place, they usually got up after for the benefit of their constituents and said: "I did not vote on this issue because I was paired with a minister", or "I was paired with the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand", or wherever in Canada.

That is the kind of relationship that is lacking in this House. The government House leader can bring in all the amendments and all the changes to the rules of this House that he likes, but if the human factor is not there, if the sense of decency is not there, and if there is going to be smart aleck conduct on the floor of the House no rules are going to settle that.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hopkins: The hon. member is getting a bit upset, but I would suggest he look over some of the background of this Parliament. People think that because television is in the House, this Parliament has suddenly become a very bad place to be or a bad place to watch.

For heaven's sake, if we want to even take a brief look at the history of the Parliament of Canada, I remember sitting over there in the fifth row when the famous Munsinger debate took place in this House. It was a fierce debate. Personalities entered into it, a viciousness. There was no television in the House. It was for real.

I remember one person, whom I will not name, who sat just two seats away from where I am now. He was virtually jumping six inches off the floor with every second word he said because he was angry. It lasted two days; two days of absolute tension in this House. After that it sort of died down. People realized that it was a real tempest in a teapot.

Let us take another example. The rules of the House had nothing to do with what took place in this Parliament in 1917 during the conscription debate. If you really do an in-depth study on that famous debate in this House of Commons, the debate went on all day and all night for several days. During that particular debate, believe it or not, Madam Speaker, they had a bar in each lobby. As the night went on the debate got a little more interesting. That was not televised. There was no television in the House then.

The point I am trying to make is this. People seem to think that because television is in this House, there is more grandstanding, more tenseness in the answers, someone trying to put somebody else down. It has always been like that. This Parliament has not changed because you have elected a group of personalities to this House. Everyone in this House has a certain amount of ego, whether they want to admit it or not, because they have been leaders in their communities from which they came. When they come in here, they are not going to sit down quietly back in the corner and have nothing to say. There is going to come a time when they will get into very aggressive debate.

Changing the rules in this House is not going to change the conduct of the members of this House. Each member in this House holds it unto himself or herself to improve their conduct if they want to be more respected and, as a result, to look more decent in front of the public. But the leadership must come from the Prime Minister, as he promised in 1984. When he stands up and aggressively starts to put people down, naturally he starts a rhubarb because no one is going to tolerate it.

I was listening to a debater last night who was talking about spending so many hours on airplanes and how difficult it is to travel long distances and represent his constituents. It is true. I have known many members of this House who went home every weekend to British Columbia, and it is a big deal, but it is also good. It shows that members are interested in their constituents and they are there to serve them and to listen.

The other point I want to emphasize as I say that is that one thing is listening to your constituents; the other thing is doing something about it. I think there are many times that even if there is nothing you can do with their requests, if you at least treat them with a sense of decency and try to solve their problem, they will still respect you for it because they know they have had their day in court.

We had an issue here in this House a few weeks ago that would not be cured by these rules. That was when the public accounts and supplementary estimates were tabled in this House. It was a time when the opposition parties were asking for Mr. Spicer to come before a parliamentary committee. The government, and they talk about democracy, referred those estimates to a committee that had never had a chairperson for months. What an insult. What a way to run Parliament. Rules would not have changed that. It was all in the attitude of the people who did it. Eventually they did get a chairperson for that committee, but they would not have done it had there not been a big uproar about it. That is no way to run Parliament.

We see House management in the committee changes, which has a host of things to do from looking after the committee schedules to other items relating to the management of the House of Commons, which would be in the same envelope—in other words the same time-frames—and the public accounts committee, just two of them. That will work because you can only have two committees sitting at one time.

Where you have five committees in one group, if the government is willing to refer estimates to a committee that has no chair, what is to prevent it from looking at those five committees, making two of them very busy so that there is no slot for a third or fourth one, when a very important issue comes up that might be embarrassing to the government? It could use the block system to blot it out, keep it off the record and so on.

• (1920)

The committees should be televised, but the committees have to be given far more control than they are given under this system. If they are just going to have technical advice, that is not enough. There has to be some wide-open explanations about legislation because if people are going to watch that on television they want to know what that legislation is about.

I see you giving me the high sign, Madam Speaker. I am going to abide by your request.

If we look at the work that this House has accomplished in the last couple of years as outlined in the speech delivered in this House by the hon. member from Vanier, we will find that there has been a lot accomplished at a time when the government is complaining about the opposition holding things up. It is absolutely not true.

Here we have the government coming in, in a dictatorial fashion, in an non-traditional fashion, not been practised in this House. The government is bringing in its own rules and using the majority to put them in place and say you like them or you can do whatever you like about them.

That is not the way to bring about decency in this Parliament. There is going to be disruption from time to time in the future simply because there was no consensus on them by having consultation with all members of the House.

It has to start over there as well as over here. If we want decency and we want people in this House to be respected then we have to earn it, but the first way to do it is to start by looking in a mirror.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Madam Speaker, I wish to take part for a few minutes in today's debate which concerns us all.

I have just listened with great interest to a veteran of the House, a member who is far from being a novice in parliamentary affairs. We can of course, make use of certain of his comments. However, there is one thing that we must not forget when debating a subject as fundamental as the reshaping of the rules which regulate the House, there is one objective that we must all keep in mind as parliamentarians: How must the House operate so that its activities are democratic, efficient, and so that it serves the best interest of all Canadians?

The basic question is not how the opposition can defeat the government in the long run, or how the government can crush the opposition, as a few members of the NDP and the Liberal Party have already said today. That is not the basic question. We are then faced with a very serious problem, me must find a way to maintain the democratic balance and permit opposition and independant members to question the government on its actions, to criticize it, since this is the essence of democracy.

Certain countries of the world envy us a lot, Madam Speaker, as you know very well, because close to two-thirds of this planet's inhabitants, unfortunately, do not have a democratic Parliament. If you go to Africa—a region you know quite well Madam Speaker—, you will find that most African countries are ruled by a one-party system and do not have this kind of debate.

However, what must be kept in mind about the reform we are now proposing—and I want to appeal to those watching this somewhat sterile debate, perhaps, and who wonder why we talk about such a thing for a week. What you must keep in mind is that the government is trying to make the Parliament of Canada efficient, so that it will not be paralyzed by any member who comes along.

We are almost 300 members in this House, 300 strong-willed individuals, each with our own personality. To lead all those people at the same time, we need some order, Madam Speaker. The opposition must be allowed to express itself, but at the same time the opposition does not have the right to abuse the government, no more than the government has the right to commit abuses.

[English]

I listened very carefully to a comment made by the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle. In reply to me he explained that the new rules will not permit members of the Bloc Quebecois to do their work in this House. As the rules are now, any member of the Bloc Quebecois can stand and paralyse the whole process, not only during one hour but during one day or one week. If one member of Parliament wants to paralyse the Parliament he is able to do it by refusing his personal consent.

The hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle, as a member of the New Democratic Party, was trying to defend a member of the separatist party in this House. It is quite curious to see a member of the NDP trying to support a member of the separatist Bloc Quebecois, in order to help and give a chance to a party that wants to destroy this House, that wants to destroy this country. That NDP member wants to give those guys more chance to destroy this country and to paralyse the Parliament of Canada. It is quite curious.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the members from the Bloc Quebecois have the right to speak in this House. Although they are not an officially recognized party, they can rise at any time to raise questions of privilege, points of order or speak in a debate like the one today. Members of the Bloc Quebecois have the right to be in this House. However, given their numbers, they are a very small group in Parliament compared to all the elected members here.

Why listen to the NDP member for Regina—Qu'appelle who would give full rights to an independent member in this House to pursue his ultimate objective?

[English]

Members of Parliament sitting here under the colours of the Bloc Quebecois want to prove to the people of Quebec that this Parliament cannot work, that this government cannot do the best thing for the people of Quebec, and that Canada is not a country in which they are able to be proud of being Quebecois and being proud of being Canadian. The Bloc Quebecois is here to prove to the people of Quebec that this country will never function, that it will never work.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I do not intend to give the Bloc Quebecois those extra chances. I think that the Bloc Quebecois has the right to be represented here, to rise in this House, but not to spread trouble in the Parliament of Canada. I will never allow a member of the New Democratic Party, which is supposed to want to keep Canada united and come up with a renewed federalism in the next few months—I will never accept such a thing although it is presented in the hallowed name of democracy.

. Several opposition members have said that this government often used closure, Madam Speaker, and gagged the opposition, stifled the right to speak.

The Liberal government that preceded us did exactly the same thing and it was quite legitimate, Madam Speaker. Many people watching us now will wonder why a government member would agree to prevent other members from speaking. The reason is quite simple. If we listened to the opposition members, there would never be any closure and they could talk for hours and even days and weeks on the same subject. During that time, the Parliament of Canada could not function or pass laws, legislation that would be extremely important for Canadians.

I think, that it is very important to keep this essential fact in mind. The Parliament of Canada cannot be like a nursery school, although on some days one feels that it is. You have surely noticed that yourself. I say very sincerely that without order, if we cannot make Canadians again trust the Canadian parliamentary system and how this House operates—the regulations proposed by the government and largely accepted by the opposition, because several opposition members have risen in this House to say that they accepted many of the rules presented—

Mr. Della Noce: The rules must be obeyed!

• (1930)

Mr. Pronovost: My colleagues, including one from Laval, have just told me that rules must be followed, and they are quite right. For example, a little while ago in this House, we saw New Democratic members try to delay the proceedings of the House and paralyze it—and it costs $250,000 for every hour that we sit here—by rising for and against the same motion. We even saw New Democratic members, try to delay the proceedings of the House, loudly demanding that a private member's bill from a member of their party be presented in the House and as soon as the Speaker rose to call for an oral vote, the same New Democratic members who had insistently demanded it and wanted to bring all parliamentary proceedings to a halt, voted against their own member so that the bells were rung to summon everyone.

How many times in the past, Madam Speaker, have we urgently had to call back members from all over Canada to come and vote when it could have been settled on Thursday evening, which would have given the same result. But all members had to be called back from across Canada. That is expensive, Madam Speaker. You can imagine that, when members have to rush back to Ottawa from British Columbia, Saint-John's, Newfoundland, Atlantic Canada, Ontario, and all around the country, including from Abitibi, it costs the taxpayers a bundle.

I think that, for that reason, it is important that we adopt the new schedule the government has proposed, which we will do as early as tonight, Madam Speaker.

I have another point to make. The riding Madam Speaker represents is both urban and rural. That of the member for Outremont, not too far from us, is essentially urban. In fact, it covers such a small area that you could walk through it, while Madam Speaker, in her riding of Saint-Hyacinthe, would need a car. My colleague, the member for Champlain, must travel by plane to go from one part of his riding to another. Personally, I have to drive at least two hours to go around my whole riding.

Mr. Hogue: When the weather is fair.

Mr. Pronovost: If the weather is fair, of course. Can you see the problem we are faced with today and why members need to spend more time in their ridings? They need to be there not only to attend social functions and events of all kind, but also to get together with constituents who have problems to discuss, Madam Speaker. That is perfectly normal in any Parliament. Many citizens make appointments and may have to wait several weeks before they can meet their member and talk about their problems, the Canadian policy or their troubles with the federal bureaucracy.

As you know, we often hear reporters who work on the hill—I used to be a reporter before I came here—say: "Parliament is about to adjourn, so you will be on holidays." Quite the contrary, Madam Speaker. We work very hard here, of course, but once in his riding, a good member, whatever his or her allegiance, has to put in at least 60, 70, 80 and even 90 hours a week. It is very important to mention this.

[English]

I ask members of the New Democratic Party to be very sensitive to what they have said about the Bloc Quebecois before. The member for Regina—Qu'Appelle is trying to convince me as a Canadian that those new rules will impeach the Bloc Quebecois, will not give the right to the Bloc Quebecois to destroy this House.

It is quite curious to hear that a member of the New Democratic Party is happy with the fact that a member of the separatist Bloc Quebecois is able to paralyse this House at any moment of the day, at any moment of the year. That is how it works now, and the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle wants that to be maintained.

I cannot accept that as a Canadian. I am ready to accept that at any moment a member of the Bloc Quebecois can rise in this House to speak freely, but with the same rules that apply to all the members of this Parliament. For one member to be able to paralyse the whole Parliament, especially seeing the NDP defending the Bloc Quebecois on that question, is unacceptable.

[Translation]

In closing, I would like to mention, Madam Speaker, that most parliaments in the world, democratic parliaments that is, sit much less than the Parliament of Canada. Even countries like France, where there are no provincial governments, manage to have much shorter sessions than we do. We can do it, to make our Parliament efficient and avoid falling into anarchy like Italy.

Mr. Della Noce: Do you have something against Italy?

Mr. Pronovost: Madam Speaker, I was thrilled to be able to take part in this interesting debate. In conclusion, I must say that I fervently wish that Parliament will adopt this resolution unanimously so that we can at last have rules permitting a more efficient Parliament in Canada, whose mandate it is to serve Canadians who spend more than a $1.5 million a day for its operation. It is of the utmost importance that we use those dollars well. I thank you for being so patient, Madam Speaker.

[English]

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, there is a lot to cover in all of these rules and I do not intend to try to cover the whole area. The one topic among all of them that I want to discuss is the section dealing with committees.

I came to this House after almost 23 years of experience in the provincial House of British Columbia. I am often asked by people in my own constituency which is larger now than it was before, by people here, and by all over: "How do you feel about making the change? What differences have you noticed?" I always reply that the first difference I have really noticed is that in the federal House the committees seem to have some role, some raison d'être, some function.

That was not generally the case in the provincial House. Once a year in the provincial House we would get together. The selection committee would recommend the names of the people who were going to sit on the various committees. Someone would be designated as the person to call the group together for a meeting. The committee would meet, elect a chairperson, elect a deputy chair and a secretary, and generally with something like 13 out of 15 committees would never meet again until they were reconstituted a year later.

There was nothing that they could do on their own. They could take no initiative. The only time a committee could actually do anything, even hold a meeting, would be if the minister responsible for that area of discussion, assume it was agriculture, moved a motion in the chamber referring some particular topic or question to the committee for study. Once that motion was passed by the House the committee could start holding meetings, but not until then.

There were a couple of exceptions. The public accounts committee, for example, was ready to roll as soon as it was named, as was the one dealing with private members' bills and standing orders. But with every other committee, they never met unless the minister in charge moved a motion in the House.

In the federal House here in Ottawa it is different. That is something I noticed as soon as I came and something I appreciated. The committees did their own work. They started meeting almost immediately and started looking into whatever committee members thought was worth while, would be in the interest of Parliament, in their own interest of educating themselves as members or in the interest of the House. I appreciate the difference, thought it was very worth while and, as I say, it is always my first comment when I am asked what is the main difference between operating in the legislature in British Columbia and operating in Parliament in Ottawa?

What concerns me about the changes in the rules is the changes that are being made with respect to the operation of committees. They have been working well. It does not mean that the opposition members get their own way. They can bring in minority reports. They can even get those reports printed, which was not the case provincially. Nevertheless, they do hold their meetings. On occasion, even government members will vote with opposition members on something the committee is doing or the committee wants to do. They operate as a separate group and by and large, in my experience, they seem to vote not party line but in the interest of the work of the committee itself, and that is another difference I welcomed.

Some of the people taking part in this debate have expressed the wish that debate in this House could be the same way. Committee members speak individually without keeping to a party line as we in this Chamber seem to. That is the way committees work and I have enjoyed that aspect of my work as a member of different committees, but that too is changing with the way the rules are presented to us now.

• (1940)

The government apparently is not satisfied with the way the committees have been working. They want them to meet less frequently.

They are cutting down on the opportunities for committees to meet. Twenty-eight committees are going to be divided into five envelopes with two committee rooms assigned to each one.

In some cases, there will be six committees in one of these envelopes and in other cases, seven. Seven committees will be fighting for the opportunity to meet in just two committee rooms which cuts down on the opportunities for those committees to meet.

Deciding which committee is going to get a committee room will be left to a new committee, the Standing Committee on House Management. That committee is going to have the right to say which two committees in each envelope are going to have the right to meet. They will not be able to meet if they do not get a room. If they get a room, they will meet.

The Standing Committee on House Management will be controlled by government members, as are all committees. This is an important committee. The government will make sure that the committee is following government policy and direction rather than simply leaving things to chance.

When we look at some of the committees, we might wonder whether the Standing Committee on House Management is going to be guided by the interests of the House generally, or by the members. Is it going to be guided by the desires of the government at that particular point in time?

In each of these envelopes, there are two legislative committees. One would expect that in the event there is legislation to be considered by any of the committees in these envelopes then that particular legislative committee is going to have an opportunity to meet.

The government will be anxious to get the legislation through the committee and back into the House. There will be pressure on to get those committees meeting and to get the legislation passed through the committee and back into the House. This will leave five other committees that are waiting for an opportunity to meet in a room that may be assigned.

How often is that going to happen? How will the Standing Committee on House Management, controlled by the government, not be able to select those committees that are working in the interests of the government at that particular time? This means, perhaps, dealing with a subject that the government would like to have dealt with by the committee or, alternatively, avoiding a subject that the government does not want discussed at that time.

It may not want international affairs talked about. If that is the case, this House management committee would make sure that that particular committee did not have a room to meet in. Effectively, it would stop it from meeting. That is not the case now.

Now, there is sometimes a contest for rooms but the active committees do get rooms when they want them.

Beyond that, the legislative committees are going to be restricted to calling witnesses on technical aspects. That is not the case right now. The legislative committee can hear witnesses on any aspect of the work they are doing.

It is an opportunity for the general public, for groups with an axe to grind or for groups that feel its members have particular knowledge of something—whether they have or not. They feel they have. They want to express their opinions, try to have some influence and effect on government policy and legislation. They can make application if the committee agrees, and the committee will meet with them.

The way this reads now, through the changes that are being proposed, it will only be if someone decides that they are dealing with technical aspects only. It is not clear who makes that decision. Is it going to be the chair of the committee? Is it going to be the committee itself under the control of the government members? Is it going to be the House management committee?

What is a technical witness? Is he or she someone who comes from within the ministry or the department who is going to give evidence as to what the legislation was intended to accomplish? Is that what is meant by "technical" witnesses? There is no definition that I am aware of. There might be one somewhere, but none that I am aware of.

It would seem to me that it is cutting down the opportunities for that legislative committee to really look at the legislation. Mr. Speaker, you and I know that on occasion these committees do bring in useful amendments that are accepted by the government. This does happen. Under the new system, if the only witnesses they are allowed to hear are witnesses that are hand-picked by some group outside of the committee and presented to the committee as the ones who are going to be heard, there will be little opportunity to hear, not necessarily contrary views, but any views that are helping to develop legislation that will serve the interests of the people.

It occurs to me that we are going to get to the point where the only way in which legislation can be examined by anyone other than witnesses approved by the government, or some person representing government, will be when it gets to the Senate, the other place. The Senate will still have its committees. The Senate will still have its opportunities to have witnesses of any kind that a committee is prepared to hear. In those Senate committee hearings, as they have done in the past, it will be much more important in the future that they make opportunities for the general public—and I am not talking about everybody coming in—but people other than those designated as "expert witnesses" or "technical witnesses", people with technical ability or knowledge to be heard.

The Senate will be able to go beyond that. They will be the only ones that will be able to, with respect to a legislative committee. Yes, our standing committees will still be able to hear other witnesses. But when it comes to legislation that has been referred to a legislative committee, then one of the principal roles and the principal opportunities of the legislative committee, as I see it, in my rather limited experience in this House, is to serve Parliament and to serve Canada. That will have been lost to it by the change in the rules that will allow that committee to hear only technical witnesses.

As I have said, the definition of that is open. Who is going to select the technical witnesses? Who will they be and will they be picked by that same House management committee that is controlling everything else?

I said I would not be long and I do not intend to be. I wanted to deal only with this matter of committees, and I have tried to explain that too. In my experience, the committees of the House of Commons are serving the House of Commons very well. They are not just serving Parliament itself, but they are serving the people of Canada very well.

While some of the other changes are important and have been dealt with at great length by members in the House from both sides, I do not think there has not been enough attention paid to what is happening to the committees. That is the thing that disturbs me most. There are other things that are important, but the thing that disturbs me most is that the one feature of the House of Commons that I have enjoyed in contrast to my experience in the legislature in B.C., is the way in which the committees serve. The committees' role, their opportunities are going to be cut down. The possibility of them meeting is going to be up to the House management committee controlled by the government. They may not be able to meet at all unless the government wants them to meet. When they do meet, what they are able to do is going to be curtailed by the fact that they can hear only technical witnesses.

I will leave the rest to my colleagues to deal with. I wanted to deal only with this matter of committees.

We will be voting on the amendments to committees as a separate item, as I understand the breakdown of the vote. I hope the government will decide to take another look at the damage it is doing to the committee system in the House of Commons.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to speak on a particular aspect of these rule changes to the Standing Orders, that of Private Members' Business. I believe the changes that have been proposed to Private Members' Business are very good. They are positive changes, but I would urge the government to go even further.

I would like to give a bit of the history of Private Members' Business and talk about the reasons why we might increase the number of items that are made votable and to increase the number of hours of consideration given to Private Members' Business.

In Canada, at the time of Confederation, it was accepted that private member's bills were as important a source of legislation as bills tabled by the government. The rules adopted on December 20, 1867, gave precedence to Private Members' Business on three days of the week and to government business only on two days. From 1867 to 1906 the House operated under a set of rules that permitted fairly broad participation by individual members in all stages of the legislative process. The introduction and discussion of private members' bills consumed a considerable proportion of the House's time and private members' bills constituted a substantial portion of the legislation receiving Royal Assent.

In the early years the government made no serious moves either to increase its control of the House's time or to accelerate the pace at which legislation made its way through the House. Gradually however the time set aside for Private Members' Business started being encroached upon to enable the government to complete its legislative agenda.

At first, this was done "by leave of the House", although it became so customary that eventually the rules of the House were changed. During the period 1927 to 1961 numerous changes were made in the rules governing the introduction and discussion of private members' bills. Not only did such bills lose the pre-eminence that they had sometimes enjoyed over government bills during the 19th century, but the opportunities available to introduce and to discuss them were so severely restricted that their utility as a vehicle for initiating legislation was effectively ended.

The growing role and size of government, the increasing complexity of modern legislation, and the fact that much legislation had a financial component, all contributed to the growing pre-eminence of government. As you know, Madam Speaker, private members are prohibited by the Constitution from introducing bills with a financial initiative attached to them. This development was aided by the increasing cohesion of political parties which tended to restrict the activities of individual members. The government's need to use so much of the legislative time available has meant that the time for Private Members' Business has gradually, but inexorably diminished.

In Canada, during the 30 years from 1944 to 1974 only 14 private members' bills were passed, excluding bills to change constituency names.

There are several procedures in the British House of Commons whereby private members may table legislation. The most significant of these is the ballot. At the beginning of each session the names of 20 members are chosen and a priority established. These members are entitled to have their own bills discussed on Fridays which are set aside for Private Members' Business. In the late 1960s a number of very contentious moral issues, capital punishment, abortion, reform of laws respecting homosexuality and so on were successfully dealt with as private members' bills, although in several cases additional time had to be provided by the government.

In Canada, the 1984 Special Committee on the Reform of the House of Commons, the McGrath committee, made a number of recommendations to reorganize Private Members' Business in the House of Commons. Several of these proposals were adopted. A selection process was established whereby 20 private members' bills and motions were selected by ballot. From these a committee of members, the privileges and elections committee today, designate up to six of these votable.

The government has accepted the committee's recommendation where there would be 10 bills drawn and 10 motions drawn and 3 bills designated votable and 3 motions designated votable. I would call on the government to allow more items designated votable, perhaps 4 or 5 bills could become votable out of 10 and 3 or 4 motions out of 10 could become votable. Each of these votable items can be debated for a maximum of three hours. I would argue that as bills are more important than motions, we might restrict the number of hours that votable motions are debated to two hours.

Mr. Speaker, as you know a number of private members' bills have been passed into law including relatively controversial ones such as Bill C-204, the Non-smokers' Health Act, sponsored by Lynn McDonald. Nevertheless, certain defects have continued or become apparent. I believe we can go a long way to addressing these. Those are: the lack of time and the lack of the number of items being designated votable.

Now, why do private members put forward bills? They often put forward bills that are of particular interest to their constituents or other interest groups. Ideas for these bills arise from the problems dealt with and the complaints received by their offices. We all get a good knowledge of what is going on in government and in our constituencies by interacting with people and helping them solve their problems.

A member may wish to publicize his or her concern with particular issue. Certain members champion or adopt a particular cause or issue or carve out a particular area of specialization on their own. Private members' bills are a way of making the public and other politicians aware of the member's interest or concern.

They are also a means for members to assert their own individuality and sometimes deal with matters differently than their own parties.

Many government members will usually try first to see if the government will introduce certain legislation, although in some cases the individual member may not always receive credit for his or her work behind the scenes. The bureaucracy may be opposed to a particular measure, or the government may not have room in its legislative agenda. In such cases, the member may introduce a bill on his or her own.

Private members' bills are often used, especially by opposition parties, to advocate party positions. This can be perfectly acceptable, but there are, at the same time, concerns over the use of private members' bills to bring forward official opposition, or for that matter government policies or businesses.

More importantly, private members' bills are an important source of ideas. They are presented by members who are often reacting to public concern. Government ministers, on the other hand, are often insulated from the public. Many individual members have or develop expertise in particular areas, or by virtue of their contact with voters are made aware of problems in a unique way. Private members are not captive or influenced to the same extent by government departments; while this can deprive them of expert advice, it also can mean that they are more receptive to innovation and public concerns.

Private members' bills are an important alternative source of legislation to government-inspired bills. Sound ideas emanate from the back benches of Parliament. Moreover, since private members are politicians, they are inherently more attuned to public opinion than are civil servants.

Certainly, the government does not have a monopoly on sound ideas. With members of Parliament active as ombudsmen, they may be just as or sometimes more attuned to the popular view of their interest areas than are ministers or public servants.

Government inactivity is often a motivation for private members' bills. Private members' bills provide an important outlet for individual private members. It allows them to leave their own stamp on the legislative process. If the system were changed so as to improve the chance of success of private members' bills, this would help restore the power of Parliament, as well as revitalize the role of individual members.

Private members' bills allow members to act as individuals rather than as part of a team, yet they still can belong to a team. They provide an outlet, and most importantly, encouragement for individual initiative here in the House of Commons. In an effective private member system, there would not be votes along party lines, nor would party Whips try to get their members to vote a particular way. This would mean that it would be up to the bill's proponents to garner support. This is, of course, much closer to a true legislative system where individual members vote as they see fit on individual issues.

Many voters would be very proud of a member who managed to sponsor legislation successfully.

No matter what changes are made to the procedure rules governing Private Members' Business, it is essential that they be accompanied by changes in attitudes. Governments have to stop feeling threatened by an individual member's initiative. They must stop feeling threatened by bills that may not accord perfectly with their own legislative platform. The same is true, perhaps even more so, of bureaucracies that often hinder and thwart private members, consciously or not. Governments and parties have to sincerely allow members a free rein on private members' bills, not insisting on party lines.

Members themselves have to change. They have to be responsible for tabling bills and to avoid silly, petty and poorly drafted ones. If members only tabled bills that they seriously felt should become law, it would have an effect on the seriousness with which all private members' bills are taken. Members also have to make more of an effort to attend and participate in Private Members' Business.

The biggest problem facing private members' bills is lack of time. Every session, hundreds of private members' bills are introduced but only a few are selected by ballot and not enough of them are given enough time to be debated. Once again I call upon the government to allocate one or two more hours a week or consider alternative schemes to increase the number of hours of consideration given to Private Members' Business.

One alternative would be to have two half-days during the week set aside for Private Members' Business. It is conceivable that two morning sittings could be created to deal with Private Members' Business. The advantage of this idea is that it would minimize the disruption of existing House business and time. As we know, an hour here and an hour there prevents real continuity in discussing Private Members' Business.

Of course reform of Private Members' Business is part of a larger issue, the issue that we are discussing tonight, the general reform of the House of Commons, increasing the effectiveness of Parliament and of members of Parliament, enhancing the role of individual members and eroding the dominant role of party discipline.

The power and clout of private members cannot be legislated. It is possible to create opportunities to bring forward their concerns in the form of private members' bills, but much will depend on how they choose their issues, develop expertise, and use the system.

The attitudes of all members of Parliament and of the government will also determine whether the system succeeds or fails. The quality of private members' bills has to improve if there is a real possibility that they might become law and not form a pretext for debate.

There is some evidence that this has happened since 1985 when the McGrath commission reforms were instituted. I must compliment the Prime Minister and cabinet of the day for accepting many of those recommendations, for they have worked extraordinarily well.

Members of Parliament fulfil an important ombudsman role representing their constituents to the federal government. In doing so, they often become aware of areas that need to be addressed or reformed before the government does.

Private members' bills are a way for ordinary members to take advantage of the opportunities afforded them to initiate changes.

Writing in 1974, a newspaper columnist said: "Unless you subscribe to the quaint notion that the only people in Ottawa who are capable of thinking are those that inhabit the Treasury benches, you have to be concerned about the short shrift given private members' bills. It is one more argument for the real reform of the parliamentary procedure".

I think the rules of the House of Commons which have been presented are fine rules. I especially would applaud the government for accepting the recommendations given to it by the privileges and elections committee concerning Private Members' Business. I would encourage it to go that one step further in the future.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I bring an official opposition perspective to this issue, and I do not apologize for that one little bit. Let me explain. The premise of these rule changes is to limit debate, choke off debate. In the government's view if you delay legislation you make this House, this institution, more inefficient. In other words, it construes delay as inefficiency: "Delay is inefficiency".

Delay in this particular institution is not necessarily inefficiency. In fact, it is an absolutely vital part of the democratic process that is played out within these four walls.

When an issue comes to the floor of the House time must be given to have that issue percolate, to give people an opportunity to express themselves, to arouse the public. All of that takes time. Yet, those people on that side of the House would like us to believe that is delay or inefficiency and that the best way to pursue the political process, to pass legislation, is to do it in a great hurry: "Let us have no delay because that would be inefficient".

They are wrong. The role of the opposition is very vital to the democratic process. Believe it or not, our job which is much different from the job of those people over there is equally important. We have to have our time to do our job as they have to have time to do their job.

Speaking of delay and inefficiency, I suppose if we wanted to include cost effectiveness in efficiency it would certainly be more cost effective if I did not go home every weekend, if I did not get on the iron bird every Friday and go home. I would certainly save the taxpayer several hundred dollars a week. I guess, according to the thinking of some people, that certainly would be cost effective. But, would it really be good politics? Would it be good representation if I just sort of hunkered down here and I went home only once every four weeks or every three weeks?

The fact of the matter is that when you are in public life not only do you have to be here debating issues and taking part in the legislative process, but you also have to be back home. You have to be with your people, you have to mingle with your people, you have to be seen by your people, you have to be touched by your people. It is all part and parcel of the democratic process. It is very important. It is not necessarily the most efficient thing in the world, but it is a vital part of democracy.

I know that when I look at this package of changes I look at it rather cynically. I really wonder whether we would have this package of changes before us today if the government were not low in the polls, if it were not sitting at 15 per cent, 16 per cent, or 17 per cent in the polls. My guess is that if government members were riding high these changes would not be made or these changes would not be proposed. I gather they believe that the only way to political salvation is to shut this place down, rob the opposition of a political platform, and go home to see if it can find their political salvation. I think they are wrong on two counts. They are wrong on this package of changes and there is no political salvation for them. They are beyond redemption.

Let us look at the amount of time we devoted in debate to the goods and services tax.

• (2010)

I pulled out this legislative document, Status of Bills and Motions, and what does it show? It shows that when it came to Bill-62, the GST legislation, debate at second reading was on January 29, 30, 31, February 5, 6 and 7, 1990.

It seems to me, according to my arithmetic, six days for the GST at second reading. Then there was a debate at report stage on April 3 and April 9; two more days. There was a time allocation debate because this government is very prone to time allocation and of course closure. On the time allocation debate two more days, April 4 and 5, were devoted to that. Then there was concurrence at report stage on April 9, 1990. Then there was debate at third reading on April 10.

I have added it up and it looks to me as if there were about 12 days of debate in the House devoted to the GST. It seems to me that this government is saying that is too much time.

The GST, when it comes to tax legislation, was a watershed for this country. We had never had this kind of a tax in the country before. In this House of Commons we spent about 12 days debating. Is that too much? I do not think so, yet this government is saying: "That is too much. That is inefficient. That is delay. We have to limit debate".

As one of the previous speakers pointed out, we now face the irony that there will be more ventilation of an issue in the unelected other place than there will be here. Does that make sense? For the life of me, I cannot understand that.

I also want to touch on this matter of limiting witnesses before legislative committees to what is going to be called technical witnesses. There is a presupposition in that. There is a presupposition that the principle of whatever legislation is being debated, whatever legislation is going before the legislative committee, has already been fully explored some place else, presumably before a standing committee, so why would we want to go through the principle again or to debate the principle again? "Let us just sort of tinker with some technical aspects of a bill and we will leave that to the legislative committee". Does that make sense?

What guarantee is there that when a bill goes before a legislative committee the principle has been fully explored? Is there any guarantee that this matter would have been dealt with, particularly its principles, at the standing committee or elsewhere? I do not think so. It is a sham, but this package of changes is just another example of the erosion of the erosion of our democratic rights.

I want to enter a little positive comment here. There is a provision in this package at a certain point—I think it is after six or eight hours of debate—to reduce speeches to 10 minutes. I do not think it is a bad idea at all. Maybe it is because it is because of my journalistic background or maybe it is because of my broadcasting background, but I would submit that in a majority of cases if you cannot say it in 10 minutes you probably will never say it.

I would think that after six or eight hours there is not going to be anything lost to the public if speeches are limited to 10 minutes.

I want to touch on a couple of omissions; omissions not commissions. First I want to touch on free votes because we do not have many free votes in this House. We do not have enough free votes in this House and this package of changes is not going to help the situation at all.

People out there for better or for worse—and I happen to think it is for better—want to give their public representative, their members of Parliament, a greater role and a bigger voice in this House. What they are really saying to the political parties and to all of us is that party discipline has gone too far, that party discipline is excessive. The pendulum has swung too far in the direction of party discipline. That pendulum has to be pulled back to give members of Parliament more individual expression, particularly when it comes to sensitive regional issues.

Constituents are not stupid. The voter is rather sophisticated. Voters know that parties must stand for something, that parties cannot go in every direction on every issue, that there is many times, perhaps a majority of times, when a party has to speak with one voice. I will just pick one example. When it comes to something as fundamental in a government program as a budget, the governing party in that particular case must speak with one voice for better or for worse.

There has got to be some elasticity in the system, some room for the parties to speak with one voice, but also room for members of Parliement to speak with their particular voices, voices that represent a particular point of view of a particular region of the country.

What is happening now is that members are being asked to be nothing more than puppets. I do not think that is what we are supposed to be. After all, this is supposed to be the highest court in the land.

I think there is something that members have to look at when we ask for the right for free votes. We are not asking to defeat the government on each and every occasion that we want a free vote. All we want to do is to say that we do not like a particular piece of legislation, take it back, redraft it, improve it, and then return it to the House. We are not asking to defeat the government, to kick the cabinet out, to cause an unnecessary election or anything like that. All we are asking is for us to focus on a particularly egregious, bad piece of legislation; to send it back to the shop and fix it up. I do not think that is too much to ask for. I really do not think that is too much to ask.

I want to touch on the proposal of three weeks on and one week off. A part of it is appealing. Certainly that one week off is simply off from this place. It is certainly not off from work. I can assure you, Madam Speaker, that if it goes through I will be spending the so-called week off in my riding and in my riding office. I am sure I will work just as hard during that week off as when I am here for the three weeks.

My concern, though, is that unless we do a very good educational job of explaining what it is all about—and politicians tend not to be good at that—people are going to look at it cynically. They are going to say to themselves and to us: "Oh, it is just a way of reducing your workload. It is a way of giving yourself another break, another holiday". That bothers me because we are in low enough esteem now.

I am also afraid that this approach of three weeks on and one off from the House will be abused politically, that House leaders, particularly on the government side, will do all kinds of stage managing of sensitive issues around this provision of three on and one off. I can just imagine the government thinking: "How could we perhaps introduce something that is unpopular and is going to cause a lot of flack for the next few days? Maybe we will introduce it just as we are shutting the House down for a week".

You see, there is even cynicism in me, as there is among voters. That worries me, it worries me a lot, because if we politicians are not thought of in a good light, nor will this institution itself. In other words, as we go so goes this institution.

There is also the matter of the televising of House committees. A good idea, Madam Speaker, a very good idea. I said this the other day and I want to repeat it here. If we come to the televising of House committees, I want no part as a parliamentarian, and I don't want to see any other parliamentarian either on this side of the House or that side of the House, deciding which committee is going to be covered with the television camera, be it a permanently installed television camera or one that is hand-held and moves around the committee room. That must be decided by the media and the media alone.

I do not tell the Toronto Globe and Mail, the Toronto Star, the Winnipeg Free Press or any other newspaper or any other publication in this country which committee meeting they are going to cover. They have to decide what is in the public interest. They have to decide what is news and what is not news on a particular day. That is not my decision, that is not the business of the government, and it is not the business of this side of the House.

I know that there is a predisposition in this House that would give some politician the power to decide which committee is going to be covered by television and which committee is not. If we go down that road, that will open up an unbelievable can of worms. That is a Pandora's box, and we cannot allow ourselves to fall into that trap.

The media is far from perfect. The media makes mistakes every day. But I would rather, in this particular instance, have the media make those mistakes, for better or for worse. That is not our business.

In closing, Madam Speaker, I want to touch just briefly on legislative planning.

The way we conduct business in this House very often does not make any sense. It does not matter which party is in power, it seems to be the same old way. That old way is always keep the opposition guessing, keep the opposition off balance, and if we can give the opposition a matter of just hours' notice about the next piece of legislation to be debated, well, that is well and good for the government.

As I said at the beginning of this speech, the opposition has an important, vital role to play in this democratic process in this House.

Yes, we are adversaries, but there has to be a team approach. We need to have our resources and our time to think through legislation so that when it comes to debating, we know what we are dealing with.

I would like to see much more legislative planning in this House.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver): Madam Speaker, I represent a riding at the far outpost of the empire, North Vancouver. There are many of us in this House who represent ridings as far away.

Let me describe how I get here. When I leave my home, it takes a good 40 minutes to get to the airport. If I want to catch a plane, I had better be there 40 minutes to an hour ahead of time. I am already into my day with an hour and a half to two hours. To fly from Vancouver to here is a minimum of a full five hours. Then, of course, there is the extra approximately 40 minutes to get downtown from the Ottawa airport and to the House of Commons.

When I come to Ottawa, I have already spent seven or eight hours just to get here. That procedure is reversed when I go back to my riding. I am not the worst off by any stretch of the imagination.

Those people from the interior of British Columbia have to oftentimes overnight in Vancouver and fly from one to three hours the next morning to get back to the voters who elected them. The same thing is true to a certain extent in the maritimes and Newfoundland.

For that reason, I am very highly in favour of three weeks sitting and one week off from here. The one week off from here is important for several reasons. What a lot of people in this part of the world forget is that the Rocky Mountains are much more than a geographic barrier. They are a mental barrier as well.

I find that the minute I start thinking what I read in The Toronto Star, The Ottawa Citizen or the Montreal Gazette is important, it is time I went back to British Columbia to find out what the real people are thinking and concerned about.

Believe it or not, the people in this country do not all agree with the Montreal–Toronto–Ottawa access. What these regions consider important is not necessarily important in the other regions of the country. In many cases, it has no bearing at all on that thinking.

Can I find that thinking out, sitting in Ottawa? There is no way. We have to go home and spend time with our people.

I have not been able to accept a speaking engagement on a Tuesday or Wednesday night in years. The reason, of course, is that costs me practically a week here. No matter how I slice it, it is a day to get here.

If I take an early morning plane, then I can make it here by five o'clock or 5.30 in the afternoon when the business day is over. If I take an afternoon plane, I am here very late at night. If I take the "Red Eye" out of Vancouver at eleven o'clock or twelve o'clock at night, I may get to Ottawa by nine o'clock the next morning. Believe me, my mind is still exhausted over Saskatchewan. I may be here physically, but not in the best mental shape.

No matter how it is sliced, if we come from the far outpost of empire, it is a difficult thing coming here, doing our work and staying in touch with our constituents. That is why three weeks here and one week off will make a tremendous difference.

There are also the time changes involved. There are three hours difference between here and the west coast. I would recite a bit of an antidote.

When the Pope was in North America, his doctor made the statement that for every time zone change of an hour the Pope went through, generally speaking it took the average person at least two days for their biological clock to adjust to that time change.

When I read that, I started thinking about my travel schedule over the previous six months and I came to the conclusion that if I stopped flying immediately, by 1995 my biological clock would be back in the proper rhythm. Unfortunately, it does not happen that way. It is a very difficult thing for members from a long distance away. I am not the only one. If you have a tight little Winnipeg riding, that is fine. You can take about a two hour flight and you are home in your riding. If you are from Montreal, one hour. No wonder you have no sense or understanding of what it means for those members who are a long distance away.

I have heard a good many insensitive speeches in the last three days on this subject. Most of them demonstrated a total lack of understanding of what a good many members go through in terms of doing their job here, representing their people, as I said, at the far outpost of the empire.

I heard some rather cynical speeches, I thought, from some NDP members. They have been doing the three and one for over a year now. Just check them any day and you will find out that about one third of them are away visiting their ridings for that week. To hear somebody be opposed to this one week in four off is simply not fair.

I can think of a great many very terrible movies I have watched at midnight in the city of Ottawa, having got off a plane, got home and it is really only nine o'clock at night west coast time. I wish they had better movies in Ottawa, really, particularly late night ones.

In any event, that is part of the story. The real part of it is the fact that that week off is extremely important to all members if they only knew it. Get out in your ridings, meet your people, be available for speeches, breakfasts or whatever. What happens, of course, is your constituents will very rapidly get to know when you are in town. They do this, I might add, in Australia. The Australian members have found that after a week at home they come back to Canberra to rest up because everybody in the riding knows you are there, knows you are going to be home for the week, so there are breakfasts, luncheons, dinners. They plan their events around when their member is definitely going to be in the riding. We cannot do that now, but with the three weeks on and the one week off, we will be able to do it. It will be better for all of us, particularly those who come a long way.

Oftentimes, I feel sorry for myself on the plane until I think of some of my colleagues. There are places in Saskatchewan you cannot get to from here, and they have members. Some of the members from Manitoba fly into Winnipeg and then get into an automobile and drive for two or three hours to get home. Try and do that on a Friday night, spend Saturday and part of Sunday at home and then drive three hours back to the Winnipeg airport and try to get to Ottawa.

That one week off in four, I think, is necessary for the health of the country, for the health of the members and also to give the public a real chance to get at their member.

I would dispute what the previous member said about the government attempting to bring in nasty little bits of legislation two days before the week off. I do not think it is going to happen. If it does, it means every member goes back to their riding and will get the fallout from that legislation in their face when they are there and have to explain it. So that does not matter. But a week in four to spend in your riding is particularly important to anyone who has a ridiculous travel schedule to get between Ottawa and their riding.

The only other point I want to make in my particular remarks on the bill is that I am highly in favour of the new committee system for these reasons. I have chaired enough committees here with enough members over the years. One the greatest faults of the whole thing is that so often, in order to make a quorum or to carry on your committee business, you get a stranger who is put on that committee. He does not know the background of the committee. He does not know what has been discussed and, invariably the floaters, as I would call them, are the ones who want to take up most of the time uselessly talking about things they know nothing about. With the new committee system you will have groupings of members. If you are interested in the finance envelope and all those committees, you will become knowledgeable in each one of those areas and will be of use to a number of committees within that particular envelope. The same will happen with the social services committees.

In that sense I am highly in favour of it because it means more knowledgeable members of Parliament dealing with issues with which they are concerned.

Frankly, there are some other things on which I could agree with the opposition. I find it offensive that the House leaders of all parties have reserved so much power and responsibility to themselves. I do not agree with that. It should be spread out to committee chairman and private members to a much larger extent. First of all, I do not think it is necessary and I do not think it is healthy.

However, I would do almost anything to get that week in four home in my riding, to have an opportunity to take speaking dates when everyone knows you would be there and when there would be a full week, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Monday to conduct business in the riding which many members from way out of town now have difficulty in doing.

For those reasons I am going to be voting for these rule changes and with heartfelt thanks for the changes that are being made. They are all very worth while. For those members with their tight little ridings close to Ottawa, fie on you. Those of us from the far outposts of empire deserve that week off.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I am gratified to be given the opportunity to say a few words in terms of the rule changes. I would like to preface my remarks by simply having a complimentary word for our House leader, the member of Parliament for Cape Breton—East Richmond who put forward in response to the government House leader in a very brilliant and articulate way this past Monday, in a speech close to an hour and a half to two hours, trying on our behalf and for the benefit of Canadians to dissect a number of the rule changes that are being proposed. I know that all of the members of our caucus are very appreciative of his efforts and those members of our caucus who assist the House leader such as the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

I would basically like to structure my words in the time allotted to me in three ways. First, to touch very briefly on the full question of closure which I find ironic given the context of the debate this evening. Second, the timing of the proposed rule changes themselves. Third, obviously a few comments on the actual changes that are being contemplated.

On the first aspect I mention that I found it very ironic for closure to be ushered in during a debate about rule changes, rule changes that purport to give greater relevance, greater significance to both this Chamber and to individual members of Parliament. At the same time we have a government that has used closure a record number of times, but becoming much more cold about the whole situation as it introduces closure on the very time that members of Parliament are debating how we can make this place and members in this place function better on behalf of the country and on behalf of Canadians.

I believe if the Chamber is to be made more accountable, if members of Parliament are to be given greater latitude, greater authority and greater flexibility with which to discharge their responsibilities, it would seem to me that their constituents would win if we did not always have the club that has been known in parliamentary language as "parliamentary closure". This is a very fancy way of abruptly closing and choking debate when debate can foster new ideas in new directions. So I find it very ironic that, while we are trying to improve the lot of the House of Commons, closure is being allocated on the other end.

• (2040)

The second aspect—and I say this in a non-partisan way, as a member of this place—is that I find the timing of this debate to be circumspect, to say the least. If I was a member of the Canadian community looking on, by my parliamentary channel, I would see a House of Commons seized by parliamentary rule changes and the debate herein.

I find the timing ill-advised because the country is currently wrapped in what can best be described as a crisis on two tracks, one being the economic track and the other being national unity. We know the situation with respect to the economy, wherever Canadians live.

We know that close to 1.5 million people are unemployed; we know plants have been closing; we know de Havilland is being sold, and we know there is double-digit unemployment in my own city of Toronto, which happens to be the heartland of Ontario and the capital of the manufacturing industrial heartland of Canada.

Canadians are in trouble and Canadians are hurting; small businesses are either downsizing, going bankrupt, or going south of the border; Canadians are looking to this government and to this Parliament to inspire a nation, to try to stimulate an economy, and to collectively try to pull ourselves out of the economic pit we find ourselves in.

Instead, we are engaged in what some Canadians are suggesting is a navel-gazing exercise. As important as it is to be reforming this place with a view of hopefully improving it, at the time, be it on the economic front and on a national unity front, when we have one province contemplating whether it wishes to leave the Canadian family, other parts of the country are wishing-in to the Constitution, and Canadians of neither English nor French background want to be encompassed by the debate, we are contemplating rule changes.

The changes are very distant from the causes that are gripping Canadians today and are very far removed from the malaise in which Canadians find themselves. I am sure the changes will certainly fuel the cynicism in which Canadians all too often hold this place and the members that occupy it.

To make matters worse, not only are we debating proposed rule changes at a time when the country is going through one of its toughest times since Confederation, but as soon as we are finished the debate on rule changes, rather than having the expectation of then getting on with the business of Canada, this House is going to adjourn, as proposed by this government, which will close the lights in this Parliament.

On the one hand, Canadians see a Parliament engaged in itself, rather than engaged in the business of removing Canada from this economic and constitutional malaise. Then, of course, after we have finished the business of rule debates and rule changes, we will close Parliament on the excuse that the government has to get ready for the Throne Speech, which will not be delivered until the 13th, 14th, or 15th of May.

So it is no wonder that Canadians would view this debate as being very much ill advised in terms of timing. I would share that commitment. As much as I have a commitment to improving this place, I have to question whether the timing of this particular debate could not have waited until the issues of the nation were better resolved and whether our forces and energies as members of Parliament would then have been better focused on addressing the issues that are involving Canadians from one coast to the other coast to the other coast.

The third issue on which I would like to spend a few minutes relates to the actual changes and can be divided into three areas. Firstly, the new parliamentary timetable that is being advocated; secondly, the revised committee structure; and, thirdly, the technical orientation.

I think the latter two are of somewhat more of a technical orientation and I have the biggest concern, as an individual member of Parliament, with respect to the new timetable. That new timetable would suggest that the annual sittings of the House would be reduced from 175 sitting days to 135. Notwithstanding the fact that some of those sitting days will then be increased by an hour or so to make up for some of that loss, there is still a House of Commons sitting for less hours overall, over the long-term.

We can say quite rightly and quite legitimately that we need to spend time in our ridings and that we need to be with our constituents and responding to them. I would agree with that and I think there needs to be the time for the Members of Parliament to balance the two communities: the one in Ottawa where this Parliament is our factory and in the riding, which also happens to be a workplace of utmost significance.

I believe that when this House is closed we remove a forum that has been vital for Canadians. We recall the summer that just went by during which we had the situation of Oka and during which the situation in the Gulf intensified, and this House of Commons was closed. There was no apparatus for Canadians to look into these issues, beyond the press releases that were issued by the government and the Prime Minister of the day.

I recall during that summer when Canadians were asking why Parliament was not open for business then, of all occasions, when it had been brought back a few summers ago on such flimsy excuses as a number of people coming in on the east coast, as one illustration, or as dealing with the Correctional Service. However, when there was a true and real emergency during a crisis, this Parliament was not open.

Therefore, I would lean towards having this place be in operation more often, be more alive, and be in closer concert on the television set in the living rooms of Canadians than having this place closed, thereby removing an outlet that is the forum and the centrepiece for parliamentary democracy in this country; a democracy that people in other countries are dying and starving for.

The other aspect of the parliamentary timetable is that of the 25 allotted supply days would be removed from the opposition. That is a fancy way of saying that there would be less days when the opposition dictates the agenda of the parliamentary day.

That reduction erodes the accountability portion of an opposition. We on this side are not arguing in a purely opposition mode because we know that one day very soon we will be on the other side of the Speaker, in the government benches, and the members on that side will have their roles reversed. So we are trying to speak to the traditions of an opposition in a democracy and the democracy of any country is only as strong as the rights accorded to its opposition. When the rights of the opposition are eroded so is the definition and power of the word democracy.

Therefore, why have fewer opposition days in which the opposition can dictate the agenda for a change.

I have been in the House for six years. I have lost every single vote in the House of Commons. I accept that. The government has a parliamentary majority and I accept that.

But it is not only important who wins the votes, but who wins the debate, has the force of debate, has the force of right on one side, has the ideas, has the clarity, and has the convictions. Therefore, votes are one thing, but debates are a very different subject. Therefore, I oppose quite strenuously the attempt to remove the ability for of opposition on behalf of Canadians to set the parliamentary agenda on any day against a parliamentary government—in this case, a majority government—that has all the power, all the clout, and all the tools at its disposition.

I would also suggest that two out of the eight Throne Speech debate days be removed. Now the government says that the day of the Throne Speech is one of the most important days in any parliamentary calendar. It provides political inspiration to the government and the party and is intended to provide political inspiration and leadership to a country. The Throne Speech supposedly ushers in "a new agenda". Therefore, is it not logical that, if the government attaches such importance to an undertaking in a Throne Speech, this House, this chamber and its opposition should be accorded the fullest possible time in which to try to explore important undertaking on behalf of Canadians?

It seems illogical, on the one hand, for a government to adjourn for a month to prepare a Throne Speech and to then suggest in its proposed rule changes that there ought to be less debate surrounding one of the most important initiatives a government can take in the parliamentary agenda.

The proposal also goes on to say that two out of the six budget days ought to be removed. Once again, the introduction of a budget is another centrepiece of any government program and of this chamber, of media, and for a country, in terms of the fiscal and monetary policies that will be dictating its course, for not only months but years to come.

Therefore, if a budget is that crucial to the livelihood of a country and its people, why not provide this chamber and the opposition of the day, whoever is in that unfortunate position, the opportunity to try to account again for the parliamentary program, in a budgetary sense, of that government.

It seems to me that we have a contradiction when a government flags the important days of a budget and a parliamentary Throne Speech, then at the same time tries to advocate greater relevance for this place by removing the debate surrounding these important initiatives.

The proposal also talks about limiting a Member of Parliament's speech and cutting it in half after a number of hours. I suppose there are two schools of thought. One is to try to move the debate on. On the other hand, if Members of Parliament are to occupy a more relevant role in this chamber and are to try to be somebodies in this chamber, then cutting one's time in half is not going to do it.

If a Member of Parliament wishes to eloquently discuss an issue affecting one's riding, one's country, or one's Parliament, then 10 minutes— although it is true, Madam Speaker, that if you cannot say something in 10 minutes it is not worth saying— is not not enough time to put some points in this country as a national federal politician because some statements cannot be put eloquently in 10 minutes or less.

How do you speak, Madam Speaker, about a Meech Lake constitutional package, for instance, in less than 10 minutes? How do you speak about a Persian Gulf crisis in less than 10 minutes? How do you describe how one feels when one looks at the Kurds, in less than 10 minutes? Sure, we can discuss some aspect for five minutes and that is plenty of time. But on many other issues, ten minutes does not do justice to the substance of the day. And who is to decide which issue deserves five minutes and which deserves unlimited discussion in this beautiful chamber we ought to protect, in every sense of the word?

Therefore, on some of those changes, I am opposed, because, if you look at this chamber, it is a magnificent chamber. I remember the very first time I came here as a visitor, in early 1980. Seeing the chamber was very different from viewing it from a distance or reading about it in the newspaper. It reminded me of the first time I went to Maple Leaf Gardens. You can watch a hockey game, as many Canadians are doing this evening, and you can say it is a great game. Then you go into Maple Leaf Gardens and there is an ambiance, there are lights, and there are pictures on the wall. It is history in action and it gives you a different sense.

That was the same feeling I had when I came up and sat in the visitor's gallery and looked at the lights, the wood carvings, and the history that embodies this place. It is truly a remarkable place, that is the envy of the world, that we sometimes take for granted, that sometimes does not work, in which we sometimes do not listen to each other on enough occasions, that sometimes becomes too partisan, yes, but that has also lost a bit of relevance over the last few years, that has sensed a loss of power in the last few years, and that is concentrated more in the executive of a government.

If we are to give a sense of better purpose to this magnificent place and if we are to give a greater sense of purpose to individual Members of Parliament, who have been elected by a large number of Canadians, who have their franchise to make important decisions on their behalf, then we cannot contemplate some of the changes being proposed to us in these rule changes we are debating.

If we want Parliament to be more responsive, if we want it to be more relevant, and if we want to give the opposition a chance to hold the power and the government in check, then we have to approach it in a very different sense from that by which this government is approaching it. Unfortunately, I get the sense that this is a government that does not have the intention of spending too much time in this place.

But that view is short lived. This government has come and this government will go. This opposition will also change. You and I will one day hopefully be looking on a very different parliament and we have to look at a parliament in its long-term context. This Parliament does not belong to this government, this opposition, or this Speaker. We are simply custodians for a four- to five-year period. What we are doing this week is possibly changing the way this place operates for years to come.

With that sense in mind, we ought to move in the right direction and with dignity. We ought to restore some of the respect and dignity of this place and of the members who occupy it, which have so regrettably been lost and eroded in the last number of years.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Madam Speaker, I want to thank you for the opportunity to participate in this debate.

I am hoping this evening to talk about a couple of points that are not necessarily contained in this package but might be, because when we examine the rules and rule changes we can consider what changes we are making, but doing so also gives us an opportunity to talk about some changes that we might wish to make in the future.

Some members have talked about some of these rule changes, both positively and negatively. Most have dwelt on the amount of time Parliament may or may not be sitting, either more or less, or in a different way. Frankly, I do not really believe that aspect is particularly relevant. I do not mean that as a negative comment toward the people who have spoken, but it seems to me that the changes being proposed here are not particularly revolutionary and will not change the nature of how we operate in any substantial way. That is why I would like to suggest a couple of changes a little further along that might change things substantially.

Part of the problem, I believe, is that there is a substantial gap between what the public believes we do here and what goes on. One of those gaps, if you like, has been brought closer to the forefront in recent times under the Spicer commission and other forums in which the public has increasingly been saying that they believe there should be more free votes in Parliament, less ties to party lines, and less control by the party or the leaders of parties.

That is probably an interesting point and a good one, but, in part, it reflects the fact that most Canadians do not understand exactly what Parliament does and what kinds of matters it deals with. That is not to say anything negative about them, because frankly, until I got here, neither did I. But the issue is not free votes. In my opinion, virtually every vote we have had in the time I have been here has been free. I know that the votes usually break down along party lines, but I think we have to explore how that happens.

When I examine the last two years of Parliament, in this session, I see that we have introduced approximately 100 bills. I looked through those bills and determined that of those bills, only 14 had what I would call substantive votes.

• (2100)

I want to explain that a bit. We have a lot of votes around this place which involve such things as voting when to adjourn or not to adjourn, whether someone can speak or not speak, whether or not to move to Orders of the Day. If we examine the votes which occur on substantive issues, and even though in some cases there may be several votes involving the same bill or issue, we call that one vote, because obviously it is essentially consistent. We may have moved to Orders of the Day and done a number of other things to trigger the vote, so several votes may be involved. But we can narrow it down to how many issues Parliament divides on which are substantive. Of the 100 bills, about 85 per cent of them passed through this House on division or on a voice vote. In other words, no recorded vote was demanded. It was supported by the House.

Only about a dozen bills, in actual fact, required a formal division by the House. In some cases more than one division is taken, but as I say we will look at them one issue at a time.

Of those 12 or 14 bills, four or five were divisions triggered by something else. On the Broadcasting Act, Bill C–40, there was substantial support in the House but because cutbacks had been announced to the CBC the day before, there was a protest vote, so to speak, which triggered the formal vote.

On the borrowing authority, by and large no one in this House plans to vote down the borrowing authority. But sometimes it can be used to send a message to the government or to extract other things.

If we really narrow it down to this session of Parliament, of the 100 bills, in my opinion, we have had only four or five substantive votes. One, everybody would realize was on the GST, and we may have voted several times involving that issue but really there was only one issue involved. There was another vote involving some income tax amendments, including what we call colloquially the clawback. There was Bill C–21, amendments to the unemployment insurance, and there was the privatization of Petro–Canada and perhaps one or two others.

What I am saying is that on virtually every issue on which there was a substantive vote, where people voted because they were voting in terms of the issue, the vote did break down on party lines. That is relatively natural, because if we are talking about privatizing Petro–Canada, one can presume that most members of the Conservative Party would be in favour of that, most members of the New Democratic Party would not, and so it is only natural that it would break down along party lines.

If every vote was formally and officially a free vote, the question is would there be any difference. I suggest that, no, there would not. The reason is that for a whole bunch of issues out there which the public is concerned about, no vote is ever held—or if it is, no vote is ever held that would have any effect on the issue.

Consider three or four of the controversial issues over the last five or six years that I have been involved in while I have been here in Parliament. For example, consider the CF–18 contract, when Petro–Canada purchased Gulf or the issue of Sikhs and turbans and whether or not RCMP members would be allowed to wear turbans. None of those things were decided by a vote of Parliament, they were all decided by executive decision, by decisions of cabinet ministers involved or by the cabinet as a whole. None of those issues which the public was interested in and which were important to them were decided by a vote.

I am suggesting that it is not a matter of free votes or not free votes, it is the matter of what comes to a vote in this House. That is determined, by and large, by the executive, by the government, the cabinet. In actual fact very few votes are held on substantive issues that are not going to break down on party lines or are not going to pass through the House without a declared vote.

This whole issue of allowing more free votes of freeing members from party lines to support their constituents, is a bit of a red herring.

The question becomes, what can we do about it? One of the things we can do is try to educate the public as to how this place works, but after about 125 years that this Parliament has been in existence I am not sure that anything is going to really change in the future.

One of the other things we might do is allow more issues to be voted on. This could be done by allowing individual items coming from members of Parliament to be voted on.

We have had various changes in Private Members' Business since I have been here. However, because of the system we now have, none of these changes are likely to bring substantive issues to the table. Among other things, first of all, there is the lottery system, which means our name has to be drawn to have our item even selected. Then, there is another system that decides whether that item is going to come to a vote.

I would like to suggest that one of the things we might do is consider allowing bills to be introduced at committee stage.

One of the complaints that has been made is that there are some restrictions in terms of allocated times for certain stages of the bills. I suggest that we might want to consider abolishing second reading altogether. Perhaps we could restrict it to an introduction and response on the bill by each party. Automatically the bill could be sent to committee to be studied.

At that time, we could gather the information and examine it carefully. When it comes back to the House, we could have the substantive debate. Part of the problem now is that in making a commitment or virtually deciding in advance of any study how people are going to line up on a particular bill or issue, we pre-determine how they are going to react when we get to committee. In my view, it prejudices the kind of debate or examination that might take place. We could avoid that by sending bills to committee automatically after only minimal discussion.

I have been involved in the changes made in the committee system. Some of them have been good. I have been on one of the committees which has worked as well as any of the committees of the House; that is, the finance committee. The reason it has worked well is that members have chosen to take an independent view from the government from time to time. That has been supported by all members, including the opposition members.

What has not happened in our committee or in other committees is that opposition members have not taken independent views from their party's position. As a result of that, the system has not been very balanced. That is not an argument against the parties or the individuals, it is because they have no real vested interest in doing so.

One of the reasons for that is because the position of their party has already been made known at the second reading vote. It seems to me that if we would introduce bills and have them referred to committee, they could be considered in a serious way in committee. Then they could be sent to the House.

In making that examination, we would not necessarily have the committed points of view and partisanship that goes along with it. I recognize that I have not thought out all the ramifications and how this might work, but I do acknowledge that I have been looking essentially at the United States system where by and large bills are introduced at committee stage. Once bills pass that hurdle, they then get considered by the House as a whole. It seems to me that if we were to allow both private members and the government to introduce bills, then they would have to compete for the attention and support of committee members. Those members would then decide those things that needed to be moved further along.

In a parliamentary system, a government—the cabinet and the executive—will have to move those things and decide support. That would have to be preserved. It is preserved right now. The House of Commons and the cabinet through the House can invoke closure, if you like, on a bill at committee stage and have it brought back to the House.

They have the ability even in our current system to set the priorities. What I would like to suggest is that rather than having a system of Private Members' Business where first the bills have to be drawn and then decided by a committee of Parliament which of them have priority and which get voted, in advance of that stage, bills would have to come through the committee involved. If I decided that I had a bill I wanted to present that involved labour, for example, I would have to convince the House of Commons committee on labour, employment and immigration, I believe it is called now—we change the names around here so often I have trouble keeping track—that my bill was worthy of support. In terms of thc priority of that committee and the agenda and the other things it had to do, my bill would have to compete for their attention. It would consider my bill. It might examine it; hear witnesses and decide that it could move forward. Only after that would it then compete for House of Commons time, either in a separately allocated period of time within the private members' period that we now have, or perhaps in conjunction with other bills and other time in what we currently call Government Orders.

I think this would be helpful because it would allow committees to consider matters right from the very beginning and would allow committees to decide some of their own priorities, leaving the government the ability to bring forward those items that it decided was a priority.

The other thing it would allow is items to come before committees and, perhaps, the House to be voted on by people who are really interested in it. As I tried to point out in my earlier remarks, the issue is not free votes. If every vote was officially and formally a free vote, in the past two years, chances are virtually no votes would have been different. Mine would not have been. I can think of one bill in six years as a member of Parliament that I might have opposed and voted differently from my party and the leadership.

As I have said, the reason for that is these items never get presented. If a bill is introduced by a minister and warning signals are picked up by the House leader, because that is the House leader's job, to know that this particular bill might not garner the support of virtually all members of the government, that bill simply sits on the Order Paper.

The public, of course, never sees government members voting against government bills. That is because the government does not bring a bill to be voted if there might be substantial opposition to it or danger of losing it. It then becomes the responsibility of the minister responsible for the bill to work out whatever problems there are so that at least all the government members, if not the opposition members, are satisfied.

I do not think that the number of days and hours that we sit here, more or less, is important. By changing those and changing how we allocate them to the calendar might make it more convenient for members, including me, and I am all for that. I do not think it is going to make a substantial change to the way this House does business or to the way the public perceives us. What will make a change is if we decide to have issues aired and perhaps voted that the public thinks are important.

As I said earlier, I do not think that most debates really contribute all that much to whether a bill is advanced or not. Again, in my six years as a member of Parliament, I can probably count on one hand the number of debates that were true debates and actually affected the thinking of members. The opposition parties want to keep the debate going and the government wants to respond in kind, so we present speeches, not for making arguments or changing people's minds, but to fill up the available time. We all do that and we are all guilty, including myself.

We would be far better off spending less time on time filling and more time on substantive debate on issues that people are truly interested in. In fact, that might be part of overcoming what I call the gap between the current attitude of the public that Parliament does not respond to the things they are interested in. They also believe that we are always voting for and following either our parties or our leadership or what we are told by the Prime Minister or the leader or whoever it happens to be. It is not how much time we spend in debate, or even how we vote at the moment. The issue is what gets on the agenda.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate, the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap is next, then it will be the hon. member for Portage—Interlake, and then it will be the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to speak on the proposed changes to the Standing Orders. I think that these changes are really very severe. Some have called them Draconian distortions of the parliamentary and democratic process here in the Chamber.

As has been presented many times this evening, the changes that have been presented—and there are many—by the government through the House leader are changes that are essentially going to muzzle Parliament. If the changes are brought to fruition, Parliament will essentially cease to be accountable to the Canadian people, at least as much as it is at this point. There is some concern across Canada that we are already not accountable enough.

I can see that these changes would not be the reformation of Parliament but, in fact, the deformation of Parliament. The Prime Minister's assertion that the aim of these proposed changes will be to allow the members to be more accountable and more available to their ridings really is the greatest hypocrisy. While members may, with these changes, be able to spend more time in their ridings, I think it will be a moot point since the government will not be as accountable to the concerns brought up by the people in the ridings when they talk with their member of Parliament. I will get into that in just a little while.

If the aim of the government is really to increase accountability and the democratic process, I suggest we are going about it in the wrong way. What it is going to do is increase the distrust and the anger that is already out across Canada, the anger that Canadians feel in regard to their lack of access to Canada's Parliament. If these changes are brought to bear, which undoubtedly they will because we are speaking on closure debate tonight, this government and particularly this House leader is going to become known as the Grinch who stole democracy.

The first argument in support of my concern is that the changes that the government is proposing reduces the actual sitting time of this House by some 40 days, or if we want to do it on a percentage basis, by some 25 per cent. The committees, and this has been discussed many times tonight, as they are currently structured, will certainly not meet as often. I want to point out that today was the first day in literally months when the standing committee on communications of which I am a member met, even though there have been many very important and critical issues that have happened in the whole area of communications and broadcasting. Take, for example, the situation with the CBC. Canadians right across this country have rallied against the CBC cuts and have spoken strongly about their concerns. They faced the shock of these cuts. Yet this committee has failed to meet on these very important changes that are being proposed to the CBC. If these changes are brought forward through the changes in the House Standing Orders, these committees will have even less opportunity to meet.

Under the old rules, committees meet infrequently enough. Some of them are much more active than others. Some of them are essentially completely inactive. The argument I am trying to make is that under these proposed new changes, these committees would meet even less often and would also be restricted in who could actually address the committee. The government is restricting it to what it calls those witnesses that it wants to call forward would be witnesses who would have some technical expertise.

No longer would it seem that community advocacy groups or individuals who are concerned about proposed legislative changes would have access to the standing committees as they do now. Those committees would be restricted to calling forth witnesses who would be of witnesses of technical expertise.

I think that is a very serious restriction on the public's right to voice their concerns, their opinions on the legislation that is before us, on the legislation that is being imposed by the government. Lord knows that with the technological changes facing our society, with the vast amount of legislation that is before the House, legislation which in some cases is extremely technical, and the changes very profound indeed, one has to rely upon those witnesses, both expert and lay person, who want to come forth to the committee to give their concerns, to raise their objections to the changes. I submit that with the restrictions on the committee structure, this is not going to be able to take place.

I want to reflect back to when I served for a couple of years as the member of the legislative assembly for the North Okanagan back in 1984 to 1986. During the two years that I was provincial MLA, with the government of the day under Premier Bill Bennett, the committee structure there did not work at all. I can recall being very excited about being nominated to the select standing committee on environmental issues and was very excited with the opportunities that that presented. I was literally shocked to find that the committee met only once over the two years I was there and that was to basically select a chairperson and a secretary and subsequent to that did not meet at all. As a result, there was virtually no opportunity to have a decent review of the legislation before us.

That was a very difficult situation. I suggest there was a lot of poor legislation that came through during those years simply because the public did not have access to a procedure of appeal through the committee structure to allow them to present their concerns about some of the legislation that was coming through.

I want to say that I think we are in danger through the changes that are being presented in these changes to the Standing Orders of approaching that kind of very unacceptable situation here in our federal institution.

Another argument I want to present is that I think that the changes are being proposed are an attempt by this government to seal the lips of the opposition. There is going to be a reduction in the number of opposition days, the number of days that opposition parties have to propose their topic for the agenda of the day, for their motion to be debated.

There is going to be a reduction in those days where the opposition has its own day in court, so to speak. There is going to be a reduction in the number of days of debate on the throne speech and on the budget.

The end result is really very convenient, if you look at it from the government side, I guess, a very convenient muzzling of the opposition voice in terms of the democratic process. Opposition and government members may have more time to go to their ridings, find out what their constituents think and how they are feeling. We are actually reducing the ability of the forum where those views could be aired. We are actually reducing the effectiveness of the parliamentary forum with the changes that are proposed.

I have heard a lot of comments made previously by one of the government members who resides in British Columbia about how difficult it is to get back and forth to the west coast. I certainly agree with him, as a member also from British Columbia. I am from the interior of British Columbia. My riding is in the central southern part of the province, the Okanagan—Shuswap.

It is indeed a lengthy trip back and forth between the Kelowna airport, either through Vancouver and Calgary, and then on through Toronto, or directly to Ottawa. I figured it out that on an average trip, depending on the connections, it takes B.C. members, particularly if they are having to make the jog up into the interior of the province, between nine and eleven hours to get doorstep to doorstep. There is no question that with the length of travel, some of us travel more often in a month than some of the airline pilots log. There is no hiding the fact that it is difficult indeed for most members, particularly the members from the western provinces.

As well, you are dealing with three-hour time zone changes which are pretty disruptive to the old biological time clock. I would be the first to admit that. But even with the difficulties that are imposed on the western-most representatives in this federal Parliament, I would still submit that it is a mistake for these changes to come through which reduce the parliamentary voice of opposition members in this institution through the reduction of the hours, only to give us more time back in our ridings.

I try to split my time up each month and take a week out, if I can, when I do not have duty days here in Parliament, and spend that week—and I must submit, probably most weekends also—back in the riding. There is no question, there is a lot of travel.

I think if you want to be an effective representative, despite whether your riding might be an hour away in Montreal, or nine or eleven hours away up in B.C. or the Yukon, if you do want to be an effective representative of your constituency, you can do that under the current parliamentary structure. You can continue to be effective representatives and yet still have the kind of parliamentary forum that we need in order to have an effective debate of the issues, and in order to have an effective opposition.

If you do not have an effective opposition, you have the next thing to dictatorship in this country. I think it is extremely important that the opposition voice not be muzzled by the kinds of changes that are being proposed in these changes to the parliamentary rules.

The other argument I want to submit is with respect to the reduction of speaking time. It is proposed to reduce speaking time down from 20 minutes to 10 minutes with respect to members speaking on legislation before the House.

I go back to the point I made before. Often we are dealing with legislation in this House that is extremely difficult, extremely complex, very technical. I submit that Bill C–40, the Broadcast Act, when it came through had a lot of intricate detail in that legislation. There is simply no way that a person can stand up and in 10 minutes give a detailed and thoughtful explanation as to why he or she may support or oppose the legislation, to give the details of that information and fully explain the reasons for either supporting or opposing the legislation. Ten minutes is simply not enough. I often think 20 minutes is not enough. We need more time to speak. But the rules that are being proposed take us to a reduced time allocation, and I think that is a serious mistake.

Last, the fifth point, and I think probably the most insidious changes that these changes to the rules suggest, is the government's ability to override unanimous consent. Through this, the government is trying to override a very fundamental principle of Parliament that essentially one person can make a difference.

I want to explain myself on that. I do not think one person should be able to take the decision away from the majority. That is not what I am suggesting. Regardless of whether it is a strong majority government or a minority government, one person, as a public representative, a federal representative in this Parliament, should be able to force the government to play by the rules, play by the book and use the democratic process.

The greatest irony is that by using closure, this government will in fact be able to impose those kinds of changes which muzzle the voice of the opposition, closure that has been used during the last three years no fewer than 13 times. It does not sound like a lot, 13, but when you look at it in terms of the historical precedence in Parliament, over the last two or three years the use of closure 13 times is more than half of all the times that closure was used in the House during the previous 75 years of government. In the last three years, we have used closure far more than during those previous times.

I think the people across the country are beginning to look upon the Canadian political system with a certain amount of disdain. I do not think that these changes are in the best interest of Canadians. They are certainly going to harden that feeling against Canada's parliamentary system.

When we go back and look at the history of this last Parliament, people have seen the government using closure on the free trade debate and the imposition of free trade despite the fact the country did not want it. Closure was used on the GST debate. Now, in addition to using that process of closure, these rule changes essentially allow the government to cloak its actions in secrecy; 40 fewer Question Periods, fewer opposition days, and the many other changes that are being mentioned.

I think the changes, in short, are going to turn this parliamentary system into kind of a legislative sausage factory, if you like, a kind of a legislative assembly line where really there are no inspections, no taste tests and there is no ability of the opposition to slow down or to stop dead in its tracks poor legislation or to provide the opportunity in order to make that legislation, if it is supported, better.

In concluding, forcing these kinds of changes that are proposed and proclaiming that it is so, that all members of Parliament can participate more in their riding activities, I think is ludicrous and is really hiding the fact. The fact of the matter is that the changes are being brought to bear because this government does not want to take the kind of heat that it has been taking and, quite frankly, it should be taking in bringing through the Draconian legislative measures that it has brought through in the last three years.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I would like to just enter the debate in a very brief way because I think everyone should have an opportunity to participate in what I consider to be a very historical debate in this House of Commons.

I submit that the whole world is in a change. We see the world changing, not only going from one-party systems in the East Bloc but hopefully to a multi-party system where there is a democracy as the Canadian people have known it for some 125 years. They would like to have that opportunity.

Let me tell you, I am not going to speak for more than five minutes because I do not need 20 minutes to say what I think is important in terms of how this place operates. I have a lot of respect for the last speaker, the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap. His party would like to form the government next time. If it does form the government the next time, he probably would be happy as can be with such a move as has taken place in this House.

I submit that the change this government is asking for, although I respect that it is not perfect, I think it is going to take us out of the 18th century. I follow the U.S. congressional and senatorial system on television through C-Span, through the communication devices today. With all respect to the systems that we have in place here and in England, I do not see that adversarial activity that I see in this House of Commons. There seems to be a lot of respect for each representative, a great deal more respect than we show each other in this House.

I ask myself why are they not using every kind of motion and different methods of changing legislation as we do rather than just good honest debate. That is what we should be doing. Colleagues across the way, you and I should be debating. We should not take the time for petitions. In my view, you should send the petitions up to the desk—you don't have to take time to announce them—and stand in your place and debate the legislation that is put forward.

Obviously, your position will be different. But I do not believe that we have to get at each other's ideas in the adversarial way such as I have experienced in the last six years.

We do not have to talk for 20 minutes, with all due respect, to put a point across. The committees should sit and debate positions in a manner that is not adversarial. I have not experienced that. I wonder why.

Even in this Chamber I would like to see changes. I would like to see changes to your dress, Sir. Put an ordinary suit on, like the Speaker in the U.S. Congress. That is not going to show any less respect for our institution. We do not have to dress people up in a different way. In my view, we could even go further, and I would have no difficulty with that.

But let me tell you something as I see it. I have not sat in opposition. Heaven knows, that likely could happen some day. I am not advocating that, but should the day come, because I may disagree with a piece of legislation that has been proposed by the government, I would not see myself as trying to present petitions all day to stall the debate on that legislation, or presenting dilatory motions to stop the debate on the legislation because I disagree with it. Should not that time be spent on debate?

I hear from across the way they should storm the Chair. Yes, I understand that the Tory in the past in opposition have stormed the Chair. That is nonsense. I do not agree with that. I would not be a part of such an action.

That is what has happened over the years, I believe, to the deterioration of our House of Commons, a place that is so important. We have lost respect for different people in this Chamber from time to time because of something they said. I don't think that action has been very helpful.

I must submit, as a sitting member of the government side, that I have seen wasted hours of debate in this House, wasted hours of debate by playing silly games. Maybe my five minutes is up, but my point is, with all due respect, that we have wasted hours and hours and hours of debate in this House of Commons by playing games.

Now, now, you are falling into the role again, with all due respect. We have wasted hours of debate because of a procedural wrangle.

Those 20-some hours that I believe the change adds up to would probably not have been lost to anyone. Who knows who the opposition is going to be next time? I am not conceding defeat but I am saying that the people opposite in this House today obviously hope that they are going to govern after the next election. That is their goal, there is no doubt about it. But, surely to goodness, when they are there some day—heaven forbid, some may say—we do not want to spend this time on silliness.

The House of Commons in England. I have not been there as often as some in this Chamber. In the United States Congress and Senate, there are not many times when people are able to speak for 20 minutes, because there are many more of them than there are of us. They may get to speak for five minutes and will then yield three minutes to someone else to bring their point of view across to the floor.

I am just wondering if we are not so hung up on this institution and its historical way that we should not think of changing it and making it more effective. Although this is not a perfect package and there is probably more change to come as years go by, I believe it is moving in the right direction. I think members opposite will concede that we are not still going to run the House of Commons as we did 20 or 50 years ago. Changes are taking place.

This is a vast nation to represent and I do not think anybody is upset about the time he or she has to spend in this place. But I like honest, fair debate and when the day is done the vote is taken and we go on to another issue. That is something I have lacked, but I have nothing but respect for our members opposite. I even disagree sometimes with members on our side of the House and I think that is healthy. I do not think that is totally antiquated anymore; that is our democracy and our freedom.

I believe we have moved away a little from operating this House and have created it as too adversarial. I hope the change that does come forward works more effectively for all sides of the House, albeit there may be less time in hours, but in the end I do believe in the representation we have in this House and the honour we should attribute to one another, not in the adversarial approach. Make your point, let us get on with it and take a vote on it. That is the way I see it and I believe I will support this.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have to commend the member for Portage—Interlake. There are some things he and I agree on. I think we have the same taste in what we do not like, such as so-called modern art, when you see something that looks like the side of a barn, where they ran out of one pail of paint and had to dive into another. He and I agree on that. We agree on what we should be doing with steaks. I would rather see a vibrant living picture or piece of art and I am sure you would, too; something that would reflect nature and the delicate hand of mother nature.

But I do have to say that I disagree with him saying that he would rather have something like the American congressional or Senate system, where the speaker wears a suit, the same as everyone else.

Mr. Speaker, you and your Chair are the symbol of the tradition of this House, a tradition that instils the tradition of a democratic parliamentary system, which respects the Chair and the Speaker, who is elected by the members of this House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, we are all commoners and are elected by commoners to represent them in this House and I would not want that changed. I want to state the respect in which I hold you, Mr. Speaker, the other Deputy Speakers, and the Speaker himself.

One of the things I am very concerned about is that, as I look back at the record of this government and at the number of times they have used closure, going back to 1986—1987, they have used it 35 times. Yet the member from Portage—Interlake said that every member should have a chance to speak.

When I look at the record of this House and, again, at the number of times closure has been applied by this government, the successes of the legislation, the effectiveness of the legislation, the impact of the legislation on the economy and society, and at how this government has used the application of closure, I realize that this government is becoming more and more one that governs by corporate decision and that responds more to big business than to the wishes of the people who elected its members.

The government is going to use its majority here tonight, as we near the end of this session, to bring about changes that will cut the sitting days of this House and will deprive the members of this House of an opportunity to fully represent the wishes and needs of their constituents.

As I reflect on this package of real changes and on the cut in the number of sitting days involved, and as I look back on the last two and a half years and on the fact that closure has been consistently used by this government rather than allowing each member to speak and allowing full debate, I could not help but think back to about 35 years ago next month. I want to quote from Hansard of that time:

> The first duty of Parliament is to remain a Parliament, not to become a subservient and ornamental body.
> Parliament has a right that is certainly paramount to the convenience of the Prime Minister and has the right to live. It also has the duty to defend itself and to not allow anybody to invade its rights and privileges. It is the will of Parliament, not of the government, that is the will of the nation.
> When the Prime Minister says he speaks for the whole country he is mistaking the echoes of his own words for the voice of the Canadian people. Parliament is and must remain the authorized exponent of public opinion and public will. The sovereignty of the people is delegated to the Parliament, not to the executive.
> When I say Parliament, I mean the minority as well as the majority in Parliament. However, I do make an appeal to the Prime Minister that this Parliament and this institution should be a temple of freedom, not a place where frustration becomes a means whereby rights are swept aside and where rules are misinterpreted in order to achieve a temporary advantage.

Those words accurately reflect what we are seeing here today and were uttered by the late Rt. Hon. John Diefenbaker, who became Prime Minister. After a statement such as that, I wonder what he would say if he was here today and listened to this debate and saw the further erosion of the role of the members of this institution.

Closure was applied on three agriculture bills in second reading. First of all, we had the bill on plant breeders' rights. Let me tell you, the jury is still out on that one. The opposition insisted there were far too many years of protection and of the continued corporate acquisitions that are taking place in society today, and of the takeovers. We may well rue the day when we provided the legislative foundation for a few very powerful corporate structures to control the world's food chain.

Then, of course, the government applied closure to the Advance Payments of Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. We tried to tell the government they were wrong and numerous witnesses in committee supported us in the Official Opposition, but rather than allow the adequate debate of second reading and, even worse, rather than listen to what we in the Official Opposition had to say, this government bulldozed ahead with their majority of trained seals, who actually believed their minister rather us on this side, who actually had the base of experience and knowledge of the industry.

If the members had listened to us in the Official Opposition they would not have suffered the embarrassment of having to reinstate those interest-free loans. That must have been a terrible embarrassment to them because they had to turn around and eat humble pie last fall due to the huge crop and the low prices of grain in Canada.

Not only was the government proven wrong and embarrassed, but their credibility has fallen to even further lows. Only experienced farmers can tell them what is going to happen, but perhaps it was fate itself that intervened and their embarrassment is certainly justified because of their unwarranted application of closure before all members on this side of the House had the opportunity to speak.

As if closure on the Advance Payments of Crops Act was not enough, the government applied closure again on Bill C-48, the Crop Insurance Act, when it came before this House. We again opposed it and they again invoked closure at second reading and again in committee. The witnesses all asked that the government not proceed with the legislation. Of course, that bill has now been replaced by the GRIP legislation or the safety net legislation.

That legislation has been flaunted as the greatest thing since sliced bread, but when I compare that program to the programs of the farmers in the country to the south of us I believe it will be found lacking. A safety net is slung just a little bit above the ground. It may cushion the landing somewhat, but it will not enable the farmers to survive continuing years of low prices. This is just another example of this government not listening to the Official Opposition or to the witnesses in committee.

• (2150)

We have another example: Bill C-26, the At and East legislation that eliminated the rail subsidy for grain being transported by rail into Atlantic Canada during the winter months when the St. Lawrence Seaway is closed.

Those people needed grain down there over the winter and they did not have storage in which to hold it all. This legislation was originally put in place to enable the railways to supply that grain in order to keep the Atlantic industry alive, their flour mills going, and their elevators in use.

We opposed that legislation at second reading, in committee, and at report stage. Do you know, I believe they finally realized when we reached report stage what a blunder would have resulted from this legislation. Not only were elevators and flour mills in Atlantic Canada faced with closing, but a huge loss of jobs and a traditional market for grain from western Canada would now be filled with grain from another country. What a blunder.

In fact, the elevators in the minister's own riding in Georgian Bay were demolished because of this ill-conceived legislation. The only good thing I can say about it is that the government apparently must have realized its blunder because it never brought that bill forward from Report stage for passage on third reading. I suspect the government is simply trying to avoid further embarrassment over the error of its ways. The damage was done and those elevators were demolished and it is doubtful whether they will ever be rebuilt.

Surely, if this government had listened to the opposition and had paid attention to our concerns instead of marching to the tune of the corporate elite and their idols to the south, it would not have approved the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement in its present form. The Conservatives would not be as embarrassed as they are now over the pork ruling that Carla Hills has rejected. They would have had a fairer agreement; one that would absolutely forbid the use of subsidies to steal our grain markets with export enhancement subsidies. Now they are so embarrassed that they have not been able to screw up enough courage to demand consultation, as provided for in the Free Trade Agreement, or to demand compensation for our grain producers, as provided for in that agreement, which they negotiated.

We have seen these things happen, as I have outlined here tonight. One would think that, rather than cut back on the number of sitting days, the government would have wanted to increase them in order to give the opposition more time to point out the blunders and mistakes in the legislation it has brought forward and to then amend that legislation, in keeping with the advice of the witnesses in committee and with the amendments proposed by the Official Opposition.

I am alarmed about the erosion of the role of the members of this House and of the democratic system of government that has served this nation so well since Confederation. With the problems facing this nation today, whether national unity, the economy, the millions of people who are out of work in this country, the state of affairs across rural Canada, the closing-down of our post offices, or the boarding-up of businesses in the small towns and villages across this nation, surely it is time this government should not be cutting back on the time permitted for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. Rather, we should be calling Parliament more often and it should be sitting more often to make sure the needs and aspirations of the people of this nation are adhered to.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, it is close to 10 p.m. on this Thursday, April 11. Canadian unity is in a state of crisis, our citizens are losing their jobs, agriculture is in serious difficulty, there is a 16.6 per cent unemployment rate in my riding, and the government has decided that the hottest topic for us to talk about is whether we should change our rules, to give ourselves more time off.

I wonder if the Canadians who are watching this debate tonight or who will read Hansard during the next few days will be impressed by the choice of subject of today's debate; a choice made, of course, by the government across the way.

As you and I know, Mr. Speaker, under our rules, the government brings forward the legislation we deal with. The House collectively decides how it disposes of the legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, tonight we are talking abaut amending the Standing Orders in this difficult period when we could be talking about something else. Have you noticed, that when the House sits, when Parliament is debating hot issues, important issues of the day, it is rarely advantageous to the government? This is not peculiar to the period we are now in. I think that historically, when Parliament sits, having the House and its members question the government and hold it accountable certainly does not always make them popular for doing so.

[English]

I have in hand a public opinion poll dated March 21, 1991, which speaks of the level of popularity of the various political parties. Without making a diatribe about all of them, suffice it to say that, according to that particular poll, the present government had a popularity rating of some 16 per cent according to the Gallup organization.

It is no coincidence that the people are upset with governments that choose, in difficult times such as the one we are living in, to debate this particular issue instead of all the other issues that could be on the public agenda.

I have listened with attention to the member for Selkirk—Interlake, whom, of course, I respect very much. The member for Selkirk—Interlake always has a grass-roots approach to stating matters and I agree with many things he says. Tonight, though, I will have to part with some of his statements, such as when he remarked how we should modernize our so-called institution by removing some of the traditions we have. I will use the Speaker's attire as one and perhaps the Clerks attire, the Mace, and those other objects of tradition that we have.

They are not only part of a fetish we have for conserving old museum-like ideas, but represent in our parliamentary system 1,000 years of parliamentary democracy. Every one of those objects is a part of those traditions and every time we see those objects we remind ourselves of those years during which people fought to achieve the freedom we have.

That Mace on the table represents an ancient object that was not a decoration with which to represent authority, but something with which people would arm themselves. We all know there was also a time when that object was necessary for the physical protection of the institution.

Today, that object is still necessary, not because we want to club a member over the head with it, although I suppose that, from time to time, that temptation might arise on the part of some, but to remind ourselves of the fact that the Mace stands for those years when people fought to give us the freedom we now have.

The role of the opposition and of Parliament in this type of democratic institution is to debate. It is not a luxury to debate the important issues of our country. This is not the pure legislative chamber they have in certain democracies. I will use the example of the United States. It is partly that, of course, but it is also a place where we can raise the aspirations, the feelings and express the grievances of those who sent us here.

• (2200)

You might recall, and I say this to all colleagues in the House, a couple of years ago when Patrick Watson produced the television series entitled, I believe, The Struggle for Democracy. I watched that series very closely. In one episode they dealt with the October crisis of 1970. I watched attentively the interpretation of that particular episode.

It was interesting to note that Mr. Watson, when presenting this issue, was telling us that in 1970 the democratic rights of people were removed by the invocation of the War Measures Act, that this particular action was decided by the government and adopted, according to him, very quickly by the House of Commons with little debate.

I will not get into the issue as to whether or not the action was appropriate at that time. I happened to think that it was, but that is a subject we can debate at some other time. That is not the issue I am bringing to your attention. Mr. Watson was basically transmitting the message that the opposition and Parliament as a whole had not questioned the government properly, had not held the government to account, had not opposed in such a way as to make the government justify what it was doing. For that, according to him, the opposition was to blame, not the government, because it had failed in its duty to question. That is our job, to question the government.

Similarly, Mr. Watson made the same criticism of the press. They had not held the government to account as it is necessary to preserve democracy. It is not a foreign concept, it is the same in our courts. I am not a lawyer, but we watch how our courts operate, with both sides producing the most eloquent argument that they can for the position they strongly believe in.

Mrs. McDougall: Some people better than others.

Mr. Boudria: Some people better than others, says the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Quite true, but the point is that the adversarial system in Parliament and in the courts has not exactly been wrong. As a matter of fact, I would like to think that it has been good. It has been good because we have been able, I, as an opposition member, and I speak with lots of experience because I have not sat on the government side yet—hopefully that will change soon—and other members as government members saying what they believe in. Ultimately the public reacts to our debates, the people listen to what we have to say, the media report what we have to say, editorials are formed, people's thoughts are gathered and eventually the process changes when it is not sufficiently appropriate to meet the expectations of people, or at least generally it does.

It is not perfect and, yes, there are days in which time goes by here and there is delay. I have seen a lot of that. I have seen that as an employee of this building, I have seen that as a member of this Parliament and I have seen that in my previous role as a member of a provincial legislature. But all of that process is not useless. The process is used to express the wishes and the aspirations of those who sent us here.

Governments have been known to change their minds about policies in the past. The opposition, and even government backbenchers, have raised important issues in this House repeatedly. Because people in the media have reported on those debates repeatedly, and because constituents have phoned their members of Parliament to express their opinion on what they heard, what had been said in the House and what had been reported in the media repeatedly, ultimately that has served us well.

It is a delicate balance that we have. I recognize that. Others in the past have recognized that. The rules of this House were changed some years ago, after the report of the Lefebvre committee, now Senator Lefebvre, who was a great member of this House. Senator Lefebvre chaired this committee which reported on proposed rule changes. The House decided to adopt the rules. The rules had been adopted unanimously at committee and the House decided to adopt them. They did not decide to adopt some and reject others, but they adopted the report.

In the case of the McGrath rules, again a very distinguished member—a different political party, but nevertheless a man I have a lot of respect for—presided over a committee in the mid-1980s and again, we looked at what had been proposed and agreed to unanimously by the committee. But this time the government set off on a dangerous precedent.

[Translation]

And I said so then in the House, Mr. Speaker. The government chose parts of the McGrath Report to adopt and of course left out others. Fine. I said then, Mr. Speaker, that the government today chooses parts of a report. The precedent is there. From now on, whole reports will no longer be adopted. The government will change the rules as it sees fit, because the door had been opened to it that day and today is the second step. Today, we see a whole series of changes with which the opposition members of Parliament do not agree.

[English]

Those rules, unbalanced as they are, give advantage to the government, make the government less accountable. There are fewer Question Periods in which this government can justify to the people of Canada what it does and does not do for them. If that process makes a few bills pass more quickly, well, I suppose there will be two or three people, perhaps, who say is that not great, instead of passing 12 bills in a given period of time, they have passed 13 bills in that period of time. Does that in itself better serve the people of Canada? Are they not better served by perhaps one or two bills less being passed, since 85 per cent of them are passed unchallenged anyway. One Conservative member admitted to that earlier tonight.

If some of those bills are not passed because they are wrong, because the opposition indicated as much to the government, and because the people reacted, is that not better government? Is that not better for the people who sent us here? And is that not the reason why we were sent here, to serve our constituents, not to serve ourselves, or not to say when we retire or are defeated that under our particular stewardship, more legislation had been passed than the term before by some other government whose name the people will already have forgotten anyway? Is that not why we are here?

Together with my colleagues, I do not approve of these rule changes. We do not approve of the fact that this time today, at this crucial period in our history, was utilized for no other purpose than to change the rules. The purpose of the change in the rules, of course, is to make the government less accountable. We do not think that is a proper thing to do. We will not agree to them.

Even at this late hour, I still have a very cautious little bit of optimism in me that perhaps I can convince the government to repent and to do the right thing. Let me give it one more opportunity by asking it to vote at least for the following proposition.

Therefore, I move:

That the amendment be amended by deleting the number "21" and adding after the words "proposed amendment numbered 24" the following:

"and by substituting for the words "11.00 o'clock p.m." the words "12.00 o'clock midnight" in proposed amendment numbered 21".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Chambly and have a look at the amendment.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to speak against the Standing Order changes. I would like to speak from my experience of coming here just a little over a year ago.

I came into this Parliament with the desire to serve my constituents to the best of my ability—

An hon. member: What a crock.

Mr. Edmonston: I hear the cynicism of the other side because they say: "What a crock". I do not believe that to be a crock and I do not think it is fair to myself. Neither is it fair to other members who sincerely believe they are here to represent their constituencies.

I would like to mention that I believe in this Parliament. Maybe some of the other members here on the government side do not. If we take a look at the changes to the Standing Orders, we would see that they do not believe in Parliament.

The reason we have these proposed changes is because the government wishes to shoot the messenger rather than change its practices. All we have done is brought out, as an opposition should, facts and figures showing where the government has made mistakes. No government is perfect. This one surely is not perfect.

As a reward for what we have been trying to do as good parliamentarians, where we normally have 175 days where we would have Parliament convene, we have now 134 days if these changes are passed. This will seriously affect our role in the opposition and I even think the role of government members because I believe that when the government members are sitting here in Parliament they are much more responsible to their constituents and to all Canadians.

That does not have that much to do with Question Period, because I do not believe that there are any real questions asked that often in Question Period. Perhaps the minister on the other side would agree there are not always that many answers which are forthcoming either.

There are some things that do occur during Question Period which I find to be very productive. I will give you and example, Mr. Speaker, of some of those things, as one of my colleagues would know doubt have asked me, if I heard him correctly. One of those examples is that we are able to discuss things with ministers many times behind these curtains in a much more expeditious way than sending letters or memos. Many times we have a false impression of what the government is doing without making a statement in the House. We can find out from the minister exactly what is going on and save him some trouble and save us some trouble. That is what I call democracy. I think, Mr. Speaker, you can easily say that is what is serving your constituents best.

When we reduce the sittings of the House from 175 to 134, we reduce the opportunity of people like myself, parliamentarians, to directly speak off the record with ministers who are here and resolve issues which are important to people in our riding.

I can give an example. I can mention the Minister of Transport, for example. I never brought this up in the House before now because I did not feel it was appropriate.

Much to the credit of the Minister of Transport, I contacted him during the period when the House was sitting just after Question Period and informed him of a problem that they were having at Dorval airport where some of the taxi drivers were taking pay–offs in order to get the most lucrative trips.

The minister saw to it that the system would be changed and that those taxi drivers would be put out of that dispatch service. There was no big question in the House, and there was no major brouhaha. He just competently attacked the problem, and I thank him for it.

If the House sits less frequently, these types of opportunities to bring problems and situations to the attention of the Minister of Transport or the other ministers will not come up as often. It is very difficult when we are dealing with letters, secretaries and the minister's assistant to the assistant to that assistant. It is almost a kind of jungle that we have to cut through. It is unfortunate and should not be that way if we are all parliamentarians. I find it works very well.

There are people who listen as well on the government side, not always, perhaps, but frequently enough that if we can grab them after Question Period, things work out all right.

That is particularly why I am distressed with these rule changes. We will not have as much of an opportunity as we had in the past.

I am also concerned about the committee system because I like participating in committees. The reason why I like doing that is because we have more than a one minute question that we can ask. We can foul it up, and the minister who is there can foul it up. Many times we can discover things that we would not normally discover during Question Period.

I recall just today questioning the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I found it very interesting to learn that some of the people who were participating in writing a report on decriminalizing misleading advertising came from firms that had been guilty of misleading advertising. I never knew that, and the minister never knew that. He just found that out today.

That was not done in Question Period or in a press conference. That was done in the consumer affairs committee. I enjoyed that because it was informative and it was fun.

I am trying to think back to a committee that I found particularly enlightening. We are able to have one round of about 10 minutes when we can question the minister or any witness and we can follow it up with a second round of about five minutes. We can keep some flow and some continuity.

I think that is the kind of thing that the McGrath committee wanted to maintain back in 1985. He was a Conservative, but he wrote a very good report dealing with making parliamentary members more effective.

Mr. McDermid: What do you mean: "He was a Conservative, but he wrote a good report"? What is the inference?

Mr. Edmonston: My hon. colleague asked me about the inference when I said he was a Conservative but he wrote a good report.

The fact is that I have seen very few good reports coming from this government. I have seen some, but I have seen very few. I would be willing to say that as much as there have been some good reports, most of them have not been very good.

An hon. member: You are a socialist.

Mr. Edmonston: It is not a question of socialism.

If we take a look at the committee system as it stands now, it is a pretty good system. It works very well as far as getting information out and resolving problems.

When we have the committee system as the changes propose we can only call technical witnesses. What is a technical witness? What is a technical witness supposed to do when we require information from someone such as a minister or minister's assistant, a consumer's group or a group that is responsible for helping to write a regulation, a standards making group. These people have a lot of information to give. To have a committee which can only call technical witnesses is unfortunate and it would really gut the committee system.

• (2220)

That is unfortunate as well for people who are used to being called before committees, for consumer groups that have had a chance many times to tell committees what they have learned on the barricades, as I call it, or in the real world and for people who can come before government and explain their side of a story without being called socialists or without being called partisan in any way. I think we need more of that and that we do not have that much of it in this Parliament.

In addition, we add all the activities of the past year wherein the government has not been very respectful of members' rights to dissent. With respect to closure motions, even now we will be entertaining a closure motion when it is actually being debated before the courts. It seems at the minimum to be a contempt of court action because it is presently sub judice, but we are still engaging in closure.

I do not really think that is fair. I do not think it looks good to the rest of the Canadian public because I think they would like us to be here as well as in our ridings and, when we are here, to earn our money. I do not think we will be earning our money by reducing up to 20–some per cent of the time we are here when we should be here and we are reducing that time.

I have just one final remark. The government should understand that we in the opposition are only trying to better serve our constituents. We are only trying to make this place work correctly. By protesting these rule changes we are not trying to score cheap political points. We understand that there is a majority over there with this government. It is a majority which is abusing its majority status to stifle dissent, to stifle any information that can come in from our side which could help the government and particularly to prevent independent groups from having their views presented before a committee of Parliament.

Having been here only a year and having had to work much of my time in my riding because the former member from my riding was not there that often, I appreciate the chances I have when I do come here actually to participate in all the committees and in the House.

The problem is one of what kind of participation. Should we just sit here as a government would obviously want us to do and nod our heads in agreement? We cannot do that, not when the government is wrong, but we can do that when the government is right. However, there are other more meaningful things that we should be able to do in the committees as well as in Parliament.

My minister friend on the government side pipes up occasionally whenever I try to be generous with his side. I wish he would just perhaps open his ears sometimes and understand that I am not trying to score points with him or with the government. I am just simply trying to say things as I see them and to present in a matter of fact way or in a common sense way why these rules changes are going to work against the rights of the constituents that we are supposed to represent.

I do not think that there is an urgency to pass these rule changes right now. I believe that the system is not broken. There is no need to fix it. There is no urgency. There are a great deal of other problems that Canadians are expecting us to tackle. If we were to make a list of things that our constituents would want us to deal with, I believe that probably the economy would be number one. Perhaps the Constitution would be down to number five or six. Obviously unemployment would be very high up. Yet our constituents, Canadian voters who are watching us now, are a bit mystified as to why we are talking about rules changes and democracy and what they have to do with their everyday existence.

It has to do with democracy. It has to do with their representation either directly before committees or to this government through their elected representatives, those of us on the government side as well as those of us on the opposition side.

When these people see us on television discussing something into the wee hours of the morning—because I suspect we are going to be here that long—I am embarrassed that we have to be spending that time on a subject which seems to be of such arcane interest. Really, there are better things we could do with our time.

An hon. member: We won't sleep.

Mr. Edmonston: My colleague says that we will not sleep. I do not think we will have time to sleep. We have some interesting debates coming up later on.

Why not look at the other issues before we look at changing the Standing Orders? Why do we have to deal with this right now? Surely there are enough things on our plate with which to deal without having to bore to a certain extent the viewers and listeners with what the government has imposed upon us.

We will probably have three or four more hours of debate. Then the government will just cut it off. That is very typical of this government.

They say that it is part of democracy, just as ramming through the GST, cutting off debate and cutting down the committee system. Yet, what did they do when a Conservative fellow presented a good report dealing with the committee system back in 1985? I knew Mr. McGrath personally.

An hon. member: We are improving it.

Mr. Edmonston: I do not believe they are improving it. I believe that when we have this House management committee, for example, it will actually decide which committees meet. That strikes at the very heart of the McGrath report which wanted the committees to have as much independence as possible.

I am not going to go into all the jargon of why this is wrong. Most people will see that it is wrong and that this government has had a very bad year. It is reeling from its almost single digit polling result and desperately wants to cut off dissent. Temporarily this government will be able to reduce dissent, but it will not be able to cut it off.

It is all the more surprising—I remember watching television—when the Conservative Party was storming the Chair, complaining about its rights being abused, making the bells ring, engaging in all sorts of extra-parliamentary and parliamentary opposition. It was kind of guerrilla warfare. Today, when that party is in government, the hypocrisy is that it is doing exactly what they accused the Liberals of doing for so long, and that is what I call hypocrisy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have had an opportunity to look at the amendment to the amendment and I find it in order.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am really pleased to take part in this debate. We all know the Government House Leader has tabled a motion to amend the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, after a series of fruitful discussions with members of all parties—Liberals, New Democrats and Conservatives. The series of reforms includes in particular changes to the schedule and to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons so that it can do business more expeditiously. I would like to give a few statistics about changing the parliamentary calendar.

The present parliamentary calendar provides for 175 sitting days. The average number of sitting days in 1991 is 155. The new calendar provides for 134. The calendar always provided for an average of 155 days or 881 hours a year. The new calendar provides for 134 days or 897 hours a year. I would like to mention how many days other legislatures sit. Let us take provincial and territorial governments for a period of three or four years: the Yukon Territory, 39 days; New Brunswick, 42 days; Prince Edward Island, 45 days; the Northwest Territories, 51 days; Newfoundland, 59 days; Nova Scotia, 62 days. Alberta, 73 days; Quebec, 74 days; Saskatchewan, 79 days; Ontario, 84 days; British Columbia, 89 days; Manitoba, 98 days.

I could also give some statistics for Canadians who often ask us for figures, especially my constituents. Australia, as my colleague from Laval-Est has said 77 days in 1991. The U.S. House of Representatives sat 144 days, or 814 hours, a year on average from 1961 to 1989. In the United Kingdom, they sit 170 days on average.

• (2230)

Mr. Speaker, the new schedule will enable members to divide their time better between their parliamentary obligations and their obligations to their constituents, thus meeting their constituents' desire for more direct contact with their member of Parliament.

Although the reform provides for fewer sitting days, the number of hours per day will increase.

The situation today is very different from what it was when the Standing Orders of the House were written. These days, members are asked to be in their ridings more often and on the other hand, Parliament requires more of them.

The changes made to committees respond to members' desire for a better adapted and more efficient structure of standing committees and a clearer distinction between standing and legislative committees.

The committees of the House will belong to one of five categories, each with four or five standing committees and two legislative committees. Members will thus be able to hone their knowledge in areas covered by the various committees in a given category, because the substitution rules will be more flexible.

The proposals also contain a provision to allow cameras in committee meetings with the approval of a majority of members. The government proposes that the House of Commons accept the recommendations from the Committee on Privileges and Elections regarding the process for Private Members' Business, which will enable ordinary members to present more bills and motions.

Mr. Speaker, Parliament's task is to debate issues and to make decisions and the Standing Orders of the House guide this process. They govern the proceedings of the House and establish a framework in which the government carries out its legislative program and the opposition holds it accountable. They were designed so that Parliament could do business in an orderly way and members could debate issues and make decisions by majority vote.

The modification to the Standing Orders before Parliament is the result of a year of discussions and great co-operation among the House leaders. It is the most important series of changes proposed in the modern history of the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, with the proposed schedule, the House will sit on average 134 days per year, as opposed to an average of 155 days over the past 10 years. But the members are expected to sit approximately the same number of hours during the year. The changes to the schedule will give the members, especially those from the West and the Northwest Territories as well as from Northern Quebec and Ontario, more flexibility in planning the time they can spend in their riding. Government policies and legislation are more complex and Canadians show an interest in an increasing number of issues.

While the opposition can use an attendance reporting system and not have to worry about keeping most of its members in Ottawa these changes will help all members to fulfill their obligations in Parliament and their ridings, so that both Parliament and constituents receive all the attention and services they deserve.

Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speech the hon. member for Manicouagan made today about the difficulty of serving a huge riding. The riding of Manicouagan covers 450,000 square kilometers. My riding of Abitibi covers 550,000 square kilometers, with a population of 85,000, and it is hard indeed. We spend a lot of time here, in Ottawa. As my records show, and the hon. members are welcome to check, I am often present during the week, but when the week-end comes, we leave on Friday evening, spend Saturday and Sunday working in our riding, then come back to Ottawa. We have huge ridings.

For many summer is a time for hollidays. But we Northerners head out North, in Northern Quebec, in particular in the Nunavik area, to visit the Inuits and Crees and work with them to find solutions to their problems. It is the same thing for the member for Manicouagan, because we cannot get away when the Parliament is sitting.

The opposition parties are fortunate. Both the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party had their leadership convention in the past few years. We know there is a secret pact between them. It is rumoured in town and at home. It is a "one third, one third, one third" system. We saw it in action today, during the vote. There is one political party in this House that I will not mention which had only 18 members present out of 44 tonight to vote on this important motion. However, another party opposes the rule changes and that is the Liberal Party. Today, out of 81 Liberal members, only 44 were present. Mr. Speaker, with the "one third, one third, one third" system, we notice which members are often in Ottawa. We look across the room and wonder where the members have gone. We know why that is. They spend two weeks a month in their riding, and as many as three in some instances, because they do not need to stay here, so they can travel. Now they refuse a change which would give us, the members from large ridings, the opportunity to spend a week in our ridings to meet with our constituents.

Earlier today, I heard the member for Hamilton East say that we had met, that is true, on our way to the Senate for the royal assent and that I told her that I would be happy to go and spend one week per month in my riding for a working holiday. Upon our return to the House, she forgot the word "working" and mentioned only the word "holiday". That is pure partisanship! But when she went away for the leadership convention, she was away for a long time. It was not mentioned in the House at the time, but now we can pursuant to the rules.

Mr. Speaker, it is very important that we spend one week per month in our ridings. When I go back to my riding on Friday night, 50 weeks or so every year, I often work Saturday morning and afternoon to meet with my constituents or travel up North. I sometimes drive 400 or even 800 kilometers in one day and a half during the week-end to Matagami or Lebel-sur-Quévillon. I have a huge riding.

That is why we must have the opportunity to return home because it is important. Therefore, I will vote in favour of that motion, those amendments.

There is another thing that I would like to say to you. The other day, I noticed that three opposition members, three liberal members were away on a trip to Taiwan in the middle of a budget period, when it was most critical to be here if they wanted to take the government at task for that budget. But they chose rather to accept the invitation of Taiwan Chambre of Commerce to go there, all expenses paid. In other words, during the budget debate, those three liberal members, and I would like to mention the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell most specifically, who were here today criticizing the government and saying how important it is to be in Ottawa, were absent that very week.

Mr. Speaker, I have another thing to say to you, namely that your servant the member for Abitibi and several of my colleagues from the province of Quebec want to obtain the privilege that Liberal and NDP members already have to go away one week a month. I will vote for these amendments, for the people back home, for the population of Abitibi.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in this debate for the second time this evening, especially after the speech by the hon. member for Abitibi. I must tell the House that it is the fourteenth time this government has cut off debate on government bills or motions in this House since the 1988 election.

It is absolutely horrible, Mr. Speaker, that a government can be so—what is the word?

An hon. member: Ridiculous!

Mr. Milliken: Ridiculous, yes, that is possible, ridiculous by moving this motion once again. I am sorry to hear it and after rereading the details of the closure motions that the government has brought in this House, I am proud to take the floor to denounce the government for it.

Mr. Speaker, at the end of my speech in this debate yesterday, the hon. parliamentary secretary to the Solicitor General of Canada asked a question during the period for questions and comments.

He said:

• (2240)

> I would just like to ask the member, who understands rules and procedure very well, why he chose to give us a history lesson instead of dealing with the technical difficulties he sees in the rule changes. Why would he do that when we are debating rule changes, and he does not deal with that?

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member is not here tonight. I hope that he is watching the debate on television; otherwise he may read it tomorrow in Hansard.

[English]

Perhaps I could switch to the other official language. The hon. parliamentary secretary is really going to miss something because I want to go through the details of the changes that the government has proposed to the Standing Orders. Before I do, I want to say something about the use of closure by the government.

The government has given notice of closure. It gave notice of closure yesterday and so we are debating this motion under the closure rule. As of the end of yesterday, 13 hours and 9 minutes had been spent discussing this motion. One hour and 58 minutes of the time spent on the discussion was spent by the Speaker having to read the motion out to the House. We can thank the members of the New Democratic Party for their great co-operation and brilliant tactics in forcing that rather childish episode on the House. They insisted that the Speaker read this motion instead of waiving the right, dispensing as we call it here, of the reading in order to delay the House and obstruct the proceedings of this House. They really should be hiding their heads in shame at this particular moment for that tactic. It was really childish and silly.

However, take that away and we have 11 hours of debate on this motion and the government is up on its hind legs proposing closure. The parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, who is the mastermind behind this scheme, knows perfectly well he put the deputy House leader up to it, and after a very reasonable speech, the poor hon. gentleman went off giving notice of closure in another disgraceful episode, number 14 in this Parliament. Who knows how many more times we are going see it because the government has indicated clearly that its view is that matters should be debated for a very brief time.

So we had basically 11 hours of debate on a major set of rule changes. The Minister of State for Privatization yips away over there that there was lots of consultation. Sure there was lots of consultation, but it never went to a committee. Every major rule change that we have ever had to deal with in this House is a product of a committee report and this one is not. It is the first time the House has been subjected to major changes, certainly in the last 34 years, without a major committee report.

I want to go back to 1969. I mentioned this debate the other day in the course of my speech when major changes that imposed the time allocation rules in this House were adopted. That debate went on for 12 days: July 8, 9, 10, ll, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 22 and 24, 1969. Closure was moved on the 24th. There were a total of 38 hours of debate before the debate came to an end on that particular change of rules. What a contrast.

Here we have a government which has no particular legislative agenda at the moment, is in no need to rush us out of this House and yet is just absolutely convinced that the only way it can continue to run the country is to get the members of the opposition out of Ottawa, close this place down and get us away so that it does not have to listen to the criticisms of its dreadful policies.

Mr. Ferguson: They want to avoid Question Period.

Mr. Milliken: They want to avoid Question Period, they want to avoid criticisms of their policies, they want to avoid everything.

Let me turn to the rule changes themselves. This may be a little technical and perhaps a little tedious, but I think it might be helpful, particularly to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General who was clearly very unhappy that I did not go through this the other day. So, to please him, I am happy to do so.

The first thing in the rule changes that we have opposed, and is opposed in our amendment, is the schedule that the government has suggested: three weeks on and one week off. I do not want to claim that it is always three and one; in some cases there are four weeks on and one away; fives weeks on and one away; and occasionally six. But there is clearly more time away than has been the case in the past. The number of sitting days is reduced to 134 from 175.

As members of the opposition we object to that. We feel that Parliament should be here more, not less, so that criticisms of government policies can be made, so the opposition can do its duty in calling the government to account. That is our principal objection to the policy. We acknowledge, and I think that all hon. members will acknowledge, that more time with constituents is not in itself a bad thing and, indeed, many of us are quite happy to spend time in our ridings. But we were elected to serve in this House. We feel that is our primary obligation and we are prepared to meet that obligation.

Second, the government is proposing a change in the rules relating to petitions. Instead of unlimited time for their presentation, the government has put a maximum of 15 minutes on them. I have got to point out that if you take a quick look at the statistics for the period from April 1989 to February of this year, that is almost a two-year period, the average time per day on presentation of petitions in this House was eight minutes. Yet the government was so offended by members presenting petitions, because of course the petitions were so damaging to the government and its dreadful policies, that it felt it had to put a limit on it so we could not obstruct government business. It has insisted on a 15-minute time limit on petitions. That is the change in the rules in relation to those.

Then there is the issue of quorum. The quorum of this House at 295 members is 20 and it has been 20 for years and years, in fact since 1867. The House has grown in size since 1867 but the quorum has not increased. Yet this government with 160-odd members—it has had some defections I know, people are jumping off like rats from a sinking ship—cannot maintain a quorum in this House. In fact, the government decided that what it would do is change the quorum rules so that if there is a loss of a quorum on a day, instead of losing the item of business and having to reinstate it with a vote the next day, it would simply automatically have it go on to the Order Paper. That is the rule it has proposed and which we have suggested should be excised from this package. In other words there is no particular damage done if a quorum is not here on a particular day.

The only time there has been a lack of quorum in this Parliament was one Friday, a supply day. There was a quorum call and the government pulled all its members. The government Whip thought he would pull a trick. He said: "This is an opposition day", little realizing that opposition days are devoted to government business, the business of supply. So he pulled all his members and had them stay in the lobby. They did not come in and the House was adjourned for the want of a quorum. There they were on Monday morning with no business of supply on the Order Paper, and they looked so stupid. They were clearly embarrassed. The Whip was red-faced. The government House leader was embarrassed. He had to move the business of supply again and have a vote and put it on the Order Paper. It took up about an hour of time.

I can understand why they would want to change the rule after such a humiliating experience, but it was generated by their own folly. It was an unbelievable exercise.

Mr. Boudria: It actually happened?

Mr. Milliken: It actually happened and it was their own stupidity and they blamed the opposition for that. They say: "The opposition is calling quorum on us all the time. Why should we have to keep 20 members in the House?" That is the argument they are putting forward. They have 160. Surely it is not too much to expect 20 of them to be here.

Then they have cut back on the throne speech. Eight days debate on the throne speech was too long. Since I was elected in November, 1988, we have not completed more than one throne speech. We had a throne speech in December 1988 for the short session that dealt with free trade. We debated it for a day and went on to the free trade debate and that was that. We never went back to it. The session of Parliament was prorogued. Then the second session started and we had a full eight-day debate on that. Apparently eight days was too long for this government. Their members obviously were not interested in discussing its policies because after all it is government policy that is announced in the throne speech.

An hon. member: But there wasn't much in that speech.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn says: "You can't blame them. I wouldn't want to debate the policies either. They are such a disaster".

Nevertheless, at least from their point of view, what they did was say that they want to cut that back; eight days is too long; six days will do. And so there is the rule change.

• (2250)

They did exactly the same thing with the budget, so I do not have to repeat myself; six days reduced to four. "We do not want to debate the budget too long, it is too embarrassing. The opposition is able to turn up too many problems, too many bad policies in our budgets if they are allowed to debate for six days. We will cut them back, we will cut it down to four days."

It was exactly the same thing with supply days. To have 25 supply days in a year is too many. The opposition can raise 25 embarrassing subjects; 25 embarrassing debates. The government looks stupid, the government looks incompetent, the government looks like it is blundering. They say: "We do not want that; we want to look good. So if we do not have those debates, we can introduce our own bills and discuss those instead. We will not look quite so bad". That is the attitude of the Tory government and that is what it has done. It has cut the supply days from 25 back to 20.

Then there is the closure rule. They moved closure tonight. I see the hon. member for North Vancouver, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, does not enjoy my speech. I can understand why. He must find this very embarrassing. He should have had these rules referred to his committee. Then we would have had a decent discussion and had some public input on it. Unfortunately, his government would not co-operate with him to get them referred to committee. I am sorry he was unable to achieve that.

Curtailing debate or closure. Here we have a closure rule imposed on us today under Standing Order 52. For years and years and years, I think since the 1920s, the time for the adjournment on a closure debate was one o'clock in the morning. And so we will go until 1 a.m. or very close to it, tonight. But now the government says: "Oh, no, that is too late for our members. We cannot expect them to be in the House of Commons at 1 a.m. even if we choose to impose closure". It should be an inconvenience to the House to impose such a Draconian rule as the closure rule, but not to this government. It said: "No, we will just change the rules and move the time back to 11 p.m. It is much easier to finish at 11 p.m. That will make a shorter debate, and we do not mind cutting the debate back, cutting the opposition off on its chances of chastising and condemning our disastrous policies". So the government cut it back by two hours.

The hon. member for Ottawa Centre says, quite correctly, they should blush for that, and I quite agree.

Then we have the time allocation rule. The government decide that time allocation rules are too generous. What is the rule now, for those on the other side who have forgotten? The rule is that if they cannot get agreement with the opposition, they may propose a motion to limit the time for debate. The motion is debatable for two hours and thereafter the government may allow within the motion for not less than one full day of debate.

The government has cut away the two-hour debate. That is gone. No two hours of debate to condemn the government for moving time allocation. Then the additional day can be the same day it proposed its motion In other words, it has saved itself 24 hours out of the time allocation process. It has become a more Draconian rule than it was before.

How many times has the government used time allocation in this Parliament? Eight times. Fourteen times for closure, eight times for time allocation. Twenty-two times it has cut off or curtailed debate in the course of this Parliament. It is a record. No government ever before has been this Draconian in its treatment of Parliament, this high-handed in its treatment of this House.

Then we turn to curtailment of debate on third reading of bills. What was the previous rule? The first member speaking for the government had unlimited time. The second member speaking from the opposition had unlimited time, and thereafter all members had 20 minute speeches with 10 minutes of questions and comments. What is the new rule? It is 40 minutes for the government, 40 minutes for the opposition, five hours of time with 20-minute speeches and then 10-minute speeches thereafter with no questions or comments. That is the new rule, shorter, curtailed debate. Limit the opposition, cut them off, make everything squeezed up so it happens faster. We are not going to have any protracted debates anymore on second or third reading of any government bill because this government is trying to shut the opposition up. That is the effect of its rule change.

As the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex says, it is the suppression of democracy.

Finally, we have the borrowing bill.

After cutting the budget debate from six days to four, it then proposed to limit the debate on the borrowing bill to two days. Everyone knows the borrowing bill is the government's instrument by which it borrows billions and billions of dollars from the Canadian public. It gives the government the authority to borrow this money.

Clearly, it is a bill on which members may want to speak and address the general financial policies of the government. It is considered an extension in many cases of the budget debate, but it does not have to be. It could be moved on its own.

Yet, this government has included a rule that limits debate on the borrowing bill at second reading to two days. There is no need for closure or anything. It is just two, short, ordinary days in this House.

In this pile of changes, every single one is designed for one purpose; that is, to reduce the opportunities to the opposition to participate and criticize the government in this House. I know that every change on its own is relatively minor. The parliamentary secretary knows what I am saying is true. I know he wants to agree with me, but he is reluctant.

If he agreed with me, he would be in the Prime Minister's bad books. What we have here is a situation where each of these small changes, minor perhaps in itself in each case, adds up to a significant and substantial curtailment of the rights of the members of this House, particularly those in the opposition who want to criticize the government.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General wanted a detailed explanation of the changes. I hope that the speech I have given tonight has explained those changes in detail. Each of the changes I have listed was contained in the original amendment that we proposed to the government motion. We are asking that the government consider adopting this and scrapping those particular changes.

The others, we can live with. We do not like them all, but we can live with them.

There is one other that we have offered a change on. The subamendment that has been moved tonight is on the closure rule. We are willing to compromise.

Again, I hope that the parliamentary secretary will go out into the lobby to plead with the Prime Minister to make a change in this in particular and agree to the subamendment. Instead of ending the closure debate at one o'clock in the morning, we have agreed to move it back to twelve o'clock midnight in order to help the government along and give us at least one extra hour of debate over what it is proposing.

I know that the parliamentary secretary does not mind staying up until midnight. I am sure he could convince some of his colleagues to do the same. Then, perhaps we would have at least the opportunity to get one additional hour when the government, on its own volition—and only a minister of the Crown can do this—moves closure.

It is a government initiative. If the government chooses to use closure, surely it is the one that should know it has to be here until 1 a.m. Not this government. It wants to end it at ll p.m. We are prepared to compromise. We will saw off at 12 p.m. and carry on in that way. I think it is a reasonable compromise. I hope that the parliamentary secretary will deal with his colleagues and convince them of the rightness of our thoughts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely pleased to participate in this important debate.

After 25 years in this House, I feel I have some insight into the value of the rules and the purpose of those rules in attaining the goals of Parliament.

If we are going to evaluate these proposed rule changes that are before us, we have to evaluate them alongside the traditional goals of Parliament to see if the rules are appropriate in meeting those goals.

What are the goals of Parliament that have been pretty well agreed to by experts over the years? We must remember that Parliament, as a body, is now over 700 years old. It developed in Britain and in other Commonwealth countries as time went on.

The principle purpose of Parliament is, first of all, to scrutinize legislation. I say that in recognition of the fact that most legislation—about 90 per cent—that is presented in this House is presented by the government. It is only a small percentage that is put forward by the opposition because that is the way things work.

The government controls House time. One of the most important roles of Parliament is to scrutinize the legislation of the government.

• (2300)

Another important role is to scrutinize the administration of the government, whether the government is administering this country and the legislation of this country in an efficient way, in a sensitive way, in a way that is appropriate and meets the needs of the Canadian people. That is another important role.

A third important role of Parliament is to scrutinize the spending programs of the government. There is much concern in the country today about the large deficit, the large national debt, as to whether money is being spend wisely or not. Another important role of Parliament is to scrutinize the spending programs of the government.

Fourth and probably last is the role in scrutinizing new taxation proposals. Of course we went through a lot of that last year in attempting to scrutinize the government's proposals for the new GST, goods and services tax.

How do we go about doing the scrutinizing? We do it through debate by presenting opposing views, by picking holes in the legislation, by asking the government to explain. However, and this relates to one of the changes proposed by the government, in order to properly scrutinize long complex legislation—and legislation today is often long and complex; the bill on the goods and service tax was very long and complicated—it takes time.

As I said over and over again, the debate in this House is not necessarily to convince members on the other side of our arguments. The purpose of debate in this House, especially through the use of the media and television, is to convince the Canadian people of our arguments, to make an impact on public opinion outside this House. Then the public can go back and say to the government: "Look, we know you have a big majority in Parliament, but through the debate in the House of Commons we see that there is weakness in that legislation. We see that that legislation is bad for the Canadian people. We want you to change it". Then maybe you do get changes.

We have seen changes in legislation over the years because public opinion was aroused, but you cannot bring matters to the attention of public opinion if you are only going to have a one-day debate or a two-day debate or if you use closure over and over again so that you do not really get into the subject matter of legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I must say—and you would know this because you have been here a good deal of time yourself—that very often it is only after the second or third or fourth look at a piece of complicated legislation that you see new aspects, that you see things you did not see the first time that could be very harmful to the Canadian public.

We do the scrutinizing, first of all, through debate. We do it by proposing amendments. That means we must have sufficient time to propose amendments. We do it through questions in the Question Period. We do it through questioning after the various speeches of members in this House. A good reform was brought in a couple of years ago which allowed for a 10-minute question period after each member's speech to make him accountable for the things that he said. Before we had that particular provision, members very often got away with saying all sorts of wild and silly things. Nobody could pick them up on it.

It is true that at that time we could beg the permission of the member to ask a question, but if he refused nothing could be done about it. Now it is written into the rules and that is a good thing. That is another way we hold people accountable for what they say.

We also do the scrutinizing of legislation, of administration, of spending programs and of taxes through the committee systems. In the committee system we are supposed to go into greater detail than we are able to do in this particular Chamber.

The other advantage of course that we have in the committees is that we can invite experts of all kinds to come in and comment on the legislation and can cross-examine them, and there is more informal procedure.

By this system, by these tools, we are supposed to do our job. I might say that Parliament has been able to do this more effectively when there are minority governments.

I know there are down sides on minority governments, but when we have minority governments—and on three occasions while I have been here we have had minority governments: in 1965, my first election, in 1972 and in 1979—the government is hostage to the House, has to respond to the elected representatives of the people, and cannot get away with ramming things through. They always have to get the agreement of one of the opposition parties and maybe two of the opposition parties.

In assessing these rules we cannot assume that we are always going to have majority Parliaments such as we had following the 1984 and 1988 elections; large majorities in both cases. But we have to make the rules, keeping in mind that we will also have minority Parliaments. If the political situation continues as it is today, according to the polls, we are likely to have a minority Parliament after the next election. Right now there are five parties in this country which are doing very well in the polls, and this could result in a minority Parliament.

I said there were down sides to minority Parliaments. Sometimes elected representatives of the people put pressures on the government that it does not like to have. On the other hand, it makes the government very responsive to the elected representatives of this country and every member counts, even on the government side. I was on the government side in minority Parliaments and more attention was paid to me then as a new member than much later when we had a majority, because they needed to convince me that every bill was right. They had to do that with all members of the House.

Another thing that is necessary in making Parliament effective is a proper flow of information to members of Parliament as opposed to government members. When I say "government members", I basically mean cabinet. If backbenchers on the government side and especially members of the opposition are going to properly lock horns with ministers who have huge public services to serve them in their departments—offices filled with assistants, researchers, economists, sociologists and statisticians—if we are going to properly challenge ministers, we need to have enough information on our side. That is why it is important that the committee system function properly and that we get the right experts before those committees.

It is also important that we have a properly financed and operating parliamentary library with a parliamentary research staff and that we also have enough proper staff in our offices. It means that members should have an opportunity to get back to their constituencies to talk with the people in their ridings in order to get feedback on the different proposals put forward by the government.

I referred to the goals of Parliament and the tools we need to accomplish those goals. Now let us look at the rule changes being put forward by the government to see if it will really advance those goals or not.

In the first place they will reduce the number of weeks that we sit in a year by eight weeks. Parliament will sit eight fewer weeks than we do now according to these rule changes. What does that mean? It means that we will have 40 fewer Question Periods, 40 fewer times to question the ministers, to hold them accountable, to make them answer as to why they are doing this with respect to their administration and why they are doing that, why are they spending money this way or that way. We will have 40 fewer times to question the government in Question Period.

It also means we will have less opportunity to debate bills, to put opposing views, and less time to refer matters to committee. It is true that the committees might sit when the House is not sitting, as they do now, but things have to be referred to committees.

From my experience what happens when we shorten the timetable of the House. I said I allow for the fact that we need sufficient time in our constituencies, but I think this is going too far. That particular measure to shorten the parliamentary timetable so that we sit fewer weeks does not help us accomplish the goals of Parliament.

Next, these new proposals before the House would shorten the specialized debate and shorten the budget debate. The budget debate now, according to the rules, should go for at least six days. It would shorten that to four days. The speech from the throne debate, in which we discuss the general policy of the government, would be shortened from eight to six days; again less time for members of this House.

One must remember that this is a very large country from Victoria, British Columbia, from Vancouver Island to Newfoundland, from Windsor to the Northwest Territories, and that there are problems which differ from region to region.

• (2310)

The fact that maybe 10 Liberals are able to speak and 5 NDP members are able to speak does not mean that we have a proper view with respect to legislation. Of the 10 or 15 Liberals who might speak 5 may come from Ontario, 2 from Quebec, and there may be only 1 or 2 from the outer reaches, from the Atlantic area or from the west.

Because of the kind of country we have, we need those eight days to debate the general policy of the country. We need those six days to debate the budget, which has impacts in various parts of this country and on different communities.

Also, they would reduce opposition days from 25 to 20. Let me explain for Canadians who do not quite understand. How we spend the time in this House is decided by the government. Except for the Question Period each day when we are allowed to ask questions for 45 minutes, the government decides whether it is going to call bill a, bill b or bill c. If it wants to avoid a controversial measure it can very well do so. For example, if it has found that bill a has provoked a lot of criticism in the country, it can avoid it altogether and call bill b and it can then call bill c.

The opposition, although the government consults with the opposition, has no power in determining government bills, the business debated in the House. In order to compensate for that, we have had 25 opposition days where the opposition can decide on the subject matter to be debated whether or not it is embarrassing to the government. On some of those opposition days we can demand a vote of confidence or just a vote on the subject matter of the opposition motion.

The government is going to reduce that from 25 to 20 days. Again, how does this meet the goals of Parliament as I described them? Next it will cut the length of speech time. For second and third readings of bills, after five hours the time would be cut in half, from 20 minutes to 10 minutes. Mr. Speaker, and you would know this as an experienced member of this House, there are many issues that you cannot deal with in 10 minutes.

I can recall very well, in trying to put the arguments forward with respect to the abolition of capital punishment, that there was no way that I could deal with all the arguments for that particular controversial measure and at the same time in my speech deal with the arguments raised against so that I could rebut those arguments. There is no way one can do it in 10 minutes.

I know that we have had 10-minute speeches at the end of debates for a certain time, but this is going much further. As I say, it will restrict members of the House to properly scrutinize the government's legislation, to properly scrutinize its administration, its spending program and its taxes. Again, I do not see how that change meets the goals of Parliament.

The government is also putting forward new rules that would facilitate the use of the guillotine. The guillotine is another type of closure, a way of closing off debate. I have to remind you, Mr. Speaker, and the Canadian people that this government has used closure and the guillotine more since 1984 than it has been used by all governments since Confederation. Since 1984 it has closed down debate by the use of closure and guillotine more from 1984 to this date in 1991 than was the case from 1867 to 1984.

On many occasions we only had two or three days of debate on very important bills. Then I can remember in the committee on the unemployment insurance bill, which was again a massive social change for this country, the government put closure on the length of time the committee could sit and listen to witnesses. Of course, we had to turn down many people and many groups who wanted to participate in that discussion because they were going to be hurt very much by the cutbacks to the unemployment insurance system.

As my colleagues have said, there are some positive things in these rule changes. On the whole, the purpose of these changes are to cut back the rights of Parliament, and in particular the opposition, in scrutinizing legislation. It also hurts the government backbenchers. If we sit less, we have shorter speeches. A government backbencher wants to put on the record the views of his area, of his constituency or of his region with respect to a bill, whether he comes from northern Ontario, Cape Breton, northern Saskatchewan or from a big city like Vancouver. He may not have the opportunity to do so and, if he does get the opportunity, he only has 10 minutes. It not only hurts opposition members but it also hurts government members. They will learn it because they may very well be in opposition after the next election. They will be extremely saddened by what they are trying to do tonight by the use of closure, again ramming through these rule changes.

The rules of Parliament traditionally have been developed by consensus. In this case that was not done. The rules of this place, unlike ordinary legislation because ordinary legislation can be divided along great policy lines, great philosophical lines, should be based on a consensus. It is not always easy to get unanimous agreement so it should be based on consensus.

I see that I have three minutes left. There are things that could be done which might radically change the face of this House and make it a really effective Parliament in which to do the sorts of things I referred to at the beginning of my remarks. I personally believe that if we change the rules so that a government could not fall unless there was a specific want of confidence motion or a specific motion put down by the Prime Minister that Parliament be dissolved, we would get amendments to legislation, improvements to legislation, which would be beneficial to the Canadian people.

If as members of Parliament both on the government side and on the opposition side we knew that we could sometimes defeat legislation without defeating the government, that we could amend government legislation without defeating the government, I think we would have better legislation. It would be an end to that old rule, that old tradition, that old convention we have that every time we defeat a government bill or we radically change a government bill the government must resign and seek a new election. I think the day of threat that the government has of dissolving Parliament if we do not support its legislation should be over. There should only be an election if the opposition very purposely puts a clear motion of want of confidence in the government. The government should only be able to dissolve Parliament if it puts before the House a motion to dissolve Parliament and go to the people.

It is true that if it has a majority it will easily pass that, but that is what we would be debating. For example, let me refer to the bill whereby the government decided to count as income for unemployment insurance severance pay and retirement income, which a lot of members on that side did not like as well. I can remember the member for Annapolis Royal and other members opposed the legislation. We would have been able to amend that legislation and make it better legislation. I think it would have been better for the government in the long run. The former Minister of Employment and Immigration lost her seat in Kingston basically because of that particular legislation. There were a lot of former public servants, members of the RCMP, of the correctional service and so on, who just did not like that legislation.

There are many things that could be done. For example, with respect to the length of speeches, if we had a rule somewhat similar to that of the United States where at the end of your time—and let us say the time is 20 minutes as it is now—you had not finished your speech, you would be able to table a paragraph on the record to complete the speech. I think that would be very helpful.

I see that my time is up. Let me simply conclude by saying that most of these rule changes that are being proposed to this House will not help Parliament do the job that it is supposed to do for the Canadian people. This package of rules changes is just another knife in the back of democracy.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to be speaking on this motion in this debate. Within a couple of hours it is going to be arbitrarily passed, because of course of the motion of closure. This may very well mark one of the last 20-minute speeches that many of us will be making in this Parliament, including myself, as this legislation goes through.

There have been all kinds of references to the rules in this House, references to some of the more minor ones, references to some of them which are more profound.

I had a very interesting experience with some of the rules of the House in the wee small hours of the morning during the debate on the gulf war. I will get to that in a minute. I committed a breach, within a very short period of time, of two rules of this House which the present Clerk reminded me of at the time, and I thank him very much for that. Actually, if you break the rules once you get a warning, if you do it twice, there is a penalty. I will not go into a description of what the penalties are, but if anyone cares to ask me—if anybody is watching on television, as I am sure they are, they were certainly watching at 3.30 in the morning in the middle of January—what the penalties are I will be only too pleased to let them know.

On the surface of it, it would seem that those two rules were rather trivial and yet, if one looks at what they represent in this House, they are very profound as well. The first rule I broke was to walk down the aisle between what was, at that time, Madam Speaker and the person who was speaking. I was reminded by Mr. Marleau of having broken a rule and I was not aware of it. After he mentioned it to me I was.

I was speaking to one of the Clerks at the table and the Clerk on the other side had the information which I was seeking. So I walked around to the other side of the table and I broke the second rule which was to walk between the Speaker and the Mace. There is a penalty for that too, although the first time is a warning. It seems rather trivial, but I think they are both the epitome of what this House is all about and why we have rules at all.

In the first case, I was extremely impolite. I had walked between the person who was speaking and you, Mr. Speaker, the symbol of authority in this House. In the second case, I walked between what is your symbol of authority and yourself. Both represent something which is of long tradition and which I really do believe sort of summarizes what this place is all about: civility, tradition and respect; respect for ourselves, respect for the job we have, respect for the House, respect for the people whom we represent and respect for the country of which we are all a part.

Of course, there is a reason for those rules beyond the respect for everything I have just mentioned. There is not an organization in the civilized world and certainly the parliamentary procedures, the general rules which we are talking about, whether they apply to your local hockey association or your local Rotary Club or the House of Parliament or what, do have such a civilizing and modifying affect on our behaviour. In a general sense, without going too far beyond, I guess the present context of this House, which is the British parliamentary system, many of the rules which we have adopted are part of tradition.

But what on earth is wrong with tradition? Someone mentioned that they thought it would be better if Mr. Speaker were to be wearing a suit as they do in the United States. Mr. Speaker, there are reasons why you wear what you wear and, without going into it, I think if anyone cares to realize what that is and the authority that it represents that is fine too.

The basic assumption of all these things, whether it is in your local hockey club or in the House of Parliament, is that the majority shall rule and, within this House, we certainly recognize that those on the other side of the House have the majority. However, absolutely essential within that concept is also the necessity that the minority be heard. That is the bearing on which these rules have so much importance.

The rules of the House have evolved in this House and elsewhere to protect the rights of the minorities. It means that in the case of the opposition in the House of Commons, the rules have evolved, although I would suggest in the first four years of this government some extremely good changes were made. The McGrath commission made its report and some very good changes were made which made it much more possible for the minority, for the opposition in this House to be able to be heard.

I would suggest that if the major proclivities of the present government had been in effect at that time, there certainly would not have been those kinds of rule changes. A good proportion of what we are talking about right now is an attempt by this very same government to revert to the days before the McGrath commission, to take back some of the ability the opposition has, some of the ability which the minority in this country has to be able to express themselves and to be able to function in the manner which the tradition of the British parliamentary system has dictated the opposition should be able to do in order to protect the minorities within the country.

Probably one of the most significant things that has been said in this debate in so far as why the government would possibly want to make these changes came from some member opposite who said that it really was a shame that during Question Period it was primarily the opposition which was able to exercise any kind of activity during Question Period, that really it was an infringement upon the rights of the backbenchers of the government side, not to be able to get involved in Question Period.

That too is part of tradition. Question Period is not for the government. Question Period is not to give government backbenchers an opportunity to get involved. Question Period is an extremely valuable tradition which probably, on the basis of the proclivities of this present government, would never have been instituted in the British parliamentary system if all governments had thought this way. Sometimes, I guess, if you were on the government side, and even sometimes I wonder when I am on this side, how on earth the parliamentary system ever evolved to the point where there was a Question Period.

What it signifies is that over time, through tradition, those who cared about the rights of people, those who cared about the rights of minorities, generously decided that yes, indeed, they would give the opposition the ability to be able to question the government. Certainly the parliaments of the world are far richer for that evolution having taken place and for that ability to have come about.

The very fact that someone in the government on the opposite side would even suggest—I do not know whether they are a member of the cabinet or not—that the backbencher should be able to be far more involved with Question Period, I think is symptomatic of how this government would really like to be able to throttle the opposition. It would like to control it and it would like to be able to cut it down.

In an attempt to do that, in addition to all the things it has have done since 1988 when I came to this House and of which we are all aware, it has used closure many times. In almost every instance, it has used closure so it is certainly no surprise that in ending this debate, it would be bringing in closure.

The very idea that the government would even have done that is so much in opposition to what this whole parliamentary system is about, that it should have brought in closure as many times as it did; that it would even suggest that there should be less of an ability of the opposition to debate things as they are now, which it is certainly doing within this legislation, is just something that I cannot understand. A government which five or six years ago brought in rather exemplary changes is now bringing in these kinds of changes.

This government, when in opposition, was able to ring the bells, holding up this House for 14 days over something with which it disagreed. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and I will not speak for anyone but the New Democratic Party, but I suspect there may be other parties in this House who at the time of the introduction of free trade, of the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, of the GST, would probably on all those occasions and even more have willingly rung the bells for 14 days had we had the opportunity. But once these people got into power, ringing the bells for 14 days, holding the House up for 14 days for what they thought at the time was a good cause, and certainly what we would have thought was a good cause, was not something they allowed the opposition any more.

The longest the opposition can ring bells now is for 30 minutes at any one particular time. That too gives us a comparison of how well the previous governments, how judiciously they viewed the ability of the opposition to function compared to what this government does. It is not any surprise that they have done this.

Some of the changes which they are proposing are changes to the calendar, where ostensibly we will be sitting for three weeks and having one week off. I am not convinced, in spite of all the arguments from the other side of the House that if these rule changes are brought in and that is one of them, that that is the way this House will conduct itself. At the present time we have a calendar. I do not know how long that particular calendar has been in effect in this House, but we have one. We are all aware of it. I do not think there has been any six-month period since I have been here when we have adhered to the calendar.

In 1987, at a time when presumably there was a similar calendar in effect, the government called the House back in emergency session to deal with an immigration problem in August. The House sat continuously until September 1988, in spite of what the calendar said.

I have a suspicion that in spite of all the fine arguments made on the other side of the House that this House at times will be sitting more than three weeks and may very well, despite the calendar, be away from this House for more than one week at a time.

Other changes being brought in are adjustments to business within the days of the calendar. There is a suggestion that the presentation of petitions will be limited to 15 minutes a day.

Previously someone else pointed out that on average the length of time taken for petitions has only been eight minutes a day anyway. I guess that is one change of which we probably ought to be glad and something of which we should be only too willing to take advantage. There are times, when presenting petitions from my constituents, I felt I really would like to be a little more explicit about their concerns. I am sure that the expansion of the length of time for presenting petitions to 15 minutes from the average eight is something that will be very welcome.

Many previous speakers have referred to the restructuring of the committee system. It is, again, just part of the government's methods of being able to limit the ability of the opposition and of the minority to function as well as they have been operating up to this time, particularly since the implementation of the McGrath commission, with those changes having been made and the ability of the committees to function having been expanded by the government in a previous session of this Parliament. I suppose they are now backing off on that expansion.

I suppose the government members find that, in spite of the fact they thought it was helpful for the Canadian public to be able to function in a more democratic way, they themselves find it is not all that effective for them. I am sure it is an embarrassment for them when the committees do their work well. I was, myself, a member of one of the committees where that happened. When these changes go through that is something that will certainly not be able to occur as well within this House any longer.

There is a suggestion that only technical witnesses will be able to be heard. If we have a committee that is looking into the social problems of this land does that change mean that someone who is poor and who, I would suggest, would probably be one of the more technical witnesses a committee could possibly hear from, would be excluded because he or she is not a social worker?

Does this change mean that, if a committee were to examine a subject that concerned labour, they would not be able to bring a working person to the committee so that the members would be able to hear them? I would suggest that someone who is a working person and whose daily life is being affected by changes within the Commons ought to be heard by a committee and not only by the Minister of Labour or the Deputy Minister within the department.

There has been a suggestion that one of the only ways in which the Canadian public will be able to get their views across will probably be through the Senate committees because so far, at least, the government has not gone to the extent of limiting the ability of Senate committees to be able to hear witnesses and operate in a much freer way.

I am also told that the new system, which is certainly going to be passed here, will require fewer meeting rooms. I would suggest that perhaps, Mr. Speaker, through your good graces, you would put pressure on the government to re-establish the Reading Room, also part of the tradition of this House, presumably with fewer rooms being required. Perhaps the Reading Room could be restored to its original splendour.

I have already referred to reduced speaking time. This may be the last 20-minute speech that I will be able to give in this House for a considerable amount of time. It is worthwhile mentioning that, because I can remember that, when I was working on the legislation that changed the unemployment insurance, I had the opportunity to speak for 40 minutes on one occasion.

That sounds like a long time, but even that was an insufficient amount of time to be able to get the concerns of the people I was representing across the House to the government; namely, those who were going to become unemployed and those who find themselves restricted as far as employment is concerned. Certainly, the reduced amount of time is not going to be able to give the members an opportunity to represent themselves.

In conclusion, I see that my time is almost running out. The rule changes are not going to cure what is wrong with this House, which began in 1984 with this present government.

If the government really wants some changes in this House, let it listen to the people, as it has not done on almost every occasion. Listen to the people. The opposition will not have to be as strident or insistent in its work and this place will run much better.

• (2340)

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. member: I like your tie.

Mr. Harb You like it, eh? Made in Canada. The hon. member likes my tie and I am willing to take it off right now and pass it on to him if he can convince his colleagues to retract their initiative in terms of the House sitting arrangement.

I stand to state my opposition to the government proposition to reduce the number of days we are sitting in the House for quite a few reasons.

First, I find it somewhat outrageous at a time when we have all those very different types of issues before us as a country, as a nation, that we are cutting down on the number of days we are spending here in order to do very important business for our country.

If we are to compare ourselves to the private sector, for example, any corporation, in the private sector, and if management is to make such a proposition, I can assure you that in that time that company will be out of business.

The difference between us and any private sector company, of course, is there is no one really out there to measure the productivity of the House between elections. There are the people at large or the shareholders of the country who can measure our productivity around election time.

If the government is running out of subject matter, I might suggest a few tonight that the government can look at. It looked like it had run out of propositions, out of legislation and that is why it wants to cut down on the number of days.

I might suggest, for instance, for the government to look at the economy instance, and look at the possibilities of commitment to full employment at a time when we have over 1.6 million people who are unemployed. Look at the question of the high number of bankruptcies in our society. If we look at the western world and western nations, we are ranking pretty high out there. Look at some sort of an incentive encouragement to small business whereby we can encourage small employment and we can help small business to survive this tough economic time.

There are other questions such as the environment where the government can spend and continue with some sort of a commitment to deal with the issue of the environment, help clean up our rivers, our lakes and also to an extent the harbours in Atlantic Canada.

There is also the question that deals with national unity at a time when we are seeing the debate raging from coast to coast. I think it is only fair for us as parliamentarians to sit here and debate this issue seriously.

There is also the question of our social programs and the maintenance of our social programs. The latest statistic shows there are between 130,000 to 250,000 people who are homeless, who do not have homes. Finding a solution to that is only fair and it is something that the government should take very seriously and deal with it.

There is subject matter such as education and literacy at a time where we have high illiteracy rates, approximately 38 per cent according to the latest statistics, and the drop-out rate when it comes to our youth is approximately about 30 per cent which means, in other words, in our society nowadays for every 100 students who enter school, approximately 30 of those who drop out before the age of 18. That to me is a priority. It is a priority for our society and should be a priority for our House and for our government.

If my colleagues across tell me: "Well, we are running out of subject matter to deal with", these are a very few and I am sure if they are to provide the opposition parties with the time necessary, we can, in fact, help them out even to draft legislation to deal with those issues.

The reason why we want to reduce the time that we are sitting here to allow MPs to go back to their constituents and meet with them, I think, is a legitimate one, and I would have loved to have spent 100 per cent of my time with my constituents. But the fact of the matter is that we were elected to perform our duties inside of the House and also as well outside the House with our constituents.

Certainly there is a need to find some sort of a balance. There is no question about it. That is why we have constituency offices and capable staff in our constituency offices who can be our representatives at the constituency level. Of course some of my colleagues will say there is no substitute for a good MP. There is no doubt in my mind that might be right to a large extent, but people understand that we have a very important job to do here, and they expect us to be here.

I am also quite unhappy about the way it was handled. As my colleague mentioned a little earlier, the House is going to be limited to a maximum of 15 minutes a day to introduce petitions. To use the GST as an example, if we were to introduce all those petitions at once in the House of Commons it probably would have taken us quite a few days. My understanding is that in excess of 200,000 Canadians from all across the country signed petitions against the GST. They want the government to know about their views, and they expect their member of Parliament to present those petitions. I believe it is only fair to allow a member of Parliament enough time to introduce those petitions in the House.

As my colleague indicated, the average time it took in the past couple of years was approximately eight minutes. The time allocation of 15 minutes perhaps might not be a bad idea, but as an over-all arrangement I am against it because I do not think we should put a time limit on voicing the concerns of our constituents.

I could go on and state why the House should not be off for one week every four weeks. I basically get paid in order to serve my constituents. I would suggest my constituents and all of our constituents expect us to spend time in the House.

I truly believe that three years from now, when the Liberals form the government, my colleagues on the other side of the House will perhaps come back to haunt us by telling us: "We told you so". I am willing to take the risk and say: "Yes, but there is a price for democracy". I truly believe that it is the wrong thing for the government to do at a time when perhaps we should look at every free bit of time to deal with the issues of the economy, the Constitution, the environment, education, illiteracy and so on.

After I have gone through this presentation, I hope my colleagues across the way will have a little meeting with the House leader and the Whip and come back here just before twelve o'clock and reverse their decision. Then we will go home happily.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The first question is on the amendment to the amendment standing in the name of Mr. Boudria. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

In accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 57, at this time it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

Pursuant to agreement announced by the Speaker on Wednesday, April 10, 1991, the Chair will now put the question separately on three groupings of the main motion.

Accordingly, the question is on the first grouping. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the proposal relating to Private Members' Business, namely those numbered 38 through 45 and 60 through 64?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

First grouping agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on the second grouping. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the proposals related to committees, namely, those numbered 46 through 59?

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that there is unanimous consent to apply in reverse the result of the first vote to the third and fourth votes.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I agree to apply the result of the vote in reverse.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the Whip of the Official Opposition mixed up the first and second vote that we took. Perhaps we could assume he was indicating that the preceding standing vote taken by the House would apply in reverse to the remaining motions, the one dealing with committees and the one dealing with everything else.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That was my understanding. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The House divided on the second grouping, which was agreed to on the following division:

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPRING ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order, when the House adjourns on the day of adoption of this motion, it stand adjourned until a time and a day to be set by the call of the Chair;

That, during such adjournment, the provisions of Standing Order 28(3) respecting recall of the House shall continue to apply; and

That, at any time during such adjournment, the Speaker may recall the House for the sole purpose of granting Royal Assent to any bill or bills, after which the House shall stand adjourned in accordance with this Order.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this debate, a debate which I think many members of the House have been looking forward to for some time.

I say that because this particular session has been a long one. It has been one of tremendous interest. Some of the issues we have discussed have probably been some of the most important issues that parliamentarians have had the opportunity to discuss and debate in many a year. In the last couple of years I have seen issues that have been very difficult, very divisive, and have created tremendous interest and debate across the country.

Yet, having said that, we have come now to this adjournment debate with good spirit in the House of Commons. I am thinking of the debate that has occurred this last week. I would like to refer particularly to a column, in The Ottawa Sun today, by Douglas Fisher, where he talks about the debates that have occurred in this House over the past few days on the rule changes of Parliament.

• (1010)

He writes that this was not a debate for the so–called stars, this was a debate for the backbenchers. It was the backbenchers who very much led the way on this debate. It has been the backbenchers who expressed, often very eloquently, their dreams and aspirations for this institution, their concerns about how we as parliamentarians and this institution are viewed across the country.

Some of the interventions during this debate of the last few days have probably been some of the most interesting and thoughtful debates that I have seen in some time.

I want to come back to that in a few moments, but first I would like to give a thumbnail sketch of some of the bills that we have discussed in this particular Parliament.

Over the last couple of years, if my calculations are right, we have dealt with some 77 pieces of legislation from first and second reading, committee stage, report to third reading. We have dealt with a number of really important issues. It has been a very exciting parliamentary session.

I think back to the question of abortion, Bill C–43. It was an issue of great struggle for the members in this House. It was an issue of conscience which people on both sides of the issue have very strong feelings about. We saw the House struggle with that. We saw the issue passed in the House by a very close vote and then defeated in the Senate.

It is that kind of issue that, in many ways, has personified the type of Parliament and session that we all have had the "privilege" to participate in. It is that kind of issue that has forced us not to see ourselves purely as partisans or as "participants in a sausage factory", a term that was used in the last few days debate.

We have been called, as parliamentarians, to look at some very difficult issues and determine where we individually stand, with the kind of perception and ideals we want to bring to our country. We have seen it in other debates. The question of Meech Lake was an issue this last couple of years.

Madam Speaker, you and I have very interesting perspectives, with you are a member from Quebec and I, a member from Alberta: one from the west and one from central Canada. We are faced with an issue that gets to the very core of our thoughts, ideas and dreams that we have for our country.

We saw the tremendous interest, the tension and the fascination that centred on that debate. Like you, Madam Speaker, I watched some of the meetings that were held on that issue. We can remember in particular the conference with the Prime Minister and the first ministers. We saw the dynamics that were alive there, and of course, saw its ultimate failure which has, once again, brought our country to a very important crossroads.

Maybe the last couple of years and some of the issues that we faced, discussed, thought about and struggled with have been a preparation for the debates that are going to occur in the near future.

The next issue we look at, as everyone knows, is going to be the whole question of the unity of our country, and the type of country that we want to pass on to our children and grandchildren. We heard the quip making the rounds: We now have new fathers and mothers of Confederation.

I think the last two years, as we have struggled with so many different issues, as we have tried to grasp such fundamental questions, have possibly prepared us for what is to come. There have been so many bills that we dealt with that pushed us, prodded us, and made us very conscious of our roles. I know that this preparation has been good for me personally. It forced me to think about my role as a parliamentarian, not as someone who is here to occasionally intervene in a debate or to rise from time to time and vote with my party, but, rather, I have been forced to examine my ideals, my dreams, my thoughts on so many different issues that have been before the House and before the country.

As a result of that I have been able examine myself as a parliamentarian and to prepare myself for what is coming over the next little while.

For me, one of the highlights of this whole Parliament is the one that I started talking about in the early part of my remarks, the rules package that we put before this House of Commons. I was a member of the McGrath task force, and before that the Lefebvre committee which dealt with the early stages of reform and I think set the stage or the groundwork for the McGrath task force.

I have had a particular interest in reform, and as Doug Fisher wrote in his column, I am one of those who have dreams and aspirations. I like the way he put it, and I hope I can find it in his column. He refers to members arriving in the House, and soon after developing an interest in the institution, developing some very strong attitudes about the kind of reforms that should be put in place. I was no exception to that. I was very fortunate to have been on the Lefebvre committee and then the McGrath committee. In both of those cases, we had an opportunity to look at this institution, to suggest often radical and very imaginative changes, and not only to suggest them, but to have an opportunity to spend time analyzing in detail the implications of those changes.

It was particularly interesting to go through that process, to see the McGrath task force complete its work in what is probably one of the best examples of members setting aside their partisan differences to work on a report they hoped would be adopted by the House of Commons.

In this debate on the largest reform package since McGrath, there were two speeches in particular that I want to refer to. I want to refer to the comments of the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley—which used to be Surrey—White Rock—Delta, and the speech given by the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, which was originally Winnipeg—Birds Hill. I refer to those two particular members because they did something I could identify with, and that was very simple, they served with me on the McGrath task force.

They carried into this debate some of the same perspectives and concerns that I did and so I listened closely to them. I said to the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona after his remarks that when listening to him I had a flash of what I had hoped Parliament could become.

I saw an opportunity for us to have some real excitement. What I envisioned at that point was that we could enter into a dialogue, not where he might give a 20–minute speech and I might give a 20–minute speech and another member might give a 20–minute speech, but that we could actually stand here in this Chamber and discuss back and forth, point for point, our concerns, hopes and aspirations for a particular Standing Order and the implications it might have for this Chamber.

The closest we can come to that would be in committee of the whole. That is about as close as we can come in this institution to a really dynamic, one–on–one debate, that is short, not wrapped up in speech but in dialogue.

I saw that in his debate. I felt it could well have turned into a dialogue that I know the country would have liked to watch. The country would have been impressed to see that parliamentarians on opposite sides of the House with very different philosophical roots and very strong partisan differences could suddenly set aside those differences, philosophical or partisan, and say: "This is what I want for this institution".

The particular interest that the member for Winnipeg Transcona and I have is the whole area of committees because both of us very much supported that part of the McGrath task force and I think both of us believe that committees can be the real driving force of this institution.

We wanted to see and we still want to see committees having a strong influence on legislation, and also on policy. We dream of the day when committees will actually play a part in the drafting of legislation, by way of pre–study. The member for Winnipeg Transcona, I think, came to the House in 1979, a year before I was, and I know he has the same confidence that I have in members of Parliament.

We believe that if members of Parliament are given an opportunity to look at an issue, to talk to their constituents and to other Canadians, we are going to see some top quality laws and policy directions or guidelines for our country.

The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona in his remarks looked very carefully at this particular package that was before us as it related to committees. He quite rightly went through it with a very critical eye.

I told him after his remarks, or in fact I think it was before them, that when I sat down and did some of the initial drafting of committee reform, I had imagined him looking over my shoulder. If there was going to be one person who was going to be critical of that area, it would be the honourable member for Winnipeg Transcona. I knew he would look very carefully at the committees because he had a lot of confidence in what the McGrath task force had suggested. He had some concerns, but he did not want to in any way destroy the spirit of what had been established by that task force.

It was for me a fascinating experience to listen to his remarks. It renewed for me something that I needed to have renewed and that is a confidence in the people in this House and a confidence in this institution.

Now, at the end of the day, if we were to sit down and say: "Here are the issues, what do you agree on?", there may not be an awful lot. In some ways that is not as important as the fact that two members with such different approaches and positions can come together and look at an issue that is so important to us.

The other element that Doug Fisher mentioned in his column is in the headline: "It was a candid, sad debate". The sadness he refers to, and I have talked about the candidness he makes reference to being the quality of the speeches that were given on all sides of the House.

The sadness that Doug Fisher expresses is that the debate itself received so little media attention. This is understandable. The nature of the debate is technical and its scope narrow. It concerns, theoretically, only this House. But in fact, that is not the case. The rules under which we operate and the tone we set and establish in this place very much impact on the country, directly through legislation, but even more so indirectly, in terms of the flavour and tone of our debates and the perception that we send to the nation, whether it be through television or through reports of what goes on in this institution.

I agree with Doug Fisher. What we were faced with was a situation that really should have had the press gallery full. We should have had the people who cover this institution sitting up there, watching the heartfelt debate that was going on. If there is one thing that Canadians need to see, it is MPs at their best. Unfortunately, they so often see us at our worst, because 99 per cent of what is covered in this institution is Question Period.

All members know that 90 per cent of Question Period or maybe more is show. It is the theatre. It is the place where we get up and take shots at each other, but few expect anything constructive to really come out of that hour. Yet, it is the entire focus of the Canadian public. The entire focus is on those 45 minutes of this House of Commons.

There is very little coverage of the work in committees. There is very little coverage of debates. There is precious little coverage of bills that pass through this place unanimously.

I have a regular experience in my riding when I go back and talk to my constituents and I, like other members, am criticized for our behaviour in the House. They may say to me: "Albert, we do not mean you, but the others". Well, the truth is that they mean me too. I am just as guilty as anybody else of tirades in the House, my hurled insults across the aisle. I am no saint. I am like everybody else.

People look at that and say: "Why do you not ever agree on anything". And I tell them that we do, regularly. There is probably not a week that goes by that we as a House do not agree unanimously on something. It may be to pass a bill at a particular stage or a motion. It may be to take an issue and refer it to a committee of this House for study. There are any number of things that we do unanimously. But of course because we do them unanimously, there is no tension, no confrontation. Therefore, there is no news.

I think it is really unfortunate, at a time when this country says to all of us: "We are looking for leadership".

• (1030)

I do not think by that they strictly mean the leaders of the parties. They want leadership from the hon. member for Edmonton, from me for Peace River, from Vancouver. They want leadership from individual MPs. They want us to be an example.

My point is that there is leadership in this House. It is not leadership restricted to a particular side of the aisle. There is leadership on all sides of this House. We saw that demonstrated in the debates of the last few days. We saw members expressing themselves eloquently, passionately, and thoughtfully.

I think if Canadians are given an opportunity to see that, then their confidence in Parliament will increase. The confidence of Canadians in their individual members will rise and then we will be in a position to go into the all-important debate of the coming few months with some of the credibility that all of us need.

When Doug Fisher wrote his column, he wrote it as a person who watches Parliament, an individual who served in this House for a number of years, and since then has dedicated his life to watching and reporting it. His perspective as such I think has always been a little unique because he is someone who has been here. He knows the turmoils, the tensions, and the greatness of the institution. That is why his particular column reflects so well the reality that we are facing today.

We have come as parliamentarians through a couple of years of tremendous issues, tremendous tension, tremendous soul-searching and yet I think we end on a high note. We end on a note that is serious, thoughtful and demonstrates the kind of leadership that Canadians want to see.

I want to look in particular at a couple of the reforms in this package that did not get discussed a great deal. I want to look for a moment at the question of pairing. In the British House there has always been a system of pairing. In the Canadian House we had a system of pairing. It was informal but it was practised for years and years and years.

Then, I think it was shortly before I arrived in 1980, pairing broke down in the House of Commons. Those pairing relationships were destroyed. As a result, I think the House lost something very important. It was not so much that individual members can be paired, but it was an acknowledgement of the value and the importance of individual members.

How do you get that from pairing? I think it is this way. Let us take an issue or bill that I am particularly interested in, a bill that I may have worked on for years, that I may have been pushing through with all of the influence I have to make it a reality. Then, through some accident, through some quirk, I am unable to attend the vote. I could be sick. I could be caught by a snow storm in my riding 4,000 miles from here. There are any number of reasons that I may not be able to be in this institution at the time of the vote.

If there is a system of pairing, an hon. member on the other side of the House would agree to cover for me. He or she would rise in the House and say: "The hon. member for Peace River was not here and I agreed to pair with him".

Therefore, I have an opportunity, even in my absence, to express my position on the bill. The hon. member in rising will say I would have voted with my party but, because I paired with the hon. member who would have voted for it. We would have put it back to where it would have been had we both been here.

The importance of that is that it gives credibility to members. It is a recognition that what we are doing in here has partisan implications, is often partisan driven, but nevertheless it is an acknowledgement that I, in my absence, am still important.

In this particular package we agreed to a new pairing process. I do not know how much it is going to be used. I have no idea if it is going to be used regularly or very infrequently. That is unimportant. What is important is that we once again acknowledge that individual members' votes are important. They have a right to have those expressions placed on the record. Even if they are prevented, for reasons of health or weather or whatever we face in this huge country that we live in, those expressions are still there.

I think what it does do is express a relationship. It is an expression of equality. It is an expression that we, on both sides of this House, attach a value to one another's participation, one another's voting, and one another's importance in the institution.

There was an article in the Ottawa Citizen on March 8, 1991, and it refers to the whole question that I have been talking about this morning, the question of credibility of the institution and of individual members.

The headline said: "Reforms may aid credibility." I just want to quote three paragraphs from this particular article, and this is not a personal reference:

> In short, our elected leaders are making Parliament irrelevant. Thus, it is difficult to understand all the opposition politicians' complaints and moans about the common rules changes recently introduced by government House leader Harvie Andre. These reforms would do more to restore some credibility to the House and its occupants, than another roving committee of so-called great Canadians could.

In other words, this article is saying that the rules by which we govern ourselves are important. They do have an impact on how Canadians see us. We, as parliamentarians have been making Parliament irrelevant. I think it is unfortunate that is the kind of article that is written. Yet in fact, I think we would have to agree that it accurately reflects the feeling and attitude of a lot of our constituents.

We have to approach motions like these rule changes with sincerity and with honesty. We need to work together to make those reforms affect the House and the institution and our behaviour in a way that I think will help us re-establish our credibility.

We saw at the beginning of the debate some very strong statements about the rule changes. We saw very strong descriptive words being used, and yet in the end, after six days of debate, we saw a change in tone. Last night when we voted, and even before we voted, there were two things that happened which are significant.

Early yesterday afternoon, this House unanimously approved a House order that would allow us as a Parliament to adjourn today at 2 p.m.

• (1040)

We all agreed to that House order. It was passed through this House and as a result today we have a debate on the adjournment motion but we know at two o'clock that on division it is going to be passed.

I think that demonstrates what we as parliamentarians are trying to do together.

Second, there was a lot of controversy about what was going to happen to the votes. Yet if we look at what happened in the votes last night we find that parts of the package, particularly the Private Members' Business part, passed unanimously. I did not see that in any headlines this morning. It did not make a story. But in the midst of a fascinating debate and a fair amount of controversy we passed unanimously a part of the package, and we went further. We managed to work out among ourselves a voting pattern that would allow members to go home at about 1:15 in the morning.

Those are examples of co-operation that I think reflect well on the institution.

I say all that because we have been, in the last two years, through one of the most dramatic sessions of Parliament that we have seen in a long time. When we return on or about May 13, we are going to be into another very dynamic session of Parliament, but the dynamics of the next session are going to be even more important than the one we finished because in many ways what we will face will not be issues of great partisan import, but ones that will strike the very roots of our country.

When we enter into that debate, to a large extent all of us are going to be forced to examine the kind of country we want, the kind of co-operation that we can develop with people from other parts of the country than where we may live. We are going to be faced with an issue that will force us to examine our partisan differences very carefully. We are going to be forced to decide whether or not we as individual members are going to behave in a partisan way and score points off one another, or we are going to set aside those differences and try to build a consensus that will make Albertans feel comfortable in this country, make Quebecers feel comfortable in this country, or make maritimers feel comfortable in this country.

It will be a tremendous challenge for us because so often by habit or practice, we come into this House and immediately put on our partisan cloaks, get the fists up, and get ready to go at it. We are going to be forced to stop this because, if we do not stop, the price that the Canadian electorate is going to ask us to pay is more than our seats in the next election, whether or not we can survive that election. It is going to be much more than that. It is going to be Canadians saying to us, "why didn't you put the country ahead of your own personal ambitions?"

We are going to face a very difficult decision because, as we have been trained for years, we have by instinct trained and committed ourselves to behaviour that says we look first at the partisan opportunity and then, second, at the issue. Now I do not think that would be the case today. I think we are going to see that the issue we are going to face is an issue that we cannot afford to be deal with in such a way.

There are all sorts of rumours floating around as to what is going to happen in the next stage. I saw a report on Canada AM this morning suggesting that Parliament will play a major role in this next constitutional stage of our country. I hope that report is true. I do not know that. I do not have any inside information that allows me to say that. I hope it is true, because I cannot think of one single institution or vehicle that we could use in the entire country of Canada that better provides the opportunity to bring all the perspectives of the nation together in one place, to participate in discussions about the country than this one.

I can remember when I was first elected in 1980, sitting back just on the other side of the Chamber in the seat over there in the back row, one of my first impressions was sitting there and, for the first time in my life, being surrounded by people who represented every part of Canada. People from the Northwest Territories, people from southern British Columbia, people from the maritimes, from Quebec, from Ontario and from all over the country. People who had perspectives that were so different from my own, who had experiences that shaped their thoughts and their approaches to Parliament and laws, and were so different from my own. This was not so much because of partisan differences, it was because their part of the country was very different from the part of the country that I lived in.

If that television report this morning was true, if we, as parliamentarians, have an opportunity to enter into debates on the constitutional future of our country, we are going to face one of the most exciting opportunities we have ever had, at least in my 11 years in Parliament. We can take almost any issue that might reflect on this country and bring to it a perspective that is unique, that expresses very clearly the distinctions that exist between different people and between different regions. We, as an institution, as a collective group, have probably the best opportunity to search out alternatives, to search out a consensus that we can offer up to the rest of the country.

I must say that is what I thought I was elected to do. When I had this dream as a young boy of becoming a member of Parliament, this is what I thought would happen. I was going to come to Parliament. I was going to think about the great issues of the day. I was going to struggle with them. I was going to do some real hard soul searching. I was going to be part of the process that drafted the laws that directed the land.

I received a big shock when I arrived at Parliament. I discovered, while I was sitting over there, that I had very little to do with legislation. Even as I talked to members who were on the other side of the House, at that time members of the government, they would say to me the same things that I felt.

• (1050)

They, too, felt that they were not part of the legislative process. That is why the McGrath task force was a turning point; that is why the question of committees is so important.

As we have gone through the three stages of reform we have had in the last 11 years—the Lefebvre committee, the McGrath task force, this set of rules that we have just put into the House of Commons, and the next one that is yet to come—

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I wonder if the hon. member could explain how someone who has just moved to impose 10-minute speeches on everybody else, for all time, sees fit to go on for some 50 minutes now while others are waiting for an opportunity to speak. It seems a bit inconsistent.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It must be Friday and the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona obviously heard all the nice things the hon. member for Peace River had to say about him a while ago. But with the rules that do prevail today, the hon. member is allowed unlimited time.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I apologize to my friend for being so long but it is an opportunity I have not had in a long time—

An hon. member: Make it your swan song, Albert.

Mr. Cooper: —to express, with unlimited time, some of the thoughts that I have developed over my 11 years as a member of Parliament.

My friend says I am one of the people who has restricted other members to debate for 10 minutes. Now, he knows that is not true; he knows that, in fact, what we did in this rules change was to simply change the eight-hour rule to a five-hour rule, so that we have gone from 20 to 10. He will also know that in the McGrath task force it was the first time in my memory that we had suggested that speeches be shortened.

There is a consistency, and that is to give more members an opportunity to participate in the debate.

What I wanted to do this morning was take the few minutes that I have to lay out the type of session that we have just gone through. I wanted to talk about the rule changes and the way they impact on the institution. I wanted to tie that to the issues we are going to face in the next few weeks. The importance of the issues that we are going to face cannot be overestimated.

I think all of us know that we are going to have other issues, we are going to have other bills to debate in this Parliament. But the really important issue that we are all going to face is the question of national unity. I hope, and I want to express it even stronger than that, it is more than a hope, it is a strong desire, that Parliament be the focal point of that discussion.

I would like to be able to get up in the morning knowing that I am going to participate in a debate that is going to impact on the nature of this country, and more than to participate, to know that I am going to have an influence on it.

From what I can hear happening, that is what is going to happen. That is what is going to be the case, that we as members, are going to be able to participate in that debate in this House and we are going to have a chance to influence it.

I know, in terms of committees, that whatever this House addresses, whatever bill or motion we discuss, will probably at some point be referred to a committee of the House. Again, another opportunity for us as members to participate and to be part of the process.

I obviously have lots of papers in front of me and I could easily go on for another several minutes.

Mr. Blaikie: Oh, please do. Please do.

Mr. Cooper: I do not want to monopolize the time. That is not my intention. I did want to lay out these thoughts this morning, and to express to the House some of the concerns, attitudes and ideals that I would like to see us, as a House, express and live up to in the next little while.

I want to thank the hon. members for the opportunity to participate. Madam Speaker, I thank you for that chance. I want to say to all of the members that I hope they have a good rest over the recess. Most of us will be working in our ridings, but I hope we take the time to rest a little bit, because we are going to need to take the time for solitude to think and to reflect. I hope all members do that.

I wish everybody a good recess, and I look forward to the debates and the excitement that is going to happen when we come back on May 13.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the parliamentary secretary for his grade 5 essay.

One should be a bit more generous and say grade 6 essay, and congratulate and give him high marks for his knowledge of geography, with high marks also for his self-congratulatory skills and in looking deeply and closely at a few trees. He saw a few trees. I do not know if he saw the forest.

One should give him high marks for delivering a 45-minute speech in the pursuit of bubbles, rumours and fantasies and for revealing the depth of the intellectual capacity of his government on whose behalf he has obviously spoken. Certainly, he deserves high marks for a masterful, political analysis of the situation today in Canada.

If that is what the cabinet of the Government of Canada can produce on the Adjournment Debate, then everybody understands why we are in trouble.

In reply, I would say that rarely in the history of Parliament has the government asked for an adjournment of Parliament immediately after returning from an Easter recess. I could hardly believe my ears when the parliamentary secretary wished us a happy recess and a good rest.

We have just come back from a recess. What is he talking about? Does he realize that we just had Easter and that we just got back from a recess?

Why are we having an adjournment? If there is a good reason, we would like to hear it. Canadians are entitled to hear it, but we did not hear it in the 50-minute speech of the parliamentary secretary.

To be quite fair in this debate, as we always try to be, I would add that Canadians would find nothing wrong with the government deciding to adjourn today and resume next week with a brand new session and a speech from the throne. Unfortunately, that is not the case.

At the same time, the country is in trouble because of high unemployment, dissatisfaction in Quebec and in the west, understandable unrest amongst native people in Oka, James Bay, Alberta and British Columbia because of the lack of a federal role when it comes to proposed major construction of river dams in three provinces, and the dissatisfaction of the public with the way we manage our forests. We are in deep trouble because civil servants are overworked and understaffed—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately I must interrupt the hon. member who of course will have the floor after Question Period.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, if we are going to address all of Canadians' constitutional concerns, we will have to take a look at the Charter of Rights and Freedoms as well.

Many Canadians feel that the Charter is fine the way it is. But there are some who want to add to it the right to private property, or the right to medicare or the right to shelter. Others believe that the Charter should spell out our responsibilities and our obligations as well as our rights and freedoms. Still others want to eliminate the "notwithstanding clause". There are those who believe that Charter rights should apply only to Canadian citizens and not to refugee claimants or fugitives from foreign justice and others who want to delete references to official bilingualism or multiculturalism.

Whatever we do, we are bound to be unhappy at times when the Charter protects a right that some of us would rather it did not.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I rise today to call on the government to introduce legislation to support the use of ethanol and to ban MMT in Canadian automotive fuels.

We have heard this government on many occasions promise time and time again that it would set up a special program to encourage the use of grain alcohol as an octane booster for gasoline.

It took us six years to ban lead, and despite the government's so–called commitment to ethanol and the environmental impact, it allowed MMT, an insidious neurotoxic substance to replace lead in Canadian gasoline.

I am aware of several people who have worked in garages, car dealerships, muffler shops and gasoline bars, and one teacher who taught auto mechanics in a high school in Saskatchewan, who have serious neurological health problems. Two of these people have gone public. Some of our Canadian scientists have been calling and warning of these health effects for several years.

I have documents dated 1990 from medical schools and universities, as well as other institutions outlining in detail the truly horrible effects that allowing the continued use of this neurotoxin can have on the Canadian people.

This insidious substance accumulates in the bodies and the effects may not appear for several years. Because our children—

CANADIAN CANCER SOCIETY

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, I take this opportunity to remind members of the House and all Canadians that April is Cancer Month.

In Canada we estimate that over 100,000 new cancer cases will be diagnosed this year and that approximately 50,000 people will die of this disease.

The government is taking steps to change this. In collaboration with the provinces and the Canadian Cancer Society, the Department of National Health and Welfare is working to improve cervical and breast cancer screening programs in Canada. The department is also helping to fund the work of the Cancer 2000 task force "Strategies for Cancer Control in Canada".

I would like to applaud all those involved in the fight against cancer and their efforts toward reducing the burden of this disease on Canadians. I particularly pay tribute to the Canadian Cancer Society and the work it is doing.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, it is another GST moment. Strange but true, case number two, the youth "tax credit caper".

If you are under 19 years of age and earn under $30,000, you do not qualify for a GST tax credit, even if you are a non–dependent. The only way the Conservative government will let you have the credit is if you have a child.

Today non–dependent Canadians under 19 can receive unemployment insurance; they can receive welfare; they can vote. But they do not get the same break under this regressive tax as other people do. It is a clear case of discrimination.

The Conservative government's hand is out for a large chunk of taxes from the often small pay cheques of youth, and will gladly accept GST to boot. But a tax credit? Forget it.

Stay tuned, the saga does continue. Coming up, the GST insurance.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the Candlelighters Childhood Cancer Foundation of Canada is a national organization which represents 31 parent support groups from across Canada whose families have children with cancer. The difficulties these families face are enormous, given the emotional, psychological, financial and logistic problems that arise when a child suffers from cancer.

In providing the family support needed as treatments occur for their children, parents must often quit their jobs or take extensive leaves of absence. As presently regulated, these parents are not eligible for unemployment insurance unless they are diagnosed as suffering from extreme emotional distress. This approach has proven itself to be inadequate and potentially detrimental to an employee's career status.

As a result of this situation, Candlelighters has proposed a federal caretakers allowance through the unemployment insurance program which would provide benefits in the same manner as individuals receive benefits for maternity and quarantine leave. Many other nations already have such a program in place and a Canadian initiative in this regard would be a worthwhile, progressive step that would make the lives of many distressed Canadians slightly more bearable.

I have written to ministers on this and the answer I get is that it would set a—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

REFUGEES

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I am sure that every member in this Chamber wishes that she or he could personally do something, anything, to help the Kurdish refugees before they die on the muddy mountainsides of Iraq and Turkey. Even hardened news reporters can be heard dissolving at scenes like the sight of a three-year old girl, barefoot, ankle deep in mud, wearing a thin little dress and shivering in the steady drizzle. Days, even hours, count with these children.

Canada must urge the involvement of the United Nations at the highest level, and fast. We must break the bureaucratic and political logjam, and cut through the complexities of agencies like the World Food Program, UNICEF and others. I am urging that a special representative of the Secretary-General or some United Nations emergency contingent oversee relief efforts immediately.

If only for the sake of these kids, we have to get the United Nations effectively and quickly involved. Above all, we have to get rid of that monstrous mass murderer, Saddam Hussein, to permit the relocation of the Kurdish people in their own homeland.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I rise today to express my frustration and dismay with the Government of Canada regarding the recent unemployment statistics which have been released for the Island of Cape Breton, part of which is my constituency.

The figures released by employment and immigration state there is 22.2 per cent unemployment, which is the official record, whereas in some of the communities it ranges between 40 and 50 per cent.

I have called upon the Government of Canada, and in particular the Minister of Employment and Immigration, as well as the minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, to put in place programs which will address the very serious situation on the Island of Cape Breton.

I believe there is an obligation, both legal and moral on the part of the Government of Canada to attempt to do everything humanly possible to alleviate the fear, the frustration and the anguish of a people who have been singled out by the Government of Canada for such bad economic policy.

NATIONAL VOLUNTEER WEEK

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, National Volunteer week is from April 21 to 27. During that week, communities in all regions of the country will pay tribute to their volunteers and use the opportunity to celebrate caring for others and compassion, which hold a fundamental place in the life of Canadians. With their generosity and dedication, volunteers contribute to the betterment of their fellow citizens and strengthen the whole fabric of society.

Despite that, the great importance of what they do is not yet recognized by all. To better understand the real contribution of volunteers, let us consider it in economic terms. If a monetary value were assigned to all the hours freely given by members of Canadian volunteer organizations, it would amount to approximately $13.2 billion a year. That is impressive to say the least.

Three cheers for Canada's volunteers!

[English]

FORESTRY

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, Canada's cut and run logging of the past will become the exploit and sell out industry of the future unless action is taken immediately.

Canada's forest lands are being alienated, subdivided, sold off and urbanized by major forestry companies.

MacMillan Bloedel, the company which spends millions to lobby for clearcutting 3,000 hectares in both the Carmanah and Tsitika valleys, is now marketing 3,000 hectares of its Managed Forest Lands on Galiano Island in the Gulf Islands as an "investment in paradise".

This is profiteering and real estate speculation of forest lands on which they have received preferential tax assessment, paid no royalties or stumpage fees.

• (1110)

Forest lands must be managed for the public. Economic self-interest by multinationals cannot be allowed to destroy communities, jobs and the environment.

If Canada is indeed serious about protecting its forests and its international reputation, the respect for communities, for jobs and for the environment must be part of the business plan.

It is the responsibility of governments to ensure that message is delivered.

NATIONAL VOLUNTEER WEEK

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to National Volunteer Week which is being held this year from April 21 to April 27.

This week, communities across the nation are paying tribute to those many Canadians who donate their time and energy to ensure the well-being of fellow citizens and to support the causes in which they believe.

Thirteen million Canadians, men and women of all ages, from all walks of life and from every cultural background make volunteering an integral part of their lives.

Whether working on their own or through organized groups, they play a strong and vital role in ensuring that our society is more open and compassionate. Through their dedication and commitment, they help shape and strengthen our communities and are one of the most valuable natural resources this country has.

Volunteering fosters community spirit and promotes a sense of belonging. It connects individuals with their neighbours, with others sharing common interests or concerns and with Canadians nation-wide.

The strength of the volunteer spirit in Canada is a remarkable achievement. This nation truly owes a debt of gratitude to its many volunteers.

TRIBUTE TO LOUIS LABERGE

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, Louis Laberge's leaving the presidency of the Quebec Federation of Labour will be a dramatic occasion for all those who, during his 27 years at the helm of this dynamic union, got to know him and love him with his faults and good qualities.

But we already have the assurance that he will remain on the scene as full-time president of the Quebec Workers' Solidarity Fund, which he was so instrumental in creating in 1983 and has more than 100,000 shareholders and $350 million in assets. This fund is his pet project and he will certainly put his whole heart into running it well.

Nicknamed the grey eminence, but more affectionately known as our national "Ti-Louis", Mr. Laberge is an old friend. I was fortunate to know this bubbly, colourful personality in the 1950s when, with my father whom he called Dr. Hector, he sat on Montreal City Council. I was able to appreciate his energy, his fighting spirit and his dedication to all the causes he believes in.

Elected president of the QFL in 1964, the same year I was elected member of Parliament for Saint-Denis, Ti-Louis has become the likable but rough 67-year-old lion who will still make his presence felt in the labour federation as president emeritus, although he says that he will leave the reins of power entirely to his successor and friend, Fernand D'Aoust, who opposed him for the presidency in 1964. I also have high regard for Mr. D'Aoust and I wish him an equally successful career at the head of an organization that is full of vitality.

I am pleased to wish Mr. Laberge and his wife, who has always supported him so well, all the best.

I am even more pleased that the new QFL headquarters will be in my riding of Saint–Denis, at the corner of Saint–Denis and Crémazie. This will bring me even closer to him. Long live Ti–Louis Laberge!

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, I must interrupt the hon. member. The hon. member for Edmonton East has the floor.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, Dr. James Plambeck of the University of Alberta's Chemistry Department has estimated that Mitsubishi's giant Al–Pac pulp mill on the Athabasca River will produce about 60,500 cubic metres of effluent every day.

Scores of thousands of people downstream from the mill draw their drinking water from that river. Who will guarantee all those thousands that they will suffer no ill effects from swallowing what has been estimated to be an average of a tablespoon of straight mill effluent every day?

As for the Minister of Environment, he will know that the scientific review panel report of the company's revised proposal has been thoroughly discredited as bad science.

Therefore, I call on the minister to exercise his undisputed authority to halt the mill's progress, at least until baseline studies are done on the Athabasca River system and other crucial conditions set in the original federal–provincial review have been met and completed unless he, too, is willing to drink a tablespoon of mill effluent every day.

QUEBEC GAMES

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint–Maurice): Madam Speaker, the 26th Quebec Games finals will go down in history for the exceptional involvement of the entire population of the localities of Shawinigan, Grand–Mère and Shawinigan–Sud.

Under the skilfull direction of Mr. Michel Béliveau, president of the organizing committee of the 1991 Quebec Winter Games, at least 4,100 volunteers from the heart of the Saint–Maurice valley worked for 10 days to make this major sporting event a success.

I want to thank in particular the government of Canada, and the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration, for its outstanding financial support.

My congratulations to all the people of the central part of the Saint–Maurice valley for this great success.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Madam Speaker, today, as a matter of fact this afternoon, the government will be closing down this Parliament while 1.4 million Canadian men and women are out of work and 500,000 Canadians depend on food banks for their daily meals.

In Quebec, Madam Speaker, 5,000 businesses had to file for bankruptcy in 1990, and 14,000 cases of personal bankruptcy were reported. In Montreal, 223,000 people are jobless and the unemployment rate, which rose to 14 per cent, is the highest in the country.

In Quebec City, there are 24,000 people out of work; in Trois–Rivières, 9,000, or 16 per cent of the population; in Sherbrooke, 8,000; in the Chicoutimi–Jonquière area, 8,000 also. In the province, 335,000 people are on welfare and 3,000 others join them every month.

Major job losses are reported, Madam Speaker, at Air Canada, VIA Rail and CP and plant closures were decided by General Motors, Pratt and Whitney and Canadair just to name of few. Fourty–one thousand jobs were lost in the manufacturing sector in 1990. That is a disaster!

Madam Speaker: Unfortunately, the hon. member's time is up.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. This government insists on closing down Parliament because it says it needs more time, more than a month, to write a new throne speech. This is a desperate attempt to put a fresh face on its tired and failed old policies.

Surely the government does not need another month to know that it has a very serious and crucial economic problem, and it is that there are more than 1.4 million people looking for work in this country.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister give us a commitment today that the new throne speech will contain an immediate program of full employment so that there will be at least a glimmer of hope for the more than 1.4 million Canadians who are out of work due to the discredited economic policies of this failed and tired old government.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the context of the hon. member's question. It was my understanding that in the negotiations among House leaders, there was a genuine desire, after the passage of the resolution that would incorporate new rules in the House, there would be a period of time when we could get ready for the new session of Parliament.

It is quite normal to have more than one session in any Parliament. It has been the decision of the government to come forward with a Speech from the Throne which will reflect some of the concerns that affect the nation with regard to national unity, economic opportunities and the continuation of the good policies that have built a stronger Canada.

The hon. member will recognize that the figures this month indicate that for the first time in five months, there has been a net increase in total jobs created in this country. I think that is a positive sign.

There should be no surprise about the fact that we were going to go through this bit of a downturn. It was clearly indicated in the budget speech presented by the Minister of Finance. We expect a turnaround to occur in the second half as the Minister of Finance predicted. In his seven years as Minister of Finance, his predictions have always come true to form.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister talks of a bit of a downturn. Why does he not admit, as the Minister of Finance was finally forced to admit, that we are in a desperate and serious recession caused by this government's economic policies.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the tragic situation workers find themselves in nation-wide does not seem to be taking a turn for the better.

In Trois-Rivières, the unemployment rate is 16 per cent. That means 9,000 people out of work.

In Sherbrooke, there are 8,000 jobless people, and another 8,000 in the Chicoutimi area.

So, I would like to ask the acting Prime Minister this: Can he reassure the Canadian people and promise them today that the throne speech will contain full employment policies which will have an immediate impact?

Why does he not give a little hope to the Canadian people who are unemployed because of old and tired policies? Can he give us a positive answer today for the benefit of the jobless?

• (1120)

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the old and tired policies are the policies that are advocated by the hon. member. They are policies which are throw-backs to the past which simply did not work when he was in government. We are not going to go back to that type of policy.

I remind him of the fact that under his policies back in the early 1980s, we had 14 per cent unemployment, we had 22 per cent interest rates and we had a disastrous recession in 1981-82.

What we have now is a set of policies that are designed to get us out of the recession that we are in today. They are designed to get interest rates down. We are seeing some signs of recovery in that. I need only remind the hon. member of what has happened in the housing market. We are seeing a substantial increase in housing sales from a level of about 2,500 to a level of close to 6,000 from January to February.

I quote from Mr. John Winter, who is a leading retail analyst in Toronto. He says: "I think March will be better than February and, quite frankly, I think we have seen the bottom of this slump." This is consistent with what we have been saying as a government. It is consistent with what the Royal Bank and what the Conference Board have been saying.

If the hon. member would quit walking around with a little cloud over his head, only talking doom and gloom, he might be able to see that as well.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I do not know why this minister is revelling in the problems caused for millions of Canadians due to the policies of his own government for which he was taking credit.

Why is the minister continuing to rely on the same policies to get us out of the recession that he admits got us into the recession? If the minister will not give us a commitment today for new policies of full employment, I ask him to tell us what his government is doing right now for the more than 1.4 million Canadians who are standing in the unemployment lines all across this country. Give us an answer right now. Give Canadians some hope.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member is thinking about when he says I am revelling in the difficulties that Canadians are having. I am not revelling at all. I do not like it at all. What I do know is that the policy prescriptions that we are following are the right ones to get us out of the recession that we are in today.

We saw, from 1984 right through to the spring of 1990, where those policies brought us record growth, that Canada was number two, only after Japan, of the major industrialized countries. There were 1.6 million jobs created in that period of time. So these policies are working.

I say to the hon. member, if he has any ideas, if he has any alternative policies, let us know and let us have them, but I have yet, in the six and a half years that I have been Minister of Finance, heard anything from the Liberal Opposition as to what alternative policies it has. Canadians are looking for more than just straight negative opposition, what they are looking for is a positive policy approach.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In Atlantic Canada, unemployment insurance recipients are experiencing extraordinary delays in having their UI claims processed; in many cases, from 10 days to 2 weeks. This is devastating in an area where unemployment is running over 20 per cent. For those people whose only source of livelihood is their UIC cheque, it is totally unacceptable, even tragic.

I would ask the minister to explain why this is happening and what is being done to rectify it.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I sympathize with the hon. member's question and its intent because we have had some processing problems in some of our offices. What we have been trying to do as a result is do more through the mail and more on the telephone, and we have improved our claims processing. We are putting more people in our offices to ensure that we can speed up the processes for getting cheques to people as rapidly as possible.

Sometimes it comes as well from people coming in to us with incorrect information which delays the process and takes up some of our personnel time. But we are doing the best we can to ensure that the backlogs come down, and they are being reduced very quickly.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, whatever the reason for this delay, there is hope that we are witnessing a temporary interruption and that this greatly reduced level of service is not something that can be expected on a long-term basis. That is the concern. So I would ask the minister to undertake to assure this House that her department will not accept a degradation of service for UI claimants as a regular occurrence.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, far from it being a regular occurrence, the service throughout our department has improved quite considerably over the last two or three years. I answered the first question dealing with the difficulties that the hon. member pointed out and I am quite prepared to accept that, but over time we have improved the service. Not only that, the programs we have put in place are programs that enable people to get back to work faster and to get trained for other jobs. Even in the Atlantic region which the hon. member represents, where I recognize there are particular difficulties, there is a mismatch between the training that people have and the jobs that are available because there are some jobs available. I would point out that in the month of March across Canada, there were 2,000 more jobs than there were the month before. There was an increase in the unemployment rate because of more people coming into the labour force.

To reinforce what my colleague said about the economy turning around, we are seeing more jobs being created and there were more created last month.

DE HAVILLAND

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Aerospatiale, which is part of the consortium that is going to purchase de Havilland, already had its president as its official lobbyist in Canada. On April 5 Fred Doucet became an official registered lobbyist for Aerospatiale.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister tell us what possible advantage Aerospatiale could expect to gain by having a former fundraiser for the Prime Minister, a former chief of staff, and in fact a man who got married at 24 Sussex Drive, as its official lobbyist?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, that question would be more appropriately addressed to Aerospatiale. He can certainly phone them up and ask them. I think that would give him the best answer.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, we are in a nation where there is a great deal of distrust and questioning about the political process. The whole country is, and the Deputy Prime Minister knows that.

I think they would be wondering whether there is more concern about producing jobs for the Prime Minister's cronies than the 26,000 people who are going to be affected by this purchase.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member has a direct question to pose to one of the ministers.

Mr. McCurdy: Yes, Madam Speaker. Is the Deputy Prime Minister aware of whether or not this close friend of the Prime Minister has in fact approached the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, or the Prime Minister, to discuss with him how they are going to preserve those 26,000 jobs that are likely to be affected by the de Havilland purchase, or is it in fact more important to see that the former Conservative cronies get jobs?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I really cannot add any more to the obvious answer provided by the Deputy Prime Minister, and that is to phone those who signed the contract, but I say to the hon. member that when the Prime Minister came into office he said he would bring in a lobbyist registration act. That has come into effect and is in force. It is that information that is now public and I would suggest that the hon. member work on the basis of that type of knowledge rather than the kind of innuendo which he is so capable of throwing around here.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

It has been seven years now that this government has promised improvements to the Bankruptcy Act of Canada. God knows, we have waited for decades of successive Liberal governments to bring in appropriate changes to the Bankruptcy Act of this country that would give a measure of justice to those workers who have lost their jobs and to those suppliers who have not been paid as a result of bankruptcies.

Yesterday, after six months in office—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Normally, the first questions asked by the New Democratic Party would have the possibility of one question and two supplementaries.

I am really trying very hard to see the connection between the first question asked and the one being asked by the member now. Maybe he would want to rephrase his question and put it now.

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague for Windsor—St. Clair pointed out that there is a danger of 26,000 jobs being lost in de Havilland.

My question deals with job losses.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Then the hon. member will put his question now.

Mr. Rodriguez: I understand why they are so sensitive about this on both sides.

Can this government tell the people of Canada in what month, in what year and in what decade can we expect to get the changes to the Bankruptcy Act that will provide justice to workers who have lost their jobs as a result of bankruptcies?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the government does share the concern expressed by the hon. member.

I can assure him that it is a matter that is under very active consideration. I hope that in the not too distant future we will be able to respond to the very valid point that the hon. member made. I just ask him to be patient a little longer.

JUSTICE

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, my question today is for the Minister of Justice.

Recently, there was a very significant court case in British Columbia. The Gitksan-Wet'suwet'en people, we understand, are going to take this to appeal. Eventually, it will end up in the Supreme Court.

There is a large number of people in British Columbia and in other parts of Canada who feel that it would save a lot of time and money if this appeal was directly referred to the Supreme Court.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will put his question now.

Mr. Wilbee: Madam Speaker, my question is to the justice minister.

Can this case not be referred directly to the Supreme Court, rather than going through the various appeal processes which will involve a lot of funding and a lot of time, which is unnecessary at this time?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, technically and theoretically it is possible to refer questions to the Supreme Court of Canada.

We have not had a formal request to do so. We are undergoing discussions with parties to the case. We are no longer party to the case since the claim against us was dismissed.

I would point out, though, that it is unusual to refer a matter as factually complex as this to the Supreme Court of Canada. I think all the parties would want to consider what was the best way to clarify the issues. It is a case of very complex fact in law.

Our disposition is to be as co-operative as possible. We are having informal discussions, but as yet have had no formal request from any of the parties.

DE HAVILLAND

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister, and it is with regard to the proposed sale of de Havilland.

It has been confirmed this morning in writing by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Mr. Fred Doucet, the former chief of staff and friend of the Prime Minister, has been hired as the chief lobbyist to lobby both the government and Investment Canada on behalf of the consortium of Aerospatiale and Alenia.

Given that the government thus far has failed to stand up for the Canadian aerospace industry or provide any details whatsoever of the proposed deal, how can Canadians now have any assurance whatsoever that the interest of the workers at de Havilland, our aerospace industry and research and development will take precedence over the interest of a former chief of staff and long time personal friend of the Prime Minister?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): The people of Canada can have trust and confidence that this will bring net benefit to Canada because the previous arrangement brought tremendous net benefit to Canada. They have moved from 2,800 jobs in 1974 to a level way beyond that. They have developed a strong order book. They have got a good distribution network. This was all done when Boeing took over.

As we move to a different purchaser, we will ensure that net benefit to Canada is there again.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, the question is, as the minister put it, a question of trust.

I return to the Acting Prime Minister and ask him very simply, will the allegiance of the government lie with the workers of de Havilland and the aerospace industry, or will the allegiance of the government lie with a former chief of staff and long time personal friend of the Prime Minister? Whose side will the government be on? Let us have some confidence and trust for a change on behalf of Canadians.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister may want to answer, but it is very difficult for the Chair to accept that this is a question regarding the administration of government. The decision was made by a private company and not by the government. I do not see how it is a question regarding the administration of the government.

The hon. minister may want to answer. If not, I cannot allow the question.

I have heard the comment made by the hon. member for York West and I do not think he meant to imply any impropriety from the Speaker. I am sure that he will want to rise right away and withdraw the comment.

Mr. Marchi: I concur with your sentiments and I think you are absolutely right.

TELESAT CANADA

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is also to the Deputy Prime Minister.

It concerns Telesat Canada. In 1985, the Prime Minister laid down the law: No government-owned corporation could hire lobbyists to lobby cabinet. Now we hear that Telesat Canada, the government-owned satellite company, is paying the Prime Minister's former assistant, Bill Fox, and a recent Conservative Party president, Bill Jarvis, to lobby cabinet and to overrule a CRTC decision.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister now stand in his place and respect the rules laid down by the Prime Minister and put an end to this abusive process?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, the government does not own the company. We are a shareholder, we have an interest in the company, but it is a private company.

Whatever they do is their business. It is Telesat's business. The government will act in its own best interest and in the interest of the nation.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): The majority shareholder in this corporation is the Government of Canada, and therefore it is a government corporation.

I want to ask a supplementary. First of all, cabinet itself could be in a very difficult position. By overruling the CRTC it increases the value of Telesat. Then it will privatizė it. At the same time, of course, Tory friends will be rewarded by doing the lobbying.

I want to know this time whose side the Prime Minister is going to be on. Is it the side of the Tory lobbyists or on the side of the people of Canada, for a change?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, Telesat hired communications consultants to help them prepare their case. I know they did hire them because they happen to be good.

Now, they will do what they feel is appropriate and the government will do what we have to do in the best interests of the nation.

WOLVERINE COPPER TUBING

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Another Canadian manufacturer has just been deep-sixed by free trade. Wolverine Copper Tubing of Annacis Island, British Columbia, has suddenly and in the middle of contract negotiations closed its doors and is moving production south of the border, throwing 180 British Columbians out on the street. Wolverine is an Alabama based, U.S. company that is, I might add, the sole manufacturer of copper tubing in Canada.

• (1140)

What actions, if any, has the government taken to forestall this closure and to protect the Canadian jobs that are at stake? If the minister has not taken any actions, what actions is he prepared to take?

Finally, why was Investment Canada allowed to sell out our Canadian manufacturing industry to foreign interests, when this is the obvious result?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member should know that there is a similar Wolverine operation in my home riding of London, Ontario, and it makes the same products. I do not know what he is talking about when he says that the sole supplier has disappeared.

Mr. Merrithew: Get your facts right.

Mr. Hockin: More important is the effect of the free trade agreement. If the hon. member will look at the increase in manufacturing jobs in British Columbia in 1988, 1989 and 1990 in anticipation of the trade agreement, the net benefit is on a huge positive side, not a negative side.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, Wolverine owns three plants. I say there is one down and two to go.

John Quarles, President and CEO of Wolverine in Alabama, has cited economic reasons for the closure. In a recent telephone conversation he said: "We are fighting those high Canadian interest rates and the GST, and we just can't make a go of it".

Will the minister not admit that this government's tragic monetary policy, its high interest policy and its over-valued Canadian dollar, combined with the GST, are killing our manufacturing industry and mothballing our economy?

Will he also not admit that the impact of these measures, when we combine them with the free trade agreement, is encouraging a virtual exodus of manufacturers out of Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I certainly will not admit such a thing. As a matter of fact the exact opposite is the case.

Mr. Merrithew: Right on.

Mr. Hockin: The old manufacturers' sales tax which built in a cost of operation 4 per cent or 5 per cent more than Canadian operations should ever have to carry has been totally removed. What has happened is that the Canadian manufacturing establishment has benefited to the tune of 3, 4 or 5 per cent with the removal of the old federal sales tax.

In terms of the free trade agreement, we have put in place accelerated tariff reductions in a number of areas to benefit industries similar to that and a number of manufacturing industries in British Columbia, all to show that the manufacturing sector in many cases wants an acceleration of this agreement and nothing other than that.

REVENUE CANADA

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

The minister will know, if he has examined the figures, that one-day shopping trips to the U.S. over the past two or three weekends show that the volume has reached alarming proportions. I would like to ask the minister about the new policy, which I understand is currently being drafted by cabinet to address these concerns.

What is the thrust of this new policy likely to be? When is the new policy likely to be announced?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member touches on a very serious problem that affects not only the federal government but, more important, the provincial and municipal governments, the private sector and labour itself.

From a Customs standpoint, the hon. member will know that we have moved ahead in accelerating the use of technology, adjusting work forces to conform to demands and putting in a pilot project to make a more efficient and effective way of collecting taxes and duties. That is on the Customs side.

On a broader side, the government is working toward creating and taking the leadership in creating a program that will bring in the private sector, that will bring in labour, that will bring in the provinces and that will bring in the municipalities so that we can deal with this on a society-wide basis and make sure that we come up with a resolution that will resolve this matter sooner, rather than later.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): With reference to the reply I got, Madam Speaker, I want to remind the minister that facilitating the entry of Americans into Canada at border points is a good idea. We agree with that, but that is only one issue.

Addressing the attraction to shop in the U.S. on a regular basis by Canadians is a very different issue.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. With an estimated annual $1 billion in lost retail sales in Ontario alone for the current year, not to mention the thousands of lost jobs in the retail industry, can the minister tell me what concrete and immediate plans he has to address this tendency for more and more Canadians to do their regular weekly shopping in the United States?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I touched on that question in my first response but, to be more specific about it, as far as the customs operations are concerned I repeat that we are accelerating the use of technology through automated cash registers to make way for a more efficient and effective way of collecting duties and taxes.

We have put in recently in British Columbia a pilot project which is going to relieve the congestion at the border, revitalize the tourist industry in British Columbia, and allow for expanded commercial traffic in that province. We are going to be monitoring that and hopefully be expanding it to other parts of the country.

I have finished meeting on a bilateral basis with mayors from border communities this last week. We look forward to continuing to meet with them to come up with a marketing program that will allow Canadians to realize that by going south of the border to shop they in fact are hurting themselves, Canadian retailers and the Canadian economy as a whole.

Oral Questions

ABORIGINAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship. It concerns the aboriginal representative organizations program.

Over the past few years funding for this program has been cut and the program actually expired two weeks ago, on March 31. The minister of state has not yet made a decision on whether to extend or renew this program.

Will the minister tell the House today whether and when he intends to renew this program?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to indicate that yes, the program has made a very important contribution to the vitality and to the sustenance of the community.

We are currently in the process of reviewing very carefully what was in place. With my colleagues in caucus and cabinet, we are now examining where we go from here, but I am not in a position yet to reveal the details this morning.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, let me quote from the Main Estimates about the program:

> This program provides program funding to Inuit, Métis and non-status Indian and status Indian representative organizations which work to enable aboriginal people to participate in the political, social and economic life of Canada.

I have a supplementary question. The 32 aboriginal groups who use this program need to assure their clients and their banks that their funding is forthcoming and they cannot afford to wait for the minister to make up his mind.

Will the minister agree to release the funds available for this program today so these aboriginal organizations can get on with their important work?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, we are very understanding of the situation that the groups find themselves in today. They have been very important and supportive of our desire to create a society where equality is the call word, where equality is the cornerstone of our citizenship.

There are at the moment very important considerations on certain elements that were in the budget. We are now very carefully reviewing those elements. We have been as forthcoming as we can and have indicated to all of our client groups, not just the aboriginal representative organizations program that we have been very supportive of, whatever continuing support that we have been able to make in the interim pending a further decision of the caucus and the cabinet.

WILDLIFE RESERVES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Forestry. We can read in La Presse of Thursday, April 4, 1991: "For lack of an agreement with Quebec on a conservation strategy, the Algonquins of Lac Barrière are threatening to set up barricades on Highway 117 and again block logging roads in La Vérendrye Park Wildlife Reserve to prevent any wood cutting." My question is this: Can the minister tell us today whether it is in his jurisdiction to implement a forestry regime in this wildlife reserve in Quebec?

• (1150)

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, I can tell my hon. colleague that while we do have active programs in place to assist native people with the development of their resources on the reserves, if native people aspire to use resources that are on public lands under provincial jurisdiction it is the province of Quebec that would be the principal authority to deal with the native people on this particular issue.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Farmers in western Canada have a deadline that is rapidly approaching. They must decide whether to sign up for GRIP, for revenue insurance, for crop insurance, or in fact for nothing at all. An important part of that decision is whether or not deficiency payments will be tied to any or all of these programs.

Will the minister tell Canadian producers today whether or not they must sign up for any of these programs in order to be eligible for deficiency payments?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, as I am sure the hon. member knows—and I would appreciate if he would convey this to his producers—we did establish a set of principles that were agreed to by the provinces which would govern us in the development of a third line of defence package.

Largely, the principles reflect the multifaceted nature of the problem and the fact that it would be in everyone's best interest to get as many people as possible into the long-term safety net process. That is important from the standpoint of the producers, as well as the provinces, and particularly those who have yet to commit fully to the Net Income Stabilization Account, which is very key and vital to the long-term stability of the agricultural community.

One of the principles is that to the extent possible any transitional assistance should be tied to the long-term safety net program and delivered to that program if possible. It is within the spirit of those principles that we are attempting to develop that plan.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, the government says that GRIP is voluntary. If it is voluntary then deficiency payments should not be tied to it. If the payments are tied to GRIP then the government should have the decency at least to let producers know that.

I ask the minister again, very simply, are deficiency payments tied to GRIP or are they not tied to GRIP? Farmers have a right to know so that they can make a proper decision based on market matters as opposed to what this government is doing with respect to programs.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's concern. We will hopefully be in a position to indicate the kind of a program that will meet the criteria, the principles that were developed.

He may very well be overstating the case when he suggests that there is an element of compulsion. Certainly there will be some incentives. I think that is what the hon. member would want because, in spite of some of the reservations he had about our approach in principle, his party and he himself supported the over-all principle of a long-term safety net which was largely developed by the producers themselves.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Last week the minister for federal-provincial relations, in an interview with a major Canadian newspaper, said that Ottawa might give the provinces more control over official languages.

Considering the poor record of most provinces with respect to minority language rights and the critical and sensitive nature of this issue with respect to national unity, would the Acting Prime Minister say whether such a proposal is actually being considered and, if so, would he give the assurance that his government will not propose or entertain any measure that would weaken the language rights of official language minorities in this country: the francophones outside Quebec and the anglophones in Quebec? Would he give the House that assurance?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, there certainly has been no decision made on that particular issue.

The issue of the Official Languages Act and languages indeed has become part of the whole national unity debate. There are many commissions, inquiries and committees that are studying all aspects ancillary to national unity. Certainly the Official Languages Act has been one that has been discussed.

As the Prime Minister has said in the House and outside the House on many occasions, we hope to receive the recommendations and the data that is being collected, through the Spicer commission and indeed our own joint parliamentary commission, plus the many examinations that are being undertaken by the provinces. We will deal with this information and hopefully come up with a package that will in effect reflect the attitudes and the views of Canadians.

This is an open and transparent process, and it would be in everyone's interest to ensure that the views of the public being collected right now will be looked at, studied, and honoured in some respects.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, these public musings or thinking are not really assuring the language minorities in this country, and the Acting Prime Minister has not given me the assurance I was asking for.

The minister for federal-provincial relations also said that the national consensus on official languages has eroded. Under the Official Languages Act, 1988, which was supported by all parties, Part 7 provides that the government should promote both official languages and enhance the vitality of the minority language communities in this country.

When will the government take steps to implement that part of the Official Languages Act and turn back the erosion referred to by the minister for federal-provincial relations? When will this government take strong measures to support official bilingualism?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the government's record is very clear in that regard.

The hon. member and his party cannot have it both ways. They cannot, on the one hand, insist on an open and transparent process and then, on the other hand, reject and condemn any views and opinions that come thereto.

Really what we are doing at the present time is collecting the views and opinions across the country. The position of the federal government has been made very clear. We brought in amendments to the Official Languages Act that would conform to the constitutional requirements. That is the position of the government.

However, to deny people the freedom of expression of thought on any or all aspects devoted to national unity I think would not serve the best interest of democracy. I am sure the hon. member would be the first person in this House to condemn that.

HEALTH

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Status of Women. I have repeatedly asked her colleague, the minister of health, to remove the Meme breast implant from the market until proven safe.

The minister continues to hide behind mysterious studies which his department supposedly has. Yet, there is ample evidence that links the Meme implant with cancer. This is cancer month, I might add.

If the Minister of National Health and Welfare will not act, what steps will the Minister responsible for the Status of Women take to protect Canadian women from this dangerous product?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has responded to this question over the past two days. He has indicated that he has recently had one of his officials looking at the results of the most recent federal drug administration studies on this issue. He has also indicated that if there is any information that would factually lead to any link between the Meme breast implant and an increased incidence of cancer of course he will take the appropriate action.

I have asked the minister personally to ensure that I am kept informed, that the review is thorough and that it will take into consideration all possibilities, and I will be monitoring the situation very closely.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I guess I am somewhat disappointed, but I would have hoped that more concrete action would be taken.

The government is clearly hiding behind the questionable Kerrigan report. Why is this government relying on a study authorized by Dr. Kerrigan, a doctor who has used the Meme implant in her own medical practice and was therefore clearly involved in an obvious conflict of interest?

How can the Minister responsible for the Status of Women allow this placing at risk of Canadian women in this country today? I ask the minister please to respond. Why?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there has been a number of different studies undertaken both in Canada and in the United States.

From the health and welfare perspective, there is no factual link from the evidence they have received at this point.

• (1200)

If factual evidence should come forward that would show that link, of course we would take any appropriate action that is required.

LABOUR CANADA

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Earlier today I gave him a background briefing on a matter regarding a verbal decision by Labour Canada that a Canadian Airlines flight attendant had no reason to invoke her right to refuse to work in an unsafe condition.

Given that the city the flight attendant was scheduled to fly into and stay in for 13 hours was not only suffering a cholera epidemic, but saw terrorist bombings of 30 buildings, including the Canadian embassy on the very day that she was scheduled to be there and that 10 of her colleagues actually stayed there, in spite of Labour Canada saying it was safe, I want to ask the Minister if he will do what Labour Canada has refused to do and ensure that flight attendants are able to invoke their right to refuse, especially in foreign countries where they continue to be employees under the control, pay and direction of their employer.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend for providing me with the information. I have requested that my officials look into this matter on an urgent basis and as soon as I have some answers I will get back to my friend.

I appreciate that this is not a very good situation. We have a task force studying the flight crew duty time and we will take this into account too.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

10TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the 10th report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and in doing so, I would like to make the following remarks.

The tenth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts which I have the honour to table today deals with the problems encountered by the Canadian Coast Guard and the Department of the Transport in the modernization of a large ice-breaker, the Louis St. Laurent.

The modernization project has gone through a rapid cost escalation, including a major cost overrun, from a planned expenditure of $51 million to a projected $139 million and is some 20 months behind schedule. The project was not let out to tender at Cabinet request. The committee has tried to put these problems in perspective and examine the larger questions of improved planning and reporting of major capital projects in Transport Canada and in other government departments.

For example, Transport Canada has agreed that a more thorough assessment process is required prior to all future ship modernizations or major repairs and the committee has made a recommendation to this effect.

With respect to non-tendering, the committee repeated an important recommendation made in several earlier reports to the House, namely that maximum use be made of competitive tendering for contracts.

The committee has asked Transport Canada to respond to the recommendations by June 28, 1991 and has requested a government response to two of the recommendations at an earlier date pursuant to Standing Order 109.

62ND REPORT OF STRIKING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the 62nd report of the Striking Committee. This report deals with the membership of a legislative committee.

Pursuant to Standing Order 113(1), upon such presentation, such reports are deemed adopted.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

AUTHORIZATION TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I have with me today two requests by committees to travel, but I am advised that on one of them there have not been the proper consultations between the members of the committee and the leadership of the Liberal Party.

By drawing the attention of the House to that, I would hope that the people who are involved will have those consultations so we can proceed with that motion before the House rises at two o'clock.

I understand there is consent for the second motion, on which there have been consultations. I move:

That the two researchers from the Library of Parliament assigned to the Standing Committee on Agriculture, Sonja Dackers and Len Christie, be authorized to travel to Winnipeg for the period May 5, 6 and 7, 1991 for the purpose of attending a workshop on sustainable agriculture on behalf of the committee.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, with regard to that particular motion, I believe you would find unanimous consent on this side.

With regard to the remarks made earlier by the parliamentary secretary, there has been no consultation with myself, the chief opposition Whip, the industry trade critic or his office with regard to the motion which he was going to raise.

I just alert him to that because if it can be arranged before 2 p.m., we can have another look at it. We give consent to this particular motion.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, on behalf of my gigantic caucus, I too would like to indicate our consent to the motion with regard to travel by the two researchers.

I note once again that this is an act of good faith on the part of the NDP caucus.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the motion presented by the hon. parliamentary secretary. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

CONCURRENCE IN 26TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I move:

That the 26th report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections presented to the House on Wednesday, March 20, 1991 be concurred in.

He said: Madam Speaker, I just want to summarize the report.

The Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections received a request from the hon. member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo to amend the Standing Orders to permit joint sittings of standing committees so that two or more committees could meet together, have a joint meeting, hear witnesses and prepare a transcript of the proceedings.

The purpose of the amendment to the Standing Order that the committee has recommended in the 26th report is to do exactly that. It simply adds the words necessary to effect the change requested by the hon. member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo.

The committee is of the opinion that this will enhance the ability of committees of this House to function effectively.

I am moving this today in light of the fact that we are in the midst of changes to the Standing Orders. This could be printed with the reprinting that will take place as a result of the division last evening.

I note that the report was agreed to by all members representing all parties on the standing committee.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I just note that our caucus too is in full agreement with the motion of concurrence.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections must truly be on a role.

It had the 21st report which was part of the reform package that was adopted unanimously last night. Because of our interest and encouragement of the committee system in this Parliament, we on the government side are happy to give our support and endorsement to this particular amendment. We urge the adoption of this amendment unanimously.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I rise in accordance with Standing Order 36 to present a petition duly certified by the clerk. It is from from 65 of my constituents in the Deep Bight Southwest Arm area, which represents nine communities.

The petitioners are concerned that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has historically been a key element in the government's commitment to cultural integrity and national unity. They are calling on Parliament to ensure that CBC programming remains intact and that local programming in Atlantic Canada is maintained, particularly, a program which is near and dear to our hearts in Atlantic Canada, called Land and Sea, which has consistently over 20 years celebrated the special nature of the Atlantic region.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I have three groups of petitions to submit today. The first one is from a number of residents in my constituency of Okanagan—Shuswap and the communities of Lumby, Enderby, Falkland and Vernon in particular.

These petitioners are very concerned about the recent reductions in RCMP services, not only in our community, but essentially in all communities in British Columbia and, in fact, right across Canada.

They are urging the government to consider restoring proper funding to the RCMP so that it can fulfil its mandate and role and provide a visible police force for communities across British Columbia and to re-examine the decision to force the provinces to either increase funding for the RCMP, which is in many cases much more than the communities can afford, or face the decrease in services and the closing of detachments as has already occurred.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, the second group of petitions is from residents, I might add, right from one end of British Columbia to the other. This group of petitioners, about 709 names, are urging the Minister of Communications and this government to consult with all affected parties, specifically those citizens living outside of Canada's urban areas, who will be impacted severely by the possible deregulation of long distance telephone services.

They are urging the Minister of Communications to hold local hearings in the smaller communities throughout the province before deciding the fate of Canada's telecommunications system.

That is on behalf of residents throughout the province of British Columbia in regard to the UNITEL application for long distance services.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, the last petition is from a number of citizens also throughout the province of British Columbia who are protesting the recent cutbacks in CBC services, the recent reduction of $108 million in funding to the CBC and the loss of 1,100 jobs, and the reduction or closure of regional television stations.

They are asking the government to reconsider its priorities in terms of this decreased funding for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

AIR CANADA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I have a series of petitions signed principally by residents of the city of Edmonton, but as well by residents of other centres in Alberta, duly authorized by the clerk, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The petitioners note that over 200 Air Canada employees at the Edmonton International Airport and Edmonton reservation office will be losing their jobs because of cutbacks by Air Canada in its expenditures on employment.

They note that the affected employees provide services that are essential to Air Canada passengers in Alberta and, therefore, call upon Parliament to express its profound opposition to the further centralization and retrenchment of its regional services by Air Canada, our former national air carrier, as they note, and urges the Parliament and the federal government to request Air Canada to revoke the proposed lay-offs.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 448, 472 and 481.

[Text]

BREAKWATER CONSTRUCTION AT THE KUSKANOOK SMALL CRAFT HARBOUR IN KOOTENAY LAKE, B.C.

Question No. 448—Mr. Arseneault:

1. Did the government award a contract for breakwater construction at the Kuskanook Small Craft Harbour in Kootenay Lake, B.C., and, if so, (a) from which department were the funds allocated (b) from what specific budgets were the funds obtained (c) what are the overall amounts of the budgets (d) how much money is left in the budgets (e) what was the procedure for determining allocation?

2. What is the (a) estimated number of boats which use these facilities (b) breakdown (pleasure, fishing, etc.) of activities held at these facilities?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Departments of Fisheries and Oceans and Public Works as follows:

1. (a) The Department of Public Works, on behalf of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, contracted the breakwater construction project in two stages as follows:

Amount	Contractor
$798,593	L.J. Construction
$913,359	Currier Contracting Limited

The public tendering process was used to award both contracts.

(b), (c) The project was funded from two sources; the Small Craft Harbours' Harbour Revitalization Program ($225.3 million over 4 years, expiring March 31, 1991) and the Small Craft Harbours Regular Program ($67.4 million for 1990/91).

(d) The funds allocated to those two programs are totally depleted.

(e) All funding for both programs has been allocated based on regional project priorities.

2. (a), (b) Once the infrastructure is completed, the harbour will be able to accomodate approximately 175 vessels, most of them recreational.

MR. RYSZARD PASKOWSKI

Question No. 472—Mr. Kilgour:

With respect to Canadian Security Intelligence employee Ryszard Paskowski, (a) did CSIS inform him of the nature of his mission in Rome in 1986, and if not, for what reason (b) did CSIS attempt to persuade him to tell Roman police authorities that he was on a private visit, and if so, for what reason?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Ryszard Paskowski was never an employee of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS). After his first arrival in Canada in December 1984, and before his departure for Rome in 1986, he did provide information to the Service about the alleged activities in Canada of a foreign intelligence service. This information could not be verified and as stated in the House by the Honourable James Kelleher, when Solicitor General, on January 22, 1988, CSIS ended its relationship with Mr. Paskowski before he left Canada voluntarily for Italy in August 1986.

The relationship between the Service and Mr. Paskowski has been thoroughly examined by the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC) and no wrong doing of any kind by the Service in relation to Mr. Paskowski was found.

EL SALVADOR—POLICE INVESTIGATION INTO ASSASSINATION OF SIX JESUITS AND TWO WOMEN AT THE UNIVERSITY OF CENTRAL AMERICA

Question No. 481—Mr. Robinson:

Did the Canadian government send an RCMP Officer and a staff member of the Canadian embassy in Costa Rica to conduct a technical review of the Salvadoran police investigation into the assassination of the six Jesuits and two women at the University of Central America at some time in the last two years and, if so, what was the content of any reports submitted to the Canadian government from this delegation?

Right Hon. Charles Joseph Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In a statement at the OAS November 30, 1989, the Canadian Permanent Observer stated that Canada would consider any request from the authorities of El Salvador for help in the investigation of the assassination of the six Jesuit priests and their employees. At the request of the Salvadoran government, the Canadian Ambassador, accompanied by the RCMP Liaison Officer and another officer of the Embassy in San Jose accredited to El Salvador, visited San Salvador from January 4–6, 1990 for meetings with the government, the Church and the University of Central America. The Embassy officers later met British, Spanish and American officials, as well as the Salvadoran Special Investigative Unit and two criminal investigators from Scotland Yard. They concluded with the assessment that the investigation, to that point, was proceeding in a serious and professional manner. The Salvadoran government made no specific request for assistance, and, since the investigation soon moved from the forensic to the judicial phase, it did not lend itself to Canadian technical intervention. No recommendation for further action was submitted to the RCMP.

[English]

I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the other questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, do the questions that are held now, if we do in fact prorogue today or at least at some point before we next sit and consider this matter simply disappear or do they carry over to the next session?

Madam Deputy Speaker: No, the questions would have to be resubmitted if we begin a new session of Parliament.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPRING ADJOURNMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 19433).

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, there was one specific passage in the parliamentary secretary's speech with which I agreed. That was when he referred briefly to the necessity of being prepared for what is coming. That is the way he put it in his speech.

It seems to me that he has a point because he and his colleagues in the Progressive Conservative Party should be prepared for what is coming, particularly in the province of Alberta where there is a surprise in store for the Progressive Conservative Party.

It is no great political secret that should an election take place today the government party would be really lucky if it were to be able even to form the Official Opposition. The parliamentary secretary is quite right in urging in his speech to prepare for what is coming.

As to what we may charitably call the analysis he made, he seemed to be reporting from another planet. It was a report of a situation that from this side of the House we see in completely different terms. Let me explain. If we had not just returned from an Easter recess one would understand, perhaps, the necessity of calling an adjournment. We have just come back from one and I suppose Canadians will be wondering why all of a sudden another recess is necessary.

I do not think Canadians would object and we certainly support the idea of adjourning today and starting a new session next week with a Speech from the Throne because the public business and interest requires that this Parliament be active, be present, be alert and extract during Question Period from the government the information that the public eventually learns from the media the following day.

We are adjourning at a time when the country is in deep trouble because of high unemployment, 1.4 million people are unemployed. There is dissatisfaction in Quebec and in the west. There is understandable unrest among native people in Oka, the James Bay region, Alberta and British Columbia. There is rampant dissatisfaction among civil servants who are overworked, understaffed, and economically straitjacketed by this government, with an increasingly frustrated public facing ever-shrinking government services.

We are in trouble with workers in industrial Canada living in anxiety about the uncertainty of the future. We are in trouble because of growing cynicism with a political party whose record is a long, long list of unkept promises. That fact also has an impact on the credibility of the entire political institution no matter the party to which you belong.

We are in trouble because of foreign competition. We are in trouble because our productivity does not seem to be keeping up with that of other nations. We are in trouble because of poor leadership. We are in trouble because of this government's privatization of publicly-owned assets. I must remind you of the situation of de Havilland in Toronto, in particular, a real failure of the privatization policies of this government as carried out recently.

• (1220)

We are in trouble because of a government that is unable to win the support of Canadians at large and that has hit rock-bottom levels in popularity. We are in trouble because the Prime Minister is seen as the greatest disaster ever to hit this great nation. We are in trouble because the party in power, having lost the confidence of the people for good, can, from a constitutional point of view, carry on and govern until November of 1993. We are in trouble because of a mutilated VIA Rail, a demoralized postal service, and a frustrated CBC.

We are in some pain and difficulty, to put it mildly, about the uncertainties that surround the free trade agreement that is being discussed with Mexico. We are in trouble because of a continuous crisis in the fisheries in Atlantic Canada. We are in trouble in urban Canada because tens of thousands of refugees are waiting endlessly to learn about their fate in this country.

It is against this background then that, at a time when Canada is obviously facing these difficulties, the government decides to close down Parliament from mid-April to an unspecified date sometime in mid-May perhaps. Are we going to close down for repairs or are we going to close down for restoration? It seems to me that it is more likely we are closing down for sale, judging from the propensity of this government for dismantling public institutions that it has shown over the last six years or its propensity to retreat from governance and to give away federal responsibilities at a drop of the hat, as we have seen through the Meech Lake accord experience.

An adjournment debate should actually have a clear purpose: to the government to justify and explain to Canadians the reasons for adjourning. I ask you to examine the speech by the parliamentary secretary, who was obviously speaking on behalf of the Crown, the ministers, and Cabinet, to judge for yourselves the substance of the speech he gave, and, at the same time, to let Canadians decide on the merits and reasons for adjourning.

You may recall that this session of Parliament started on April 3, 1989, almost two years ago, actually. At that time, the Governor General read his Speech from the Throne. That speech is an important document for parliamentarians and Canadians because it sets out the agenda, so to speak, for the lifetime of the following session. Therefore, that Speech from the Throne contains a number of promises.

The government might have had a good reason for adjourning if the business it set out to conduct had been completed. Unfortunately, though, that is not the case. There is a great deal in the Speech from the Throne of unkept promises, unfinished business, proposals lost by the way-side, so to speak.

Let me illustrate that by going over some of these unkept promises. To begin with, you will find in the Speech from the Throne a statement that says: "Legislation will also be introduced to ensure an appropriate environmental assessment review process." Here, condensed in a very few words, is a very important concept. It is a promise to give Canadians a law that would protect the environment by way of measuring the impact a project or a policy could have on the environment before

It is a very important initiative, which saw the light of day in the form of Bill C-78. It is so important that, even in Hansard of October 16, 1990, the Minister of the Environment said, and I quote: "We have to get Bill C-78 through the House".

Mr. Speaker, that bill has not even come back from committee and has not been examined in committee since Christmas. That bill is going to die, as they say, on the Order paper.

Let me give you another example, to do with water. In the same Speech from the Throne is the following commitment, and I quote:

> These initiatives are part of a new environmental agenda, which will also include the commitment to improve the quality of our water through new legislation.

This promise in the Speech from the Throne resurfaced recently in the Green Plan.

So, what do we actually have? We have a report by the Pierce commission, initiated by the Liberal government in 1984 and completed in 1985. We had, in 1987, a booklet entitled The Federal Water Policy in which a policy is outlined. Then, in the Speech from the Throne of April 3, 1989, we have a commitment to improve the quality of our water and a commitment in the Green Paper.

Mr. Speaker, after six years of Progressive Conservative government, that is where we are, with a repetition of commitments on water and these commitments have not been carried out.

In the same Speech from the Throne is a very important statement, which reads as follows:

> The government remains committed to a national child care program.

That commitment has not seen any political expression, in the form of programs, policies, or budget, you name it. Commitment is on paper; it is gone.

Mr. Speaker, it is a zero result from a statement in which many of us who appreciate—and I am sure that many within the government members also appreciate the social importance of a national child care program, which has now been allowed to disappear into the landscape.

There is a reference to refugees in the Speech from the Throne. Unfortunately, the refugee question is, as I mentioned earlier, still a crisis.

In the same Speech from the Throne there is a commitment to revitalize the Citizenship Act. Action on that commitment has unfortunately been zero.

There is a commitment with respect to native people in the Speech from the Throne and, despite the promise of funds, there have instead been cuts to communications and core funding of native organizations.

There is a commitment to a new copyright legislation. The delivery on that commitment has also been zero.

Therefore, we must analyze the situation of unfinished, unkept promises.

• (1230)

One also has to go beyond the Speech from the Throne and beyond what has not happened in the field of an environmental assessment review act, so that today, as we speak, instead of the promised law, we have an Order in Council, which was passed by the Liberal government in 1984 and attempts to regulate that particular environmental situation.

On gun control, there is, again, unfinished business. There is a proposed law in the pipeline from which the government seems to have backed out.

On the question of estimates, because of this open-ended adjournment, there will be three, four, five, six or more weeks ahead of us in which the scrutiny of government expenditures on the part of committees will not take place. That scrutiny is probably the essence of parliamentary activity. It is the essence of the role of elected representatives who are, instead, asked to go back to their ridings. I must stress, in this connection, that the timeframe and the window of opportunity to examine expenditures of budgets of any government department closes at the end of May.

This is the crucial time, because the estimates are produced in March. So you can see that April and May are, for interested parliamentarians, the key months in which to carry out that kind of job on behalf of the Canadian public. That kind of opportunity is almost wiped out.

Might I add, Mr. Speaker, and bring to your attention that the budget debate is incomplete. The House has not approved the budget of the Minister of Finance, so we are adjourning with a budget that has not been voted on. We are asked to adjourn with important unfinished business, called approval of the budget.

Mr. Speaker, I must tell you more, and bring to your attention what is left unattended to. While we are being asked to adjourn, the important issue of the free trade agreement with Mexico and the United States is on the move. It is in the news and in the works, so to speak.

While President Bush negotiates and discusses with Congress the well-being of American workers, with an eye on their future jobs, social security, and protection of the environment, this government is told to go on vacation.

Does it make sense? While the American political and governmental system is fully absorbed by the question of the proposed trade agreement on the North American continent and the voters' collective attention to ensuring that it is the best possible agreement for the interest of the American workers, we are not paying attention to the collective interest of the Canadian workers, the environment, and the long-term social consequences of this agreement, because it is felt that Parliament ought to close down and that members of all parties ought to go home.

I ask you, does it make sense to you, Mr. Speaker? It certainly does not make sense to us on this side of the House, because this proposed agreement is such a vital issue that yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs tabled a special paper dealing with the question of issues that relate to the impact on workers on the part of this proposed agreement.

Mr. Speaker, evidently there is a lot we do not know, a lot at stake, and a lot, therefore, that ought to be discussed in public, with the public interest in mind.

You can see, therefore, that I am concluding, in this analysis, that I am rapidly coming to the conclusion that it is actually the height of irresponsibility to adjourn now. It is the wrong time for closing down the Parliament of Canada at this juncture, for the variety of reasons I have given you in the course of my presentation.

What we can see here is a decision to govern by decree by a government that is giving signs of profound tiredness, that is running out of ideas, and that is, in a sense, conveying the wrong message to the public, something the government should never do no matter what its political stripe. The government is conveying the notion that it is letting the public interest down because it does not want Parliament to sit.

Therefore, this is a sad day for parliamentary democracy at a very difficult time and a very difficult moment in Canadian history.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand up in the House and wind up this session of Parliament and to speak for my party, the New Democratic Party, hopefully expressing some of the wishes, the visions, the frustrations, and the hopes of many Canadians.

Before I came into the House today, someone asked me what I could say about this government that is positive. I said I was sure that, if I thought deeply enough and for a little while, I would be able to think of something positive. I can think of a lot of positive things about Canada. I am very positive about Canada and about Canadians.

I must say that, if you examine what the Throne Speech said a couple of years ago and the blueprint it drew for this government and for Canada, and if you look at where we are now, I think the government has failed miserably in the economic area and in the constitutional area. I want to highlight that point in my speech.

I think we have seen economic and constitutional mismanagement on a grand scale, to the point where our very country is in danger. This is very serious indeed. We need an alternate vision in this country, a public policy, in both the constitutional area and in the economic area. In a sense, they are both intertwined and I want to speak about them in my speech.

I have said this before, during the Meech Lake debate, and hope to say so again this summer and especially next year, when the constitutional debate will heat up. We need an activist federal government to keep this country together. We need a federal government that will show the greatness that is there for Canada, both in English and in French, and to provide for the blossoming and exploding native culture and reality in this country, which is a good thing, and the new multicultural element of the new peoples who are of neither English nor French background and have come to this country.

This country is on the move, but this government is not. This government is mired in an ideological past.

I want to say one thing before I get into some concrete examples such as the free trade deal with Mexico, which we have discussed in this House during the last couple of weeks, or the aerospace deal, involving the loss of a major company, which we discussed in the House of Commons today in Question Period, or indeed one of the events that occurred this week in the House, namely, the re-ratting, if you like, of a Bloc Quebecois member back to the government ranks, and I want to say something about that.

• (1240)

I actually see the Minister of Justice in the House, so perhaps I could take a bit of crack there.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Don't let me cramp your style.

Mr. Waddell: Then I want to finish by talking a little about what we members have to do for our constituents in the months that lie ahead while Parliament is not sitting.

First of all, I want to say something about the changes to the rules of Parliament. I know we have had a long debate on this issue, and the issue has been settled. But I warn the government and I say to my fellow Canadians that it keeps restricting the rights of Parliament and keeps cutting it back. We all suffer in the long run because Parliament is still the one institution in this country where the ordinary Canadian can go to their MP and can obtain some justice for a cause. That MP can get up and put a question right to the Minister of Justice or to the Prime Minister in full view of the national press. I am afraid we are restricting the rights of parliamentarians more and more.

As I have said, we have had that debate and I regret what the government has done with the rules of Parliament.

Let me say something about the failure of what I said was the economic policy of this government. We are about to get into a free trade deal with Mexico, but Mr. Speaker, I say to you, should we not examine the results of the first free trade deal that we got into with the United States before jumping into an expansion of that deal? We in the NDP do not accept, unlike the Liberal Party, it now seems to me, the premise that a North American free trade deal is inevitable.

Looking at the past deal with the Americans, it seems to me that we have lost 226,000 jobs, investment is down, there is no adjustment program for the workers and, worse still, we have not received secure access to the American market. The Prime Minister himself was complaining about that just last week with regard to the pork dispute, on which we were overruled by the Americans. We must define more clearly the dispute settlement mechanisms in the existing free trade deal before entering a new one.

The Free Trade Agreement is not working. The Americans say that they can just use the extraordinary measures clause, which was included in the agreement only in extraordinary circumstances, like such as corruption or something like that, and now the Americans seem to be using this clause. This is a very serious situation indeed. Let us not jump into a new trade deal without looking into the old one.

We are also concerned about what the real motives of this trade deal are. I want to quote the Leader of the Official Opposition in Mexico, Cuauhtèmoc Càrdenas, who was, in my view, robbed of an election victory by the present President of Mexico in a corrupt election. Here is what Mr. Càrdenas said in a recent speech in Vancouver, British Columbia: "Their free trade agenda is simple and narrow. Mexico will sell its cheap labour to attract foreign capital, which, in turn, will guarantee the survival of one of the last remaining authoritarian political systems in Latin America".

Mr. Speaker, do you think that it is as the Prime Minister told us, that they are going into the free trade deal to raise the standard of Mexican workers? Not on your life. The Americans want to go into that free trade deal with Mexico for cheap labour. The workers receive about 4 per cent of our wages. They exploit women in these factories on the Mexican–American border. The environmental standards are atrocious. The health and safety standards are atrocious.

We have already seen evidence of companies like General Motors in Canada and General Electric in Canada moving jobs out of Canada as a result of our deal with the Americans, into the Maquiladora free trade zone on the Mexican border. This action is a forerunner of things to come and this is why we should not get into that deal.

One does not have to be a brilliant economist to figure this out. Here is the agenda: the PR, the Mexican governing party, stays in power with its corrupt administration and top–down redistribution of wealth. All the wealth is at the top. The Americans get a low–wage place in which to invest and use American capital and Canada gives its cheap, raw resources. That is why we are seeing the deindustrialization of Canada. So let us not get into this kind of deal. This is going to be a major item on the agenda during the next few months.

I also mentioned another area of economic mismanagement, where the French and Italian companies, backed by the Italian and French governments are about to buy de Havilland. There are 3,000 jobs at stake. Not only that, the continual development of the Dash–7 aircraft, which Canada does so well, and the continual development of high–tech in the aerospace industry, which is one of the high–tech industries that we have and one of the top high–tech industries in the world.

We in the NDP want to see a viable aerospace industry. We have to be realistic and I acknowledge that. We do not want to pour millions of dollars down a hole, but it seems to me that, if there is a takeover by the French companies, backed by their governments, the Canadian government should at least have a share in the new company. It should have what is called "the golden share" so that they can make sure the research and development stays in Canada and can make sure these European companies will not just buy the Toronto company, de Havilland, in order to close down one of their competitors.

This take-over is crucial for Canadian jobs and this government will not get involved because they believe in the pure free-market economy. Well, if they keep going they will turn Ontario into a province with the economic level of industry that New Brunswick has. This could be a real tragedy.

They tell us to look at Investment Canada and ask can Investment Canada not protect us. Well, under this government, Investment Canada has a score of 914 to zero. I counted it up and there are 914 approvals and zero rejections.

I say that high-tech, investment, and aerospace are the kind of industries Canada has to stay in; we cannot give them away. I am worried about what is happening with de Havilland, with the trade deal, and with the loss of jobs. I think there has been economic mismanagement of this economy on a large scale by this government.

Before I close, let me say something about the constitutional matters. I am afraid we have a Prime Minister who is a deal-maker, who is not speaking for Canada.

I was pleased this week, as we all were, that one of the Bloc Québecois, the Separatist group from Quebec went back to the government. We would have liked him to perhaps go somewhere else, but he did reject separatism. I see this country in great danger, but I see a beginning of an opening through which we can once again reconcile French and English in this country.

The Prime Minister has a reputation as a deal-maker, as someone more interested in making a deal than in what the deal says. He is not a nation-builder, like previous Prime Ministers have been. The premiers, in their own way, have to speak for the provinces. Mr. Mulroney does not speak for Canada. We need leaders in this country who will speak for Canada. There is no price, in terms of federal powers and national social programs, that he will not pay in order to get a deal.

The Prime Minister has blamed the failure of the Meech Lake accord on everyone else but himself: it is Mr. Wells' fault; it is Elijah Harper's fault; or it is the NDP's fault. Well, I suggest that he look to himself for the fault.

I would like to quote what the distinguished Canadian, Tom Berger, has said on this matter:

> English Canadians had a greater commitment to the idea of Canada than our leaders did. That is why Meech failed; not because of cranky opposition by the people of English Canada to the distinct society clause. They sensed, even if they did not understand the details, that Meech Lake was another chapter in the Mulroney government's dismantling of Canada's federal system. Traditional Canadian deference to our political establishment was missing in the Meech Lake debate.

Let me wind-up by saying this. In the months ahead we will have to change our economic policy, stop the deindustrialization of Canada, and protect Canadian jobs. We must have an economic vision of this country that does not have us just throwing our resources into cheap labour in Mexico.

• (1250)

We have to develop high tech here in Canada. We have to emphasize the environment. We have to emphasize education. We have to emphasize national institutions. We need a national government, not just a Quebec government or a B.C. government or a government in Ontario. We need a national government that can tie all this together. We cannot decentralize all the programs to the provinces. We need national social institutions like medicare programs and day care. That is what makes Canada a civilized society. We need that and our people want that and they are demanding leadership.

The Prime Minister should call an election. Do not just adjourn this Parliament, call an election and face the Canadian electorate and they will have a message for him. They will get rid of these scoundrels very quickly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have received written notice today from the hon. member for Scarborough East that he is unable to move second reading of his bill during Private Members' Hour today.

[Translation]

Therefore, the order for second reading of Bill C-329 will be moved to the bottom of the priority list for Private Members' Business.

[English]

Since there will be no business before the House between two and three o'clock p.m., the House may then wish to adjourn.

Questions and comments. Debate.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, as was pointed out, today we are debating a motion to adjourn Parliament for four weeks. This is a sad commentary on the preparedness, the competency and the commitment of the government that it wishes to adjourn Parliament at a time when the country and the world are faced with so many serious problems.

This country is in a serious recession, with very high unemployment, the unity of the country is under attack in many of the provinces, instability in the Middle East and eastern Europe, and starvation in Africa, all of which affect world peace and security. We have many unresolved aboriginal issues, issues that came to the forefront last year in Kanesetake and Kahnawake and other places in the country and were to be dealt with. But, here we are, almost a year later, and not much has been done.

It appears that the government does not have any agenda, any program or any policy to deal with these issues and, therefore, it adjourns for four weeks.

To begin with, let us look at the economy. We have the worst recession since 1982. The recent unemployment figures indicate that 10.5 per cent of Canadians are unemployed. This amounts to approximately 1.4 million Canadians out of work. Retail sales have taken tremendous drops. Housing starts are way down and bankruptcies are way up.

One could argue that perhaps this recession, this situation that I have just referred to, is a result of the usual business cycle, but there are many, many experts who would argue that even with the business cycle things would not be as bad as they are if the government had not deliberately adopted certain policies which made the situation much worse.

We can, first of all, refer to the goods and services tax which, whether you agree with it or not, nearly everybody, nearly every expert unanimously said this was the wrong time to bring in a tax like that at a time when the country was going into a recession. We have people out of work, people with their salaries frozen and they are faced with additional taxes. What do they do? Of course, they cut back on their retail buying and their investing. This only hurts the economy further and drives it into a still deeper recession.

Another matter that no doubt has affected the lay-offs and unemployment is the free trade agreement. It was contemplated by the government and by the Economic Council of Canada that the free trade agreement would very seriously hurt many of our industries and there were recommendations that adjustment programs be put in place to compensate for those adjustments that would take place. That has not been done, with the result that we have many industries, and I will refer to some of them very specifically in a few minutes, that have closed down and moved their operations to the United States. This has particularly hurt the industrial areas of this country: southern Ontario, Montreal and parts of the larger cities in the west.

When employment was increasing in 1984, 1985 and 1986, the Prime Minister claimed responsibility. I can recall very well when the unemployment figures came out in those days, he got up and boasted that the jobs being created were due to his policies and his programs. He said that he created those jobs. It was not the private sector, it was not the result of international markets, it was not the result of worker productivity, but it was the Prime Minister who was responsible, according to his statements of those days. If you look in Hansard you will see them.

The upward trend in creating jobs started in 1983 and not in 1984 or 1985. It accelerated in those years, but it started in 1983. Nevertheless, let me make this point. If the Prime Minister had the answers in 1984 and if he was really responsible for the creation of those jobs in 1984, 1985 and 1986, where are the answers now? If he had the answers then, if he had the policies, if he had the solutions that led to the creation of jobs, surely now is the time when he should put those solutions to work.

It is obvious that he did not have the solutions and that he was not responsible for that job creation from 1984 to 1987. He was simply riding the trend. He was simply riding the surge of the business cycle which, at the time, was an upward trend.

If he had the answers, if he had been responsible, if he knew how to create jobs, if he knew how to cut back on unemployment, today is the time that he would do it and we are not seeing it being done.

We have had several budgets. We had a budget last year from the Minister of Finance in which he predicted that unemployment was going to increase, and he introduced certain measures without any effect. The rate continued to rise. He has now come forward with another budget with no real solutions. His solution, the solution of this Conservative government is very similar to the solution of other Conservative governments in the world, the governments of Ronald Reagan in the United States and Margaret Thatcher in Britain, which is a hands-off, laissez-faire approach to the economy, that everything will right itself and that if you leave it alone it will take care of itself. Well, that has never been the case in this particular country.

In Canada we have always had a mixed economy, a good balance between the public sector and the private sector. The private sector thrived under those circumstances. The public sector contributed to education, to training, to public infrastructures such as transportation, ports, railways, communications and other things that are necessary, helped the private sector do its job. The greatest eras of prosperity that we had in this country were during those periods of Liberal government when there was a mixed economy.

It is true that we had problems from time to time, but when we had those problems we did not take a hands-off attitude or a hands-off approach, we intervened.

While this recession is taking place, what does the government do in the budget? It cuts the training program by $100 million, it cuts transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education, it makes cuts in health care, VIA Rail, and so on. These are the very things you do not cut during a recession.

The government argues that because we have a huge deficit in this country, there must be cuts if we are going to prevent an additional burden on our grandchildren and our great-grandchildren. There are some things that cutting will only contribute to the deficit because you cut back on your capacity to produce. Cutting back on training and education short-changes the future with respect to trained workers and trained professionals able to produce the wealth that is required to give us a prosperous economy.

It is very shortsighted for governments to cut back on training and education, and it is very short sighted to do that during a period of recession. By doing that the government simply sabotages our capacity to produce more down the line in the years to come. That is a silly approach to dealing with the deficit, it makes the deficit worse rather than better.

• (1300)

Up until now I have spoken generally about the recession that is now with us. I would like to talk about Montreal, the city I come from, which has been hit particularly hard by the recession.

Montreal now has the highest unemployment rate of any municipal area in Canada. That is a new record for Montreal. The unemployment rate in Montreal is now higher than any of the great cities in the Atlantic provinces, which always in these kinds of times had higher unemployment rates. Montreal has the highest unemployment rate of any city in Canada and it has the highest poverty rate of any city of Canada.

Recent studies have indicated that one out of four individuals in Montreal live below the poverty line and that there are 290,000 more individuals in Montreal living below the poverty line than in all four Atlantic provinces. That is a serious, serious situation and should be dealt with.

This week I put a question to the Minister of Finance, asking if he would bring in a joint development program with the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec to do something about this disastrous situation. He said they were already doing things. Well, the things they are already doing are peripheral, marginal, and they are not really attacking the core of the problem.

What I would like to see for Montreal is a type of development program that we have for Atlantic Canada, ACOA, or that the government has for northern Ontario or for western Canada with the Western Diversification Program. Montreal needs a special institutionalized program at this time to turn around the situation in that city because major industries have closed.

I want to refer, just to show how dramatic it is, to the situation in Montreal and the plants that have closed there during the last two years.

During the last two years, Gattuso has lost 88 jobs in St. Laurent; Valmet-Dominion Company, 200 jobs; Black and Decker, 150 jobs; Marconi, 380 jobs; Pascal's, 180 jobs; Bristol Myers Squibb in Candiac, 124 jobs; CBC in Montreal, 160 jobs; Eaton's, 60 jobs; General Motors, last year it was 1,700 but that was temporary. They have been called back, but now notice has been given they will be laid-off again; Catelli, 63 jobs; Steinberg's, 150; Clairol Canada, 228; CNR, 2,000 jobs; Miracle Foodmart in Montreal, 350; Canadian Marconi in Montreal, 130; Goodyear in Valleyfield, not far from Montreal, 800 jobs; Dominion Textiles, 20; Twincraft in St. Laurent, 60; Rolland Papers, 293; Nationair 25; Canadair, 300; Noranda Mines, 125; Culinar, 256; Circo Craft, 211; Domtar, 1,300 jobs; Pratt and Whitney, 1,200 and Air Canada, 2,900 jobs eliminated across the country with a large number in Montreal.

I put that on record because if you just mention figures in general, people lose the impact. The individuals who work for those companies I just referred to know how serious it is, because now they are on unemployment insurance or on welfare or on the bread line. That is not the way this country should operate. Government should respond to those situations and try to do something about it. Unfortunately, it is not being done.

In recent days, the opposition has brought to the attention of the House and Canadian people the critical situation faced by aerospace workers in Toronto as a result of the sale of de Havilland by Boeing. As you will recall, Boeing bought de Havilland a few years ago with the consent of this government and are now selling it to a French and Italian firm which has an aircraft in competition with the Dash-8 aircraft being produced by de Havilland in Toronto.

I raise this issue because it is very important for Toronto where there are 3,000 jobs—approximately 3,000 jobs with de Havilland— threatened by the sale of de Havilland by Boeing to the French and Italian firm, but in addition to those jobs in Toronto there are people who supply de Havilland with materials and with other supplies they need for the production of the Dash-8. Of those materials that are provided by other Canadian firms to de Havilland, 48.7 per cent come from Quebec, amounting to $82.5 million.

In other words, the greatest amount of subcontracting and sub-purchasing towards the production of the Dash-8 aircraft comes from Quebec and, in particular, the Montreal area.

So it is not just Toronto that is affected by this sale. It will now go to Investment Canada for approval or disapproval. That sale not only threatens the jobs of many aerospace workers in Toronto, but also throughout the country and, in particular, in Quebec where 48.7 per cent of the supplies for the Dash-8 come from.

Quebec's large portion of the supply business with de Havilland is attributable to the engine manufacture of Pratt and Whitney Canada in Longueuil. The Dash-8 Pratt and Whitney's PW-100 series engines represents 16 per cent of the aircraft's selling price. I just put that on the record to show how important this is.

I have referred to the critical situation of the economy in this country while this government goes on recess for four weeks and how that recession is impacting on Montreal.

I also want to refer to the constitutional crisis. As I said, we are faced with movements in Quebec and in other provinces, the Reform Party in the west, which would divide this country and turn it into a country unlike the one we have known for well over a hundred years. The government is adjourning at a time when we should be taking action, when leadership should be shown to deal with this threat to our national unity, with this threat to our way of life.

It is troubling that leadership is not being shown by the Prime Minister and by the government in dealing with this matter.

This morning I put to the government certain musings that were stated last week by the Minister for Federal-Provincial Relations, who is a Senator, who in an interview with the Montreal Gazette said that it may be necessary to transfer responsibility for official languages to the provinces.

We know that the provinces have a very poor record in dealing with the language minorities. We not only have the situation of Bill-178 and Bill 101 with respect to the anglophone minority in Quebec, but we have historically the policies of the Ontario government cutting back the rights of francophone minority, measures taken by the government of Manitoba in past years to crush the rights of francophones in that province and so on and so on.

Provinces have not had very good records with respect to their language minority.

The initiatives to protect those language minorities have come from the federal government following the royal commission on bilingualism a few years ago, and so far the movement has been progressive with respect to the protection of language minorities by the federal government. We would hope that the federal government, in order to get a new constitutional deal, will not sell out the language minorities in this country.

• (1310)

A very important issue to me, which has been left on the table as Parliament adjourns today, is the question of gun control. About a week or so ago, I tabled in this House a petition with over a half a million names, asking the government to put on the restricted list paramilitary semi-automatic rifles, the same kind of rifle that was used by Marc Lepine to shoot down 14 women at the Ecole Polytechnique in December of 1989. That semi-automatic is a type that is used by many police forces, by many assault groups. It can fire up to 30 bullets. It has no place for sale over the counter as a hunting rifle.

The government tabled Bill C-80, which we thought was an improvement with respect to gun control. That bill was then set aside and it looks like it is going to die because the session will be prorogued. A parliamentary committee has come up with proposals, some of which are good, some of which are not so good, but here we are adjourning this session, more than a year and a half after the massacre at the Ecole Polytechnique, and still we have got nothing on gun control.

Mr. Speaker, you indicated to me that my time is coming to an end. I simply wanted to put on record that the government is adjourning at a time when there are many critical issues to deal with in this country. This government has lost the support of the Canadian people. It is at the lowest rate in the polls that any government has ever been in Canadian history. The Prime Minister has lost the support of the Canadian people. This motion to adjourn today for four weeks demonstrates again why they have lost that support. The country is faced with serious problems, but the government does not know how to deal with them so it decides to adjourn. What a sad day for Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, before we adjourn prematurely, I would like to congratulate our colleague, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, who is extremely concerned about the state of the economy in Montreal. He talks about it often and I know that he is very interested in it.

My colleague, Mr. Allmand, knows the situation of the textile industry and clothing manufacturers in Montreal—and I know something about it because I visited some manufacturers in Montreal. This industry is in a steep decline. Forecasts are that in five or six years—and these are not my figures, Mr. Speaker; they come from various associations of clothing manufacturers in Montreal—the industry will literally be wiped out in Montreal. You know that in the past, Montreal was one of the great centres in North America.

I would like our colleague to tell us what remedy he thinks this government could give the textile industry and at the same time whether he thinks this premature adjournment should not be considered an admission of failure.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right. The textile industry was always very important in Montreal. It has given employment to thousands of people in Montreal.

But you know that during the free trade debate in the 1988 election, the industry itself said many times that this agreement with the United States would threaten their industry and many jobs in it.

[English]

The warnings that were given to us during the free trade debate are now coming to pass. Industry after industry, in the clothing business and in the textile business in Montreal are shutting down or moving to other countries. Workers who found jobs there for years and years are left without any work at all. My good friend has approached me. He has been in touch with many of those industries in Montreal. We intend to meet with them as soon as possible to get their views on how we can turn the situation around. I think this is very important. Our party leader has agreed as well that something has to be done and has approved of our meeting with them.

I would not want to start making recommendations at this point before we meet with the industry, but we have agreed to meet with them at the earliest possible date. We will be making suggestions in this House to the government to save a very important industry, the clothing industry.

There are some very basic necessities that every individual needs to live. We need food, we need housing, we need education but we need clothing. We all need clothing. We need shoes and clothing. Why should that clothing not be produced in our own country? Why should we have to go abroad for most of our clothing? It is ridiculous. This is a principal industry and one that should be helped to expand, modernize and compete in the world.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I would have one comment to make following the excellent speech from our colleague, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, who showed to what extent this government has abandonned the Montreal workers, failing to implement the recommendations of the committee headed by Mr. Laurent Picard, which had suggested a series of specific measures to pave the way to Montreal's economic recover. Unfortunately, years later, this report still has not been acted on. It could have helped bring economic renewal to Montreal, but it was not taken seriously. It has not even been given fair consideration by the Canadian government.

We are now faced with a truly alarming situation in Montreal. A recent study by the Quebec Planning and Development Bureau has shown that at the present time there are some 188,000 jobless people on the island of Montreal. Such a situation is absolutely unbearable! We all know to what extent Montreal is the engine of the Quebec economy. If the economy of Montreal were to collapse, the whole province could be affected.

So, I commend our colleague for his speech and I would like to ask him to tell why, in his opinion some of the main recommendations of the Picard report have not yet been implemented?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Danme-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right. In 1986, the Conservative government appointed Mr. Picard to chair a commission on the economic situation in Montreal. The commission studied the problem for several months and published a report containing 86 recommendations. It suggested creating high technology industries in Montreal and focussing on international trade.

But, Mr. Speaker, four years later, most of these 86 recommendations have been ignored, totally ignored by the government which itself created this commission chaired by Mr. Picard.

But other commissions have also made recommendations. There was the commission with Paul Lacoste, former rector of the University of Montreal, for the United Way in Montreal in 1990, which made similar recommendations, which recognized that the unemployment rate in Montreal was a disaster. These recommendations were also ignored by the federal government for what was under federal jurisdiction.

• (1320)

[English]

I could go on. There were other reports as well. There was a 1989 report by federal economist Jules Leger which referred to the growing number of unemployed and the poverty in Montreal. It made certain recommendations. Nothing has been done about that either.

It is not just a tragedy for Montreal, but it is a tragedy for all of Quebec and for all of Canada.

Government Orders

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

INDUSTRY, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY, REGIONAL AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Cooper: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry to interrupt the exchange but, as you know, during Routine Proceedings today under Motions, I had indicated that there were two travel motions, one of which we had to complete consultations on.

I want to advise the House that those consultations are now completed. It is my understanding that there would be unanimous consent for the following travel motion:

That the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development, be authorized to travel to Toronto from Wednesday, April 24 to Friday, April 26, 1991 in order to attend the conference Reaching for Success: Business and Education Working Together; and

That the necessary staff accompany the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS)

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPRING ADJOURNMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 19433).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a very short comment or question.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, what we heard from the hon. member from Montreal are the same woes that we hear in Toronto city.

The unemployment list is getting longer. The food banks are getting longer. Bankruptcies are growing. The refugee backlog is getting worse. The self-exiled class are not given work permits, et cetera.

Just 45 minutes ago, we met with the building industry from Toronto. It made a comparison of the recession of 1981–82 and the present recession. In 1982, the second year of the recession, there were 14,122 units sold as compared to 1990 when only 8,180 were sold.

I would like to ask the member whether he feels, according to what is happening around Montreal, which recession had a greater negative impact on the people, especially the poor and the unemployed.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out when we were in government and faced with the recession of 1981–82, we were an activist government and believed in government intervention to help the situation.

We did not believe in the laissez-faire approach to the economy. I can recall very well that we put more money into the construction of housing. We set up funds so that first-time home buyers could buy homes. This was a program which was cancelled by the Conservatives when they came to power.

If they really want to do something, and housing is one area that stimulates the economy and gives people one of the basic needs that they have, shelter, they could at least recognize that fact and come forward with a new budget or a new Speech from the Throne and put money into housing. I understand the housing construction people who were here today recommended that CMHC lower its downpayment requirement from 15 per cent to 5 per cent.

There are things like that which would help the housing industry and the economy to get back on its feet. It would help people to get housing at the same time.

We have to believe in a mixed economy and not in a hands off, laissez-faire approach.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, today, more precisely in a few minutes, Parliament will adjourn for quite a while without even dealing with one of the most important problems for my riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Speaker, on July 13, 1990, I informed the government opposite in a press release about unemployment in our riding and the whole eastern Ontario region and I then appealed to the government opposite to look into this issue which I thought would get worse.

So with my colleagues, the members for Stormont—Dundas and Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, we showed at that time that eastern Ontario had lost nearly 3,000 jobs.

I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that at that time we certainly did not expect the situation to become as serious as it is today, although it was already serious then.

In 1990, the summer of 1990, my colleagues and I showed the government that, for example, in Hawkesbury, 85 jobs had been lost with the closing of Canadelle Inc. or Wonderbra if you prefer; 78 with the closing of Laser International; 23 laid off at Mercedes Textile; 38 at Sun Wheel; 20 at Rail Car in Alexandria; 75 at Tradition Windows; 100 lost their jobs in the shoe industry and 30 at Alexandria Molding. The same thing happened in the Cornwall region, so well represented by my colleague from Stormont—Dundas. They lost over 1,000 jobs. The Renfrew region, represented by the member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, lost some 1,600 jobs.

All in all, then, we could find and identify 3,127 jobs that had been lost for the people in our region. But, Mr. Speaker, it went from bad to worse. At that time, we asked the government to intervene. We asked the government to help the people of Eastern Ontario who needed work.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we saw then that the government did not care about it, so much so that the Minister of Supply and Services, who is the political representative for Eastern Ontario, ridiculed our complaining about the lack of employment in our region. Even the constituents of the minister responsible for Eastern Ontario were angry about what he did.

[English]

I have here an article from The Ottawa Citizen of July 19, 1989, in which a municipal councillor from the constituency of Lanark—Carleton, which is represented in this House by the Minister of Supply and Services, was indicating to us that the problems being raised by the opposition members were indeed serious.

I would like to read from the article:

> Dick's statements raised the concern of Coun. Dennis Staples who said council should contact the MP for a meeting and show him the "very real" concerns of the town.
> "The economic situation in Smiths Falls is not exactly rosy," said Staples.

Faced with the inaction of the government in this area, my colleagues and I tried a second initiative to convince the government of how much we needed help. We asked the municipalities whether or not they agreed with us that the economy of eastern Ontario needed help. This is what they said. The Township of Pakenham adopted a motion asking the federal government for help. The Township of Lavant, Dalhousie & North Sherbrooke, the Township of Grattan, the Townships of Head, Clara and Maria, the Corporation of the Village of Chalk River, the Town of Gananoque, the Village of Merrickville, the Town of Prescott, the City of Brockville, the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry, the Village of Chesterville, the Township of Roxborough, the City of Cornwall, le comité de développement économique des comtés de Prescott–Russell, la ville d'Alexandria, le canton de Hawkesbury–Est, la corporation du village d'Alfred, the Corporation of the Township of Lancaster, the Corporation of the Township of Kenyon, the Village of Maxville, the Village of Lancaster, la corporation de la ville de Hawkesbury, le canton de Plantagenet Sod, le canton de Longueuil,

• (1330)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I could list some more for several minutes. All those municipalities asked the government opposite to assist the economy of Eastern Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, my riding is only a few kilometers away from Parliament and I sometimes get the feeling that the Peace tower is casting a shadow over the problems facing my riding, however hard I try to disperse the cloud or shadow obscuring the issue.

The fact is, at the moment 50 kilometers from here, in Hawkesbury, in my riding, the unemployment rate stands at 16.6 per cent.

[English]

The Minister of State for Youth is in the Chamber as we speak, and I know that he knows my constituency. His own is all things proportional, not that far away, some distance, but nevertheless not as far as many Members of Parliament's constituencies. I have an article here from the Hawkesbury Express in my riding. It says:

> Sixteen per cent record high. Jobless rate could get worse.

Here is what it says:

> There are now 1,946 people receiving unemployment insurance benefits in the county. That translates into an unemployment rate of 16.6 per cent, says Fernand St. Jacques, manager of the local Canada Employment Centre.

Those are not statistics that I am inventing, Mr. Speaker. That is the hard economic reality of the riding that I have the honour and pleasure to represent in this House of Commons.

[Translation]

The situation there is very serious Mr. Speaker. I have been asking this government, for quite some time now, for an economic development plan for our area. I have to say, that we received a bit of good news recently. Apparently, under the auspices of the Community Futures Committee, we will have, in Hawkesbury, a program intented to improve the infrastructure, hoping to encourage Cité Collégiale to open a satellite institution in Hawkesbury. Now, I have something to tell the New Democrats, and I am sure they are all listening to me with interest from the other end of the room, Mr. Speaker. I can see how interested they are in this issue. I hope they will put a word in for us to their kissing cousins at Queen's Park, because they are the ones responsible for bringing Cité Collégiale to Hawkesbury.

I had the opportunity, recently, to discuss this matter with the Minister of State for Small Businesses who was telling me that the key is to improve education opportunities for our young people, and I agree with him. As he said so well, Mr. Speaker, we must make post-secondary institutions available to improve the schooling of our young people and enable them to find jobs. However, the ball is now in the court of the Ontario New Democrats, and they should know that all the people of Eastern Ontario are expecting them to act on this issue.

Some ministers on the other side have offered their help to convince the Ontario New Democrats. I wish to thank right now those who will. There is no time to loose. We must act now and with all our might.

[English]

Aside from this community college initiative that I have just been describing, we are still losing more and more jobs.

A few weeks ago, in consultation with Employment and Immigration Canada, we managed to find funds to retrain people under the Job Re-entry Program. I was really proud that day. I was really happy. I drafted a press release, announcing all these new initiatives that were going to be established and the different high schools in the riding that would be participating in training these people who were unemployed—all of them women, by the way—to reintegrate them into the workforce. Was I ever pleased with this initiative. I phoned the local press to tell them about these grants we were getting that would give jobs, at least temporarily, to 125 women who would be retrained.

The reporter said he guessed I had not heard the news. Then he told me that that afternoon, Ivaco Steel laid off 140 workers.

After the effort was over, there was a net loss of 15 jobs instead of any gain. I was not exactly pleased. As a matter of fact, I was very discouraged.

[Translation]

A few days later, Canadian Pacific Forest Products announced it was closing its forest research lab in Hawkesbury.

[English]

CIP Research and Canadian Pacific Forest Products have had a research lab in Hawkesbury for 88 years. They have now announced that they are shutting it down. I regret that very much. Up until now, I have been trying to work in co-operation with the employees of that institution. It is not closed yet because there are still a few days left. Not very many, might I add.

I have been trying to convince Canadian Pacific Forest Products to delay the closing for a while, only a few months, because this is important.

Second, I want Canadian Pacific Forest Products to let the employees of that plant have the factory either at a reduced rate or no rent at all for a period of time in exchange for future considerations, preferred shares and so on, in the company that the employees are trying to establish to keep this research lab alive in our community.

I am still awaiting an answer from Mr. Paul Gagnier, the President of Canadian Pacific Forest Products. If by any chance anyone in Canadian Pacific Forest Products happens to be watching the television right now, perhaps they can tell Mr. Gagnier that I am waiting for his answer.

What we are hoping to get here is funding from the federal government for a market study—and that is available because there are programs under the Workers' Adjustment Program—in order to determine whether or not the employees could successfully run that plant themselves under the conditions I described a few moments ago.

I succeeded in reaching a few people. One of them is a University of Ottawa professor who is giving his time to the employees of this plant. His name is Dr. Walter Baker, and I should probably take this occasion to thank him publicly for what he is doing. Dr. Baker is voluntarily helping the employees get themselves together to make a pledge to invest their severance pay, and everything else that they can muster, into a corporation. That would then be utilized as a further show of good will to convince everyone that they are trying their best to keep their jobs alive at Canadian Pacific Forest Products.

What we need, then, to keep at least that particular institution open is, of course, the funding from the government in order to do the needs study for the jobs. I understand that is moving along. But we also need the co-operation of Canadian Pacific Forest Products. They have not said no yet, and they have not been overly critical, but I will say right now on this Friday, April 12, 1991 that there is only a week left before the plant closes. We need answers from them in terms of keeping the plant open for a little while so that then we can get the federal government involved to try to preserve the jobs.

I should also congratulate the employees for their initiative under the leadership of Mr. Ron Dynes of Canadian Pacific Forest Products, who is trying to get his colleagues at the research centre in Hawkesbury to keep this factory open.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me add just a few words about youth unemployment in my constituency. I just told you the unemployment rate is about 16 per cent in my riding, 16.6 per cent to be exact, and according to the manager of the Employment Centre, there is a distinct possibility that the unemployment rate might rise again before the end of this recession. I too hope that this recession will end soon. However, I think, and the Conference Board agrees with this, that we will have to wait a few more months before we see the end of it.

In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, we could at least encourage our young people who will have to face some very tough times this summer. The Challenge '91 program the government offers is a good one. I have received in my office a lot of grant requests. With this money, farmers and small business people, as well as public and para-public agencies, will be able to hire young people this summer. Mr. Speaker, I have for about half a million dollars of requests on my desk.

But from what we have heard at this point, only $77,000 was put aside for my constituency; that is not much money. I talked to the Minister of State for Youth and want to thank him. Without going into details, I hope we will be able to encourage these young people in difficulty. And if at all possible, Mr. Speaker, since the youths need our help so badly, maybe we could find funds to at least encourage a greater number of them.

Finally, I see that the Minister of Transport is sitting in this Chamber at the moment and I have said this to him before, but I simply want to alert him to the blow that the area is recently seeing approach, regarding one of the largest transport companies in the country, which is based in my riding and known as GTL or the Glengarry Transport Group.

Most Canadians will recognize that the name Glengarry has been made famous through two ways. Glengarry is the home of the Glengarry Highlanders and is the name of that very large transport company in Canada. Well, I am not breaking any secrets by saying that Glengarry Transport is in very big financial difficulty. It was in the newspapers today, yesterday, and a few days ago.

Between Glengarry Transport and the affiliated companies, namely Intercan Leasing, the subsidiary company of Glengarry, —and I believe that is the name—there are approximately 7,000 trucks in this country. I hope we do not lose that industry or any part of that company. It is based in Alexandria and has offices in Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto and Kingston, so a number of Members or their constituents would be affected if we lost that industry. I hope and pray that we do not. We do not need any more bad news than we have received already.

So, in closing, I only want to repeat —that the constituency of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and eastern Ontario need hBelp and they need it now; a 16.6 per cent unemployment rate in Canada is unacceptable and when it happens 50 miles from Parliament, Mr. Speaker, it is a disgrace.

I dare hope that the government, in the course of the next weeks and months, will listen not to the complaints voiced by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, but by the voters, the Canadian men and women who suffer and need help.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. I recognize the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I compliment my colleague from Russell—Glengarry—Prescott on an excellent presentation.

By way of comment, realizing that we would be having this debate today, but not realizing that it would be so short, I did take an opportunity to go over the Speech from the Throne for the 34th Parliament, Second Session. There are four small comments that I would like to make.

First of all, I noticed that we talked about—and I will quote from the speech: "Canadians who fish for a living find their catches reduced by predatory overfishing outside the 200-mile limit. My government will intensify its international efforts to put an end to these practices." That statement was written on April 3, 1989. The community that was being referred to, the European community, had a quota that was set at 13,000 tonnes and they set a quota of 160,000 tonnes, which is 12 times greater and their catch was equivalent. I do not have the figures for 1990 but I think they are roughly the same. So, I am aware that the government is trying but they will have to try harder to achieve some success in this regard.

The second point I would like to make note of is that there is talk about improving the government's record on unemployment insurance. Two years ago, I and my constituents from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception had great faith that something great was going to be achieved.

Well, let me just give you the record. At that particular point in time, as this was written, U.I. worked this way: the employer paid 43 per cent, the employee paid 31 per cent, and the government paid 26 per cent. In 1989 the government contributed $3 billion out of $13 billion.

In less than two years, to cover the cost of the government's withdrawal, which has happened in the two years, for every $100 of employable earnings from an employee the premium rate rose from $1.95, when this was written, on April 3, 1989, up to a total of $2.80 now. That is an increase of 85 cents or 45 per cent.

An employer's contribution rose from $2.73 to $3.92. That is another increase of 45 per cent to make up this $6 billion we expect to lose because of the government's contributions. Well, I have not been impressed with the achievement in that regard.

The third point: There is talk, and I quote;

> It will be replaced with a fairer sales tax that will ensure the Canadian economy is fully competitive and that will maintain a stable source of revenue to finance essential programs.

I am sure reference has been made to the goods and services tax here and I am not going to waste your time and the House's time in the precious few moments that remain by saying what Canadians believe the goods and services tax has done over this period of time. It has caused great divisions in the country and I am sure has largely been responsible for leading to the "made in Canada" recession we are now suffering.

My final point, Mr. Speaker, is this: In preparing Canada's future, talk about education and health. I want to end on this very sombre note and I am referring to the province of Newfoundland and to the five-year freeze in the transfer payments to the provinces. In total, the freeze will be worth about $30 billion.

In 1990 there was an announcement that there would be a two-year freeze of federal transfer payments and that freeze cost Newfoundland $19 million in 1990 and 1991 and $34 million in 1991-92. In the last federal budget, as you would recall, Mr. Speaker, this freeze was extended for a further three years.

This freeze, then, plus the other federal restraints to transfer payments in the past six years since this government has been in power will have cost Newfoundland about $500 million by the end of 1992 and, in 1991-92 alone—this coming fiscal year—about $140 million.

When these financial burdens are transferred to the province they can be absorbed by richer provinces like Ontario and perhaps Quebec, but Newfoundland is not a wealthy province and we cannot absorb it.

So, Mr. Speaker, on those four promises that were made two years ago, I am disappointed, constituents from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception are disappointed, and all Newfoundlanders and Atlantic Canadians are disappointed.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I was most disappointed by the comments of my honorable colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who concluded his speech by reminding us of the difficult financial situation of one of the most important transport companies in Canada: The Glengarry Transport. I was disappointed because I was also reminded that we had had here in Parliament a debate on that very subject a few years ago when the Conservative government, contrary to advice by all those concernd in the transportation sector, insisted on proceeding with its deregulation.

We, in the Liberal Party of Canada, were opposed to this government policy and we warned it that deregulating transportation would be detrimental to several Canadian carriers, that Canadian trucking companies could not compete sucessfully with their American counterparts and that we were placing them in an excessively difficult situation because, as we pointed out at that time, both industries could not compete under the same set of rules since regulations in the United States were different from those in Canada and that in the long and the short term, deregulation would result in a considerable amount of job losses in the transportation industry in Canada and that several Canadian firms would have to close down their operations.

Now, we know what happened at CN Transport, a company that the government sold off in a fire sale.

M. Boudria: It was a giveaway!

Mr. Ouellet: My collegue, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, says it was given away for nothing. That is practically the case! It is one of the most surprising transactions I have ever seen, to say the least. In fact, some people questioned this transaction, which favored totally insolvent investors. These people became owners of a Crown corporation only to sell it off a few months late. They laid off thousands of CN truck workers. These lost jobs clearly that the government's Crown corporations privatisation program was a complete failure.

Today, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell spoke of another transport company established in his constituency suffering the same disadvantages of deregulation. I can only feel very disappointed by this situation.

I would like, in the few minutes that I have left, to come back to the unemployment problem in Montréal. I made a little while ago some comments on certain remarks made by my colleague, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. I cannot help but share his views to the effect that the Tory government did not fullfil its obligations following the release of the Picard report's. Clearly, this government do not have the political will to maintain Montreal as one of the main industrial centers in Canada and the federal government has totally given up its responsibility toward the Montreal naval shipyards as well as the train engines that were made for years and years in the East of Montreal and the transportation area since the Dorval—Mirabel issue, which was a priority in the Picard Report, has still not been resolved four years and a half later.

The great promises of the conservative government have not been achieved and the whole Montreal transportation industry is paying the price.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to continue what I was saying in my comments to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

In the few moments that are left to me I want to reiterate the importance of the main resource, that is the fishing industry, to Newfoundland and, indeed, to my riding; its impact and how it relates to the transfer payments. Life has been difficult for us because of the federal government's fiscal freeze.

Historically Newfoundland and Labrador have been subject to economic forces that unfortunately have been beyond our control. Our traditional dependence on the resource-based export industries means that external forces have a tremendous impact on the province and our economy.

If I put it another way, Newfoundland has become excessively dependent on fiscal transfers from the Government of Canada because of the limited development and the lack of diversification that is possible in the economy. An increase or decrease, depending on the over-all economic performance of the Canadian economy and indeed the philosophical approach the federal government shows with respect to regional disparity, has a driving and an overriding effect on Newfoundlanders and their economic way of life.

Relevant to our discussion this morning and this afternoon, in the past few years and coincident with the declining economic performance in Canada, the future of the fishery, which is the economic backbone of our province and indeed, of most of Atlantic Canada, has been seriously eroded.

Anyone who sat in this House over the last two and a half years would not be surprised to hear that. I want to give some indication of how much.

Over the past few years there has been progressively greater quota reductions, and the result is that the groundfish landings have declined by over 60,000 tonnes in the past few years. That is a tremendous decrease. A major contributor to the decline of our groundfish continues to be foreign overfishing inside and outside the 200-mile economic zone. The government of the day, whether it is Liberal, whether it is Conservative, whatever it is, that government has to become aware of the necessity to take some Draconian measures to restore the fishing industry to a reasonable level, like it was before.

I could go on for a long time, but I want to make the point that we must be the only country in the world that allows foreigners to harvest the very national resource on which the living of our region and that of the country depends.

I have to refer to the days eights years ago when people talked about a 400,000 tonne total allowable catch. That is the measure of what we do in Newfoundland. TAC it is called, 400,000. We are looking at less than 200,000 today. This is a very simple point. It can be confused with all kinds of caveats and all kinds of perturbations and all kinds of arguments. The fact remains that the foreign overfishing that has taken place inside the 200-mile limit, which is condoned and indeed encouraged by the Government of Canada, is the same level of foreign fishing that took place when the total allowable catch was twice what it is now.

You do not need a Ph.D. in fishing resource industry to understand that there is something dramatically wrong with that. There will be a price to pay. If we cut down the foreign fishing inside the 200-mile limit we may suffer some loss of trade. That trade-off has to be made and it has to be made soon. That is probably the most important thing that we can achieve in my mind, as far as the fishing industry is concerned, in the next couple of years until this Parliament completes.

The second problem is foreign overfishing outside the 200-mile limit. I am personally, and I know a lot of my colleagues are and I believe some members on the other side, in favour of extending Canadian jurisdiction to the nose and the tail of the bank, which is outside the 200-mile limit, but it gives Canada control of a resource that we own. How does a fish know if it is inside or outside the 200-mile limit? Can it be done? They said that we could not increase the three-mile limit to twelve miles. It was done. They said that we could not increase the 12-mile limit to a 200-mile limit. It was done.

They are telling me that I cannot increase the 200–mile limit to the nose and the tail of the bank. It can be done and I am sure someday it will be done.

I thank you for your indulgence. I think it is a great privilege to have the opportunity to finish off the last session of this Parliament as the last speaker, and I thank you for the opportunity.
