Archdeacon Farrar said no one should regard this great question of intemperance except as one of much solemnity and pathos—no one who had witnessed the great evils of drunkenness—the degredation and misery which it brought upon thousands of human beings in every part of this kingdom—no one who has seen, as he had seen, the appalling amount of crime, vice, and poverty which it was occasioning, would regard the question otherwise than as serious and solemn. As illustrating some of the peculiar influences of alcohol, he pointed out its tendency, to overcome people by the hereditary transmission of its influences, and its tendency, also, to grow upon those who immediately used it. It was one of those chemical substances which created a craving for themselves—a craving which was neither hunger, nor thirst, nor necessity of any kind; but a physical perversion—a mechanical craving—a burning for a dead substance, which had the power to lay up men's souls in chains, which were more weighty than chains of iron; and to shut them up in prisons, the walls of which were harder than of stone. (Applause). As showing how the influence of drink overcame the most elevated and the most cultured of minds, the lecturer instanced the closing days of Prince Charles Edward Stuart, and of Robert Burns, and of others distinguished in art, letters, and on the battle-field; and he asked, if drink had overcome minds so strong, so elevated, so cultured as these, how much more deadly must its influence be on the weak, the degraded, the ignorant masses of the people, among whom the licensed houses in this country were set down? Yet it was the fact that it was exactly among these weak and ignorant people and poor people that the licensed houses were planted—it was exactly where strength of resistance was at its minimuin. (Applause). And the result of this fact, to a great measure, was that, while we spent 70 millions of money a year on bread, 70 millions on rent, 11 millions on education, and a little more than one million on Christian missions, we spend 136 millions a year, on an average, on intoxicating drink. (Applause.) Until we alter that state of things, we must always have the great ulcer of vice and pauperism amongst us. The question of temperance reform was one that pressed upon the whole country; and at this moment the question was of unusual importance. At this time the lecturer adverted to the views of eminent judges, eminent medical men, eminent clergymen, and eminent statesmen, all of whom declared, with Mr. Bright, that, if we for ten years only would become a nation of abstainers, we should be in a condition of such prorperity as hardly to be recoguized again; and with Mr. Gladstone, whose words zent a thrill of emotion through that most unemotionable body, the British House of Commons, and who declared that intemperance causes evils worse, because more continuous, than the three historic scourges of history—war, famine, and pestilence combined—and that it was the measure of our degredation and disgrace. (Applause.) Drunkenness was a national crime; and he would apply to it the words of Oliver Cromwell—"National crime is a thing which God will reckon for, and I wish it would not lie on the nation one day longer than we have the opportunity to find a remedy." (Applause.) Proceeding to notice some of the objections taken to the movement of temperance reformers, Archdeacon Farrar said there was, first, the sham bible argument—the perverted expositions of the Word of God which were used to defend the crimes and vices of men. He would not try to argue with those who tried to put the Bible between us and the crimes and vices of the nation. He would say to those people, in the words of Shakespeare:—

Having waste ground enough,
Shall we desire to raze the Sanctuary
And pitch our evils there?

Neither would he notice the sham liberty argument, which was used always with great authority by the publicans. (Laughter.) There was no kind of liberty except that which lay in obedince to salutary laws; and, therefore, between drink and freedom there was simply irreconcileable opposition. The resentless tyranny of drink he would illustrate. Lucio addresses Claudia:—

Why, how now, Claudia? Whence comes
This restraint?

And Claudia replies:—

From too much liberty, my Lucio, liberty.
As surfeit is the father of much fast,
So every scope by the immoderate use
Turns to restraint: Our natures do pursue,
(Like rats that ravine down their proper bane),
A thirsty evil, and when we drink, we die.

(Loud applause.) As regards the experience argument, that people could not make men sober by Act of Parliament, Archdeacon Farrar gave that assertion the flattest contradiction. Temperance reformers were taunted with the statement that what they wanted was "grandmotherly legislation"; but he would remind them that it was to "grandmotherly legislation" that they owed the Factory Acts, the Education Acts, the Sanitary Acts, the Free Public Libraries Acts, the Acts that shut up gambling hells, the Acts that checked leprous literature, the Acts that prevented tender children from being treated like machines, the Acts that prevented women from being used like degraded beasts of burden in the black mines of our collieries, and many other beneficial statutes in favour of our common humanity. (Applause.) In conclusion the lecturer declared that if young men, combined would declare to resist this great evil of intemperance, they would win a victory, not only for themselves, but for their country and for the world. Truth was on their side; mercy was on their side, the souls of all great and good men who had ever taken part in any great struggle for the reformation of humanity, were on their side. God Himself was on their side. He concluded with the appeal to all that heard him—Will you be on our side? (Applause.) There was no higher or nobler task that they could possibly devote their energies to, and no work in which they could hope to reap a better reward. (Applause.)

THE HOUSEHOLD.

AVOIDING DOCTOR'S BILLS.

Health Hints and Happy Thoughts for Everybody.

A bottle of arnica should always be kept in the house; it is good for bruises, sprains or aches in the joints.

Sleeping with the arms thrown over the head is unhealthy. The position interfers with the action of the lungs.

A little salt should be applied to a pin scratch or one given by a cat. It is painful for a few moments but removes all poison.

Inhaling hot water and salt is excellent for catarrh. Sleeping with the mouth open is apt to bring on this disagreeable trouble.

Deer feet boiled to a jelly and the liquid strained is one of the best remedies for chilblains. It should be applied to the feet and hands every evening before retiring.

The eating of fish is said to increase the brain power, but if it is eaten more than once a day, and not very much then, it is said the brain will grow smaller instead of larger.

Weak eyes should be bathed night and morning, warm water being used just before retiring and the same on rising, increasing it gradually to as cold water as can be borne.

Most people forget, although they know better, that they should run, skate and dance with the mouth closed. They tire less easily and are not almost breathless when they stop.

Hot or very cold water is the best to apply to a bruise. Hot water is the better of the two, but unless it can be procured immediately it is best to use it ice cold and not warm or slightly hot.

Boiled milk, with a little sugar or salt added to it, is one of the best articles of food for building up the system. Milk just slightly heated is better than cold milk at this season. A person whose health is run down, but who is not actually sick, and whose appetite is poor, can build up their health by drinking a glass of milk at every meal and at all times instead of water.

Sol's rays raise thyme, time razes all,

Mr. Alex. Robinson, of Exeter, in writing about one of the most popular articles, and one that has done more good to the afflicted than any other medicine has during the short time it has been in existence, says: "I have used four bottles of Northrop & Lyman's Vegetable Discovery and Dyspeptic Cure, and have been cured of Dyspepsia that troubled me for over ten years. Part of that time I had it very bad, and was at considerable expense trying to get relief, but this excellent remedy was the first and only relief I received."

And through the whole hole wears.

Holloway's Pills.—In order that the slightest indisposition may not rapidly run its disastrous course from bad to worse, the afflicted of every age should give it immediate attention. A few doses of these thoroughly purifying and strengthening Pills will always be beneficial when the least disorder reigns or when nervous fears oppress. Two or three Pills at bed time have the happiest effect in promoting perfect digestion, whereby the muscles are rendered more vigorous, the spirits more buoyant, and the entire frame more hardy. Holloway's medicine increases the quantity of nutriment derivable from a given quantity of food, and so the quality of the blood is improved, the tone of every fibre throughout the body is heightened, and the disposition to fall into disease is reduced to a minimum.

Our Canadian Silk Industry is prosperous. The great difficulty to be contended with is the low grade of good required. Is nothing is this more apparent than in the comparatively small article of sewing silks. Belding, Paul and Co., make three grades of spool silk; of these different qualities the poorest one has by far the largest sale, at the same time they constantly hear of complaints of poor sewing silk. If ladies will take the trouble to ask for Belding, Paul & Co.'s own brand, and see that their name is on the end of each spool, they will be sure of getting the best made. 76y.

SCROFULA

and all scrofulous diseases, Sores, Erysipelas, Eczema, Blotches, Ringworm, Tumors, Carbuncles, Boils, and Eruptions of the Skin, are the direct result of an impure state of the blood.

To cure these diseases the blood must be purified, and restored to a healthy and natural condition. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA has for over forty years been recognized by eminent medical authorities as the most powerful blood purifier in existence. It frees the system from all foul humors, enriches and strengthens the blood, removes all traces of mercurial treatment, and proves itself a complete master of all scrofulous diseases.

A Recent Cure of Scrofulous Sores.

"Some months ago I was troubled with scrofulous sores (ulcers) on my legs. The limbs were badly swollen and inflamed, and the sores discharged large quantities of offensive matter. Every remedy I tried failed, until I used AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, of which I have now taken three bottles, with the result that the sores are healed, and my general health greatly improved. I feel very grateful for the good your medicine has done me.

Yours respectfully, MRS. ANN O'BRIAN."
148 Sullivan St., New York, June 24, 1882.

☞ All persons interested are invited to call on Mrs. O'Brian; also upon the Rev. Z. P. Wilds of 58 East 54th Street, New York City, who will take pleasure in testifying to the wonderful efficacy of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, not only in the cure of this lady, but in his own case and many others within his knowledge.

The well-known writer on the Boston Herald, B. W. BALL, of Rochester, N.H., writes, June 7, 1882:

"Having suffered severely for some years with Eczema, and having failed to find relief from other remedies, I have made use, during the past three months, of AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, which has effected a complete cure. I consider it a magnificent remedy for all blood diseases."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

stimulates and regulates the action of the digestive and assimilative organs, renews and strengthens the vital forces, and speedily cures Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Rheumatic Gout, Catarrh, General Debility, and all diseases arising from an impoverished or corrupted condition of the blood, and a weakened vitality.

It is incomparably the cheapest blood medicine, on account of its concentrated strength, and great power over disease.

An Ambitious Woman.

BY EDGAR FAWCETT.

CHAPTER XIII.

A long chain of days followed, each in every way like the other. One steady yet lazy wind pulsed from the south; the skies were clad with an unaltering blue haze from dawn till dark, except that a rosy flush, like a kind of languid aurora, would steal into the full round of the horizon with each new sunset, and stay until evening had first empurpled it, then darkened it completely. Afterwards the stars would come forth, golden, globular and rayless, while the same unchanged southerly wind would get a damp sharpness that made at least a light wrap needful if one remained out of doors. The great piazza would be almost vacant an hour or so after nightfall, and the whole shore quite lonely.

As regarded after-dark visitors, the island had virtually closed its season. But Claire and Hollister haunted the piazza a good deal when the early autumnal darkness had emptied it of its occupants. After they had dined he would light his cigar, and then select a hundred yards or so of the firm wooden flooring, over which they passed and repassed, arm in arm, more times than perhaps both their healthful young frames realized. The other guests of the hotel doubtless conjectured that they were saying all sorts of tender trifles to each other, according to the immemorial mode of those from whom the honeymoon has not yet withdrawn her witching spells. But in reality there was very little between them of what we term lover-like discourse. Claire discouraged it in her husband, who obeyed the tacit mandate.

She was prosaic and practical on these occasions. It amused and charmed Hollister to find her so. In any guise that it chose to wear, her personality was an enchantment. Claire planned just how they were to live on their return to town, and he thought her irresistible in this role of domestic anticipation.

"We shall have to find apartments," she told him. We cannot afford to rent a house of our own. But apartments are very nice and respectable. They are quite different from a boarding house, you know I should be sorry if we were compelled to board."

"So should I," declared Hollister. "Are you sure that we have not enough to let us rent a small house?"

Claire's eyes glistened, as though the chance of their income being made to stretch thus far suggested charming possibilities. But she soon gave a sad shake of the head. "No," she decided. "We should only find ourselves running into debt. We had better take no rash risks. Your business is full of them as it is, Herbert. Besides a year or two may make the change easy for us."

She amazed him by the speed with which she learned just how his affairs stood. Her quick mastery of facts that with most women baffle both memory and understanding, was no less rare than thorough. It had always been thus with her. Whatever she wanted to comprehend became her mental possession after slight and brief effort. It was not long before she read the price-list of stocks in the morning papers with nearly as lucid a perception of what it meant as Hollister himself. She made her husband explain as well as he could—and this was by no means ill—both the theory and practice of Wall Street speculation. She soon began to know all his important investments, and to talk of them with facile glibness.

Her control over Hollister daily strengthened. She would have swayed a man of much firmer will, and it is certain that he grew steadily more deferent to her judgment, her counsel, or even her caprices. The desire that she so plainly laid bare to him he had already estimated as a most right and natural development. In his eyes it was touched with no shade of selfishness; its egotism was to be readily enough condoned; one lighted self-assertion in those whom nature had wrought of finer stature, from better clay. The queen pined for throne and sceptre; they were a debt owed her by the world; she could not help being born royal.

It irritated him that those people in the hotel whom she had expressed a wish to know, should not have sought her acquaintance and society. She must have struck them as a creature of great beauty and grace. Why had they not been won into paying her tribute? This was Hollister's fond way of putting the matter to his own thoughts.

A few of these same people still remained. They formed a little clique among themselves; they, too, were waiting for the drowsy and torpid weather to wake up and send them townward. They saw Claire daily, almost hourly, and yet they never showed a sign of caring to do more than see her. Hollister secretly resented their indifference. His pride perhaps conspired with his love in making him bring Claire a fresh supply of flowers every evening, that she might wear them brilliantly knotted in the bosom of her dress. She remonstrated with him on the extravagance of this little devoted act, but for once he overruled her protest by a reference to the cheapness of flowers at that especial season. She always wore the flowers. Jutting forth in a rich mass from the delicate symmetry of her breast, they became her to perfection, as their lovely contact becomes all save the most ill-favored women. She allowed Hollister to continue his pleasant, flattering gift. The mirror in her dressing-room was of generous proportions.

By day she liked to stroll the shore, or sit with a book on one of the many benches, and watch, when not reading, the pale blue sweep of ocean, smooth as oil, and flecked with a few white-winged ships. Some of the sails were so faint and far away to the eye that they made her think of blossoms blown by a random breeze clear out into the misty offing. But now and then a boat would move past, tugging the shore, and wearing on its breadth of canvas huge black letters that advertised a soap, a washing powder or perhaps a quack medicine.

The tender poetry in sky or sea gave these relentless merchantmen (if the term be not inapt) a most glaring oddity. But Claire did not wholly dislike, after all, the busy push of life and traffic which they so harshly indicated. If she had been less capable of understanding just how vulgar a note they struck, she might have disapproved of them more stoutly. As it was, she accepted their intrusion with full recognition of its ugliness, yet with a latent and peculiar sympathy. It reminded her of the vast mercantile city that lay so near—the city where her young husband was seeking to augment his gains, and by a process of slight essential difference.

But curiously in contrast with this fueling was Claire's mode of now and then speaking to the shabby people who frequented the shore, and repeatedly giving them alms when this or that woful story of want would meet her ears. Past experiences made her singularly keen in detecting all the sham tales of beggars. She had learned the real dialect of poverty, and her sense was quick to perceive any suspicious flaw in its melancholy syntax.

More than once she would engage little dingy-clad children in converse, and nearly always a coin would be slipped into their hands at parting. But one day it happened that a child of smart gear, a little girl about five years old, came up to her side and began prattling on the subject of a sandy structure which the plump, tiny hands had just erected, a few yards away.

The child had a fat, stupid face, which was shaded by a big, costly-looking hat, along whose brim coiled a fashionable white plume. Every other detail of her dress implied wealthy parentage. Her little form exhaled a soft perfume, as of violets. She looked up into Claire's face with dull, unintelligent eyes, but with a droll assumption of intimacy, while chattering her fluent nonsense regarding the product of her recent sportive toil. Claire was not prepossessed, but at the same time she took the little creature's hand very socially, and listened to her brisk confidences with amiable heed.

But a French bonne, in a fluted cap, suddenly appeared on the scene, and cut short the child's further overtures of friendship by drawing her away with swift force and a gust of voluble French reprimand. The child broke into peevish screams, and was at once lifted by the strong arms of the bonne, just as a lady abruptly joined them. The lady shook her forefinger at the child, while she was being borne away with passionate clamor.

"Tu as ete tres mechante," exclaimed the new-comer, remaining stationary, but following with a turn of the head and unrelaxed finger this tragic departure. "Nous avions peur que tu ne fus tombee dans la mer. Tais-toi, Louise, et sois bon enfant!"

Distance soon drowned the lamentations of little Louise, and the lady now addressed herself to Claire.

"I hope my bad little girl hasn't been troubling you," she said. "It is really the nurse's fault that she strayed away in this wild style. Aline is horridly careless. I've already discharged her and that makes her more so. Last week at Newport the poor child nearly fell over the cliffs because of that woman's outrageous neglect."

"Your little girl was in no danger here, I think," said Claire smiling.

"Oh, no; of course not," returned the lady. She gave Claire a direct, scanning look, and then dropped upon the bench beside her. "Coney Island is very different from Newport. We had a cottage there all summer. Do you know Newport?"

"No," said Claire. "It is a very delightful place, is it not?"

"Well, yes," returned the lady, with a covert dissent in her admission. "It's nice, but it's awfully stiff."

"Do you mean ceremonious?" asked Claire.

"Yes. I got frightfully tired of it. I always do. My husband likes it, and so I go on his account. I'd much rather go to Narragansett or Mount Desert. They're more like real country, don't you know? You haven't got to button your gloves all the time, and pose your parasol. You're not bothered with thinking whom you shall know and whom you shan't. You can let yourself loose. I love to let myself loose. But you can't do it in Newport. Everybody there is on a kind of high horse. Now I like to come down, once in a while, and ride a pony."

The lady gave a shrill, short laugh as she ended these words. Claire had already noted all her personal details. She was tall of figure and extremely slender. She had a sharp-cut face which would have gained by not being of so chill a pallor. Her black eyes were full of restless brilliancy; her lips were thin, and marked at their rims by a narrow bluish line.

She carried herself with an air of importance, but her manner was very far from the least supercilious display. She promptly impressed you as a woman whose general definition was a democratic one, though aristocracy might also be among her minor meanings. She had no claims to beauty; she was too meagre in point of flesh, too severe in general contour, too acute in her angles. She lacked all the charm of feminine curves; she was a living conspiracy of straight lines. You could not closely observe her without remarking the saliency of her joints; she seemed put together on a plan of cruel keenness. At the same time her motions were not awkward, but managed her rectilinear body with a surprising ease and pliancy.

Her health appeared excellent, notwithstanding her thin frame and chalky color. The warmth, speed, and geniality of her speech, evidently springing from high animal spirits, no doubt enforced this inference.

Claire felt not a little puzzled by her, and had an immediate wish to find out just who she was. On the afternoon of yesterday she had once or twice joined the patrician group and had chatted with this or that member of it, apparently on the most familiar terms. Claire already knew, having thus observed her, that she was a recent arrival. But past experiences made it seem quite probable that she was merely a tolerated nobody. "Would she join me like this and address me so affably," Claire asked herself, "if she were some old friend of real note?"

At the same time, any trace of such self-depreciation was far enough from showing itself in Claire's spoken answer.

"Everything is tiresome, I suppose," she said, "if there is too great a supply of it. For my own part, I think that I like the conventionalities, as they are called. I haven't seen enough of them in my life to be wearied by them. I have known what poverty is in other years, and now, when I contrast it with the little ceremonies and forms that accompany prosperity, I find myself rather glad that they exist."

Her companion looked surprised for a moment. She put her thin face rather close to Claire's. The candor of the latter was a novelty. Claire had used it with a somewhat subtle intent. Her fleet tact had told her that it was best frankly to count herself outside of the social pale behind which she more than suspected this garrulous matron belonged.

"Oh, so you've been poor?" came the somewhat rattling response. "But of course you're not so now, or you would not speak of it. Poverty must be so perfectly awful. I mean when people who . . . well, don't you know, the people who live in tenement-houses, and all that."

The speaker here paused, while arranging the long mousquetaire gloves that reached in tawny wrinkles far up either sharp arm.

"Well," she suddenly recommenced, "I dare say I ought to care more for style and form and fashion. I was brought up right in the midst of it. All my relations are perfectly devoted to it. They look on me as a kind of black sheep, don't you know? They say I'm always going into the highways and hedges to pick up my friends. But I don't mind them; I laugh at them. They're here now in full force. There are two of the Hackensacks, and two of the Van Corlears, and two of the Van Kortlandts—all cousins of mine, more or less removed. I was a Van Kortlandt before I married. I'm Mrs. Manhattan Diggs, now, and I have been for five years. The best of the joke is that my husband, whom I perfectly dote on, by the way, and who's the dearest in all Christendom, disapproves of me as much as my relations do. The other day he called me a Red Republican, because I said society in New York was all trash. So it is trash. It's money, money, and nothing else. When he makes me dreadfully mad I throw his name at him. Diggs, you know. Isn't it frightful? His mother was a Manhattan—one of the real old stock, and she married a man by that name—an Englishman with a fortune. If he hadn't been rich I'd have pitied my poor husband. He'd never have made a dollar. I tell him that all he can do is to sit in the club window, and drive, and bet, and play cards. But he's just as lovely to me as he can be, so I don't mind. I worship him, and he worships me, so we get on splendidly together, of course. . . . And now I've told you my name, you must tell me yours. I hope it's prettier than mine. It ought to be, you're so immensely pretty yourself."

"My name is Mrs. Hollister," said Claire. "Mrs. Herbert Hollister. I have been married only a few weeks."

"A bride! Really? How delightful! Do you actually mean it? I dote on brides. I'm sure we shall be friends."

They rapidly became so. Claire was by no means averse to the arrangement. Mrs. Diggs was violent, explosive, precipitate, but she was not vulgar. Besides, her roots, so to speak, were in the soil that Claire liked. They lunched together that day at one of the little tables in the vast, airy dining-room. While they were seated at the meal, several of the elegant ladies passed on their way toward other tables. Mrs. Diggs nodded to each of them familiarly, and her nods were distinctly returned. Claire took special note of this latter point.

"Your relations will think you have deserted them," she said.

Mrs. Diggs laughed. "They think I'm always deserting them," she exclaimed. "I don't believe my absence is a great affliction; they manage to endure it. . . . Oh, by the way, here comes Cousin Cornelia Van Horn. She must have arrived to-day. Excuse me for a moment. I'll have to go and speak to her."

Mrs. Diggs hastily rose and went toward a lady who was herself in the act of crossing the room, but who paused on seeing her approach. The meeting took place not far from where Claire was seated. She saw Mrs. Diggs give her kinswoman a kiss on each cheek like the quick peck of a bird. They were cheeks that time had faded a little, but the face to which they belonged had a haughty loveliness all its own.

At least five-and-thirty years had rounded her figure into soft exuberance, mellowing but scarcely marring its past harmonies. She was very blonde; her eyebrows, each a perfect arch, and the plenteous hair worn in a dry, crisp matwork low over her white forehead, were just saved from too pale a flaxen by the least yellow tinge. Her features were cut like those of a cameo, but they were too small and too near together for positive beauty, while her eyelids had too deep a droop, and her nose, by nature lifted too high at the extreme tip, lost nothing of the pride, even the arrogance it bespoke, from the exquisite poise of her head above a long throat and sloping shoulders. Claire decided that she had never seen a woman so stately and yet so lightsome, or one who could so clearly suggest the serenity and repose of great self-esteem without thrusting its offensive scorn into harsh evidence.

Mrs. Diggs remained with her new companion several minutes. Her severe back, in all its rather trying outlines, was presented to Claire during this interval, though once she slightly turned, making a little gesture with her bony hand that seemed to indicate either the table she had just quitted or the figure still seated there. And soon afterward Claire saw that the person whom she had heard named by Mrs. Diggs was looking steadily at her with a pair of cold, light-blue eyes. While she returned this look it struck her that a change of color touched the placid face of her observer, though the flush for faint pink into pink only by a shade less dim might easily have passed for a trick of deceptive fancy.

Mrs. Diggs presently came trotting back to the table, with her odd combination of graceful movement and bodily sharpness.

"Mr. dear Mrs. Hollister," she began, while seating herself, "do you know that Cousin Cornelia knows all about you. I happened to mention your name before you were married—Miss Twining, wasn't it?"

"Yes," replied Claire.

"Well, the name seemed to strike her, and she at once asked if you had not stayed quite a long time with Mrs. . . . Mrs. . . . Oh, you mentioned her when you spoke of being here several weeks before your marriage."

"Mrs. Bergemann," said Claire, and immediately added, in tones full of quiet interest: "Well, Mrs. Diggs?"

"Why, that was what placed you, don't you know, with Cousin Cornelia. Yes, Mrs. Bergemann; that was the name."

"Did your cousin know Mrs. Bergemann?" inquired Claire.

"She didn't say so. But she appeared to know just who you were. I think she's going to make me present you. There seems to be some queer mystery. She acted rather strangely. Are you sure you've never met before?"

"Yes, I am perfectly sure," answered Claire. "Did you not say that the lady's name was Van Horn?"

"Cousin Cornelia's? Why, yes; of course it is. She's my second cousin. She's related on the Van Kortlandt side. She was a Miss Thurston."

"Thurston," repeated Claire, not interrogatively, but as though she had caught the sound with recognition the instant it left the speaker's lips. She broke into a smile now. "That explains everything. She is a sister of Mr. Beverley Thurston, is she not?"

"Cousin Beverley? Of couse she is. Do you know him?"

"Oh, yes," said Claire. "I knew him very well."

"Why, you don't tell me so!" blithely exclaimed Mrs. Diggs. "I dote on Beverley. I suppose he thinks me dreadful, but I dote on him, just the same. He is so broad, don't you know? He's seen so much, read so much, and lived so much, generally. And with it all he's so conventional. That is the way I like conventionality—when you find it in some one who makes it a sort of fatigue-dress for liberal views, and not the uniform of narrow ones."

"I approve of your description of Mr. Thurston," said Claire, slowly. "It tells me how well you like him."

Mrs. Diggs creased her forehead in puzzled style, and bent her head closer toward Claire's. "What on earth do you suppose it was that made him dart off so suddenly to Europe?" she asked.

Claire stooped, as though to discover some kind of objectionable speck in the cup of chocolate that she was stirring, and then removed what she had found, with much apparent care. "He did go quite unexpectedly, did he not?" she said, lowering her head still more as she put the speck on her saucer and examined it with an excellent counterfeit of the way we regard such things when uncertain whether their origin be animal or vegetable. She wondered to herself, at the same time, whether Mrs. Diggs would notice her increased color, or whether she herself had merely imagined that her color had undergone any sort of change. "At some other time," she went on, letting the words loiter in utterance, with a very neat simulation of preoccupied attention . . . "at some other time, Mrs. Diggs, I should like to talk more with you about Mrs. Van Horn's brother. But just now I want to ask you about Mrs. Van Horn herself."

Here Claire briskly raised her head. The problem of the aggressive speck had seemingly been solved. "I have heard Mr. Thurston mention that he had a sister of that name," she continued, now speaking with speed, "but he told me almost nothing regarding her. She appears to be a very important person."

Mrs. Diggs glanced toward a distant table at which she had already seen her cousin seat herself. Then she turned to Claire again, as though confident of how safely remote was the lady whom she at once proceeded to discuss.

"Cornelia is a very important person, Mrs. Hollister. As I told you, she's my second cousin. I used to see a good deal more of her before I was married. She's at least ten years older than I am. She brought me out into society. I was an orphan, don't you know, and there was nobody else to bring me out. I had to be brought out, for I was eighteen, and all the rest of the family were either too old, or else had gone to Europe, or . . . well, something of that sort. So Cornelia gave me a great ball. It was splendidly civil of her. But I don't think she did it from the least benevolence. No, not at all. She had ended her term of widowhood, and wanted to appear again, don't you know? The ball was magnificent, and it gathered all her old clientele about her. I remember it so well; it is only eight years ago. I stood at her side, behind a towering burden of bouquets which it made my wrist ache to hold. Cornelia was in white satin, with knots of violets all over her dress. I shall never forget that dress. She wore amethysts round her throat, and in her hair, and on her arms. It was a kind of jubilant second-mourning, don't you know? She looked superb; she was eight years younger than she is now. People gathered about her and paid their court. She resumed old acquaintances; she received open or whispered compliments; she was the event of the evening. I was nearly ignored. And yet it was my ball; it had been given for me, to celebrate my debut in society. But as the evening progressed I began to discover that I had been made a mere pretext. Cornelia herself was the real reason of the ball. She had simply used me as an excuse for re-emerging. She re-emerged, by the way, with seventy thousand a year, and a reputation for having been one of the reigning belles of New York before she married Winthrop Van Horn. She was poor when she married Winthrop, and he lived only a few years afterward. He left her every penny of his money; there were no children. Cornelia was a devoted wife; at least, I never heard it contradicted, and I've somehow always accepted it. I think everybody has always accepted it, too. He died of consumption in Bermuda, and it is usually taken for granted, don't you know, that he died in Cornelia's arms. For my part, I can't imagine anybody dying in Cornelia's arms. . . . But that's neither here nor there. She kept herself as quiet as a mouse for five years. But mice are nomadic, and they gnaw everything. And Cornelia, during those five years of bereaved woe, to my certain knowledge, took a peep at every capital in Europe. After the ball—the ball that she gave me, please to understand—she became a great leader. She's a great leader still. Didn't Beverley tell you that, Mrs. Hollister?"

"No," stated Claire, keenly interested by this nimble monologue. "As I said, Mr. Thurston scarcely did more than mention his sister's name."

Mrs. Diggs applied herself actively to a fragment of cold chicken, which she had left neglected through all these elucidating items. Claire watched her, thinking how clever she was and yet how unsircumspect. With what slight incentive had been roused this actual whirlwind of family confidences!

"She perfectly adores Beverley," Mrs. Diggs presently continued. "I have an idea that she does so because he's a Thurston—or rather because she's one. She has contrived to make it appear very exceptional to be a Thurston. The Thurstons have never been anything whatever. Her mother married into the family, and cast a spell of aristocracy over them. But Cornelia never alludes to the Van Kortlandt connection. She knows that can take care of itself. I believe her grandfather, on the other side, was a saddler. But she has managed to have it seriously disputed whether he was a saddler or a landed Knickerbocker grandee. The panels of her carriage bear a Thurston crest. It is a very pretty one; I am quite sure she invented it. I once told Beverley so, and he laughed. He has never used it, though he has never denounced it as spurious. The joke is that she ignores the Van Horn crest entirely, which is the only one she has any right to air. Cornelia is a great leader, as I said. She has Thursday evenings in the big old house on Washington Square which her late husband left her. Lots of people have struggled to go to Cornelia's Thursdays, and not gone, after all. It's absolutely funny to observe what a vogue she has got. She could make anybody whom she chose to take up a social somebody by merely lifting her finger. But she never lifts her finger. That is why she is so run after. You can't get her to use the power she possesses. It yearly grows more of a power, don't you know, on this very account. It's like a big deposit in a bank, that gets bigger through lying there untouched. She wont spend a penny; she lets it grow. The women of New York are becoming a good deal less flippant, some of them, than they used to be. Clubs and receptions have come into fashion, where intellectual matters are seriously, even capably discussed. Somebody will read a paper on something sensible and literary, and a little debate will follow. At one of these clubs—composed strictly of women—it is forbidden to mention the last ball, though this may have occurred on the preceding night, and everybody may have seen everybody else there, talking the usual gay nonsense. The whole thing is a kind of 'movement,' don't you know. It's very picturesque and it's extremely in earnest. It makes one think a little of the old historical French salons. It has laid bare some charming and surprising discoveries. It has shown how many women have been reading and thinking in secret during those long intervals of leisure that have occurred between their opportunities for being publicly silly, inane, flirtatious, and hence of correct form. On the other hand it has led certain women to cultivate their minds as they would a new style of dressing their hair. All that we used to satirize in former entertainments of this kind fails to exist in those I am describing. Pipe-stem curls and blue spectacles are replaced by the most Parisian felicities of costume. A delightful-looking creature in a Worth dress that fits her like a glove will give us her 'views' on the Irish land-question or the persecution of the Jews in Russia. . . . And now I come to the real object of my digression, as the long-winded orators say. Cornelia Van Horn frowns upon all this. She has gathered about her a little faction, too, which frowns obediently in her defense. You must not fancy for a moment that Cornelia could not shine in these assemblies if she chose to favor them. She has brains enough to outshine nearly all their supporters. But she condemns the intellectual tendency in women when thus openly exhibited. If they want to read and think, they should do it in the quiet of their closets, and in the same way that they write their letters, or glance over their accounts, or distribute their household orders. There is no objection to philosophy, science, belles-lettres, so long as they are not made to interfere with the general dignified commonplace of the higher social life. To be individual, argumentative, reformatory, is to be professional. To be professional is not to be 'good form.' The moment that a drawing-room is made to resemble a lecture-room or a seminary it becomes odious from a patrician stand-point. Only queens and duchesses can afford to paint pictures or to write books without loss of caste. A consistent aristocracy never discovers new ideas; it accepts old ones. Agitators are the enemies of repose, and repose is the soul of refinement."

Here Mrs. Diggs gave a gleeful trill of laughter that made Claire compare it to her mind, as well as her person; it was so clear and sharp.

"Oh, you can't imagine," she went on, "how radical Cornelia is in her positively feudal conservatisms. I'm so liberal, don't you know, that I can appreciate her narrowness. I relish it as one does a delicious joke. But it's a very curious sort of bigotry. There's nothing in the least spontaneous about it. I've a conviction that she sweeps her eye more widely over this fine Nineteenth Century than any of the ladies I've been telling you about. She has seen that she can only reign on one kind of a throne, and she sticks there. And I assure you there isn't the least doubt that she reigns in good earnest. . . . I'm surprised that Beverley Thurston didn't tell you about her. Beverley has got her measure so exactly. He thinks me dreadful, as I said, but he's fond of me. I'm sure we always amuse each other."

"No," said Claire, shaking her head slowly, "he was very reticent on the subject. Perhaps he thought I might want to know her if he painted her portrait as you have done. That would have been awkward for him provided his sister had declined my acquaintance. And I dare say she would have declined it, as I was not in her exclusive circle."

Mrs. Diggs put her head a little on one side. She was looking at Claire intently. A smile played like a faint flicker of light upon her thin lips, whose two bluish lines always kept the same tinge.

"Why are you so candid with me?" she said.

"Candid?" repeated Claire.

"Yes. Why do you show me that you would like to know Cornelia Van Horn?"

"Why?" still repeated Claire. "Did I show you that?"

"Not openly—not in so many words, don't you know. But I imagine it."

"You are very quick at imagining," said Claire with a little playful toss of the head. "Well, if you choose, I should like to know her. I should like to know any one who ranks herself high like that, and has a recognized claim. I have a fellow-feeling for ambitious people. I'm ambitious myself."

Mrs. Diggs seemed deeply amused. She lifted a forefinger and shook it at Claire.

"I'm afraid you're very ambitious," she said.

"Well, I am," admitted Claire, not knowing how much rosy and dimpled charm her face had got while she spoke the words. "I am quite willing to concede that I have aims, projects, intentions."

Mrs. Diggs threw back her head and laughed noisily. But she lowered her voice to a key much graver than her laugh, as she said:

"You are as clever as Cornelia in your way. Yes you are. I shouldn't be surprised if you were a good deal cleverer, too. I suspect there's a nice stock of discreet reserve under your candor."

Claire creased her brows in a slightly piqued manner. "That is not very pleasant to hear," she said.

Mrs. Diggs stretched out her hand across the table so pointedly and cordially that Cla

The Ingersoll Chronicle.

THURSDAY, APRIL 3, 1884.

ALMOST the last business transacted by the Local House was the adoption by the House of an address asking the appointment of a Commission to enquire into and investigate the bribery conspiracy. The Commission is to be composed of three judges, one at least of whom is to be a judge of the Supreme Court of Judicature of Ontario. The Commission is to be appointed by the Government, and the powers conferred upon it are ample for the most searching enquiry into the whole conspiracy. A sum of $10,000 has been voted to defray the expenses of the Commission, which is instructed to make "searching investigation" which the gravity of this last attempt at corruption demands.

The Senate has refused to sanction Mr. Charlton's Bill for the punishment of seduction and like offences. The Hamilton Times says: While we do not approve of the interference of the Senate with the legislation of the popular House, we are not sorry for the fate of Mr. Charleton's Bill. The moral effect of the idea that woman must be the guardine of her own virtue or suffer the punishment is good. The idea that the law will recompense her for the loss of it is bad. There are exceptional cases; the cases of orphans, wards employees, dependents and weak-minded girls, in whose behalf some legislation might be objectionable, but for a general principle, applicable to the women of Canada, the law should recognize that women know enough to take care of themselves and are expected to exercise their knowledge. Education is better than penal legislation as a promoter of chastity.

THE all-night session of the Ontario Legislature, which closed at a quarter to 4 o'clock Tuesday morning, 25th ult., was the latest but one in eleven years, and was marked by one amendment after another moved by the Opposition, without affecting the solid majority of the Government. There was in all twenty divisions taken, an exceptionally large number for one day's session. The whole number of previous divisions in the session was only eight. The amendments were chiefly in regard to License Duties, the Rivers and Streams Bill, and the amendments to the Election Act. On the latter Mr. Neelon voted with the Opposition; in almost every other vote he supported the Government, as he has voted in nearly all the other divisions of the session. At the first division there were only 63 members within reach of the division-call bell, and the Government suffered relatively more than the Opposition, the vote standing 36 to 27. On the next division a straight vote of 39 to 26 occurred, and during the remainder of the session the Government majority maintained about the same figure, and on one occasion was fourteen. On an Opposition resolution against the Rivers and Streams Bill, Mr. Blythe voted with the Government; and on the expenditures for colonization roads Mr. Clarke, of West Toronto, also voted against his own party. Had all the members been present the Government majority on one of the divisions would have been seventeen. Even on the Election Law amendments, on which Mr. Neelon voted against the Government, the Government majority was twelve by the actual count, and that vote represented in these cases the count which would have taken place had the House been full.

PAID MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.

(Communicated.)

So many "crooked" cases have been brought to light in our legislatures, and so many bills are passed by our representatives that would not be sustained by the people had they a direct voice in the matter, that we feel justified in saying there is a screw loose somewhere in our legislative system. Our American cousins whom we know to be far from spotless, look upon our House of Commons as a political pandemonium and hold up our representatives as examples of corruption. The same opinion is held, and frequently expressed, by many earnest, thoughtful men in this country. Every one of us can call to mind several gentlemen who entered the political arena poor and obscure, and are now, through subtile gladiatorial trickery, rich and well known. Not one of us would call them selfish since they have not only enriched themselves through "eminent services rendered" but have scattered large sums of public money broadcast upon those who have the good fortune to be related to them. Such a glorious opportunity to make money is not to be slighted by needy men who have, what we often hear called "the gift of gab," and who prefer living by their wits to living by labor. It seems as if those who framed our system of government had this class in view and sympathized with them. They settled $1000 per annum on the members. Where, under the sun, can a man sleep away a few hours each day for three or four months of the year, as many of our representatives do, and get such a liberal reward? The consequence is, our politics have become a trade, and a man can earn just as much at the trade of law-making, as he could if he were to turn burglar and make law-breaking his occupation, and though the means and principles practised by the two are often identical, the law-maker is never punished, but devises punishment for his law-breaking brother.

Look at the class this system draws to our legislative hall! What interest have they in the welfare of Canada? What care they for the laws they make? They depend upon their seat for their living and upon this position in parliament to make money. Their chief has a lot of snug box-stalls, and if they are only faithful to him and do what he requires at their hands, they are sure of a good position when they become unfit for service. We do not see any of this bare-faced corruption in the British House of Commons, because the members have nothing to gain there unless they work for the welfare of the community, and, thereby, their own interests as part of that community. No member of the British Commons receives a cent for his time or services, and the consequence is, the people get no adventurers for representatives, but men who have a large interest in the community and whose prosperity or adversity is bound up with that of the nation.

Seventy of the number were pewholders."

A series of successful revival services, held in the Methodist Church, conducted by Rev. J. S. Ross, and extending over eight weeks, were brought to a close on Sunday night last. A reception service was held after the public service and over fifty were welcomed into the church, these however were not the whole results of the revival, some not being able to attend. The pastor has formerly received into the church over sixty of adult age many of them married couples, and there are several children under thirteen who have manifested a desire to be saved and have been received as catechumens. Mr. Ross is very successful in conducting such services, and carries them on after the old Methodist fashion, nor is he loss able in the pulpit, because he is successful in this direction.

The discovery was made and the tools secured only just in time to frustrate the conspiracy and prevent the escape of all the prisoners.

OTTAWA, March 31.—A certificate of award of a diploma of honor for special services rendered in connection with the late international fisheries exhibition in London, has been forwarded to the following gentleman in Canada: Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Alexander Galt, Hon. A. W. McLean, Hon. Hugh Nelson, Prof. Honeyman, Samuel Wilmot, W. R. Dimock, and L. H. Joncas. The certificates were sent through the High Commissioner for Canada, and each was accompanied by a circular letter from the secretary of the exhibition, which states that owing to the elaborate nature of the design, which prevented the artist from delivering the diploma at the time originally agreed upon, and the laborious process of reproduction which necessitates some months of execution, it cannot be delivered until summer.

The Soudan War.

GENERAL GRAHAM'S ADVANCE.

LONDON, March 30.

A Suakim despatch states that the British advanced to-day to Tamanieb, and burned the village. The Arabs fled. Firing opened at half-past seven, and was brisk on both sides. The rebels were in larger numbers than yesterday. The English cavalry and mounted infantry led the attack, and drove the rebels from the rocks, dispersing them among the hills. There were no British casualties. The loss of the rebels is unknown. General Graham will explore the region in the neighborhood of Tamanieb wells, and will then return with his entire force to Suakim. The campaign is practically ended.

OSMAN DIGMA'S RETREAT.

The authorities at Cairo consider that Osman Digma's retreat without a decisive battle, leaves the opening of the Berber route unsettled. It is reported that Osman is at Mewaneh Hill, a village five miles from Tamanieb, with several hundred adherents, chiefly from the Berber district. General Stephenson and Evelyn Baring urge upon the Home Government the necessity of the early withdrawal of all English troops from the Red Sea coast. General Stephenson is in favor of garrisoning Suakim and Massowah with a contingent of native Indian troops, to be relieved from Bombay monthly.

TERRIBLE RIOTING IN CINCINNATI.

89 PERSONS KILLED.

[March 24 Wm. Berner, on trial for the murder of Wm. H. Kirk, was found guilty of manslaughter. The verdict was declared privately by the judge who tried the case to be an outrage, and the jury, after leaving the court room, was hooted at by the crowd, with suggestions that they should be hanged. Kirk was killed in his stable by the blow of a hammer, robbed of about $100 in money, put in a waggon, hauled off toward Cumminsville, and dumped into Mill Creek, where the body was found two days later. Joe Palmer and Wm. Berner confessed that they did the murder and robbery. On trial Berner testified that Palmer did the actual murder, while he only looked on and got a share of the money. The verdict was universally condemned. One of the jurors was threatened by a mob, and would have met with violence had policemen not taken him from his house by a back way.]

Berner, after his sentence, was disguised and taken to Lovel to await the arrival of criminal deputy Joe Moses, with the necessary papers for his committal to the penitentiary. It became known that Berner was at Lovel. The crowd gathered when the train with Moses aboard came in, and when Berner with the officers went on board it the crowd made a rush for Berner. He ran through the car and escaped.

AN AWFUL SCENE.

CINCINNATI, March 30, 2 a.m.—The scene this morning beggars description. A seething, howling mob of 15,000 or 20,000 people surrounded the Court House and gaol at an early hour last night. Anticipating a demonstration, barricades had been thrown across Sycamore and Court streets, and entirely around the three exposed sides of the gaol. The baffled mob, enraged at the obstacles thus thrown in their way, attacked the Court House with the fury of demons. They rolled all manner of combustibles into the Court House entrance and to them touched a match. An hour later the records of a century of the County Auditor, Clerk and Treasurer and Recorder were in ashes. The loss is incalculable, and the handsomest building in Cincinnati is virtually destroyed. Every few minutes a murderous volley was fired into the mob, every volley with fatal effect.

BERNER'S CONFESSION.

COLUMBUS, March 30.—Berner said that he was induced to make his confession of deliberate murder by parties around the gaol, who told him that if he confessed he might get free. This was before he had engaged a lawyer. Afterwards he had four attorneys, and their chief aim on the trial was to destroy the effect of the confession he had made. They were successful in this, and by it succeeded in practically keeping the confession out of the evidence in the case. Berner's associate in the crime, a negro, who has not been tried, is one of the prisoners in the Hamilton County Gaol.

THE CONVICT'S EXPERIENCE.

COLUMBUS, O., March 29.—Berner was landed in the penitentiary at 8 o'clock to-night, being accompanied by a strong guard of specials commanded by Deputy Sheriff Joe Moses, of Cincinnati. He had a most eventful experience of escapes for the past thirty hours. After leaping from the train he wandered over the country keeping in sight of the railroad, and finally rested in a box-car on a siding till nearly daylight, when he broke for the woods and was overtaken about 10 o'clock by Deputies Moses and Deduce, who kept him at the chase with bullets. They had difficulty in keeping him concealed during the day, and finally drove to Foster's Crossing, the next station beyond Loveland, where they had previously arranged to meet some newspaper correspondents. They had changed Berner's clothes, put a Derby instead of a soft hat on him, and had him so changed that no one would have recognized him from the descriptions. They turned him over to two correspondents and then claimed that they had failed to find their man. There was quite a crowd at the place, however, before the train arrived there at four o'clock, and the people suspected them and called for Berner, but they got off safely. There were crowds at all of the stations making inquiries, and a multitude awaited the train in and about the city here, but they were given the slip. A detachment of fifteen police and a large number of prison guards had been quietly located at the suburban crossing, where the party alighted, and they succeeded in getting there one by one without arousing suspicion. They met a large crowd, however, on the double quick to the prison gates. Berner was scared to death. He rejoiced when he was inside, wanted something to eat and a chance to rest. After supper he related the incidents of his trip with every one he met cursing and boiling for his blood.

CINCINNATI, March 30.—The 4th and 14th regiments were called out at midnight to assist the police.

The firing upon the mob was merciless, whether by Gatling gun or by the soldiers.

Captain Desmond entered the court house to subdue the flames, but was instantly killed. The flames went their own way. The mob would not let the firemen use the engines.

THE KILLED AND WOUNDED.

It is estimated that 75 persons were killed and 150 wounded since the disturbances began on Friday night. A large proportion of the wounded were struck with musket balls and their injuries are serious. Heart-rending scenes were witnessed in the morgue and hospital. At the latter, cots were filled with victims of the riot, and between them were seated mothers, fathers, sisters and brothers bemoaning the fate of those dear to them. The mob sent emissaries to Kentucky Sunday night who succeeded in mustering about 150 men, but the bridge and ferry authorities prevented them crossing. The Secretary of War ordered a detachment of regulars to hold themselves in readiness to protect United States property.

GRAND TRUNK EMPLOYEES,

General Manager to be Informed they Cannot Afford Reduction in Wages.

The threatened reduction of wages on the Grand Trunk has been the general topic of conversation at every sitting and in every caboose along the line for the past week. The determined stand taken by the trainmen at their meeting at Toronto a week ago, and the reports received from other divisions of the road, and which were read there, has done much to make the men confident of success should Mr. Hickson precipitate a strike by cutting down the wages. The General Manager has already considerably reduced the staff of switchmen and others along the line, thus giving more work to the trainmen. Formerly they had little or no switching to do; now they have nearly it all. This, together with other rules, has given them more work to do, and they think in the face of all this it is hardly right to ask them to consent to a reduction. Another meeting was held on Sunday, at which the attendance was even larger than at the preceding meeting.

The reasons given by the General Manager for the proposed reduction were thoroughly discussed and shown to the satisfaction of those present to be without foundation. The fact that if the cut is not made the Grand Trunk will have to carry grain at a loss is denied by the men. Contracts made last fall will have to be carried out, and the railway company will have a material advantage in moving the grain in summer instead of in winter. Three or four more cars can be put on each train in summer than in winter. It was alleged by one of those present that the Grand Trunk would save from 20 to 25 per cent. by moving their grain in summer than in winter.

Reports were read from Point Edward, Stratford, Belleville and Montreal, congratulating the Toronto division on the stand it had taken, and promising every support should Mr. Hickson put his proposed six, eight and ten per cent. reduction into force. If he does every man along the line is ready to strike.

The secretary was instructed to communicate with the General Manager, informing him that they cannot afford to have their wages reduced, and giving their reasons for coming to this conclusion.

VICTORIA'S YOUNGEST SON.

Prince Leopold dies Suddenly at Cannes.

Prince Leopold, youngest son of Queen Victoria, died suddenly at Cannes last Friday morning. The Queen is profoundly affected. The Prince died in a fit as he was starting for Darmstadt to attend the wedding of his niece, Princess Victoria of Hesse. A Cannes despatch says the Prince's death was due to the effects of a fall he suffered the previous evening.

Later London despatches say the accounts of the Duke of Albany's fall are conflicting. A despatch to Reuter's says that he was standing on a chair, while special despatches say that he was ascending a staircase. He took supper after his return to the Villa Nevada, and retired to rest as usual. No alarm was felt in regard to his condition, and a doctor remained in the bed-room with him. Great reticence is observed as to the precise cause of his death, but it is generally supposed to have been apoplexy. The Duchess of Albany received a letter from the Duke on Thursday, in which he said that he never felt better or stronger. The escort started with the body on Sunday morning. When the Queen heard of the Duke's death she was seized with a paroxysm of weeping. The meeting of the Queen with the Duchess of Albany was most affecting. As she entered the Park she was unable to restrain the tears at the sight of her son's desolate home; she was weeping bitterly when she met

THE WIDOW.

The Princess Helen of Waldeck-Pyrmont, mother of the Duchess, and her sister, the Queen of Holland, are coming to Claremont. The Duchess passed a good night, and bears up fairly well. The Prince of Wales went to Cannes and accompanied the remains of his brother home.

All the morning papers devote long articles to the Duke, and speak in high praise of his virtues. The Daily News says: "His was a blameless life, but better than blameless; it was a life of noble purpose, rich in promise, and disappointing the world only by its too sudden close."

The Times says: Through the length and breadth of the land a universal shock has been caused by the sudden removal of the gifted and high-minded Prince almost on the threshold of richer still in promise. His services were freely given wherever they could advance literary, scientific or philanthropic objects. "The effect of the blow on the Queen will be watched with solicitude, especially in view of her recent state of health." The banquet which was to have been given this evening by Minister Morton in Paris has been postponed. Telegrams of condolence have been received from President Grevy, the Emperor William, the Czar and the King of Denmark. The papers of Amsterdam declare that the Dutch nation profoundly shares in the Queen's grief. The remains of the Duke of Albany have been placed in a coffin which is enveloped in black velvet. The cover is glass, through which the body is visible arrayed in a violet-colored robe and wearing some of the many decorations the Duke had received. The face has a peaceful look. The Queen and Princess Beatrice have returned to Windsor. The Gazette orders the court to remain in mourning till May 11th. The Duke will be interred in the Mausoleum at Frogmore on Saturday next.

THURSDAY, APRIL 3, 1884.

TOWN NEWS.

WINTER is lingering about a lap behind spring.

PALM Sunday falls on the 6th, Good Friday on the 11th and Easter Sunday on the 13th of April.

SCHOOL promotion examination and other matter crowded out this week. Will appear in our next issue.

THE lecture which was to have been delivered by Hon. J. B. Finch to-night is unavoidably postponed on account of illness.

OYSTER SOCIAL.—An oyster social will be held in the Bible Christian parsonage, Oxford street, on Wednesday evening, April 16th, to commence at 7 p.m.

THE burning of one of the chimnies of Mr. D. White's residence on Saturday night, created considerable alarm for a time. The "steamer" turned out promptly.

THE pensioners throughout Canada are now paid by money order from Halifax, instead of by a staff officer as has been the custom from time immemorial.

FOR EUROPE.—Messrs. L. R. Richardson, Strathroy; E Caswell and R. H. Caswell, Ingersoll, sailed for England on Saturday. Mr. W. S. King will sail for Glasgow April 5th.

GARDENING operations have commenced in town. It is rather early to do anything much in the way of planting, but a good deal may be done in the way of preparing the ground.

PERSONAL.—Mr. Joseph Gibson, postmaster, leaves for Ottawa to day.—Miss Bertha E. Fitch has returned to her home at Croswell, Mich., accompanied by her sister, Mrs. T. A. Menhennick.

RUNAWAY.—A horse attached to a covered buggy took fright at the Salvation drum on Sunday and ran away. The occupants, two young boys, sons of Postmaster Gibson, were thrown out, but fortunately were not seriously injured.

PINK TEA.—I never heard of one but am going to find out what it means by attending the social given at the residence of Mrs. Root, Oxford street on Tuesday evening the 8th instant in connection with the Presbyterian church, Ingersoll.

THE 24TH.—The 24th of May falls this year on Saturday, the calender thereby getting the bulge—to use a cultured and handy expression—on the scholars and school teachers. A petition has been circulated requesting the Mayor to proclaim Monday a holiday instead.

FLAXSEED! FLAXSEED! SCREENED!—Sold to the farmers for the purpose of growing flax this season, at Beachville, Thamesford and Embro flax mills. The undersigned will also rent good clean fields for the purpose of growing flax at each flaxmill.—JOHN H. BROWN. 95t

PATENT GATE.—A very ingenious gate can be seen on the market square, called "White's Patent." N. P. Bevins is the agent and has already made very considerable progress, although the time of year has hardly arrived to bring it prominently before the farmers.

FIRE.—A brick cottage belonging to Mrs. Dyke, on Queen Street East, occupied by A. Garner, was burned to the ground on Friday evening. Cause of fire unknown. Loss on house $400, fully insured. Loss on furniture about $600, partially covered by insurance. Mr. Garner also lost $46 in money. There was no one in the house at the time of the fire.

C. V. R. TO DETROIT.—Sunday's Detroit Free Press says: A private dispatch from Montreal announces that the Canadian Pacific has definitely determined to build the so-called Credit Valley extension to Detroit, in order to give them a through line west. The route determined upon is from Ingersoll to Detroit via London and Chatham.

LIFE INSURANCE.—Attention is directed to the advertisement of the Canada Life Assurance Company, of Canada. By insuring now or before the 30th April, inst., a share in two years' profits will be secured at next divisions in 1885. The Canada Life has paid in bonus addition on life policies since 1865, 2½ per cent. of the amount insured, which is $25 per thousand. Amount insured in 1882 was over five million dollars. H. O'Connor, Jr., Agent.

Resolution of Condolence.

The Ingersoll Ministerial Association met at the residence of the Rev. J. Reynolds on April 1st, 1884, and unanimously passed the following resolution, anent the death of the Rev. W. W. Ross, and instructed that a copy be forwarded to Mrs. Ross and to the press:—

To Mrs. (Rev.) W. W. Ross:

DEAR FRIEND.—In the all wise Providence of God, you are called upon to mourn the loss of a devoted husband; your dear little ones, the loss of a loving father, and we the loss of an esteemed brother in Christ. Permit us, as members of the Ingersoll Ministerial Association, to convey to you and family, our deepest sympathy in this the hour of your sore bereavement. As we met from time to time we were closely drawn to our brother, by the wise counsel, amiable disposition, and fervent piety which always characterized his life; and now that he is no more to meet with us, we rejoice to think that he is gone to join a purer and nobler band in heaven. Whilst we mourn over the fact that his voice is no longer heard on earth, yet we rejoice to know that he is now singing the song of the redeemed above. And whilst we mourn to think that his work on earth is ended, yet we rejoice to know that he is not gone into a dreamland of inactivity, but is now with the white robed immortals before the throne, engaged in the broader, nobler and heavenlier mission of of eternity. Let us mourn over our loss, but rejoice over his eternal gain.

Dear sister, you may rest assured of this, you will ever find in us a profound sympathy and deep interest in your future welfare, and our earnest prayer to God is, that He who hath promised to be a "Father to the fatherless and a judge of the widow" may ever be your God, and may it be your precious privilege to enjoy the fulness and richness of that blessed promise for evermore.

J. REYNOLDS, P. R. ROSS,
H. C. SPELLER, R. B. ROWE.

Obituary.

The late Joseph Gibson, Sr., was born on the 3rd April, 1808, in the Parish of Westison, County of Cheshire, England. In early life he displayed a natural taste for music and for many years he was the leader of the English Church choir in the place where he resided. When quite a young lad he was put to learn the trade of a blacksmith, and shortly after he was out of his time he started business on his own account. Building iron ploughs and fixing plough irons, was the main feature of his business and he was noted for his skill in this direction. Some years before he left the old country a dispute took place between the principle land owners and the tenants living under him regarding the ownership of certain lands attached to the English Church. In the struggle which followed, Mr. Gibson was the leading spirit on the side of people. In the lower courts, before which the case was tried, Mr. Gibson and his friends came off the victors, but the wealthy landlord knowing that his long purse would enable him to win in the end threw the case in chancery. At this stage of the contest nearly all of the tenants deserted their cause, leaving Mr. Gibson no choice but to let the matter go by default, and no longer feeling inclined to live under such a landlord he decided to leave the land of his fathers. He arrived in Canada in the spring of 53, bringing with him his wife and six children of which our present postmaster was the youngest. After living for a short time in Salford, then called Manchester, he purchased a farm about two miles north east of Campbell's Corners, but after farming for about a year he sold out and removed to this place where for a time he conducted a large and paying business in manufacturing lumber waggons. One of his partners, however, got into trouble and left for Kansas, which made it necessary to close up the business. Since that time he has worked at his trade, first for the late Mr. W. Eastwood, and lately for the Noxon Mfg. Co. For the last three years he has been to feeble to follow his calling and he has resided with his son, Mr. Joseph Gibson, postmaster, of Ingersoll, when he closed his eyes in death on Friday ev'g last. For well nigh 30 years he was a member of the Methodist Church, and of late the Bible has been his constant companion, and so another of the old land marks is gone. He was buried on Sunday last, and now rests by the side of his loving wife.

A special meeting of the above was held on Tuesday evening last.

Thos. Henderson sent in his resignation of the position of Chief Engineer, which he, through his acceptance of a Government position which called him away from home a good part of his time, was unable to fill.

The Finance Committee Report was read making the following recommendations:—

That having examined the auditors' report and the detailed statement annexed thereto, and although your committee did not undertake to examine the treasurer's books and vouchers in connection with the several accounts between the treasurer and the municipality, but having confidence that the auditors have faithfully and honestly, and according to their declaration of office, examined and compared the vouchers with the treasurer's books, would recommend the adoption of said report by this council.

And further, your committee have had before them the estimates for the High and Public Schools, amounting respectively to the sums of $1,573.09 and $4,611.00 as well as accounts from T. J. Thornton, Mrs. Gibson, wood to be charged to charity account, amounting to $3.75; also an account for telegraph, 41 cents. Also we have had before us the letter of J. H. Heffernan, for billiard license, which we recommend be granted by his complying with the by-laws of the town.

Your committee would recommend that the requisition of the Board of Education be complied with, and the moneys paid over upon demand; and that the sum of $3.75 be paid T. J. Thornton, and the sum of 41 cents be paid the Dominion Telegraph Co.

Moved by Mr. Buchanan, seconded by Mr. McInnes, That the Report from the Finance Committee be laid on the table till the next regular meeting.

MR. WATTERWORTH wanted to have the mover's objection to the Report.

MR. BUCHANAN said he wished to proceed with the other important business before the Council. The report was a lengthy one and he wished to examine into it.

Moved in amendment by Mr. Watterworth seconded by Mr. Seldon, That the Report from the Finance Committee be adopted.

MR. GIBSON suggested that the movers of the resolutions come to some understanding about their respective motions, and deal with the Report decently and in order.

MR. BUCHANAN said the Report had been handled not to his satisfaction, and in a very queer manner. He wished the Report to stand until a man could examine into it, and be prepared to speak intelligently upon it.

MR. WATTERWORTH said there were only three ways to dispose of the Report. Either adopt it, reject it, or go into Committee of the Whole. The Council were as competent to deal with it as they ever would be.

Mr. Watterworth moved, as an amendment to the amendment, and Mr. Gibson seconded, That the Council go into Committee of the Whole on the Report from the Finance Committee.

Mr. Watterworth's amendment carried, and the Council went into Committee of the Whole, with Mr. Horsman in the chair.

On motion the Report was ordered to be read clause by clause.

The Clerk read the first clause.

MR. GIBSON (without rising)—I move the first clause pass.

MR. BUCHANAN thought it a cheeky way to push it through.

MR. GIBSON rose to a question of order. He asked the Board if he was not doing his duty in moving the adoption of a clause according to rules. Mr. Buchanan appeared to be ignorant of the rules.

MR. BUCHANAN said Mr. Gibson should have risen to his feet and made his motion.

The first clause was read and passed when it was found that the Clerk had been reading and the Council passing the Auditors Statement instead of Finance report.

The first clause of the Finance Report was read and adopted.

On the reading of the second clause Mr. Buchanan said his reason for objecting to the report passing was on account of the manner in which the discussion had been conducted on a certain item at a previous meeting. Mr. Buchanan raised a question about the appropriations to each municipality for County roads and bridges by the County Council and he called upon the Mayor to explain.

MR. NOXON said the discussion was out of order. The money from the County Council was paid over to the Reeves of each municipality who carried it and laid it out as they saw fit. The discussion was irregular inasmuch as the clause in the report to which the discussion referred had been adopted.

MR. SELDON quoted the by-laws passed at the County Council in 1865 as his authority for receiving and disposing of the funds appropriated for County roads and bridges as he had done.

MR. BUCHANAN on rising to speak, was told by Mr. Noxon he was wasting the time. That's the cry whenever I get up to speak said Mr. Buchanan, but time was not wasted when Mr. Noxon had stood up and told the Board a lot of stuff which lacked confirmation. He (Mr. Buchanan) had voted at a previous meeting of the Council on Mr. Noxon's explanation.

MR. NOXON—I cannot compliment you on your intelligence now.

MR. BUCHANAN—I am not fishing for compliments—what he objected to was to a certain member of the Council receiving money from the corporation for services last year performed. He (the speaker) had opposed the act before but on Mr. Noxon's explanation had allowed it to pass. Mr. Buchanan then quoted from a hand book on Municipal Law, that no town councillor was to receive any money for services. Where did that certain councillor get his money?—from the Town Treasurer. The Treasurer was liable for the amount. He asked the members of the Board in the face of the oath they had each taken to look at the matter carefully. The speaker here read some more extracts on Municipal Law.

MR. RICHARDSON—What are we getting?

MR. BUCHANAN—You are getting Love.

MR. RICHARDSON—Where do you find it?

MR. BUCHANAN—Search for it and find it out for yourself as I have done. No man has a right to pocket our money with impunity. A man has done so and I will contend against that man as long as I stand in the Council. I will allow no man to pocket money. It is a pretty thin skinned action not to allow the Report to stand over for a week.

MR. GIBSON took the liberty to draw attention to the clause which had provoked the discussion. He then proceeded to quote from County By-Laws showing the authority on which the Reeves and Deputy Reeves were to dispose the county appropriation. The money was subject to the Reeve. The Town Council had no control over it, and Mr. Seldon being Reeve had full control of the money. The facts were against Mr. Buchanan.

MR. BUCHANAN—In your estimation.

MR. GIBSON, continuing, said he was not vain enough to give an opinion, but simply gave the facts as they stood. The money was apportioned by the County Council, and the County Council appointed Commissioners consisting of the Reeves and Deputy Reeves to superintend the disbursement of that money. Mr. Buchanan had seemed to be under the impression that no member of the County Council could receive pay for his services. On the contrary, the County Council pay their members. Again, Mr. Buchanan had quoted from certain books as if he was the authority for the books.

MR. BUCHANAN—You might be thick-headed enough to look at it in that light.

MR. GIBSON contended that Mr. Seldon, as having control of the money, could pay it not to whom he pleased. Did it follow that because a man had taken pay for his work that he was a rascal?

MR. MATHESON—Where does the money come from that the County Council apportion?

MR. GIBSON—Ingersoll pays its share, but cannot say if the same amount comes back. The man who got the money had no standing before the County Council, save as a private individual.

REEVE SELDON explained how it came that a member of the Council had come to do the work. It was work which he himself and the Deputy Reeves should have done, but the County Council being in session necessitated the absence of himself and Deputy Reeves. In the emergency Mr. Watterworth had been engaged to look after the work. There had been nothing underhanded in the transaction. It was County Council money with which Mr. Watterworth had been paid. The money had been drawn by an order signed by himself as Reeve.

MR. BUCHANAN—It was a private Councillor of the town of Ingersoll who drew money from our Treasurer to pay himself.

MR. NOXON—Could we pass an order drawing one cent of those funds?

MR. WATTERWORTH rising—I am the culprit.

MR. BUCHANAN—Hear! Hear!

MR. WATTERWORTH—Do I look like one?

MR. BUCHANAN—In my eyes.

MR. WATTERWORTH—I don't look at it through a rogue's eyes. I got the money from the Treasurer on an order of Mr. Seldon. Mr. Seldon was at the County Council attending to duties there and I did Mr. Seldon's work and got $3 for it. It is clear the Council had nothing to do with that money. The speaker said it was the first time he had ever been charged with wrongfully putting money into his own pocket.

MR. BUCHANAN—Never before?

MR. WATTERWORTH—No? It has been worth $2 per day to do the work, and the whole transaction was above board. Mr. Buchanan was a nice patriot. Why, Mr. Buchanan had belonged to the Council scarcely two weeks when he wanted the whole Board of Works to come in front of his shop and do $20 worth of work for his own convenience.

MR. BUCHANAN—Work that you had promised to do.

The discussion dropped and the second clause of the report was then carried.

Moved by Mr. Gibson, seconded by Mr. Watterworth, and resolved, That the Council do now arise and report the report from the Finance Committee as passed in Committee of the Whole without amendment.

Council resumed.

Moved by Mr. Gibson, seconded by Mr. Watterworth, that the report as passed in Committee of the Whole be adopted.

Moved in amendment by Mr. Buchanan, seconded by Mr. O'Connor, that report as passed in Committee of the Whole be laid on the table till the next regular meeting of the Council.

The amendment on being put was voted down and the report from the Finance Committee was accordingly declared adopted.

Moved by Mr. Seldon, seconded by Mr. Nelles, that the names of Messrs. Buchanan and McInnes be added to the Board of Works.

MR. BUCHANAN objected to being appointed. He would have liked to have been put on at first but objected to being put on now in a second handed way. There were plenty on the Board at the present time. If five men could not look after the town they had little conceit in themselves.

MR. MCINNES also objected to his name being added, saying it was a sick job thrown on Buchanan and himself.

MR. WALLEY hoped that as No. 1 Ward was not fairly represented in the Board of Works, Mr. McInnes would accept and act, as he was a good hand and had plenty of time to give to the work.

MR. BUCHANAN said the motion looked cowardly. Five members ran the Board last year, while this year it required seven. It would be all pleasant sailing for the Board of Works when they had worked in the majority of the councillors, as there would be nobody left in the council to find fault with the Board. He (the speaker) didn't want to go on the Board, but would act if he was forced on.

MR. GIBSON said he was on the Board of Works for the present year. He had no ambition for the work as well as no experience. He felt while a member of the Board like a square peg in a round hole. He wanted his name struck off.

Moved in amendment by Mr. McInnes, seconded by Mr. Buchanan, That the Board of Works remain as at present, and we trust they will do their duty in No. 1 Ward, as that Ward is not fairly represented.

Moved as an amendment to the amendment by Mr. Gibson, seconded Mr. Waterhouse, That the name of Joseph Gibson be struck off from the Board of Works, and Mr. M. T. Buchanan's name be inserted instead.

MR. GIBSON from the first, he said, had always considered that he would be no good on the Board of Works. They had put him in a place where he either had to say yes or go it blind. Mr. Buchanan was possessed of a worthy ambition to distinguish himself and it would be a good thing to give him something to pull at.

MR. BUCHANAN—In your shoes?

MR. GIBSON—Not in my shoes—your feet are too large.

Amendments much of Mr. Gibson and Mr. McInnes on being put were lost, and the original resolution carried on the following division. Yeas—Messrs. Watterworth, Seldon, Gibson, Walley, Matheson, Nelles and Noxon. Nays—Messrs. Horsman, Waterhouse, Richardson, McInnes, Buchanan and O'Connor—6.

Moved by Mr. Watterworth, seconded by Mr. Walley, and resolved, That the sum of $20 be paid to each of the auditors, viz.:—Wm. Tennant and Hugh Kerr, and that the Mayor sign the orders for the same.

Moved by Mr. McInnes, seconded by Mr. Matheson, and resolved, That the following salaries be paid and the Mayor sign the orders for the same:

R. A. Woodcock, $87.50; C.C.L. Wilson, $50; M. H. Gray, $25; Thos. Henderson, 1st engineer, $25; Fred Sheppard, 2nd engineer, $12.50; Wm. Towle, 3rd engineer, $6.25.

On motion the report from the Market and Printing Committee was adopted. The Report read as follows:

TO THE COUNCIL.

Your Committee on Market and Printing beg to report as follows:

That we recommend the Town Clerk be supplied with wood and light.

That the west bent of the market shed be used as a store room for wood.

That specifications be made and let by tender for kalsomining, wainscotting, and painting, the town hall and council chamber as follows: Town hall to be kalsomined, ceiling sky blue, sides as decided upon by the committee, wainscotting town hall 4 ft. high, and south side council chamber 3 ft. high, new woodwork to have 3 coats of paint, old woodwork 1 coat of paint.

We recommend the following tenders be accepted, they being the lowest, namely:—Wainscotting town hall, etc., $39; Painting, kalsomining, and patching, E. J. Redmond, $70 or $75; for market clerk, Riley M. Deuel, for fees to be collected; and the Printing be awarded to G. F. Gurnett.

T. SELDON, Chairman.

The Fire, Water and Gas Committee reported, recommending that the resignation of Thos. Henderson be accepted; also that they had consulted Fred Sheppard, at present second engineer, as to his acceptance of the vacant position, and that he wishes till the next meeting of the council to give his decision. In the meantime Mr. Sheppard undertook full control of the engine.

Report was adopted.

On motion $50 was ordered to be placed to the credit of the Indigent Committee.

On motion the clerk was instructed to get 200 copies of the Auditors' report printed as soon as possible.

Moved by Mr. McInnes, seconded by Mr. Richardson, that the Court of Revision comprise the following:—Messrs. Waterhouse, Buchanan, Watterworth, Matheson, and the mover. On Mr. Matheson, Mr. Watterworth and Mr. Buchanan each wanting their names removed from above committee it was resolved that the appointment of a Court of Revision be laid over.

Moved by Mr. McInnes, seconded by Mr. Buchanan, and resolved, That this council go into Committee of the Whole on the petition signed by about 200 of the citizens re Salvation Army, which reads as follows:

To the Municipal Council of the Town of Ingersoll.

GENTLEMEN.—We, the undersigned residents of the Town of Ingersoll, humbly request that you will take proper means to prevent the Salvation Army from parading the streets beating their drums and tambourines in the evenings, thereby frightening horses, and preventing peaceable citizens from passing along the street, also on Saturday afternoons, when the streets are crowded with people and horses, also on Sundays when people are on their way to divine worship.

Council went into Committee of the Whole, with Mr. Nelles in the chair.

On motion the petition was read by the Clerk.

Mr. Gibson read from the By-law of 1874 (clause 41) the following:—"The ringing of bells, shouting and other unusual noises in public places is prohibited." He had a suggestion to make on behalf of peace and good will. The electors were much divided on this question, and in this case it was difficult to do anything to meet the public wish. The above clause prohibited unusual noises. Some held the beating of drums was an unusual noise. The best plan was to appoint a committee of the coolest heads in the council to interview the officers in command of the Army in a friendly spirit, and much of what they complained of might be obviated. If the Army are doing wrong, they had a by-law to cover the case. He (the speaker) didn't like litigation. A committee might be appointed as a sort of compromise. It was true that the Army monopolized the whole of the sidewalk, which was wrong. The noise called "firing a volley" came directly under the act, and should be stopped. He (the speaker) had a deep feeling in this matter, and if he spoke as he felt people would say he was consulting himself personally. He had witnessed a scene last Sunday which he hoped never to see again. His boys' lives had been endangered, and he was thankful they had not been seriously injured. A nuisance would have to be proved before anybody could be convicted.

Mr. Noxon said they had all the law that the council had any authority to make. He had no doubt that if those who had control of the Army were met the principal objectionable features might be removed. He (Mr. Noxon) took strong objections to demonstrations on Saturdays, when the streets were thronged; also to their monopolizing the sidewalk. But the Army had rights. The difficulty was to prove a nuisance. But all law protecting the peace, quiet and good order of the town should be enforced. He would propose the appointment of a Committee.

Mr. Watterworth concurred in the remarks of the gentleman preceding him. In his opinion the greatest annoyance arose, not from the Army itself, but from the crowd which congregated as the processions passed.

Mr. GIBSON said one great grievance was just at Mr. Murdoch's door. The crowds who were shut out of the barracks during certain intervals blocked up the sidewalks. The constable, at any rate, had a right to keep that place clear.

MR. BUCHANAN expressed himself as glad that the citizens had made a move. The Army, he believed, was doing a good work, but they could do it with less noise. He has regarded the Army in its true light on the streets since the lives of himself and family had been endangered. An occasional band of music going down street was a treat and people prepared for it, but the drum every night grew monotonous. If they (the Army) could be prevailed upon to stop it, it would be a good move. The thing was getting worse instead of better. It wasn't right to ask the constable to put in all his time keeping the sidewalk in front of the barracks clear while the other parts of the town were neglected. He was also in favor of appointing a committee.

WR. WALLEY was also in favor of a committee.

Moved by Mr. Richardson, seconded by Mr. McInnes, and resolved, That a Committee of Messrs. Gibson, Buchanan, Watterworth, Matheson and the mover, wait upon the officers controlling the Salvation Army and induce the Army to change their mode of procedure through the streets in order to conform with the by laws and wishes of the ratepayers and that the Committee report at the next meeting of the Council.

Committee rose and Council resumed.

On motion Council adjourned at 10.40.

DEATH OF REV. W. W. ROSS.

The Memorial and Funeral Services—Sketch of the Life of Deceased.

The Rev. W. W. Ross, pastor of King Street Methodist Church, died on Friday, March 28th, after a brief illness, of inflammation and hemorrhage of the lungs. His death has caused universal grief. The funeral services were commemorated in the above church on Monday amid the presence of a very large congregation composed of all denominations.

The Rev. W. W. Williams, of Woodstock, opened the solemn services in saying, "I cannot express my own feelings of sadness and sorrow for the loss you have sustained in the death of dear Bro. Ross, whose remains we are to follow to the grave to day. I feel that I cannot speak too highly of the character which we are contemplating this afternoon. Brother Ross! O yes: how precious is that term among all Methodist ministers; a brother in the church; a brother in Christian fellowship; a brother in the Christian home, and now a brother gone before to welcome bye and bye those who shall follow him. I shall not now detain you with any lengthy remarks as it is my liberty to call upon a number of others to express their estimation of this lofty character which still remains in our memory."

He then invited the following reverend gentlemen to come and take their places on the platform: Rev. R. B. Rowe, Bible Christian minister; Rev. H. C. Speller, Baptist minister, and Rev. P. R. Ross, Presbyterian minister, of Ingersoll. Rev. W. R. Parker, President London Conference; Rev. Dr. Sutherland, Secretary Missionary Society.

The Rev. R. B. Rowe announced a hymn, after which J. Wakefield, Chairman Brantford District, led in prayer, and Rev. H. C. Speller read 1 Corinthians, 15 chap., beginning at 35th verse.

The solemnity of the occasion was very impressive indeed. The singing of the choir now in solemn style of Pope's pathetic ode "The Dying Christian to His Soul," seemed to voice to that vast assembly the triumphant death of their beloved pastor, whose remains lay in a flower-decked coffin in front of the mourning draped pulpit which he so lately had nobly filled.

The Rev. Mr. Williams read an address of condolence presented by a deputation of eight from the Quarterly Board of the Centennary Church, Hamilton, to Mrs. W. W. Ross, on the death of her husband, and full of sympathy to her in her great loss, and expressing their high estimation of his character. Also a telegram of condolence from the Ministerial Association of Hamilton of a similar nature.

The Rev. Mr. Jeoffrey then read a brief sketch of the Rev. W. W. Ross's life, from which we glean the following:

The Rev. W. W. Ross was born in Huntingdon, County of Hastings, Sept. 21, 1836, and entered into mercantile life at about the age of 18 years with Nathan Jones, Esq., Belleville, Ont. At the age of 19 he was converted under the ministry of Rev. Dr. Young, and entered Methodist ministry at the age of 21, the first year of which was spent at Victoria College, Cobourg. He was ordained in 1861. The various circuits he preached at in their order were Napanee, Almyra, Merrickville, Hamilton, Three Rivers, Crompton and Hatley, Seffar, Lawrenceville, Kingston, Metis, Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal, Hamilton and Ingersoll. Frequently during his ministry, his health, never very robust, compelled him to take rest. In one of those seasons of rest he became agent for the Upper Canada Bible Society and for four years laboured with great success and acceptance to all parties concerned. At the close of that period he re entered the ministry and accepted an invitation from the Centennary Church, Hamilton, where, after three years labour, he came to Ingersoll.

At one time he took a journey of "ten thousand miles by sea and land" which is the title of a book written by him recording his travels. His last public service was the meeting of his class in the parsonage about four weeks before he died. He had been in the habit of impressing upon his class "The danger of trusting in religious emotion unless actuated by correct principles." His end was in conformity to his idea. His last words were, when asked by his wife his parting testimony, "my testimony must be my life." He leaves behind him a wife and five fatherless children to mourn their irreparable loss.

The Rev. P. R. Ross then said, "I have been closely intimate with Bro. Ross for about 14 months, and I may say that I have lost a dear friend in him whose remains we pay to day the last funeral rites, and in doing so, permit me to say that of all the men I have ever met in the ministry, I have never been so thoroughly attached to any one as to him who has gone home. I don't think there is a man or woman in this town to-day who ever heard him say an unkind word concerning any one. I do sincerely hope that the friends he leaves on earth will learn from him that one lesson, to be brothers in Jesus Christ. Concerning Sectarianism he knew nothing of it whatever, for he embraced Baptists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians and Methodists in his bosom. He had a broad Catholic bosom in him. Let us forget the little lines of disembarkation separating us from one another and move in the spirit of our dear departed friend to prepare ourselves for that glorious company which awaits us in heaven."

Rev. W. R. Parker spoke a few highly appreciative words of the late Rev. W. W. Ross, saying that he believed he had served his day and generation, for he had begun in the right way, and according to the right law as given by the apostle to "love one another" and that though he is dead his works still speaketh. Rev. Parker also said Mr. Ross had genius for organizing and borrowed his illustrations from the word and imparted them freshness and force which made them ringing and divine.

The Rev. Dr. Sutherland responded in an eloquent tribute of respect to the memory of the departed one. He expressed the honour and privilege he had of his acquaintance and he asserted he had never known a man who possessed such universal kindness of feeling to his fellows as our brother. In matters of conscience he was brave as a lion; in sorrow he was loving and tender; he had one of those characters in which seemed to be blended kindness and strength which are the grandest endowments to men here below. "He being dead, yet speaketh." He speaks to-day to us, remember the words I spoke to you when with you, "Work while it is called to-day for the night of death cometh when no man can work."

A large concourse attended the funeral procession; the schools were closed and general business in the afternoon was suspended.

The following are the names of the pall-bearers and the reverend gentlemen who attended the funeral:—The bearers were Rev.'s Dr. Ryckman, Mr. Fowler, D. E. Brownell, R. J. Treleaven, Thos. Crews, D. Hunt. There was also present: Rev.'s W. Williams, Chairman London District; Dr. Young, Dr. Sutherland, Sec. of Missions; W. W. Carson, Mr. Henderson, H. McLean, R. H. Wadell, B. D.; W. Lund, Dr. Burns, of Ladies College, Hamilton; J. Wakefield, Manly Benson, W. J. Maxwell, and Moore.

Mr. Ross was in the second year of his pastorate in Ingersoll when death overtook him and interrupted his active and useful life. He had just reached the prime of his manhood, being only 47 years of age.

Potato Bug Exterminator.

One day last summer in passing along side of a large field of potatoes, we observed two large Bipeds drilling their offsprings to march up one row of potatoes and down the other, making a fell swoop on the potatoe bugs and not leaving one to tell the tale. Perhaps it was not so much in the interest of the farmers that they worked so assidiously from early morn till late eve. But that they enjoyed the work for the game to them was sweet. The farmer and his family assured me that the work has been so well done by this brigade that they never trouble themselves any more about fear of damage from potato bugs. We give our views in rhyme below.

JAMES MCINTYRE.

When we do trace out nature's laws
And view effect and muse on cause,
For the future there is great hope
If we our eyes will only ope,
With joy they will often glisten,
If to truth one doth but listen.
Now for a minute lend your lugs,
Our theme it is potato bugs,
Just buy a pair of young Penfowl
There voice may be like the Screetch Owl,
But soon as the potato shows
You there will find the Penfowl goes,
Up one row and down the other,
Like loving sister, with her brother,
And you will find that down their mugs,
Have disappeared poptato bugs,
There's no more need of Paris Green,
For they will keep potatoes clean;
And faithful they do work all day,
For to them 'tis gay sport and play,
No more you need their voice bewail,
But admire the grand Peacock's (tail.)

THE LATE JAS. HENDERSON.

Sketch of His Life.

The funeral of Mr. Henderson took place on Thursday last, from his late residence, in North Oxford, about one mile from town. About nine o'clock the friends and neighbors of the deceased began to arrive, and until ten o'clock a continued stream of vehicles were congregating within the premises of the fine old homestead that had been hewn out of the wilderness of fifty years ago. Long rows of poplars line the avenue leading up to the venerable old mansion and also along the lanes leading out over the farm, a large and thrifty orchard nearly surrounds the house, and the out buildings and surroundings reminded one of an old country manor. The scene about the spacious yard and within the house was very interesting, the numbers of old friends of both male and female who had come to pay their last respects to one who had held so many prominent positions in the community for such a lengthened period, many past their three score years and ten—was quite remarkable. The remains were in a room convenient to all who desired to take a parting look upon one so long known and respected, and upon whose brow not a wrinkle was to be seen. A beautiful cross lay upon the coffin, and the surroundings were in accordance with the faith in which he was raised. The procession reached from the old home nearly to the Catholic church. A large assemblage had already congregated at the church when the cortege arrived. The sacred and dignified ceremonies of the Catholic church, commenced as the coffin reached the church doors, and a Requiem High Mass was celebrated by the Rev. Father Molphy, assisted by the Rev. Father's Carling and Brady. The choir did their part most effectively aiding very much in the solemnities of the occasion. The discourse delivered by Rev. Father Molphy relative to the deceased and the occasion was eloquent and impressive. Six of the eight sons carried their father to his last resting place. The scene was at once most imposing, and brought tears to the eyes of many who witnessed this beautiful act of paternal regard. A large concourse followed to the cemetery, where the last sad rites were performed over the grave of North Oxford's earliest and most respected pioneer.

As intimated in last week's issue, we shall endeavor to give a more extended notice of Mr. Henderson's early life in Canada which extends back to over fifty years. He came from the County Down, Ireland, to the County of Oxford in 1833, and commenced at once an industrious career that extended on into extreme old age, and was nearly as vigorous at ninety-five as many are at seventy years of age. Being naturally mechanical he superintended the erection of several of the first principal edifices in the neighbourhood, among which was the old English church, the remains of which have been converted into a dwelling now occupied by Peter Kennedy, Esq. As we noticed last week, Mr. H., for many years filled most of the important offices in the municipality of North Oxford, reeve for two years, treasurer for six years, and assessor and collector of the Township from 1842 to 1848, and councillor eleven years in succession. In his first year in Oxford he acted as Bailiff, which office he filled with much ability and thorough integrity. During the rebellion Mr. Henderson took an active part, not only near home but was on duty as far west as the "Rond Eau." Not only in his own township did his energy and ability do good service, but he contracted and built that part of the macadimised road extending from Beachville to Dorchester, and also superintended the building of all the bridges and toll-gates as far as Chatham. A good deal has been said of late years in reference to making the Thames navigable from London to Chatham. It is no doubt in the recollection of some that Mr. Henderson took a cargo of 50,000 feet of lumber from Choate's mill down to Chatham. His son Capt. J. S. who accompanied him in this voyage, relates some very stirring incidents in connection therewith. Mr. Henderson was also overseer of the Ingersoll and Northern road, as well as filling the office of managing director until three years ago—his was indeed a busy life, and it is worthy of remark, that after so long a term and having filled so many places of importance and trust, his has left a character for honesty, honor and integrity unimpeachable. His executive ability was strongly marked and he was looded up to by his neighbors as a man of superior judgment. Notwithstanding his many public duties, Mr. Henderson overlooked his farm thoroughly, was for many years the largest hop grower in this section of Ontario.—He leaves eight sons who are all filling respectable positions in life. Andrew, the eldest, whose farm lies on the borders of the town; Capt. J. S., who with his brother, E. H., occupies the homestead; two, Thos. and D. H. who are in mechanical business in Ingersoll, Thos. also being inspector of weights and measures; two, Jas. M. and Wm. N. who are farmers in the township of Adelaide, and S. J. Henderson, M. D., living at Cassville, Mich. Capt. J. S. was with the volunteers at Windsor during the Fenian raid in '66, having spent some four months in '64 at the military school at Laprairie, Que., and was stationed at the town of Remingford during the Alabama trouble. Thos. has an important position in the weights and measures department for which he is eminently qualified—having a natural genius for mechanics. As was remarked in last week issue of THE CHRONICLE, Mr. Henderson, sen'r., was particularly noted for his kind and neighbourly qualities and was especially the poor man's friend, always having a word of kindness for every one with whom he came in contact. Besides his wife and eight sons, he leaves thirty-eight grandchildren and one great grandchild. Comparatively few men have the privilege as he had of seeing a large family grown up and each filling respectable positions in society, each having the tongue of good report fully in his favor, and speaks volumes for the care and training, as well as example of the parents. Mr. H. was a staunch adherent and supporter of his church. He was a Conservative in politics, but liberal to all, having the good will of all parties, as his positions in life fully show.

FARM AND DAIRY.

Spring Calves.

When spring calves are to be raised, it is better to raise those which come in March than later, though they may be successfully raised at any season of the year. In dairies where cows habitually come in in the spring, heifer calves dropped in March are much more likely to be ready to enter the dairy at a timely date in the spring, when they are two years old, than are calves dropped later in the season. Early calves, too, get a good start before the following winter sets in, which is always the most trying time in the period of calfhood. It is well, therefore, where milking stock is needed to replenish the depletions of the herd by age and accident, to raise a few more heifer calves than are actually needed, that, after weeding out those that do not prove first-class, there may be enough worth keeping to fill up the vacant places. In our own experience it has always paid to look well to the antecedents of the calves to be raised for milkers. We have sometimes had as good cows from the first calves of heifers from good milking stock as from any other, but, as a rule, our best success has been with those from cows just after reaching their prime. At this period in a cow's life she is the most vigorous, and this is an essential point in the transmission of the qualities of a parent. If we wish to reproduce the individual peculiarities of a good animal, we shall be most certain to succeed by promoting in it a strong constitution and great vital force and personal vigor. Such animals, whether male or female, transmit their own personal peculiarities with the greatest certainty. Animals which are weak and feeble in constitution, whether exhausted by overwork or reduced by lack of appropriate food or care, or which are weak from inherited defects, generally fail in transmitting their good qualities. Their progeny, as the phrase goes, takes back, and they deliver to their offspring the blood of ancestors more or less remote. Vigor at the time of coupling, and all the way thro' pregnancy, is necessary to insure an inheritance of the individuality of the parent. A lack of the necessity is the reason why extraordinary milkers, in the hands of an average farmer, so often fail to reproduce their extraordinary milking capacity. Very large milkers are very seldom kept in a vigorous condition. Their strength runs away in their milk, till their vital force is weakened; for it is rare that such animals are fed liberally enough and skillfully enough to keep up their milk and strength, too, and hence they often fail as breeders. In the hands of growers of purely bred stock, the situation is different. They generally understand this law of inheritance, and keep their stock in condition to do their best. A Jersey or a Friesian cow of extraordinary milking capacity, in the hands of professional breeders, may fairly be expected, not only to reproduce itself, but even to advance her leading excellences, because they are prominently active and they are vitally sustained by judicious feeding. The road to improvement in milking stock lies in the direction of milking and feeding, and it is because well posted breeders understand and make the most of these agencies that the astonishing butter records of Jerseys, and the equally astonishing milk records of some of the Dutch cows are possible, and that still greater developments may reasonably be anticipated.

The Farm Labor Problem.

I am convinced that the leading obstacle in the way of profitable farming is the difficulty of obtaining and keeping reliable and efficient hired help. Farmers, ordinarily, cannot afford to hire good men, because those who belong to this class usually have employment at work which offers better pay than is usually given by farmers. Cheap help is usually poor help, and hence really expensive. If good men are employed, the profits of the farm go to them, and not to the farmer. I have known some farmers who appear to enjoy keeping about them a gang of rough, low-minded men, who are hired at low wages and boarded and lodged by the farmer, his wife doing the washing and ironing. Such farmers may make farming a success, but it seems to me that less success and more pleasure and comfort in life would be preferable.

I believe the best thing for farmers to do, who object to hiring cheap help to board in the family—thus making of the farmer's home little more than a second-class boarding-house—is to adopt the use of machinery as far as practicable, and hiring as little help as possible. Thanks to inventive genius, we have to-day machines which may make farmers fairly independent of laborers. The great difficulty with machinery is the expense and cost of storage room, but with reliable help so costly and so hard to find, I think the machinery, if properly cared for, will prove cheapest in the long run. With proper machinery and implements, the ordinary Eastern farmer can get along with one or two good hands very well. Thus by cutting off the amount of hand labor required, the labor problem is at least partly solved.

The next best thing, I believe, is the tenement house system. Married men of steady habits can usually be obtained it a comfortable home is offered for their use, and although extra privileges are usually demanded by tenant laborers, the system saves the annoyance and unpleasantness resulting from boarding them.—In Country Gentleman.

Experience with Ensilage.

Here is our experience the present year with ensilage:—We put up about eighty tons, and finished about Oct. 1. The fodder-corn was all put in in good shape, except about ten loads, which were frostbitten very badly. Those we put on top. We did not use any stone or sand for weights, but placed about two feet of oat-straw on top, and the stalks of the field-corn as we husked if were placed on top of that. It was at least two or three weeks before we got any weight upon the ensilage to amount to anything. There were about ten tons of stalks piled on top of the ensilage. The silo is 20x24 and 20 ft. deep. We did not have enough to fill it more than half full.

We have just opened it and find, to our delight, the fodder preserved as nicely as any fodder could be in a stone silo, with 300 pounds of stone per square foot piled upon it.

Our silo is made of tarred paper and matched plank, all on top of the ground. The frosted fodder on top was spoiled, as we expected it would be.

Now a word as to the way the cattle eat it. We give them a bushel each of the ensilage night and morning, and they eat every particle of it and lick their chops for more. Let those put their fodder in the field to dry who choose, but for us we shall use a silo as long as we keep a cow.—[Hardin Bros., Schenectady Co., N.Y., in Rural New Yorker.

How to Milk.

Recently we gave extracts from a paper in the Indiana Farmer by John M. Stahl on the above subject, and now find place for further selections:—

"Milking should be done regularly. Have certain hours for the work and do it at the usual time. The internal milk producing and supplying organs of the cow learn when the udder should be relieved and will kick, and perhaps the cow will do the same, If you don't squeeze at the proper time.

"Likewise milk clean. Blessed is the man or woman that strips for three minutes after the udder is empty. It should be remembered that about four-fifths of the milk production of the cow has been developed by thus mutely asking for more by tugging away at a teat. In a state of nature the cow gave enough milk to support her calf till it could make its own living. The milk propensity has been developed by squeezing.

"Always rub the udder and teats clean before beginning to milk. To make clean butter is an impossibility. There are too many chances for dirt to get into it. But the nearer you come to absolute cleanliness the nearer you will come to the highest excellence. Comparative cleanliness is essential to good butter. There is always more or less dirt clinging to the udder and ready to fall into the milk-pail unless removed before milking is begun. Keep a cloth about the cow stable with which to rub the udder and teats clean.

"In the name of all that is half-way decent, I beseech you never to dip your hands in the pail while milking, as your filthy neighbour does. The practice is so very filthy that I shall simply hold it up to your disgusted gaze on the end of my pen and then drop it."

Notes.

The sales of Aberdeen-Angus and Short-Horn cattle in Scotland last year footed up 819 head for which $143,000 was paid.

Sheep, to do well, must have dry floors and runs, and have plenty of pure air, and should be protected from the scare of dogs.

Prof. Knapp, of Iowa, says that two quarts of oats and two ears of corn twice a day are a liberal allowance for a young horse.

All buildings in which horses, cattle, sheep, hogs or poultry are kept should be well ventilated, but not in such manner as to admit draughts.

Less grain and more grazing tend to better development of frame and muscle than when corn is fed to hogs exclusively. Build the frame first and lay on the fat afterward.

It is common in some quarters to use any kind of salt for butter, but unless the best be used the butter will be inferior, and necessarily sell low. It is economical to procure good salt for such purposes.

The owner of a farm should have his season for clearing up and burning rubbish in the Spring as regularly as does the housewife. Something of this work can be done before the hurrying time of plowing and seeding begins.

The London Dairy Show two or three years ago made tests of the several breeds of cows to learn what per cent. of the milk of each was butter, with the following result: Ayrshire, 5.57; Jersey, 4.74; Guernsey, 4.86; Kerry, 3.73; Brittany, 4.19; Holstein, 2.27.

Spring is near, and it is time to set the hens. But before doing so, do by all means clean the house of all vermin. Thoroughly whitewash the premises, clean out the excrements and old straw from the nests. Then fumigate the house well with flour of sulphur; it will kill all animal life, sure.

Many a man has had his pork fail to keep properly because it was salted in a frozen condition. Frozen meat, whether beef, pork or mutton, will not properly assimilate with salt, and cannot be depended on to keep in hot weather. A moment's reflection will make this seem so reasonable that one will wonder why he did not think of it before.

On the mucky black soil lands at the West farmers find that any size of tile less than three inch quickly fills up. One farmer said he would not lay two-inch tile if furnished free of cost. The fine soil works easily through the joints of the tile, and on this black soil there is commonly too little fall to make a current that will wash the tile clear.

Old apple orchards do well in grass. It is a mistaken notion that the trees must be ever cultivated. Keep the grass cut or pastured short; apply an abundance of good manure on the surface; keep the tops of the trees open so as to allow the sun to strike the surface, and a sod cannot harm an orchard for a few years. When it becomes too sod-bound turn it over and it will reseed itself.

The condition of well-fattened animals, in which the fat and lean meat is mixed in alternate layers, has generally been regarded as only the result of long and careful feeding, which is necessarily expensive. It is now believed by some that this desirable result can be secured by feeding on grains containing a larger portion of albuminoids and less of carbohydrates. In other words, oats, peas and beans will make more lean meat in proportion to fat than a diet of corn.

An interesting experiment, showing the evil effects of worry on the quality of a cow's milk, is reported by the Connecticut Experimental Station. A new cow was bought and turned in with a strange herd. She had been recommended as a rich milker, but her milk yielded no cream. On analysis it showed solids, per cent., 11.28; fat, per cent., 2.16. This cow had been a pet, and when put by herself the milk showed, solids, per cent., 15.08, and fat, per cent., 5.54. This is a remarkable exhibit.

Dr. Caldwell speaks very highly of oatmeal for milch cows; but when he rates it above corn meal he runs counter to the experience of many farmers who feed for cream and butter. It is possible that oatmeal may be theoretically more nearly a perfect feed than corn, as it contains a greater percentage of albuminoids, but no Northern grown grain will take the place of corn in making thick, yellow cream and highly colored butter in Winter; that from oats alone is comparatively white. Corn and oats ground together, however, make good feed for cows, or in fact for any kind of farm stock.

The breed influences not only the yield but the degree of quality. Milk from cows that give large quantities is not always as rich as it should be, while the milk from cows that yield small quantities, but rich in all respects, may contain a larger proportion of nutritious matter than that from the deeper milker. The breed also influences the proportion of the different substances that enter into the composition of milk. The Ayrshire tends to the production of a large quantity of caseine, and the Jersey is bred for proportion of cream. Which is the richer milk is a matter for discussion, for while the milk from the Jersey may seemingly be the richer in carbon it is not unfair to claim that the milk which contains the greater quantity of nitrogen may really be the more nutritious and valuable as an article of food.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Household Hints.

Cranberry jelly mixed with cold water makes a refreshing drink for a sick person.

A well-beaten egg is a great addition to a dried apple pie, giving lightness and a good flavor also.

A bunch of peacock feathers, tied with a ribbon, makes a pretty ornament to hide a bad spot on the parlor wall.

A little whitening applied to white paint when washing it will cleanse it quickly, and take the yellow tint away.

A little borax put in the water in which scarlet napkins and red-bordered towels are to be washed will prevent them from fading.

Dishes, to shine brightly, should be washed first in suds and then dipped in clear hot water, and left to drain. They require little or no drying.

If the boy's shoes are stiff from having been wet, rub them at night with a little castor oil. This will soften them and make them comfortable again.

Flannels should not be washed very often. Change the garments frequently and air those taken off in the open air and sun. Unless they are really soiled do not wash them.

One way to prepare onion flavoring for a vegetable soup is to take a large onion, remove the outer skin, then stick cloves into the onion, and bake it until it is nicely browned. The peculiar flavor thus gained is relished by the epicure.

All Can Be Attractive.

Few women are beautiful. Some are pretty, many may be handsome; all can be attractive, and there is absolutely no excuse for being unsightly. It costs money to buy dresses, hats, cloaks, shoes, gloves, collars, ribbons, and handkerchiefs; but little more expensive is a neat dress pattern, simply made but well-fitted, than a startling novelty loaded with trimmings and slovenly made. A becoming hat costs no more than a loud, gaudily trimmed one, and it is possible to get just as neat a shoe for $3 as for double the price. It would seem impertinent to have to speak of personal cleanliness, yet so gross is the neglect that a woman with a head of clean, well-kept, well-arranged hair, white teeth, immaculate hands, face, ears, and neck, is quite as remarkable in a public place or street-car as a positive beauty. It is this scrupulous care of the body that adds so much to the reputation of Mrs. Langtry. Her hair is so clean and fragrant of bay rum, her teeth so white, her lips so red, her ears and finger-tips so pink, and her skin so perfectly free from imperfections, and there is about her such an air of being well-fed and well-kept as to remind one of a thoroughbred horse.

A Few Scotch Recipes.

Scots Beef Collops:—Cut stakes of a huckbone or spareribin a small pieces; beat them well; take a stewpan, brown a little butter with flour, put in a row of beef, with pepper, salt, and sliced onions; repeat the same till your stewpan is near full; draw back the collops make about half a mutchkin of gravy of the skinny parts of your beef, and thicken it with butter and flour; add to it a little vinegar and ketchup, and when it boils scum it, and mix your collops with it.

Soda Scones:—Eight cups of flour, two teaspoonsful of salt, a piece of butter the size of a walnut and one teaspoonful of baking soda. Mix the salt, soda and butter well into the flour and then make into a nice dough with as much buttermilk or sour milk as is required. Bake on a griddle over a very slow fire without a particle of grease of any kind. They can be made any size you prefer. A good way is take a piece of the dough that will roll out to the size of an ordinary plate and about half an inch in thickness. They are very nice warm for tea and nicer cut in half and toasted for breakfast; and are a pleasant change from home-made and baker's bread, if made occasionally.

Orange Marmalade:—Not Dundee marmalade, but still very nice. This recipe was given me by a Scotchwoman and as oranges are very cheap just now, I thought it would be acceptable, as very little fruit was "put up" last year—all kinds being very scarce:—Buy as many oranges as you wish to put up and their weight in loaf sugar. Score the oranges in quarters and remove the rind. Put the rinds, from which any adhering skin has been removed, into a preserving kettle with plenty of cold water and boil till soft and then drain. Squeeze the juice and pulp, keeping out all seeds and white skin. Put it on the fire with the sugar and boil half an hour. Then add the yellow rinds which must previously have been cut into the finest of chips. Boil together until it jellies and the chips are cooked through and are transparent and tender.

Scotch Soup, or Hotch Potch:—Boil four pound of beef in two pints of water, till the whole substance is out of it. Then take out the beef, and put in about two dozen of turnips, neatly turned out with a nip turner, three carrots well scraped and washed, and split into four quarters, about a half inch long, a stock of ice lettice washed clean, the top crust of a penny loaf, a little pepper and salt, half a peck of green peas, and two or three large onions. When it comes to a boil scum it well. Then put in three pounds of the back ribs of mutton, cut into handsome steaks and let it boil for an hour on a moderate fire. Before you dish up the soup, take out the lettice and bread, and serve it up in a turreen. This soup is sometimes made with mutton alone, or with beef alone, or beef and mutton bones, and instead of bread, rared, sliced potatoes are put in and the vegetables—turnips, parsnips, carrots, etc., are cut into small dice and it is sometimes thickened with barley. It is a staple dish on the table of both the poor and the rich Scot, and is very nourishing for the money expended.

Oatmeal Bannocks:—Put in a baking pan six handfuls of fresh oatmeal, a small pinch of salt, one teaspoonful of baking powder, and a piece of butter or lard about the size of half an egg. When these ingredients are thoroughly mixed, pour boiling water upon them and stir till the meal is thoroughly wetted, and so that it can be worked by the hand. Then take a piece of it, lay it upon your board and gently kneed or press it thin, using the left hand to surround it and prevent its cracking. When thinned as much as it possibly can be by the hand go over it gently with your rolling pin till it is about an eight of an inch thick. Do all this as quickly as you can while it is warm. Cut as you would a pie in serving it, and put it in a dry clean pan in a very slow oven—the giver of this receipt sometimes leaves her oven door open, when her oven is a little too warm. They are done when hard. They must not be browned. Set them around your bakeboard to cool and then if you wish them to look nice, as well as taste nice, dust them over with a broombush dipped in wheaten flour. These bannocks, if well and carefully made and eaten with fresh butter and the accompaniment of a good cup of tea is a dish fit for—fit for—let me see—why for a good Scotch husband who earns the money and lets you wisely expend it.

A Photographer Convicted of Libelling a Young Lady.

Brockville, March 20.—A remarkable case was tried on Tuesday at the Perth Assizes before Justice Ross. It was an action of libel brought by Miss Susan Horner against Mr. John F. Bradley. She is a respectable and well conducted girl. The defendant is a photographer, having an establishment on the main street of Perth. On May 24th last Miss Horner had her likeness taken at the defendant's photographer gallery, but when the photos came to be printed she did not like them; she therefore refused to take them, and would not pay for them. The defendant got angry and determined to punish Miss Horner. He adorned one of her photos with a moustache and put a cigar in its mouth; a second he decorated with a large red pair of specs; and in the third he caused a blotched appearance of the face. He procured or wrote some doggerel verses and put the photographs and the rhyme in a frame, and hung them outside the door of his studio. People of course stopped to look, and a small crowd gathered one of whom suggested to Mr. Bradley that he was doing wrong, and that he was

OPEN TO AN ACTION FOR LIBEL.

Bradley consequently took the offensive matter in after it had hung there some thing less than an hour. Bradley also printed some cards containing two of Miss Horner's photographs. To one of these he added a cigar, and moustache, and a flushed face. The other he left plain, in order to make sure of the likeness being recognized as it was suggested. He gave the card to a young man telling him he might show it to a few, but was not to let it go out of his possession. This was produced in court. Shortly after all this the plaintiff paid Bradley's bill, not being aware of what he had been doing. The affair caused a great deal of talk in Perth. The court room was crowded, and one or two sensational incidents happened. Bradley han been subpoenaed to produce the three photographs and the verses, but he refused to do so. He was sworn on his subpoena and presisted in his refusal, claiming privileges on the ground that their production would render him liable to a criminal action.

Mrs. Greene, a boarding house keeper testified that in consequence of hearing the talk about the photos and the verses she had to refused to allow Miss Horner to board with her, as she thought something must be wrong about her. However, on enquiry, she consented to take Miss Horner. Some time afterwards after the action was commenced the defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiff trying to effect a settlement. It is certainly a remarkable document. He tells her that if she acted the part of a lady in paying for her pictures the affair would not have happened. He adds:—"The pictures I made you were good, and if you expect me to make it is more than I am able to do. Now for the sake of peace I will see that there is no more of your amiable features made, and will call in all that are out. If you put me to any more trouble about this subject I will fight it out to the extreme point of the law. Then everybody will know all you can scrape up against my character and all I can against yours. Subsequently Bradley paid $50 into the Court. The only question really at issue was one of damages. Mr. Britton, in his defence made the best of a bad case. The jury found a verdict of $200 and costs in favor of the plaintiff including the $50.

A MODERN PEEPING TOM

How He Lost the Love of His Lady by Impertinent Curiosity.

An odd case was called up before a downtown magistrate in Philadelphia last Friday. The defendant was a young man of about 23 years of age, who is employed in a furnishing goods department of a large general dry goods store in the city, and the complainant was a blooming damsel of 19 summers, plump, rosy-cheeks, and in every way calculated to be an accomplished player upon the heart-strings of susceptible mankind. From her sixteenth birthday the fair maiden in question has been monopolizing the affections of the young man who was at her instigation dragged before the bar of justice; and there is no reason to believe that she did up to that time fully reciprocate the unwavering devotion he showed toward her. As revealed at the examination, of this young man and maiden was brought about in a curious way. The damsel, who resides with her parents, occupies the third story back room of the residence, attached to which is an extensive bathroom that is provided with large windows, the panes of which are made of frosted glass. In this apartment the young lady was in the

THE UNHAPPY ENDING TO THE LOVE AFFAIR

HABIT OF BATHING EACH MORNING

The back buildings of the boarding house in which the young man resides face the back buildings of the fair lady's house, and from this window he could, and often did, throw kisses across to her, receiving in return a supply of same kind of unsatisfactory tokens of affections. Everything went on swimmingly until, one morning the young lady received the following anonymous note:

Philadelphia, January 2, 1884.—I send you this to tell you that nearly every morning the steam gathers on the ground glass windows of your bathing room, and when it turns into water makes them quite transparent, so that anyone can see you in your bath, etc. My attention was called to this by the actions of somebody who each morning appeared to enjoy the charming sight though a pair of opera glasses. I am yours truly. A FRIEND.

This missive was a bombshell, and girl, furious at what she had read, resolved to see for herself it the writer of the letter had spoken truly. The next morning she prepared her usual bath; the steam gathered on the window panes and trickled down; then from the back part of the bedroom she distinctly saw, by means of a pair of opera glasses, the favored young man peering at her bath room through another pair of opera glasses. She at once returned all his presents, refused to see him and had him brought before a magistrate to answer the charge of "invading upon her privacy." The young man, thoroughly ashamed and depressed, was discharged.

The Bishop's Appointment.

When Archbishop Moore died, Manners Sutton was Bishop of Norwich and also Dean of Windsor. He was at that moment residing at his deanery, and was entertaining a party of friends to dinner. In the middle of dinner the butler came up to him with an excited face.

"Beg pardon, my lord, a gentleman wishes to see your lordship directly, but he won't give me his name."

"Nonsense!" said the Bishop; "I can't come down of course."

"The gentleman says it is very important—very important, indeed, my lord—or he wouldn't disturb you."

"Well," said the Bishop, somewhat crossly, "ask him to wait a few minutes till I have finished my dinner."

"Beg pardon, my lord," said the butler, presistently, and with some confidence, "but you had better see the gentleman directly."

The Bishop, amazed at the man's coolness, made an apology to his guests, and went into the next room, where he was still more amazed to find King George III, who, as usual, was breathless and rapid.

"How d'ye do, my lord?—how d'ye do?—eh—eh? Just come to tell you Archbishop of Canterbury is dead—died this morning—want you to be new Archbishop, you know—new Archbishop. What d'ye say, eh—eh?"

The Bishop stood dumfounded, and the King broke in again, "Well, d'ye accept, eh—eh?"

The Bishop had by this time recovered himself sufficiently to bow gratefully and murmur his thankful acceptance.

"All right," said his Majesty. "Go back—got a party, I know—very glad you accept. Good night—good night." And with that he bustled away.

The fact was that he had anticipated exactly what happened. Mr. Pitt came down to his Majesty next morning to inform him that the Archbishop was dead, and to recommend to his Majesty Bishop Pretyman (Tomlin) for the vacant primacy. The King who had rather too much of Pretyman at Mr. Pitt's hands, resolved to be first in the field, and was now able to tell his Prime Minister that he had already appointed the Bishop of Norwich. —English Paper.

Wit and Wisdom.

A man who goes out on a bender may get in straightened circumstances.

"I have not loved lightly," as the man said when he married a widow weighing three hundred pounds.

A wife asked her husband if druggists kept dye-stuffs for sale. He replied: "Most druggists keep little else but die-stuffs."

It will be observed that people have generally the identical faults and vices they accuse others of; we may instance cowardice.

The groundwork of all manly character is veracity, or the habit of truthfulness. That virtue lies at the foundation of everything said.

Small boy—"Pa, did you know ma long before you married her?" Pa—"I didn't. I didn't know her until long after I had married her."

There is more virtue in obscurity than is commonly supposed; and perhaps there have been nobler specimens of magnanimity in humble life than even the page of history can boast.

"Very intellectual boy that of yours, Mr. Goggins: I should like to examine his head." Proud father—"Johnny, what bumps have you got?" "I've got the bump of eating, father, and the bump that Billy Hopkins gave me on the nose; but I'm lyin' for him."

An Auld Kirk divine was one day walking along one of the streets of the capital of the Orcades, when he met a well-known tinker. "Well, John, can you say the 'Lord's Prayer' yet?" "Och man," said John, "every man tae his trade. Can you mak' a tin pail?"

A simple Scotchwoman's description of McCheyne's preaching told the secret of his effective appeals. "He preached as if he was dyin' a'most to have ye converted." What an increase of pulpit power there would be if all preachers spoke with a like earnest desire and purpose!

A jobbing carpenter of the name of Bauldie P—— was engaged on a piece of work which he was not making a very good job of, and a neighbour, by way of taunting him, said: "I doot ye're gey near beat, Bauldie?" "Na, na," replied Bauldie, "Man, I would stop afore I would own beat."

The following striking lines form the epitaph of a miller in Richmond churchyard. Tradition says they were dreamed by him the night before his death:—

"Earth walks upon earth, glittering like gold;
Earth turns to earth sooner than it would;
Earth builds upon earth cities and towers;
Earth says to earth, "All this shall be ours."

A penurious gentleman who had a lawn to mow applied to a gardener to have it done, but wished him to do it for the grass, saying to John's demurring, "Do the cows hereabout no eat grass?" "Ou ay," says John, "they eat grass, and a man ca'd Nebuchadnezzar ate grass, an', as ye appear to be i' the same state o' mind, ye can e'en try an' eat it yersel'."

Mrs. Narler: "That nasty warmint of a dawg o' yourn owt to be poisoned, Miss Mary. He's the terror of all the cats in the village." Miss Mary: "It's very silly of you to be afraid of him, Mrs. Narler. He won't hurt you.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla, the first blood medicine to prove a real success, still holds its place as first in public estimation, both at home and abroad, as shown by its miraculous cures, and immensely increased sales.

A lass, alas! is sometimes false.

When a cold or other cause checks the operation of the secretive organs, their natural healthy action should be restored by the use of Ayer's Pills, and inflammatory material thereby removed from the system. Much serious sickness and suffering might be prevented by thus promptly correcting those slight derangements that, otherwise, often develop into settled disease.

Of faults a maid is made.

Mr. A. Fisher, of the Toronto Globe, says: "I take great pleasure in recommending Northrop & Lyman's Vegetable Discovery and Dyspeptic Cure to the public. I have suffered with Dyspepsia for some time, and have tried several remedies without receiving any benefit. Being recommended to do so, I used one bottle, and must say that I find the result perfectly satisfactory, not being troubled with this distressing disease since, and would recommend others similarly afflicted to purchase a bottle at once and try it, as I am satisfied they will receive benefit from its use."

I would a story here commence,

Mr. Peter Vermeit, Hochelaga, P. Q., writes: "Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil cured me of Rheumatism after I tried many medicines to no purpose. It is a good medicine." Just think of it—you can relieve the twinges of rheumatism, or the most painful attack of neuralgia—you can check a cough, and heal bruised or broken skin, with a bottle of Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil, costing only 25 cents.

But you might find it stale;

Prominent among the greatest medical discoveries, by the many cures it has affected, McGregor's Speedy Cure leads the van. Subjected to the minutest chemical analysis, it has been found to contain none of those injurious ingredients characterizing the worthless specifics daily offered to the public. Every ingredient possesses a peculiar adaptability to the various complaints for which it has been compounded, and its efficacy is being established by testimonials hourly received. We are therefore confident that we have a preparation which we can offer to the public with the assurance that it will be found not only a relief but an absolute cure for Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Indigestion, Constipation and Impure Blood. Free trial bottle at Gayfer and Kneeshaw's Drug Store.

The end tail of our tale.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Rheumatism and Neuralgia.—Though in the former disease remorelessly attacks persons of all ages, and the latter ruthlessly selects its victims from the weak and delicate, the perserving use of these remedies will infallibly cure both complaints. After the affected parts have been diligently rubbed with hot brine, and the skin thoroughly dried, Holloway's Ointment must be rubbed in firmly and evenly for a few minutes twice a day, and his Pills taken according to the printed directions wrapped round each box of his medicine. Both Ointment and Pills are accompanied by instructions designed for the public at large, and no invalid, who attentively reads them, can now be at any loss how to doctor himself successfully.

MUCH IN A LITTLE.

Many proprietary medicines, if they cure at all, require such a large quantity to produce effect that it makes them very uncertain and expensive remedies. Not so with Burdock Blood Bitters. It is highly concentrated, and for all diseases of blood, liver and kidneys, one or two bottles will cure more than gallons of the weak mixtures usually sold. Send for facts and figures. 95i

CHAPTER XIV.

When Hollister returned that evening, almost the first words that Claire spoke to him were : "Congratulate me, Herbert. I have taken a fine forward step at last."

"What do you mean, my dear?"

"I have got to know somebody of importance. I have launched my ship."

"Oho," laughed Hollister, understanding. "I hope the ship will prove seaworthy, little captain. You must steer with a prudent eye, remember. All sorts of squalls will lie in wait for your canvas, no matter how well you trim it."

"That is just the kind of sailing I like," said Claire. "I've been becalmed long enough."

He laughed at this in his hearty way, as though it were quite a marvel of wit. "Come and tell me," he proposed, "about the important somebody who has been sensible enough to discover you."

They were alone together, in their wide, cheerful apartments overlooking the ocean. They were about to go down and dine, and Hollister had just finished a few preparatory details of toilet. Lights had been lit, for the rapid autumn dusk had already thickened into nightfall; but though they could not see the starlit level of waters just beyond their windows, they had a sense of its nearness in the moist, salty breeze, whose tender rush made the drawn shades bulge, and set the loose curtains fluttering buoyantly.

Hollister sank into a chair as he spoke the last sentence, and at the same time put his arm about his wife's waist, drawing her downward until she seated upon his knee. The roses at her bosom brushed his face, and he thrust his head forward with a sigh of comic infatuation, as though rapturously inhaling their perfume. But his free hand soon wandered up along the chestnut ripples of her hair, and he began to smooth it, with a touch creditably dainty for his heavy masculine fingers.

Claire permitted his caresses. She always permitted and never returned them. He had a slight sense that this was a coldly unreciprocal course; it appeared to fit neatly enough with the general plan of creation that she should receive homage of any sort without further response than its mute recognition. That was the way he had constantly known her to act, or rather not to act; a change would have surprised, perhaps even shocked him; she would have ceased to be his peculiar, accustomed Claire; his revered statue would have lost her pedestal, and he had grown to like the pedestal for no wiser reason than that he had always seen it enthrone her.

"I will tell you all about my discoverer," Claire said, with a matter-of-fact directness; and she at once began a swift and succinct little narrative.

"Diggs," Hollister suddenly broke in, with one of his fresh laughs. "Oh, look here, now; you've made some big mistake. She can't be one of your adored swells, with such a name. It's—it's . . . cacophonous, positively!"

"Wait, if you please," said Claire, with demure toleration, as though a bulwark of proof made this skeptic assault endurable. "Her husband's name, in the first place, is not simply Diggs; it's Manhattan Diggs." She made this announcement with an air of tranquil triumph; but Hollister at once gave another irreverent laugh.

"Oh, of course!" he cried. "I remember now. I know him. That is, I nod to him on the street, now and then. Is he here? Why, he's nearly always tipsy, you know."

"Tipsy!" repeated Claire, rising with an incredulous look. "Oh, Herbert, you must be mistaken. She worships him. She says that he treats her charmingly, and that they get on together with perfect accord."

"It would be rather strange to find two of that name even in such a great place as New York," said Hollister, with a slight shrug of his shoulders. "I don't believe I am mistaken a bit, Claire. He's a tall man, with fat yellow side-whiskers, and a face as red as your roses. He's got lots of money, I'm told. He goes down into the street, and dawdles an hour or so a day at his broker's. But I've never seen him thoroughly sober yet. Upon my word, I haven't."

Claire soon saw the husband of Mrs. Diggs. It was after dinner, in one of the spacious, modern-appointed sitting-rooms, now so often half-vacant of occupants, or sometimes wholly vacant, through these lengthened September evenings.

"I want to present my husband," said Mrs. Diggs, preceding a tall man with fat side-whiskers, whom Hollister had before this recognized across the dining-room as his own particular, chronically tipsy Mr. Diggs, beyond all possibility of mistake.

Claire had a little chat with Mr. Diggs, while Hollister, who had claimed acquaintance and shaken hands with him, seated himself at the side of his volatile spouse.

Claire soon became bored. Mr. Diggs was plainly tipsy; Herbert had been right. But he was most uninteresting tipsy. He had sense enough remaining to conduct himself with a sort of haphazard propriety. He incessantly stroked either one or the other whisker, and kept up a perpetual struggle not to appear incoherent. He was at times considerably incoherent; a few of his sentences made the nominative seem as if it were swaggering toward its verb. But he was vastly polite. He told Claire that his wife had fallen in love with her. A little later, however, he spoke of his wife with a certain jolly disparagement.

"Kate is full of a lot of new things. I don't know what I'm going to do with her—really, I don't. She'll be a regular free-thinker before I know it. And I don't like free-thinkers; I think they're a sad lot. Now, don't you?"

Claire gave short, evasive answers to these and a number of similar appeals. Mr. Diggs distressed her; he was not at all the sort of person whom she desired to meet. She soon made herself so intentionally distraite that he rose and told her he was going to smoke a cigar, which he would bring into the sitting-room after he had obtained it, provided she did not object. She professed herself wholly sympathetic with this arrangement, and tried not to let her lip curl as she watched the unsteady pace of its proposer across the long sitting-room.

But he had scarcely retired before Mrs. Diggs broke off her converse with Hollister and exclaimed to Claire :—

"Where on earth has dear Manhattan gone? You don't mean that he has left you? How shameful of him!"

"I believe he has gone to get a cigar," Claire said.

"Oh, a cigar," retorted Mrs. Diggs. "Yes, poor Manhattan is an inveterate smoker." She now looked at Hollister and Claire equally, with quick, alternate movements of the head. "I feel sure that tobacco is beginning to injure him, though it is really a very small kind of vice, don't you know? It saves a man from other worse ones. Manhattan, dear boy, smokes a good deal, and I suppose I should be grateful it's only that. I hear such dreadful tales from my friends about their husbands drinking. I don't know what I should do if dear Manhattan drank. I'm so glad he doesn't. If he did, I—well, I actually believe I should get a divorce!"

Claire felt that her husband's eye, full of merry furtive twinkles, had fixed itself upon her all through this unexpected speech. But she kept her face from the least mirthful betrayal. Mr. Diggs did not come back with his cigar.

Claire now wondered, as she watched her new friend and entered into conversation with her, whether this unconsciousness of her husband's continual excesses could be real and not feigned. It was hard to suppose that so much shrewd observation and so cunning a recognition of human foibles and follies could by any chance consort with the obtuse lack of perception which her late comments had implied. And yet Claire somehow became conscious that Mrs. Diggs had really meant it all. The anomaly was hard to credit; it was one of those absurd contradictions with which human nature often loves to bewilder us; and yet its element of preposterous self-delusion held at least the merit of being genuine.

Claire had reached a distinct conclusion to that effect, when Mrs. Van Horn, entering the room, paused and looked all about her. There were several other groups scattered here and there, but the lady presently fixed her gaze upon that small one of which Mrs. Diggs was a unit. And very soon afterward she began to move in the direction of her cousin.

Mrs. Diggs was so seated that she could plainly note the approach. She half-turned toward Claire, and said in rapid undertone, seeming only to speak with the extreme edges of her lips :

"Can I actually trust my senses? Is it fact or hallucination? Cornelia is coming this way. I told you she wanted to know you, but I didn't dream that she would condescend to seek anybody, like this, short of a queen, or, at the lowest, a duchess. Yes, here she comes; there's no mistake."

Mrs. Diggs quitted her chair, a little later. She took a few steps toward her cousin, meeting her. Hollister also arose; Claire, naturally, did not rise.

"I want to present Mrs. Hollister," said Mrs. Diggs, after a few seconds of low-toned converse with the new-comer. "My cousin, Mrs. Van Horn," she at once added, completing the introduction. It was Claire's turn to rise also, which she did.

"I think you know my brother," said Mrs. Van Horn to Claire, when all were again seated. "I mean Mr. Beverley Thurston."

"Oh, yes," said Claire.

Her monosyllables were quite intentional. She had not liked the lady's manner. There had been a remote, superb chill about it. She was distinctly conscious of being descended to, as though from an invisible stair. The nearer view that she had gained of Beverley Thurston's sister made her sensible of a new and original personality. Mrs. Van Horn was so blonde, so superfine, so rarely and choicely feminine. Her warmth was so faint and her coolness so moderated. She was like a rose that had in some way blent itself with an icicle, the shape of the flower remaining, and its flush taking a hue that had the tint of life yet the pallor of frost.

Claire determined not to speak again unless Mrs. Van Horn addressed her. This event soon occurred. Hollister and Mrs. Diggs had fallen into conversation. Mrs. Van Horn surveyed them, with her pose a little in the air, and her eyelids a little drooped. She seemed on the point of interrupting their talk, and of ignoring Claire, who had leaned back with a nice semblance of entire unconcern. In a few moments, however, this mode of treatment underwent change.

"I have heard my brother speak of you," she said, fixing her light-blue eyes full on Claire's face. "It was before you were married, I think."

"Yes," replied Claire. "We were very good friends. I missed him after he had gone."

"He went suddenly," said Mrs. Van Horn.

"Very suddenly," responded Claire, with a smile as complaisant as it was inscrutable.

Mrs. Van Horn looked downward; she appeared to be examining one or two of her rings; they were not numerous, though each of them had an odd individuality of prettiness. "There seemed to be no good reason why he should go," she soon said, lifting her eyes again. "He has been there so often."

"I should think it would be hard to go too often," said Claire.

"You have been, then?"

"No. But I wish to go very much. . . . Not yet, however."

"Not yet?" repeated the lady. Claire could not accuse her of staring, in any downright way, but she had an impression that every least detail of her own dress and person was receiving the most critical regard. "I suppose your husband's affairs detain him here, for the present."

"Yes," returned Claire, but at the same time she shook her head negatively. "It isn't that, however. I mean it would not be only that. There is something for me to see, to know, to do, here. I haven't finished with my own country yet," she proceeded, giving a bright smile. "I am not yet ready for Europe."

Mrs. Van Horn laughed. But it was not a laugh with any amusement in it, neither was it one that contained any irony. "My brother thought you very clever," she said. "He told me so repeatedly."

"That was kind of him," Claire answered. She did not decide that Mrs. Van Horn was patronizing her; she decided, on the contrary, that the sister of Thurston was trying to make her disinclination to patronize most plainly apparent. "It is pleasant to hear that he thinks well of me," Claire went on. "He is a man whose good opinion I shall always highly value."

Mrs. Van Horn leaned forward. She was smiling, now, but it struck Claire that her smile was at best a chilly artifice. "You did not show much regard for his opinion in one instance," she said, lowering her voice so that Claire just caught it, and no more. "I mean when he asked you to marry him. You see, I know all about that. He told me. It sent him to Europe."

This was, of course, a bombshell to Claire. But even while the color was getting up into her cheeks with no weak flood, she realized that it had been meant for a bombshell, and made swift resolve that its explosion should not deal death to her self-command.

"I am sorry that he told you," she rather promptly managed to say. "I have kept it a secret from everybody. I thought he would do the same."

"Oh, he has no secrets from me," returned Mrs. Van Horn, with what seemed to her an extraordinary brightness of tone. The speaker immediately drew out a little jeweled watch and looked at the hour. "It is later than I thought," she now said. "I have two letters to write; I must be going upstairs. Pray come and see me, Mrs. Hollister, when you are back in town," she continued, while putting her watch away again, and calling Claire by her name for the first time since they had met. "Mrs. Diggs will tell you my address. Promise me that you will not forget to come. I leave rather early to-morrow, and may not have a chance of repeating my request." Here she rose and put out her hand. Claire took it but said nothing. She had lost her self-command after all; she was too much embarrassed to utter a word. Mrs. Van Horn had already gained one of the doors of the great room before Claire realized what had taken place. A certain splendor of courtesy enveloped the whole departure. It was admirably conducted, notwithstanding its abruptness. It was one of those things that Mrs. Van Horn always did surprisingly well; she could enter or retire from a room with an effect quite her own in its supple graciousness and dignity. But Claire soon felt that both the graciousness and dignity had something mystic about them. It was somehow as if an oracle had pronounced something very oracular indeed. The civility of the invitation had been so totally unforeseen, and it had followed with so keen a suddenness the recent bewildering revelation, that Claire did not know how to explain the whole proceeding, to construe it, to read between its lines.

Hollister, who had received a brief, polite bow of adieu, and risen as he returned it, broke the ensuing silence.

"Didn't she go away quite in a hurry?" he asked. "I hope you haven't offended her," he added jocosely to his wife.

"Cornelia didn't look a bit offended," said Mrs. Diggs, regarding Claire, or rather her continued blush. "But that means nothing. You didn't quarrel, now did you Mrs. Hollister?"

"Oh, no," said Claire, still dazed and demoralized. "She asked me to visit her in town; she was very urgent that I should do so."

"You don't really tell me such a thing!" exclaimed Mrs. Diggs. "You've no idea how prodigious an honor she was conferring. It's like decorating you with the order of St. Something—actually it is."

"I'm afraid I failed to value it in that way," replied Claire, who was recovering herself.

"Of course you did. You haven't yet taken in the full enormity of Cornelia's importance. You can't do it until you see her surrounded by her own proper atmosphere—with her foot on her native heath, so to speak. Then you'll understand the massive condescension of to-night."

"I think I would just as lief not understand it," laughed Hollister with his characteristic play of gentle humor. "It doesn't repay you to climb those very big mountains. Everybody says there's very little to see after you've got to the tops of them."

Mrs. Diggs echoed his laugh. She was looking at Claire, however, with her bright, black, restless eyes. "I think your wife may want to climb," she said. "I'll be her guide if she'll let me. There's a very good view from the summit of cousin Cornelia. You can look down on a lot of smaller peaks."

Claire shook her head. She had got her natural color again, but not her natural manner; she spoke in a tone of preoccupied seriousness that did not harmonize with her light words.

"I shouldn't like to fall down one of these glaciers and be lost," she said.

"Oh, there's no fear of that," said Mrs. Diggs. "You're too sure footed."

Somewhat later that evening, when they were alone together, Hollister asked his wife :

"Did that Mrs. Van Horn say anything that hurt you, Claire?"

"Oh, no. What made you think so, Herbert?"

"I . . . Well, perhaps I only fancied it. . . . You had known her brother, hadn't you?"

"Yes. He was a good deal at the Bergemanns' last spring. He went to Europe afterward. I suppose that was why she wanted to know me better."

Claire said this with a fine composure. She was standing before her dressing-table disengaging the roses from her hair. Hollister stole up behind her and clasped her in his arms, setting his face close beside hers, and looking with a full smile at their twin reflection, which the mirror now gave to both.

"So you've got among the great people at last, little struggler," he said; "you've begun to be a great person yourself." He kissed her on the temple, still keeping his arms about her. "I suppose you'll make quick work of it now. I'm glad for your sake—you know I am! You're bound to succeed. I shall be awfully proud of you."

This seemed quite in the order of things to Claire. Her husband's approval was a matter-of-course; it was like the roses he gave her every day—like the kiss, the embrace, the loving devotion that had each grown accepted synonyms of Herbert himself. She forgot the words and the caress with careless promptitude. But she did not forget what Mrs. Van Horn had said to her downstairs in the great sitting-room. Her sleep that night was perturbed by the memory of it.

"Does that woman like me, or does she hate me?" repeatedly passed through her mind, in the interval between sleeping and waking. "Does she feel that she owes me a grudge, and long to pay it? Is she angry that I refused her brother? How strange it would be if I should find myself face to face with some hard, bitter enmity just at the threshold of the new life I want to live."

But the bright morning dissipated these brooding fears. It was a bright morning, and an unexpectedly cold one. The sea sparkled with the vivid brilliance of real autumn, as Claire looked at it from her window on rising, and every trace of its former lazy mist had left the silvery crystal blue of the overarching sky. A sharp barometric change had occurred during the night. Claire and Hollister effected their toilets with nimble fingers and not a few audible shivers. The flimsy architecture of the huge hotel, reared to court coolness rather than to resist cold, had suddenly become an abode of aguish discomfort.

Its occupants fled, that day, in startled scores. Mrs. Diggs was among the earlier departures. She bade farewell to Claire, wrapped in a formidable wintry mantle. Her leave taking was warm enough, though her teeth seemed to chatter while she gave it. Her husband was at her side, looking as though the altered weather had incited him to even a more bacchanal disregard of his complexion than usual. The chubby-cheeked little girl, her French bonne, and the maid of Mrs. Diggs, were also near at hand.

They were all five on the piazza, where Hollister and Claire had gone, both careless in their youthful health and vigor, of the rushing ocean wind that blew out into straight lines every shred of raiment that it could seize. Little Louise was whimpering and contumacious; she wanted to break away from Aline, and pulled against the latter's tense clasp of her hand as if the wind and she were in the same, hoydenish, fly-away plot together.

An admonitory stroke of bells had just sounded from near the depot; the train would soon glide off from the big wooden platform beyond. Mrs. Diggs was in a flurry, like the weather; her great wrap could not warm her; she looked more chalky of hue than ever, and the bluish line in her lips had grown purplish. But a defective circulation had not chilled her spirits; she was alive with her wonted vivacity.

She had caught Claire's hand, while turning at very brief intervals toward Aline and the child. Her sentences had become spasmodic, polyglot, and parenthetical; they were half addressed to Claire and half to the recalcitrant Louise.

"Now you won't forget just where you're to find me, will you, my dear Mrs. Hollister? . . . Sois bonne fille, Louise; nous allons a New York toute de suite. . . . I want so much to see you as soon as you can manage to come. Did you ever know anything like this dreadful gale? I'm so cold that I believe it will take a good month to warm me. . . . Tais-toi, cherie, tu vas a New York, ou il ne fait pas froid du tout. . . . You're going this afternoon, you say? I don't see how you can wait. There's cousin Jane Van Corlear just going inside—I promised to go along with her. Say good-by, Manhattan; the cold weather has made you as red as a turkey-cock, hasn't it, dear boy? . . . Aline, prenez garde! Elle est bien mechante, elle veut d'etre absolument perdue. . . . Well, good-by, both of you. I do hope you won't freeze before you get off!"

When the Diggs family had disappeared, Claire and her husband went and finished their packing. That afternoon they left the deserted hotel, reaching New York about dusk. They had themselves driven to the Everett House; Hollister had occasionally lodged there in bachelor days, and proposed it as a temporary place of sojourn.

It proved less temporary than they had expected. Apartments were easy and yet hard to procure. A good many sumptuous suites, in haughty and handsome buildings, were offered them at depressing prices. They found other suites, in buildings far less grand, which pleased them less and suited their purse better, but still left a certain margin as regarded proposed rental vs. expenditure. Five or six days were consumed in these monotonous modes of search. They could obtain lodgment that was too dear, and lodgment that was too cheap; but they could not hit the golden mean of adaptability which would combine delectable quarters with moderate rates.

"It is tiresome work," Claire at length said, "and it is keeping you from your business, Herbert, in a most shameful way. I really don't see what we are to do."

"The apartments in West Thirty-Sixth Street, that we saw yesterday," ventured Hollister, genially, "were rather nice, though small, of course."

"Quite too small," affirmed Claire. "Besides, the house itself had a dingy air. It looked so—so economical, Herbert. We don't want to look economical; we want only to be it."

Hollister made a blithe grimace. "I am afraid that to be it and look it are inseparable," he said. "The grain of the rind tells the quality of the fruit." He put his head a little sideways and glanced at his wife with a quizzical eye. "Now, in the way of downright bargains, Claire," he went on, "there is that nice basement house which is for rent entire in Twenty-Eighth Street. The one we drifted into by mistake during our wanderings of yesterday, you remember."

"I'd rather not think of it," said Claire, with a sort of musing demureness. "I liked it very much. I don't believe there's a furnished house to rent in the whole city that could be had for the same terms. But you know very well that we could not afford to take it, with the need of at least three servants, apart from other expenses."

"True," said Hollister. "That is, unless I get along better—make a hit on the street, you know."

"Oh, well," said Claire, "there is no use in depending upon chance. Of course," she added slowly, with a grave, affirmative motion of the head, "I should like very much to have the house. You know I should."

"Then we'll rent it," Hollister struck in, swiftly and with fervor. "It won't be much of a risk, but we'll take what risk there is. The first quarter's rent would be absolutely sure, Claire. Are you agreed?"

He spoke entirely from his loving perception of how much she would like to reign as the ruler of her own establishment. It thrilled him to think of her in this proper, sovereign sort of character.

"It will not be right, Herbert," Claire said. "We made up our minds to spend just so much and no more." . . .

But her tones lacked all imperative disapproval. Perhaps she was thinking how pleasant it would be for Mrs. Diggs to find her handsomely installed as the mistress of her own private dwelling.

On the following day Hollister rented the little basement house in Twenty-Eighth Street. Claire accompanied him while he did so. She was frightened when the terms asked were finally accepted. She was still more frightened when she thought of the steady, draining expenses which must follow. But, after all, her alarm only acted as a sort of undercurrent. Above it was the large, delightful satisfaction of foreseeing herself the reigning head of a distinct establishment.

It was an extremely pretty house, no less outside than inside. The occupation by its new tenants had been arranged as immediate, and this notable event soon occurred. Claire went herself to hire the three servants. She found a great supply at a certain depot for this sort of demand. She engaged three whom she liked the most, or rather disliked the least. And very soon she and her husband quitted their hotel for good. They became co-proprietors of the basement house in Twenty-Eighth street.

Certain new tasks occupied Claire. She quickly performed them. Her administrative faculty now showed itself in clear and striking relief. Her penurious past had taught her unforgotten lessons; she went into her new place with none of a neophyte's unskilled rawness; her fund of domestic, of management experience was like an unused yet efficient well; she had only to give a turn of the hand and up came the buckets, moistly and practically laden. True, she worked under the most altered conditions; she was no longer a drudge but a supervisor; and yet the very grimness of that early apprenticeship had held in it a radical value of instruction. She who had known of the prices paid for inferior household goods, could use her knowledge now to fine profit in the purchase of better ones. Having swept with her own toil floors that were clad coarsely, she could in readier way discern uncleanly neglect on the part of underlings who swept floors clad with velvet.

Her responsibility was borne with great lightness. "I think I am a sort of natural housekeeper," she soon told her husband. "It all comes very easy. I find that my daily leisure is increasing at a rapid rate."

She directed with so much system, discipline and keen-sightedness that speed was a natural result. Her detection of negligence and fraud was prompt and thorough. She discouraged the least familiarity in her servants. On this point she was severely sensitive; she maintained her dignity in all intercourse with them, and sometimes it was a dignity so positive and accentuated that it blent with her personal beauty in giving the effect of a picturesque sternness. The secret of its exercise lay wholly in her former life. She had once been socially low enough for these very employees to treat her as an equal. All that was dead and in its grave. She wanted to keep it there forever. Instinctively she stamped down the sods, and even held a vigilant foot upon them.

She was soon prepared to seek out Mrs. Diggs and pay her a long, intimate visit. She found her new friend in a small but charming home. The drawing-room into which she was shown displayed a great deal of good taste, and yet it had not a touch of needless grandeur. Its least detail, from the cushion of a sofa, to the panel of a screen, suggested permanent and sensible usage. It was a room that shocked you with no inelegance, while it invited you by a sort of generally sympathetic upholstery and appointment.

Mrs. Diggs was delighted to hear of the new Twenty-Eighth Street residence. She took Claire's gloved hand in both of her slim, bony ones, and proffered the most effusive congratulations.

"It's so much nicer, don't you know, to be a real chatelaine like that—to have your own four domiciliary walls, and not to live in a honeycomb fashion, like a bee in its cell, with Heaven knows how many other bees buzzing all about you. I'm inexpressibly glad you've done it. Now you are lancee, don't you know? You can entertain people. And I'm sure, my dear, that you do want to entertain people."

Claire gave a pretty little trill of a laugh. "I have no people to entertain yet," she said.

Mrs. Diggs was still holding her hand. "Oh, you sly mouse!" she exclaimed. "You've got great ideas in your head for the coming winter. Don't tell me you haven't. Remember our talks at Coney Island. And you're going straight for the big game. You're not the sort that will be content with a small, low place. Not you! You want a large and high one. It's going to be a great fight. Now, don't say it isn't. I know all about you. I dote on you, and I know all about you. You intend to try and be a leader. You've got it in you to be one, too. I believe you'll succeed—I do, honestly! I'll put up my money on you, as that dear Manhattan of mine would say of a horse. . . . You're not annoyed at me?"

"Not at all," smiled Claire. "But everything must have a beginning, you know. And I have no beginning, as yet. I have only met yourself and" . . . She paused, then, looking a little serious.

Here Mrs. Diggs dropped Claire's hand, and burst into a loud, hilarious laugh. Her mirth quite convulsed her for several moments.

"Cornelia Van Horn!" she presently shouted in a riotously gleeful way. "Myself and Cornelia Van Horn! That is what you mean. Isn't it, now? Isn't it?"

She was looking at Claire with both hands in her lap and her angular body bent oddly forward. She gave the idea of a humorous human interrogation-mark.

"Well, yes," said Claire, soberly, and a little offendedly; "I do mean that. Pray what is there so funny about it?"

Mrs. Diggs again became convulsed with laughter: "Funny!" she at length managed to say. "Why, it's magnificent! It's delicious! You're going to titillate against Cornelia! Of course you are! You don't know a soul yet; you're quite obscure; but you have a sublime self-confidence. That is always the armor-bearer of genius; it carries the spear and shield of the conqueror. My dear, I always wanted to have somebody beard Cornelia in her den, don't you know, like the Douglas! I'm with you—don't forget that! I'll help you all I can. And when you've shaken the pillars of New York society to their foundations, please be grateful and recollect that I set you up to it."

She threw back her head and laughed again, in her boisterous, vehement, but never ill-bred style.

Claire sat and watched her. She was not even smiling now; she was biting her lip. She had concluded, some time ago, that she understood Mrs. Diggs perfectly. But she did not know, at present, in what spirit to take this noisy paroxysm. Was it sincere, amicable amusement, or was it pitiless and impudent mockery?

The sudden death of George Rice, of Currie's Crossing, from inflammation of the lungs, the result of a neglected cold, removes from our midst one who has battled with the hardships of a new country and seen during his eventful life a country of unbroken forest changed into a land of cities, towns and fertile farms. The subject of this sketch was born some miles out of Toronto—then Muddy York—in the year 1823. His father was the late Alfred Rice, esq., whose death occurred some years since. His mother still survives, and lives on the old homestead in East Oxford.

SPRING CREEK MILLS.—The Galloway cheese factory commenced operation April 7th. The quantity of milk received at the factory was not very large, but larger than might be expected. The cheese maker, Mr. Ireland, has won a great reputation and added much to the patronage. The high reputation this factory has acquired for making a first class article has ranked it among the first factories in Ontario.

Maple sugar is the chief topic among the farmers in this part. The sap has been running very freely for the past few days. Sugar sucks are quite prominent just now, not bad to take at this period of the year.

I hope whoever the path-master is on second concession will look after the road this year in front of lot No. 13. The road has been allowed to remain all on one side of road allowance, so as there is not even a foot path left. The road wants to be turn-piked in the middle of road allowance and gravelled. The condition the road is in now would be dangerous for a man to drive even a buggy, if his horse had not been fed oats pretty freely.

PRIVATE BANK FAILURE.

Result of the Reckless Extravagance of a Young Banker—The Amount of Defalcation Estimated at $30,000.

London, April 6.—About six years since a young man named Bailey Harrison came here from Parkhill and entered the service of the Federal Bank. He was the son of John Harrison a wealthy mill owner of that village, while there he formed the acquaintance of Miss Tillson, daughter of E. D. Tilson, a wealthy citizen of Tilsonburg, and subsequently married her. After the marrige they resided here and were highly thought of. Bailey enjoyed the confidence of the bank authorities and concluded to in Tilsonburg, taking for a partner Dr. McTaggart, a banker at Parkhill, who has since removed to this city. Dr. McTaggart placed the same confidence in Bailey as did the people of the Federal Bank. This together with the fact of the young man's father being wealthy and of his alliance with a wealthy family at Tilsonburg, placed his credit at a range that but few young men in Western Ontario could at that time boast of. A large concern was opened in Tilsonburg under the style of

"HARRISON & M'TAGGART, BANKERS."

In one month alone the transactions are said to have amounted to $130,000. The Federal Bank still continued to be the basis of supply, and it was nothing new for people visiting Tilsonburg to hear the remark that Harrison & Mc Taggart's Bank did far a larger business than did the branch of the chartered bank of that place. It is now about four years since the office was started in Tilsonburg, and accordingly to the books it was very shortly after that young Bailey commenced that no one who had heretofore known him or his family could ever believe the young man guilty of. It appears the fast life and expensive habits commenced in London followed him to Tilsonburg, and in order to keep pace with the times funds must be forthcoming. By a careful manipulation of the books false entries were made and other entries were suppressed, and large sums thereby appropriated from time to time. The defalcations in the Tilsonburg office by this time assumed startling proportions. He knew that the explosion would come sooner or later, and absconded. At first he gave out he had gone south to the Tennessee field sports,

A COURSE OF SYSTEMATIC FRAUD,

IN ORDER TO TEST HIS DOG

against the best setter in the United States, but the unusual length of his absence caused inquiry to be made. Suspicions were aroused and his father was sent for. He could not believe any of the reports concerning his son, consequently declared he was prepared to assume all liabilities and gave his bond to that effect. Mr. Harrison sr., then took up his abode in Tilsonburg, and assisted in carrying on the business crippled by his son, but the longer the old man stayed the more the became apparent, till at last the father said he would pay no more. Thirty thousand dollars is the lowest figure that can be arrived at as yet as the amount of Bailey's defalcations. A suit has been entered against Mr. Harrison by the Federal Bank for that amount. Dr. McTaggart has escaped much loss seeing that he as well as the bank, are recouped by the guarantee and bonds furnished by Mr. Harrison. Young Bailey is said at present to be in Chicago engaged in the commission business. It is also said at the time of his leaving Tilsonburg he must have taken from $10,000 to $15,000 with him.

FUNERAL OF THE DUKE OF ALBANY.

The Services held in St. George's Chapel —Only the Royal Family Present.

The Duchess of Albany visited the Memorial Chapel, where the body of her husband was resting, and remained a short time alone with the dead.

The funeral services took place at 11:30 o'clock on Saturday in St. George's Chapel. The Queen, the Prince of Wales, and the Princesses Christian, Louise, and Beatrice went from the castle through the deanery to the chapel. The Prince of Wales, the Crown Prince Frederick William of Prussia, and the other royal personages assembled in the Memorial Chapel and marched in procession to St. George's Chapel. The Prince of Wales followed the coffin as chief mourner.

The Dean began the services as the coffin entered the door. The choir sang "O God, Our Help in Ages Past," and Spohr's anthem, "Blessed are the Departed." The coffin was then lowered into the vault. As the Queen retired the choir sang "Lead, Kindly Light." Chopin's "Funeral March" was played as the other royal personages withdrew.

The Queen sat during the service weeping bitterly. All the young Princes were sobbing. The Prince of Wales was very pale. After the service the Seaforth Highlanders (the Duke's regiment) played "He will return to Lochaber no more."

CUT OFF HIS WIFE'S HEAD.

A Physician of Altoona, Pa., Misuses His Surgical Instruments.

ALTOONA, PA., April 7.—Mrs. Dr. L M. Beach, wife of a prominent physician, was discovered in her residence this morning with her head almost cut from the body. The doctor has been arrested. It is said he has admitted that he committed the deed. Two large knives and a cleaver, used for amputating purposes, were found beside the victim.

A coroner's jury found that Beach murdered his wife. He admits that he killed her, and wants to be hung or shot. Since his arrest he has tried to borrow a knife and pin, and it is believed he intends to commit suicide. He was received into the church yesterday, and partook of the communion. It is generally believed he is insane. The couple did not live happily. The woman had been married twice before, her last husband having been shot and killed by a desperado two years ago. Her hands were much hacked by clutching the knife used by the murderer. The head was held to the body by only half an inch of flesh. The doctor's socks and underclothing were covered with blood.

The Cuban Filibusters.

HAVANA, April 7.—The general feeling of distrust is assuming gigantic proportions. Chief Duranis is reorganizing a band of so-called bandits, and other chiefs are recruiting actively all over the country. The election of the members of the Cortes will be another element of moral disturbance. The Conservative party is split, because the majority, who are Spaniards, begin to see that if the present mismanagement continues the Island will be speedily ruined. The commercial situation is daily becoming more desperate. Stocks and shares of all kinds have fallen to an alarming degree.

The British Franchise Bill.

LONDON, April 8.—In the Commons to-day, Mr. Gladstone made a powerful speech in support of the Franchise bill. He said it was a good thing for the state that the largest number of capable citizens should possess the franchise. He defended the extension of the franchise in Ireland as an act of right and justice.

Oxford and Cambridge Boat Race.

LONDON, April 7.—Cambridge won the boat race easily this morning. The weather was rainy. Mist overhung the river, and the water was choppy. There were few spectators on the shore or afloat. Cambridge started the favorites.

IT has been learned by cable that the Privy Council in England has given judgement in the case of McLaren vs. Caldwell—a case which tests the legality of the River and Streams Bill, passed by the Ontario Legislature, and disallowed by Sir John Macdonald—in favor of the appellant, Caldwell, with full costs. This settles the right of the Province. McLaren, who owns timber lands around a certain stream, prohibited Caldwell who owned lands farther up the stream, to float timber past his property, on the ground that the stream was his property. The Ontario Government passed a bill declaring that all streams in the Province were public highways, and granting Caldwell power to float timber down stream. This bill the Dominion Government disallowed.

General Luard has been appointed to the command of a brigade at Aldershot, at a salary of over £1,500 a year. He will also be created a Lieutenant-General in the course of the present year.

It is estimated on authority that after the whole of the double liability has been collected from the shareholders of the Exchange Bank, the creditors may receive some 60 cents in the dollar of their deposits.

Great indignation was expressed by Prince Edward people on Saturday because the ferry steamer to Belleville was not run, although her route was clear of ice. Seventy teams had assembled at the landing on the Prince Edward side, and many people crossed to market in skiffs.

A despatch from New York says: For several days a circular calling upon the working classes to attend a meeting in the Cooper Institute, to take action in connection with the Cincinnati riots, has been circulated. It is said threats have been made to foment a disturbance and apply the torch. The entire reserve force of police has been ordered on duty.

Father Lennan, of Brantford, who was one of the deputation who met the Bishop of Hamilton at New York, has returned home to the city. He speaks in the most laudatory terms of Dr. Carberry, and is firmly impressed with his grand character. He is confident that the see under his able charge will go rapidly ahead.

Dr. Geikie, dean of Trinity Medical School, Toronto, has received official notification from the registrars of the College of Physicians, Edinburgh, and the King's and Queen's College of Physicians in Ireland, stating that these bodies had decided to recognize the fellowship diploma from Trinity School of Medicine in the same manner as they recognize other degrees and diplomas granted in Canada.

Mr. A. W. Clement, Government Inspector of cattle, has lately returned from Laprairie county, and reports that four-fifths of the sheep in that county are infected with some disease, and a strict quarantine in the infected district to prevent the spread of the malady is being enforced. Some of the sheep, it is said, are without any wool whatever, and the meat is not recommended for food.

The eighteen year old daughter of a farmer named Ross, of the 6th concession of Bruce township, attempted to fill a lamp with oil without extinguishing the light, with terrible results. The oil in the can became ignited, and both can and lamp exploded, the shock of the explosion shaking the building, extinguishing every light, and leaving the inmates in total darkness. The other members of the family were unaware of what had happened, as the oil was kept in an upper room, and as a consequence the unfortunate girl was terribly burned before she was rendered any assistance. She only lived a short time after the accident.

Further details of the awful catastrophe to the steamship Daniel Steinman, which was wrecked on the 5th inst. off the Nova Scotian coast, gives the number of souls on board as one hundred and twenty-nine, of whom only nine, the captain, five of the crew, and three passengers, escaped in watery grave. The ill-fated vessel struck twice, sinking immediately after the second shock, those on board who had not previously been swept away by the furious waves that broke over her decks being engulfed in the sinking vessel. Eleven bodies had been recovered from the sea at last accounts, and were placed in a temporary dead house on the island.

At the Easter show of fat cattle at Point St. Charles on Monday, as high as 7½c per pound, live weight, was paid for beef, the highest price known here for many months. George Webber, of Peterboro, showed an extra pair of three year old red steers, to one of which was awarded first prize. The second prize was awarded to a large roan-colored steer belonging to H. Kelly, and for which he paid 9c per pound, live weight, at the late fair in Guelph. H. Kelly got first prize for a fat heifer, and second prize goes to T. White, of Pickering, who also received first prize for a fat bull over 2,400 pounds. The second prize bull weighing over 2,200 pounds, belonged to Crawford & Co., of Toronto; 7c per pound was bid for him, but his owner asked 8c.

Sir Alexander Campbell has introduced in the Senate a bill to confirm the arrangement entered into by the Ontario and the Manitoba Governments respecting the boundary dispute. The bill provides that the Dominion Government may agree to refer the boundary dispute between Canada and Ontario to the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The decision of the Judicial Committee to be final and conclusive, so far as the Parliament of Canada has authority so to declare or enact. Until the boundaries have been decided under the said reference, the courts, judges, magistrates, sheriffs, and other officers of Ontario, and the courts, judges, magistrates, sheriffs, and other officers of the other Province or territory in which the locality in which any question as to the boundaries arises is claimed to be by the Government of Canada, shall, in respect to all matters within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, have the same jurisdiction and authority in such locality as if such locality were within the Province or territory in which such courts, judges, magistrates, sheriffs or other officers have undoubted jurisdiction, and were part of the county, district, or halfwick over or in which they are entitled to exercise jurisdiction and authority.

The following extract from a letter from Calgary will not be uninteresting to our readers: "There is any quantity of good farming land in the near neighborhood, on which water can be easily obtained by digging wells from ten to thirteen feet deep. The soil is not so heavy as that in Manitoba, but all having any knowledge of farming have raised good crops and consider it first-class. With regard to summer frosts I cannot do better than quote Mr. Glenn's letter, published in the Canadian Gazette which says: 'During my nine years' experience summer frosts have never damaged my crops.' Agricultural implements and general goods can be obtained here at a very little advance on Winnipeg prices. The town of Calgary is growing very rapidly. Over three hundred buildings have been erected in the last six weeks, and building is still very brisk. General stores are giving way to separate lines of goods, as owing to the large demand it is impossible for any, except those with very large capital, to keep a general stock satisfactory. Of the climate, it is impossible to make [illegible] from the East credit our reports [illegible] themselves. For the [illegible] spring peop[illegible] without seeing [illegible] past month we have had wa[illegible] weather, the snow having all gone some time past. We can walk around in shirt sleeves from 7 a. m. to 7 p. m.; the evenings, however, even in midsummer, are cool and pleasant."

THE CONSPIRACY.

Bunting, Wilkinson, Meek and Kirkland, Committed for Trial—Exciting scenes in the Court Room.

Toronto, April 8.—There was a tremendous crowd at the Police Court this morning when Meek, Bunting, Kirkland and Wilkinson appeared before Police Magistrate Denison to hear the judgment read.

Mr. Denison went into the case at great length, reviewing the conduct of the members and prisoners in all its minuteness.

THE MEMBERS

He contended that in Messrs. Dowling, Cascaden, McKim and Balfour's case there was not the slightest evidence of concerted action, while to overthrow the Mowat Government by bribery. He specially mentioned Wilkinson and Kirkland as being the leading spirits in the gang.

Kirkland, on hearing his name mentioned fainted in the court.

ALL COMMITTED.

The Magistrate concluded by committing the whole to trial.

Latest Notes by Cable.

THE STREAMS CASE.

LONDON, April 7.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to-day gave judgment in the appeal case of Caldwell v. McLaren, which involved the right of the appellant to run timber down the Mississippi river past certain improvements made by the Messrs. McLaren. The judgment of their Lordships is long and very elaborate. They review the question from beginning to end, and their judgment is in favor of Mr. Caldwell's appeal, reverses the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, and sustains the judgment of the Court of Appeal of Ontario, adopting practically the same grounds as the latter.

SERIOUS CONDITION OF AFFAIRS IN EGYPT.

A Cairo despatch says Nubar Pasha has resisted the presidency of the Council of Ministers on account of discord with the English officials and the absence of a distinct declaration on the part of the English Government of its future policy in regard to Egypt. The officials and the heads of every department in Egypt threaten to resign. The discontent with European residents in Cairo and Alexandria is intense. The uncertainty of the English policy in regard to Egyptian financial affairs and the Soudan question is paralyzing commerce. The official bureaus are in a state of anarchy, the English and Egyptian officers quarreling, the English referring every dispute to London for settlement. It is doubtful whether a successor to Nubar Pasha can be found. It is believed that his retirement will hasten an English protectorate.

THE DUCHESS OF ALBANY.

From a pecuniary point of view the Duchess is left in a comfortable position. She has the dowry voted by Parliament, which amounts to £6,000 a year. The Duke was careful in the management of his financial affairs, so that he was enabled to settle upon the Duchess by his will a further yearly sum of £2,000 and to leave her also a sufficient sum for keeping up Claremont.

The Queen maintains good health in spite of the shock caused by the death of the Duke of Albany. Her medical advisers insist on the necessity of outdoor exercise. In consequence of this she drives daily about the private grounds at Windsor.

ANOTHER LONDON DYNAMITE SCARE.

The authorities received information that dynamiters intended to commit an outrage during the absence of the Thames police boat at the University race. Extra guards were consequently placed about the law courts and other public buildings of importance.

BISMARCK'S RETIREMENT ONLY PARTIAL.

The North German Gazette says:—By his physician's advice Bismarck renounces the control of affairs in the Prussian Government, but retains the direction of imperial affairs, and in this capacity occupies a personal and untransferable position of confidence toward foreign powers.

PRESS PERSECUTION IN MADRID.

A VOICE FROM THE SOUTH.

A Note Brought by a Robin from a South Carolina Girl.

Hamilton Times.

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Geo. W. Johnson, while in his garden on Augusta street, saw a bird fluttering about, evidently disabled in some way. He at once proceeded to investigate, and discovered it to be a splendid specimen of the robin, the legs of which were entangled in a piece of cord, tied to one of the wings. A small card, doubled up and sewed at the edges, was attached to one end of the string. On opening the card Mr. Johnson read:

Beautiful robin,
Why will you go
To the bleak, cruel north,
That home of snow,
While we in the south
Are ever warm,
And always prepared
To protect you from harm?

Further pencilling on the card stated that the writer, Lilly Ranson, of Meadville, South Carolina, had a bird caged for two weeks prior to the 14th of February, but on that date she was constrained to let him free, his efforts to get away being such as touched her pity. If Lilly sees this paragraph she will be delighted to hear that her pet is being properly cared for in the "cruel north," and that until he is prepared to journey back to his Southern home he will be in every way "protected from harm."

The Scott Act in Nova Scotia.

Halifax, N. S., April 1.—Decision has been given in the Supreme Court in the case of the Queen vs. Lyons—a motion to quash a conviction under the Scott Act to Kentville, King's county. The conviction was quashed in this case, as well as some thirty-four others. The Supreme Court decided that the Scott Act was not and could not be in force in any county in Nova Scotia where licenses were not in existence at the time of the proclamation. The practical effect of this decision is to render illegal all proceedings taken under the Scott Act in every county of the Province where it has been adopted. Meanwhile actions for damages have already been entered for false imprisonment by those who have been punished.

With each entry we charge a fee of $10, payable in advance, to cover the entire expenses for advertising. 2 per cent. on the first $2500; 1½ per cent. on the second $2500; 1 per cent. on any amount over $5000. Commission will be claimed if property is sold at private sale to a purchaser of our finding.

ONTARIO'S HEALTH.—Dr. Bryce, of the Provincial Board of Health, in his report for last week says:—"Diarrhœa is very markedly increasing. Whether this be not due to infiltration of surface water impregnated with organic materials into wells and water supplies hardly admits of question. Care in the removal of such materials from proximity to wells seems to be enforced by such facts."

DEATH OF REV. DONALD MCKENZIE.—On Tuesday evening the Rev. Donald McKenzie, one of the oldest, if not the oldest living Presbyterian ministers in this Province, died, aged 85 years. He survived his partner just three months. Next week we shall give a full history of his long and eventful career. The funeral services will be held in Knox Church on Friday, commencing at one o'clock.

M. E. CHURCH.—Rev. B. F. Austin, B. D. M. A., principal of Alma College, St. Thomas, will preach in the M. E. Church, Charles St., next Sabbath, April 13th, both at 11 a.m. and 7 p.m. We hope all who can will avail themselves of this opportunity to hear one of the most promising young men of this country. We regret to hear that the pastor of the above church, Rev. J. Reynolds is still too ill to attend to his pulpit and pastoral duties.

CLOSE SEASON FOR FISH.—The following schedule of the close season for fish in Ontario during the year 1884, which has just been issued by the department of marine and fisheries may be of interest: Pickerel, 15th April to 15th May; maskinonge, 15th April to 15th May; bass, 15th April to 15th May; salmon trout and large grey trout, 1st November to 10th November; white fish, 1st November to 10th November; speckled trout, 15th September to 1st May.

CHURCH OF THE SACRED HEART.—Palm Sunday in the Roman Catholic church was the occasion of ceremonies out of the usual order, such as the reading of the passion, the distribution of palm, etc. On Good Friday in that church will be celebrated the peculiarly solemn mass of the presanctified, upon the conclusion of which the faithful will advance to the alter railing and kiss the crucifix. Roman Catholics were on Sunday exhorted to keep Good Friday as a holy day as distinguished from a holiday.

I. O. O. F.—The 65th anniversary of Odd fellowship in America, will be observed by the brethren of this town attending divine service at the Baptist church on Sunday evening, 20th inst. Owing to the re-opening of the Erskine Church on the 27th, the brethren have changed their previous arrangement from that date to the 20th which move, we have no doubt, will be duly appreciated. On Friday, 25th inst., the fraternity will give their grand annual concert in the town hall, of which particulars will be fully given in our next issue.

ILLEGAL GRANTS.—The Stratford auditors presented a supplementary report to the Council to the effect that the following accounts, paid in 1883, were illegal, in the opinion of the solicitors:—Grant of $150 to the Mechanics' Institute, as no by-law was passed to that effect; $100 to the manufacturers' committee, being spent on purely speculative objects and not to directly aid manufactures by bonus as provided by statute; $300 to the band, the statnte making no provision for it; $50 by the public school board to Mr. Vanstone for services rendered being expressly forbidden by statute.

GRAND CONCERT.—A Grand Concert will be held on Easter Monday night, April 14, at the Town Hall, Ingersoll, in aid of the Catholic Church. Some of the best talent in the Province and prominent local singers have been secured for the occasion. Miss Lenora Clench, the great violinist, will make her first appearance in Ingersoll. Miss Reidy, Stratford; Dr. Sippi, London; Mr. Drumgole, London; and others will take part. Tickets 50 cents to all parts of the hall. Seats may be reserved without extra cost at Mr. Woodcock's store. Tickets can be secured at Henderson's, Wcolson & Murdoch's, and J. S. Smith's.

THE STREETS.—When the sun comes out and melts this snow, then would be a very good time to have our business streets scraped. The action might be repeated a few weeks later. The operation is not an expensive one and would certainly make our streets cleaner, neater and healthier. While we are on the subject of streets, would it not be a wise move on the part of the authorities to make the necessary arrangements now for watering the streets, instead of waiting until the dust begins to fly about before making a move. Our shop keepers who have had many dollars worth of goods damaged in the past should make a move this season in time.

TOWN COUNCIL,

Eighteen-Cent Meals for Tramps—A New Board of Works—The Salvation Army.

The regular monthly meeting of the above was held on Monday evening.

Members present: Mayor Noxon in the chair, Messrs. Watterworth, Seldon, Gibson, Walley, Richardson, Buchanan, McInnes, O'Connor and Nelles.

Minutes read and signed by the Mayor.

Following accounts and communications were read by the Clerk:—Mr. Murdoch's report of rent for stalls; Treasurer's receipt from R. M. Duell; Ingersoll Gas Light Co.'s account; Account from R. M. Duell for salary and 3 loads of wood, $58.10; R. Frezell, account for 31 meals to tramps at 18 cents per meal, $5.58; J. Boles, account $20, suit of clothes for Watchman Flood; A. McGill, account $39, for wainscotting Town Hall and Council Chamber; request for relief from Joseph Leflar.

Committee on C.V.R. business reported as follows:

To the Mayor and Council of the town of Ingersoll:

Gentlemen,—Your Standing Committee on Railways beg leave to recommend that the Clerk of this Council be instructed to request the C. V. R. to pay over at once to this corporation the amount of accrued interest on the debenture stock held by this town against the said company amounting, up to the 1st inst., to seven thousand five hundred dollars (7,500) and that the Clerk be further instructed to enclose with his communication to said Company, a copy of this report as adopted by the Council, with the corporate seal attached.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JOSEPH GIBSON, Chairman.

Committee on Salvation Army reported: Your Committee appointed to confer with the officer in charge of the Salvation Army in respect to annoyances caused to citizens of the town from the beating of drums, &c., on the streets, (as set forth in a petition of citizens,) beg to report that your Committee met the officer in charge of the Army, and brought the grievances complained of to his notice. When the following conclusions were arrived at:—

1st. The Army will not march on Thames street from the corner of King street north on Saturdays.

2d. The Army will not beat the drums on Saturday afternoons.

3d. The Army will avoid disturbing the congregations of the several churches when at Divine worship.

4th. The Army will not occupy the whole of the sidewalk as formerly.

5th. Your Committee also beg leave to sit again.

F. RICHARDSON, Chairman.

Moved by Mr. Gibson, seconded by Mr. Buchanan, and resolved, That the report from the Railway Committee just read be adopted.

Moved by Mr. Richardson, seconded by Mr. Nelles, and resolved, That the report of the Committee Re Salvation Army be adopted.

On motion of Mr. McInnes, seconded by Mr. Buchanan, and resolved, That the account of the Ingersoll Gas Light Co. amounting to $82.89 be paid.

Moved by Mr. Watterworth, seconded by Mr. Seldon, that Clause 56 of our consolidated by-laws be and is hereby brought to the notice of the Market Clerk re feeding tramps and that he act thereon.

Mr. Watterworth explained Clause 56, in which it was provided that tramps and prisoners in the lock up were to be supplied only with one pound of bread each 24 hours, with one pound of meat every alternate day. This giving 18 cent meals to tramps should be stopped.

Mr. Horsman enters and takes his seat.

Mr. Seldon objected to the duty being placed on the Market Clerk. It was the Constable's duty.

Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Gibson both thought if no by law at present existed to go by that one should be passed. Eighteen cent meals were too luxurious for tramps.

Mr. Watterworth withdrew his motion pending the result of the Clerk's search for the by-law governing the case.

Moved by Mr. Buchanan, seconded by Mr. Gibson, that by-laws governing the town be consolidated and 100 copies printed and also that the rules governing the Council be inserted, and that Printing Committee be instructed to procure and the Finance Committee to consolidate the same.

Mr. Waterhouse enters and takes his seat.

Mr. Watterworth said it was a rule of the Council that any member moving for a Select Committee must be himself a member of that Committee. In placing the consolidation on the Finance Committee the mover of the resolution had not considered the amount of labour he was imposing. He (the speaker) felt his inability to deal with the matter as it should be dealt with. It required a man with a legal mind to do the work properly and such a man should be employed and paid for doing the work.

Mr. Buchanan thought it wasn't a very big job. It might take considerable work, but it was necessary to have the by-laws. Might just as well start at the job now. The work will never grow any less.

Mr. Seldon said he had not the time to spare to govern the work as it should be done. The Council should employ some competent person to do it.

Mr. Gibson thought something should be done. The work of the Council should be fairly divided among the different Committees, but in this case the burden might be lessened by authorizing the Committee to employ some legal gentleman under whose supervision the work should be done.

Mr. Noxon thought the work a simple one. It wasn't necessary to go back further than 1874 when the last consolidation took place. Since which time there probably were not more than half a dozen by-laws conflicting with those passed. The best way was to appoint a Special Committee, and if the Committee found work such as they could not undertake, let the Committee then report to the Council and the Council take such further action as they see fit.

Mr. Buchanan withdrew his motion.

On motion R. M. Deuell's account was ordered to be paid.

Moved by Mr. McInnes, seconded by Mr. Seldon, and resolved, that John Warnock be appointed first engineer of the Steamer Fire Co. at the usual salary of $100 per year.

Moved by Mr. Walley, seconded by Mr. Waterhouse, that the Constable be instructed not to order any more meals for tramps or prisoners at more than ten cents per meal until further orders.

Mr. Gibson claimed that the resolution was out of order and wanted his objection taken. They had a by-law which allowed but one pound of bread per day to occupants of lockup. Mr. Walley's resolution could not over-ride the by-law.

The resolution carried.

Moved by Mr. Buchanan, seconded by Mr. McInnes, and resolved, that the following be a Committee to enter into the consolidation of by-laws governing the town. Messrs. Nelles, Watterworth, Gibson, McInnes and the mover.

Moved by Mr. McInnes, seconded by Mr. O'Connor, that the Board of Works first appointed, not appearing to have confidence in their ability to carry out the work appointed to them and that instead of adding McInnes and Buchanan to the list we rescind the resolution appointing said men and that this Council do now appoint five members to act as a Board of Works as we consider seven too many.

Mr. Seldon asked in what had the present Board shown their inability.

Mr. Buchanan said that the Chairman of the Board of Works (Mr. Seldon) had told him that he didn't intend to continue to act as Chairman of the Board as at present constituted. That was an expression of his inability. He (Mr. B.) didn't want to be put on at the date. Didn't believe in sucking the bones after the meat was off. There was nothing wrong in the resolution.

Mr. Seldon—There is nothing wrong about the resolution.

Mr. Buchanan—Why then all your noise?

Mr. Seldon was willing that they should change off and get a new Chairman.

Mr. Buchanan to Mr. Seldon—Didn't you tell me you wouldn't act as Chairman.

Mr. Seldon replied that he remembered telling no such thing.

Mr. Richardson wanted to know where the mover of the resolution brought in the inability of the Board.

Mr. McInnes said the motion didn't mention the inability of the Board. It read "confidence in their ability."

Mr. Gibson was sorry to see the feeling that had sprung up in the Council. He hoped that the passing of the resolution would better it, he would therefore support it.

Mr. Walley didn't believe they could select a better Board than at present.

Mr. McInnes' motion was amended, reading as follows: "That all resolutions referring to the Board of Works be rescinded and that a new Committee be appointed."

Resolution as amended on being put was carried.

Silence followed, which was broken by Mr. Gibson suggesting that His Worship give out a hymn.

Mr. McInnes—I move we adjourn.

Mr. Gibson—If I move a resolution appointing a new Committee, need I become a member of it?

Mayor Noxon—Board of Works is a special Committee, not a standing Committee. It is a rule of the Council that a member moving for a Special Committee must become a member of that Committee.

Moved by Mr. McInnes, seconded by Mr. Buchanan, that the following members compose the Board of Works for the year 1884: Messrs. Watterworth, Seldon, Matheson, Buchanan and the mover.

Mr. Seldon objected to his name being placed on the Board again. In his opinion the Committee could act as well with seven members as with five.

Mr. Buchanan—Do you think it fair play that the Board of Works should consist of the majority of the Council?

Mr. Seldon could see nothing wrong in it.

Mayor Noxon said there had been a good deal of bad feeling in connection with the constitution of the Board. If Mr. Seldon would consent to act it would do a good deal towards allaying the asperities that had arisen.

Mr. Gibson said it was a time when judgment should prevail over feeling.

The motion was carried.

Mr. Seldon called for the yeas and nays, which stood as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Watterworth, Horsman, Gibson, Waterhouse, Walley, Nelles, Richardson, McInnes, Buchanan, O'Connor and Noxon.—11.

Nays—Mr. Seldon.—1.

Council adjourned.

The Bible and its Value.

PAPER I.

To defend the Bible is to fight for the spiritual, educational, and intellectual life of the world. The Bible! Beautifully true were the words of Byron when he said: "Within this awful volume lies the mysteries of mysteries;

Oh! happiest they of all the human race,
To whom our God hath given grace,
To hear, to read, to watch, to pray,
To lift the latch and force the way;
But better that man was never born
Who reads to doubt, or reads to scorn."

But "obedience is better than sacrifice." Yes, and better than the finest poetic genius. Had the brilliant poet from whose poems these words are taken, turned the course of his soul's affection in the same way his intellectual powers ran, he would never have been compelled to pen the following in the evening of his life;

"My days are in the yellow leaf,
The flower and fruit of life are gone,
The worm, the canker, and the grave,
Are mine alone."

Now what is true of any man in the individual, is also true of mankind in the aggregate, who pursue a like course. In proportion as nations have exalted the Word of God, have they been exalted by the moral influence of its truths. Let us suppose for a moment that the Bible were to be abandoned. What would follow as the result? As a necessary consequence, universal disaster to the long train of blessings now going the length and breadth of our land. Without the Bible of God the ruin of everything noble would become a thing inevitable without the slightest hope of anything better through all the future. Some might aver that at least we could return to Paganism. And what then? That would be a change from light into darkness, and from comparative purity and happiness to unutterable depravity and wretchedness. To abandon the Bible is to abandon the gospel, and there is naught left but utter atheism. Of course there are many forms of unbelief evidently by no means less than stark infidelity in its darkest colour, but these points of relief are traceable only to the influence of God's Word upon the human mind at some period in its history. We cannot bring the smallest ray of light out of darkness. Light is from another source altogether.

This is an age when many—too many—are too fond of a change. They are well pleased with a less valuable article if it is only a change in the programme of life. As a consequence of this we have ceased trying to solve the problem of all things by studying the Word of Him who "knoweth all things," and are sincerely engaged in trying to solve everything by the scientific discoveries of men who know but little of the grand problem of human life and destiny at the most. In its highest attainment science is a poor security for moral excellencies, and not a dependable fountain to supply that peace which alone can cheer the drooping in life, and lift the veil that the most simple may see the glory that lieth beyond this life. Science is a power for good only when brought under the influence of Christianity, and all true science rests satisfied in that position; but any theory, however ingenious, which savors of antagonism to the Bible as the standard of truth, cannot be a help to mankind. The writings of Sir Isaac Newton testified that the Bible was the best factor of true science. A learned gentleman in his day dissented from this position of Sir Isaac; but the great scientist kindly reminded his friend that it was more than probable he did not read the Bible very much. On examination this proved to be true. This more than likely that the same thing is true to-day. Those who say "The Bible is played out," have not, and do not know its contents any more than the study of theirs. The physical, or natural world, could do as well without the sun as monarch of day, as the moral world could do without the Bible as the monarch of books.

If a mantle of darkness could cover the sun, not a plant could grow, not a flower could bloom, and all animate creation would soon die. The whole world would become as one charnel house; and if the Bible were destroyed from our homes, and from our land, and from the earth, the world would be wrapped in moral darkness. Science in its highest and purest form can never take the place of Bible revelation. Its legitimate work is to illustrate the harmony which subsists between nature and revelation; and to show that the manifestations of God in the material universe are to blend with correct views of the facts and doctrines recorded in the volume of inspiration.

The next paper will touch on Science as the helper and handmaid to a knowledge of the scriptures.

OXFORD TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION CONVENTION.

Report of Proceedings.

The convention of the above society met last Thursday in Knox Church of this town.

The meeting was called to order by the President, Rev. W. A. McKay, at about 11 a.m. After devotional exercises, and the minutes of last meeting being read and confirmed, the President read the following telegram from Chatham, which he received on voting day:—"Kent Temperance Association in session sends greetings to Oxford Association. See Jeremiah 1:22, and I. Cor. 16:13."

Rev. C. R. Morrow read letters from Mr. Curry, ex-Speaker of Provincial House of Parliament, from editor of Acton Free Press, from Milton, and others, and a number of cards from various counties, all congratulatory, and expressing gratitude for the victory achieved.

Reference was also made to a letter from Dr. McCrae, of St. Johns, N.B., in which he characterizes the use by the liquor party of a letter written by him some two or three years ago as an act of impertinence. The letter, he says, was never intended for publication.

On motion the following resolution was carried:—"That this convention desires to recognize the value of the press of the county in assisting us in the late Scott Act contest, and especially to thank those papers that have helped us editorially."

On motion the convention adjourned to meet again at 2 p.m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

After singing and prayer the minutes of former session were read and confirmed.

On motion, Mr. Brethour, who was present from Halton Co., and who so ably assisted us in the late contest, was invited to a seat in the convention, and to all the privileges of a member of the Association. His wise counsels aided much in the business of the day.

The President then gave a most excellent address, which he was requested to publish.

A letter was read from Dereham suggesting that each municipality hold a grand temperance pic-nic. After some discussion it was decided to hold one grand pic-nic for the whole county on 1st July next, at the park in Woodstock, and a committee consisting of all the ministers of Woodstock, together with Messrs. Oliver, Rippon, and Morrow was appointed to make all arrangements.

The secretary here read letters from several parties, stating that there were several cases of violation of the election laws during the campaign, bribery, impersonation, and intimidation. On motion these were referred to the solicitor, to take such action as he deems best.

Mention was made by the president of the excellent service so cheerfully rendered by brethren from Halton, and on motion standing vote of thanks was accorded them. Rev. D. L. Brethour, in a few fitting words, replied on behalf of the brethren from Halton.

Especial mention was also made of the splendid service rendered by Mrs. Youmans; also Messrs. Cameron, Brethour, Morrow and Oliver.

Rev. C. R. Morrow then offered remarks showing the perfection of our organization, giving and comparing reports from nearly every polling division and subdivision in the county, and closed by showing that out of 4,075 votes promised us we polled 4,073.

Motions of thanks being in order standing votes were taken for the leading officers —Messrs. W. A. Mackay, C. R. Morrow, and Oliver. President replying; for the ladies of W.C.T.U., for their able and prayerful assistance. Mrs. J. C. Yule being introduced by Rev. S. S. Bates, of Gobles Corners, in a few appropriate words replied on their behalf.

A motion encouraging counties now agitating in favour of passing the Scott Act was unanimously passed.

The report of the auditing committee showed the finances to be in a most satisfactory condition—that not only was there sufficient in the treasury to pay all accounts but there will be a small balance in hand.

On motion it was decided to give $100 to the funds of the "Dominion Alliance," to be provided out of amounts due the treasurer but not yet paid in.

The business being ended a motion to adjourn until 1st July, then to meet in Chalmers Church, Woodstock, was put and carried. Benediction was pronounced by the President, and thus closed another of the most pleasant conventions held in the county.

PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

I have to congratulate the Association upon the proud position in which we stand to-day. Since our last meeting we have won one of the grandest victories for temperance and prohibition ever achieved in the annals of Ontario. Glorious old Oxford, with a population of about 50,000, and perhaps second to no county in our Dominion for intelligence, wealth, and industrial activity, has now in a voice clear, loud and unmistakable, declared against licensed bar-rooms. It was a keenly fought contest. Never was our country so stirred before. This is evident from the fact that the vote was the largest ever polled in the county. Our opponents worked with an eagerness and a determination worthy of a better cause. But we had a noble cause, a splendid organization, and above all, the approving smile of Almighty God. Hook upon our victory as the result of much earnest labour and much wrestling prayer.

We feel specially indebted to those dear friends outside our county who came to our assistance in this struggle. Special mention ought to be made of that talented Christian lady, Mrs. Youmans. Her earnest and able appeals will long be remembered. We should also make special mention of the excellent services rendered us by Rev. J. Smith, Toronto; Revs. D. L. Brethour, M. C. Cameron; J. Neal, of Halton; also Messrs. Young and Harrison of the same county; T. R. Earl, of Tutterville; and T. W. Jackson, of Lynden. These men all laboured with us day and night without fee or reward, save that which our Great Master will give to them. The Lord bless them abundantly.

Of those in the county who laboured so faithfully and so successfully, where all did so well it is hard to particularize, but it seems to me there are two men who deserve special mention. The first of these is

OUR EARNEST INDEFATIGABLE AGENT,

Rev. C.R. Morrow. I have been associated at various times with many jealous workers in the temperance cause, but never have I seen any man throw himself body and soul more earnestly into the work than did Mr. Morrow. As my house was for some time the centre of operations, I know whereof I speak. Night after night Mr. Morrow met the whiskey champions on the platforms and put them to confusion. Every weekday he was engaged writing for the press, answering a host of correspondents, and organizing committees. On the Sabbaths he preached in some of the pulpits of the county, three times each day, on the evil of "Bible Temperance and Prohibition." For all this Mr. Morrow received no salary, his expenses simply being paid. I am sure the Association will not forget this.

Another Oxford gentleman to whom we owe much is

OUR YOUNG BUT FAITHFUL AND CLEVER SOLICITOR,

Mr. C. W. Oliver. It is a matter of great satisfaction to this Association, and no little praise to Mr. Oliver to know to-day that in all the work he has done for us during the past year, though he has been closely watched and scrutinized at every step by a legal firm in Woodstock, employed by the liquor sellers, yet never once have these astute and learned gentlemen succeeded in tripping our solicitor,—never have they caught him napping like the weasel. Mr. Oliver sleeps with both eyes open; and the counsel for the liquor sellers cannot get hold of him. I hope the day is not far distant when Oxford will show her high appreciation of the excellent services rendered to this Association by Mr. Oliver.

And now, gentlemen, let us diligently apply ourselves to the important work which lies before us to-day. First, we should see that our accounts are paid at once. I am glad to know that the funds are on hand sufficient to meet all our present liabilities.

Then we should take means to continue and perfect our arrangements for further work. There is a danger that our victory, glorious as it is, may, through inaction on our part, prove ultimately an ignominious defeat. This must not be. The eyes of thousands throughout our Dominion are upon us. The future of temperance legislation in this land depends very much upon the success of the Scott Act in Oxford. Brethren, shall we not prove ourselves equal to the trust now in the good providence of God committed to us? By the help of God we will. Let us complete our various organizations throughout the County. Let us pursue a prudent conciliatory course by which we may win the sympathy and cooperation of all the intelligent and conscientious people of the community, whatever attitude some of these may have hitherto taken in the Scott Act. Let there be no denunciation of good and honest men, however much mistaken we believe them to have been on this question. Let us show even those engaged in the traffic, that while we hate their business we love their souls. Let us go on enlightening the public mind and conscience in our pulpits, on the platforms, and through the press. Let all our efforts be put forth in a spirit of humble and confident dependence on Almighty God, who alone can make them effective, and I believe that before the first of May, 1885, the time when the Scott Act will come into operation, we will have on our side not merely 4,073 voters or a majority of 775, but nine out of ten of all the people of this county. Then the inforcing of the Act will be comparatively easy work; and the result will be the freedom from the liquor curse, happy homes and glad hearts. May God speed the day.

FARM AND DAIRY.

Factorymen should send in the date of commencing operations for publication in THE CHRONICLE & DAIRYMAN.

Mr. G. H. Cook is the owner of a promising gelding coming three years old which turns the beam at 1340 lbs. Sired by "Lord Haddo" owned by Mr. F. Roberts, W. Oxford.

Why is it that Canada makes the best cheese in the country and the poorest butter? The creamery system, we believe, is almost unknown in the Dominion, but cheese factories flourish like a green bay horse.—American Dairyman.

One of our high flying exchanges advocates feeding cows on peas and oats. We wonder how many acres of this food a cow could eat in a day. It may pay to feed oats when you want to make a record, to sell the cow or her offspring by, but don't you try to make any money out of the milk with it.—American Dairyman.

At the adjourned meeting of the patrons of the Derryville cheese factory, Victoria County, the subjoined statement of the receipts and expenditures was read: Receipts for the year, $2,829.81; expenses, $2,828.61; amount of milk delivered at factory, 319,248 lbs; amount of cheese manufactured, 31,682 lbs.

We notice an inter

FARM AND DAIRY.

A Successful Dairyman.

Good management is the secret of success, and it is this which has made Mr. Pomeroy's small dairy of 20 cows bring him an income of $2,735 last year. The cows are of pure Devon stock, which is a rarity to hear of now, when the Jersey makes so much noise that no other breed has a chance to be heard of. The proceeds of Mr. Pomeroy's farming last year were as follows:

8 cows and other animals	$379 00
3,328 pounds of butter at 25 cents	830 75
Pork sold	64 55
Eggs and poultry	30 00
Wool and lambs	51 70
Total	$2,735 00

There is in addition to this, of course much that has been used in the household, the grand total being a sum of money and an amount of comfort and satisfaction in the aggregate far greater than that realized by many a man in business whose expenses and worry would largely overbalance those of the farmer. Like all other successful dairymen, Mr. Pomeroy (who is a New York State farmer) practises soiling, without which it would be scarcely possible to keep a herd of 53 head, all told, on 150 acres, which he does. The principal soiling crops grown were oats and peas sown together and corn, which was fed with the ears on it as it grew.

The Ensilage Question.

It is evident that the ensilage question is not yet fully settled, and that a further and more careful study of it is needed before we can obtain a true balancing of its merits and demerits. An Ensilage Congress was held in New York city a few weeks ago, when a number of dairymen bore testimony to the value of ensilage as an article of fodder for milch cows. They all claimed that it increased and kept up the flow of milk; but when they came to speak of the quality of the milk they were content with the use of negative terms. "No bad results have been experienced," "customers did not complain of it," "no injurious effect on the cattle was seen," etc., were current phrases of the several speakers. Perhaps the fact that the milk from ensilage fed cows had been rejected by the New York Condensed Milk Company rendered them somewhat cautious; and perhaps also the statement contained in a paper read by Prof. Manly Miles, to the effect that bacteria were bred in ensilage during the process of fermentation, contributed to their reserve. Prof. Miles is of opinion that bacteria produce the acidity which is said to affect the milk, and that if they could be killed there would be no acidity. He suggests that the silo be filled leisurely, and that no weights be put on until the temperature is high enough to prevent its falling below the point necessary to kill the bacteria, say from 115° to 122°. The result he believes would be uniformly sweet ensilage. Prof. Brown, of the Guelph College, has also been conducting a series of experiments with it, but chiefly with a view to ascertain its value as a fodder for milch cows; and while he hesitates to make a positive statement, it is apparent that he entertains grave doubts of its usefulness.

Notes.

Here, according to Mr. Hoard, is one of Mr. Harris' cardinal principles in cheese making: "Dip the whey rennet and develop the acid in the curd sink, and by all means use a curd mill." If you don't do this try it, you may learn something to your advantage.

As soon as the frost is out of the ground all trees planted within a year should be straightened where loosened by frost. Inattention to this point has made all our old orchards lean away from the prevailing winds. The evil is worse as the country grows older, and the winds have a full sweep.

If trees or shrubs are set on habitually dry land, a pail or two of water may be applied with profit when the trees are set and when the hole is about-thirds filled in. If the hole be then filled with loose earth, and a mulch of straw added, the roots will likely be kept moist throughout the season, and the ground will not become packed on the surface as it is apt to do if water is applied at intervals during the season.

Young early chickens should be fed cooked bran and meal, alternated with bread crumbs and finely chopped, hard boiled eggs. If the meal can be scalded in milk so much the better. To insure thrift, the chicks should be fed five or six times a day until five or six weeks old. Wheat should be given as soon as they will eat it, though rice is the best of all grains. In order successfully to raise early-hatched chickens, three things are indispensable—heat, proper food and cleanliness.

A Georgia farmer gives the following remedy or rather preventive in the matter of hog cholera: "I feed my hogs on butter-milk and kitchen slops. Every week I throw dish water over them. I have not lost a hog in ten years by cholera. While my neighbors hogs have died by it, mine have been healthy. I keep a barrel near the cook room back window and pour all the slops into that; my hogs are fed on it once a day. They are free from lice and kept in a healthy condition all the time. The grease and soapsuds keep their bowels in good condition."

The great majority of farmer's cows drop their calves in the Spring so as to have the first flow of milk while the cows are at grass. It is, therefore, timely to urge those who have good milking or butter strains to keep the heifer calves for cows. Butchers will usually pay more for a calf at five or six weeks old than the owner can realize by keeping to sell; but a good cow is worth twice or three times as much to keep as a poor one, and there is, and should be, increasing difficulty in securing the best cows except by breeding them on the farm where they are to be kept.

The Farmers' Gazette of Dublin publishes a statement showing how difficult it is for ordinary judges to tell butter from butterine. Some fine Normandy butter, costing forty-eight cents a pound, and a sample of butterine, bought of a local retailer for twenty-two cents a pound, were submitted to a jury of nineteen farmers, who tasted and examined both samples. Ten out of these nineteen judges declared the butterine to be the butter. The makers of butterine in this country use all the way from sixty to eighty-five parts of neutral lard to fifteen to forty parts of good butter, respectively, in making butterine. These are thoroughly mixed, salted and colored a golden yellow, and the tubs are branded with fancy names as from country creameries. It is said an infalable test is to melt the butterine and then suddenly chill it by surrounding it with cracked ice, when the lard goes to the bottom and the butter to the top, the line of separation being plainly visible.

FLUID LIGHTNING.

Fluid Lightning not only cures Toothache instantly, but also Neuralgia, Headache, Earache, Rheumatism, Lumbago and Sciatica. Pain of any kind cannot remain one minute where it is applied. When you hear of Fluid Lightning you hear of one of the greatest marvels ever known in the way of a medicine, as it never fails to cure, and not in a week or a day, but the instant it is applied to the affected part. Sold at Gayfer & Kneeshaw's.

Curing Cheese.

Every rise and fall in the warmth of the room in which cheese is curing warps and impairs the development of flavour, and causes an extra shrinkage in weight. Moisture is essential to rapid curing and to the formation of flavour. Dry air and much light are objectionable. We have found the best curing in dark, close rooms, and as damp as they could be on account of the mould. It was this that led to our little experiment in curing cheese in boxes, which, by the way, has proved a perfect success. We have just cut one of the cheese so cured, now about six months old, and find the curing perfect—all that could be desired—and it was so considered by an expert who happened to be present when it was cut. Though skimmed at the rate of a pound of butter from fifty pounds of milk, the flavour is perfectly clean and quite full and nutty like that of well-made, whole-milk cheese, and would easily be mistaken for such by the average consumer. It is greatly superior to those cured on the open shelf. The result has proved so favourable, we propose to experiment further another year, and hope others will do so too.—National Live Stock Journal.

That of Roan Boy who won the highest prize as a fat steer, is reported by a veteran judge and carver of beef, as "decidedly the finest he had ever seen cut up; the best colored, juciest, and most tender ever cooked. The fatty parts when broiled were more like rich butter than tallow. The meat did not shrink like ordinary beef, the fatty part not melting out, but the whole piece retaining its form. The marbling was the most perfect I ever saw"

This is what beef always should be, and the quality of all I hope is rapidly being bred to this end by the improved cattle of our country, and their crosses on common stock, which is rapidly going on among us. Choice beef is not only the savory, but it is really the most economical for consumption even at a higher price than that of inferior quality; for there is no gristle in it, and tough pieces such as no one can masticate, and if consumed at all must be made into soup, and even for that it is neither so savory nor economical as the superior quality.

This cutting up a carcass by the butchers to pass judgement upon it, and then submitting the beef to be cooked and consumed by good judges of meat, is the only true way of getting at the real merits of fat cattle at the shows; and I think no prizes ought to be awarded them until this is done. Fat merely has too often won the prizes; but what alone should do this is tender, juicy, well marbled meat; that is, a fine intermixture of narrow streaks of fat and lean. Nobody in a civilized country wants to eat a chunk of tallow on the one side, supplemented by a dry, tough piece on the other.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Cooking Recipes.

FLAVOUR FOR CAKE.—An economical and really delicious way to flavour a cake which is to have icing on the top is to grate part of the peel of an orange or lemon over the cake before putting the icing on.

CHOICE FIG CAKE.—A large cup of butter, two and a half cups of sugar, one of sweet milk, three pints of flour with three teaspoonfuls of baking powder, the whites of sixteen eggs, a pound and a quarter of figs (the choicest), well floured and cut in strips like citron; no flavouring.

GELATINE DESSERT.—A simple and delicate desert is made by dissolving half an ounce of gelatine in a pint of cold milk; when entirely dissolved add a quart of milk and sugar to your taste, and the yolks of four eggs. Boil until like custard; just before removing from the fire add the whites of the eggs, well beaten; flavour and pour into moulds; when cold turn out of the moulds and serve with cream or with fruit.

CRACKED WHEAT PUDDING.—Pudding made of cracked wheat is very agreeable and nourishing. To 1 quart of sweet milk allow nearly half a cupful of cracked wheat; put it in a pudding dish and bake slowly for 2 hours, stirring several times. If you choose to do so you can add raisins and a little cinnamon for flavouring, but most people prefer it well salted, and to eat it with a little cream and sugar. This is nice both warm and cold.

COOKING BEETS.—If you object decidedly to the odour of beets when boiling, and on this account do not have them on the table as often as you would otherwise like, try this way of preparing them. Boil more than the quantity required for one meal, in salted water, and of course with their jackets on. Do not remove the skin from those which you are not to use that day; set them in some cool closet, and when you wish to serve them remove the skin, cut the beets in slices, pour hot water over them after putting in a saucepan, and let them stand on the stove until hot.

A good rule for vegetable soup without stock is two tomatoes (canned ones may be used), one onion, two potatoes, and a heaping teaspoonful of rice or barley, a teaspoonful of salt. Boil for an hour in a quart of water. Split some Boston crackers, dip them in water, put them in a baking tin in a hot oven. When brown put them into the soup.

DREAM CAKE.—Dream cake is a new production, and will be welcomed by all lovers of good cake. It is baked in three layers. Each layer should be about an inch and a half thick when baked. The two lower layers are frosted with confectioners' sugar and the white of an egg; the frosting for the bottom layer is flavoured with lemon, the next layer with vanilla, and the top layer is thickly covered with cocoanut and is flavoured delicately with a few drops of rose water. The cake may be made by following any good and sufficiently rich receipt for white cake.

CURRIED OYSTERS.—Curried oysters, which are often served as an entree with game, is a dish that requires so little time to make that it commands itself on that account. To the liquor from one quart of oysters add half a cup of butter, two tablespoonfuls of flour, and nearly one tablespoonful of curry powder; this should be mixed with the flour. Let this all come to a boil, then add the oysters, which you have sprinkled with salt; let this come to the boiling point, then serve. If you are not accustomed to the use of curry powder, it is best to begin with a teaspoonful only to this quantity of oysters.

TAPIOCA CREAM.—Delicious tapioca cream to be eaten cold is made easily. Let two tablespoonfuls of tapioca soak all night in enough sweet milk to cover it, and a trifle more. In the morning heat one quart of milk to the boiling point, beat the yoke of three eggs with half a cup of sugar and the tapioca; when well mixed stir these into the boiling milk. Let it boil for a minute or two until you are sure it has all reached the boiling point, then remove it from the fire, flavour it with lemon and vanilla. Put it into the dish in which it is to be served. Beat the whites to a stiff froth, or better still, have some one else do it, so that, while the tapioca is still hot, the meringue may be placed on the top. A tablespoonful of powdered sugar should be beaten with the eggs.

COOKING CHEESE.—A scientific writer in a foreign magazine gives two receipts for cooking cheese, which he considers valuable, as he believes from experiments and observations, the cheese which is cooked is more easily digested than that which is raw. The first dish is much like an omelet. Fresh eggs are well beaten and then are mixed with grated cheese; this is moistened with sweet milk; it is then cooked in a little pan like a flower-pot saucer; it is cooked gently. The other method of preparing the dish is to take some slices of buttered bread, soak them in a batter made of milk and eggs, without flour. Put the bread in a pudding dish, covering each layer with a layer of grated cheese. The butter that is left may be poured over the top. This, when gently baked, the writer says, is a nutritious dish. It is, he says, both easily digested and has great sustaining power.

DINNERS.—Is there a woman anywhere who has never been vexed to know what to have for dinner? This may be helped if on some happier day she sits down with pencil and paper and makes a list of the possible dinners that are within her power to prepare; the kinds of meat and the ways to cook them, the kinds of puddings and pies which are on the bill of fare. It is a fact that almost every housewife has a bill of fare, though she might be surprised if you were to tell her so. This list is really a great help; very often a good dinner, and one with sufficient variety, might be put upon the table if one could only think just what to have at the proper moment. A list which I saw for desserts commenced thus:—"Prune pie, lemon pie, cornstarch pudding, plain, with fruit, or with chocolate; bread pudding, baked Indian pudding, banberries, lemon tartlets."

Useful Hints.

SALT FOR CARPETS.—A correspondent writes that salt freely sprinkled over a carpet before sweeping will make it look almost as bright as new. She considers it far ahead of a damp-mop or cloth.

Court plaster made at home is economical, and is said to be highly successful. Dissolve one pint of French isinglass in one pint of warm water; to this add ten cents' worth of pure glycerine, and five cents' worth of tincture of arnica; lay a piece of black or white silk on a board and paint it over with the mixture.

LAVENDER WATER.—Inexpensive but pleasing lavender water is made by mixing the following ingredients together:—Three ounces of the essence of bergamot, six drachms of the tincture of musk, one drachm of the oil of cloves, four drachms of the English oil of lavender, twelve ounces of rose water, and seven and one-half pints of alcohol. Of course a smaller quantity can be made if desired, preserving these proportions.

FRENCH SHOE DRESSING.—Vinegar, 2 pints; soft water, 1 pint; glue, (fine) 4 ounces; logwood chips, 8 ounces; powdered indigo, 2 drachms; bi-chromate potass, 4 drachms; gum tragacanth, 4 drachms; glycerine, 4 ounces. Boil, strain, and bottle.

TO REMOVE FRECKLES.—Freckles can be removed, according to Dr. J. V. Shoemaker, by the careful application of a little ointment of the oleate of copper at bed-time. He makes the ointment by dissolving the oleate of copper in sufficient oleo palmitic acid to make a mass.

If it is necessary that the clothes of the Monday's wash should be left in water all night, do not leave them in suds, but after taking them from the boiler and draining them, put them in a tub and pour over them scalding water and let them lie in this; from this they can be wrung out and after bluing slightly will look much whiter and certainly will have a more pleasing and cleaner odor than if left all night in suds.

Babies not only enjoy but they need some variety in food; many a sickly looking child of less than two years might be benefited greatly if care were bestowed upon his diet. Bread and milk and potato are not sufficient for him; wet toast, buttered, and broth with plenty of salt but no pepper, will be nourishing and appetizing. Add barley to it, or rice. Beaf tea, diluted a little, is also excellent. Wheat bread alone should not be given, but Graham and India or corn bread also.

He Was no Thief.

From the Arkansaw Traveller.

'Gentlemen,' said an Arkansaw Colonel as he stood under the limb of a tree from which depended a rope, 'I must protest my innocence. I did not steal the mule. I am above petty theft. I know that you all have the interest of the community at heart, and I do not blame you: but there are times when we are all liable to be too rash. If I had stolen the mule, my guilt would oppress me until I would beg to be put out of the world in the most summary way.'

'The mule was found in your possession,' said the leader of the mob.

'Very true, my dear sir.'

'Did you jump into your lot?'

'No, sir, I conducted him to the confines of my premises.'

'Did you buy the animal?'

'No, sir.'

'Did you trade for him?'

'I did not.'

'Then who stole him? Let down the rope, boys.'

'Gentlemen, I hope you will give me a chance to explain. The mule in question was the property of one of our distinguished fellow citizens, Major Rugleberry. Some time ago the Major and I exchanged a few words of an uncomplimentary nature. I intimated that the Major's blood would be highly satisfactory to me, and the Major said that my gore would please him mightily. Well, we separated thoroughly agreeing with each other. The next day the Major and I met. I got what is vulgarly called the drop on him, and relieved him of the top of his head. He was riding a mule at the time, and when he fell off I saw that he had no longer any practical use for the animal, so I took charge of him. Now, if I had dismounted in the way he did, I should have interposed no objection to the Major's taking my horse.'

'I hope, sir, that you will excuse us,' replied the leader of the mob. 'We thought that you stole the mule. Your explanation is most satisfactory, and I hope you'll excuse us. Let us all take a drink.'

TEMPERANCE.

Hon. G. W. Ross on Temperance.

The Hon. G. W. Ross delivered the following address in Toronto last week:

They had come to the time when a man could be a temperance man without losing his respectability, and when the liquor traffic required to be restrained. There was a time when a man was almost afraid to say that he was a temperance man for fear that his respectability and other qualities that went to make a good fellow would be questioned. The English House of Commons had passed two or three hundred Acts restraining the sale of liquor, and it had not lost any of its prestige. Some were not willing to say that the liquor traffic be prohibited; that it would not be right. Well, if it was well to close the taverns on Saturday nights, and to close them during an election, it is well to close them altogether. It was the first law that was promulgated. They might see they had prohibition in the Garden of Eden, and it would have been well if that law had never been broken.

THE PROGRESS OF TEMPERANCE.

What were the Legislatures doing in the matter? In 1864 the Parliament gave its sanction to the Dunkin Act. In 1875 they passed the prohibition law for the whole of the North West. In 1878 they passed the Scott Act, which was based upon the soundness of prohibition. In 1882 the McCarthy Act was passed. What Parliament had done the Courts had also done, as was instanced in the late appeal to the Privy Council. So they had not only the legislative authority in Canada but the highest judicial authority in assuming that prohibition was good for the country. A prohibitory liquor law had also been passed by some of the Legislatures in the United States. Appeals had been made to the Supreme Court there, and it was held that it was quite within the power of the different States to pass a prohibitory liquor law. They had in Toronto, say 90,000 people, and and of these 300 are licensed to sell liquor. If they prohibit 89,700, why not extend the prohibition to the 300 who were allowed to sell liquor?

PROHIBITION ADVOCATED.

The Parliaments attempted prohibition as to the time, place, and person in the sale of liquor. First it was not allowed to sell liquor on election days. If it was well to close the doors of taverns so that men might go to the polls with clear heads, it would be well to keep them closed for the rest of the week, so that people might have clear heads all the week. (Applause.) If it was well to close taverns on Saturdays and Sundays, it was well to keep them closed all the time. It was prohibited to give Indians liquor. Was not a white man as good as an Indian? (Laughter.) If it was well to protect an Indian it was well to protect a white man. A degraded white man was just as bad as a degraded Indian. So they had it set forth in the law of the land that prohibition was good for the people. If they had an extension of the time for not selling liquor, and if the law included more people to whom it should not be sold, they would have prohibition. People told them that the liberties of the people would be interfered with by prohibition. There were other matters that curtailed the liberties of individuals, such as the Health Act. It was a part of the privileges of Parliament to interfere with the liberties of the people. They say to their people, "You must not corrupt our members of Parliament; you must not bribe them." (Laughter.) Every by-law of the city of Toronto encroached on the liberty of the people. It was then right to interfere with the liberty of their subjects, and they did it because it was that their liberties should be controled. The liquor dealer complains of his business being curtailed. Do not they interfere with the liberties of individuals. In the gaol were 1,445 persons confined during the last year whose liberties were interfered with because they got drunk and the police ran them in. The liberty of the wives of some of these men who are working to support their children whose fathers is in gaol through drunkenness is interfered with. These liquor dealers claim they have a right to sell liquor. Where did they get it? They got it from society. So society may take away this privilege. The liquor traffic interferes in every way with public rights, and even admitting that the liquor dealer has some vested right to sell liquor, that vested right to the public against him would not allow him to stand behind his counter and give out liquor to the thirsty thousands. It is contented also that to suppress the liquor traffic will ruin some valuable property and business. In other business the raw material was improved, but do the liquor dealers improve the raw material? The material which the dealers operate upon is men and women. Could this ruining of their people be an industry? Could it be an industry for which they could offer prize at the Exhibitions? Therefore by restraining the liquor traffic they had done as much as they could. They had hedged in the dealers on every side, and now all that remained to be done was by one fell swoop to have prohibition altogether. The Ontario Legislature had this session abolished saloons in towns of less than 6,000 population, and they have reduced the number of saloons in other places to more than half. It now remained for them to

TO THE INTEREST OF THE COUNTRY

ABOLISH THEM ALTOGETHER.

They have withdrawn liquor licenses from grocers, abolished the sale of liquor at agricultural fairs, and in ferry boats while in dock. They had also placed the control of the sale of liquor in ferry boats under the Local Commissioners. In any district here before an hotel can be established the consent of a certain portion of the residents of that locality must be obtained. Mr. Ross referred to the recent progress of the cause in the carrying of the Scott Act in Oxford the other day, concluding by exhorting all to fight for the cause.

Mr. Wm. Thomas, of Newton, Ia., says: "My wife has been seriously affected with a cough for twenty-five years, and this spring more severely than ever before. She had used many remedies without relief, and being urged to try Dr. King's New Discovery, did so, with most gratifying results. A Stockbroker's little Game.

From The Whitehall Review.

Stockbrokers are sometimes men of considerable resource. It is said on the Stock Exchange that one day last month a firm received a letter from a country gentleman, "one of their customers, announcing that he was coming up to town that day, and would call and upon them to take away a parcel of valuable securities which was laying on their hands. In the afternoon the customer arrived. After the usual greetings, said one partner to the other, 'Blank will you lend me your key of this safe, to get out this gentleman's securities? I broke mine yesterday.' I never had a key of that safe,' replied the junior partner. Hadn't you? I thought you had. Well, I Suppose there is nothing for it but to send for a couple of smiths and have it broken open.' But here the good-natured customer interposed. The safe was a great, massive affair, as fluent-looking as the Bank of England. Dont have it broken open,' he said. 'You can send me the securities; I dare say they will travel quite safely.'

The partners thanked the considerate gentleman, and the subject dropped. Before he left the office the senior partner invited his customer to dine with him at his club that evening. The invitation was accepted; and in the course of the meal the guest said: Now you have often promised to run down and see my place, and you've never done it. Will you come on Saturday?' 'Yes' I will answered the stockbrokers; and I can bring those secuities of yours with me. That will be safer than sending them by the rail or by post.' 'All right, that will do nicely.' But before the Saturday arrived the stockbroker with the securities in his portmanteau, had departed, like the Magi, another way.

"Good Morning."

It is astonishing how old this salutation is, and how it differs amongst various races. The Greeks wished a man to be of "good cheer." The Romans trusted their friends might, that day, find themselves in a state of health and safety. But when the matter is looked into the reason explains itself. The Greek was a gay dog, and happiness at any cost was his ideal. Hence be of "good cheer," —make the most of the moment. The Romans, surrounded by the cares of a vast empire, threatened now by one foe and again by another, used a more solemn greeting. "Health" was his first wish, because his idolized Rome was surrounded by fogs. "Safety" was his second wish, for at any moment the fatal end of all things might come. In China "good morning" almost grows comic. It means there "Have you eaten your rice, and is your stomach working well?" Fancy putting these phrases to an Englishman. Yet, after all, the Chinaman shows a good deal of wisdom in his salutation. A good appetite for breakfast, be it a bread-and-butter meal, or be it a repast on rice, means—as a rule—a good day, and following a good day, a good night, and with a good night, pleasant sleep, and renewed strength for the morning again. A man whose stomach, too, is working well, is a man whose temper is equable, and who will therefore, generally speaking, be happy and sunny-minded. Upon these considerations, therefore, it would almost seem that Pigtailed John's "Good morning" is the wisest of those named.

A Port Hope Celebrity.

Detroit Free Press.

The Port Hope (Canada) Guide is publishing the pictures of local "celebrities," the latest of which is the Mayor of Port Hope. This man the Guide assures us, has a strong love for law, and is the happy possessor of all the elements that constitute a good lawyer, but luck has always been against him, and the fact is that he is engaged in the manufacture of cheese boxes and cider. Some people may laugh at this sort of celebrity, which seems to be genius and greatness of an undeveloped state, but it probably doesn't require much to make a celebrity in Port Hope. And after all, what is law compared to cheese and cider? If the Port Hope celebrity would add crackers to his other industries he would leave nothing to be desired. A protective tariff does not seem to have encouraged the manufacture of crackers over in Canada.

Canada Needs no Army.

At the annual meeting of the Dominion Artillery Association at Ottawa Lord Lansdowne in his speech said:—"You are not, and I hope never will be, a military nation in the sense in which some of the great European powers are military nations. Your people have their peaceful pursuits, and are engaged in the development of the resources of the country. Your only coterminous neighbor is a great nation, with which you are upon the most friendly terms, and whose relations with you, as far as I know, are absolutely unclouded. They are united to you by ties of descent, language, and a common love of free institutions. Again, you form part of an empire which you may depend upon it, will never seek a quarrel gratuitously, or for any selfish purpose. For all those reasons the people of Canada are content to entrust what might be called their national insurance to any army of very moderate strength, supported at a very moderate cost and at a very moderate sacrifice of the time and attention of those who form members of the different forces.

Pronunciation of some English Names.

Cholmondeley is pronounced Chumley: Marjoribauks, Marshbanks; Cockburn, Coburn; Cowper, Cooper; Mainwaring, Mannering. In Elgin and Gillot the 'g' is hard; in Gifford and Nigel it is soft; in Johnston the 't' should not be sounded. In Molyneux the 'x' is sounded, and the name is pronounced Molinoox, with a very slight accent on the last syllable. In Vaux the 'x' is sounded, but it is mute in Des Vaux, and likewise in Devereux. In Ker, Berkeley, and Derby the 'e' has the sound of 'a' in 'far.' In Waldegrave the second syllable 'de' should be dropped, and so should the 'th' in Blyth. Dillwyn is pronounced Dillun. In Conyngham, Monson, Monkton, and Ponsonby the 'o' takes the sound of 'u;' and Blount should be pronounced as Blunt, the 'o' being mute. Beauclerk, or Beauclerc, is Boclare, the accent being on the first syllable. Wemyss should be pronounced Weems. In Hertford the 't' is elided, and the 'e' has the sound of 'a' in 'far.' Stratchan should be pronounced Strawn; Colquhoun is Kochoon, the accent being on the last syllable; Beauchamp is Beachum, and Coutts is Kootes. Another formidable name to the uninitiated is Duchesnes, which should be pronounced Dukarn. Bethune should be Beeton; and in Abergavenny the 'av' is not sounded. Menzies is pronounced Mynges, Knollys as Knowles, Sandys as Sands, Gower as Gorr, Milnes as Mills. Finally, Dalziel should be pronounced Dael, Chartres as Charters, Glamis as Glaums, Geoghegan as Gaygan, and Ruthven as Riven.

About forty years ago two small iron screw steamers were built on the Clyde to ply between Dundee and Leith. On their arrival it was thought by many that they were hardly big enough for the service. A half-witted hanger-on about the docks being asked his opinion of the new boats, replied:—"Very bonnie boats, but they wid, be a' the better if they were a wee bittie langer, a wee bittie wider, an' a wee bittie deeper.

Never think any matter so trifling as not to deserve notice.

THE following is from J. W. Ptolemy, of Winnipeg, formerly grain buyer for William Gilleshy, of Hamilton and Grimsby: "I was for many years much afflicted with Costiveness, Biliousness, and ultimately Dyspepsia. I suffered very much and tried many different medicines, which gave me only temporary relief and then I was as low as ever again. I was recommended by a friend, who had been restored to health by it, to try McGregor's Speedy Cure. I did so, and it was not long before I felt like a new man, and I have enjoyed excellent health ever since. I first commenced taking in February 7th, 1870. Sold by Gayfer and Kneeshaw.

Do the duty which lieth nearest.

MR. Parpetus Boileau, Ottawa, says: "I was radically cured of piles, from which I had been suffering for over two months, by the use of Thomas' Eclectric Oil. I used it both internally and externally, taking it in small doses before meals an. on retiring to bed. In one week I was cured, and have had no trouble since. I believe it saved my life."

Miscellaneous Items.

Contentment gives a crown where fortune has denied it.

HAVE you tried Holloway's Corn Cure? It has no equal for removing these troublesome excrescences.

Labor then to the last moment of your existence.

D. Sullivan, Malcolm, Ontario, writes:—"I have been selling Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil for some years, and have no hesitation in saying that it has given better satisfaction than any other medicine I have ever sold. I consider it the only patent medicine that cures more than it is recommended to cure." Unprincipled persons are selling imitations of Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil. Do not be deceived.

Study in your course of life to do the greatest amount of good.

HALL'S Hair Renewer renews, cleanses, brightens, and invigorates the hair, and restores faded or gray hair to its youthful color and lustre. People with gray hair prefer to use the Renewer, rather than proclaim to the world through their bleached locks that they are becoming aged, and passing on to decay.

Let the greatest order regulate the actions of your life.

AYER'S Cathartic Pills are suited to every age. Being sugar-coated, they are easy to take, and though mild and pleasant in action, are thorough and searching in effect. Their efficacy in all disorders of the stomach and bowels is certified to by eminent physicians, prominent clergymen, and many of our best citizens.

Never bid another do what you can do yourself.

Mr. T. C. Wells, Chemist and Druggist, Port Colbourne, Ont., writes: "Northrop & Lyman's Vegetable Discovery and Dyspeptic Cure sells well, and gives the best of satisfaction for all diseases of the blood." It never fails to root out all disease from the system, cures Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, etc., purifies the blood, and will make you look the picture of health and happiness.

Never put off till to-morrow what can be done to-day.

Pale, woebegone invalids suffering from poverty of the blood, bilious sufferers and those whose circulation is depraved, should use without delay Northrop & Lyman's Vegetable Discovery and Dyspeptic Cure, the celebrated blood purifier, which stimulates digestion, increases the nutritive properties of the blood, and expels impurities from the system.

Do unto all men as you would be done by.

PERFECT soundness of body and mind is possible only with pure blood. Leading medical authorities of all civilized countries endorse Ayer's Sarsaparilla as the best blood-purifying medicine in existence. It vastly increases the working and productive powers of both hand and brain.

Time is gold; throw not one minute away but place each one to account.

By lack of open air exercise, and the want of sufficient care in the matter of diet, the whole physical mechanism often becomes impaired during the winter. Ayer's Sarsaparilla is the proper remedy to take in the spring of the year to purify the blood, invigorate the system, excite the liver to action, and restore the healthy tone and vigor.

Remember always that labor is one of the conditions of our existence.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Whenever the weather is variable, and the temperature constantly changing, the weak and delicate must be very careful to neglect no symptom of disordered action or ill health. Weak-cheated and strumous subjects will find in these noble remedies the means of casting out the humours which engender and prolong their sufferings. The Ointment should be well rubbed twice a day over the chest and the Pills taken in alterative doses. It will penetrate and act most wholesomely and energetically on the diseased structures. These remedies manifest a wonderful power in removing all taints from the blood, and consequently in curing a multitude of chronic ailments which seemed to be almost irremediable.

The case of Mr. John Morrison, of St. Ann's, N.S., who was afflicted with a serious dropsical disease of the kidneys. The best medical aid having failed, his life was despaired of. Two bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters cured him. His statement is vouched for by J. D. McLeod, J.P., who knew of his condition. The cure is considered marvellous in his town. 95t.

THE BEST I EVER KNEW OF.

J. G. Starkey, a prominent and influential Citizen of Iowa City, says: "I have had the Dyspepsia, and Liver Complaint for several years, and have used every remedy I could think of, without any relief whatever, until I saw your SHILOH'S VITILIZER advertised in our paper, and was persuaded to try it. For thirty years prior to 1850 the consumption of wine and spirits in Paris was at the rate of about 100 litres per head. Between 1850 and 1860 it rose to 119; between 1860 and 1865 it reached 160; in 1872, 216; in 1881, 272. Those who ought to know say that the increased consumption has worked no improvement in health or morality.

SANITARY INSPECTION.

If you would avoid sickness clear away the filth and rubbish about your premises, establish proper drainage and admit pure air. The skin, kidneys and bowels are the sluiceways of the human body. Regulate these channels of health with Burdock Blood Bitters which act directly to purify the blood and regulate the stomach, liver and kidneys. 95t.

THE FIELD, THE WOOD AND THE GRAVE.

This is the field, the very one
Where we once wandered hand in hand,
And, in the light of summer's sun,
The grass-blades golden-flooded stand,
You twisted corn-flowers in your hair,
The lark sung in the heather,
This is the field as sweetly fair,
Where we once walked together.

This is the wood, the sheltered place,
Where we sat many times, and dreamed,
While through the roof-tree of leaf-lace
The silver moonbeams shimmering gleamed.
Here heath-weed grew, and wild-fern there;
Forget it, I can never.
This is the wood, so wildly fair,
Where we were pledged forever.

Still near the village lies the spot
Where we with tears and sighing,
Read words that tender hands had placed
On graves where their dead were lying,
I wandered there alone to-day,
Where you are calmly sleeping;
The simple words on that new grave
I could not read for weeping.

An Ambitious Woman.

CHAPTER XV.

But Claire's doubts were soon settled. If that visit did not precisely end them, a few succeeding ones forever laid the ghost of her spleen. Mrs. Diggs had been jocundly candid, and that was all. No baleful sarcasms had pulsed beneath her vivacious prophecies. She soon convinced Claire that she was a staunch and loyal confederate.

She often dropped into the Twenty-Eighth Street house, and praised its appointments warmly.

"Your little reception-room is perfect," she told Claire, "with those dark crimson walls and that furniture so covered with big pink roses. I like it immensely, don't you know? I wouldn't have liked it two or three years ago; I would have thought crimson and pink a weird discord; but fashion gives certain things their stamp; it makes us wake up some morning and find our hates turned to loves."

About the dining-room, on the same floor, and the drawing-room, on the floor above, she was genially critical. This or that detail she discovered to be "not just quite right, you will do it now?" and Claire in nearly all such cases changed dissent into agreement after a little serious reflection. Some of the resultant alterations involved decided expense. This Claire regretted while she would let her husband incur it. Hollister always did so readily enough. Wall Street had rather smiled upon him, of late. A few of his ventures had become bolder but flattering successes had persistently followed them.

"The theatre is all lit," he said to her one evening, "but the curtain doesn't rise. How is that, Claire?"

She knew perfectly well what he meant, but chose to feign that she did not know. They had been surveying together a few decorative improvements, recently wrought, in mantel, dado, or even table-cover.

"I don't think I follow your metaphor," said Claire. There was the tiny outbreak of a smile at each corner of her mouth. It struck Hollister, who was standing quite near her, that she looked delightfully prim. He kissed her before he answered, and then, while he did so, let his lips almost graze her ear, saying in an absurd guttural semitone, as of melo-dramatic confidence:

"I mean that it's time for Act First. Time for the lords and ladies to enter, with a grand flourish of trumpets. Of course, when they do come, they'll all kiss the hand of their charming hostess, just like this.

But she would not let him kiss her hand, though he caught it and made the attempt.

"There are no lords and ladies in New York," she said, laughing, and receding from him at the same time. "And if they should come, they would never behave in such an old-fashioned style as that."

But though she treated them lightly, his words fed the fuel of her deep, keen longing. She had made up her mind that Mrs. Diggs had been right. She would never be content to take a low place. Nothing save the highest of all would ever satisfy her.

At the same time she clearly understood that great sums of money were needed to accomplish any such end. She spent several days of brooding trouble. She had not great sums of money—or rather, Hollister had not. And there seemed slight chance of her husband ever securing them.

"The season is dreadfully young yet," said Mrs. Diggs to her the next day, while they sat together. "There is simply nothing going on. There are no teas, no receptions, and, of course, no balls. But we'll go and take our drive in the park. Do hurry and dress."

Claire dressed, but not very quickly. She kept Mrs. Diggs waiting at least fifteen minutes. Mrs. Diggs' carriage was also waiting. It was not an ill-looking carriage. It was burly and somewhat cumbrous. The silver-harnessed horses that drew it had clipped tails and huge auburn bodies. But the wheels of the vehicle were touched here and there with a tasteful dash of scarlet, as if in pretty chromatic tribute to the violent complexion of "dear Manhattan." When they were being rolled side by side together in this easy-cushioned carriage, Mrs. Diggs said to Claire:

"You kept me waiting a little eternity. I hate to wait. I suppose it's because I'm so nervous. I've been to three or four different doctors about my nervousness. They nearly all say its a kind of dyspepsia. But that seems to me so ridiculous. Dyspepsia means indigestion, and I can digest a pair of tongs—no matter at what hour I should eat it. My dear Claire," (she had got to use this familiar address, of late) "I don't see how you can get on without a maid. That is why you're so slow with your bonnet and wraps; be sure it is. Oh, a maid is a wonderful comfort."

"So is a carriage like this," said Claire, smiling.

"Yes, a carriage is indispensable, too. At least I find it so. You will also, my dear, when you come to pay visits among a large circle of friends."

"I'm afraid that both the maid and the carriage will be out of my reach for a very long time yet," said Claire. "Our taking the house, you know, was a great act of extravagance."

"Oh, your husband is doing finely in Wall street. I have heard from Manhattan about his brilliant strokes. Manhattan thinks him intensely clever. His success is creating a good deal of talk, I assure you."

This was true. Hollister would now often laugh and say: "The luck seems to be all on my side, Claire. And I don't take any very fearful risks, either, somehow. The money isn't coming in by hundreds, at present; it is coming in by thousands. I'm getting to be a very important fellow; upon my word, I am. My own dawning prominence amuses me considerably. But it isn't turning my head the least in the world. A lot of the big men down there are taking me up. A month ago they scarcely knew if I existed."

Then he and Claire would talk together of the real speculative reasons for his success; he would find that she had forgotten hardly an item of past information; her judgments and decisions were sometimes so shrewd that they startled him, considering how purely they were based upon theory and hearsay. Once or twice he permitted her counsels to sway him, though not with her secured sanction. The result turned out notably well. He told her what he had done, and why he had done it, after the triumph had been achieved. She was by no means flattered on discovering the faith he had reposed in her. She even went so far as to markedly chide him for having reposed it.

"Remember, Herbert," she said, "that I am of necessity ignorant regarding these matters, in every practical sense. All my opinions are quite without the value of experience. Please never take me for your guide again. Never sell nor buy a single share because I venture the expression of an idea on sales or purchases. I am proud and glad to think myself the cause of your having made a lucky operation; that, of course, I need not tell you. But I should not forgive myself for ever leading you into disaster."

She reflected secretly: "How weak Herbert is! He is no doubt clear and quick of mind, and he is of just the light-hearted, easy temperament that has what he himself calls 'nerve on the street.' But how weak he is in his trust of me! Does not that show him weak in other ways? Would a man of strong nature let his fondness ever so betray his prudence? I must be guarded, hereafter in my talks with him. I really know nothing; I only use his knowledge to build upon. What he is doing is three-quarters mere hazard, and the rest cleverness. I see plainly that he has begun a very precarious career. He may win in it; others have won. He may win enormously; I am just beginning to accept his chances of doing so. But there must be no balking and thwarting on my part. He would ruin himself, most probably, if I proposed it. He is so weak where I am concerned! Yes, in all such ways he is so weak!"

She could not dwell upon the fact of this weakness with any tender feeling. She had grown to accept his love as something so natural and ordinary that she could coldly survey as a flaw any point in its devotion which verged upon indiscreet excess.

Just at this period of her life it sometimes struck her that she was very cold toward her husband. But no pang of conscience accompanied the realization. She had disguised nothing from Herbert. He knew precisely what she wished to do. He even sympathized with her aim, and desired to abet it. She could not help being cold. Besides, he had never offered the faintest objection to her coldness. He evidently wanted her to be just as she was.

And, moreover, she was no different at this hour, when the possibility of a great social victory assumed definite outlines—when she was his wife and the mistress of his household—than she was sure of sharing his fortunes until death should end further companionship—than she had been at the hour when he first asked her to marry him.

She had a great sense of duty toward him. She meant to leave no obligation of wifely fealty unfilled. And this determination, flinchlessly kept, must stand for him in place of passion. She had no passion to give him. She had given all that to her dear dead father. If he were alive now, and dwelling with her, what joy she would have in putting her arms about his neck, her lips to his cheek, and telling him how the hopes whose roots he had sown long ago might soon ripen into splendid fruit!

"You tell me that you have new adherents, new friends," she soon said to her husband. "If any of them are people of prominence—of the sort I would wish to know—why do you not ask them here, to our house?"

"True enough," said Hollister. "That is an idea." And then, with beaming hesitation, he added: "But I thought you would not want them without their wives."

Claire seemed to meditate for a slight time. "I should not want them without their wives," she presently said, "unless I felt sure that their wives were the kind of women whom I would be very willing to have among my acquaintances."

A few days later Hollister announced to Claire that he had arranged a dinner at which four gentlemen besides himself were to be present. He had placed the whole affair in the hands of a noted restaurateur, who assured him that it should be conducted on the most admirable plan.

"It was intended as a little surprise for you," he said. "The men are all of the kind that I am nearly sure you will approve. I mean they are what is called 'in society.' You see, I am getting quite wise with regard to these matters. A few weeks have made a world of difference in me. I am waking up to a sense of who is who. Before, it was all stupid random sort of work. Now I am in a wholly different frame of mind. I am beginning to amuse myself as much by the study of men as by the study of stocks. I have several distinct adherents, several distinct supporters, and one or two would-be patrons. I don't think I was ever unpopular on the Street; I was simply unimportant. But now that I'm important I have got to be quite popular. I dare say the whole thing is attributable to yourself, Claire. You pricked me into life. I was torpid till I met and knew you."

She was considerably alarmed about the plan of the dinner-party. She was not at all sure if it would be in good style for Hollister to give it with herself as the only lady present. As soon as circumstances permitted, she hastened to consult Mrs. Diggs.

"Oh, it's all right," decided the oracle. "You are always certain of being correct form if you do anything like that in company with your husband. But, my dear Claire, it's too bad you couldn't find three more ladies besides yourself and me. You see, I invite myself provisionally, so to speak. Isn't it dreadful of me? But then I take such an interest in you that I want to be present, don't you know, at the laying of your cornerstone. Manhattan ought to be asked, too, dear fellow; it's etiquette, don't you know? But then you need not mind, this once."

"I wish that I knew three more ladies," said Claire, thoughtfully.

"Yes . . . that would make a dinner of ten. A dinner of ten is so charming. Mr. Hollister wouldn't object, would he?"

Claire quickly shook her head. "Oh," she said, "Herbert never objects."

It was so seriously spoken that Mrs. Diggs broke into one of her most mutinous laughs. "How delicious!" she exclaimed. "What a superb conjugal truth you condense in one demure little epigram! . . . Well, if 'Herbert,' as you say, 'never objects,' there is . . . let me see . . . there is Cornelia Van Horn."

"Would she come if I asked her?" Claire asked.

"You haven't asked her, so of course you don't know. Nobody can ever predicate anything about Cornelia. But considering how great was her amiability at Coney Island, I should say that . . . Well, yes, I should say that Cornelia would come." Here Mrs. Diggs raised one thin finger, and shook it in smiling admonition. "That is," she added, "if you call on her, as she requested."

Claire looked grave. "I will call on her," she at length said. "I have not felt sure whether I would or no. I did not like her way of asking me, or her manner beforehand. . . . But I will call on her, provided there are two other ladies." Here she paused a moment, and then proceeded with decision. "But of course there are no other two ladies. At least, not yet."

Mrs. Diggs' eyes were sparkling most humorously. "I don't know why it is," she exclaimed, "that you always entertain me so when you speak of Cousin Cornelia. There's a latent pugnaciousness in the very way that you mention her name. It seems to be fated that you and she shall become dire foes. She's so big and mighty that I'm always reminded, when you discuss her, of dauntless little David, with his sling and stone, marching against the doughty old giant. . . . As for our one other lady, Claire, how about Mrs. Arcularius?"

"Mrs. Arcularius? Why, we have quarreled."

"Nonsense. You snubbed her mildly. I don't doubt that she will come. Women at her time of life have survived nearly every sentiment except that of appetite. Ten to one that she will scent the odor of a good dinner, and come, as your dear former instructress, and all that, don't you know?"

"Very well," said Claire, with gravity; "I might ask her. But then there would be the fifth lady. I am afraid that she is not to be found."

Mrs. Diggs put one slim hand to one pale temple, and drooped her bright eyes. "I have it!" she presently exclaimed. "There is my other cousin, Jane Van Corlear. We won't ask Jane until we are sure of the others. Then we shall be sure of getting her to fill the vacant place. You remember her at Coney Island, don't you? No? Well, in a certain sense nobody ever remembers poor Jane, and nobody ever forgets her. She has been a widow for years, like Cornelia. But she never asserts herself. She is tallowy, obese, complaisant. She rarely goes anywhere, and yet she leaves a sort of aristocratic trail wherever she has been. She will accept if I tell her to; she always gives in to me, though in her sluggish way I know she thinks me objectionable. Poor Jane is a perfect goose, and yet I dote on her. She is such a dear, consistent, inoffensive, companionable goose, don't you know? Claire, your dinner-party is entirely arranged."

"I am afraid not," said Claire, dubiously.

The next day she and Mrs. Diggs concocted the invitations together. On the day following, the two ladies whom they had asked each sent a courteous, conventional refusal.

Mrs. Van Horn gave no reason for her refusal. Mrs. Arcularius mentioned a previous engagement as the reason of her non-acceptance.

"You see," said Claire, to her fallacious counselor, "our ladies are not obtainable after all."

She was secretly chagrined; but Mrs. Diggs showed herself openly so. "It is too bad!" declared the latter. "I've a lurking belief in the authenticity of Mrs. Arcularius's previous engagement. As for Cornelia, I suspect pique at your not having been to visit her. But we shall see what we shall see, regarding Mrs. Van Horn. Of course our little dinner is ruined. You must preside as the only woman. Claire, and I don't like it charmingly. But I shall drop in upon Cornelia to-morrow, and try to sound the unfathomable."

Mrs. Diggs did so, and on the afternoon of the same day she sought out Claire, filled with her recent exploring skirmish.

"She received me, my dear Claire, with a great deal of high-nosed graciousness. I hadn't been three minutes in her presence before I felt that her cold, serene eyes were reading me through and through. She mentioned you herself; she made it a point to do so. She spoke of you as that pretty young woman whom Beverley used to know. Then she recollected that you had asked her to dinner. 'But of course I could not accept,' she said, with her best sort of ducal look. 'I do not really know your friend. I have met her only once, and then for a few minutes.' She wanted to change the conversation after that; she has vast tact in the way of changing conversations; great leaders like herself always have. But I would not put up with that at all. I am usually a good deal awed by Cornelia. But I made up my mind not to be awed to-day at any hazard. I reminded her that she had sought to know you and asked you to visit her. I showed her that I would not stand her delicate rapier-thrusts. I swung a bludgeon, and I flatter myself that I swung it rather well. I told her that she had given you a perfect right to invite her. I told her that you had treated her with unusual courtesy, and that instead of leaving a slip of meaningless pasteboard with her footman, you had resolved on the more honest and significant civility of asking her to dinner. Moreover, I added, the fact of her brother having been your most intimate friend had rendered, to my thinking, the civility a still more kindly and genuine one."

"You must have made her very angry," said Claire, with a peculiar fleeting smile.

"Angry? She was in a white heat. She could never be in a red one, don't you know, she is so constitutionally placid and chill. She replied that you had actually attempted to offer her patronage, and that your effort had amused her not a little."

"Did she say that?" questioned Claire, with a certain quick eagerness. "Then I was right at first. She had some unpleasant purpose in wanting me to visit her."

"Good gracious!" exclaimed Mrs. Diggs; "you never suggested such a thing before!"

Claire had grown very grave and calm again. "Did I not?" she said. "Well, I had supposed it. It was a sort of fancy."

Mrs. Diggs took one of Claire's hands and held it, at the same time giving her an intent look.

"You're keeping something from me," she said. "Yes, Claire, I know you are. Did Beverley Thurston ever ask you to marry him?"

Claire colored to the roots of her rich-tinted tresses. She tried to draw her hand away, but Mrs. Diggs still retained it.

"He did!" exclaimed her friend. "Your complexion tells me so! Everything is explained now. You refused Beverley. Yes, my dear, you refused him. And she somehow got wind of it. Perhaps Beverley told, or perhaps his complexion, like yours, divulged secrets, don't you know? . . . And yet, on second thought, Beverley's complexion could do nothing so expressive; it is too battered and care-worn; its capability for blushing is entirely null. . . . No, he told her. And she has not forgiven you, and never will. Her monstrous pride would not permit her to do so. I understand everything, now. You remember what I told you about her clannish feeling — how she loves to quietly exalt her family name? . . . Ah, my dear Claire, you have committed, in her eyes, the great unpardonable sin. I was right; I felt it to be in the air that you and she would prove enemies. I begin to think myself a sort of haphazard sibyl; I divined what would happen, and it has happened. You have presumed to refuse her brother, and Cornelia knows it. Prepare to be crushed."

Claire lightly tossed her graceful head, and her lip curled a little as she did so.

"I am not prepared to be crushed," she said. "Mrs. Van Horn has spoiled our prospective dinner-party, as regards ladies, but she has not spoiled me."

"Delightful!" declared Mrs. Diggs, softly clapping her hands. "That's the spirit I like to see. The fight has begun; it's going to be serious. But remember that I am always your devoted auxiliary!"

The dinner took place. There were no ladies present except Claire herself. It was an extremely elegant dinner. Claire rose when coffee was being served and left the gentlemen together. She performed, so to speak, her unaided office of hostess with singular charm and dignity. And during the progress of the dinner she made a friend.

This was Mr. Stuart Goldwin. Everybody on Wall Street knew Stuart Goldwin. He had drifted into that stormy region of success about four years ago. He had so drifted from a remote New England town, and his speculative success had been phenomenal.

He was reputed to be worth at present a good many millions of dollars. He had acquired an enormous influence among his constituents; he was the reigning Wall Street king. He had none of the vulgarity which had marked a few of his immediate predecessors; he had always shown a full appreciation of his royalty, and the duties resultant from it. He had been admitted with singular promptness into the social holy of holies; he was hand in glove with what are termed the best people; he belonged to three or four of the most select clubs; his circle of acquaintances had rapidly become huge.

Women liked him as much as men. He was personally the type of man whom women like. His frame was tall and imposing; he wore a large, tawny moustache, which drooped with silky abundance below a delicately-cut nostril. His eyes were large, and of a soft, glistening hazel. His manners were full of a fascinating frankness. His age was about forty years, but he might have passed for considerably younger. Books had not fed his rapid and distinctive intelligence, for he had no time to read them; and yet he had caught the reverberation, as it were, of the best and newest ideas announced by the best and newest writers.

Claire thought him delightful. He, in turn, thought her even more than this. She was a discovery to him. He had never married, and he was fond of saying in his blithe, epigrammatic way, that half womankind was so enchanting to him, as to have made, in his own case, anything except the most Oriental polygamy quite out of the question. He had wit in no small store, but when he liked a woman greatly it was his most deft of arts to keep this in very judicious reserve, and employ it only as a means of subtly wooing forth the mental sparkle of her to whom he paid court.

Claire found herself vain, in a covert way, of her own conversational gifts, before she had talked with Goldwin more than twenty minutes. She would have liked to talk with him exclusively during the dinner, but her two other guests were persons of importance who ought not to receive her impolitic neglect. She managed matters with tact and skill. Everybody thought her charming when she glided from the dining-room, in decorous retreat before that little anti-feminine bayonet, the after-dinner cigar. She had made a distinct success. She felt it as she sat in the drawing-room, waiting for the gentlemen to ascend and join her.

Goldwin had not deceived her. She read him with lucid insight. She saw him to be imposingly superficial; she perceived him to be a man whose polished filigrees would ring hollow at so much as one sincere tap of the fingernail. He was agreeable to her, but not admirable; he captivated, but he did not dazzle her. She compared him with Beverley Thurston, (never thinking to compare him with her husband), and noted all the more clearly his lack of genuine and manly magnitude. He came and joined her before any of the other gentlemen. His face was a little flushed from the wine he had taken, but with no unbecoming suggestion of excess.

"I couldn't stay away from you," he said, sinking into a happy, half-lounging posture on the sofa at her side. He was faultlessly dressed, in garments that seemed to accept every bend of his fine-moulded figure without a wrinkle of their dark, flexible surface. "Your husband smokes the nicest sort of cigar, but he has another possession that seems to me vastly superior. Then he broke into a mellow laugh, and waved one hand hither and thither with an air of mock explanation. "I allude to this beautiful little drawing-room," he continued.

His mirthful, side-long glance made Claire echo his laugh. "I will tell Herbert how much you like it," she said; "He will be so pleased to know."

"Pray do nothing of the sort!" he said with a good deal of comic seriousness. "I should never forgive you if you did. Husbands are such oddly jealous fellows. There is no telling what innocent little outbursts of esteem may sometimes offend them."

Claire thought the time had come for a decisive parry in the parlance of fencers. "Oh, Herbert is not at all jealous," she said, measuring the words just enough not to make them seem out of accord with her bright smile. "He has never had the least occasion to be, I assure you."

He fixed his eyes with soft intentness on her sweet, blooming face. "Never?" he questioned, quite low of tone.

"Never," she answered, gently laconic.

"But he might take some stupid pretext. . . . who knows?"

"Oh, if he did I would soon show him the stupidity of it. We understand each other perfectly."

They talked on for at least half an hour. The other gentlemen remained below. Goldwin made no more daring complimentary hazards. Their converse turned upon social matters—upon what sort of a season it would be—upon the coming opera—upon the nature of New York entertainments—upon the men and women who were to give them. Claire made it very plain to him that she wanted to enter the gay lists. She at length said:

"Do you know Mrs. Van Horn?"

Goldwin laughed. "Why don't you ask me if I know the City Hall," he said, "or the Stock Exchange? Of course I know her."

"Do you like her?"

"Nobody ever likes her. Who likes statues?"

"People sometimes worship them."

"Oh, she is a good deal worshipped, if you mean that."

Hollister and his two remaining guests now appeared. Claire re-welcomed both the latter gentlemen with beaming suavity. They were both important personages, as it has been recorded. They had both important wives, to whom they repaired a little later, and to whom they loudly sang praises of Claire's loveliness. The remarks of each took substantially the same form, and the following might be given as their connubial and somewhat florid average:

"That fellow Hollister's wife, you know. The man I dined with to-night. Didn't know he had a wife? Well, you'd have known it if you had been there. She's a splendid young creature. Handsome as a picture, and good style, too. By the way, Stuart Goldwin was there; you know how hard it is to get him. I shouldn't wonder if these Hollisters were going to make a dash for society soon. Now, don't repeat it, my dear, but the fact is, this Hollister can be of considerable service to me in a business way. There's no use going into particulars, for women never understand business. But . . . if anything should occur—any card be left, I mean, you may be sure what my wishes are. . . . Oh, of course; look sour and refuse point blank. Bless my soul, when did you ever do anything to help along my interests? You'll spend the money fast enough, but you won't turn a hand to help me make it. All right; do as you please. Hollister is to-day the most rising young man on the Street. There's a regular boom on him. He's got Goldwin for a friend. You must know what that means."

Both ladies did know what it meant. Both ladies had looked sour, but both in due time entertained their afterthoughts.

They were ladies of high fashion, each prominent within an exclusive clique. They were not powerful enough to indorse any new struggler for position; their own right of tenure was not unassailable. They dreaded this Mrs. Hollister, as it were, but they secretly resolved that it would be folly to ignore her. Meanwhile a certain interview, held by Stuart Goldwin with a certain lady of his acquaintance, was of quite different character. Goldwin did not reach the house of Mrs. Ridgeway Loe until some time after ten o'clock. It was an exceedingly pretty house. Its drawing-room, though as small as Claire's, must by comparison have put the latter completely in the shade. It was an exquisite artistic commingling of all that was rare and fine in upholstery and general embellishment.

Mrs. Ridgeway Loe, too, was in a manner rare and fine. She rose from a deep cachemire lounge to receive Goldwin. She was dressed in crimson, with a great cluster of white and crimson roses at her breast. She pretended to be annoyed that he should have presumed to come so late. She had the last French novel in her hand, pressed against her heart, as though she loved its allurements and disliked being thus drawn from them. Goldwin knew perfectly well that she had expected him, that she was very glad he had come.

He often wondered to himself why he did not ask her to be his wife. She was passionately in love with him; she had been a widow almost since girlhood. She had a great deal of money, for which he cared nothing, and a great deal of beauty, for which he could not help but care. She had almost seriously compromised herself by allowing him to show her attentions, where intimacy, in the judgment of the world, should long ago eitheir have ceased entirely or else have assumed matrimonial permanence.

Yet she was a woman who could, to a certain degree, compromise herself with impunity. Her connections were all people of high place. She was distantly related to Mrs. Diggs and nearly related to Mrs. Van Horn, who felt toward her that fondness that may exist between a queen and a lady-in-waiting. Apart from this, she was a social dignitary. Her artificiality was more plainly manifest than that of Goldwin, and it had become a commonplace among her friends to say that she was affected.

But she had made her affectation a kind of fashion; other women had so liked the peculiar flutter of her lids, the drawl of her voice, the erratic movements and extraordinary poses of her body, that they had imitated these with disastrous fidelity. She said clever, daring, insolent, or rimable things all in the same slow, measured way, and generally managed to leave an impression that a fund of unuttered experience and observation lay behind them. She was prodigiously pious for one of her pleasure-loving nature.

Her charity was liberal and incessant. She trailed her

Among our Thamesford items on the 3rd inst. there appeared a paragraph tending to hurt the feelings of a respectable resident of the vicinity, Mr. Wm. Smith. The item in question escaped our notice in the hurry of preparing the paper for the press, and we did not see it until our attention was called to it ten days after. Had we noticed it before going to press it most assuredly would not have appeared. As it is we regret its publication. Despite the utmost care items of this nature from correspondents will creep in. We have frequently cautioned our correspondents against such writing and we hope it may not occur again.—EDITOR CHRONICLE.

BAILEY HARRISON'S VINDICATION.

Testimonial from His Late Fellow-Townsmen.

Under the heading "H. Bailey Harrison," the Tilsonburg Observer gives the following:—As the reader will have inferred from the heading of this article that the Observer is about to speak about a personal matter which has, we may say, become national property through the agency of an Associated Press dispatch, published in all the daily papers on Monday, it will not be necessary to enter into preliminary details. It will be enough to say that the Associated Press dispatch which caused so much excitement in Tilsonburg, and which branded Mr. H. Bailey Harrison, of this town, as a defaulter and falsifier of accounts, is malicious and untruthful. In this dispatch it is stated that Bailey Harrison's defalcations amount to $30,000, and that he took from $10,000 to $15,000 away with him. This is scandalously untrue. The losses of the bank by bad speculations spread over the whole of its life do not amount altogether to more than the smallest sum mentioned, and all can be accounted for legitimately (including Mr. Harrison's overdrawn account); and Mr. Harrison did not take a dollar of the firm's money away with him. As a matter of fact, he sold his dogs to pay his personal indebtedness to the merchants of Tilsonburg, and when he left town he borrowed money to take him away. The fact is that he could have remained in Tilsonburg with perfect safety, as his only crime was one that is common to many men doing a good business—he lived beyond his means. The business having got into difficulties, want of moral courage caused him to leave rather than stay and meet the difficulties as he should have done. A plain proof of the untruthfulness of the story that he stole nearly $15,000, etc., is found in the fact that he spent Wednesday and Thursday of this week in Tilsonburg and appeared publicly on the streets. It is almost needless to say that he was warmly welcomed by all the business men and citizens of every degree in the town. What ever Bailey Harrison's faults may be, and they are many, perhaps—most of them being comprised in that category which is considered most venial and most easily pardoned—he is liked and trusted by the people of Tilsonburg. We trust that he will take the measures he is contemplating to vindicate the integrity of his character, which has been so maliciously and untruthfully attacked. While he was here he procured copies of the several papers that published the libel, and, we understand, proposes to begin proceedings against them. The estimation in which he is held by the business men of Tilsonburg, who know all the circumstances of the case, is shown in the following testimonial sent by them to Mr. Harrison on the 30th ult.:

TO H. B. HARRISON:

DEAR SIR.—We, the undersigned business men of Tilsonburg, having a grateful recollection of benefits received while you conducted the banking house of Harrison & McTaggart in this town, and having learned with regret that you have decided not to return here, take this method of expressing our sorrow for the business misfortune that has caused your departure from our midst, and our sympathy with you in your loss of position and influence consequent upon that misfortune. Though we know you must have committed some errors in business, we know that others, supposed to be abler men than yourself, have committed even greater errors. From our intimate knowledge of your career, we know that your belief in the business possibilities of Tilsonburg, and your desire to foster and advance them, has been the chief cause of your business losses. We also believe that had not your business been almost forcibly closed through the jealousy of a rival institution you might have worked out of your difficulties, and your house would still have continued to aid struggling and enterprising business men. We feel most acutely that the stoppage of Harrison & McTaggart's banking house is one of the greatest misfortunes that has overtaken the business men of Tilsonburg for many years.

For these reasons we take this method of voluntarily expressing our sympathy with you in your misfortune, and we trust that some day in the near future you may be enabled to resume business among us.

Tilsonburg, Ont., March 29, 1884.

The above was signed by 84 names, including all the prominent business and professional men of the place.

THE CINCINNATI RIOTS.

Strong Charge to the Grand Jury—Anxiety for the Result of Their Work.

CINCINNATI, April 15.—The court today gave the grand jury a strong charge in relation to its duties in inquiring into the cause of the riots. The jury is composed of the foremost citizens, and the result of their work is awaited with great interest. There is a marked difference in the conduct of criminal trials. There were three convictions and two pleas of guilty to-day. The juries required but a short time to agree upon their verdicts in the cases submitted to them.

THE NIAGARA FALLS TRAGEDY.

Vedder's Body not yet Recovered—No Solution of the Mystery.

NIAGARA FALLS, April 15.—It was reported to-night that the body of Thomas Vedder, who shot Van Rensselaer Pierson, and then jumped into the Falls had been recovered, but it proved to be false. The search is not being systematically prosecuted, although the reward has been increased to $200. Friends of James Vedder say that he is too dazed with grief to grapple with the situation. The report that two New York detectives had come to investigate the case is utterly without foundation. The family do not appear to want any investigation and another effort will be made on Tuesday at the inquest to keep James Vedder off the stand. One of the jurors said to-day: "We are going to stick to our determination to have all the facts we can get."

Coroner Elsheimer's friends are reproaching him on every hand for allowing Chief of Police Canfield to interfere with him in the discharge of his duty. The matter may be brought to the attention of the Grand Jury. The popular belief grows stronger that Vedder left a note behind him. A significant fact was that there was crape on the door of Vedder's house as well as on Pierson's, and that would not have been done if the family had any doubt about the fact of the suicide.

Vedder made a new will about three moths ago, and, besides charitable bequests, made liberal provision for his relatives. The will covers over $100,000 worth of property. Some people now claim that both Pierson and Vedder committed suicide.

ROSS AND COURTNEY.

Conditions Under Which They Will Row.

This match is exciting unusual interest amongst the knights of the scull, and the articles of agreement provide that Nagle and Pilkington shall place in the hands of some responsible person, to be selected by Ross and Courtney on or before May 24, 1884, at 6 p.m., the sum of $2,500, "which said person or persons is or are hereby authorized to pay over to the winner of a certain boat race between said parties, to be rowed on Oak Point course, New York, on or about the 30th day of May, 1884, in accordance with the decision of the referee of said race, the sum of $2,000, and to the loser $500." It is further agreed and mutually understood, that both Ross and Courtney agree to row a fair, square race for the money, and guarantee to be on the premises at Oak Point on or before May 24, 1884, six days before date named for race, and there remain until after said race has been rowed, Pilkington and Nagle agreeing to furnish them suitable accommodations during that time. It is also agreed and understood that Pilkington and Nagle reserve the right to make any such alterations in the agreements as may be necessary for the convenience or comfort of the public.

The race to be three miles, one and one-half miles and return, to be rowed on the Oak Point course, New York, on Friday, May 30, 1884, between the hours of 1 and 7 o'clock p.m. To start from boats anchored twenty-five yards apart and turning stake-boats moored twenty-five yards apart one and one-half miles from starting-point.

FOREIGN NEWS.

OLD TESTAMENT MANUSCRIPTS.

LONDON, April 14.—Dr. Harkavy, of the imperial library, St. Petersburg, claims to have discovered some very ancient Hebrew manuscripts, which contained portions of the Old Testament, chiefly from the prophets. The manuscripts were bought by their present owners at Odessa from a Greek sailor hailing from Rodos. They consist of 30 rolls of vellum. Following the lamentations of Jeremiah is a poem on the fall of Jerusalem signed "Jacob, the son of Isaac." Dr. Harkavy thinks the manuscript originated in a colony of isolated Jews. He has not yet discovered any important variations from the received text.

THE TROUBLES IN THE SOUDAN.

The meeting of Sheikh Morghani with the followers of Osman Digna at Suakim failed to accomplish the desired object, owing to rumors that the rebels had captured the Egyptian station at the fifth cataract and that Khartoum had fallen.

Advices from Berber make no mention of the fall of Khartoum. The Bisharreen Arabs are plundering in the vicinity of Berber, and the Governor asks that even a small detachment of English troops be sent to the assistance of the town.

DYNAMITE CONSPIRATORS.

LONDON, April 15.—Col. Majendee, in a report on the recent dynamite attempts, says the agent used was lignin dynamite, a substance made in America, the manufacture of which is not licensed in England. A further proof of its American make he asserts is found in the fact that slabs of the material have been discovered, the paper wrappings of which were marked "Atlas Powder Co." He says the clocks used in the machines are also of American make, and the pistols were of a type common in America. He shows lignin dynamite was a component of the infernal machine imported in the Malta from Bavaria in 1881, it was the agent of the explosion in Possil Park, Glasgow, and at the office of the London Times in 1883, that it was a component of the machine found in Liverpool in April, 1883, and of the cartridge found in Primrose Hill Tunnel January last.

FLOGGING DYNAMITERS.

A correspondent writes to the Times suggesting flogging convicted dynamiters.

The men arrested at Birmingham Sunday, while lounging near Egan's house, have no connection with the Fenians.

SEARCHING IN FRANCE.

PARIS, April 15.—Owing to information obtained through the recent arrest of Fenians in England, an English inspector is coming here to search for dynamite conspirators.

THE ROYAL MARRIAGE.

The marriage of the Princess Victoria of Hesse and Prince Louis of Battenberg, is fixed for April the 30th. The Queen will attend, but she has given orders that there shall be an entire absence of festivity. The couple will come to England to reside. They will occupy Sennicote House, near Chichester. The Queen gives the Princess a large private dowry.

ENGLISH SHIPPING.

A London cablegram says the depression in English shipping has become extreme. The ports are crowded with destitute and suffering sailors. In Shields alone there are 4,000 seamen out of employment. A hundred steamers are lying idle on the Tyne. Ten thousand laborers in the Tyne ship-yards are out of work, and as many more in the Sunderland ship-yards. Business is slack in the yards along the Clyde, but so far there has been less suffering than in the other ship-building localities.

THE GERMAN EMPEROR.

LONDON, April 15.—The Emperor William, it is reported on good authority, has entered a state of pronounced dotage. He has become abnormally suspicious of every person surrounding him, and constantly exhibits a childish eagerness to be before the public in imperial state, and to perform royal duties. His mania renders him almost intractable to the attending physicians. They find themselves compelled to resort to all kinds of subterfuges in order to deceive their patient into accepting the discipline absolutely necessary in his present enfeebled condition. It is said that one of the principal medical advisers of the Emperor has been ordered by him into disgrace because the prudent doctor in the excess of his zeal, found himself compelled to resort to a white lie, for the purpose of preventing his Imperial majesty from imprudently enjoying a drive when too weak to bear the exercise. The doctor on the occasion referred to induced the Kaiser to spend the day in-doors by misrepresenting the state of the thermometer and the barometrical indications outside. William did not discover the deception until the next day, when he learned from a non-posted visitor that the weather of the previous day had been simply delightful. This information made the Kaiser furious, and he at once forbade the offending doctor to ever enter the Imperial presence. The fact that such deceptions as the above are found necessary by the court physicians, and that the order of expulsion is secretly ignored, indicate plainly how far advanced is the old Emperor's childishness.

Of course the authorities officially deny that the aged Emperor is seriously ailing, and busy themselves in making many official declarations that he is rapidly recovering. But all these official announcements may be set down as attempts at statecraft to hide the disagreeable truth, which is, that the Emperor is far on the dangerous side of the line of decadence. He is at present suffering greatly from the insomnia that set in during the congestive chill which prostrated him last Tuesday, and which kept his attending physicians desperately engaged at his bedside all that night.

The employees of the Grand Trunk Railway are jubilant over the settlement of their dispute with the company. Thursday last was pay day, and all the hands were paid at the former rate of wages. It is stated that this step was only taken after much deliberation by the management.

The steamship Reliance, carrying the United States and Brazilian mails, has been wrecked off Bahia. The passengers, crew, and mails were saved, but the vessel and cargo, among the latter being one thousand bags of coffee, are a total loss.

Holmes and Brecken, the Halifax dynamiters, were brought up before the Supreme Court on Monday for sentence, which was, however, deferred by the judge pending the argument of a legal objection raised by prisoners' counsel.

The season of seeding in the North-West has begun. Had it not been for the wintry weather of last week a large portion of the seed would already be in the ground. The farmers in southern Minnesota and Dakota are at work, but a much smaller number in the north have begun the season's operations, owing to the unfavorable turn of the weather. To have put in one-third of the crop south of the forty-fifth parallel and five per cent. north of it is by no means an unsatisfactory record for the first third of April. It is estimated that the wheat acreage for Minnesota this year will be 2,800,000 acres, and of Dakota 1,500,000 acres, an increase of 200,000 acres in the former and 300,000 acres in the latter instance. Careful estimates place the amount of wheat in the hands of farmers in Minnesota and Dakota at 12,000,000 bushels.

The decline in price which many articles have suffered in the United States within the past two or three years is quite remarkable. Wheat, which is now selling in the New York market at about one dollar a bushel, sold at $1.55 at the beginning of 1880, and at $1.48 in 1882. Indian corn has declined in the same time from 75c and 70c a bushel to about 58c, and oats from 50c to 35c. Mess pork has dropped from $18.50 to $16.50 a barrel within a year; pig-iron now brings only $20 a ton, instead of $35, as formerly; steel rails, $34, instead of $90; copper, 14c a pound instead of 25c; lead, 4c a pound, instead of 5c; raw sugar can now be had in abundance at 5½c instead of 6c or 7c. And so with other commodities. Cotton and petroleum seem to be about the only things that have not shared the general depression.

BIGAMY.

A Dereham Man a Candidate for the Penitentiary.

John Speers was charged with having in the township of Dereham, on the 17th day of October, 1883, unlawfully married Elizabeth Emily Miners (daughter of Mr Cyrus Miners), having at the same time a wife living in the village of Ridgetown. Speers pleaded guilty and was sent for trial.

In this case an amusing thing was the reply of the prisoner to the question of the magistrate. The P. M. asked him if had any children by his first and legal wife. "Yes, sir answered the prisioner. "How many?" "One." "What is its sex?" asked Mr. McLean. "I don't know, sir; I never saw it," answered the prisoner with remarkable equanimity. They say it is a wise child that knows its own father, but this, evidently will be a wise father if he ever knows his own child after he gets out of penitentiary. According to his own statement he was married in Ridgetown about three years ago by Rev. Mr. Fryer to Miss Adelia Grimsell.

He was married in Dereham on the 17th of October last to Miss Miners by the Rev. Joseph Archer. Rev Mr. Archer's certificate which was put in as evidence, bore the signatures of two witnesses of the ceremony, viz.: John Miners and Lizzie Pickard. The prisioner, though not an unintelligent looking fellow, was too illiterate to be able to sign his own name to the evidence, and had to make his mark. His second wife, the one he deluded last, is a large fine looking woman. The evidence against the bigamist is so conclusive that there is no chance of his escaping a term in the penitentiary. His proper wife lives in Blenheim, Ont., near Ridgetown.—Observer.

TWO YOUTHS WHILE SKATING FIGHT WITH A BEAR.

Two youths employed at the Fur Fort,
Resolved to have half day of sport;
From Jasper House in the far north,
For game they joyous issued forth;
The Factor of the Hudson Bay
Granted them a few hours play,
And it was in cold winter time,
When thick on lake was glassy rime,
But beneath o'er all their route,
They saw below big speckled trout;
With hatchet ice they did clear,
And the beautious trout did spear.

For they were longing for a dish
Of this sweet and savory fish,
And they caught many too with bait,
For in the day it was not late;
But it was cloudy with snow storm,
Yet they saw the massive form,
While the hurricane did blow,
Of a fine noble Buffalo,
So they resolved to have a treat
Of the delicious Buffalo meat,
But he did on his haunches rear,
To their surprise it was a Bear.

The lake being smooth the youths did skate,
Resolved for to seal his fate,
A pistol shot made "grim roar,
And from him trickled drops of gore,
They round him skate and fresh blood drew,
When they at him the hatchet threw;
He chased one and then the other,
For men on skates did him bother;
But the bold Scottish lad McBeth,
Alas he nearly met his death,
When he so boldly did press near,
To probe him with the sharp fish spear.

For with fell swoop the paws of Bruin,
To him they almost did bring ruin,
But he so dexterously did skate,
That he was saved from horrid fate;
But now they skated back to fort,
For aid for to renew the sport;
They knew their game was no trifle,
So they secured a trusty rifle;
Returning he had fled to wood,
But they tracked him with his blood,
For they did not yet despair,
But that they would capture Bear.

They saw the elder bushes sway,
While he did force through them his way,
And heard the brushwood loudly snap,
Where he went through he left a gap;
They skated swiftly o'er the ice,
And was near brushwood in a trice;
Full soon the savage beast is slain,
With rifle bullet in his brain;
And now these hunters do take prade,
In skin as large as Buffalo hide;
For Indian stripped the skin of Bear,
And left the carcass in his lair.

FIRST SEMI-ANNUAL
Great Sales of FARM LANDS
BY PUBLIC AUCTION.

To be held in the different County Towns of Ontario early in autumn, the dates of which will be given shortly, making over Forty Large Sales.

Messrs. MACKINTOSH & PETERS beg to announce that they have arranged to hold a series of Auction Sales as above, and now invite immediate entries for them.

LAND HOLDERS, FARMERS, OWNERS OF MILLS, FOUNDRIES, and OTHER PROPERTY will find this a ready and satisfactory way of selling their property. The several properties will be offered subject to an upset price or unreservedly, at the option of the owner.

The catalogues of entries will be lavishly advertised and distributed throughout this Province and in England, thus ensuring a big attendance at all the sales of buyers from all parts.

No plan so good has ever before been presented for effecting sales.

Briefly put, our plan is to secure entries of lands in all parts of Ontario, and to sell them by public auction to the highest bidder, subject to an upset, or unreservedly, as we may be authorized, the sales to be held at the different County Towns in June next.

With each entry we charge a fee of $10, payable in advance, to cover the entire expenses for advertising. 2 per cent. on the first $2500; 1½ per cent. on the second $2500; 1 per cent. on any amount over $5000. Commission will be claimed if property is sold at private sale to a purchaser of our finding.

☞ No charge whatever if no sale is made. Parties desiring to put their property into these sales should make the entries at once, as catalogues must be out shortly. For terms and fuller information, apply to

The Ingersoll Chronicle.

THURSDAY, APRIL 17, 1884.

TOWN NEWS.

THE banks closed on Easter Monday but other business went on as usual. The day was delightful—a perfect sample of a spring day.

CHANGE.—P. W. Campbell has sold out his stationary and fancy goods business, (nearly opposite THE CHRONICLE Office), to G. B. Fotheringham. See adv.

A HYPOCRITE.—H. N. Warner, a prominent advocate of the Scott Act in this county, was arrested at Woodstock on Saturday for drunkenness and profanity.

BASE BALL.—A meeting will be held in McMurray's hotel on Monday evening next, the 21st inst., for the purpose of organizing a Base Ball Club for the season of '84 All interested are earnestly requested to attend.

M. E. CHURCH.—Rev. T. J. Parr, the popular young elocutionist of Woodstock, will fill the pulpit of the M. E. Church, Charles street, next Sabbath, April 20th, both morning and evening.

SOCIAL.—Notwithstanding the inclement weather last evening the oyster social at the B. C. parsonage was well patronize', and was a great success. A very pleasant time was enjoyed by all.

THE Quarterly Meeting Service will be held in the B.C. Church next Sabbath afternoon. The pastor will preach and administer the Sacrament. In the evening the 5th lecture with diagrams on Bible History will be given.

FAST PASSING AWAY.—The past month has proved fatal to numbers of the oldest residents of this county. Scarcely a week passes but we are called upon to chronicle the deaths of some of pioneers of our county, who are rapidly disappearing.

GREAT LAND SALE.—Attention is directed to the advertisement of the great sale of lands to take place shortly. This is an opportunity which those having farms or other property to dispose of should not fail to take advantage of. James Brady, the agent for Oxford County, will give full particulars.

I. O. O. F.—The anniversary service of the Ingersoll fraternity will be held on Sunday evening next, at the Baptist Chapel, on which occasion Rev. Speller will preach. On Friday, 25th inst., a grand concert will be given in the town hall, which will be one of the best given by the Oddfellows. Look out for posters and further announcement.

THE STREETS.—The streets have been scraped. The work was done quickly and as well as might be expected while there was still ice in some of the gutters. The operation should be repeated a few weeks hence. Let's not wait until we are choked with dust before the necessary arrangements are made for watering the streets.

ACCIDENT.—A singular accident occured a short time ago to Mr. Geo. Tunks at Centreville. In cutting a tree near the telegraph line it struck the wire and rebounded striking Mr. Tunks a severe blow on the back of his head, completely stunning him and from the effect of which he has not yet recovered. We are glad, however, to see him able to be around again.

WIRE FENCING.—The Merchants' Union Flat Steel Barb Fence Co., of London, seems to be doing a rushing business. Among their numerous orders they have just received one from British Columbia for four tons of wire. This is for Yale Co., B. C., alone. This would show that this fencing is becoming popular a long distance from home.

A GOOD HOTEL.—The City Hotel, London, under the management of Messrs. J. & J. McMartin, is becoming more and more noted for its general home surroundings. To the farmer, as well as the business man, it presents all the attractions of a first-class hotel at reasonable rates, with obliging and courteous attendants. The dining room is particularly worthy of favourable mention.

THE Niagara Annual Conference of the M.E. Church is now in session at Strathroy. It commenced yesterday at 7.30 p.m. Rev. J. Reynolds, of this town, was to have preached the opening sermon, but is prevented by illness from attending the Conference at all. In the month of April, 1865, he was admitted on trial into this same Conference, held at the same place (Strathroy) with ten others, only one of which is now in the Conference, namely, Rev. J. S. Williamson, P. E. of the Hamilton District.

EASTER BEEF.—The display of Easter meat made by J. & G. O'Callaghan was worthy of the high praise which it received from all who seen it, so comprised a heifer (sister of Jumbo) weighing 1,750 lbs., bred and fed by Willard Karn, West Oxford. 1 two year-old steer, weighing 1,900 lbs 5 three-year-old steers, weighing from 1,300 to 1,600 lbs., bred and fed by W. Karn, W. Oxford. 3 veal calves, bred and fed by I. Small, Dorchester. 14 hogs. 4 spring lambs, bred and fed by Thomas Saddler, Dorchester. 4 sheep, from Geo. Adams, Stratford. Turkeys, geese, chickens, ducks, hams, bacon, corned beef, pickled tongues, sausages, headcheese, etc.

REPAIRING OF THAMES ST. PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—The Presbyterian congregations of this town having decided to occupy the Thames St. church as their place of worship, and the necessary repairs which have been in progress for some time, being about completed, the church will (d.v.) be re-opened on Sabbath 27th inst., when the Rev. H. M. Parsons, pastor of Knox church, Toronto, will conduct the opening services and will preach both morning and evening. Also, on Monday evening following, (28th inst.,) the Rev. Dr. Cochrane of Zion church, Brantford, will deliver his interesting new lecture, "Across the Rockies, through Salt Lake City and the Golden Gate to British Columbia" in the church under the auspices of the Ladies' Missionary Society of the congregation.

EASTER CHURCH SERVICES.—The festival of Easter, commemorating the resurrection of our Saviour, is the most joyous celebration in the churches which observe the seasons of the ecclesiastical year, and special services are always held appropriate to the occasion. The services in St. James' church were of a particularly interesting and impressive nature. The music was of a high order, and the choir, under the leadership of Mr. W. Robinson, sang beautifully. The chants and responses were exceedingly well rendered. The "Te Deum" by Woodward and the Anthem "They have taken away my Lord," by Stainer, are worthy of special mention. Miss G. O'Grady, the organist, rendered some of the compositions of the old masters and contributed greatly to the beauty of the service. We congratulate Mr. Robinson and his supporters in their successful efforts in producing a class of music becoming the service of the Church of England.

THE R. C. CONCERT.—The concert given in the Town Hall on Easter Monday night in connection with the Church of the Sacred Heart, it is not too much to say, was one of the best affairs of the kind ever given in Ingersoll. The hall was filled to the doors by a large and appreciative audience, many occupying chairs, which had been provided for the occasion. The opening trio "Viva Hibernia," by Misses McDonald, Doty and Keating, was received with hearty applause. Mr. Skinner, of London, who possesses a splendid voice, sang several times during the evening and made a most favourable impression on this his first appearance in public here. Miss Roche sang "A Bird From O'er the Sea" very sweetly, also "My Pretty Zengeraella" receiving an encore. It will not reflect disparagingly on the others to say that Miss Lenora Clench, the child violinist, was the star of the evening. This was her first appearance before an Ingersoll audience, and the impression she made will be a lasting one. Each time she appeared she was rapturously encored, the audience seeming never to tire of the sweet strains of her violin. Her playing is indeed wonderful, more so when her youth is considered. Miss Clench may be certain of a warm reception whenever she again appears here. Miss Reidy is now well known to Ingersoll concert goers, having sang here before. It is sufficient therefore to say that she sustained her reputation on Monday night, receiving many encores. In response to the last of these she sang "Why I Left Old Ireland," which was received with loud applause. Miss Kilroy's singing was heartily applauded and encored. Miss Doty, always a favourite, was well received. Master Chas. Butler sang two comic songs which were encored. He sings well and possesses plenty of confidence. Miss McDonald sang "Terence's Farewell to Kathleen" in an excellent manner and was heartily applauded. The air "d'Isabella," by Miss Reidy, with violin obligato by Miss Clench, took the audience by storm, and they expressed their appreciation in the warmest manner. James Brady, Esq., occupied the chair and performed the duties of that position with his customary grace and to the satisfaction of all. At the close of the concert the Rev. Father Molphy made a few remarks, during the course of which he referred to the evident pleasant relations existing between the Roman Catholics and those of the Protestant faith. Father Molphy is to be congratulated on the great success of this the first public entertainment in connection with the Church of the Sacred Heart since the commencement of his pastorate in Ingersoll.

Mr. Wells having declined to act, the above motion was withdrawn by the mover and seconder, after expressions of extreme regret by various members.

The meeting was closed with the benediction, to meet on the 28th.

Presentation.

On Tuesday evening the President, Sec., Treas., and office employees of the Noxon Bros. Manufacturing Co., Limited, met at their office, and presented Mr. E. C. Armand, who has been in the office for the past 15 months, and who is leaving for Arnprior, where he is going into business for himself in the grocery line, with an address and a handsome inkstand, gold pen, clock and calender. The presentation was made by Mr. John W. Shaver. Below we give the address and Mr. Armand's reply.

ADDRESS.

E. C. ARMAND, Ingersoll, Ont.,

DEAR SIR:—Allow us, hereby, to express our regret at your departure from our midst. Our acquaintance, though not of long duration, has been of the most pleasant nature, and, therefore, we cannot allow you to go away without taking with you some token of our esteem for you. We would ask you to accept this ink-stand and its accompaniments as a present from your employers and fellow clerks, and we trust that it may often remind you of the pleasant associations you formed while with us. It is the sincere wish of us all that the line of business you have chosen may be suitable to your taste, and that prosperity may attend your future engagements.

Signed in behalf of your employers and the office staff.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN W. SHAVER,
Shorthand Writer.

REPLY.

MY DEAR FRIENDS—With feelings of profound gratitude I beg to tender my sincere thanks to you for the kindness imparted to me in presenting me with this handsome gift. Indeed it was entirely unexpected, and I may add undeserved, by one whose stay amongst you has been of such short duration And on that account, kind friends, I shall prize this exquisite souvenir highly, not only for its intrinsic value, but for the many good wishes accompanying it. I feel grateful for the many acts of kindness extended to me on several occasions, but this present must event surpass all, and shall ever remain a green spot in my memory. And now that I am about to depart from Ingersoll to return to Arnprior, the place of my childhood, I shall not forget the many kind aquaintances formed in Ingersoll, especially my employers and office mates. I sincerely hope that every step that each and every one of you may take will be in the direction of prosperity and happiness. I also hope the time is not far distant when I shall have the pleasure of seeing you all once more. But if it should be our lot never to meet on this earth, I trust we will all meet in the realms of eternal bliss

SMALL POX.—The emigrant woman who had smallpox in East Zorra is dead. There is no likelihood of the disease spreading.

THE LATE MRS. HACKETT.—The death of Mrs. Hackett, relict of the late Walter Hackett, which occurred a few days ago at the ripe old age of 81 years, deserves more than a passing notice. Mrs. Hackett was the next eldest sister of John Flaharty, of Dereham, she and her husband having emigrated from Ireland to this country about forty-four years ago, and moved to the 2nd Con. of Dereham, west of the Culloden gravel road, when there was scarcely a tree chopped in that locality. They endured very many hardships incident to those times, and raised a numerous family of five sons, three are in California, one in Pennsylvania and one in Michigan. The three sons in California hold prominent positions as captains of steamers near San Francisco, their names being familiar to all travellers who have visited that far off coast. Edward went there as early as 1861, John in 1866 and Walter, the youngest, followed in 1877. Mrs. Clarke of London, sister of Mrs. Hackett, still survives her, as well as her brother John who is yet a hale and hearty man. Walter Hackett enjoyed the respect of all who knew him, and at the time of Lord Dufferin's visit to Ingersoll, was presented by Mr. Chadwick (then Mayor) to His Lordship as a noted type of the genuine Irish settler of Canada, who by their industry and thrift aided by willing helpmates, had helped to turn our forests into well cleared farms and comfortable homes. Lord Dufferin welcomed Mr. Hackett very heartily and asked him many questions in reference to his place of nativity in Ireland, and also of the struggles and hardships attending the first settlers in this section of Canada. Many will recollect Father Boubat's remarks relative to Mr. Hackett at the time of his funeral in 1880, in which he showed his liberality and kindly bearing, also his devotion to the interests of his church, and all who knew His Reverence will say he paid no compliments where they were not deserved. This last year or two has taken from among us a great number of those who have borne the brunt of the battle of life, and when may we expect to find their like again. The subject of this sketch, Mrs. Hackett was much beloved by all her friends, over giving a good and pious example although death took away so suddenly and left us without a dear and loving mother, they feel happy in the thought that God, whom she so faithfully served here on earth, at last called her to her bright and eternal home. The bereaved friends were much comforted by the Sisters of Charity, of London. The same Sisters who devotedly attended at the dying bed of the husband of the deceased, gave again their comforting influence by their pious and charitable work.

THE LAST SERMON

Preached By The Late Rev. W. W. Ross.

The late Rev. W. W. Ross preached the following sermon in the King Street Methodist Church, on Sunday evening, March 1st, being the last before his death.

The discourse was rather a conversation with parents, than a sermon, and was delivered when its author was in feeble health, but being the last pulpit exercise of one whose abilities were universally admired, it will be read with interest by many of our readers.

He took for his text Psalm 1-27-3. "Lo children are a heritage of the Lord."

I may say to those that were not here this morning, that the morning's sermon was based on the same text. The one thought we tried to work out, was the possibilities wrapped up within the child heritage. What may every child become; what it ought to become. To-night we take another thought, quite distinct, but in the same logical connection: The process by which we are to develop the possibilities of their nature, making them worthy men and worthy women. Now, before we settle down on the discussion of this subject, I will point you to a link binding them together. Turn to the 127th Psalm, and follow me a little while for the exposition. "As arrows are in the hands of a mighty man, so are the children of the youth. Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them; they shall not be ashamed, but they shall speak with the enemies in the gates." Who are meant here, by children of the youth? These children, I take it, refer to the first born; the children of the youth of the parents; then in the course of years, when they have grown up and in their maturer state, are in their parents hands, "As arrows are in the hands of a mighty man," they are at once a gladness and profit to their parents. The first born children can be so trained as to be joy to the household. Now there are some who look upon children as incumbrances. I can remember how I began to cut out advertisements from the papers, of parents advertising their children for service, as they were an incumbrance to them. Children may become incumbrances to their parents if, on the part of the parents, there is lacking love and proper devotion and direction towards them, then of course they become so. Further, there may be in some extreme case, such a nature in the child, that in spite of the affections of its parents, it may become an incumbrance; but as a general rule it should not be so. Advertisements under that plea were becoming very common, till some satirical pen lashed it out of existence. I don't see how any person with a parental feeling, could lay down quietly his child before the public in such a manner. I would go out on the roads and break stones before I would advertise that I wanted a situation for my children, because they were an incumbrance.

Then they may become more; they may become a curse. I cannot conceive of any curse that is on this side of the world of terror, that is worse than this one. Did you never see a child so turned into a curse that the mother was prematurely laid away in the grave; a child that, because of its extravagance and prodigality, becomes such a drain upon the resources of the home as to bring it to beggary. But on the other hand, according to the teaching of the text tonight, the child may in every way be an acquisition to the home circle. Such a one is the man that hath his quiver full of them," "They shall be as arrows in the hands of the mighty man." The arrow was used as a weapon of protection, and also as a means of provision. If provision was needed, he went forth with an arrow in his hand; if defence was needed, he went forth with an arrow in his hand; therefore, children if rightly matured, instead of being like so many child arrows in the heart, may be arrows in the hand. They defend us and provide for us, when we cannot defend or provide for ourselves. Here we see is one glorious child heritage. Further, children of the household may be respected in their relationship to the public. "They shall not be ashamed, but they shall speak with the enemies in the gate."

Bring before your mind, an ancient oriental city. There were two leading gates in it, one for ingress, the other for egress. A great deal of business was transacted in these gates, merchants traded, men bought and sold, justice was administrated, the judges of the city sat in the gates. Thus you see that the gates of an ancient oriental city were, on the whole, the most public part of the city. Now children may be so developed in their natures, that without shame they can take their places in the public, and stand as men erect, to the honour of their parents. This was in David's eye, that my child might stand among the great as well as the small, and not be ashamed. Suppose I have enemies, when they face my child in the gates, he will not cower, but he will stand firm within the gates. "They shall not be ashamed, but they shall speak with the enemies in the gates."

It is a beautiful figure, and to understand it aright, you must put yourself in the place of an orientalist. Now brethren, we are ready for the more immediate discussion of the subject. I see my ideal, the possibilities of my child heritage and the process by which I am going to bring them out, to make them worthy men and worthy women. First: consecration to God.

Now to take this child and make it what it ought to be, is the hardest work on earth except to make myself, what I ought to be. It is a harder thing to make ourselves right, as their natures are more pliable than ours. I am bound by east iron habits, it may be; but the next to myself, the hardest work is take a child, and make it all that it ought to be. Why, in some respects, it is easier to govern the Dominion of Canada, then it is to govern children. Now do you think God will leave us to do this work ourselves? Would he give me this heritage, and tell me to work it out myself, without giving me power to do so? I want my child to go up as a beautiful building, but "except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain who build it." I want my child, surrounded by danger as he is, to dwell safely in the City, but unless the Lord protect the City, it is vain. You cannot build or protect them right without God's help.

Again: I want my children to be fed. He that does not provide for his own household, is worse than an infidel. Says David, "They rise up early, and sit up late, eating the bread of sorrows" that their children might be fed and clothed. I may sow the seed, but unless the Lord give the sunshine and the shower, how am I to get bread? During these long severe winters, and the hard times, you may be beginning to think, how am I going to put clothing on these backs, and to procure the necessary food.

Why do you borrow trouble; does not God promise that every little mouth he has sent, will be fed? He feeds the young ravens when they cry. Again: "And so He giveth his beloved asleep." New rendering:—"So He giveth to his beloved in sleep." I have often heard farmers say, "my strongest reason for being a farmer is this:—Everything is growing when I am asleep. When the pofessional man sleeps, his business stops; while the merchant is sleeping, his profits cease; but to the farmer sleeping and the rain falls in the night, watering the soil and refreshing his crops. That was the very thing that was in the mind of the revisers; the Lord giveth to his beloved, while they are sleeping. "Thy bread and thy water shall be sure," you see that comes out of my covenant with God. I say, Thou hast given me a heritage; I enter into a covenant and say, I give it back again to Thee. Help me to provide for it.

God sends an infant into my home, a little builder but incomplete. The first thing to do, is to take it to God's house, and dedicate the little building to God, and ask God's blessing on every one employed in the building. We wondered, when at the third anniversary of Martin Luther's birth, at hearing how, at his birth, his father took him to a closet and solemnly consecrated him, saying:—"O God take my baby boy. Lord make my baby boy a performer in the church", and the next day he was consecrated. Now of course, that is what we ought to do whenever there comes a precious heritage to our house. Now some weeks ago, I preached a sermon on baptism. I am not a believer in the absolute necessity of the ordinance of sacrament and baptism; a man may get to Heaven without either, but at the same time I am bound to observe them both. Very well. The next question comes: Where should it be done? Of course you know my mind; I believe the place is, in the presence of the people of God, nevertheless, I don't say that God will not accept it in your homes. To me, the more excellent way, is the baptism in the church. Jesus came sixty miles from Galilee to be baptised by John in Jordon in the presence of the multitude there. The Jews went to Jerusalem in order that they might have their children circumcised in the sanctuary. Brethren when my child is given me, I want the sympathy of all God's people, in the bringing up of that child. Some say I don't care for your sympathy; I am going to look after my own household, without your sympathy. That was the reason I came here, to have my child baptised, because I wanted your sympathy. A vessel is about to start for a distant land; around its passengers are gathered affectionate friends to bid them a tender farwell, and wish them a happy journey. Here comes in the crowd, a solitary stranger, and steps on the gangway unnoticed. It is a sad sight. Others have had their friends to give them a cheering word of parting, but there wasn't one hand to clasp his, or one tongue to bid him Godspeed. But is it not sadder, when a child comes unwelcomed by its mother? As I have heard them say, "the little brat" when the little thing comes unwelcomed. Is it any wonder that so many young people "—tempted and tried strangers in strange places—go down in the dark waters of dissipation? Take this town, for example, I can take you to some places, even after all the work which has been done lately by the Army and the Churches for souls, and point you to the poor little heathens. O the power of Christian sympathy.

If you hav'nt had the little children baptised, send for some one, and give the little things the advantage of formal consecration to God.

Another point, is that of protection. We have spoken of consecration. I must protect my heritage from bad habits. It is said that a man is a bundle of habits, and they began when we were babes. To-day a habit is a playful kitten to a child, but after a while it is the savage brute that will hug it to death. Like the little brook sparkling and bubbling in the sunshine, it soon gathers force, as it grows wider and deeper, till at last it is a sweeping river, spreading desolation and death in its course. You let that child go on in its bad habits, through the years, and bye and bye you will see it mastered by its habits. Hence, the first thing to do is to deal with its habits. We must protect them from evil mates. Children must have their fellows. They must mix more or less with bad children in the public school. How am I to protect them from improper mates? I sometimes think my children are in danger of learning bad habits from the children of others and perhaps their children may be in danger of bad habits from my children. I have trembled when I have heard the bad stories which my children have picked up at school. What am I going to do? The only way is to train that child every morning in God's book, and keep the radical truths of purity in his mind. Then I must protect them from bad books. I think I am safe in saying that our children are destroyed more by bad reading then they are saved by good reading. There are 55,000,000 in Canada and the United States, and of these people there are men, women and children who never cross the threshold of a church from one year's end to the other, while the saloons, operas and theatres, are crowded every Sunday night. I say that the press is having a powerful influence in elevating the mind with Christian power. Although, I do not admit that it has more influence than the pulpit. The very sacredness of the pulpit gives it a stronger hold upon the persons within its reach. The press has a broader and more extended power. To-day you may have one million listen to the gospel while the press has ten million of readers. The various forms of bad literature, now so extensively circulated and read, conspicious among which are the Dime Novel, accounts of murderers executed, such as the life of Jessie James, etc., are to-day ruining thousands of our children. We want an Anthony Comstock in every town and city, to purge it from its vile literature. Another dangerous form is that of obscene pictures. The impressions made by these will come to the mind even upon the most solemn occasions, long after the person has learned to abhor them, just as a wound thoroughly healed often shows the scar to the end of life. Mind what kind of reading you put in your children hands. One novel, inflicted by bad reading may be healed, yet the scars will still be there. Then there is the question of amusements. I know that I get on narrow climbing here. We must have amusements. There is not a man in my church, however venerable and spiritual he may be, who can keep up power in a spiritual sense, without relaxation. Save me from the man that never laughs. The poet speaks of him as being fit for treasons, murders, &c. The greatest and noblest men we have ever had, liked to indulge in a laugh, but how much more does a little child. The little lambkin spends most of its time in play, but bye and bye we receive from it the rich golden fleece. Amusements must be harmless in themselves, and in their associations. Look at this beautiful grassy lawn, shaded by sheltering evergreens, and radiant with scented flowers fringing its green sward. A more charming place could not be imagined. But do you see that venomous serpent coiled amid its flowers. See this lovely arbor entwined with roses and sweet honey-suckle, but the hornets have built their nests therein, and although some amusements may appear very innocent and enticing, yet in them lieth the venomous serpent and stinging hornet. Cultivate your children, look after the wants of their minds, as well as their bodies, and thus cultivate their hearts.

I believe just as much in the conversion of a child, and in some respects more, as I do in that of a grown up person. Let us therefore cultivate this child heritage, and see what beautiful lofty characters we can build from it, for "Lo children are a heritage of the Lord."

The Bible and its Value.

PAPER II.

In our last paper we stated that science is a valuable assistant in proving the value of the Scriptures, especially in the matter of their authenticity. Many have doubted the genuineness of the historical record of the Bible, especially when it goes so far back as the early days of Chaldea & Egypt. Now, under the benign patronage, and controlled by the safe hand of Christianity, science comes to the rescue and renders valuable assistance. The Royal Geographical Society of England, has under way at present a scheme to dip up a portion of the foundation of the Red Sea, to find, if possible, among the debris the relics of Pharoah's host. No doubt the Society will be amply rewarded with tangible evidence of the story written by Moses. We think this discovery to be more than probable, by contemplating discoveries which have been made already. The ruins of Herculaneum and Pompeii are ample proof of the statements of profane history concerning those cities, and it is equally true that the discoveries made by Layard on the site of Ancient Nineveh, not many years ago, and of Babylon too, are sufficient proof of the statements of sacred history concerning those cities of the Bible. The excavations of our times with their discoveries, form ample evidence to the thoughtful mind of the genuineness of the sacred book. The different M.S.S. in several important libraries to-day, written with the cuniform character of the Hebrew language, beautifully clasp hands with those hieroglyphical inscriptions found on many tablets among the ruins of Nineveh. The importance of this fact as an evidence in favor of the genuineness of the Bible history cannot be easily overestimated. It might be best, just at this point, to explain this idea to the mind of the common or more general reader. Suppose a case:—You are engaged in digging out earth for a cellar before putting up a building, you find an old sword bearing an inscription giving name and date of a soldier's life, you then enquire into the military documents of the country and you find a manuscript the same name and date recorded. You could then reasonably doubt the genuineness of the statement concerning such a soldier, while the M. S. and the inscription are in perfect keeping, one with the other. Well, so it is with modern discoveries concerning the very cities we read of in the Bible, and the ancient manuscripts yet extant. These are sufficient proof that the palmy days of those cities and the prophets were contemporaneous.

Take another fact. What explanation could be given concerning the present status of the Christian church in the world, outside of the moral power of the truths of the New Testament? None other. There is a reason why for everything, and all things important or unimportant have their individual history. Accept the New Testament history as being true, and all the pure and noble features of Christianity are at once explained. Deny it, and then compare Christian laws with the heathen, and what an inexplicable mystery appears in view. English history tells us that the Normans conquered that island in the 11th century, and that Saxon rule preceded the Norman, &c., &c.

Now, we have proof of these things in the English language, in dialects, and in laws. The same thing is true in American history, in reference to the different nationalities settling in different parts of the country. New England was settled by the Pilgrim Fathers; New York by the Dutch; Philadelphia by the Quakers; Maryland by the Roman Catholics; Virginia by the gentry of England, and Canada by the French. Now there are ample names, religious proclivities, customs, laws, literature, peculiarities and traditions, concerning each and all, proving the truth of received history of those places and people. How easy it is to identify Luther with the Reformation, and Wesley with Methodism, and George Fox with Quakerism, and John Knox with Presbyterianism. Quite easy. In like manner, the rise and progress of the Christian religion could only be identified with such a person as was Jesus Christ, and in harmony with New Testament history. The genius and conquests of Christianity in the world (not by battles with sword dipped in human blood) by the sword of Divine truth, conquering men and hearts by divine love, could have originated only by such a person as the Saviour of mankind. A thousand Solons and Socrates combined with all their powers could not begin to affect the world's mind like the teachings of the great Teacher. Only Christ Jesus, whose lessons of unapproachable beauty and finish are given in the gospels, and whose matchless love and mighty miracles are recorded in the New Testament, can account for the history of the Christian Era and for the present happy state of the Christian world.

OXFORD TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

Proceedings of the Meeting at Ingersoll.

The regular half-yearly meeting of the above was held in the High School building of this town, Wednesday and Thursday, April 9th and 10th.

After the business meeting F. W. Merchant, M.A., Head Master High School, Ingersoll, after thanking the members of the Institute for honouring him the second time with the office of President, delivered the President's address—subject, "The Teacher as a Student." We regret that owing to the late hour of receiving the report we are unable to give it this week. It will appear in next week's issue.

Mr. Griffin, of Woodstock H.S., then explained his method of teaching Algebra to junior classes, which was listened to with much interest.

The next speaker on the programme being absent, Mr. Dennis moved That the Institute discuss the advisability of having uniform promotion examinations throughout the county, which was carried. After many pertinent remarks by the members bearing upon the subject under consideration, the discussion was brought to a close by Mr. Deacon, whose experience enabled him to suggest methods of surmounting the difficulties presented. For lack of time it was resolved to drop the matter, giving the committee power to consider it at some future period.

The meeting then adjourned to meet at 2 p.m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Reading was taken up by Mr. Burke, of Bright, who formed the Institute into a class and gave a practical lesson on the adaptation of the voice to the author's sentiment, which was entered into with much spirit.

Mr. Cole, of Norwich, then gave his method of teaching Composition to junior classes. Several teachers expressed their difficulties in teaching this subject, and the rough places were made smooth by hints from our worthy Inspector.

A very able address was delivered on vocal culture by Miss Churchill, Boston, Mass. The voice being the only medium through which we can reach the soul, the speaker showed clearly the necessity for its cultivation in order to convey sentiment. The statement made by her that reading is only speaking the author's sentiment was a strong incentive to the teachers for improvement in this art.

By request of the Institute, Miss Churchill recited "Shamus O'Brien," displaying great talent and ability, after which she was tendered a hearty vote of thanks.

Prof. J. M. Smith, Woodstock College, gave a lesson and address on the Tonic Sol-fa system of teaching music, which was shown to be both simple and scientific.

EVENING SESSION.

The Institute and many friends of education met in the town hall, where Dr. McLellan delivered an excellent address on "The Elements of Canada's Power." The talented gentleman's remarks aroused the feelings of patriotism in the hearts of his hearers, by whom he was loudly and frequently applauded.

THURSDAY SESSION.

Mr. Bryden, B.A., H. S., Ingersoll, gave an exercise in Drill and Calisthenics, illustrating his methods practically by the skilful evolutions of his class. This was followed by a short address, showing the necessity of cultivating the physical as well as the moral and intellectual powers of pupils.

The "A. B. C. of Arithmetic" was now taken up by Dr. McLellan, who clearly explained and highly recommended the system used in the Kindergarten schools of Germany, which cannot fail to call into action the reflective powers of pupils.

A discussion took place as to whether printing or script should be taught to junior classes. The leaders were Messrs. Carlyle and Oliver, respectively. Strong arguments in favour of each were brought out, after which a number of teachers gave their experience in the use of printing and writing in connection with elementary reading.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

A business meeting occupied a few moments at the opening of this session.

Messrs. Oliver and Dennis were elected to the office of Vice-President and Sec.-Treas., which were made vacant by the retirement of Jr. Stock and Miss Gardiner from the profession. Mr. Beattie was placed on the Management Committee.

Woodstock was decided upon as the next place of meeting.

Dr. McLellan spoke for some time on Grammatical Analysis. He first gave many leading ideas and principles in teaching classification, then proceeded to analysis, which he explained so clearly that many difficulties hitherto met with in teaching this subject, were swept away.

Reading was again introduced by Mr. Burke, who gave a practical lesson in vocal culture. A drill on the vowels and other vocal exercises proved beneficial.

Dr. McLellan expressed himself pleased with the Institute, complimenting the members upon their ability and intelligence in dealing with the different subjects, and spoke for some time upon the necessity of these Institutes for mutual improvement. His affable remarks directed in a channel meant to lighten the hearts (not the pockets) of the teachers, will be long remembered. In the course of his remarks the Dr. passed many high enconiums upon our Minister of Education, who has risen from the lowest to the highest position in the profession.

After a hearty vote of thanks to the Dr., and a few appropriate remarks from the President, the Institute adjourned.

The Late Rev. Donald McKenzie.

DIED.—On Tuesday evening, April 8th, at the family residence, Ingersoll, the Rev. D. McKenzie, late pastor of Knox Church, Embro, in the 86th year of his age.

The Rev. Donald McKenzie was one of the old landmarks of this country. He was ordained in 1834, just 50 years ago, by the Synod of Ross. Dr. McDonald, the famous "Apostle of the North," presided on this occasion. Shortly afterwards Mr. McKenzie was settled in West Zorra, where he labored faithfully and with marked success for nearly 40 years. A remarkable feature in the history of the congregation to which he ministered so long is the large number of young men out of it who have entered the learned professions, and especially the Christian ministry. These are classified as follows:—29 clergymen, 21 doctors of medicine, 9 lawyers, and 1 high school teacher—in all 60.

Deceased was buried on Friday afternoon, his remains being conveyed to the cemetery in North Embro. Service was held in Knox Church, Ingersoll, and in Knox Church, Embro. Several clergymen were present, among whom were Revs. Murray, London; Munro, Embro; Cameron, Thamesford; McPherson, Stratford; McKay, Puslinch; Sutherland, Exfird; McDonald, Belmont; Ross, Brucefield; Silcox, Embro; Meldrum, Innisnich; Grant, Simcoe; Scratch, Embro, and Ross, Ingersoll.

Rev. Mr. Ross gave out the 23rd Psalm, which, he said, was the favourite one of the deceased in his last hours. Rev. Mr. Murray, of London, then read a portion of the 90th psalm, also the 1st Cor. from the 5th verse, and 7th chapter of Rev., from the 9th verse. Rev. Mr. McPherson led in prayer, and after singing a portion of the 53rd paraphrase, Rev. Mr. Munro, of Embro, read an appropriate address, a portion of which we give below:—

Our deceased and honored father, Rev. D. McKenzie, to whose dust we this day pay our last tribute and respect, whose memory will be dear and whose name will be fragrant in all our homes for many years to come, arrived in Zorra in August 1834. During the previous year, (1833) the Synod of Ross resolved to send a Missionary to labor among their expatriated countrymen in Canada, and Mr. McKenzie was asked to be their first Missionary. After much serious and prayerful conference with the committee appointed by the Synod, and with many private christians, Mr. McKenzie resolved to come to Canada. Accordingly in presence of the Synod of Ross assembled in Tain, in May 1834, he was ordained for the field by the Presbytery of Dingwall as a Missionary to Canada. The following June 1835, Mr. McKenzie became the pastor of a regularly organized congregation in Zorra, to which he faithfully ministered till it became manifest that age and infirmities

FARM AND DAIRY.

Rearing Calves.

In the feeding of calves, great forcing is often hurtful, and regularity and liberality are obviously the main factors in the growth and fattening of the animal. The foundation of the adult is laid in youth, and in these days of twelve-month mutton and two-year-old beef the rearing properly is a paramount consideration. When there is a large flow of milk and the calf left with the cow, she should be milked dry twice a day. It is better for the calf to be a little hungry for a day or two at first than to receive full rations, for prevention is better than cure. Still, abstinence may be good for older stomachs, but those of calves ought not to be left too long waiting, but then perhaps overfilled. In this case it has been truly said the food masters the stomach, instead of being mastered by it. When the young animal has got a fair amount of flesh on, it should be kept on. They should not be well fed in the first three months and starved the next three, because that not only checks growth, but loses condition, which is difficult to restore. Now that it is well known that calves make more weight than heifers or steers in the same time, and even at a less cost of food, everything tending to the welfare of the animal needs strict and skillful attention.

If the calves have been accustomtd to a little linseed-cake, the quantity may now be considerably increased, but cautiously, so that the system may be able to assimilate all that is consumed. These remarks, however, must be accepted with limitations, for females for breeding purposes may be made too fat. Again, on poor and moorland farms, where the summer grass and the winter foods don't comport with pampering the calf, it would be a serious loss to follow the foregoing rules, and it often and almost always happens that these conditions are associated with an uncongenial climate.

A Milk Notice.

The Messrs. Straight & Co., of Ohio, are among the largest creamery managers of the West, and we know of no way we could serve our readers better than to publish their requirements from their patrons.

Milk cans are to be fully sheltered in rainy weather during the time of milking, and well protected from rain by projecting tin tops or water-proof covers, on the way to the factory.

After June 1, 1884. we will not accept more than 100 pounds milk from any can at one delivery. Those in the Northwest who lead the world on quantity of milk received and quality of butter produced, confine their patrons to cans of 60 to 75 pounds capacity, refusing to risk the quality of milk handled and delivered in larger masses.

Managers are not allowed to deliver butter to any party more than three or, at least, four times per month.

No milk received hereafter between April 1 and July 1, of the following season, from those having withdrawn between August 1 and November 1.

Those who deliver us milk regularly during all of August, September and October thereby keeping their standing as regular milk patrons, perfectly good with us, wherever they sell during the other nine months.

No milk to be brought to us sooner after the calving than the fourth day, or seventh to ninth milking, from cows in perfect health.

Delivering milk from diseased cows subjects the guilty party to criminal prosecution.

Cows must be carefully kept from whey, turnips, cabbage, unsound potatoes and other feed that damages milk.

Perfect cleanliness should be observed in milking, tin pails only used, and the milk slowly strained (to air and cleanse it, both) into the can through a good strainer.

The cans should be carefully shaded from the sun in hot weather, the covers should be left off till ready to start for the factory, and the milk aired several times meanwhile (if any delay) by stirring with a dipper. Milk cans should be cleansed with boiling water and well sunned every day, and scoured with salt as often as twice a week.

Changing milkers, irregularity in time of milking, and worrying cows by the agency of dogs or harsh, thoughtless people, are, each and all, unprofitable to owners in the diminished quality of the milk.

Notes.

Give the calf the first milk from the cow's udder—the last is often too rich for it.

This is a good time of the year to be doubly careful in straining the milk to keep the hairs out.

Slow milking of cows never secures full product. Partial milking soon dries the cow and greatly reduces her value.

The nicer the quality of cheese produced, the higher the price it will bring, and the more desirable it will become as an article of food.

The regular use of salt is indispensable to the health of a cow, and subsequently to the successful management of the the dairy. A certain quantity of salt should be given daily with the food, precisely as we take it ourselves.

From every quarter comes the evidence of usefulness of skim milk for laying hens, and farmers who have not tried it should give it a hearing this spring. Hens will consume an immense quantity of it if allowed a full supply.

Watch your farm hands and note their treatment of cattle. The brutal habit of kicking cows should not be allowed. A kick in the udder will very likely result in bloody milk. Although the consequences of a blow or a kick on the ribs may not be seen at once, more or less damage will certainly follow.

Increased attention needs to be given by cheese makers to the matter of curing cheese. Cheese factories should be provided with suitable curing rooms, where a uniform temperature of the required degree can be maintained, together with a suitable degree of moisture and sufficient supply of fresh air. The expense required to provide a suitable curing room would be small compared to the increased value on the cheese product thereby secured.

Small dairymen and farmers having only a few cows, labor under some difficulties in the way of providing suitable curing rooms for their cheese. Yet if they have a clear idea of what a curing room should be, they, will generally be able to provide something which will approximate to what is needed. Good curing rooms are absolutely needed in order to enable our cheese makers to produce a really fine article of cheese.

Mr. V. E. Fuller's famous Jersey cow, Mary Anne, at Oaklands, near Hamilton, Ont, has been tested for a period of seven days in the matter of butter-making by a committee of practical men. All the processes, from milk to the weighing of the butter, were done under their watchful eye, and the result, affirmed, has never been equalled. The net amount for the week was 26 pounds, nine ounces of unsalted butter, and 27 pounds, 9¾ ounces of salted.

The sense of smell is of the greatest importance in the business of dairying, and it is by no means exaggerating its importance to say that an acute olfactory sense is indispensible to success in fine dairying. The nose has, first a duty to perform in the stable in detecting the wrong scent of the cows. Rightly this is a sweet agreeable odor, when the animals are kept clean and fed upon clean food.

The curing of skim-milk cheese skillfully conducted, enriches it in fat and brings it up to a very slightly inferior condition to that of a full milk cheese. The same digestive property is excessively developed by long curing and exists more largely in the more highly flavored cheese; the flavor being produced by the decomposition which increases the digestive activity. Cheese of this kind is not used as food strictly, but as a condiment to aid digestion of other food. It is used as fruit is, at the end of a meal, nominally as a relish, but really as a help to digestion.

The farmer who is hardest to convince of his errors is the one who possesses a single instance within his own experience with which to combat your arguments. If you maintain that Jerseys are good butter cows, he once knew one that could not make a pound of butter. If you hold that roots are good for dairy cows he once knew one to get choked to death on them. His one swallow always makes a summer, and he forgets that thorough experience is a good teacher it should be the experience of many who have tried several ways rather than the experience of one that always creates but a limited knowledge. The Good Book tells us not to be over wise in our own judgment. This should especially be in the case in matters pertaining to farming, where every man's experience is so varied in different seasons. Then there are so many conflicting elements about farming, and especially that most fickle of all things, the weather, makes or mars a thousand fortunes every year, and nowhere is she more potent than on the farm.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Tea and Coffee at Night.

The use of tea at night is another very mixed question. If your nerves are fatigued, tea will often make you sleep; but, if you are over excited, it will keep you restless and awake. As a rule most late workers are in the habit of sipping tea. Many do not find that it injures their sleep, and I suppose that most doctors would agree that, if this is the case, tea for a student is far better than alcohol in any shape. These remarks also apply to coffee. Black coffee in hot countries seems to be the panacea for all the woes of life. It apparently suits some late students and business men better than tea in times of pressure, and it is certainly superior to any form of alcohol. A head clerk in one of the largest offices in London told me that during a fortnight of commercial panic, when all the employes were kept working overtime, most of them took to stimulants. My friend said: "I foresaw what was coming and when the crisis arrived cut off all alcohol and substituted coffee. At the end of the fortnight most of my colleagues were knocked up, but I was as fresh as a bird."

The Ideal Beefsteak.

Any one can cook a beefsteak—in his mind. As a matter of fact, it requires an artist to do it, and this view is shared by a correspondent, who writes: "A member of my family brought the cooking of this article of food to perfection. The first requirement is not so much a tender and juicy steak, but a glowing bed of coals, a wire gridiron—a double one so that you can turn the steak without touching it. The steak should be pounded only in extreme cases, when it is too thick. Attempt nothing else when you are cooking steak, and have everything ready for the table, the roasted potatoes and vegetables all being in their respective dishes in the oven, with doors left open a little way. From ten minutes upward is needed to cook steak.

The time must depend upon the size, and you can easily tell by the color of the gravy, which runs from the steak when gently pressed with a knife, as to its condition. If the master of the house likes it "rare done," when there is a suspicious brown gravy with the red it will be safe to infer that it is done enough for him. If the next stage is the favorite one, remove the steak the instant the steak is of a light brown. Remove it to a platter, pepper and salt it to your taste, put on small lumps of butter, and then for two brief moments cover it with a hot plate, the two moments being sufficient to carry it to the table. One absolutely essential factor is the preparation of good beefsteak is that it must be served at once. If you can impress it on your cook that he is not to let it stand and steam while he is doing other things, you will be likely to receive your reward for so doing."—London Hotel World.

Life is the preface to the book of eternity,

TEMPERANCE.

Temperance and Health.

Omitting all references to the mental and moral ravages of intemperance, it would require a lifetime to recount the pains and aches, malignant diseases induced by the demon intemperance. We have already seen that all alcoholic liquors impair, retard and complicate digestion, always and everywhere, both in the case of the sick and the well, thus preventing the normal and full nourishment of the system. Some of the robust may endure this for a time, but the sick may safely avoid all combinations of it in the matter of digestion as they need all of the strength possible that they may resist the inroads of disease. It always and everywhere wastes power—never generating any—prevents the renovation of the blood, the whole body, increases the labors of the heart, by which it must weaken that organ, deranges the brain and nerves, vitiates the blood and all the digestive juices, none of which effects are favorable to even the robust, while none of the sick can tolerate any such antagonistic agencies.

The action of alcohol—as a drink, medicine or as a bath—is always in the line of paralysis. Let this thought be emphasized; it always and everywhere tends to benumb, derange and eventually impair and destroy the sensibilities. In illustration, observe the 'rum-blossom' of the drunkard, the red and enlarged nose. The blood vessels are so paralyzed that they cannot perform their ordinary labors, from which fact, in consequence of their relaxed state, the blood is not urged on, the vessel becoming enforced at particular places—in the face, more especially—the accumulation and engorgement increasing the size of the nose, red enough to serve as a warning—like a light-house—to guard the young from being wrecked on the hidden rock of drunkenness?

The intense red color of the drunkard's brain is produced in precisely the same way as that of the nose, namely, paralysis of the nerves which control the circulation of this part so the body. When the drunkard's face and nose are reddened, or blushing under the influence of alcohol, the brain blushes. The same may be said also of the lungs, the stomach, the liver, the kidneys, and other structures of the body. His whole physical being blushes with shame for the outrage against nature. In consequence of this intense congestion, and the fact that it receives one-fifth of the blood in the body, the brain participates more than any other organ in the body, except the liver, in the injury wrought by the "demon drink." As before mentioned, it sometimes becomes hardened to such a degree even during life that it can be readily distinguished from a healthy brain by sense of touch alone.

For this reason, no function of the system can be carried on in its normal condition, during its legitimate labor or office. The brain, therefore, thus robbed of its normal energies, by a partial paralysis, is unable intelligently to superintend the running of this wonderful machine, "fearfully and wonderfully made," while the semi-paralyzed nerves, losing a part of their vital force, fail to keep up the telegraphic communication between the brain and all parts of the body, which harmony demands.

The heart—occupying the position of the prime motor—enervated by a fearful increase of toils by the use of alcoholic stimulants (goads) laboring under serious disadvantages, must fail to perform its part of the system—labor, just to that extent failing to convey nourishment to all parts of the body as well as failing in gathering up the waste and poisonous parts, conveying them to the lungs for renovation, purification. A failure here is but another name for universal failure! If the stomach is not nourished and stimulated by pure blood, it must to that extent be unable to so transform the food into blood as to impoverish the whole system. There must be a general absence of vital force, the supplies being cut off, partially, and the renovating and purifying forces suffering to the same extent. Alcohol is a "two-edged sword," fearfully destroying the vital forces. It attacks directly and indirectly, first reducing the power of the organs of the body, then indirectly aggravating the evils by reducing their nourishment, by impairing digestion. This is an apt illustration of the Bible assertion that "if one member suffers, all will suffer with it."—The Golden Rule.

Holloway's Pills. — Indigestion. — How much thought has been bestowed, and what voluminous treatises have been written upon this universal and distressing disease, which is with certainty and safety dispelled without fear of relapse by a course of this purifying, soothing, and tonic medicine! It acts directly on the stomach, liver and bowels—then indirectly, though no less effectively, on the brain, nerves, vessels, and glands, introducing such order throughout the entire system that harmony dwells between each organ and its functions. Dyspepsia need no longer be the bugbear of the public, since Holloway's Pills are fully competent to subdue the most chronic and distressing cases of impaired digestion, and to restore the miserable sufferer to health, strength, and cheerfulness.

Influence of Woman's Society.

'It is better for you,' says Thackeray, 'to pass an evening once or twice in a lady's drawing-room, even though the conversation is slow, and you know the girl's songs by heart, than in a club, tavern, or the pit of a theatre. All amusements of youth to which virtuous women are not admitted, rely on it, are deleterious to their nature. All men who avoid female society have dull perceptions and are stupid or have gross tastes, and revolt against what is pure. Your club swaggerers, who are sucking the butts of billiard cues all night, call female society insipid.'

Names of European Nations.

These are derived principally from some particular cause or object. For instance, Ireland—which Julius Cæsar first called Hibernia—is a kind of modification of Erin, or the country of the West.

Scotland, from Scotia, a tribe which originally came from Ireland. It was anciently called Caledonia, which means a mountainous country — forests and lands.

Portugal, the ancient Lusitania, was so named from a town on the River Douro, called Cale, opposite to which the inhabitants built a city called Porto, or Oporto. And when the country was recovered from the Moors the inhabitants combined the words, and called it the kingdom Portucale—hence Portugal.

Spain, the ancient Iberia, from the River Iberus, or Hispania, from the Phœnician spaniga, which signifies abounding with rabbits which animals are very numerous in that country—hence Spain.

France, from the Franks, a people of Germany, who conquered that country. Its ancient name was Celta, Gaul, or Gallia-Bracchata, the latter signifying striped breeches, which were worn by the natives.

Switzerland, the ancient Helvetia, was so named by the Austrians, who called the inhabitants of these mountainous countries Schweitzers.

Italy received its present name from a renowned prince called Italus. It was called Hesperia, from its western locality.

Holland, the ancient Batavi, a warlike people, were so named from the German word hohl, the English of which is hollow, implying a very low country. The inhabitants are called Dutch, from the German deutsch or teutsch.

Sweden and Norway were anciently called Scandinavia, which the modern antiquarians think means a country the woods of which have been burnt or destroyed. The appellation Sweden is derived from Sictuna, or Suithеod. The native term Norway, or the northern way explains itself.

Prussia, from Peuzzi, a Sclavonic race; but some writers suppose it took its name from Russio, and the Sclavonic syllable po, which means adjacent, or near.

Denmark means the marches, territories, or boundaries of the Danes.

Russia is the ancient Sarmatia, which has been subsequently named Muscovy. It derived its present name from Russi, a Sclavonic tribe who founded the Russian monarchy. The original savage inhabitants used to paint their bodies, in order to appear more terrible in battle. They generally lived in the mountains, and their chariots were their only habitations.

Turkey took its name from the Turks, or Turcomans, which signifies wanderers, and originally belonged to the Scythians or Tartars. It is sometimes called the Ottoman Empire, from Othoman, one of their principal leaders.

Humorous.

The best backing a young man can have is a good backbone of his own.

When a man goes to collect a bill he never likes to receive a snub, but he rather likes to receive a check.

"There is a use for everything," said the surgeon, as he slyly dropped orange skins on the pavement at midnight.

"Can your wife drive?" one man asked another. "Drive what?" "Drive a horse, of course." "Drive a horse! why, man, she cannot drive a nail."

A 'Shams man waited until he was 83 years old before he got married. That's like running three miles to get a good start for a fourteen inch jump.

"Can you tell me," asked a man of his tailor, "how you came to get this coat so tight?" "Oh, yes, sir. The fact is you were tight when I measured you."

A clergyman, meeting an inebriated neighbour, exclaimed, "Drunk again, Wilkins" to which Wilkins, in a semi-confidential tone, responded, "So am I, parson!"

Mr. Forrest, who was a gruff ould gentleman, replied that he would build his house to heaven if liked. "Well," said the big, burly father of the present Mr. M'Fie, of Airds, "if you do, you'll have no want of tenants for your top flat."

A farmer in the neighbourhood of Doncaster was lately accosted by his landlord thus—"John, I intend to raise your rent." To which John replied—"Sir, I am very much obliged to you, for I cannot raise it myself."

"The moon," said a total abstainer, "is not quite a teetotaller; but she lets her moderation be known to all men—for she only fills her horn once a month." "Then she fills it with something very strong!" observed a bystander; "for I have seen her half gone."

"Lord send us a good conceit o' ourscls," said a Carrick farmer to his neighbour, who had rather worsted him in an argument. The reply was "Ye needna bother the Lord with ony such superfluous duty; He can hae sma' doubt o' your conceit o' yoursel'."

Washington Irving once said to a lady: —"Don't be anxious about the education of your daughters; they will do very well; don't teach them so many things; teach them one thing." "What is that, Mr. Irving?" she asked. "Teach them," he said, "to be easily pleased."

"So you always manage to put up with your Tartar of a wife?" "Oh, yes! We have lots of fun together." "How is that?" "Well, you see my wife, when she gets into a passion is in the habit of throwing at me anything that comes in her way. Every time she hits me she is pleased, and every time she misses I am pleased; and thus we are never short of amusement."

A countryman upon coming to see the sights, was taken by an Edinburgh friend to the theatre. When the lights were down, and the play had commenced, he was offered the use of an opera glass. Examining it as closely as the darkness of the place would admit, he placed it to his mouth and turned it upwards. Finding that no liquid was coming out of it, he handed it back in despair, saying, "It's empty, John; there's no a single drap in't."

Jean, wha was a gey big strappin' quean o' seventeen, was very anxious tae ken hoo heavy she was. Passin' a tattie store ae day, an' seeing the scales, she speired at the storekeeper if he wad weigh her. Being an obleegin' chield, he complied. The weights being on the brod at the ae end o' the scale, Jennie seated hersel' as best she could across the bucket which hung by ropes frae the ither end. After turning the weatherside o' ten stane seven, she made for the street, and, seeing a friend, she cried out—"Ae, Mag, I've been getting weighed."—"Weighed! an' hoo heavy wis ye?" "Hoo muckle dae ye think?—ten stane seven, an' me legs hinging ower the bucket."

A Lawyer's Removal.

'Say, you all—come here, quick!'

'What's up?'

'Fun! Here's a lawyer going to move!'

The boy was correct. A lawyer was changing his office. Some men who had never seen a lawyer remove gathered around with the boys to watch proceedings.

An old man with a lame back and a woman blind in one eye constituted the force. They first brought down a table, ink-stained, scratched, cut and one leg broken. A second-hand man remarked that it might be worth thirty cents.

Next came a book case, one drawer, gone, all the glass broken, and one door hanging by a single hinge. The value of this was set down at $3.25. Then came articles, described and valued as follows:

A carpet	$1 25
A lounge	38
A stove	1 75
Pictures	15
Ink	2
Legal cap	10
Alpaca coat	15
Tea straw hats	60
Spittoons	25
Chairs	75
State Laws	6 00
State Maps	50
Total	$11 90

After the second hand man had sharpened a pencil and made some figures on a piece of brown paper, a boot black inquired the sum total.

'I make the whole thing $15.45,' he answered.

'Is that all? And is he a first class lawyer?'

'I believe he is.'

'Woof! that settles me! I've got $20 in the bank, and to-morrer I'll shake this kit and set up a law shop!'—Detroit Free Press.

Our Canadian Silk Industry is prosperous. The great difficulty to be contended with is the low grade of good required. In nothing is this more apparent than in the comparatively small article of sewing silks. The great demand in Canada seems to be for a cheap quality, buyers forgetting that a cheap thread must necessarily be a fine and consequently a weak one. Messrs. Belding, Paul and Co., make three grades of spool silk; of these different qualities the poorest one has by far the largest sale, at the same time they constantly hear of complaints of poor sewing silk. If ladies will take the trouble to ask for Belding, Paul & Co.'s own brand, and see that their name is on the end of each spool, they will be sure of getting the best made. 76y.

An Ambitious Woman.

BY EDGAR FAWCETT.

CHAPTER XVI.

Rather early the next morning, Mrs. Diggs dropped in upon Claire, "to hear all about it," as she said, alluding to the dinner-party.

She dismissed two of the gentlemen with two little contemptuous nods. "They are both well enough in point of respectability," she affirmed. "So are their wives. All four are so swathed in dull convention that you even forget to criticise them; they're like animals which resemble the haunts they inhabit to such a degree that you can tell them from the surrounding foliage or furrows only when they move or show life. Whom else did you have?"

"There was Mr. Stuart Goldwin," said Claire.

"Goldwin? You don't mean it, really? Did you have Goldwin?" Here Mrs. Diggs looked hard at Claire, and slowly shook her head. "My dear," she went on, "it must indeed be true that your husband is achieving great financial distinction. Pardon my saying it, Claire, but Goldwin wouldn't have put his limbs under your mahogany if this had not been true. He is an enormous personage. Other Wall Street grandees have been very small pygmies in the social estimate. But Goldwin carries everything before him. You needn't tell me that you like him. It would be something abnormal if you didn't. He is really the most charming of men. You can't trust him, don't you know, further than you can see him; he bristles with all sorts of humbug. And yet you accept him, because it is such well-bred, engaging humbug. He has hosts of adherents, and he deserves them. He gives the most enchanting entertainments. They are never vulgar, and yet they cost vast sums. For example, he will give a Delmonico dinner, at which every lady finds a diamond-studded locket hid modestly in the heart of her bouquet. I need not add that in a matrimonial way he is simply groveled to. But beware of him, my dear Claire; he is dangerous."

"Dangerous?" repeated Claire.

"Well, not so much in himself. Goldwin, in himself, is a shallow yet clever man, a forcible yet weak man, a man whose pluck has aided him a great deal, and whose luck has aided him still more. He has caught the trick of looking like a prince, and hence of giving his princely amassment of money a superb glamour. He will fade, some day, and leave not a rack behind. Of course he will. They all do. I don't know that he would if he married. And now I come to my previous point. He doesn't marry; therefore he is dangerous."

"I don't follow you," Claire said.

"He doesn't marry Mrs. Ridgeway Lee. That is what I mean. As it is, she guards his approaches. She is a woman of high position, considerable queer, uncanny beauty, monstrous affectation, and a fondness for him that amounts to idolatry. She's the most intense of pietists; she riots in all sorts of religious charities. She has other idolatries besides Goldwin, but he is her fore most. I have never been just able to make her out. She is a sort of cousin of mine. She's wonderfully handsome, but it's the lean, cold beauty of a snake. As I said, she guards Goldwin's approaches. She's a widow, and a rich one, and she want's Goldwin to ask her to marry him. He doesn't, however, and hence she coils herself, so to speak, at the threshold of his acquaintance. If any woman draws near—I mean too near—she hisses and bites. . . . Oh, don't look incredulous. I've known her to positively do both. She'll do it to you, if Goldwin is too attentive. That is why I warn you; that is why I call that nice, brilliant, headlong, gentlemanly Goldwin a dangerous man."

In a few more days Hollister, of his own accord, proposed to Claire that she should engage a maid. He also told her that he had made purchase of two carriages, a span of horses, and an extra horse for single harness besides.

"You will be able to drive out, either in your coupe or your larger carriage, my dear," he said, "by Wednesday next." Then he broke into one of his most genial laughs, and added: "I hope that is not too long to wait."

Claire took this prophecy of coming splendor with serious quietude. She had talked with her husband regarding his recent plethoric influx of thousands.

"I've an idea, Herbert," she said using a slow, wise-seeming deliberation. "It is this; why do you not buy our house? We both like it; it is comfortable and agreeable; it fills all our wants. And it is for sale, you know."

Hollister looked grave, then smiled, then affirmatively nodded.

"I'll do it, Claire," he answered. "I'll do it to-morrow, if you wish."

"I do wish, Herbert. And when you have bought the house, I want you to put it in my name. I want you to give it to me."

He started and stared at her. A gleam of distrust appeared to slip coldly into his frank eyes. Claire saw this, but answered his look with firm calm. "Why do you say that?" he murmured.

She went nearer to him, and laid one hand on his shoulder. "Why do I say it?" she softly iterated. "Because I know something of the risks and perils you are forced daily to meet."

He watched her intently and soberly, for a few seconds after she had thus spoken. Then his characteristic smile broke forth like a burst of sun. He kissed her on the lips. "It shall be as you say!" he exclaimed, drawing her nearer to him, with a look which they of bids and sales and stock traffic had never seen on his manly yet winsome face. "You are right. You are always right, Claire. There's a lot of money drifting in; it seems as if the money would never stop drifting in."

"I hope it never will," said Claire, showing her pure teeth in a laugh, as he again kissed her. At the same time she drew back from him while his encircling arm still retained her, in a way to which he had grown wholly familiar, and which, in an unwedded woman, would have readily seemed like the reserve of absolute maidenhood. A slight further lapse of days brought grand results for Claire. She was legally the owner of the charming little house in which she dwelt; she had her maid, obsequiously attendant upon her least wants; she possessed her coupe, drawn by a large, silver-trapped horse: she possessed also, a glossy, dark-appointed carriage, drawn by two horses of equally smart gear, and supervised by coachman and footman, in approved and modish livery.

Mrs. Diggs was in ecstasies over the prosperous change. "Now you are indeed tancee, don't you know?" she said. "By the way, has Cornelia Van Horn left a card on you, my dear?"

"No," said Claire.

"Can she really mean open warfare?"

"Let her wage it," Claire answered. "That is better than to have it concealed."

The opera season began the next evening. Hollister had engaged a box permanently. It was a season that opened with auspicious brilliancy. Claire appeared in her first really notable toilette. One of the reigning modistes had made it, and for the first time in her life she was called upon to stand the test of surpassingly beautiful dressing. It is a test that some very fair women stand ill. They show to best advantage in garments which have no atmosphere of festival; it becomes them to be clad with domesticity, or at least moderation.

This was by no means true, however, of Claire. The diamond necklace which Hollister had spread on her dressing table but a few minutes before the hour of departure, glittered round her smooth, slender neck with telling saliency. Her gown was of a pale, pink brocaded stuff, and she carried its full-flowing train with a light-stepping and perfect repose. Before she had unclosed her cloak, and given herself to the box at Hollister's side, numerous lorgnettes were levelled upon the lovely, dignified picture that she made. When she had seated herself the spell continued. The large pink roses in her bosom were not deep or sweet enough of tint to do more than heighten the fresh, chaste flush in either cheek. She bore herself with a fine and delicate majesty. Her dark-blue eyes told of the quicker pulse that stirred her veins only by a more humid and dreamy sparkle. She was inwardly glad to be where she sat, and to be robed as she was robed, but her pleasure softly exulted in its own outward repression; she was wonderfully self poised and tranquil, considering her strong secret excitement. Nearly everybody who looked upon her pronounced her to be very beautiful, and a good many people, before an hour had passed, had looked at her with the closest kind of scrutiny.

The opera was a favorite one; a famed and favorite prima-donna sang in it. Below, where the real lovers of music mostly thronged, her singing once provoked neither comment nor criticism. But up in the region sacred to fashion inattention, gossip and distraction, she rapidly became an event which even the most melodious cavatina was powerless to supersede.

It was not all done by her beauty and novel charm. Hollister, sitting at her side, nonchalant, handsome, of excellent conventional style in garb and posture, materially helped to increase the notability which surrounded her. His success had publicly transpired; a few of those newspapers which are little save glaring personal placards, had of late promulged with graphic zeal his speculative triumphs. He had leaped into notoriety in a day, almost in an hour. There was but one man in the house besides her husband whom Claire knew. This man was Stuart Goldwin, and he soon dropped into her box, remaining through the two final acts.

Hollister, meanwhile, chose to be absent. He had found some friends who were solicitous of presenting him to certain ladies. He spent nearly the whole of these two acts in chatting with these same ladies. They were all gracious; one or two of them had strong claims to beauty. It was no less an important evening with himself than with Claire. Perhaps with him it was even more so, since he obtained his social acceptance, as it were, by great dames upon whom he pleased with his handsome face, happy manners, and growing repute as a potential millionaire.

His wife, on the other hand, had gained a different victory. She was pronounced to be charming and remarkable; she had acquired the prestige of Goldwin's open attentions. But she was a woman, and she had not yet received the endorsement of her own sex. It might possibly soon arrive, or it might be withheld; there was still no actual certainty.

Claire loved the music, but she would have heard its cadences in discontent if fate had decreed that she should sit, this evening, with no attendant devotee. She knew well that Goldwin's company distinguished her. Mrs. Diggs had given her points, as the phrase goes. She was quite aware that the horse-shoe of boxes in our metropolitan opera house, and the other more commodious proscenium boxes which flank its stage, are at all times occupied by just the kind of people among whom she wished to win her coveted lofty place. She understood that they would note, comment, gauge, admire or condemn; and while her manner bespoke a sweet and placid unconsciousness of their observation, she was alive to the exact amount of observation which she had attracted.

"I am so glad that you came," Goldwin told her. "For very selfish reasons, I mean. You appear, and you corroborate my statements. Now people can at last see and judge for themselves. The verdict is sure."

He said many more things in this vein, all uttered low, and all accompanied by his smile, that seemed either to rouse volumes or to leave his true meaning adroitly ambiguous.

Mrs. Ridgeway Lee was in a somewhat near box. When Goldwin returned to her side, just as the curtain was falling on the last act, she accepted his escort to her carriage with a fine composure. He met Mrs. Van Horn, a little later, in the crush that always occurs along the Fourteenth Street lobby of our Academy when a full house disgorges its throng.

The two ladies talked together. Not far away from them stood Mrs. Diggs and Claire, each waiting for an absent husband to secure a carriage.

"What a contrast there is between them," Claire murmured to her companion. "One is so blonde and peaceful, the other so dark and restless."

"Yes, my dear Claire. Have you caught Cornelia's eye?"

"No. She does not appear to see me."

"She sees you perfectly. She has not yet made up her mind just how to act."

"I think that she means to cut me," said Claire, under her breath.

"Never," came the emphatic answer, so bass and gruff because of its vocal suppression that it produced odd contrast with Mrs. Diggs' bodily thinness. "To cut you would be to burn her ships. She has an object in knowing you. I'm afraid it's a dark one. But be sure she is only making up her mind just how to know you. She will soon decide; she has already delayed too long, and she feels it. Be ready for a prompt change."

If the behavior of Mrs. Van Horn was really to be explained on the theory of her prophetic cousin, then she made up her mind very soon after the delivery of these oracular sentences. A chance turn of the neck seemed to render her conscious of Claire's neighboring presence. She bowed with soft decision the moment that their eyes met; and Claire returned the bow.

The next instant she laid one gloved hand on the arm of Mrs. Ridgeway Lee, and then both ladies moved in Claire's direction. Their progress was of necessity made between the forms of several assembled ladies, who nodded and smiled as the great personage and her companion pushed courteously past them. They were mostly the loyal adherents of Mrs. Van Horn, in the sense that they held it high honor to have the right of occasionally darkening her Washington Square doorway. Two or three of them were perhaps co-regents with her as regarded caste and power.

They all saw and intently watched the little astonishing action that now followed. Mrs. Van Horn glided up to Claire and extended her hand.

"I was so sorry to have missed your dinner, Mrs. Hollister," said the great lady, with her best affability, "but another engagement forced me to be absent." She again put her hand on the arm of Mrs. Ridgeway Lee; she had thus far wholly ignored Mrs. Diggs; her nose was well in the air, as usual, but her smile was bland, conciliatory, impressive; she glowed with an august amiability.

"I want you to let me present my cousin, Mrs. Lee," she proceeded. "We have both heard so much about you of late from Mr. Goldwin. You can't think how devoted a friend you have suddenly made."

Before Claire could answer, Mrs. Lee spoke. She had got herself into her usual extraordinary twist. Her visage, her hands, and her lower limbs, regarded according to their relative disposements, would have made a very sinuous line. Like Mrs. Van Horn, she was wrapped in an opera cloak. But her dark little head rose from the large circlet of swansdown about her slight throat with an effect not unlike the slim crest of a turtle stealing from its shell. She constantly suggested a creature of this lean and chill type, though rarely with any of its repulsive traits.

"Indeed, yes!" she softly exclaimed to Claire. "Mr. Goldwin is a great friend of mine, and he has told me hundreds of charming things about you."

"Our acquaintance has been a very short one," said Claire, looking at Mrs. Diggs. In a certain way, she sought to gain a kind of tacit calm from the latter's face. She failed to perceive just how matters were drifting. Was this patronage on the part of both ladies? Or was it meant for irreproachable courtesy?

Mrs. Diggs gave a laugh. "Goldwin can say a hundred charming things very easily on a brief acquaintance," she declared. "Can't you?" were her next words, delivered to Goldwin himself, who had just then slipped up to the group.

"Oh, no, I can't," he at once replied, "unless I mean every one of them."

"Dear me!" said Mrs. Diggs, "how quickly you grasp the situation! So you heard what we were talking about, did you? You've found out that we were discussing your last enthusiasm?"

"Ah," said Goldwin, "I have very few of them. Don't cheapen me, please, in the regard of Mrs. Hollister."

"You seem to count upon her regard with singular confidence," said Mrs. Van Horn.

"That's entirely our affair," laughed Goldwin. He looked at Claire, but while he did so Mrs. Van Horn placed her hand within his arm. She took it for granted that her carriage had been properly summoned by the financier, and she was going to permit him to accompany her thither, as she had permitted him to find it; she nearly always put herself in the attitude of permitting favors and not soliciting them, by some deft, secure art, quite her own. The bow of farewell which she gave Claire was handsomely suave. Mrs. Lee moved away at her other side. Mrs. Lee had been her guest that evening, and they were to ride home together.

"So, Claire, it's settled," presently said Mrs. Diggs. "Cornelia is to know you. So is Sylvia Lee. Be careful of them both. I can't feel certain yet of exactly what it all means. . . . Here's that dear Manhattan of mine. He has got our carriage. Shall I remain with you till your husband reappears? . . . Very well; I will. But this is no place in which to talk over the whole odd, interesting thing. I'll try and drop in upon you soon; possibly to-morrow, if I can manage it. Does Manhattan see us? Just observe how stupidly he stares about everywhere but here. He's been a little strange and absent-minded all the evening. I really think he's forgotten where he left me. He smokes too many of those strong, horrid cigars, don't you know? I truly believe that they cloud his brain half the time . . . but then it's better he should smoke too much than think too much. I don't know what I should do if the dear fellw drank too much!"

Mrs. Diggs did present herself at Claire's house on the following day. But Claire was not at home. She had driven out in company with her husband.

It was a momentous drive. They had left home together at about one o'clock. Claire had no idea whither they were going at first. Hollister had chosen to assume an air of profound mysticism. "I have a great surprise for you," he said.

There was no characteristic twinkle in his eye as he made this statement. Claire felt that he was far from saddened, and yet his gravity looked an undoubted fact.

"I will accompany you blindly," she said, just before they entered the carriage. "I suppose, however, there are some more jewels at Tiffany's which you want me to see and choose from."

"No," said Hollister, shaking his head. "I shouldn't spend nearly a whole day away from Wall Street for anything of that sort."

The carriage had soon passed Tiffany's by a considerable distance, in what we call the downward direction. As its progress increased Claire's curiosity heightened, but for some time she gave no proof of this. Her talk was of their new attainments, of their growing pastimes, pleasures, and luxuries. She spoke often with a slightly unfamiliar speed; it was a little habit that of late had come upon her; it betrayed gentle excitement in place of previous composure. To Hollister, when he observed it all, the effect was filled with charm; he no more disliked it than he would have disliked to see a very tender breeze agitate some beautiful bloom. But now his gravity by no means lessened under the spell of Claire's rather voluble advances. She had plainly seen the change; then, after an interval of almost complete silence, she placed her hand in his. The carriage was now very near to one of the Brooklyn ferries. No doubt the first real suspicion of the truth had flashed through Claire's mind when she abruptly said:—

"Where are we going, Herbert? You really must tell me."

He met her intent look; she had rarely seen his blithe eyes more solemn than now.

"Haven't you guessed by this time?" he said.

"Perhaps I have," she answered. Her tone was a low murmur; she had averted her eyes from his, and would have withdrawn from him her hand, had not the clasp of his own softly rebelled against this act. Her cheeks had flushed almost crimson. "Go on," she persisted. "Tell me if I am right."

"I think you are, Claire; I think you have guessed it at last." The carriage had just entered the big gateway of the ferry; hoofs and wheels took a new sound as they struck the planks of the wharf. "Don't you remember that night at the Island, a little while after our engagement, when you told me that it would give you such joy to regain your father's body and to have it decently buried, in a Christian way?"

"Yes, Herbert . . . I remember." She spoke the words so faintly that he scarcely heard them.

"Well, Claire, I made you a promise then, and I recollected the promise."

"And I forgot it!" she cried, throwing both arms about his neck for an instant and kissing his cheek. Immediately afterward she burst into tears. "Oh Herbert, you remembered and I forgot! how wicked of me! I let other things—things that were trifles and vanities—drive it from my mind! Poor, dear, dead father! He would never have done that to me! He loved me too well—far too well!"

The tears were rushing down her face, and her frame was in a miserable tremor. Already he had caught both her hands, and was firmly pressing them while he bent toward her, and while she leaned in a relaxed position against the back of the carriage. He thought her repentance as exquisite as it was needless; he held it only as a fresh proof of her sweet, refined spirit. It brought the mist into his sight, and made his voice throb very unwontedly, to see her weep and tremble thus.

"My darling," his next words hurried, "you're not in the least to blame. You would have thought about it a little later, I'm certain. But so much has happened since our marriage, you know. Besides, what you call trifles and vanities are just what he wanted you to think about. He must be glad (if the dead are ever glad or sorry in any way) to see you climb higher, and get the notice and influence you deserve. You never slighted his memory at all. Don't fancy you did, Claire. He was in your mind all the while, only you postponed speaking of him a little longer than you intended. You had told me what to do, don't you see, and you felt a certain security as regarded my doing it. That was all. Now do cheer up. We've quite a ride to Greenwood after we leave the ferry. Everything has been done quietly, dear, without your knowing. I thought it would pain you too much to stand beside any open grave of his. The body was not hard to find. You recollected its . . . its number, you know. I'm sure you will like the stone I've put over him. It is just a plain granite one with the name and date of death. The date of birth shall be put there afterward; I didn't want to ask it of you yet; that would have spoiled my surprise."

She grew more perfectly calm again some time before they reached the cemetery. The cessation of her tears deeply relieved Hollister. He had never seen her weep before, and the betrayal of such emotion, feminine though it was, had harshly disturbed him. Once more composed, she returned to him in her proper strength. She became Claire again. It was not that he did not like her to show weakness, but rather that in showing weakness she appeared new and odd to him, and hence not his own strong, serene, familiar Claire. Any jar, as it were, in the steadfast vibrations of his fealty sent to the heart of this unswerving loyalist a strange, acute dismay.

The autumn darkness had almost fallen upon the multitudinous tombs of Greenwood before Claire was willing to leave that of her father. His name, cut in the modest grey of the stone, seemed for hours afterwards cut into her conscience as well. The grand repose of the place, too, left its haunting thrill in her soul. A great sombre note had been struck through all her being, at a time when her brain and heart began to feel the full intoxication of worldly longing.

While she was living intensely, death had come to her in the shape of keen-reproachful reminder. The vast cemetery had now no vernal or summer charm. Above, the sky was soft as a turquoise, but underfoot, and on tree and shrub, the lovely melancholy of waning autumn met the bitter melancholy of a more woeful decay. It was all like one mighty threnody put to mighty yet very tender music. With a certain sinister and piercing eloquence, moreover, this huge, mute city of death addressed Claire. Many noted family names had of late passed into her memory, as those of people whom it would be safe, wise, politic to know; and she saw at once exactly what it all means. . . . Here's that dear Manhattan of mine. He has got our carriage. Shall I remain with you till your husband reappears? . . . Very well; I will. But this is no place in which to talk over the whole odd, interesting thing. I'll try and drop in upon you soon; possibly to-morrow, if I can manage it. Does Manhattan see us? Just observe how stupidly he stares about everywhere but here. He's been a little strange and absent-minded all the evening. I really think he's forgotten where he left me. He smokes too many of those strong, horrid cigars, don't you know? I truly believe that they cloud his brain half the time . . . but then it's better he should smoke too much than think too much. I don't know what I should do if the dear fellw drank too much!"

Mrs. Diggs did present herself at Claire's house on the following day. But Claire was not at home. She had driven out in company with her husband.

It was a momentous drive. They had left home together at about one o'clock. Claire had no idea whither they were going at first. Hollister had chosen to assume an air of profound mysticism. "I have a great surprise for you," he said.

There was no characteristic twinkle in his eye as he made this statement. Claire felt that he was far from saddened, and yet his gravity looked an undoubted fact.

"I will accompany you blindly," she said, just before they entered the carriage. "I suppose, however, there are some more jewels at Tiffany's which you want me to see and choose from."

"No," said Hollister, shaking his head. "I shouldn't spend nearly a whole day away from Wall Street for anything of that sort."

The carriage had soon passed Tiffany's by a considerable distance, in what we call the downward direction. As its progress increased Claire's curiosity heightened, but for some time she gave no proof of this. Her talk was of their new attainments, of their growing pastimes, pleasures, and luxuries. She spoke often with a slightly unfamiliar speed; it was a little habit that of late had come upon her; it betrayed gentle excitement in place of previous composure. West Zorra.

On Thursday of last week quite a number of the property holders of the townships of West Zorra and East Nissouri and the Village of Embro, met for the purpose of forming a home fire insurance company.

Belmont.

Burglars forced an entrance into the house of A. McDonald, Belmont, Thursday. Entering a bedroom they broke open a trunk, taking $30 in cash and a silver watch, besides a gold ring and a pair of gold earrings belonging to Miss McDonald. Two men were afterwards seen walking down the C. V. R. track, which runs alongside the house, but no clue has been obtained to their identity.

Dickson's Corners.

The Sabbath School will open again on the first Sabbath in May.

The members of I. O. G. T. in conjunction with the Sabbath School are making an effort to raise sufficient means to purchase an organ to be used in connection with their proceedings. There is no doubt but that an organ would add much interest to the singing in the Sabbath School, and would be exceedingly convenient when tea-meetings and other social gatherings are held in the hall. About fifty dollars have already been raised for this object.

Avon.

Miss Emma Cook is visiting friends in Norwich and Dereham.

Rev. Mr. Cridland, of Belmont, preached here last Sunday night.

Rev. Mr. Griffin is attending conference at Strathroy.

Mr. Daniel Groat had a narrow escape from being killed last week. As he was going to Egan's sawmill, his team took fright throwing Mr. Groat out of the wagon one of the hind wheels ran over his head cutting it badly and bruising his side, but he is now able to attend his work again. No damage done only breaking the reach of the wagon.

West Oxford.

Mr. Hezekiah Wilson has been appointed engineer in West Oxford to carry out the act, respecting ditches and watercourses, passed in 1883.

Some time since the Council of West Oxford passed a by-law for the purpose of encouraging the planting of shade trees in the Township, in pursuance of the provisions of the "Ontario Tree Planting Act 1883." At their last meeting they appointed Mr. Wm. Rivers inspector of trees so planted. If farmers and others avail themselves of the encouragement so promptly made by the Council it will be the means of not only beautifying the many homesteads, but enhance their value and result in the many advantages derived from trees.

Millers! bewars of imposters. There is a party making his tour through the country putting on any amount of presumption, that he wants to buy mills and farms, or to rent. He is a small fellow, his forehead declining, giving the back part of his head a peculiar prominence. This fellow, who calls himself a miller, has proved himself to be a fraud on the public. Through his inigitous misrepresentation, succeeded in renting a mill in this part. The landlord, thinking he might be what he was representing himself to be, give him extra time in paying his rent. When the second quarters rent came due, he disposed of his stuff by magic and took an early excursion somewhere between one and three o'clock in the morning to parts unknown.

The burial of Mr. James Nichol and the daughter of Mr. Snell of Centreville, took place at the West Oxford C. M. church, near Geo. Galloway's on Sunday afternoon. The services were conducted by Rev. Mr. Hunt, of Salford, assisted by Rev. Mr. Moore. The two processions met at the junction of the Centreville and old Stage Road, and reached nearly to the church, only about one half of those in attendance could obtain admittance to the services in the church. Rev. Mr. Hunt preached a very impressive sermon which could not fail to come down to each and everyone present. Seldom if ever, was there so large a concourse of people assembled at this quiet little country church, which presents such a pleasing rural appearance, and is surrounded by so many associations connected with early settlement of West Oxford. Many of the earliest of Oxford's pioneers lie in the grave yard adjoining the church which stands on the site of one of the oldest if not the oldest church in this county. Mr. Nichols' only son returned from California a few days before his father's death, but was taken down with the measels and was unable to attend the funeral.

Tilsonburg.

A cricket club will be organized shortly, in this town. Out door games will be all the rage in Tilsonburg this year.

The band boys are endeavouring to raise sufficient funds to procure a tasty uniform. It is to be sincerely hoped that our citizens will "come down handsomely,"and not act niggardly with the boys. Since the warm weather has set in, they play publicly every Friday evening.

At a late meeting of the Council it was decided that the business portion of the town be provided with street lamps. This is a most commendable move, as the town was sadly in need of having its principal business thoroughfare properly illuminated.

Thuraday, May 3rd, has been set apart by our Council as "Arbor Day," for tree planting in the town. This is the first time that such a move has been made, and it is to be hoped that the citizens generally will grasp the opportunity and zealously endeavour to provide for the future adornment of the town.

At last we are to have a new lockup. Recent developments have plainly shown our town fathers that the present miserable structure is of no earthly use for such a purpose. A committee has been appointed to prepare plans and specifications, and, no doubt, in a short time we will have a substantial building that will defy the efforts of the most cunning and skilful of prisoners to procure egress.

An enthusiastic and largely attended meeting of the Eureka Lacrosse Club, of this place, was held in the Royal Alfred Hotel the other evening. The officers elected for the present season are as follows; President, A. B. Cameron; Sec.-Treas., L. Merrill; Capt., F. Ferguson; Committee, W. Hillman, T. H. Mathews, L. Burn, and Warren Armstrong. Correspondence is solicited from the various junior lacrosse clubs in the district.

An exceedingly well-attended meeting of the Shamrock Lacrosse Club was held in the Liberal office last Monday evening. Considerable discussion took place respecting the former name of the club, and after the various pros and cons had been advanced on both sides, it was resolved that the club be known hereafter as the Oxford Lacrosse Club, of Tilsonsburg. The following are the various officers elected:—Hon. President, R. C. Scott; 1st Hon. Vice-Pres., P. G. Bromley; 2nd Hon. Vice-Pres., W. J. Bodman; President, Wm. McGuire; Sec., A. B. Cameron; Treas., C. S. Ferguson; Captain, F. Hillman; Managing Committee, F. B. Tillson, J. C. Ross, John McIntyre, Chas. Thomson, W. Gray, M. Bain, M. D. Crooker, including President, Secretary, Treasurer, and Captain. The prospects for the season are exceedingly favourable, and they would like very much to arrange friendly matches with the various Lacrosse Clubs in the vicinity.

Kintore.

Mrs. Hall is seriously ill.

Wheat is looking well in this vicinity.

Business is booming in our blacksmith shop.

Some of our farmers are busy at ploughing.

Mr. John Sims lost a valuable horse a few days ago.

Mr. James Watts has taken the milk route again this coming summer.

Mr. J. Alderson is building an extensive log stable.

Mr. William Towle is about to raise a large driving shed.

R. E. Towle paid us a visit last week, but will leave for Ingersoll to-day to resume his studies.

Many friends of Mrs. F. Thurton will be sorry to hear of her long illness still continuing.

Mr. Joe Howes left for Manitoba last week to seek his fortune. We wish you success, Joe.

Mr. A. Hughes has completed his wire fence by erecting a beautiful wire gate which adds much to the appearance of his place.

Mr. Gilbert Towle is about erecting an excellent brick house. We are pleased to notice so many young men preparing material for new residents. "Hallo boys" leap year is showing good results.

Mr. Matthew Steele, of Petrolia, died at the residence of Mr. Andrew Logan, in his 41st year. Deceased was formerly a resident of this township, and was highly respected. His remains were followed to their last resting place by a large concourse of friends.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Foreign and Domestic.

BIG FALL IN STOCKS.

On rumors of a large failure the Montreal stock market was very weak this morning. Bank of Montreal sold at 11½ per cent. less than Saturday's prices, prices, Merchants', 1 per cent., Commerce opened at 124½ and sold down to 121¾, Bank of Toronto declined 1 per cent.

THE ST. THOMAS RIOT AND MURDER.

The adjourned inquest on the death of Antonio Marlotte, the Italian laborer, was concluded at St. Thomas on Saturday when the jury returned a verdict that deceased was murdered by one of the prisoners now in custody, whose names are Thomas Gilligan, Thomas Fahey, James Curley, Ed. McFadden, Pat. Flanigan, Michael Hannigan, Andrew O'Brien, Thos. Flanigan, Martin Joyce, T. Baker and Jas. Gilligan, and that, as all acted in concert, they were all accessories to the crime. The accused were accordingly committed.

THE FASTEST ON RECORD.

The Guion steamer Oregon arrived at New York from Liverpool on Saturday evening, having completed the voyage from Queenstown in six days, ten hours, thirty minutes, the best on record either from Queenstown to this city or the other way. Her record beats that of the steamer Alaska, of the same line, known as the "Greyhound of the Atlantic," by eleven hours and ten minutes for the westward voyage, and excels the latter's eastward record by eight hours and seven minutes.

THE QUEEN'S ILLNESS.

The illness of Queen Victoria at Darmstadt has given rise to alarm in Great Britain. In all probability the affection is a return of the rheumatic pains which some time ago attacked Her Majesty at Windsor Castle, and rendered her very nervous, at times compelling her physician to resort to hypodermic injections of morphine. It is known that the physicians feared a return of those pains on account of the danger of exciting the sciatic nerve, which, in persons who in other respects do not possess excellent health, is the fatal point in gout, from which the Queen has for years suffered. Her Majesty appears to have had a turn for the better, for she was out driving yesterday.

Cause of Prince Leopold's Death.

Letters from Cannes state that the Duke of Albany's death was hastened by the fast pace of his life at Nice and Monaco. The day before his death he spent four hours at the Monaco gaming tables, where he suffered heavy losses. The atmosphere was stifling, the crowd dense and excited. The Duke was pressed upon and shoved about by the crowd and became greatly excited. Social dissipation of this nature was new to him. The reaction set in the evening of the night in which the fatal attack accurred.

From a pecuniary ponit of view the Duchess of Albany is left in a comfortable position. She has the dowry voted by Parliament, which amounts to £6,000 a year. The Duke was very careful in the management of his financial affairs, so that he was enabled to settle upon the Duchess by his will a further yearly sum of £2,000, and leave her also a sufficient sum for keeping up Claremont. The court mourning has been ordered to continue for six weeks instead of two months. The shorter time was decided upon out of consideration for the London trade, which would suffer seriously in case nothing but blackshould be worn throughout the season.

Despite the painfully fulsome and ridiculously prolix articles in the papers about the Duke of Albany' the truth with regard to the circumstances of his death is creeping out. It is now universally acknowledged that the Prince is dead because he was allowed, for the first time in his life, to go out alone on a spree, Intoxicated with his unusual freedom, and accustomed all his life to revolt against the idea that he was an invalid, he lived as fast as he could, danced furiously, stopped up all night, drank pretty freely, and so brought on a fatal fit of that epilepsy from which he suffered all his life. Labouchere, in the Truth, is the only journalist who tells even a little of the real facts, and he goes so far as to express regret that the sickly Prince was ever allowed to marry.

NEWS NOTES.

G. T. R. employes at Montreal and other places have accepted a five per cent. reduction for six months.

Mrs. Godman is charged with stealing valuable plumes from the establishment of A. R. Kerr & Co., Hamilton.

Two feet of snow is reported in the Maine woods yet. Great anxiety is felt by lumbermen.

Dr. Walker T. Davis, convicted of the murder of Munday for the purpose of securing $27,000 insurance, has been sentenced to imprisonment for life at Versailles, Ky.

A young lady of personal attractions, and the wealthy daughter of a respectable Irish gentleman, disappeared from her home, in a village in the eastern townships, and has not been heard from.

The canton of Glaris, Switzerland, abolished capital punishment a few years ago. The experiment has not proved satisfactory, and the Government has decided by a large majority to re-introduce it.

A sect is said to have been discovered in Rostov, South Russia, who poison children with narcotics. It was founded by a woman who murdered her children in order to relieve them from earthly suffering and procure a celestial happiness.

Two students of University College challenged each other to an egg-eating contest on Sunday. One of them ate eighteen and the other two dozen hard-boiled eggs. Both fools are very ill, and under medical care.

Three dramatic scenes stand out from the gloom of Prince Leopold's death. One is the meeting of Empress Eugenie and Queen Victoria at Windsor. Another is the presence of the Prince of Wales on the Aintree race course watching the running of his own horse, The Scot, in the Grand National, while his aide-de-camp stood waiting to give him the news. The third is the reception of the Irish gentleman who applauded when Lord Hartington made the announcement in the House of Commons.

Earthquake in England.

London, April 22.—At 9:30 this morning an earthquake shock was felt in the eastern counties of England. At Ipswich the houses were shaken, plates were rattled, and bells rung. The people were thrown into such a consternation that business was suspended.

The shock was still more severe at Colchester. The concusion lasted half a minute. The first symptom was a deep rumbling sound; this was speedily followed by the quaking and shaking of all buildings and the fall of all chimney stacks of factories. Other lofty structures were destroyed. The spire of one of the largest churches in the city, 150 feet high, fell with an awful crash.

DESPICABLE OUTRAGE.

Malicious Damage Done in the Stratford "Times" Office.

Stratford, April 18.—Last night some persons unknown entered the Times printing office here and pied all the type in the place, including every case and all the forms in advertisements and jobs. Mr. H. T. Butler, who is the editor and publisher, attributes the outrage to personal spite, and not as the result of party or sectional feeling. He is deputy reeve of the town, and thinks perhaps some action of his in the Council may have led to the dastardly affair, but is unable at present to lay his finger on the guilty party. Entrance was had by a window, which was forced open. The loss is estimated at $1,500.

SUBSTANTIAL EXPRESSION ON SYMPATHY.

In accordance with the wish of a number of citizens, the Mayor called a public meeting for this evening to consider the best steps to be taken regarding the gross outrage committed. His Worship Mayor Gordon introduced the object of the meeting, and called upon gentlemen present who desired to address the meeting upon the subject. A number of prominent gentlemen addressed the meeting, and all spoke in favour of showing their sympathy in a substantial manner.

The following resolutions were passed by the meeting:—

"That this meeting desire to express their abhorrence of the outrage perpetrated in the Times office last night and their sympathy with Mr. Butler in the loss he has sustained thereby." Carried.

"That the Council be requested to offer a reward of $500 to be paid to the person giving information that will lead to the conviction of the party or parties who committed the outrage in the Times office on the night of the 17th inst." Carried.

At the close of the meeting a subscription list was opened, and about $300 subscribed.

Washington Letter.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

Washington, April 14, 1884.

The question of a revival of the right of suffrage in the district of Columbia has been much agitated of late. It has been claimed in behalf of the movement that the disorderly element that used to "make things howl" on election days has been eliminated—scattered through the country, and that a better voting class has taken place. On every occasion, however, when there has been a chance to do any voting, the result has shown that the same rowdy element remains here and is ready to come to the front on the slightest encouragement.

Joseph Medill of the Chicago Tribune, one of the most distinguished editors in the West, has been in Washington all the week, and his visit has been the cause of considerable concern among politicians and presidential aspirants. Mr. Medill's political career has been very eccentric; and, recognizing accountability to no one, he feels at liberty to change his mind and shift his political anchorage wherever he likes. In 1868 Medill supported Grant for the presidency; in 1872 he abandoned him and went over to the Liberals in support of Greeley; and in 1876 he fought Blaine with the greatest bitterness. He started out in this campaign giving a hearty support to Logan, but since he came to Washington he has abandoned Logan and joined the Blaine boomers, giving Logan's friends a fit of the blues. This conquest of Mr. Blaine is the result of the "personal magnetism" about which so much has been said.

Considerable agitation has lately been given to the subject of Mr. Blaine's pecuniary accumulations. He was worth at least a quarter of a million dollars when he entered Congress in 1863, and he has been engaged in many good enterprises since that time. He bought productive coal lands near Pittsburgh, besides other good property, to invest his money in, and his judgement has rarely been at fault in such matters. Then, the rental of his new mansion at the head of Massachusett avenue to Mr. Leiter, the Chicago millionaire, was a bit of economy not barren in results.

Lent is over. The heart of the great social life of the Capital is freed from religious restraint and begins to throb with its wonted energy. Holy week was very strictly observed, and Washington society devoted itself to penitence and prayer. So much so that it seemed the more quiet after the half-gay Lenten weeks, in which there was no exciting Terpsichorean whirl, but just enough dinner parties, musicales and teas, for real enjoyment.

April 21, 1884.

The first skirmish in the tariff battle in the house scored a victory of the Morrison forces, though the motion to consider the bill only passed by a majority of two votes. But in politics it is eminently true that nothing succeeds like success, and it is argued that while a bare majority of two means nothing in itself in the House, the moral effect of this vote on the tariff will be considerable. If Mr. Randall had won the fight by even a small margin, the would have showed his power so plainly as to leave no doubt of his leadership. That he failed, although by a very little, it is believed by some will hurt his prestige. The first fruits of the vote to take up the Morrison tariff bill appeared in the shape of a list of ninety-two members who have notified Chairman Cox that they wish to deliver speeches on the subject. This will open the flood gates from the capitol to the Government printing office, and the employes of the latter establishment will enjoy a prosperous spring. The Congreational Record will swell out of all proportion, and tons of talk will be printed and dumped on the country at large. Then, after all, the bill may possibly be abutated at the neck by the passage of a motion to strike out the enacting clause; or be adopted in a more or less altered shape and then hung up to die of neglect in the Senate. But certainly no person at this stage can definitely forecast the fate of tariff legislation for the session. For a long time there have been rumors floating about among Democratic Congressmen of some attempt which it was said would be made to harmonize the factions warring on the tariff question. And it now turns out that the offer of a compromise was actually made to Messrs. Morrison and Carlisle, in which, according to my informant Mr. Randall concurred. The proposition was that if the Morrison horizontal reduction were abandoned they would support a bill reducing duties wherever they ought to be reduced, and at the same taking off the tax on tobacco and native brandies. But the tariff reform leaders intimated that while they might have entertained this proposition had it come sooner, they felt compelled to reject it because it came too late. They said it would take months to prepair such a bill and bring it to vote in the House. There are, however, those who think that a compromise might be arranged pending the debate on the Morrison bill, which is sure to last several weeks, and that a comparatively simple bill, taking off the tobacco tax and that on fruit spirits, enlarging the free list, and making reductions in a number of the tariff schedules could get a larger vote in the House than Mr. Morrison's bill can.

The Senate was active the past week. Commencing with the Naval appropriation bill, which it increased $6,528,080, measures were passed in quick order. It would seem that the Senate has of late years become the business member of the federal legislature, and that the House, as a law-making machine, has completly broken down. The Senate in the course of a session usually manages to turn off a fair amount of work, in spite of its besetting sin of verbosity, but the House seems less conscientious. It is now only the latter part of April, and the members of the Lower House already talk wistfully of adjournment, though scarcely a single subject of serious importance on which legitimate differerences of opinion exist, outside of the money bills, has reached a vote. In fact, not one piece of affirmative legislation of importance has been added to the statutes by this Congress. The electoral count, the refunding bills, the coinage, the Mormon question, the shipping interest, the bankruptcy bill, the relief of the Supreme Court, the disputed land bill, reform in the diplomatic and consular systems, the admission of various territories as states, our isthmus policy, the postal telegraph question, and many other matters lie in indiscriminate and hopeless bondage in the prison-houses of the calendars. The situation is in a great measure explained in that the House is paralized in its functions by a set of obsolete and unjust rules, which render it almost impossible to secure proper consideration of important measures.

Among the many subjects now in the toils of our tireless investigators, none attract more attention, now that the Keifer-Boynton imbroglio is over and the Star Route secrets are warming, than the second investigation of the Jeanette scandal. Just exactly what Congress expects to gain by this dreary recital of arctic woes it is difficult to see. The survivors of the expedition and the widow of the gallant Commander are brought together daily, and witnesses are raked over by the fine tooth comb of cross-examination by two expert lawyers, to show up what temporary bickerings, little instinctive jealousies, swearing or harsh words now and then came to pass. No one supposed that the Jeannette heroes were a party of flawless saints, and poor justice to draw their foibles out of the tomb.

THE MIDDLEMISS MURDER.

Startling Developments and Further Arrests Expected.

St. Thomas, April 22.—Some startling developments are expected in connection with the murder of Grant Silcox at Middlemiss. Jas. Scott, a young man of the neighborhood, has confessed, implicating a well-known resident of the village. Further arrests are expected.

The trial of Wrightman and Graham, the men who actually committed the murder takes place on May 2.

THE EGYPTIAN TROUBLE.

How Gordon Views His Abandonment by the British Government—2,000 Men, Women and Children Massacred—General Gordon Believes the Time for Retreating Has Arrived.

London, April 21.—The Foreign Consuls at Khartoum report, April 9th that Gordon considers the time for retreating has arrived. Gordon will send with Col. Stewart and Vice Consul Power, who are to return to Lower Egypt, via Abyssinia, all foreigners who choose to accompany them. Gordon has himself no intention of retiring. He hopes England will yet send him aid.

THE MASSACRE NEAR SHENDY.

The Paris Figaro's correspondent at Cairo sends details of the recent Shendy massacre. Three hundred Egyptian troops and 600 non-combatants, preferring to make a hazardous attempt to march to Barber to starving inside Shendy, set out from the latter place on the 15th inst. Part of the number went slowly by steamer down the river, while others marched along the river bank. When two hours distance from Shendy they were attacked by Arabs, and after a short fight all the troops, excepting a few, were massacred. The Arabs, afterward captured Shendy. Egyptian troops there have discarded arms and uniforms in the hope of being spared. Few, however, escaped the general massacre. Ten thousand men, women and children were slaughtered. Many of them were refugees from Khartoum.

THE ABANDONMENT OF GORDON.

General Gordon has sent a telegram to Evelyn Baring, expressing the utmost indignation at the manner in which he has been abandoned by the English Government, and saying henceforth he will cut himself adrift from those who have deserted him, on whom will rest the blood guiltiness of all lives heretofore lost in Soudan. It is believed the Government has determined to dispatch the utmost available forces of all arms of the Egyptian army to Khartoum. It is hoped the force will be ready to start in six weeks.

A Free Concert.

Buffalo Telegraph.

The Salvation army paraded Saturday night. Two female officers with voices like the screech of a door, headed the solemn procession. There were about twenty converts in the procession singing lustily. In front of the soldiers' monument the band at Lang's Adelphi struck up a tune in one key and the Salvationists a tune in another. Then the street dogs began to howl and seek refuge from the awful mixture of sounds in fight. A female Indian tobacco sign fainted and a fakir selling a patent plating stuff gathered up his traps and stole down Broadway. The reign of terror soon ended and people crawled out of their holes to resume business.

Messrs. MACKINTOSH & PETERS beg to announce that they have arranged to hold a series of Auction Sales as above, and now invite immediate entries for them.
LAND HOLDERS, FARMERS, OWNERS OF MILLS, FOUNDRIES, and OTHER PROPERTY will find this a ready and satisfactory way of selling their property. The several properties will be offered subject to an upset price or unreservedly, at the option of the owner.

Briefly put, our plan is to secure entries of lands in all parts of Ontario, and to sell them by public auction to the highest bidder, subject to an upset, or unreservedly, as we may be authorized, the sales to be held at the different County Towns in June next.
With each entry we charge a fee of $10, payable in advance, to cover the entire expenses for advertising. 2 per cent. on the first $2500; 1½ per cent. on the second $2500; 1 per cent. on any amount over $5000. Commission will be claimed if property is sold at private sale to a purchaser of our finding.
☞ No charge whatever if no sale is made. Parties desiring to put their property into these sales should make the entries at once, as catalogues must be out shortly. For terms and fuller information, apply to

TOWN NEWS.

YESTERDAY was St. George's anniversary.

SHARP frosts on Sunday and Monday nights.

ODDFELLOWS' CONCERT to-morrow (Friday) evening.

SEATS for the I. O. O. F. Concert may be reserved at Richardson's jewelry shop.

REMEMBER, the High School entertainment will be held Friday evening, May 2nd. Particulars next week.

ACCIDENT.—Mrs. W. T. Root, Oxford St., had the misfortune to fall and dislocate her wrist on Friday evening.

THE STREETS.—The dust has commenced to fly. That petition for the water cart should be circulated at once.

A THOROUGHBRED.—Mr. S. Caldwell of Brantford has purchased a thoroughbred mare from Mr. D. Choate of Ingersoll.

ADDRESS.—F. W. Merchant's address before the Teachers' Convention, crowded out last week, appears on the fourth page of of this issue.

JOURNALISTIC.—The London Advertiser in its new dress is one of the best looking as well as one of the most ably conducted newspapers in Canada.

TUG OF WAR.—Arrangements are being made to have a tug of war between a picked team from Woodstock and Ingersoll, on the 24th of May, also between a team from Zorra and the London policeman.

ENTERTAINMENT.—An entertainment will be shortly given by the young folks of the B. C. Church, at which the prominent feature will be Hawkins' Celebrated Jubilee Singers, of London. Look out for further particulars.

TELEPHONE CONTRACTS VALID.—Chief-Justice Hagarty has decided that contracts made by telephone are valid. A great deal of business is now transacted by telephone and this decision may prove both satisfactory and convenient.

THE ONTARIO MUTUAL.—The annual meeting of the members of this well known company was held on Wednesday of last week. There was a large attendance. The report was a most favorable one, showing a surplus on the year's operations of $44,000.

KNOX CHURCH.—We would remind our Presbyterian and other friends, that the Rev. John Thompson, of Sarnia, will preach on Sunday, 27th inst., morning and evening, in Knox church which in accordance with the decision of the presbytery of Paris, will be open for service as usual.

AT a trial of new paragon hose, on Tuesday evening, on Noxon's hydrant, with a 1⅛ nozzle and 175lb. water pressure, water was thrown the great distance of 300 feet. The trial was made under the superintendence of T. H. Noxon, assisted by Chief Vance and Assistant Chief Matheson.

LIQUOR LICENSES.—The Ontario license commissioners of the South Riding of Oxford met Wednesday and Thursday of last week and granted all licenses applied for by those who held licenses last year with the exception of two. They meet again on the 30th inst. to consider the advisability of granting new licenses.

I. O. O. F.—The 65th anniversary of Oddfellowship in America was duly observed by the fraternity of this town attending in a body the Baptist Church on Sabbath last, on which occasion the pastor Rev. Mr. Speller, preached an excellent discourse based upon the text, "Bear ye one another's burdens."

WON'T PAY.—The date of the Toronto semi-centennial has been changed from the 17th June to the 30th., with the object of taking in two holidays, namely the 1st and 4th July. A better step to assist in making the affair a failure could not have been taken, as but few from a distance would wish to visit that city when wearing a funereal aspect, as it must naturally do when all places of business are closed.

SCOTTISH GAMES.—The Caledonian Society of Ingersoll will hold their annual games this year on Monday, 26th May. They are already making extensive preparations for the day's sports, which promise to be the best yet held by the Society. The prizes will be handsome and will no doubt attract many professionals, as well as crack amateurs to the sports. A. G. Hodge, of St. James' Hotel, Toronto, will conduct the games. For the concert in the evening they are securing some of the best talent in the land.

A GREAT CHANCERY CASE.—Mr. James F. McDonald, Barrister, returned home from Winnipeg, on Monday, with a very big feather in his cap—having secured a verdict for his client in the celebrated land suit of Hymen vs. Bennett. This case which has been pending in the Court of Chancery for some years past, was heard before Mr. Justice Taylor, on Tuesday of last week, and a decision rendered in favour of the defendent, for whom the case had been ably conducted throughout by Mr. McDonald. Nearly a million dollars was involved in the case.

QUARTERLY meeting services of the B. C. Church, Oxford Street, were held last Sabbath. On Tuesday evening the quarterly business meeting was held, being the last prior to the new order of things which will be effected by the Union. Notwithstanding the serious drawbacks met with during the past year, the financial showing proved quite satisfactory and encouraging. A resolution was unanimously carried urging Conference to allow the pastor Rev. R. B. Rowe to remain here another year. The resolution also strongly attested to the earnest and faithful services rendered by the above gentleman.

TREE PLANTING.—We would suggest that the Council be asked to set apart some day about the end of the present month, proclaim it a public holiday, and request the citizens to unite in planting trees on the streets. If every ratepayer would on this day plant, or cause to be planted, one tree for each member of his family, the result would be most surprising, and the effort cost him comparatively little labor or expense. In some of the Western States "Arbor Day" is now a great institution. It is an anniversary devoted to tree-planting, and of late years the practice of setting apart a day for that purpose by proclamation has been widely observed.

ERSKINE CHURCH.—The Presbyterian congregation will in accordance with the decision of session and by authority of the Presbytery of Paris, will worship in the Thames Street Church on Sunday, 27th inst. The Rev. H. M. Parsons, who is acknowledged to be one of the ablest preachers in Toronto, will occupy the pulpit morning and evening. The Rev. W. Cochrane, D.D., will deliver his lecture on "Across the Rockies through Salt Lake City to the golden gate of California," on Monday evening, 28th inst., at 8 o'clock. All who wish to hear this Canadian orator will do well to keep free from all engagements for that night. All are cordially invited to attend.

THE PRICE OF BREAD.—London Free Press: Housekeepers in this city are complaining, and apparently with justice, that while the price of wheat has fallen in Chicago and other American markets to the lowest point touched in twenty years, flour dealers have increased the price of that article 25c. per cwt., and bakers, following in the wake, have raised the price of bread one cent, per two-pound loaf. In Montreal a co-operative bakery is talked of unless an immediate concession in the price of bread is made. Toronto World: "No wonder that the press is being aroused to come out on this subject. The contrast between cheap wheat and dear bread in Canada at this time is actually phenomenal, and should stir the public to such action as remedy a crying evil. The public are certainly being robbed by somebody, we want to know whether it is the flour men or the bakers who are getting away with 'the boodle.'"

NEED OF POOR HOUSES.—Mr. Justice Osler, at the Halton assizes, spoke strongly in favor of the establishment of county poor-houses and the evil effects of confining in jail, as is the case in this county, persons charged with vagrancy. The jail, he said, was not the place for those who were unwilling to work and earn their own living. He approved of the plan adopted by several of the County Councils of purchasing farms and erecting poor-houses where vagrants could be sent and compelled to work, and where they would not be a burden upon the country. Such an institution he thought was a growing necessity in several counties. In Norfolk and Waterloo they had these institutions and in the county of York they had recently taken steps to provide such a place. When will his Lordship be able to point to Oxford as one of the enlightened and progressive counties which has provided one of these much-needed homes for the destitute and unfortunate?

CLEAN up!

CLEAN up your yards!

CLEAN up your cellars!

CLEANLINESS is next to politics—and a long way ahead.

ODDFELLOWS' CONCERT to-morrow (Friday) night.

THE town loses $450 revenue this year owing to the change made in the license law.

GRANT'S PACKING HOUSE.—Messrs. J. L. Grant & Co., are erecting a large addition to their extensive pork packing establishment.

THOROUGHBRED FOWLS.—Mr. Charles Edwards exhibited several coops of fine bred fowls at the fair last week. He advertises eggs for hatching elsewhere.

THE old Mechanics' Institute of Berlin has passed a resolution to transfer all the personal property to the town for the purpose of a free library.

STALLION SOLD.—Mr. J. C. Norsworthy has sold his three-year-old stallion to Mr. W. Dempster, of Boone, Iowa, formerly of this town, for $400. The colt was sired by "Milesian."

THE Ontario & Quebec R. R. now run new and elegant Wagner Sleeping Cars through from Toronto to Chicago and vice versa on the trains leaving Ingersoll, going east, 5:50 a.m., and going west 4:42 p.m.

FOR THE WEST.—About forty passengers passed westward over the Credit Valley and C. S. R. yesterday, bound for the Prairie Province. They went via the Chicago & Northwestern.

LARGE SHIPMENT.—Mr. A. Armstrong, of this town is about to ship 45 yearling bulls to Kansas City for ranching purposes, all being pedigreed stock that cost him an avarage of $88 each.

REMOVAL.—Mr. Wilton is moving his cigar factory from Ingersoll back to Tilsonburg. He has rented Mr. R. H. Burke's old tinshop on Broadway, near the overhead bridge, and is fitting it up.

HYMENIAL.—Mr. Alex. W. Murdoch, of Murdoch & Woolson, grocers, was yesterday united in marriage to Miss Jennie Nicholson, of Hamilton. They left on the afternoon train for the West, on a short trip. We wish our old friend Alex. and his bride every happiness.

WOODSTOCK CONSTABLE.—Constable Donald Smith, of the Hamilton police force, has been appointed Chief Constable of Woodstock. There were thirty applicants for the position. Smith has some reputation as a hammer thrower and all round athlete.

No advanced boy is esteemed a boy of any parts unless he carries a revolver. After this parents must be careful and cautious how and where they chastise their hopeful sons. The hand of authority may strike on the pistol pocket and another "didn't-know-it-was-loaded" item set on the rounds.

THE FRUIT CROP.—According to a prominent fruit grower in the Niagara district, the peach trees have been almost all killed down, as far as the snow line, which signifies that the present bearing trees are entirely destroyed; but the yearlings will send up vigorous shoots and make strong, healthy trees (by cutting them off near the ground) for next year, as the roots are perfectly sound.

SIGNS OF SPRING.—We have been visited already by many of the feathered songsters, which announces that spring is not far away. The robins, blue birds, brown thrushes, black birds, meadow larks, and hawkes have been seen in numbers this week. Wild ducks, pigeons, and geese have been in this vicinity also. The festive music of the frogs have been heard for several days past.

TO PURIFY FOUL CISTERNS.—A medical man in the New York Tribune gives his method of deodorizing cisterns that have acquired foul odors. He says that such oxidizing agents as chloride of soda or chlorinated soda will fully serve the purpose. To get the best results the material should be poured into the cistern, using for this purpose a gas pipe reaching to the bottom. Two quart bottles will clean an ordinary cistern, he says.

A Literary Society called "The Young Mens' Literary Society," has been formed by the students of the High School and others of the town. The following officers were elected for the ensuing term, President, N. E. Towle; Secretary-Treasurer, Frank Richardson; Critic, W. Brydon, B. A. Meetings are held every Friday evening, in the Mechanics' Institute. Subject for next evenings debate, Resolved "that Free Trade is better for Canada than Protection."

I. O. O. F. CONCERT.—The Odd Fellows of Ingersoll will celebrate the 65th anniversary of Odd-Fellowship in America by a Concert in the Town Hall, on Monday (24th) evening. Among those who will take part in the programme are Mrs. McCullough, of Hamilton; Miss Malcolmson, Toronto; Mr. W. Skinner, London; Mr. Jas. Johnston, Hamilton; Miss Doty, Miss Poole, Mrs. Chapman and Mr. J. Telfer, Ingersoll; Mrs. J. A. McInnes, Pianist. Tickets 25 cents, reserved seats 10 cents extra, at Richardson's jewelry store.

FROM FORMOSA.—Dr. McKay writes as follows: "On December 29, 1883, I baptised 13 in Tamsui, and we commemorated the dying love of Jesus. Eleven churches on the East Coast are about completed. Girl's school finished and opened; this building is as large as the Oxford College. Both institutions on the ground I purchased before going to America. Upward of 100 Aborigines were at the opening of the Girl's school. Would that thousands in America heard them sing their own mountain airs to our sweet hymns."

ART INTERCHANGE.—The Art Interchange of April 24th will contain a beautiful design in color (13 x 13) of a female head for plaque decoration. It is unlike any decorative head heretofore offered for sale. Against a delicate blue background is shown the nearly profile view of a blond, whose light hair is ornamented by a band of marguerites. In short, the Art Interchange of April 24 promises to be one of the most attractive issues of this valuable art journal. Published by William Whitlock, at 140 Nassau Street, New York.

TO SAVE TREES BARKED BY MICE.—Reports from many sections of the country indicate that mice have proved very destructive to trees during the last winter, by barking them. Almost any small tree thus barked may easily be saved by taking a couple of small shoots or branches of the same species, making a small incision on each side of the tree, just above and below the peeled part, and inserting the ends of the twig in the cuts. If this is carefully done—anyone can do it—communication is provided for the sap to pass up and the tree is saved.

A DEFAULTING CATTLE DEALER.—A great deal of excitement has been caused in East Zorra and the whole district around Tavistock by the flight of Chris. Zehr, a German farmer and cattle dealer, who lived on the 16th line, near that village. For many years past he has in addition to working two hundred acres of land, been an extensive speculator and dealer in live stock. Judging from the rumours circulated about him, he must have succeeded in defrauding most of the people of the whole district—where he was almost universally looked upon as trustworthy. His defalcations are put as high as $50,000.

ST. NICHOLAS.—St. Nicholas for May is a notable number in its contributors and in during his late trip to England and the continent. The Captain, who is a son of Judge Macqueen, of Woodstock, while attending the last camp held on Carling's farm, felt his eyesight failing him. It appears he ruptured a blood-vessel in one eye, and the other sympathizing with the affected orb, there was nothing for it but to undergo an operation, or else lose his sight altogether. When he crossed the ocean and arrived at the office of the celebrated Dr. Liebreich, Prof. Bader, at London, he was informed that it would be necessary for him to have both eyes taken out and a certain operation performed known as the enlarging of the pupil. The Captain willingly underwent the operation, and so much pleased was the Professor with his patient that he sent him bandaged up over to his palatial residence on the Rhine, to be there tended and nursed. The first intimation of returning sight, and the first object seen by Capt. Macqueen was the spire of the cathedral of Cologne. Ever since, his sight has been gaining strength, and so fully has he recovered that a few days ago he was appointed range officer for the approaching rifle tournament for the Western district, so that his confidence in his scope of vision is attaining a wide range. The only difference the operation made on the captain was to increase the size of the pupils to about eight or ten times their original size.

Town Council.

A special meeting of the Town Council was held on Monday evening for general business.

Members present: His Worship the Mayor in the chair, Messrs. Richardson, O'Connor, Seldon, Gibson, Nelles, Waterhouse, Walley, Henderson and Buchanan.

A letter from H. E. Suckling, C. V. R'y. in answer to report of Railway committee stating that the company had not earned sufficient to pay the interest on debenture stock held by this town.

Moved by Mr. Buchanan seconded by Mr. O'Connor and resolved that the names of Messrs. Horsman and O'Connor be added to the committee appointed to draft agreement with committee of the N. and W. Oxford Agricultural Society in reference to the occupation of Victoria Park for agricultural purposes.

Council adjourned.

Wedding Bells.

Yesterday morning the Church of the Sacred Heart was the scene of a large gathering, the occasion being the marriage of Miss Emma Smith, the third daughter of Mr. Andrew Smith, to Mr. J. P. O'Neill, of Woodstock. The ceremony, which was performed by the Rev. Father Molphy, took place at 9.30 a. m. The bride was given away by her father. The bridesmaids were Miss Josie Smith, sister of the bride, and Miss Martha O'Neill. The groomsmen were Mr. J. O'Neill and Mr. J. F. O'Neill, of Woodstock. The bride was dressed in elegant bronze plush and ottoman cord silk, with diamonds and natural flowers for ornaments.

The bridesmaids wore bronze ottoman satin.

Solemn high mass was sung at the church by Mrs. Watson, Miss Keating, Miss Doty, and Miss McDonald. A solo sung by Miss McDonald at the offertory of the mass was particularly well rendered.

At the conclusion of the ceremony the bridal party repaired to the residence of the bride's father for breakfast, at which over forty-five guests sat down. The bride was the recipient of many handsome and useful presents, the groom's present being a pair of handsome gold bracelets.

The newly wedded couple left on the afternoon train for Detroit and the principal cities of the West for their wedding tour. They will in future reside in Woodstock, where Mr. O'Neill is engaged in business.

The following address accompanied by a handsome cake basket was presented to Miss Smith, on Tuesday evening, by the choir of which she was a member:

Dear Miss Smith;

Your friends meet you here to-night for a twofold purpose, the less agreeable part of which is to bid you good-bye.

It were scarcely just to mar the pleasure of this evening with regrets, yet we cannot refrain from expressing to you our sorrow at losing so amiable a companion, and so valuable an assistant. But we must not dwell on the painful portion of our task, but hasten to tend to you our hearts' best wishes for your happiness in the new sphere of life in which you will soon find yourself. We trust that your pathway through this world may be smooth, obstructed only by such bars and crotchets as may be surmounted by singing a good song.

In requesting you to accept this little souvenir, we would ask that it may sometimes act as a reminder of the many pleasant days spent with the choir at Ingersoll.

Personal.

Miss Malcolmson, of Toronto, is visiting her sister, Mrs. Skene, in this town.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Baker of Toronto, are visiting friends in Ingersoll.

Mrs. J. Johnson of Ridgetown, is visiting friends in town and vicinity.

Mr. W. C. Noxon left on Saturday for a week's stay in Chicago.

Mr. W. Robinson, G. T. R. agent here, left for Kansas City on Saturday, on a business trip.

Mr. C. C. L. Wilson, of J. L. Grant & Co., left for Utica yesterday, on a business trip.

Miss Lucy McCarty returned from Toronto on Tuesday where she has been visiting for some time.

Mack Howes, proprietor of "The Brunswick" house, Winnipeg, and a former resident of this county, called on us yesterday.

Mr. Fred H. Silli, formerly a student of the grammar school here, who is now teaching school at Arkona, was home to see his friends last week.

We are pleased to know that Mr. W. C. Bell, who has been ill for some weeks past, is now on the mend. His many friends hope to see him on the street again very soon.

Mr. R. J. Drummond left on Tuesday for Utica, N.Y., to buy cheese for Messrs. J. L. Grant & Co., of Ingersoll. Mr. Drummond is one of the best cheese makers of this district, having been engaged in some of our leading factories. We wish him every success.

We are very sorry to hear of the protracted illness of the Rev. J. Reynolds, pastor of the M. E. Church. The rev. gentleman has worked hard during his pastorate in this town, and now that he is laid aside, and considering events of late, no doubt his many friends will embrace this opportunity of showing all regard and helpfulness possible to relieve his mind of all anxiety concerning his work. His condition is, we fear, precarious.

NEW SCHOOL SYSTEM.—Referring to the proposal to institute the half-time system for children in the primary classes of the public school, an exchange says: Probably the best way to meet the case would be to shorten the hours of all under 7 or 8; to allow them longer time on the playground, and to adopt during the rest of the time methods of instruction on the kindergarten principle, which would convey simple lessons without taxing the capacity of the scholars severely.

WHY HE DOES NOT ATTEND.—St. Thomas Times: Mayor Horton is by virtue of his position ex-officio a member of all committees. He, however, never avails himself of this privilege to attend. One of the Aldermen the other day asked him the reason of his absence. "I desire to have all subjects come before me as a fresh matter at the council board," was the reply. "Being made first acquainted at the Board with the legislation to be voted upon, I cannot be prejudiced either one way or the other, and have ample time while the question is under discussion to make up my mind which way to vote in the event of a tie."

FRANK LESLIE'S SUNDAY MAGAZINE.—The May number contains some particularly notable articles, and is altogether most interesting and edifying. The editor, T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., has two articles—"The Arctic Martyrs" and "The Great Freshets"—which are of profound interest and admirably illustrated. "Cathedral of Our Saviour, Moscow," "Love and Life in Norway," "A Summer Holiday Abroad," "The Pianofort, Ancient and Modern," etc., are prominent features of the number. There are serial and short stories, essays, sketches, etc., by Rev. E. Barras, Miss G. A. Davis, Alfreton Hervey, T. L. Meade, J. Alex. Patten and other celebrated writers; poems of great merit; the Home Pulpit, with sermon by Dr. Talmage; and miscellaneous articles, etc., entertaining and replete with information. Single copy, 25 cents, or $2.50 a year, postpaid. MRS. FRANK LESLIE, Publisher, 53, 55 and 57 Park Place, N. Y.

A DELICATE OPERATION.—A very interesting and delicate operation was practised on Capt. Macqueen, of the 22nd Oxfords, during his late trip to England and the continent. The Captain, who is a son of Judge Macqueen, of Woodstock, while attending the last camp held on Carling's farm, felt his eyesight failing him. It appears he ruptured a blood-vessel in one eye, and the other sympathizing with the affected orb, there was nothing for it but to undergo an operation, or else lose his sight altogether. When he crossed the ocean and arrived at the office of the celebrated Dr. Liebreich, Prof. Bader, at London, he was informed that it would be necessary for him to have both eyes taken out and a certain operation performed known as the enlarging of the pupil. The Captain willingly underwent the operation, and so much pleased was the Professor with his patient that he sent him bandaged up over to his palatial residence on the Rhine, to be there tended and nursed. The first intimation of returning sight, and the first object seen by Capt. Macqueen was the spire of the cathedral of Cologne. Ever since, his sight has been gaining strength, and so fully has he recovered that a few days ago he was appointed range officer for the approaching rifle tournament for the Western district, so that his confidence in his scope of vision is attaining a wide range. The only difference the operation made on the captain was to increase the size of the pupils to about eight or ten times their original size.

The Bible and Its Value.

PAPER III.

Another feature of the excellency of our Bible is the popular attention it has commanded, and still continues to command; and the Reformations which have been accomplished by it.

Look a minute first at its popularity and its increasing hold on the mind of man universally. Its pre-eminent value appears when placed in contrast with novelties and novels. These may command attention for a time, but the transient fire soon dies out, and, as a rule, those who are most affected by them are not to be reckoned among the most useful of earthly citizens. Some of the novels of the ex-premier of England had a large sale and for a time commanded popular attention, but long since the once famous "Lothair" has become stale. Not so with the Bible. It stands at the front of all books, for its antiquity, popularity, influence and power to regenerate and to bless. It fills a larger space in the hearts of all the noblest of the sons of men than all other books combined. The memory of mankind can produce more quotations from this book than from any other and possibly than from all others. The simple fact that the Bible is more talked about, more thought about, and more written about than any other book, demonstrates it the king of all books in commanding attention. The learned and "golden mouthed" Chrysostom must have seen its pre-eminent worth when he gave it the name of Bible; and tracing its history from his day, until now, we cannot find another book so extensively circulated, no other book having such influence power to force its truths upon the conscience to the accomplishment of the moral elevation of the nations so deep and abiding. Take an example or two. At the dedication of the Palace Church at Antananario in Madagascar, about three years ago, the Prime Minister read a paper giving a statement of how the Queen became a Christian. He said "It was by the influence of the word of God, blessed by His good spirit, that the Queen became a follower of Christ." He continued, "I will show you the very Bible she read, and holding it up, said, "This mutilated book was in the palace of the previous Queen, uncared for, and unread. The present Queen in her sorrow of heart, read this good book, and its influence changed her heart and life." What a grand tribute to the value of the Bible, and what a glorious change for the people of that great Island by this royal example, in contrast with the state of that place in 1849. Before we dismiss our reference to that noble woman who so lately has exchanged the crown of Madagascar for a "crown of life that fadeth not away" let a few more of her words be chronicled. On the day of the dedication referred to she said, "I desire no royal homage to-day, let high and low appear on equal footing as worshippers of the true God. Yea, let the slave of the slave be free." What other book could so influence a royal heart with such beautiful benefaction working against the passions and frailties of the human heart? None other. The same thing is true in English history. Who could be more barbarous than the early Britons were at the time of the invasion by Julius Cæsar? And what period among the Zulus of Africa could be more bloody than the time of the English Heptarchy? And what brought about the change? The translation of the Bible into the Anglo-Saxon tongue became the moral lever to lift the nation from barbarism to civilization and Christianity. From the very year when the "Venerable Bede," in the 7th century, translated the gospel of John into the English language, the nation moved forward and upward, and every subsequent step taken by his successors in the same direction has tended, yea, compelled the elimination of barbarous enactments and placed in their stead on the statute books of parliamentary law, the moral principles of God's book. And while it is true that in the ancient time the judges read the law of Sinai, and governed by these laws in the form of a theocratic government and that peace and prosperity reigned supreme; it is equally true that when the principles of the new testament, love, charity, and brotherly kindness shall permeate all our laws, then shall dawn the brighter day. Nations and men who love the bible most, must by necessity excel in every good thing, for a man's book makes the man, for weal or woe.

SOUTH OXFORD SPRING FAIR

The Most Successful Yet Held—The Names of Prize Winners.

The South Oxford Spring Exhibition of stallions, seed grain and potatoes held in Ingersoll on Thursday last, was the most successful exhibition in every respect yet held by the Association in this Biding. The exhibit was much larger in every class than heretofore, and the attendance, notwithstanding the disagreeable weather, was far larger than at any previous show. The success of the fair fully demonstrates the desirability of holding it permanently at Ingersoll. The location of the park, where the fair was held, no doubt, added to its success. The officers of the Association are deserving of all credit for their efforts in making the show such a success. To Mr. Gordon H. Cook, particularly, the thanks of our townspeople are due for his efforts in collecting the sum necessary to bring the fair here. We feel sure that next year our citizens will respond heartily when again asked to contribute. Mr. Brady sold the grain and potatoes by auction, after the prizes had been awarded. Below is the Grand Church Opening.

The building formerly known as Erskine Church will be reopened for public worship on Sunday next, 27th inst., when the Rev. Mr. Parsons, of Toronto, will preach morning and evening. This church has been closed for some months past, owing to the fact that the two Presbyterian congregations became united, and have worshipped for some time past in the old Knox Church. Shortly after the union took place it was felt that the old building was inadequate to the requirements of this rising congregation, which has been rapidly increasing under the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Ross, and it was decided to make such alterations and repairs in the Thames Street Church as would be adequate to the wants of the congregation. The church has been accordingly repaired by ceiling and otherwise beautifying it so that it is now one of the finest, if not the finest, church edifice in town.

We congratulate the united congregation and their popular minister on the result of the union negotiations, for although a small minority of the congregation still hold out and dissent with the desire to form another congregation, we trust they may yet see the undesirability of such a course. One thing appears certain that the united congregation will make one of the most prosperous and progressive churches in town, and with so eloquent and popular a clergyman as Mr. Ross, they cannot fail to make themselves a power for good in our midst.—COM.

Resolution of Condolence.

Mrs. W. W. Ross, Ingersoll.

DEAR MADAM.—We have been instructed by the Board of Directors of the Upper Canada Bible Society, to express to you their profound sympathy in your sore bereavement, and to convey to you the appended copy of the minute unanimously adopted by them at their regular monthly meeting, held last Tuesday evening.

Both during his term of office as permanent agent and since, our own relations and intercourse with dear Mr. Ross, were of course more intimate and frequent than those of the majority of the directors, therefore we feel the loss even more than they; for he was eminently one of those whom to know more intimately is to love more heartily. But writing on behalf of the Board of Directors, we shall not venture to express our own personal feelings; nor shall we attempt with human words to assuage the pain of such separation, when only the Holy Spirit can console the heart of the bereaved.

Commending you to the God of all comfort, our Heavenly Father in Christ Jesus.

We remain, dear madam, yours in respectful and heartfelt sympathy.

J. GEORGE HODGINS,
I. M. CAMERON,
ROBT. BALDWIN,
Secretaries.

MINUTE.

Adopted unanimously by the Board of Directors of the Upper Canada Bible Society, Tuesday, April 15th, 1884.

In the recent death of the Rev. W. W. Ross, the Upper Canada Bible Society has lost one of its most valuable and valued friends. Whilst permanent agent from 1875 to 1879, his enthusiasm in the cause, and the energy of his nature, guided by wisdom, tact and method, were of very great service to the society at a somewhat critical period of its history. After his official connection with the society as permanent agent ceased, he continued ever ready to do anything in his power to advance its interests. The great good he did for the Bible cause by his visit to Manitoba last year was not only recognized by this Board, but has been very warmly acknowledged in the published report of the Winnipeg branch; and the directors looked upon him as one whose experience and readiness would often be of great service for many years to come. They cannot therefore but feel a sense of great loss by his removal from the scene of action, while at the same time bowing in submission to the will of their Heavenly Father, who knoweth all things, and doeth all things well.

The directors desire not only thus to recognize and record the worth of their departed friend, but also to assure his widow and family of their respectful and deep sympathy with them in their sore bereavement.

FARM AND DAIRY.

Butter at $1.00 a Pound.

The Utica N. Y. Herald says: The celebrated Darlington butter—which sells in New York and Boston retail markets at $1 per pound.—is made by Jared and James Darlington, near Philadelphia, Pa. These gentlemen own four rich farms, keep 300 head of superior cows and make at least 1,200 pounds a week. So rich is their land, and so well cared for their cattle, that fences are scarcely necessary to keep their stock from wandering. The Darlingtons personally take a hand in milking the cows and making butter themselves. The butter is marketed, strange to say, in white cedar packages. The lumps or prints put up in half-pound and pound parcels and wrapped in muslin, are very sweet, fresh and aromatic. The butter is apparently colored to suit the eye of the purchaser and has superior keeping qualities. Whether the latter feature is secured tho' special methods of manufacture or by the introduction of harmless antiseptics is not known. As a whole, says the Cultivator, we do not think the Darlington butter superior to three or four New England dairies altho' it had a model worthy of attention of our progressive and intelligent dairymen.

Cause of Poor Quality in Cheese.

In a recent issue I notice that my friend Judge Jones inquires where all the good cheese has gone, and why the high standard of excellence is not kept up in its manufacture. Briefly I may express my opinion. Recently at Columbus, O., at dinner, the Judge and myself were discussing a specimen of very poor cheese—good material, spoiled in manufacture—and I told what my opinion was in the matter. It was too much acid in making; nothing else. Good cheese is composed of water, fat and casein. When cheese is scalded or cooked in the whey, an acid is developed that destroys fats, and results in making the cheese dry when cured, sharp in flavor, salvy, and when cut soon losing its flavor. This is not the whole damage from the sour whey. The acid liberates the phosphates, which elements are valuable in promoting digestion, and also in preventing this excessive sharpness.

One other thing is also of great damage in cheese making, and that is too rapid cooking of the curds at the start. If the steam is turned on and the requisite heat quickly attained, the outer surface of the curd is cooked at once and before the centre is warmed up, and thorough cooking is thus prevented. This partially cooked curd does not cure even in the subsequent curing of the cheese, which all tends toward making a poor cutting cheese. It is not wholly the wholesale use of the skimmers in the factories that is the cause of poor cheese, but the very causes I have pointed out. If the milk is coagulated with a minimum quantity of rennet, the curd finely cut and gradually warmed up to the scalding point and the whey drawn at the point (or before) of the appearance of acidity, and after salting this curd it is exposed to the air until it gets an "acid" from this source, rather than from the whey, the elements wanting in the other cheese will not be found wanting in this one.

The "dry" acidity (it might be so called) does not afford any chance for the acids to "eat" out the fat, or cut out the phosphates, but leaves them both intact. This results in cheese of nutty flavor, buttery quality, easily digested, and when cut, does not quickly dry out and lose its flavor. This is often denominated sweet curd cheese, which it is in one sense, but in another it is not, for the sweet curd cheese is put to press as soon as salted, but in this case the curd is "broken down" by the action of the air, which gives it no after chance to develop gases while curing, as it would if put immediately to press.

If Judge Jones will place an order with Mr. A. E. Fobes of Lindenville, Ashtabula County, for some of his sweet curd, "dry" acid cheese, he will not soon have occasion to lament the fact that he is unable to get good cheese. There was never any good reason why there should have been such an employment of excessive acidity in the manufacture of cheese in our factories. This rule of extreme acidity is being rapidly abandoned or modified in Ohio, which is proof that it was radically wrong.—J. G. in Country Gentleman.

Notes.

Calves need special care, as this is the time when "black quarter" and other serious troubles come upon them.

Pigs thrive with a good run of clover. The orchard is the proper place for swine; they have good grazing and destroy many insect pests.

Keep your chickens clean and dry. There is no better place for the coops than in the vegetable garden, where the young chicks will destroy many injurious worms.

Change the cows gradually from dry feed to pasture. Bring them to the stables early, and feed hay with some roots; give dry fodder the next morning before turning the animals out to grass.

Mangels should be sown this month on rich mellow soil. Other kinds of beets may be sown early next month. Every farm should have a root crop as a part of a rotation. A root crop cleans the land of weeds and furnishes an abundance of food for farm animals.

Do not pasture meadows in the spring; this is asking too much of any field. It is cheaper to buy fodder than to rob the meadow. If any tramping of the meadows in early spring is allowed by animals, let it be done by the horses while drawing out a good top-dressing of fine manure.

Ewes, with their lambs taken from them, sometimes need some of the milk removed from their udders. After shearing, the ticks gather on the lambs, and may be quickly destroyed by dipping in tobacco water or some other effective dip. Tag the sheep before they leave the sheds for the pasture.

At this season a small quantity of green food is very helpful to horses. When shedding their coats the bowels should be kept rather loose, and a feed of carrots and oats in equal quantities is better than the grain alone. Carrots are probably the most nutritious root grown, and in proportion to their value can be produced as cheaply as any.

It is wise to make a general compost of everything about a farm that can be so utilized. The manure from poultry, sheep, horses and cattle may be mixed together, and if the refuse of the litter, straw, leaves, and also the scraping, be added, the whole will serve as an excellent absorbent for the liquids that are sometimes wasted.

New milk weighs 8 pounds 8 ounces per gallon, skimmed milk 8 pounds 9 ounces, cream 8 pounds 4 ounces, buttermilk 8 pounds 8½ ounces, and water 8 pounds 5 ounces. Those who believe in testing milk by the lactometer, or any specific gravity test, will observe that 3 gallons of skimmed milk and 1 gallon of water will have the same specific gravity as a gallon of milk.

Do not plant corn until the soil is warm and settled weather has come. The corn crop makes nearly all its growth within a hundred days, and requires food in abundance and close at hand. Corn responds rapidly to any available plant-food, applied either as well-rotted manure or as a quick acting commercial fertilizer. If the ground is weedy, plant in hills, otherwise drills will be the most profitable.

Little time now remains in which to get tools and materials ready for Spring. Seeds should be ordered at once, if not already, that the first pick at a dealer's stock may be secured. Tools are to be cleaned, sharpened and put in order for the haste of Spring work, which is coming soon. Especially is it necessary to perfect plans for the garden. Know what you are going to plant, and where, and how much, and why you plant it at all, before Spring opens.

The work horses need the best of care and an abundance of wholesome food. The shoes may be removed from farm horses if the fields are free from stones. All horse labor should be pushed forward rapidly, so that during the hot weather of next month some leisure may be taken at noonday. Oxen are slow of motion, but most useful for many kinds of farm work. They need considerable time for feeding and can not be hurried much at their work.

It is a noteworthy fact that all the leading dairy breeds of cows come from countries near the seashore, and where there is an abundant supply of moisture in the atmosphere. The milking capacity of common cows may be greatly increased by moistening their feed. If water is always convenient cows will drink much more, but it does not follow that water so taken will be assimilated with the food in the stomach as it will where both food and moisture are taken together.

In Mr. Hoard's famous speech on "skim milk farming" we find the following pleasant piece of sarcasm: The wisdom that will consent to the housing of expensive tools and machinery in the open fields at all times when not in use, or that will shelter the growing stock behind a wire fence with the expectation that the former will prove serviceable or the latter profitable, is of the skim milk variety; while the practice of burning the straw stacks and stubble to get rid of a lot of rubbish, and the practice of plowing but skin deep and of cultivating but indifferently, are alike barren of profitable results.

Breeders are learning with regard to Jerseys and other highly inbred breeds that a vigorous constitution, with good feeding and digestive capactiy, is essntial to long-continued good results. For a week's trial a delicate cow may and often does give large yields, but such cows are not always valuable—except to sell at fancy prices. Old farmers have always said that a good cow was never a poor feeder. The fact holds good to whatever the rule may be applied. The capacity for eating and assimilating a large amount of food is quite as essential in the animal that is to give twice or more her weight of milk in a year as one that is expected to add one hundred pounds of weight in bone, flesh and fat in the same time.

TEMPERANCE.

Moderate Drinking.

Following is a quotation from the speech of Admiral Sir B. James Sullivan K. C. B., delivered at a very important meeting of the National Temperance League in Exeter Hall:

"I will not refer but slightly to what we have all heard lately—the wonderful superiority in the matter of health and strength of the abstainers in the Arctic regions. In that, as in one or to two other cases I will allude to I wish you to see that abstainers compare favorably with the most moderate of moderate drinkers, because in those regions they only have a very small allowance of the very best of jamaica rum, which is said to be of the purest spirits. Therefore it is impossible that the drinking could have been other than the most moderate, and yet what do we find? Some years since, when an Arctic expedition was lost for four years under the late Sir John Ross, they went through sufferings such as never an Arctic expedition experienced before. They were reduced at last to fall back upon the provisions of a wrecked Arctic ship—some of the party carrying the rest on their backs, so reduced were they in health and strength. They there found ample provision, and some of the very best naval rum that could be found in those days, which had been weakened by lying there—for it always loses its strength by keeping—and what was the result? In trying in boats to reach the whalers, they suffered unheard of taials, and friled in their object. As the result they had to come back and pass another winter in those regions; but from the fact of Sir John Ross standing the work apparently better than the others, and he being the only abstainer among them, he suggested giving up all allowance of rum which they were accustomed to have. Their health was so benefited by abstinence that, though it lay along side them, they did not take it again. At that time it seemed extraordinary how such a thing could be because there was prevalent the old fallacy that a glass of grog warms you; but now we know that, in those Arctic regions especially, it would be dangerous, because every drop of alcohol lowers the temperature.

Then if we go to the Antarctic regions with Sir John Ross, who was one of those who served under his uncle in that voyage, we find this remarkable testimony. Dr. J. D. Hooker, now the President of the Royal Society, writes thus:—'Several men on board our ship, and amongst them some of the best, never touched grog during one or more of the Antarctic cruises. Many had laid in for themselves large quantities of coffee, and gladly would the others have exchanged their grog for this beverage. In the same letter he says:—'I do think that those who use spirits in cold weather is generally prejudical. I speak from my own experience. It is very pleasent at the time, for a glass of grog warms the mouth, the throat and the abdomen; and this, when one is wet and cold, with no fire, and just before turning into damp blankets, is very enticing. But it never did me an atom of good; the extremities are not warmed by it; and when a continuance of exertions or endurance is called for, the spirit does harm, for then you are colder or more fatigued a quarter or half an hour after it, than you would have been without it. This is a remarkable valuable and disinterested testimony from Dr. Hooker, which, coming from such a man as he is must have great weight with the general public.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Mistakes in Nursing

A physician contributes to Chambers's Journal a paper on the nursing of the sick, from which we extract the most practical portion of the M. D.'s suggestions. It will be observed that the writer dwells upon the importance of avoiding over attention on the part of the attendant in the sick room, and the importance of quietude, which he defines as the absence of all excitement, and it must be remembered, that the writer further adds, that anything out of the common will tend to excite the mind of the sufferer. Do not, therefore, walk on tiptoe, for this, in addition to its unusual elaboration of the gait, invariably causes a certain amount of creaking. Speak in low tones, but don't whisper; a whisper will often awaken a sleeper who would not be disturbed by ordinary conversation; and never say "Hush!" Let your clothes and foot covering be of as noiseless and unobtrusive a character as possible, and instead of gliding and tittering about like a rickety ghost, do not hesitate to walk. If you have occasion to say anything in the room, say it so that the patient can hear it if he wishes, and do not let him be aware of your conspiring privately with the others, especially at the door.

That door has much to answer for. If it be visible from the bed, people open it cautiously, put their heads in, and slowly withdraw again. If, as is more frequently the case, it is screened by the bed curtains, mysterious openings and shuttings are heard, unattended with any ingress or egress, and sotto voce colloquies go on outside. When you enter, do so honestly and at once; do not spend five minutes in turning the handle, like a housebreaker, thereby producing a series of irritating clicks, finally terminating in a big snap, with which the door flies open. If the latch be at all rusty, a handle that is slowly wound back in this way will often stick, and either require to be rattled back into position, or, if left as it is, may start back suddenly after a time of its own accord with a report like a pistol shot. It is always well to recollect that it by no means follows that a sick person is asleep because his eyes are shut; he may be actually conscious of all that is passing in the room, though unable or unwilling to make any sign; and nothing can be more maddening under such circumstances, than to have people hush-sh-ing, and whispering around, and creaking about on the tips of their toes. We have all sympathized in our hearts with poor Sir Leicester Dedlock when his tongue was bitten with paralysis, with his sister constantly bending over him with clasped hands and murmuring, "He is asleep?" till, goaded to desperation, he makes signs for his slate and writes, "I am not."

Never stand at the foot of the bed and look at the patient. While talking to him it is better to sit by the side of the bed, and as near the pillow as possible, so that you may converse easily, while your face and body are turned in the same direction as his. By this means you can make all necessary observation of his features without enforcing the arrest of his eyes to your own, which is so embarrassing and disagreeable to one lying in bed, and is almost unavoidable when facing him. Keep him in as comfortable a position as possible, by all means, but don't be too demonstrative in smoothing the pillows and little offices of that sort.

Fidgety attentions will worry him, and do him more harm than downright neglect.

When you are sleepy, it is better for your charge as well as for yourself, that you should go to bed at once, and get that repose in slumber to which you must succumb eventually, however strong your devotion may be, and however great the interests at stake. It is not necessary to dwell here on the prudence of economizing your strength, that you may be capable of greater or prolonged exertions, should the need for them arise, or to look at this detail from the point of view which affects yourself. But in any case, you can be of little or no sevice, worn out with fatigue, and in a condition more akin to somnambulism than vigilance, and the spectacle of a nodding, dozing nurse is neither soothing nor reassuring to the sufferer; while, if you be one near and dear to him, he will be tormented with anxiety lest you should impair your own health on his account. In such a case as this, you cannot do better than lie down comfortably on a sofa or bed where he can watch you, and have a good nap—for his sake.

Some people have a great notion of "tempting the appetite" by the suggestion of all manner of eatables and drinkables, or by bringing them ready prepared to the bedside experimentally. This, no doubt, is very well at times—during convalescence, for instance; but as a medical man, I am persuaded that it is a mistake in the earlier stages of an illness, when all food is loathed alike, and the creation of an appetite is an impossibility. The only thing to be done is to impress on the invalid the necessity of taking what is ordered for him at stated times, just as he takes his medicine; and it should be prepared on the same footing as a medicine—with the understanding that it is a nauseous dose, and must be presented in a form that will admit of its being swallowed as compactly and rapidly as possible. It is worse than useless to employ flavoring matters at this stage, with the idea of making anything palatable; if you can render his food absolutely tasteless, as you will do far more for him. And beyond this forcible administration, so to speak, of a certain amount, I think little good is gained by suggesting this or that delicacy, in the hope that your patient may be induced to "fancy" something. We may take it for granted that when he feels inclined for anything he will ask for it spontaneously; and the promptings of nature are more likely to lead him to a choice of what is best for him, than one string of suggestions. I have frequently observed that when sick people have mentioned a desire for any special food, they almost invariably eat of it when it is procured; whereas it often happens, when they have been persuaded to assent to something which has been proposed, the inclination—if it ever existed—has passed away before the dish or article can be brought to them.

I say, "if it ever existed;" for there is no doubt that a patient often yields to suggestions in sheer extremity, simply for the sake of peace. I happened to be in a sick room the other day, when a relative arrived on the scene. She had been warned to repress all emotion, and succeeded very well; but her tender solicitude was wholly irrepressible. I am sure that she asked at least twenty questions in less than a minute, until the unhappy sufferer writhed under them. "Shall I raise your head a little? Will you have another pillow? Wouldn't you like your head a little higher? Let me fan you. Will you have the blind up? What can I get you? Some arrowroot? Do try some! I am sure you will be more comfortable with another pillow. Will you have one?—yes; do! I'll go and get one. Will you have a cup of tea? I'm sure it would do you good. A cup of tea won't take a minute," etc. The cup of tea has been a dreadful instrument of torture in the hands of well meaning people, who would not knowingly have teased a fly.

These are small things, you will say. But a small thing in health is often magnified to a grave matter in sickness, and the sum total of them all may be as serious in their effect as the disease itself. It will be seen that the few points upon which I have laid stress are such as are calculated to promote tranquillity of mind—which, indeed, is half the battle in medical treatment. It is generally conceded that a trained nurse, who has no interest in the patient beyond that which the duties of her office impose, is better fitted to expedite his recovery than those who are bound to him by ties of affection, however welcome their presence may be in the hour of affliction. Whether the reader will agree with me or not, my experience in foreign countries has impressed me with the conviction that men make far better nurses than women.

The Teacher as a Student.

The following address was delivered by F. W. Merchant, M. A., Head Master of the Ingersoll High School, at the late meeting of the Oxford Teachers Institute:

The question, "Should the teacher be a student?" is not a debatable one. He who enters the teaching profession must be a person of mental growth, and it is as impossible to grow mentally without a regular supply of mental food, as it is to build up a strong and vigorous body on no better diet than air and water. The teacher must be a student in order to be full of the subject he teaches. He should be able to look at it from every standpoint that he may at once see the easiest and best methods of presenting it to his pupils. He must be a student that he may be in sympathy with the means by which knowledge is obtained. He who is in the habit of helping himself over difficulties is best able to help others. He must be a student in order to give freshness to knowledge imparted. No matter how often a person may have visited the fountain of learning in his youth, if he be not now a constant visitor, it will be impossible for him to lead others to enjoy its beauty or taste its sweetness. Dr. Arnold, writing to one of his old pupils, who had commenced the work of tuition, says, 'You need not think that your own reading will now have no object because you are engaged with young boys. Every improvement of your own powers and knowledge tells immediately on them; and indeed I hold that a man is only fit to teach so long as he is himself learning daily.' Dr. Arnold strikes sharply the right nail on the head; the would-be teacher, who is too lazy to improve himself by careful study, had better engage in some less responsible but perhaps more lucrative calling.

The first question that meets the faithful teacher is, 'What shall I study?' Study the subject you are to teach. Never rest satisfied until you know at least four times as much about a subject as you will ever be required to teach. How often have I heard the remark, 'Mr. so and so is not a very good scholar but he is an excellent teacher, he can teach even more than he knows.' This is wrong. It is true, that with his book upon his eyes, he may hear lessons upon what he knows nothing; but there is a wide difference between hearing a lesson and teaching it. Study how to teach. To my mind, he who has acquired a more literary training is no more qualified to teach than to practice medicine, plead at the bar or preach the gospel. There are broad and deep principles at the base of the teacher's art and he who would enter the profession must endeavour to master them. Education is a science, and not until those who desire to teach study it as such, will the teacher receive the consideration which appertains to his professional character. 'But stop,' I hear some person say, 'if education is a science, and if to become a teacher I must master its principles, I have a life-long work before me; I wish soon to engage in some other vocation. I am teaching to obtain a little money to give myself a start; if I do not enter one of the learned professions, I shall commence business. To such an objector I have but a short answer. You should never stand behind the teacher's desk. If you want money, do something in the line of your chosen occupation; but do not for the sake of a few paltry dollars, with the best energies of your mind concentrated in other aims, without training or perhaps even without aptitude, begin a work so far reaching in its consequences. Time will permit me simply to glance at one of the subjects of the teacher's professional study. I refer to it not only because it is fundamental in its character, but because I believe it to be to a great extent neglected by our teachers. It is the teacher's privilege to watch and direct the mental growth of his pupils, hence it is necessary that the teacher know something of mind. What would you think of the man who set himself up as a regular physician without knowing anything of the laws of the body? It is equally absurd for any one, ignorant of the different powers of the mind, the order of their development, and the modes of their action, to profess to be a true teacher. The study of Psychology will, while proving deeply interesting to the teacher, profoundly impress him with the worth of the material upon which he acts. The teacher cannot always busy himself with what he is to teach, and how he is to teach, but what next shall he study? After making himself fairly proficient in his own mother tongue, let him take up any line of investigation for which he has a special liking. Those who have become famous for their erudition have not been found digging in every nook and corner of the field of learning, but have confined their labours to well defined limits.

How shall the teacher study? Study with an aim. If his certificate be not of the highest grade, let him bend all his energies to obtain a better; if he is conscious that he fails in certain particulars necessary to his professional success, let him with untiring zeal endeavour to improve. Let every aim be subordinate to this, the aim to become a true teacher. Study according to a plan. Time is short; every minute should be economized. When one subject becomes tiresome, rest by taking another of a different kind. Exercise should be taken at regular intervals. Time should be given to original thought. The teacher should train himself to express his thoughts clearly and concisely. Study thoroughly. The old maxim, 'What is worth doing, is worth doing well,' applies with double force to the work of the teacher. If the teacher be a careless student, his pupils will follow his example, 'Like master like pupil.' What the teacher knows he should know positively. Study energetically and perseveringly. Whatever aim the teacher has in view, whatever plan of study he may have formed let him pursue it with a patient diligence.' Buffon says of genius 'it is patience.' The pathway of life is crowded with the ruins of many a half built edifice; if the teacher would be one of the few who adorn it with a beautiful and finished temple, he must carefully lay the foundations, and then faithfully, diligently, and energetically continue to work.

Mr. Thomas H. Hodgson, ex-cheese king of Canada, whose disastrous failure in Montreal caused such a sensation about eighteen months ago, has not so easily got rid of his liabilities as he expected when he absconded to New York. It will be remembered that the defaulter was arrested here on a criminal suit on behalf of the Bank of Montreal for secretly disposing of goods in his stores upon which the bank had made immense advances on the security of the warehouse receipts. A compromise was effected between the friends of the prisoner and the bank, the former paying 40c. on the dollar, and the debtor getting free, which he made good use of by suddenly skipping across the line before any of his other creditors had time to stop him. He had also victimized the Hochelaga and Molsons Banks out of sums ranging from $13,000 to $15,000 each. A trifling compromise was offered these banks to settle their claims, but they positively refused anything less than the full amount. A warrant for Hodgson's arrest was taken out in New York some time ago by the Hochelaga Bank, on the plea that as a refugee from a foreign State who was guilty of obtaining money by fraudulent pretences he could be arrested, and in default of making restitution committed to gaol. Before the arrest could take place Hodgson went to England, but on his return to New York he has been taken into custody under the State law and committed to gaol. Hodgson has been carrying on the shipping of produce from New York since his departure from Montreal.

Gilbert Laird, St. Margaret's Hope, Orkney, Scotland, writes: I am requested by several friends to order another parcel of Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil. The last lot I got from you having been tested in several cases of rheumatism, has given relief when doctor's medicines have failed to have any effect. The excellent qualities of this medicine should be made known, that the millions of sufferers throughout the world may benefit by its providential discovery.

Don't fill the gash with soot, sugar, or anything else to arrest the hemorrhage when you cut yourself, but bring the parts together with strips of adhesive plaster.

No one Buys a "Pig in a Poke"—in other words, purchases on mere guesswork—who buys for his or her relief Northrop & Lyman's Vegetable Discovery and Dyspeptic Cure. The fact is too well known to leave room for any peradventure that it is a sovereign curative for Indigestion, Costiveness, Impurities of the Blood, Kidney and Female troubles, and other infirmities.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Abscesses, Erysipelas, Piles.—Unvarying success attend all who treat these diseases according to the simple printed directions wrapped round each pot and box. They are invaluable to the young and timid, whose bashfulness sometimes endangers life. Though apparently local, diseases of this nature are essentially blood diseases, but a little attention, moderate perseverance, and trifling expense will enable the most diffident to conduct any case to a happy issue without exposing secret infirmities to any one. The Ointment checks the local inflammation and alleviates the throbbing pains. These directions also clearly point out when and how Holloway's Pills are to be taken, that their purifying and regulating powers may assist by adjusting and strengthening the constitution.

Don't jump out of bed immediately on awakening in the morning.

Our Canadian Silk Industry

is prosperous. The great difficulty to be contended with is the low grade of good required. In nothing is this more apparent than in the comparatively small article of sewing silks. The great demand in Canada seems to be for a cheap quality, buyers forgetting that a cheap thread must necessarily be a fine and consequently a weak one. Messrs. Belding, Paul and Co., make three grades of spool silk; of these different qualities the poorest one has by far the largest sale, at the same time they constantly hear of complaints of poor sewing silk. If ladies will take the trouble to ask for Belding, Paul & Co.'s own brand, and see that their name is on the end of each spool, they will be sure of getting the best made. 76y.

VITAL QUESTIONS!!

Ask the most eminent physician

Of any school, what is the best thing in the world for quieting and allaying all irritation of the nerves and curing all forms of nervous complaints, giving natural, childlike refreshing sleep always?

And they will tell you unhesitatingly "Some form of Hops!"

CHAPTER I.

Ask any or all of the most eminent physicians:

"What is the best and only remedy that can be relied on to cure all diseases of the kidneys and urinary organs; such as Bright's disease, diabetes, retention or inability to retain urine, and all the diseases and ailments peculiar to Women"—

"And they will tell you explicitly and emphatically "Buchu."

Ask the same physicians

"What is the most reliable and surest cure for all liver diseases or dyspepsia; constipation, indigestion, biliousness, malarial fever, ague, &c." and they will tell you:

Mandrake! or Dandelion!"

DUALITY.

O! brother, thro' this rolling sphere,
With all its seeming strife,
Two principles for ave are wed,
We call them love and life:
The dead negations come and go,
Like clouds that dim the day,
They have a certain work to do,
Then break and pass away.

O! brother, there can be no death,
If one link in the chain
Could break from out its wonted place,
Then all were rent in twain;
The babe that never lisped a word,
The patriarch wise and old,
To the great whole, for endless time,
Finite relations hold.

As earth unto the boundless all
The atom to the earth,
As drops unto the restless sea,
The germ unto the birth;
Each bears within it in degree,
The power from whence it sprang,
And has a history dating back
To when the first stars sang.

O! brother, there can be no death,
Since all things dual are,
Two powers combine to form a leaf,
Or swing in space a star;
And when we drop these robes of clay,
What wonders we shall see,
While chief amidst the grand display,
Will be duality.

Tarough doubts and fears the world of men,
Progressed in every age,
That Christs were born to many lands,
We see by history's page;
The gods of ancient Greece and Rome
Are myths to you and me,
And yet they speak in thunder tones
Of immortality.

An Ambitious Woman.

BY EDGAR FAWCETT.

CHAPTER XVII.

The gay season had soon set in with full force. It promised to be a season of especial brilliancy. Claire rapidly found people gathering about her. She began to have a little list of her own. The wives of the two gentlemen who had dined with herself and husband in Goldwin's company, each asked herself and husband to dine at their own house. The dinners were both of sumptuous quality, and attended by numerous other guests. Claire made a deep impression at both places. Her toilettes were rich and of unique taste: she was by far the most beautiful woman at either assemblage. The sudden financial glory of Hollister, whose actual wealth was tripled if not quadrupled by rumor, cast about her exceptional grace, beauty and wit an additional halo of distinction. She was the kind of woman whom women like. In not a few of her own sex she quickly roused an enthusiastic partisanship.

"You are bound to lead or nothing," Mrs. Diggs soon said to her. "I see this very clearly, Claire—though, for that matter, I have seen it all along."

"I mean to lead or nothing," answered Claire, with her superb candor. "Thus far I have not found it difficult."

Mrs. Diggs put up her thin forefinger.

"Tut, tut," she remonstrated. "Don't be confident. Ambition may overleap itself. Remember that you are still on the threshold."

"I've crossed it," said Claire, laughing. "I've got into the drawing-room."

"No, you haven't, my dear. You have yet achieved nothing secure, absolute, decisive. Now, I'm not a bit of a snob myself, as you know. But I understand how to reason like one; I can measure the mettle of the one you've got to fight with. Let us talk plainly together, as we always do. None of the very heavy swells have as yet admitted you. There's no use of denying this. You're being a great deal talked about. You've broken bread already, and you've received invitations to break more bread, with some very nice, exclusive women. But they are not of the first rank; they're not of the great, proud select chips. True, Cornelia has called on you, and Sylvia Lee has called. You've returned their visits, and have seen neither; neither was at home. But then neither is at home except on her visiting-day, and that is customarily written with much legibility on both their cards. But on both the cards which you received, no day at all was written. I've never mentioned this before, have I? Well, it never occurred to me until last night. I was nervous, and couldn't sleep; that dear Manhattan was out at the club, smoking those horrid cigars, which flush his face so and hurt his poor, dear brain, I'm sure. Perhaps it was that which kept me awake and made my mind run backward you, and reflect upon this peculiarly interesting stage of your career. The little circumstance I have mentioned may mean nothing, but I'm inclined to think otherwise; everything, no matter how trivial, about Cornelia, is sure to mean something. But, however this may be, affairs have now reached a peculiar pass with you. You must make a coup, my dear—a grand coup."

"Which you have arranged entirely," said Claire, smiling, "I haven't a doubt. And now you await my sanction of it?"

Mrs. Diggs creased her pale forehead, in a reflective frown. "No, not precisely that, my dear; I haven't quite decided what it is to be. But I have almost decided. Suppose that you do not make it at all—that is, not in your own person. Suppose that I make it for you."

"You?" inquired Claire.

"Yes. Suppose that I send out cards for a huge reception, and place your card within the same envelope. Then you would receive at my side, don't you know, and everybody who came must henceforth be on your list as well as on mine. I would launch you boldly forth, in other words. I would put you under my wing. I would give you my cachet."

A marked intimacy now existed between Claire and Goldwin. He would often drop in of an evening—sometimes of an afternoon. Hollister was not by any means at home every evening, when he and Claire had no mutual engagement. He was getting to have a good many solitary engagements. "Stag" dinners claimed him; there would be nocturnal trysts with certain fellow-financiers on the subject of the morrow's chances. Then, too, he had been made a member of the Metropolitan Club, an institution oddly hard, and in a way oddly easy, to enter: it was the one great reigning club of the continent; none other precisely resembled it; the social leaders who did not belong to it were few, and to cross the doorstep of it will was the unfulfilled dream of many a social struggler.

Claire cordially liked Goldwin. If he had been obscure she would still have liked him, though his importance was so knit in with his personality, he exhaled such an atmosphere of pecuniary and patrician celebrity, that one could ill think of him as ever being or ever having been obscure.

She was boldly frank with him regarding her ambitious aims. He would throw back his handsome head and laugh heartily at her ingenious confidences. He would tell her that she was the most exquisite joke in the world, and yet that he was somehow forced to accept her as quite the opposite of one. "Ah, yes, intensely opposite," he would add, with a fluttered pull at his silken moustache that she felt to be studied in its emotional suggestiveness, with a large sigh that she suspected of being less studied, and with a look in his charming hazel eyes that would nearly always make her avert her own.

His homage had become a very substantial fact, and she knew just how much of it the popular standard of wifely discretion would permit her to receive—just how much of it would be her advantage and not her detriment. He was too keen not to have perceived that she had drawn this judicious line of calculation. Now and then he made little semi-jocose attempt to overleap it, but at the worst a word would curb him where a glance failed. She found him, all in all, saltatory but never vicious; a stout pull of the rein always brought him to terms.

After her converse with Mrs. Diggs, just recorded, she told him of the latter's proposed coup. He looked at her sharply for a moment, and then made a very wry grimace.

"Good Heavens!" he exclaimed. "That woman endorse you! It would be complete ruin."

"Mrs. Diggs is my friend, and as such I must insist upon your always speaking with respect of her in my presence," reprimanded Claire, stoutly.

"Respect? Why, of course I respect her. Not physically; she's constructed on too painful a plan of zigzags. But in all other ways I consider her delightful. She's got a big, warm heart in that angular body of hers. She's as liberal as the air. But she isn't good form—she isn't a swell, and no earthly power could make her so. Of course she doesn't think she has really lost caste. She may tell you that she does, but privately she has an immense belief in her ability to play the fine lady at a moment's notice. I don't know any woman more flatly disproved of by her own original set. Shall I tell you what this idea of hers would result in if practically carried out? A distinct injury to yourself. She has a crowd of queer friends whom she wouldn't slight for the world; she's too consistently good-hearted. She'd invite them all, and they would all come. Her notable relations—the Van Horns and Van Corlears and Amsterdams and Hackensacks, and Heaven knows who else—would yawn and perhaps shudder when they got the tickets for her entertainment. They would mostly come, too, and all their grand friends would no doubt follow them. But they would come with a feeling of deadly rancor toward yourself; they would never forgive you for setting her up to it, and nothing could induce them to believe that you had not set her up to it."

Here Goldwin crossed his legs with an impatient violence, and stared down at one of his shoes with enough intensity for it to have been concerned in the last caprice of the stock-market. "Oh, no," he went on, "that would never do. Never in the world. It wouldn't be a coup at all; it would be a monstrous fiasco. Take my advice, now, and politely but firmly nip any such proceedings in the bud."

Claire did. On his own side Goldwin was secretly determined that she whom he thought the most fascinating, novel, and beautiful woman he had ever met, should achieve the full extent of her desires. These desires affected him as much as they affected Hollister: they were part of Claire's charm for him; they were like the golden craft of scrollwork that framed the picture; they set it off and made it precious; there was a lovely impetuousness about them that struck a second wind in his mother woman, like a kind of ugly greed, but that in her were a delight.

He made up his mind that he could serve her, brilliantly, conspicuously, and he soon done so. He issued invitations for a dinner at Delmonico's, and gave it on a scale of splendor that eclipsed all his previous hospitalities. Rare music rode to the guests while they feasted: the board was literally pavillioned with flowers; the wines and the viands were marvels of rarity and cost; beside the plate of each lady lay a fan studded with her monogram in precious stones; during dessert a little cake was served to everybody present, which when broken contained a ring, with the word Amore emboossed in silver along its golden circlet. The host had very carefully chosen his guests from among the autocrats and arbiters of fashion. Claire and Hollister were the only persons who did not represent aristocracy at its sovereign height. But on Claire fell the chief honors. It was she whom Goldwin selected to lead the dining-room; it was she to whom he directed the major share of his attentions, contriving with slight apparent effort that she should know everyone else, and making it evident that the affair was held in large, luxurious compliment to herself alone, though not thrusting this fact into more than partial prominence.

Goldwin, for certain marked reasons of his own, had been from the first resolved upon the attendance of Mrs. Ridgeway Lee. He sent no invitation to Mrs. Van Horn. He knew that Claire suspected the latter of averse feelings, and he knew no more than this. But Mrs. Van Horn was not a necessity to the success of his festival: she could easily be replaced by some other leader, and it would be much better not to invite her at all than to invite her without avail. But Mrs. Lee must appear.

He had been prepared for refusal, and it promptly came. On the evening of the day it reached him, he presented himself at Mrs. Lee's residence. He found her alone. She had denied herself to four or five other gentlemen during the previous hour. She had expected Goldwin, though she tried to look decorously surprised when he entered her elegant little drawing-room.

She had chosen to clothe herself in black satin, the shimmer of whose tense-drawn fabric about bust and waist, and of its trailing draperies about the lower portion of her lithe person gave to her strange figure an almost startling oddity. An irreverent critic who had recently seen her in this robe had declared that she made him think of a wet eel. Allowing the comparison to have been apt, if ungallant, there is no doubt that she could have suggested only an eel very much humanized, with a face possessed of quite as extraordinary feminine beauty as that possessed by the deadly lady whom Keats so weirdly celebrated.

Her dark eyes seemed to-night lit with the smouldering fires of fever. The moment Goldwin looked at her he made up his mind that he was to have a hard time of it. She had undoubtedly guessed the purport of his dinner, and she meant to tell him so. He strongly suspected that she meant to tell him so well, with considerable verbal embellishment.

He pretended, in a playful way, to be dazzled by her fantastic apparel. He put both hands up to his eyes, and rubbed them in comic imitation of bewilderment.

"I'm not prepared to tell you whether I like it or not," he said, while he sank into one of the big, yielding chairs. But I consider it splendidly effective. It makes you appear so beautifully slippery. You look as if you could slide into an indiscretion, and then squirm right out again without being observed by anybody."

Mrs. Lee bit her lip. She had often let him say more saucy things than this to her, and not resented them. But to-night her mood held no such tolerance.

"You promised me," she said, that you would never speak rudely about my personal appearance." She seemed to shape with some difficulty this and the sentence that followed it. "I did not make myself. Perhaps if I had been granted that privilege I might have hit on a type more suited to your taste."

Goldwin shrugged his shoulders. "Oh, come," he said, "you've let me chaff you a hundred times before, and treated it as a joke."

He was still seated, while she stood. He forgot to think this a discourtesy toward her; he would have remembered it as such to almost any other woman; his outward manners were usually blameless; but perhaps he was no more at fault than herself for the present negligence.

As it was, it did not strike her. She was thinking of other weightier things. A delicate table stood near her, and she half turned toward it, breaking from a massive basket of crimson roses, one whose rich petals were heavy folded and perfect, and fixing it in the bosom of her night-dark dress. Goldwin was watching her covertly but keenly all the [illegible] She seemed to him like an incarnate tempest—he knew her so well. His furtive but sharp glance saw the tremor in her slim, pale fingers as she dealt with the discompanioned rose.

Finding that she did not answer, he went on: "You are out of sorts to-night. Has anything gone wrong during the day?"

She tossed her head for an instant, and her lip curled so high that it showed the white edge of her teeth. But promptly she seemed to decide upon a mild and not a harsh retort. "I have been at the hospital most of the afternoon," she said. "I prayed for an hour beside a poor woman who was dying with cancer." She gave a quick, nervous shudder. "It was horrible." She closed her eyes, then slowly unclosed them. "Horrible," she repeated in her most measured way.

"It must be simply ghastly," observed Goldwin, with dryness. "For heaven's sake swear off these debauches of charity for at least a month or two? They're completely breaking you up. It's they that put you in these frightful humors."

She came several steps toward him, and sank into a chair quite close at his side. She twisted herself so inordinately, in taking this new posture, that her detractors would have decided the whole performance one of her most aggravating affectations. "What frightful humors?" she asked. This question had the same loitering, somnolent intonation that always belonged to her speech, and contrasted so quaintly with her nervous, volatile turns and poses.

Goldwin saw that the time had come. "Oh, you know what I mean," he said, "You went and refused my dinner. Of course you didn't mean it."

"I did mean it," said Mrs. Lee, very low indeed.

"Nonsense. I'm like an enterprising salesman. I won't take 'no' for an answer."

"I shall give you no other."

He leaned nearer to her. "What on earth is the matter?" he inquired. "I am going to make it a very nice affair. I don't think I've ever done anything quite as pretty as this will be. You used to tell me that no one did these things just as well as I. You used to say that if I ever left you out of one of my state feasts you'd cut my acquaintance."

She had drooped her small, dark head while he spoke, but now, as he finished, she raised it. Her tones were still low, but unwonted speed was in her words.

"I don't doubt you will make it a very nice affair. But you give it because you want to give distinction to a woman who has bewitched you. Don't deny that Mrs. Hollister will be there. I know it—I am certain of it."

"I don't deny it," said Goldwin, crossing his legs quietly, "now that you afford me a chance of stating it."

He saw her spend an inward shiver from displaying more overt signs.

"Oh, well," she said, "do not let us discuss the question any more. I sent you my regret to-day. I have another engagement, as I told you."

"Another engagement is easily broken."

"It is a dinner engagement."

"I don't believe you."

"You are grossly rude."

"I know I am. It's perfectly awful. It's the first time I ever insulted a woman. I shall be in the depth of repentance all day to-morrow. I don't know if I shall ever really pardon myself. But. . . . I don't believe you, all the same."

He said this with a mournful deliberation that would at any other time have roused her most enjoying laughter; for he had in him the rich fund of true comedy, as many of his friends were wont loudly to attest, and at will he could draw flattering plaudits of mirth from even the gloomiest hearer.

But Mrs. Lee did not show even the glimpse of a smile.

"There is no use," she said. "I have given you my answer. I shall not go. I shall not permit you to make of my name and position a mere idle convenience. I shall not lend you either one or the other, that it may serve your purpose in presenting to society any adventuress who may have pleased your fancy."

Goldwin was very angry at this speech. She had no idea how angry it had made him, as he quietly rose and faced her.

"What right have you to call her an adventuress?" he asked.

Her eyes flashed as she looked up at him. "Of course she is one. Her husband, too, is an adventurer. They're both trying to push themselves in among the best people. And you are helping them. You are helping them because of her; and you are now helping her . . . well, you are helping her because of herself."

Goldwin gave a smile at this. She perceived, then, how very angry he was. She knew his smile so well that when it came, different from any other she had ever seen on the same lips, it struck her by its dread import.

"You called upon this adventuress," he said: "you were willing to do that."

"Yes—to please you."

"Allow that as your reason. You called on her in private to please me. You will not meet her in public to please me. Is not that just how the case stands?"

She fixed her eyes on his face. Her feverish look had grown humid. He could plainly note that her lips trembled. She was so alive, now, to a sense of his being very indignant, that this realization frightened her, and she let him see, with pitiable candor, just how much it frightened her.

"You are in love with Mrs. Hollister," she murmured. "And—she is in love with you."

She showed him the full scope of his power by those few words. He walked toward the door, pausing on its threshold.

"I won't remain to hear you insult a woman whom I respect," he said; "you called her an adventuress, which is untrue; you now say something even worse."

"Will you deny it," she asked, rising.

Her question had a plaintive, querulous ring, which the circumstances made more than pathetic.

"Will you reconsider your refusal?" he said, making the interrogation a reply.

She sank back into her seat again.

"No, never!" she exclaimed.

"Good night!" he returned. He went immediately out into the hall, put on his coat and hat and left the house.

"She will yield," he told himself. "I am sure of it. She showed me that she would if I were only hard enough. I mean to be hard. I can make it up in kindness by and by."

He waited three days. No word came to him from Mrs. Lee. But on the fourth word came to him.

"I knew it," he thought, as he read her note.

Mrs. Lee went to the dinner in a truly marvellous gown. It was some curious blending of crimson and black silks, that made her look sombrely clad in one attitude and luridly clad in the next. Her only jewelry was a thin snake of rubies about her slender throat, and the head of the snake, set directly beneath her chin, was a big gold one, having two large garnets for eyes. All the women pronounced her costume ridiculously overdone. All the men professed to like it. She never appeared in gayer spirits. Next to Claire she was the most notable feminine guest.

But Claire ruled absolute She had never been more beautiful, perhaps because she had never felt more secretly and victoriously exultant. The delicious music, the piercing yet tender odor of the lavish flowers, the insidious potency of the wines, which she sipped sparingly and felt dangerously tingle through her veins—all these influences wrought upon her a species of stimulating enthralment which made the whole splendid banquet seem, on the following day, like some enchanted dream.

On one side sat Goldwin, the genius who had created this lovely witchery, urbane, devoted, allegiant; on the other side sat a man of deserved eminence, a wit, a scholar, a statesman. She talked with both companions, and it could not be said that she then charmed both, for one was already her loyal devotee. As for the other, though advanced in years and freighted with pungent experiences, he soon tacitly admitted that he had at last found, at the most discriminating period of his career, a woman whose graces of intelligence and beauty met in faultless unison. As all the ladies rose, leaving the gentlemen to their coffee and cigars, he leaned towards Goldwin, even before Claire's draperies had swept the threshold of the dining-room, and significantly murmured,—

"You were right. She is an event."

That dinner was the stepping-stone by which Claire mounted into immediate triumph. All through the next year she was the reigning favorite in just that realm where she had aimed to reign.

Her father had died a pauper and been buried as one. She, the mistress of many thousands, having fixedly remembered what a feeble, disappointed, obscure, broken-down man had said to her in early childhood, now stood as the living, actual result of his past counsel.

Years ago the seed had been sown in that dingy little basement of One-Hundred-and-Twelfth Street. To-day the flower blossomed rare and beautiful. The little girl had climbed the hill to its top, after all. She had not grown tired and gone home before the top was reached. She had done her father's bidding. She was sure he would be glad if he knew.

"And yet am I quite sure?" she would sometimes ask herself. "Was this what he really meant when he spoke those words?"

She knew perfectly the folly of the course that she now pursued. Her occasional self-questionings were a hypocrisy that she realized while she indulged it. But they were very occasional. She had slight time for introspection, for analysis of her own acts.

Flattery and devotion literally poured in upon her, like the new wealth that continued to pour in upon her husband. The house on Seventy-Eighth Street was second-exchanged for a spacious mansion on Fifth Avenue. Claire ceased to know even the number of her servants. She had a housekeeper, who superintended their engagements and discharges. She dwelt in an atmosphere of excessive luxury, and felt herself living it more and more as she yielded to the spell of its subtle enervation.

The second winter was the confirmation of her sovereignty. As the phrase goes, she was asked everywhere. Her bright or caustic sayings were ever on the lips of loyal quoters. Her toilettes were described with journalistic realism in more than a single newspaper. Cards for her entertainments were eagerly sought, and often vainly. Foreigners of distinction drifted into her drawing-room as if by a natural process of attraction. She had scarcely a moment of time to herself; when she was not entertaining she was being entertained. Her admirers, women and men, vied in their efforts to secure her presence. She had acquired, as if by some magic instinct, what she had needed personal touch; she had got the grand air to perfection. Diplomatists who had met and known the most noted beauties of European courts had nothing but praise to pay her serene elegance of deportment, the undulating grace of her step, the nice melody of her voice, the fine wizardry of her smile. She had never seen Europe, yet she might have spent all the years of her youth on its soil with no lovelier results than those which now marked her captivating manner. She was an American, past question, to transatlantic eyes; yet these found in her only the original buoyancy and freshness of that nationality, without a gleam of its sotternel crudeness.

Foes, of course, rose up against her. There can be no sun without a shadow. She had made herself so distinct a rarity that cheapening comment could not fail to begin its assault. It did so, in hot earnest. Two women had denied their sanction to her sudden popularity. These were Mrs. Van Horn and Mrs. Ridgeway Lee. They were not foes enemies; neither, by all appearances, were they covert ones. They were on speaking terms. They met her constantly, yet they offered her no deference. Deference was what she now required, and with a widely-admitted right.

The invidious statements that stole into circulation regarding her could not be traced either to the vengeance of Beverley Thurston's sister or the jealousy of Stuart Goldwin's abandoned worshipper. It was possible that the foes of Claire's defenders never thought of so tracing them. But the statements were made, and took wing. She had been a vulgar girl of the people. Her parentage was of the most plebeian sort. A lucky marriage had given her the chance, now accepted and enlarged. Her maiden name had been this, that, and the other. She was absolutely nobody.

Claire heard none of these scorching comments. She reigned too haughtily for that. Mrs. Diggs heard them, but Mrs. Diggs betrayed no signs of their existence. Goldwin was now devotedly at Claire's side; they were repeatedly seen in public together; the world in which she ruled considered it a splendid subjugation: she had brought the great Wall Street King obsequiously to her feet.

But no taint of slander tainted the relation between them. Claire had been very clever; she had blunted the first arrow, so to speak. She had done so by means of her complete innocence. Goldwin was in love with her; no one doubted this. It was something notable to have said of one. But she was so solely not in love with Goldwin that she could continually, by strokes of frank tact, show the world her own calm recipiency and his entire subservience.

A swift yet sure chasm widened between herself and Hollister. The latter had become a man of incessant and imperative engagements. Claire never dreamed of feeling a jealous pang, and and yet she knew that her husband, no less than herself, had become a star of fashion. Hollister was assiduously courted. He and Claire would now meet once a day, and sometimes not so often.

They had separate apartments; it was so much more convenient for both. The same dinner-engagement frequently claimed them; but on these occasions she would appear in the lower hall to meet him, rustling beneath some new miracle of dressmaking, and they would get into the carriage together and be driven to the appointed place.

At the dinner they would be widely separated. He would sit beside some woman glad to have secured him; she would be the companion of some man happy because of her nearness. The dinner would break up; the hour would be somewhat late; they would get into their carriage; Hollister would have an appointment, at the club, or somewhere. He would let Claire into the great new house with his latch-key. "Good night," he would say, and hurry off to the carriage that had waited for him. Claire would ascend and be disrobed by a sleepy maid. To-morrow there would perhaps be another dinner, of the same sort. Or it might be an affair to which she went alone, and from which Goldwin accompanied her home. Goldwin was always prepared to accompany her. He obeyed her nod.

But Hollister was still her devout subject. It was merely that the sundering stress of circumstances divided them. He did not forget Claire, he postponed her.

Everything was in a whirl with him, now; he was shooting rapids, so to speak, and by and by he would be in still water again. For the present, he had only time to tell himself that Claire was getting on magnificently well. It was like driving four or six restive horses abreast, with his wife seated at his side. He must attend to the skittish brutes, as it were; her safety, no less than his own, depended on his good driving. But she was there at his side; he felt comfortably sure of this fact, though he could not turn and look at her half often enough.

The January of this second winter had been prolific in heavy snow

PAPER II.

(Communicated.)

It may be objected that it is unfair for one man to spend his time in looking after the interests of thousands and receive no remuneration, either for the time so spent or for the labor which he may have performed; that it is unjust for one to work for many and not receive an ample recompense. That seems plausible; yet, if I plant a pleasure-ground, and by working, planning, waiting many years, get it to suit my taste and derive my chief pleasure from it, a railroad may lay an unsightly track across my lawn and clear my shrubbery. Is this unjust? Those who have so suffered, and many have, consider it the acme of injustice; but we must remember that it is a principle of modern Government, and a just one, that an individual must suffer inconvenience and what he may consider injustice for the welfare and convenience of the community. A certain course may seem unjust, but when the alternative is vicious, which is to be preferred? Again this objection supposes. (1.) That there is a certain amount of work in the administration to be performed by each constituency requring a part of the time and labour of each ratepayer, and that one man is appointed to do their united work. (2.) That this appointed man will do the same work and with the same results as when performed by the many. (3.) That he will consult the interests of the many collectively, in preference to his own individual interests. (4.) That the recompense is to be paid according to the actual amount of time and labour which he has consumed in the interests of his constituents. (5.) That he shall not be paid for the time and labor which he has spent in looking after his own interests. When were these conditions fulfilled in any representative? I believe that if we consider the matter carefully we shall come to the conclusion that there is more injustice in the present system of paying our representatives than there would be in not paying them.

It is also objected that clever, but poor young men who could strengthen the government by their ability, would be excluded if representatives were not paid. I do not consider Parliament the place for poor young men; too many temptations in the way of rich monopolists are thrown in their path. A recent writer on the British constitution says, "such purity as prevails in England is rarely found elsewhere, and this can be ascribed to nothing else than the large part taken in politics by those whose position places them above temptation."

If young men have the ability to materially aid a government they have enough to amass a fortune if they persevere; at the same time they will acquire earnestness of character and a wide experience, and will be far better fitted in their riper years to legislate for their fellow-country-men.

Young men usually start on their political career filled with politico—economical vagaries, and spend their first twenty years in the House establishing the impractability of their chimeras. It would be better if they would experiment at their own expense and not burden the nation with results of their inexperience. There would be fewer laws repealed if we had practical, experienced men in the House of Representatives. It is also of the greatest importance at present, when the balance of power seems wavering between Capitalists and the Commons that we have men to represent us who would have no object in becoming the tools of companies. The way in which millions were squandered, last session of the Commons should convince us that only men having a large amount of taxable property should be sent to Parliament, and in order to get that class there, we should not display a tempting bait to entice adventurers.

A BILL has been introduced into the Manitoba Legislature, and will likely become law, providing that the man who takes a bribe shall be equally guilty with the candidate for legislative honors who gives a bribe.

THE American Old Testament Revision Company, after twelve years of labour, completed its work at New York on Friday. The last work was the final revision of the books of Ezekiel and Daniel. It is now expected that the revision of the Old Testament, which requires much time to be carefully carried through the press, will be given to the public next fall or the first of next year.

INGERSOLL'S debenture debt is $102,000 Our sinking fund amounts to $11,700. For the year 1883 we expended $85,414.86, $6,854.39 of which was for interest; $2,100 was applied to the sinking fund. The fire department cost $752.84. The Board of Education received $6,855, and the Board of Works $2,681.48. It cost us $795.15 to light our streets; $4,331, was the amount of our county rate.

THE death of Chief Justice Spragge removes from the bench and the service of his country one who was well worthy of the high position to which he had attained. He was alike a credit to the profession from the ranks of which he graduated, and an ornament to the Bench upon which for so many years he sat. His name will rank among those of many able men who preceded him, and whose memory the people of Canada, and Ontario especially, still delight to honour.

THE Grand Jury at Toronto has found true bills against Bunting, Wilkinson, Meek and Kirkland, charged with conspiracy to bribe members of the Ontario Legislature to vote against the Mowat Government. The trials will now take place in due course. It is a cause for congratulation that the whole of the evidence for the prosecution and defence can now be laid before the public, who will thus be in a position to form their own conclusions about the guilt or innocence of the accused.

Scott Act in Elgin.

St. Thomas, April 26.—The public meeting in connection with the Scott Act Convention in the First Methodist Church last night was largely attended and very enthusiastic. The chair was occupied by D. G. Sutherland. Stirring speeches were delivered by Rev. Mr. Morrow, Rev. John Smith, of Toronto, and Rev. Mr. Brethour, of Milton. The Convention met at nine o'clock this morning and made all the necessary arrangements for submitting the Scott Act to the electors of this city and county.

CHARGED WITH MURDER.

GEORGE McCABE AGAIN ARRESTED.

HE IS ACCUSED OF POISONING HIS WIFE.

Second Charge of Murder.

THE DOCTORS FIND SYMPTOMS OF STRYCHNINE VERY MARKED.

At five minutes to 1 o'clock on Saturday, George McCabe was arrested in London South by Detective Schram, charged with the

of his wife, Ann McCabe, by means of poison. McCabe was at once brought to the city, and a remand made out by Squire Peters for eight days.

He took matters very coolly, and ob served to the detective that if she had died from poison she had taken it herself. The warrant on which he was arrested stated that "one George McCabe is charged that he did, in the township of Westminster, unlawfully, and by violence or unfair means, hasten, or cause the death of his wife, Ann McCabe." The only suspicious circumstance connected with the affair is her sudden death. She was all right on Friday waiting around the bar—the couple kept a hotel on the Wharncliffe road—and being in and out in the yard. According to McCabe, she was taken ill about 6 o'clock. Between 8 and 9 she commenced to vomit. After this she began raving and calling to have all those people sent away although there was only McCabe and an old man in the house. He wished to send for a doctor but she would not have one. Between 12 and 1 she again commenced retching and died shortly after. When she died Mr. Charles McMillan, who keeps the Cove Inn across the street, and his mother were there. Mr. McMillan said: "A little after 12 my mother called me, saying McCabe wanted her to got over, Mrs. McCabe was in convulsions; as soon as she recovered my mother told me to go for a doctor, but Mrs. McCabe said not to, as she would be better in a little while; she went from one convulsion to another, and appeared in great pain about the chest and stomach. She died about 1.20. Mr. McMillan stated that Mrs. McCabe was a healthy woman, and he had never known her to have fits before. She was addicted to drink, however. The only persons in the house besides McCabe and his wife up to the time the McMillans went over was an old man who works about the place for his board. Mrs. McCabe was a strong, stout woman, about 60 years of age, and had been married to McCabe about 18 months ago. The inn was hers and she was generally considered in comfortable circumstances. Her former husband was John Baldy, who died some eight or nine months previous to her marriage. The neighbors say that she had a row with McCabe Friday afternoon over the removal of an outhouse, and that he made threats to her, but this story McCabe denies.

McCabe is a man between 55 and 60, of medium size, greyish red moustache and whiskers, trimmed, and looks like an old veteran. This was his second wife. About two years ago his first wife was supposed to have under very suspicious circumstances near Ingersoll. McCabe and a doctor were arrested for murder and sent for trial. They were tried before Mr. Justice Wilson at Woodstock. The trial was a long and exciting one, and excited the greatest interest. The Judge charged very strongly against the prisoners. The jury retired before 6 o'clock at night and about 8 sent down word they could not agree. The Judge again charged the jury and again locked them up. At midnight they had failed to agree and were discharged. The prisoners remained in jail until next Assizes. Judge Galt tried the case the second time. After hearing part of the evidence the judge said there was no case for the jury and DISCHARGED THE PRISONERS.

The first Mrs. McCabe had been well off and McCabe got her property, which, however, was mostly swallowed up in litigation. McCabe's home is in Euphemia Lambton county, where he has resided on and off for 40 years. A year ago last fall he came to London in connection with legal business, met Mrs. Baldy, and some time after married her. McCabe was a sober man, except on odd occasions; more so than his wife. He was quiet, and the neighbors have nothing to say against him.

Mr. and Mrs. McMillan describe Mrs. McCabe's sufferings as something terrible. The heat from her body could be felt before the hands touched her. She would cry for water, and this being offered her, she would go off into another convulsion.

OPENING THE INQUEST.

The jury after being sworn viewed the body. The face presented a wrinkled, agitated appearance, as if the woman had been tossing in pain. Across the shoulder blade on the right shoulder was a short deep scratch where she had evidently torn herself while in a convulsion. There were no other marks about the body. She was a remarkably well proportioned woman, and in her younger days was, no doubt, handsome. After viewing the body the jury decided to adjourn until 7.30 Monday evening in the interim session room at the courthouse.

THE AUTOPSY

Immediately after the withdrawal of the jury, Dr. Waugh, assisted by Dr. Wishart, commenced a post-mortem examination. Dr. Brown, on behalf of the prisoner, was also present. The examination lasted some five hours, and was a most thorough one. Every vital portion of the body was dissected and examined carefully. A reporter yesterday called upon all the medical men who assisted at the autopsy, but they all declined to give any information until examined at the inquest. However, the reporter succeeded in gleaning from various sources that all the organs of the body, exclusive of the stomach, had been found in a comparatively

HEALTHY CONDITION.

There was nothing which could apparently cause death. In fact it is said that one doctor remarked that the organs were in as healthy a condition as those of any corpse he had ever examined. The stomach presented an such as would have been caused by poison, but which might also be due to other causes. It was concluded, however, to remove and place it in a jar so that it might be analysed. The tongue was also taken out for a proper examination.

McCabe had been released from jail on an order from Squire Peters, and was allowed to attend the funeral as chief mourner in charge of detective Schram. He appeared not to take things so easy to-day as when arrested. He was rather talkative and stated that on several occasions Mrs. McCabe

HAD THREATENED SUICIDE.

Once about a couple of weeks since he had heard some one removing boards from a cistern in the cellar, and, on going down had found Mrs. McCabe taking the cover off with the intention of drowning herself. He also stated that on the afternoon previous to her death she had threatened to take poison. He said she had poison in the house which she had obtained from the late Dr. Stephenson.

ABOUT THE FAMILY HISTORY.

It is asserted, upon what may be termed good authority, that two weeks since the couple secured the services of a solicitor in the city and made their wills, the woman in favor of her husband and the latter in favor of his wife, the one surviving the other to take all. From the fact, as is alleged, that McCabe was not possessed of any property, those seeking for a motive are not slow to turn the drawing up of this will to the disadvantage of the accused.

PETER GORMAN'S STORY.

The only person who was at the inquest the evening, besides McCabe and his wife, was an old man named Peter Gorman, who does chores around the place. The reporter did not find Gorman himself, but was told his story by a reliable person. He said that it was between 10 and 11 that Mrs. McCabe was first taken sick. Before that, between 9 and 10, the three had been in the sitting-room talking, and disposing of a jug of beer. He said it was after Mrs. McCabe went to bed that she was taken sick. After a while she seemed to get better, and McCabe told him to go to bed. He had not been in bed long before McCabe again called him and told him to go for Mrs. McMillan. If this story is true it differs very materially from that McCabe himself stated in the presence of a reporter on Saturday. He said Mrs. McCabe was taken sick early in the evening, and commenced to vomit between 8 and 9.

THE PRISONER'S DEMEANOR.

The prisoner did not appear to take things so coolly to day. When arrested he showed not the least sign of fear or annoyance, and talked about the death, his former trial, or any other subject, without restraint. Yesterday he was still talkative, but seemed anxious. When anyone well known to him called at the jail, he would place his hand on his head and fervently declare his innocence.

THEIR PAST HISTORY.

He is said to own a farm in Euphemia, county Lambton. He was born there and lived in that township for nearly 40 years. The farm which his wife, whom he was accused of poisoning in Ingersoll, left, is still in dispute. A deed, making it over to him, was produced, but the signature of the wife was declared fraudulent and the deed repudiated. While here on legal business a little over a year ago he met Mrs. Baldy and they were married. It is said they have since led a very unhappy life. Both drank, and Mrs. McCabe very frequently sported a black eye. Mrs. McCabe has had an

EVENTFUL HISTORY.

She was a woman of very strong passions, and the force of her likings and dislikings impelled her to do what any ordinary woman would shrink from. She came originally from Perthshire, Scotland. Her maiden name was Campbell, but she was first married to a man named Hueston. On the same estate on which they lived worked a married man named John Baldy. Baldy and Mrs. Hueston fell in love, and he started for Canada, leaving his wife, and Mrs. Hueston deserted her husband and followed him, sailing from Glasgow on the 24th of May, 1864. They came to London, and Baldy opened the Westminster Hotel, which he kept up to within six or seven years ago, when he sold it to Mr. J. W. Martin, and then purchased the Dew Drop Inn, on the Wharncliffe road. During this time liquor had got a strong hold over him and he was gradually drinking himself to death. One day, however, two years ago this spring, while drunk, he fell down stairs and so injured himself that he died in eight days, never speaking after the accident. From the time Mrs. Hueston joined him here she always lived with him and passed as his wife. Her husband found them out here some four or five years ago and called upon the couple at their hotel. It is said, however, he got a very warm reception, both Mr. and Mrs. Baldy attacking him simultaneously, and when he discovered how matters stood he was lying bruised and beaten outside the door. Hueston then instituted proceedings for divorce here, and their history was then published at much greater length than it is now given. A decree, of divorce, however, was granted him, and he has since married again. Baldy's first wife is still alive, and living in Canada. She has never claimed her dower from Baldy's estate, but it is said she can be brought here inside of two days.

WAS IT STRYCHNINE?

One of the doctors who made the autopsy yesterday morning stated that there was little doubt but that Mrs. McCabe died from a dose of strychnine. Every symptom pointed to it. The intense pain, her cries for water, and her inability to take it when offered, were indications of the presence of strychnine. Again, while in a convulsion she retained her senses, which would not have been the case under ordinary circumstances. The stomach, too had the appearance of being irritated with this poison. It still contained a small quantity of watery matter which had been carefully placed in the jar with the stomach.

THE INQUEST.

The inquest was assumed Monday evening, and lasted till a very late hour. The evidence was conflicting as to the relations of the deceased with her husband, the same witnesses testifying that McCabe and his wife appeared very fond of each other and yet were often heard quarrelling, the wife on numerous occasions appearing with blackened eyes. It was clearly shown that the woman had been addicted to drink, but was of a cheerful disposition and not given to anything like despondency. She was attacked with paroxysms just before her death, in which she complained of burning, choking sensations, and asked for water. McCabe, while at her death bed gave evidence of great grief. The inquest was adjourned for one week, pending an analysis of the deceased woman's stomach.

NEW DEVELOPMENTS.

The doctors say that the description of Mrs. McCabe's death, as detailed by Mr. Charles McMillan and his mother, corresponds in every particular with that of a person dying from strychnine poisoning. The evidence, which does not seem of much consequence to the general public, is considered of the greatest importance to the medical men.

At the inquest McCabe looked very anxious and careworn. His is a face which once seen cannot be forgotten, and which it would be impossible to disguise. His forehead is rather narrow, but of the average height. His eyes are deep set, and have a bloodshot, watery look, whether from anxiety or drink, it is impossible to say. His nose is straight and regular. His mouth is not wide, but arched, and surrounded by a trimmed, reddish-grey moustache. His lower lip drops away, and his receding chin is one of the most prominent features noticeable.

TWO VERDICTS.

A Murderer Acquitted—Another Sentenced to 18 Months.

Toronto, April 27.

The jury, after deliberating two minutes yesterday acquitted Allkins, charged with manslaughter, he having deliberately shot and killed Hackett, his wife's paramour. This verdict was received with applause by the spectators, showing plainly how the public feel towards the seducer.

CHICAGO, April 28.—Sadie Raigh the waiter girl, who shot and killed Kingsley, stewart in the Briggs House in this city, for slandering her character, and this morning sentenced to eighteen months in the penitentiary on her plea of guilty of manslaughter. In passing sentence Judge Anthony said that the chastity of women in this country should be held sacred; that he who wilfully and without cause slanders a woman must expect to suffer the consequences, whatever they may be; but that the court had no desire to establish the precedent that the proper punishment for slander was death. The defendant is pleased with the sentence.

THE American press almost unanimously declared that the Cincinnati riots were excused, if not justified, by manifest miscarriage of justice, which had become chronic in the State of Ohio. Some leading journals did not hesitate to declare that it would have been better for the city, better for the States, better for the nation, if the mob had succeeded in hanging the score of murderers who were confined in the gaol, than that the military should have succeeded in saving the lives of the criminals at the expense of those of three or four times their number of comparatively innocent people. Of course it was the majesty of the law that was saved. As the law however was practically inoperative the people cannot see that anything but what was evil was saved. That grave English weekly, the Spectator not only justifies the riot, but declares in the most emphatic manner its entire sympathy with the rioters, surprise becomes astonishment, and consideration of the Spectator's reasons is demanded. The Spectator reviews the course of justice in the United States for some years past, giving statistics showing that during last year, though more than fifteen hundred convictions for murder were recorded in the United States, only ninety-three criminals were hanged. The main reason of the Spectator for its course, however, is to be found in the further statistics which it publishes, showing that murder has become almost twice as common in the United States as among the most passionate and least law-abiding people of Europe. The following are the statistics which are taken from Mulhall's "Dictionary of Statistics." Murder is the cause of death:—

In England	to 227	per 10,000,000
In Belgium	to 240	"
In France	to 165	"
In Scandinavia	to 266	"
In Germany	to 279	"
In Ireland (1879)	to 324	"
In Austria	to 319	"
In Russia	to 325	"
In Italy	to 504	"
In Spain	to 535	"
In United States	to 820	"

A DIABOLICAL PLOT.

Attempt to Blow Up the Parliament Buildings, Toronto — Discovery of Powerful Dynamite Cartridges with Fuses Attached.

Toronto, April 30.—A profound sensation was caused here through the discovery of two powerful dynamite cartridges, with wire and fuse attached, under the Crown Lands Office, Parliament Buildings. They were found by a son of one of the caretakers about 2.30 this afternoon. A thorough search was then made by officials and were found under the steps approaching the speaker's Chambers, having also wire and fuse attached. It was apparent that the dynamite had been placed in position to-day, as the cartridges could not have failed to be discovered had they been there before. Officials state that no suspicious-looking persons have been seen around to-day or lately.

EXCITEMENT AROUND THE PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

reigns supreme. The cartridges are about six inches long, by an inch and a half in diameter, and are called "Etna, No. 2," manufactured by the Etna Powder Co., of Chicago. The shells appeared to be newly oiled to keep out moisture. One of the cartridges would have been sufficient to blow up a wing of the buildings. The miscreants must have been disturbed, as an attachment was found lying a short distance from the cartridges.

THE British Budget is a somewhat cheerful one. The national debt is lower than for three quarters of a century, having been reduced over eight and a half millions sterling. As it still amounts to $3,708,404,680, it is respectable even for a first-class power. There will be a surplus this year of about a quarter of a million. The amount of interest paid is lower than since 1805, and it will be further reduced this year by the conversion of three percent consols to two and three quarters percent. As the Montreal Witness points out, while other nations are greatly reducing their debts, Canada is running hers up, having added thirty millions to it this year, or, as has been calculated, seventy-four dollars for every second of the session.

THE fire alarm Sunday morning made a shrinkage in the various church collections.

REV. R. B. Rowe occupied the pulpit of the King-street Methodist Church on last Sabbath morning and evening.

DIED.—Mrs. Shaw, wife of Rev. W. H. Shaw, of Lambeth, formerly of Ingersoll, is dead.

KNOX CHURCH.—The Rev. John Thompson, of Sarnia, preached in Knox Church on Sabbath last.

ARBOR DAY.—Stratford, Brantford, St. Thomas, Tilsonburg, and other neighbouring places have all set aside an "Arbor Day." Why not Ingersoll?

TEMPERANCE LECTURE.—The Hon. John B. Finch, of Nebraska, the celebrated temperance advocate, will speak in Ingersoll, on Wednesday evening, May 7th. A crowded house is certain.

CONCERT.—A Grand Concert will be given in the Baptist Chapel of this town on Tuesday, 13th May. Rev. Mr. Trotter of Toronto will be present and take part. Look out for particulars next week.

THE DUST.—People have suffered great inconvenience from the clouds of dust during the past few days. The petition to have the streets watered should have been circulated a month ago.

INCIPIENT FIRE.—One night last week night-watchman Flood discovered the floor of the engine house on fire. It is supposed to have caught from a coal from the heater. A new floor has been put in.

FIRE ALARM.—Considerable excitement was caused on Sunday morning by the ringing of the fire alarm, the churches being nearly emptied. The alarm was caused by a burning chimney at the residence of Mr. W. A. Sudworth.

ENGLISH MAIL.—The first mail packet for Great Britain, under the summer arrangement, will leave Quebec on the 18th May. The packet sailing from Halifax on the 3rd of May will be the last one from that port this season. Mails will close here at six a. m., every Friday, and will leave Montreal on Saturday morning.

INGERSOLL'S NEW OUTLET.—Surveyors are now busy on the line of the proposed extension of the Credit Valley from Ingersoll to Detroit, to connect with the Wabash system. It is pretty certain that the line will come to Ingersoll, although there is a possibility of its commencing at Putnam. It will certainly not be located east of Ingersoll in any event.

THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.—A numerously signed requisition requesting that the Queen's Birthday be celebrated on Monday, May 26, instead of Saturday, 24th, was presented to the Council at its last meeting, and in accordance with the wishes of the petitioners, the Mayor has appointed Monday the 26th prox., as the most suitable day for the holiday.

KNOX CHURCH.—The Rev. Dr. Clark, of Paris, who is, no doubt, well known to many in Ingersoll, will preach in Knox Church, morning and evening, May 4th. The following Sabbath, May 11, the pulpit will be occupied by the Rev. Mr. Hallam, who has just returned to this country after an active service of twenty-five years, over a large Indian-speaking congregation in India.

DUFFERIN LACROSSE CLUB.—This club has organized for the season with the following officers:—Pres., Jos. Gibson; Vice Pres., O. E. Robinson; Sec.-Treas., J. H. Hegler; Captain, E. Dundass; Com. of management, C. Cowan, E. Malone, J. Mathison, E. Eahelby and Jas. Vance, and will begin on Monday evening next, at 6:30, and every Monday, Wednesday and Friday evening during the season. They are open to receive challenges from all local clubs.

CHURCH SACRED HEART.—On Sabbath morning next, May 4, Grand High Mass will be celebrated in this church, north of the river, Father Molphy, Celebrant, with Rev. Chancellor Tiernan and Father Carlin as Deacon and Sub-Deacon After Mass there will be the opening of the Forty Hours' Devotion. Vespers at 7 p. m., at which Archbishop Bishop Walsh will deliver a lecture. All who can should avail themselves of this opportunity of hearing His Lordship, and also Rev. Father Tiernan.

LECTURE.—The Rev. Dr. Cochrane, of Brantford, delivered a very interesting lecture in St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, on Monday evening, the subject being: "Across the Rockies, through Salt Lake City to the Golden Gate of California." The church was well filled, the audience listened for upwards of two hours to the many laughable incidents which have been gleaned in life among the Mormons, and in and about Colorado and San Francisco. The proceeds are in aid of the Ladies' Missionary Society in connection with the church.

FIRE PROTECTION.—On every occasion that the fire alarm is sounded the necessity of having a team of horses to draw the engine becomes apparent. It is too much to expect citizens to plow through the mud and haul the engine to every fire, and there are very few of them who do it. The work is left to a few and very slow progress is the consequence. A bonus should be offered to the first team on the spot after an alarm, or a team should be purchased, which might also be utilized for corporation work. Unless some other system than the present one is speedily adopted, the consequences may some day prove most serious.

M. E. CHURCH.—At the late Conference of this denomination the Rev. Mr. Laycock was appointed to the pastorate of the Charles-street Church here, and preached to his new charge last Sabbath. The Parkhill Gazette thus speaks of this gentleman when leaving his late station:—"Our readers will regret to hear of the departure from Parkhill of the Rev. John Laycock, who goes to Ingersoll. He has been here three years, and during that time has made wonderful additions to the membership and congregation of this church here—once the weakest, and now one of the strongest congregations. Mr. L. is an indefatigable worker, a rare manager of men, an eloquent speaker, and Ingersoll is to be congratulated upon securing his services there."

LARGE CONGREGATIONS.—Since the advent of Father Molphy the services of the R. C. Church of this town have been very largely attended, particularly the Vespers. During the past few Sunday evenings the above gentleman has been giving excellent discourses bearing upon "The principal objections made by Protestants against Catholicism." Rev. Molphy is a pleasing and clever speaker, and his discourses are couched in such language as to command even the marked attention and respect of those who may strongly differ with him. Some there are, no doubt, in this section who well remember the warm controversy which this gentleman was engaged in with two ministers of different churches, some years ago, when stationed in Strathroy, out of which, it is said, this gentleman came with flying colors, having tripped up his opponents on their giving incorrect translations (through ignorance or wilfulness we cannot say) of certain Latin passages. Be as it may, Rev. Molphy won for himself golden opinions when at Strathroy, and in fast winning the good will and respect of this community, in which he has lately been placed, and with which we hope he will long be identified.

PERSONAL.—Mrs. Kirkwood of this town, and her sons A. J. Kirkwood, Chicago, and P. B. Kirkwood, Negaunee, Lake Superior, leave for Europe by the City of Rome on the 17th of May from New York. They will be absent about three months.—Mr. D. Holmes, an old resident and merchant, of Ingersoll, we are sorry to say is now very ill and in a very precarious state at Barrie.—J. L. Grant, of Liverpool, is in town on business in connection with his large interests here.—D. McMillan, M. P. for East Middlesex, was in town yesterday.—Albert A. Allen left on Tuesday for Sarnia, where he is going into the fishery business on Lake Huron, four miles above Point Edward. Mr. Allen was very successful here when he carried on the business of teaming, but expects a "bigger thing" in his new avocation.—Mr. and Mrs. R. F. Hunter leave on Monday next for Denver, Colorado, where they intend to make their home in future.—Rev. W. H. Shaw was in town on Tuesday.—John Coldridge leaves for Battleford on Monday, 12th May, to look after his timber interests. He will be absent all summer.—The Rev. John Reades was out yesterday for the first time in seven weeks. We hope to learn of his rapid recovery of sound health.

C. V. R. EXTENSION.

Probable Route from Ingersoll to Detroit.

Mr. Lumsden, engineer of the Ontario & Quebec and C. V. R. Railways, has arrived in London, and will oversee the work of surveying the C. V. R. extension to Detroit, towards which 90,000 ties and other supplies have already been purchased. Two surveying parties began operations to-day, one beginning at Ingersoll and working in a westerly direction to London, and the other beginning at Chatham, and following the route outlined easterly from that town to London. In addition to the line about to be surveyed from Ingersoll, a second route will be staked out from a point at or near Putnamville, and the data of both of these will be submitted to the Directors for decision. Entering London West, the route will be in a line directly west through the Stiles, Peters and Smith farms, and thence to Hyde Park, following as nearly as possible the original line of the old Great Western survey in 1880, upon which a large amount of money was expended. After leaving Hyde Park and proceeding westerly through the southerly portions of the townships of London and Lobo, to a point in the township of Caradoc, about four miles south of Strathroy, where it diverges slightly, the line takes an almost direct westerly course through the townships of Ekfrid and Mosa (running about three miles north of Glencoe and Newbury), and touch at Lewisville, in the township of Chatham. The new line will enter Chatham North, traversing the townships of East and West Tilbury, avoiding the marshes, and thence through Rochester, Maidstone, East and West Sandwich to Windsor, entering at the southerly portion of that town. The connection on the American side will be with the Wabash system.

ST. JAMES' CHURCH.

Adjourned Meeting of Vestry.

The adjourned vestry meeting was held on Monday.

The resignation of M. Walsh as people's churchwarden was received and accepted. Mr. C. W. Ferguson was appointed the people's churchwarden for the ensuing year.

On motion the Report of the Parsonage Committee was adopted with slight amendment. The Report read as follows:

To the Vestry of St. James' Church, Ingersoll.

We the Committee appointed to devise ways and means for the payment of the debt of the Parsonage beg to report as follows:—

That proper lists be prepared and each member of the congregation or head of a family be induced to agree to give certain sums per week, according to the ability of such person, payable either weekly or monthly at the option of the subscriber.

That these subscriptions be applied only to the payment of the debt now owing on the parsonage and that all future interest be paid out of the current receipts of the church.

That the liability incurred by subscribers shall not extend beyond four (4) years and shall cease as soon as the debt is paid within that period.

Under the scheme above proposed it is expected one thousand dollars ($1000) per year can be raised.

Finally we beg to suggest that the following gentlemen, viz.: Messrs. Jas. Chapman, Sr., and William Underwood, be added to this Committee, and that this Committee so constitute, solicit and obtain the subscriptions from the congregation and arrange for the collection and application of money subscribed, with power to fill vacancies should any of the Committee move away or refuse or become unable to act.

All of which your Committee respectfully submit.

THOS. WELLS, Chairman.
C. W. FERGUSON, Secr'y.

Dated this 25th day of April, A. D. 1884.

Moved by James F. McDonald, seconded by F. Symons, and resolved, that the Committee appointed by this Vestry to derive a plan for the payment of the debt on the Rectory be continued in the service for which it was appointed, and with full authority to add subscriptions, collect moneys, to hold the same when collected, and to apply them from time to time in payment of the debt for which they are contributed as, may appear to the Committee to be wise and judicious.

On motion the churchwardens were authorized to make such expenditure from the church funds as they shall deem necessary as occasion may require, for the decent burial of destitute deceased church members and that this be extended to meet the case of the late Mr. Wallace.

The meeting adjourned.

FILLING THE TANKS.—The "steamer" was out on Monday night filling the tanks.

THE Hon. J. B. Finch will deliver his lecture on temperance in the King-street Methodist Church, on Wednesday evening next. Tickets 20 cents.

TEACHERS SALARIES.—At the regular meeting of the High and Public School Trustees, on Tuesday evening, the salaries of the teachers were increased 20 per cent.

FIRE.—On Friday morning last Mr. Wm. Watterworth's residence caught fire from sparks out of the chimney falling on the roof, doing some damage to the cornice and deck roof. Mr. Watterworth's loss is fully covered by insurance.

B. C. CHURCH.—The usual preaching service will be held in this church on Sabbath afternoon next. In the evening, the pastor, Rev. R. B. Rowe, will give the last of the course of lectures which have been given on Bible History, to be illustrated by seven new diagrams.

CALEDONIAN SOCIETY.—A large meeting of the Caledonians took place at J. C. Hegler's office on Tuesday evening, and a good deal of business was transacted in the way of preparations for a grand day on the 24th of May. A number of new features will appear in the programme. The concert committee have engaged Miss Robinson, of New York, a bright particular star in the firmament of song.

DEATH OF MRS. M. A. GILBERT.—Her many friends will regret to learn of the death of Mrs. M. A. Gilbert, wife of the manager of the Imperial Bank, St. Thomas, which took place about 4 o'clock on Wednesday afternoon of last week. Deceased had been ill for nearly a year, consequently her demise was not unexpected. Mrs. Gilbert was formerly Miss Jane Choate, of "Beechwood," West Oxford, and was married in 1876. She leaves four young children.

SPECTACLES.—From the time of Roger Bacon spectacles have been known to be of inestimable benefit to the old and those of weak eyes. The history of spectacles is interesting to the curiously inclined. Great improvements have been made in recent times. The best spectacles now made are those of Laurance of Old London, recommended by the most eminent oculists in the world. From an adv. elsewhere it will be seen that D. Secord, druggist, is sole agent for Laurance's goods here.

TREE PLANTING.—We have on several occasions drawn attention to the Ontario Tree Planting Act. The present is a good time to do so again. Under it the council of any municipality are authorized to pay out of the municipal funds a bonus not exceeding twenty-five cents for every tree planted within their jurisdiction on any highway or boundary line or farm. The Legislature voted $50,000 for this purpose called the Ontario Tree Planting Fund. The kinds of trees are specified in the Act, and they must be planted at least 30 feet apart. They are: Ash, basswood, beech, birch, butternut, cedar, cherry, chestnut, elm, hickory, oak pine, sassafras, spruce, walnut or whitewood.

ST. ANDREWS' CHURCH.—The Church in Ingersoll formerly known as Erskine Church, was reopened on Sunday as St. Andrew's Church. The Rev. H. M. Parsons, of Knox Church, Toronto, assisted by the pastor, Rev. P. R. Roos, preached excellent and impressive discourses to large congregations, besides teaching a Bible class in the afternoon composed of several hundred. The collections were exceedingly liberal. The Rev. Mr. Parsons in the morning preached from Ephesians 2: 20-21; in the afternoon he gave an instructive lecture on the Sunday School. He based his evening remarks upon the inspiration of God's word, delivering a very interesting discourse. The choir, under the able supervision of Mr. Dunnet, made the singing particularly interesting.

THE ODDFELLOWS' CONCERT.—The concert given by the Oddfellows of Ingersoll on the 65th anniversary of the Order in America proved a most entertaining one, reflecting the highest praise on the fraternity. The hall was filled and the different performances were most heartily received. Mrs. McCullough (nee Miss Maggie Barr,) of Hamilton, who has previously appeared before Ingersoll audiences, sustained her reputation, her singing being received with delight. Miss Malcolmson, of Toronto, sang very sweetly, and was heartily applauded. Mr. Jas. Johnson of Hamilton, formerly of this town, sang with his old time vigor and received hearty encores. The singing of Mr. Skinner of London, also elicited loud applause. Those who took part from Ingersoll were: Miss Doty, Mrs. Chapman, Miss E. Poole, and Mr. J. Telfer. Mrs. J. A. McInnes performed the duties of accompanist in a highly creditable manner. Postmaster Gibson occupied the chair.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

Chancery Division.

The sittings of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice commenced at Woodstock on the 17th inst., before the Hon. the Chancellor. The docket was exceptionally large, there being eighteen cases set down for hearing, besides a remanet from the last court. The Toronto bar was represented by Messrs. Moss, Q.C., Cassels, Q.C. and Blackstock.

The first case on the list was that of Cowan vs. Vroom, but on its being called and no one appearing for either plaintiff or defendant it was struck out.

Gunn vs. Burgess—Was an action brought by William Gunn, who claimed to be the owner of a half interest in the mare "Simcon," against S. G. Burgess, of Woodstock. It appeared that the mare had been the property of John Garthwaite, late of East Oxford, and on his leaving the province she was sold among his other effects by the Sheriff, and purchased by Mr. Burgess. The plaintiff, however, claimed that he had purchased a half interest in the mare from Garthwaite, and produced a receipt signed by him for the purchase money, and the plaintiff having notified Mr. Burgess of his claim, before the sale to him, obtained a judgment for the value of his half interest with costs. Moss, Q.C., and S. G. McKay, for plaintiff; Cassels, Q.C. and Fletcher, for defendant.

Wills vs. Carrall—The plaintiff was a farm laborer employed by H. J. Carrall, late of West Zorra, and brought this action to recover the amount of wages due him. The plaintiff alleged a specific agreement with Carrall that he should be paid $15 per month; but the defendant having proved a quantum meruit, and that his claim had already been satisfied the action was dismissed with costs. Fletcher & Finkle, for plf.; Finkle & McKay, for dft.

Treffry vs. Baybrook—Was for specific performance of a contract for the purchase of lands in South Norwich. The defence was that the agreement was not in writing and was consequently void under the Statute of Frands. Council for defence, however, applied for and obtained an order to amend their defence, and the case will be tried in London this week. Blackstock, for plf.; Duncan, for def.

Snyder vs. Tremaine—Was settled out of court.

Imperial Bank vs. Leonard—An action brought by the Imperial Bank, Ingersoll, to act aside a chattel mortgage made by one Bailey, a carriage maker in that town, to his sister-in-law, Kate Leonard, the defendant, upon the ground that the same was a fraudulent preference of a creditor. It was shown in evidence that Bailey was in insolvent circumstances when the mortgage was given and that the goods mentioned therein were not at the time on the premises stated in the mortgage. Judgment for plf. with costs. Moss, Q.C., and Wells, for plf.; Cassels, Q.C., for dft.

Vroman vs. Vroman et al—The plaintiff is the owner of a life lease granted by defendant Vroman, upon lands in East Oxford. In October, 1883, the defendant Piper recorded a judgment against his co-defendant Vroman for $4,380, and the plaintiff now claims that his life lease should have priority over the judgment of Piper. Judgment declaring that the life lease has priority over the judgment of defendant Piper, and against defendant Vroman for $3691, the amount of rent unpaid. Cassels, Q.C., for Ball, Q.C., for plf.; Fletcher & Finkle, for def.

Ford vs. Workman et al.—The plaintiff is the assignee of a patent for a machine for shaping pump tubes, known as Ford's Pump Tube Jointer, and alleges that the defendants, who are pump makers in Plattsville, have infringed his patent by using one of the machines without authority. The defendants proved, however, that they had obtained permission to use the machine from the original patentee, and the action was dismissed with costs on this ground.

Sackrider vs. Sackrider—The plaintiff and defendant are brothers, both residing in North Norwich, and have been since 1879 farming in partnership. The plaintiff now asks for a dissolution, owing to the miscontduct and fraud of his brother, the defendant claims that no partnership has ever existed and that the property alleged to belong to the partnership is his own. A reference was ordered to the Master at Woodstock, to take the accounts and dissolve the partnership. Ball & Ball, for plf.; Fletcher & Finkle, dft.

Sackrider vs. Sackrider—Was a cross action between the same parties, and involving the same matter as the previous suit. A like order was made in this case. Fletcher & Finkle, for plf.; Ball & Ball, for def.

Sackrider vs. Sackrider—Brought by the wife of John Sackrider against her husband for alimony. It was proved by the defence that before the separation of the plaintiff and defendant, which took place in August, 1883, the plaintiff had executed a deed of separation, by which she was allowed by her husband $1,000, payable $100 per annum. The plaintiff claimed that she did not understand its effect. The court, however, thought otherwise, and the action was dismissed with costs.

Fish vs. Fletcher—Stands over till next court.

Wilson vs. Muir—The plaintiff is a farmer in East Zorra, and having become involved applied in February last to the defendant for a loan of money to assist him in his difficulties. An arrangement was made between them whereby the plaintiff assigned all his goods to Muir, who was to sell the same, buy up the executions against the plaintiff, and pay off a chattel mortgage on the goods, and after retaining 15 per cent. commission and expenses, pay over the balance to plaintiff. The mortgagee of the chattels refusing to allow the goods to be sold unless he was first allowed the amount of his claim it became impossible to carry out this arrangement, and the plaintiff then executed a bill of sale to defendant of all the chattels in question. This instrument was absolute in form, but the plaintiff claimed that it was only made in order to further the carrying out of the first agreement. Judgment for plaintiff, and directing an account to be taken by the Master to ascertain the amount due the plaintiff under the first agreement. Blackstock & Fletcher for plf.; Cassels, Q.C., and Ball, Q.C., for dft.

Whitelaw vs. Mabee—Was an action under the mechanics' lien act, the plf. obtaining judgment directing a reference to the Master to find out the subsequent holders of liens and add them as parties to the action and fix the amounts. Moss, Q.C., for plf.; Cassels, Q.C., for def.

Bennett vs Story—Stands over to amend pleadings.

Barwick vs. Cameron—Settled out of court.

McMichael vs. Sage—This action was tried in 1883, resulting in a verdict for plaintiffs, but since that judgment a will made by Anna Burtch, under whom the plff. claims, has been found, bequeathing all the property in question to the Baptist church. The plf. claimed, as heiress of Anna Burtch, and the defendant as executors of her husband. The new will of course defeats the plaintiff's claim, and as the principal witness for the defence has become insane, it was arranged that both parties should waive all claims to the property and vest it in the Baptist church. The action was accordingly dismissed without costs.

Hunter vs. Ferris—Was settled out of court, as was also Cameron vs. Wills.—Sentinel.

REMARKS.

The school is in a thorough efficient state. The teachers (particularly the Principal) are skillful. I think the attention of the trustees should be called to the fact that the present work of distributing the Legislative grant renders it possible for them by a comparatively small additional expenditure to pay the teachers more adequate salaries.

Literary Notes.

The contents of the May number of Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly are, as usual, extremely varied. Among the notable articles are: "Russia's Latest Annexation—Merv"; "The Origin of New York Churches"; "The Adventures of Bold Alonzo de Oqeda"; "Morocco and the Moors," etc. Lady Blanche Murphy, Etta W. Pierce, Garry Moss, Fanny Driscoll, Annie Thomas and others, contribute serials, short stories, adventures, etc. The miscellany is large, most interesting and instructive. The Bible and Its Value.

PAPER IV.

Another prominent point of excellence in the Bible is its high and beautiful morality. There is not a single evil in existence, gigantic nor diminutive, the Bible does not condemn by words stated or implied, while every possible good is countenanced or enforced. By the scriptures we are urged to love our neighbours as ourselves, and as far as possible to do good unto all men. Though the Bible recognizes the possibility of the best of mankind going astray, yet it enforces in the most uncompromising manner that every man, though he be a David or a Peter, must sincerely repent, ere he can again be restored in the favor of God. The best of men may be weary in well doing, yet the promises of the Bible blessedly lessens the burdens of life and brightens the prospect of the toiler by pointing to a future reward. In a tone of striking majesty it saith, "Be not weary in well doing, in due season ye shall reap if ye faint not." We cannot find a single circumstance or relation in life, which the untarnished morality of the Bible does not seek to bless, with its benign influence. Husbands are to love their wives, and the wife is to reverence her husband. Parents are not to provoke their children to wrath, but to train them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Children are taught to honor their parents and to care for them in the time of infirmity. Families are requested to dwell together in peace and unity, and to assist each other to general improvement. Masters are required to be just to their servants, while the servant is enjoined to be faithful in the service of his master. Magistrates are entreated to be a terror to evil doers, and to be a praise to all law abiding citizens. The wealthy are told to use their talent for the common good by abounding in every good work, while the working classes have in the beautiful life of the "carpenter's son," a right royal example of the dignity of labor. The man who earns his bread honorably by the sweat of his brow is in as good a position to be a gentleman of the first order as any other man. Pastors are to use their gifts to the utmost, and to make the conversion of mankind their highest aim. Are we sick, are we forsaken, are we bereft of a friend, or are we brought to the verge of the tomb—the place appointed for all the living. There is in the Bible a sovereign balm for every wound, a cordial for every fear. How unique and yet how comprehensive. Where can we find morality equal to this? Nowhere! Moreover, the precepts of the Bible are taught in a manner untouched by anything else. There are figures of speech in great variety mingled with considerations the most comprehensible. Appeals are made to the best feelings of our nature which seek to charm and captivate the soul. The noblest incentives conceivable are brought into play to lead the Bible reader into the way of all truth. We can read of Divine regard, amazing love, matchless grace, infinite wisdom, unconquerable sympathy, and abundant mercy, etc. These are but a few the many motive powers of the book of God. The Bible is its best commentary, its own best explanation. The bruised reed does not explain the sturdy oak, nor can the faintest star explain the magnificence of the firmament. Let the Bible be studied, and its beauties will be seen, and its blessings realized.

The success of the Union referred to was as follows:—The attendance at public worship dropped off perceptibly, in fact was not so large as that of Knox Church alone before the Union, and the receipts into the treasury were not latterly sufficient to pay the current expenses.

The small minority alluded to filled the body of old Knox Church last Sunday at the morning service, every pew being occupied, and the attendance during the evening was better than I have often seen it during the last six months.

I make these explanations, not from any ill-will towards those who have gone over to Erskine Church, whom I take this opportunity of wishing every manner of success, but from the fact that there is plenty of room for two Presbyterian Churches in town, and that late events will waken up both congregations to more active work in the cause of Christianity; but I could not allow such misrepresentations to go unanswered.

Our genial friend, Andrew Beath, has taken his departure from our village for Mt. Elgin, where he has secured a situation. He will be much missed, particularly by the Literary Society, of which he was an active member. That success may attend him is the wish of his many friends.

Quite a number of changes have taken place in the village lately. Mr. Cole has removed to town, Wm. Wallace across the river to the house lately occupied by Mrs. Rice, and A. Fisher to the one vacated by Mr. Cole. Next comes the post-office which will be removed this week.

It is with deep regret we have to chronicle the death and burial of Miss Jane Humphrey, aged 25 years. The friends have the heart-felt sympathy of the community. Mrs. Richard Moulton also died very suddenly last week and was buried in Ingersoll. She leaves a husband and a large family of small children. Much sympathy is felt for the family.

Our old friend, John Pile, visited us this week.

It is the intention of the young men to organize a base ball club soon.

The Baptist charge is still vacant. An excellent sermon was preached last Sunday evening by Rev. Mr. Willet, Toronto.

The farmers in this vicinity are busy with their spring work. They intend having draining done to a great extent this year.

We can boast of one of the best temperance lodges in the country, every meeting being exceedingly interesting.

Quite a number of our young people attended the Oddfellows entertainment in Ingersoll last Friday evening.

A number of young men from Folden's Corners and vicinity have joined themselves together under the title of "Daniels Band." They had the use of the Methodist Church of this place last Sunday afternoon and evening.

INGERSOLL CHEESE MARKET.

During the past week about three car loads of cheese have been sold at 12½ to 12¾c., last half of April; about two car loads for sale. There has been no pasture as yet, the cold weather keeping the grass back. Warm rains are greatly needed.

Sales in the Brockville district were made during the past few days at 11¾c. to 11¾c., and there will be some offerings in Belleville during the coming week.

LITTLE FALLS CHEESE MARKET.

Little Falls, April 28th.—At the market on Tuesday, transactions showed a very wide range in prices. Sales from 7c. to 12¾c.; 327 boxes at 9¾c.; 982 at 10c.; 589 at 11c.; 273 at 11¾c.; 411 at 12c.; 799 on com. Total 4,026.

UTICA CHEESE MARKET.

Utica, April 28.—The transactions on Monday were as follows: Two lots, 51 boxes at 12c.; 35 lots, 2,659 boxes, at 12¼c.; 2 lots, 110 boxes, at 12¾c.; 2 lots, 151 boxes, at 12¾c. Sales 2,371 boxes; commissions 282 boxes; total, 2,653 boxes. Ruling price 12¾c., which is ¾c. below the ruling price of a year ago.

THE LATE CHEESE MARKETS.

Altho' the market was fairly cleaned up last week because buyers were bound to get rid of what goods they had, very few cheese were sold at 13c, and some of that which was bought in the country at 12¾c was disposed of in New York at the same price. This cheese, of course, lost the freight and commission. The weather has been warm and dry for a week past, but grass has made no start yet, and will not until we get a warm rain. Perhaps it is just as well that it should not start too early, as we are very liable to get frosts in early May that would damage everything which had begun to make a growth. Cows are giving quite as much milk as usual, and the make is fully equal to that of a year ago. Cheese has fallen off ¾c, partly in sympathy with the new stock, and partly because there is very little first class cheese of that make in the market to bid on. Thirteen cents has come to be the standard price for new cheese on the 1st of May, as can be seen by referring to former records. The present price, therefore, is up to the average, and is as good as could be expected. Following is our usual table of comparison:

LIVERPOOL CHEESE MARKET.

On Saturday cheese in Liverpool took a further decline, the price according to Beerbohm going down to 66s. a drop of 5s.6d. per cwt recently. On Tuesday, however, a rise of 1s. was reported. This was a surprise to the trade coming so quickly upon Beerbohm's reported decline of 6d on Saturday, the public cable being quoted at 68s.

FARM AND DAIRY.

Care of Cows at Calving Time.

In a state of nature cows give milk only for a limited time, and this time has been much extended by man's art. But by forcing nature we have produced an animal which is more liable to disease and accidents,and as a result the care and treatment must be improved in proportion. In nature few if any accidents or diseases are attendant upon parturition. If we have improved upon nature in some respects, we must see to it that we make like improvement in all essential connecting points. Different animals of the same breed give milk for different lengths of time naturally, and just how near to parturition a cow should be milked before drying off is an unsettled question. We keep cows, for profit, and the longer we can induce them, limitedly, to hold out in their milk the better we are satisfied. In order that the cow may give milk, and at the same time support an increasing fœtus, the feed and care must be proportionately generous. My own practice and opinion is that a cow to be profitable should hold out her milk,and be milked to within six weeks, or two months at most, of calving. I have had them give milk to within four weeks without apparent detriment to dam or offspring, and with only ordinary treatment and care. A cow which is kept in good but not high condition will hold out in milk longer than one in poor condition, and will pass parturition with much less risk.

Commencing say six weeks before time for calving a change in feeding should generally be adopted, slight at first and greater at the approach of parturition. It is natural for pregnant animals to become costive as the period of delivery approaches, and the feed should be given with reference to such tendency. The object is to keep the bowels open and in a normal state; this result is attained by feeding a few roots—potatoes are the best, I think—commencing with about one quart per day and gradully increasing to ten, twelve, or even more. Other roots may be substituted, or even a pail of slops—bran, middings or the like, in water, say one to three quarts in a pail of scalding hot water—in the absence of roots. Most of the roots may be omitted if the cow runs in pasture with flush feed, or can have a feed once or twice a day of green,succulent food,like ensilage, if sweet and good. All these are preventives of constipation.

About a week before calving, the cow, if kept up, should have a box stall or pen sufficiently large for convenience, so that she may not be worried by other stock. She should not be disturbed any more than is necessary for feeding and watering; still one should keep an eye over her as the time approaches for her calving. I have never yet seen the necessity for administering any medicine before calving; neither do I believe there is any, where the cow is healthy and properly cared for. The cow should have moderate exercise daily, and should never be worried. If at pasture she will get natural exercise. Her stall should be always dry and kept well cleaned. I do not recommend any interference, or the presence of any individual in her sight at calving, but the herdsman may be in proximity, unseen by the cow, but where he can observe her movements. I consider even this as unnecessary, where previous conditions are normal. Where one foot or leg only appears, and the other is doubled back, often a little assistance by pushing the calf back just at the right time and straightening out the other leg will result in good, and may be done by any one of good judgment. Anything farther than this belongs to the veterinary surgeon.

If the cow is in health, the placenta will come away naturally in the course of a few hours at most. Let the cow get at and lick the calf all she wishes. If the placenta come away immediately, put it out of sight. After the cow has licked the calf, let it suck what it will, and when satisfied strip out any remaining milk and give it to the cow to drink, adding a little (say an equal quantity, if the whole does not make over a pailful,) warm water, stirring in about one quart of rye meal or shorts. Such a mess will be all the medicine necessary in ordinary cases. Let the calf and cow remain together for 24 or 48 hours, giving the cow water slightly warmed. Then they may be separated —the cow put in her stall or to pasture, and the calf put into a small, clean and dry pen. After the calf is 24 or 48 hours old, if the cow's bag is caked or hard, twice a day is sufficient for the calf to suck. When the cow feels inclined to eat, she should be given some sweet fine rowen, or if at grass, may graze as usual. She is better if fed as long as she and the calf are together. Her drink for a few days should be slightly warmed, What she needs is quiet and rest with nourishing food—not stimulating drugs and medicines.

Should the cow's bag be caked or hard, fomenting with warm water and working thoroughly but carefully, by hand, will very likely soon reduce it to normal conditions. Feed the cow generously with good hay or grass, giving nothing of a heating nature like corn or oil meal for two weeks after calving, after which she may be gradually returned to her usual feed with the herd. There is nothing gained by "coddling;" natural food, treatment and conditions are better, while nature restores and asserts itself. If the cow receives the foregoing treatment and care, with no undue exposure to cold and storms, there is no apprehension from future trouble from any natural cause. When the calf is 48 to 72 hours old it may be taught to drink from a pail instead of sucking. Give it say 2 quarts of new, first drawn milk at a feed at first, increasing the quantity as the calf grows. Four quarts a day is sufficient for the first week, fed three times a day, at equal intervals in equal quantities. Let the calf take two of the fingers at first, as it would the natural teat. After feeding once or twice thus, the fingers may be gradually withdrawn while the calf is taking the milk, and the calf soon learns to drink without the fingers. A leather strap or artificial teat fastened to the pail so that the calf will suck in the milk slowly, will be most natural, allowing the saliva to flow and mix with the food to a greater degree.

Setting trouble aside, feeding instead of suckling is the better way, whether the calf is to be raised or fattened for the shambles. After the first week, a little oat or barley meal may be added to the milk, beginning with a tablespoonful at a feed and increasing to a pint a day at the end of six weeks. At the end of two weeks, two parts of skimmed to one of new milk may be fed with the meal instead of all new milk—the quantity being increased as the calf grows older. Judgment may be used here. If too much is given the calf will grow pot-bellied; if not sufficient, the calf will be poor. After the calf is two weeks old, two feeds a day are sufficient, with a little clean water and a whisp of hay or grass within its reach. Hay tea may be substituted for milk, if the calf is raised, mixing a little larger portion of oat, barley or linseed meal than with the milk, gradually increasing its feed as the calf grows. Always give the calf a clean, dry bed and pen, with free air without exposure to storms or the hot sun. The longer you feed the calf on milk, the better the growth, up to six months or more; but usually the calf will gain its livlihood by grazing after reaching the age of 12 or 14 weeks. Water should be supplied, so that they may drink at pleasure; and also, after the calf is two or three weeks old, a lump of chalk and one of rock salt for it to lick. If scours occur, reduce the feed for a time; fasting is better than drugs or medicine.—W. H. White, in Country Gentleman, Worchester County, Mass.

About Jerseys.

From the Macon (Ga.) Telegraph.

"It would be difficult to obtain a correct list," said the Colonel, "but I think it safe to estimate that there are to-day 500 full-blooded Jerseys in Georgia. Of course there are grades innumerable. Georgia, however, is behind Alabama and Mississippi in the Jersey business, and Texas is rapidly pushing forward."

"What is the favorite strain of blood?"

"That also is a difficult question to answer. It is a question of taste. We have here in Georgia representatives of the prominent island favorites, for each of whom much is claimed, and many of their descendants have distinguished themselves in this country."

"What is your plan of general treatment?"

"Well, I divide my herd into three classes. The calves I place in one lot, the yearlings in another, and in the last the cows. The bull also has a range to himself when he is quiet. I do this to protect each class from injuries always liable when different sizes are allowed to run together. The calves are taken from their mothers on the second day and taught to drink the milk when carried to them. They soon learn this, and will run to meet the person who feeds them. It is best when the separation is made to place the mother and offspring beyond each other's call. These young calves I turn into my lawn, where they are directly under the household supervision. To me they are ornamental as so many deer would be. The yearlings have in their lot a shelter opening toward the south and floored with leaves and straw. The cows are also provided with shelter under the barn, three sides of which are enclosed. The question of shelter I consider very important. It can do no good to leave young calves exposed to the weather, and exposure will reduce the cow's yield sometimes from one-third to one-half in a day. The shelter I think should always be so arranged as to permit them to sleep in the open air when they desire it. They will always seek shelter whenever the weather becomes unpleasant. I feed my cattle on peas, oats, clover and bran, cutting the peavines with the peas upon them and the oats when in the dough state. I find these the best articles of food to produce a free flow of rich milk. I am not an advocate of utilizing the heifers at a very early age. It makes smaller cows. A Jersey heifer ought to be at least 24 months old before calving. This is, I know, in opposition to custom and perhaps nature, but my belief is the small size of the Jersey cow is as much attributable to too early breeding as to too close in-breeding.

Selecting Breeders from the Spring Litter of Pigs.

The most promising selections for show purposes will not, as a matter of course, be the best pig to set apart to be used as a breeder. Natural tendency to fatten and fatness in the fully developed state, are necessary in the show-pig; but pretty much all high-bred swine, as bred in these days, have as strong a tendency to obesity as it is safe to encourage in breeding animals, if we expect to count eight or ten pigs in a litter, pretty much all having a good lease of life from the start. The best show pig may come from the smallest sow in the herd, yet as a rule it is not wise to select breeders from that class. We want the most size in the shortest time, and, as stated, there are hardly any pigs in these days that do not inherit ample fattening proclivities, so that we can quite safely forego a little of the fat that we may secure in the prospective breeder roominess and tendency to growth. All litters, no matter how well bred, show variations at weaning time, and appearances indicate that we can know the best pig for future almost from the start. These appearances, however, are often deceptive, as we find a few months later, the the best pig at weaning time may not do as well as expected during the next following three or four months; hence it is best to notice the development, eventually choosing those having size and with greater width, depth and length, combined with the finest points. The practice which many have of discarding the old sow and filling up from the young litters is very unwise providing the dams are of equal merit and breeding with the pigs. If, however, a young sow be kept till she is a year old, well fed in the meantime, before being bred, she will bring as strong and growthy pigs as the older sow. The notion that a sow should be bred early that she may become a good suckler, is erroneous. Maturity in growth of the whole body is quite necessary to the development of the milk glands, and so we have proved to our satisfaction by sufficient tests. The well nourished sow, dropping her first litter at one year to sixteen months,will be as stated, bring as good pigs as the older sows, and is quite as likely to have an ample supply of milk.

Keep These Things in Mind.

The profits on a farm may be increased and work carried on in a manner infinitely more satisfactory if the following rules are observed;

Make it an invariable rule for yourself and every one around you to keep everything in its place.

If you see anything that is not in its proper place, stop at once and put it right.

When you see anything that should be done, do it at once; otherwise it will be forgotten or neglected.

When you begin a job, finish it without leaving it.

Want of care causes more damage than want of knowledge.

Have a place for everything and keep everything in its place.

Waste nothing. Waste is the mother of want.

Never leave tools or implements exposed to the weather.

Never put away tools or implements out of repair.

Never put away hoes, spades, plows, etc., before cleaning them.

No one but the owner has a right to lend.

Treat horses, cows and all animals gently.

Return borrowed articles as soon as possible, and in good order.

Never smoke in or around the barns or stables

If you use lanterns, trim and fill them by daylight.

Have the carriages and robes well cleaned and dusted before using them.

Something Useful.

The following simple method of finding the number of tons of hay in a mow will be especially useful at this season when the farmer wants to determine as nearly as possible the amount of provinder he has for the winter. Multiply the length in yards by the length in yards, and divide the product by fifteen; the quotient will be the number of tons. Example—How many tons of well settled hay in a mow 10 yards long by 6 wide, and 8 equals 480 which divided by 15 equals 32 tons.

Rearing Heifer Calves.

The rearing of heifer calves should not be lost sight of in this month; they should be carefully selected from the very best cows in the herd, for none other will pay for the raising. By giving them a little extra attention for the first month, they will gain such a status as to eat a liberal allowance of chopped oats and roots, with a bite of hay, and will be, by the time the grass grows, strong enough to do with chop and grass, with water frequently and with out milk at all, and at the same time, be in much finer shape than those which have been fed a liberal allowance of sour milk twice a day only, which latter mentioned practice of feeding, we all know, is responsible for the pot-bellied thin-hipped, short, little calves we so often see, instead of the straight, even, round ribbed and square-buttocked ones.

Salt for Asparagus.

The Germantown Telegraph has no doubt of the value of salt applied to asparagus beds in the spring, when the plants are about making their appearance. By a regular annual dose of salt, nearly covering the ground, we have known the beds to continue to afford an undiminished supply for 30 years. The fact that the quantity of salt applied at one dressing kills every green thing growing in the bed, while the asparagus thrives with it, shows how kindly and naturally it takes to the salt, asparagus being a marine plant. Besides, if the salt was of no more service than to destroy all the weeds and other foreign plants appearing in the bed, it would be worth all that it cost, as it is a difficult matter to remove weeds from among the asparagus shoots without damaging the the young plants and some of the shallower crowns, unless by the hands, a most labourious task.

The Langshan Fowl.

The Poultry Review says: Since the introduction of Langshans into England by Major Croad, in 1862, they have met with a great deal of opposition. They, unfortunately for their general popularity, greatly resemble Black Cochins, and the suspicion was strong that the birds represented as a new variety from the north of China were but poor Black Cochins. Those who have given Langshans a fair trial speak very highly of them. They are credited with being good layers, giving eggs freely in winter; good setters and mothers, and their flesh as being white, tender and juicy. They are very active for such a large fowl, foraging with great freedom. The eggs usually hatch well, and the chickens are easily reared. They are less subject to roup than other varieties. Their plumage is intense in its gloss and richness; on the whole, they are a real good variety, and will make their way well to the front.

Notes.

Practical farmers are well aware that there is a difference in the value of different varieties of corn for fodder. The Southern or Western corn will grow the greatest weight of food, but in quality some of the sweet varieties will quite make up for their smaller size. Some farmers find even so dwarf a variety as Early Minnesota profitable for feeding. Its small sweet stalks and abundant ears of corn are very nutritious, and are greedily eaten green or dried.

A flock of sheep will work up a more valuable pile of manure from the same food than from any other stock. In winter their tread is not so heavy as to prevent light fermentation of the manure pile, which is thus fitted for immediate service. In Summer they deposit their droppings more evenly than any other grazing animal during the day time, and at night will select some dry, poor knoll to enrich. The Spanish proverb is true which says: "The foot of the sheep is golden."

Let it ever be borne in mind that the most valuable part of manure is that which is very soluble, and unless it is retained by some absorbent or kept from the drenching rains, it will be quickly out of reach. Manure is a manufactured product, and the success of all farm operations in the older States depends upon the quantity and quality of this product. Other things being equal, the farmer who comes out in the Spring with the largest amount of the best quality of manure, will be the one who finds farming pays the best.

If you wish to fatten "spring chickens" quickly for market when they are about two months old confine them in coops and feed chiefly with moist food. A fowl allowed its liberty has a better flavor than one confined and fed up in a coop, but it does not put on flesh so quickly nor yet get so thoroughly plump and tempting-looking when dressed ready for market, therefore, it is better that those chickens fattened for sale should be kept in coops and fed up, while those for home use should be allowed their liberty until they were really wanted by the cook.

James Brayley, Hamilton, says: "I read the testimonials for McGregor's Speedy Cure and found that I had not to go to New York, Philadelphia, Louisiana or Texas to find living witnesses of its value, so have plenty of persons right here to prove its merits. I got a bottle and it helped me right away. I was as bad with Bilious Fever and Indigestion as I think any one could be. I have taken three bottles and am nearly well and can eat any kind of food without it hurting me. I may say that I am better than I ever ever expected to be. Weighed in the balance, but not found wanting. Northrop & Lyman's Vegetable Discovery and Dyspeptic Cure has been weighed in that just balance, the experience of an impartial and intelligent public. Both remedially and pecuniarily it is a success. Its sales constantly increase, testimony in its favor is daily pouring in. The question of its efficacy in Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Kidney Ailments, and for Blood Impurity, is decided.

Begin; to begin is half the work.

G. Bottle, of Manchester, Ontario Co., N. Y., writes: "I obtained immediate relief from the use of Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil. I have had asthma for eleven years. Have been obliged to sit up all night for ten or twelve nights in succession. I can now sleep soundly all night on a feather bed, which I had not been able to do previously to using the Oil."

Be sober, and live long.

The "constantly tired-out" feeling so often experienced is the result of impoverished blood, and consequent enfeebled vitality. Ayer's Sarsaparilla feeds and enriches the blood, increases the appetite, and promotes digestion of the food, and the assimilation of its strengthening qualities. The system being thus invigorated, the feeling rapidly changes to a grateful sense of strength and energy.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Hints and Recipes.

HOUSE-CLEANING

Ere long we shall be plunged into the miseries of house-cleaning, and it is well to prepare for this on rainy, cold days while it yet seems a privilege to remain near the kitchen range. To a home-loving woman, the cheerful atmosphere of a bright, tidy, kitchen, is enough to dispel the depression of any stormy weather. I offer you a few good recipes, and think that a person who has once taken the pains to weigh ingredients, must be satisfied that it pays better than the ordinary inaccurate measuring by cups etc. etc. Cakes prepared as follows will keep for weeks, if placed in tin pails or in a cake box (no napkin about them) for cloth gives a stale taste to any baked food. It is well to have a good supply in store for the spring campaign, moving time or house-cleaning only.

RUSKS.

Six pounds flour, one-and-one-fourth pound of sugar, 14 eggs, one-half pint of yeast, or one cake of compressed yeast, one pound of butter, and a little salt, sufficient warm milk to make it of the consistency of bread. Knead twice, cut with biscuit cutter, raise again 15 minutes and bake in a quick oven.

SPONGE CAKE.

The weight of six eggs in sugar (granulated or pulverized, not coffee sugar,) and the weight of four eggs in flour. Beat the six eggs separately, add the flour gradually, beating only enough to mix, flavor and bake it in deep pans. No baking powder is used.

CRINGLES.

Beat well the yelks and whites of two eggs, and mix with four ounces of butter. Just warm, and with this knead one pound of flour, and four ounces of sugar to a paste. Roll out, cut into thick biscuit, and bake.

CHEESE CAKE

Seven ounces of sugar, four ounces of butter, seven ounces of flour, four eggs, or seven ounces which is four of average size, Beat butter and sugar together,eggs separately, add them and then the flour. Bake in deep pan 40 minutes.

CRACKER PUDDING

This may be kept frozen until used. Six crackers rolled very fine, two eggs, a piece of butter the size of an egg, nutmeg, two cup of raisins, two cups sugar, two quarts of milk. Bake slowly. When done, cover with jelly, and frost. The above cakes and puddings will not seem stale if kept some time.

Salt for the Throat.

For many years past, indeed we may say during the whole of a life of more than forty years we have been subject to a dry hacking cough, which is not only distressing to ourself but to our friends and those with whom we are bought into buisness contact.

Last fall we were induced to try what virtue there was in common salt. We commenced by using it three times a-day, morning, noon and night. We dissolved a large tablespoonful of pure table salt in about half a tumblerful of water. With this we gargled the throat most thoroughly just before meal time. The result was that during the entire winter we were not only free from coughs and colds, but the dry hacking cough had entirely disappeared.

We attribute these satisfactory results solely to the use of salt gargle, and most cordially recommend a trial of it to those who are subject to diseases of the throat. Many persons who have not tried the salt gargle have the impression that it is unpleasant but after a few days' use no person who loved a nice clean mouth and a firstrate sharpener of the appetite, will abandon it.

Alcohol.

The habitual use of an excessive quantity of alcohol and its results was the subject of an investigation conducted by a committee of the Harveian Society in England named after the immortal Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood. The committee obtained 10,000 records of death from all causes in London, England. Of this number, alcohol accelerated death is 1,005 and causes it in 397 cases. The committee came to the concusion that the mortality among intemperate persons showed a fourfold increase in deaths from disease of the spleen and pancreas, including the liver, a twofold increase in deaths from kidney disease, an increase under pneumonia and pluerisy, under disease of the central nervous system and under disease attributed to atrophy and debility. Intemperate people did not seem to die of consumption in the same large proportion, or at the same early age as the temperate. Neither did they die as soon of heart disease, bronchitis, emphysema.

A Wonderful Worker.

Ten years ago, Bishop Willberforce recorded in his diary a conversation with Mr. Gladstone then as now Prime Minister; "Gladstone much talking how little real good work any Premier had done after sixty; Peel; Palmerston his work really done before; Duke of Wellington added nothing to his reputation after. I told him Dr. Clarke thought it would be physically worse for him to retire. He replied that Dr. Clarke does not know how completely I should employ myself." At seventy-three, Mr. Gladstone is still Premier and is doing excellent work. What Cecil said of Sir Walter Raleigh is true of Mr. Gladstone; "He can toil terribly." One of his maxims seems to have been, "There is no way of making heroism easy. Labor, iron labor, is the only way."

Nature has given him a sound mind in a sound body. His character was marked by simplicity, but the variety and extent of his labors are great. He can fell a tree of maple girth and walk a dozen miles with ease. He amuses himself with translating from English into elegant Latin, or from Latin and Greek into elegant English. One day he addresses twenty-five thousand persons in a three-hours' speech; the next he delivers an oration from the Chair of a University. He deals with a tariff and the tax-list writes essays and rules the State.

Yet he is one of the most accessible of men. He has something to say to every body, and listens with respect to any one who talks to him. When at home, he visites his tenants and takes an interest in the village literary society. There is no village library in Hawarden, where Mr. Gladstone resides, but his own library of ten thousand volumes is open to borrowers.

Perhaps the following sketch taken from the English magazine, of the way Mr. Gladstone spends Sunday may explain his good health and capacity for hard work.

But, no doubt, the most singular scene in the Hawarden church, beheld usually when the Premier is in residence in the castle, is to see him sitting in the plain uncushioned pew, near the lectern and opposite the pulpit.

It must be admitted that the spectacle of the Prime Minister of a great nation taking part, week after week, in the simple service of an obscure village church, is a sight the world has seldom if ever seen.

Seated near the reading-desk, at the time and place indicated, he quietly rises and goes through his part of the service, reading the lessons from the desk.

Then he resumes his seat, and, while joining heartily in the other parts of the service, usually listens to the sermon with his head thrown back and closed eyes. Then the service closes, and the Premier throws a coat over his shoulders without putting his arms into it; he is only on his way to the rectory.

We have heard that both Mr. and Mrs Gladstone attribute much of his health to the fact that he will have his Sabbath to himself and to his family, undisturbed by any agitation of business, the care of State, or even the recreations of literature and scholastic study.

It is impossible to restrain a sense of admiration for his profound public regard for the day of rest. Whether in London or at Hawarden, he puts us in mind of his great predecessor in the statemanship of England, Cecil Lord Burleigh, who when he arrived at Theobald on Saturday evening, would throw off his cloak or chain of office, and exclaim,—

"Lie there and rest, my good Lord Treasurer!"

At a recent church entertainment in Chicago, all who desired an opportunity to show the correctness of their pronunciation by their skill in reading the sentences given below, which had been arranged for the occasion. Twenty-six persons of correct speech and pronunciation successfully took each a long breath and began, and when the ordeal was finished 26 smiling faces betokened the conclusion of each individual that he or she was triumphant, but that 26 others had been guilty of blunders.

The master of ceremonies changed the facial expressions of all the participants by the quiet announcement that not a single one had pronounced all the words correctly. The smallest number of blunders in any instance was four, and ranged up to fourteen. The following is the exercise:

A laundry has been started by a man of cleanly habits who may be expected to do cleanly whatever he does. It is strange he should permit his family to live in squalor.

Our Canadian Silk Industry

is prosperous. The great difficulty to be contended with is the low grade of good required. In nothing is this more apparent than in the comparatively small article of sewing silks. The great demand in Canada seems to be for a cheap quality, buyers forgetting that a cheap thread must necessarily be a fine and consequently a weak one. Messrs. Belding, Paul and Co., make three grades of spool silk; of these different qualities the poorest one has by far the largest sale, at the same time they constantly hear of complaints of poor sewing silk. If ladies will take the trouble to ask for Belding, Paul & Co.'s own brand, and see that their name is on the end of each spool, they will be sure of getting the best made. 76y.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

Scrofula is so called from the Latin scrofa, a pig, from the supposition that the disease came from eating swine's flesh. It is often inherited from parents, and leeds to abscesses, ulcerous sores, debility, king's evil, and consumption. The case of the Rev. Wm. Stout, of Wiarton, who suffered 23 years from scrofulous abscesses, is one of the most remarkable on record. Burdock Blood Bitters cured him after the best medical skill had failed. 99i

Truth may be defeated, but never conquered.

Men of Extraordinary Nerve and Firmness of Purpose.

Amongst men who have forced their way to fame and fortune, we may name, as an example to all, worthy of imitation, the famous and justly celebrated Thomas Holloway, better known throughout the "wide, wide world" for his Pills and Ointment. Of these medicines it is not our purpose to speak—we are not writing puff, but solid plain facts, to show what can be done by great strength of mind; and that what one man has done another may do, provided that he has the ability and determination to use it with all his soul!

We read of the Great Napoleon, whose ambition was to conquer the world, but Holloway has done something else, for, instead of shedding oceans of human blood, he has cured his thousands, and spread great joy among the poor sons and daughters of affliction by his wonderful medicines; and, although he does not pretend to "raise the dead," yet he has given strength to the halt and soundness to the lame; and if he has not "opened the eyes of the blind," he has soothed the pain-worn, and comforted those on the brink of the grave; and in the four quarters of the globe his preparations have found their way—not by the force of the sword, not with the aid of legions, but have been silently borne on the bosom of old ocean in our huge merchant ships to every corner of the civilized world where suffering man is to be found.

But to do all this gigantic work, to accomplish so wondrous a deed, required much thought and much energy, for without these combined, this mighty work could not have been accomplished. And thus he did it. There is a wise saying, "Don't spare printer's ink" and Holloway spared neither "printer's ink" nor vast piles of the precious metal, gold. He advertises in all the languages spoken among civilized nations—and whether you go into France, Belgium, Holland, Prussia, Denmark, Russia, Greece, Spain, Portugal, Switzerland — nay, we might say all the kingdoms of the world—and in a thousand tongues they talk of "Holloway's Pills"—in a thousand languages they utter "Holloway's Ointment." We are filled with boundless wonder and astonishment that one man, one mind, one head, could plan and devise all this; and we say that, if one man has really done so, there must be some wonderful curative properties about his Pills and Ointment.—Poet Closes Historical Notices.

VITAL QUESTIONS!!

Ask the most eminent physician

Of any school, what is the best thing in the world for quieting and allaying all irritation of the nerves and curing all forms of nervous complaints, giving natural, childlike refreshing sleep always?

And they will tell you unhesitatingly "Some form of Hops!"

CHAPTER I.

Ask any or all of the most eminent physicians:

"What is the best and only remedy that can be relied on to cure all diseases of the kidneys and urinary organs; such as Bright's disease, diabetes, retention or inability to retain urine, and all the diseases and ailments peculiar to Women"—

"And they will tell you explicitly and emphatically "Buchu."

Ask the same physicians.

GOD.

[The following sublime ode to the Deity is from the Russian anthology, and was written by the celebrated Derzhaven. This poem is said to have been translated into Japanese, by order of the emperor, and is hung up, embroidered in gold, in the temple of Jeddo. It has also been translated into the Chinese and Tartar languages, written on a piece of rich silk, and suspended in the imperial palace at Pekin. It was translated into English as follows, by Dr. Bowring, and is said to have lost much of its beauty by translation. It is a noble composition.]

O Thou Eternal One! whose presence bright
All space doth occupy, all motion guide;
Unchanged through Time's all devastating flight,
Thou only God! There is no God beside!
Being above all beings! mighty one!
Whom none can comprehend and none explore,
Who fill'st existence with thyself alone—
Embracing all—supporting—ruling o'er—
Being whom we call God—now and evermore.

In its sublime research, philosophy
May measure out the ocean deep—may count
The sand or the sun's rays—but God! for Thee
There is no weight nor measure—none can count
Up to Thy mysteries; Reason's brightest spark
Though kindled by Thy light, in vain may try
To trace Thy counsels, infinite and dark;
And thought is lost ere thought can soar so high,
E'en like past moments in eternity.

Though from primeval nothingness did'st call
First, chaos—then existence—Lord, on Thee
Eternity had its foundation—all
Sprang forth from Thee—light, glory, harmony,
Sole origin—all life, all beauty Thine.
Thy word created all, and doth create;
Thy splendor fills all space with rays divine.
Thou art, and wert, and shall be! Glorious! Great!
Life-giving, life-sustaining Potentate!

Thy chains the unmeasured Universe surround
Upheld by Thee, by Thee inspired with breath!
Thou the beginning with the end has bound,
And beautifully mingled life and death!
As sparks mount upward from the fiery blaze,
So suns are born, so worlds spring forth from Thee;
And as the spangles in the sunny rays,
Shine round the silver snow, the pageantry
Of heaven's bright army glitters in Thy praise.

A million torches lighted by Thy hand,
Wander unwearied through the blue abyss;
They own Thy power, accomplish Thy command,
All gay with life, all eloquent with bliss.
What shall we call them? Piles of fire?
A glorious company of golden streams?
Lamps of celestial ether burning bright?
Suns lighting systems with their glorious beams?
But Thou to these are as the moon to night!

Yet, as a drop of water in the sea,
All this magnificence in Thee is lost;
What are ten thousand worlds compared to Thee,
And what am I, then? Heaven's unnumbered host
Though multiplied by myriads, and arrayed
In all the glory of sublimest thought
Is but an atom in the balance weighed Against Thy greatness, is a cypher brought Against Infinity. What am I, then? Nought!

Nought!—but effluence of Thy light divine,
Pervading worlds hath reached my bosom, too;
Yes, in my spirit dost Thy spirit shine,
As shines the sunbeams in a drop of dew.
Nought! but I live, and on Hope's pinions fly
Eager towards Thy presence; for in Thee
I live, and breathe, and dwell; aspiring high
Even to the throne of Thy divinity.
I am, O God! and surely Thou must be!

Thou art: directing, guiding all, Thou art!
Direct my understanding, then, to Thee!
Control my spirit, guide my wandering heart;
Though but an atom 'midst immensity,
Still I am something, fashioned by Thy hand;
I hold a middle rank 'twixt heaven and earth,
On the last verge of mortal being stand,
Close to the realms where angels have their birth,
Just on the boundary of the spiritual land.

The chain of being is complete in me:
In me is matter's last gradation lost,
And the next step is spirit—Deity!
I can command the lightning and am dust!
A monarch, and a slave—a worm, a God!
Whence came I here? and how so marvellously
Constructed and conceived? unknown! this clod
Lives surely through some higher energy,
For from itself alone it could not be.

Creator! Yes, Thy wisdom and Thy word
Created me. Thou source of life and good!
Thou spirit of my spirit, and my Lord!
Thy light, Thy love, in their plentitude
Filled me with an immortal soul, to spring
Over the abyss of death, and bade it wear
The garments of eternal day, and wing
Its heavenly flight beyond this little sphere,
Even to its source—to Thee—its author there.

O thought ineffable! O vision blest!
Though worthless our conceptions all of Thee;
Yet shall Thy shadowed image fill our breast,
And waft its homage to Thy throne,
God! thus above my lowly thoughts can soar.
Thus seek Thy presence—being wise and good
'Midst Thy vast works admire, obey, adore;
And when the tongue is eloquent no more,
The soul shall speak in tears of gratitude.

An Ambitious Woman.

BY EDGAR FAWCETT.

Claire was in high spirits; her laugh had a ring as clear as the weather. Mrs. Diggs shivered under the protective wraps of the sleigh. "My circulation was never meant for this sort of thing," she said, at length. "We've gone far enough, haven't we, Claire? It's nearly dark, too?"

This was a most glaring fallacy, coined by the desperation of poor Mrs. Diggs' discomfort. But the chilly light was growing a blue gloom above the massed housetops when the two ladies found themselves at Claire's door.

It had been arranged that they should dine quietly together that evening. Hollister would not be at home, and Claire, for a wonder, would. Mrs. Diggs had been complaining, of late, that she never had the meaning of privacy with her friend. Claire had agreed, three days ago, to disappoint for one night all who were seeking her society. "We shall have a cosey dinner," she had said, "of just you and me. We will chat of everything—past, present and future."

Mrs. Diggs recalled that word "cosey" as she entered Claire's proud dining-room, with its lofty arched ceiling, where little stars of gold gleamed from dark interspaces between massive rafters of walnut. She crouched on a soft rug beside the deep, large fireplace, in which great logs were blazing. And while she basked in the pleasant glow, her eye wandered about the grave grandeurs of the noble room, scanning its dusky traits of wainscot, tapestry, tropic plants or costly pictures: for all was in sombre shadow except the reddened hearth and the small central table, on whose white cloth two great clusters of wax-lights had been set, stealing their colors from a group of flowers, and its clean sparkle from the glass and silver. The whole table was like a spot of light amid the stately dimness.

"Really, very splendid, indeed, Claire," said Mrs. Diggs, in a sort of ruminative ellipsis, letting her eye presently rest on the tips of her own upheld fingers, which the firelight had turned into that milky pink that we often see flow through opals. "But I really think I liked the little basement house better, take it all in all."

"Did you?" murmured Claire, who was standing near her, enjoying the warmth, but not bathing in it like her half-frozen friend. "I didn't."

A very impressive butler soon glided into the room, and told Madame in French that she was served. Mrs. Diggs scrambled to her feet; the majesty of the butler had something to do with her speed in performing this act, though hunger was perhaps concerned in it.

"That dreadful sleigh-ride has left me my appetite," she said, while seating herself opposite Claire, "so I see it has not quite killed me."

"I think you will survive it," said Claire, with one of her little musical laughs.

There was not much talk between the two friends while dinner lasted, and what there was took a desultory and aimless turn. The butler waited faultlessly; there were eight courses; Claire had said that it would be a very plain dinner, and Mrs. Diggs secretly smiled as she remembered the words. The cooking was perfect; it had all of what the gourmets would call Parisian sentiment, though no undue richness. Claire ate sparingly, yet with apparent relish. She drank a little champagne, which she had poured into a goblet and mixed with water. There were other wines, but she touched none of them. Mrs. Diggs did, however, sipping three or four, until she lost her chalky wanness of tint and almost got a touch of actual color.

"I never take but one wine, as a rule," she said, "and that's claret. But the sleigh-ride chilled me to the bone. I begin to feel quite warm and comfortable, now. Do you always take champagne, Claire?"

"Always. But only a little. It's companionable to touch your lips to, now and then, when you sit through these very long dinners. I suppose the dulness of certain society originally drove me to it. But I am very careful.'

'What an air she said that with!' thought Mrs. Diggs. "And one year ago, at Coney Island, she was unknown, unnoticed."

The whole repast was exquisite. While it lasted, Claire never once spoke to the butler. He needed no orders; everything was done as well and as silently as it could be done. In his way he was an irreproachable artist, like the invisible chef below stairs, who had evoked this blameless dinner from the chaos of the uncooked.

Just at the end of dessert, Claire said to her guest: "Shall you take coffee?"

"Oh, dear, no," replied Mrs. Diggs; "I don't even dare. I'm nervous enough as it is."

But Claire had coffee, black as ink, and served to her in a tiny cup as thin as a rose leaf. Presently the two friends became aware that they were alone. The butler had gone without seeming to go. Like a mysterious au revoir he had left behind him two crystal finger bowls, with a thin slice of lemon floating in each. Claire had finished her coffee. She rose and leaned toward the flowers in the centre of the table. As her fingers played among them they seemed to break, almost of their own accord, into two separate bunches. She went around to Mrs. Diggs and gave her one of these, retaining the other. Presently each had made for herself an impromptu corsage. Mrs. Diggs had not spoken for several minutes; she had indeed been abnormally quiet ever since the butler's departure. The calm, graceful splendor of it all had awed her. It had such a finish, such a choiceness, such gentle dignity of execution.

"Shall we sit near the fire?" asked Claire, as together they moved from the table. "Or would you prefer one of the drawing rooms?"

"The fire is so lovely," said Mrs. Diggs. "Let's sit here." She dropped into a chair as she spoke. Claire also seated herself not far from the fire, though a little distance away from her friend.

Suddenly the flood-gates of Mrs. Diggs's enthusiasm burst open. She had considerable silence to make up for. "Oh, Claire," she exclaimed, "it's just perfect! I don't see how you do it! I don't see where on earth you got the experience from! If I had seven times your money I couldn't begin to have my household machinery move in this delightful, well-oiled way. My servants would steal, and chef would get drunk—my magnificence would all go awry! I'm sure it would!"

Claire laughed. "I'm very composed about it all," she said. "I keep quite cool. Mr. Hollister, too. There's a great deal in that. I don't mean management, so much as the superintendence of others' management. I'm a sort of born overseer."

"You're a born leader." Mrs. Diggs was looking at her very attentively now. "And how capably you are leading! How you carry the point, Claire! I observe you, and absolutely marvel! I can't realize that you are really and truly my Coney Island Claire, don't you know? You've shot up so. You're so mighty. It's like a dream."

"It's a very pleasant dream."

She said this archly and mirthfully. But Mrs. Diggs on a sudden became solemn.

"Claire," she went on, "you remember what I told you in our little confab the other day, at the Launderdales' reception? It's true my dear. You're like a person at a gambling table, who begins by playing for pastime, and ends by playing for greed. You know I dote on you, and you know I never choose my words when I'm in downright earnest. You're love for pomp and luxury, my dear, is becoming a vice. Yes, an actual vice. You don't take your triumphs moderately, as you do your champagne and water. You drink deep of them, and let them fly to your head. Oh, I can see it well enough. It's a trouble for you. I tremble, Claire, because"...

"Well? Because?"

She put these questions with a smile, as Mrs. Diggs paused. But it was a smile of the lips only.

"Oh, because affairs might change in a day, almost an hour. You know what vast yields your husband constantly runs. You know what might happen."

Claire rose at this. Her repose was gone; her piquant excitibility had seemed abruptly to return. She did not appear in the least angry. Mrs. Diggs would have liked it better if she had shown a wrathful sign or two.

"Don't let us talk of those grim matters, please," she said. She came over and sat by Mrs. Diggs, and then, taking both the latter's hands, sank down on her knees. Her face was lit with a charming yet restless cheerfulness. "Dear friend, you spoke a minute ago of my triumphs. Do you know, I've never secured just what I wanted till to-day? You thought I had, but you were wrong. Shall I tell you why?" Mrs. Diggs was inwardly thinking, as one ill-favored but generous woman will sometimes think of another, how purely enchanting was her manner, and how richly she deserved to win the social distinction she had attained.

"I suppose you mean, Claire, that Hollister to-day completed the last thousand of his fourth or fifth million, eh?"

"Oh, not at all. I don't mean anything of the sort. I don't know anything about Herbert's affairs, nowadays. He keeps them all to himself."

"Well, then, what is it?"

"You'll laugh when you hear. You recollect the great ladies' luncheon that I am to give next Friday?"

"Of course I do. I'm going to honor it."

"And so are two others. Mrs. Van Horn and Mrs. Ridgeway Lee. They never honored anything of mine until now. Poor Mrs. Arcularius yielded and bowed before me, long, long ago. My old school enemy, Ada Gerrard, more freckled, more arrogant, more stupid than ever, is one of my most willing allies. I have conquered them all, but I could not conquer those two women. They stood aloof, and their standing aloof was a perpetual distress."

"Claire, Claire," exclaimed Mrs. Diggs, "you make me wonder at you! What was the hostility of these two women, whether open or repressed? You had all the others to pay you court. Why should you have cared? They are powerful, but their power could not keep you from asserting and maintaining yours. I repeat, why should you care?"

"I did care. But it is all over now." She rose to her feet, with a little laugh as she said these words. "They're coming to my luncheon. They have both accepted. They have acknowledged me. I have forced them to do so."

She uttered that last sentence with a mock fierceness that ended in laughter. But she could not hide from her friend the intense seriousness from which these expressions had sprung.

Before Mrs. Diggs could answer, a servant entered the room by one of the draped doorways leading into the salons beyond. He was not the butler, who had so admirably served them at dinner, but a footman, charged with other special offices. He handed Claire a card, which she read and tossed aside. The next moment she dismissed him by a slight motion of the hand.

"Let me see that card," said Mrs. Diggs. "Has any one called whom I know?"

Claire was looking straight into the tumbled, lurid logs of the hearth.

"Yes, you know him, of course," she said. "It was only Stuart Goldwin. I am not at home to-night. Not to any one except you, I mean. I gave orders."

A silence ensued. Mrs. Diggs presently made one of her plunges. "Claire, they say that Goldwin is madly in love with you."

She gave a sharp turn of the neck, fixing her eyes on her friend's face. "That is all they say, I hope. They can't say—well, you understand what they can not say."

"That you care for him? Well, no, . . . You have been very discreet. You have arranged wonderfully. Very few women could have done it with the same nicety."

Claire threw back her head, with a haughty, fleeting smile. "Any woman could have done it who felt safe—perfectly safe, as I feel."

"You mean that this grand Goldwin, who sways the stock-market, can't quicken your pulse by one degree."

She looked steadily at Mrs. Diggs. "I did not say that I meant that. But I do, if you choose to ask me point blank. We're very good friends. He amuses me. I fancy that I amuse him. If I do more he doesn't tell me so. He understands what would happen if he did."

She was staring at the fire again. Its lustres played upon the silken folds of her dress, and made the gold glimmers part and fade in her clustering hair. Mrs. Diggs was becoming in her chair; she was leaning sideways, with both black eyes riveted on Claire's half-averted face.

"Claire," she said, "I'm so awfully glad to hear you say that. It makes me like you better, if such a thing were possible. Upon my word, to be frank, in the most friendly way, I did think there was a little danger, don't you know, of . . . Well, you've settled all doubts, of course. But then, my dear, you never were enormously fond of Hollister. You let him adore you, don't you know? Oh, I've seen it all. There's no use in getting angry."

"I'm not angry," said Claire. She was again looking full at her friend. She had put one dainty-booted foot upon the low gilt trellis which rose between the rug and the hearthstone. "We seem to drift upon very unpleasant subjects this evening," she continued. "I am afraid our little intimate reunion is not going to be a success."

"You are angry!" exclaimed Mrs. Diggs, reproachfully. "You've changed, Claire. You're not the same to me as you were before you became a great lady. Now, don't deny it. You feel your oats, as my dear Manhattan would say. You keep me at a distance. You"—

Here Mrs. Diggs paused, for the same footman who had before appeared now made a second entrance. This time he handed Claire a note. "There is no answer, madame," he said in French, and at once softly vanished.

"Pardon me," said Claire, as she tore open the envelope. Mrs. Diggs watched her while she read the contents of the note. Her perusal took some time. She read the three written pages once, twice, thrice. Her face had grown very grave in the meanwhile.

Suddenly she crumpled the note in one hand, and threw it into the fire. Her eyes flashed and her lip quivered as she did so.

"For Heaven's sake, Claire," appealed her friend, "what is the matter? I suppose Cornelia or Sylvia Lee sends a regret for luncheon. You are so foolish to mind what they do! You recollect what I used to tell you about Cornelia. But why should you mind her airs and caprices now? You are utterly above her—or rather, you have shown her that two can reign in the same kingdom. You could cut her dead with perfect impunity. That's a good deal to say, don't you know, but you positively could!"

"No, no," said Claire, with a clouded face and a little wave of the hand, "it has nothing to do with either of those women. It is" . . . here she paused, and her breath came quick. "It is from Beverley Thurston."

"Beverley!" exclaimed Mrs. Diggs. "Why, he's in Europe!"

"He got back yesterday. He has learned about me. I suppose his sister has told him. And he writes to me in a tone of impertinence. Yes, it's nothing else. He writes to me as if I were some sinful creature. He presumes to be sorry for me. He says he will pay me a visit if I can spare him an hour from the giddy life I am leading. I don't remember the exact words he uses; it is not so much what he writes as what he seems to write. The whole note breathes of patronage and commiseration. To me!—think of it! What right has he? What right did I ever give him?"

Mrs. Diggs started up from her chair. "Why, my dear Claire," she said, "you are greatly excited!"

"I am miserable!" said Claire. She almost staggered toward Mrs. Diggs, and flung both arms about her friend's neck. "I am miserable—miserable!" she went on, with a sudden paroxysm of tears. She leaned her proud young head on Mrs. Diggs' broad shoulder, beginning to sob quite wildly. "Do I deserve reproaches? Have I been so wrong? What evil have I done? Let my conscience trouble me if it will, but he is not my conscience. How dare he reproach me?"

A violent seizure of sobs made Claire incapable of further speech. Mrs. Diggs let the clinging arms clasp her. She did not know what to answer; she scarcely knew what to think. She only felt, at that unexpected moment, that she loved Claire very much, and would always stay her staunch friend, no matter what bitter ill might overtake her.

CHAPTER XVII.

As Claire was descending into the lower hall, at about four o'clock the next afternoon, she saw her husband enter the house with his latch-key. She quickened her step a little, and met him at the landing of the stairs. They had not seen each other for twenty-four hours; she had breakfasted in her room that morning, as was of late almost habitual with her, and by the time that she had left it he had been driven away in his brougham. On the previous night he had reached home long after she had retired to bed. All this was no new thing. Its first and second occurrence had shocked them both, as an unforeseen result of their altered existence. But repetition had set it securely among the commonplaces. They accepted it, now, with a matter-of-course placidity.

"I was going to the Vanvelsors' reception," Claire said. "Did you think of dropping in?"

"No," answered Hollister. He had taken her hand, and was holding it while he spoke. The next moment he kissed her cheek, and soon let his eye wander over the complex tastefulness of her attire. He then drew her arm within his own and led her toward the near drawing-room, whose threshold they crossed. Except his recorded monosyllable, he had said nothing for an appreciable time, and Claire, regarding his face with a sidelong glance, had already detected there marked signs of worriment.

"No," he presently continued, taking a seat on one of the rich-clad sofas, and gently forcing her to sit beside him. "I had no idea of going there. I don't feel like anything gay, Claire. Things are doing horribly on the Street. There's a dreadful squall. I hope it will be only a squall, and soon blow over." He then named a certain stock in which he had very comprehensive interests. "It has dropped in the most furious fashion," he proceeded. "Claire, I've lost seventy thousand dollars to-day, if I've lost a penny."

He talked more technically of his ill-luck after that, and told her what he believed to be the reason of the adverse change. She listened with great attention. She knew so much of Wall Street matters that she scarcely missed a point in all that he explained.

"So Goldwin is on the other side," she said, when he had finished.

"Yes, Goldwin is safe. But you can't tell what to-morrow will bring. No one is really safe. Prices are flying about. It's a shocking state of affairs."

"There is nothing for you to do just now, is there?" Claire asked, after a little pause.

"Oh, no; I may get a few telegrams later. But nothing serious will happen till to-morrow."

She laid her hand on his arm. She was more alarmed and perplexed than she chose to show. "Then come with me to the reception," she said; "you might as well, Herbert. It is better than to brood over the state of matters down there."

He shook his head negatively. "I should make a very bad guest," he replied. "Go yourself, Claire. But remember one thing." He was looking at her very fixedly; his frank blue eyes were full of a soft yet assertive pain. "Our life may alter suddenly for the worse. We may have to give up all this." He waved one hand here and there, as though generalizing the whole luxurious encompassment. "There is no telling what may happen. I never felt the insecurity of my career as I feel it now. Do you know, Claire, that a few more such days as this may ruin me?"

"Ruin you?" she repeated.

She was pale as those words left her lips. Hollister had proposed to her a terrible possibility.

"Yes, Claire, I mean it. Of course I am looking at the worst that might happen. But I want to prepare you."

She rose, keeping her eyes on his. "I don't know what I should do," she said, "if I lost what I have now. I have grown used to it, Herbert. I won't let myself think that it might pass away—that I should be left without all these good and precious things."

As she spoke the last words he rose also, and caught both her hands, looking eagerly into her face.

"Claire," he exclaimed, "you must think of losing it all! You must try to reconcile yourself with the idea! If you don't, the ordeal will be all the harder when it comes."

"When it comes?" she again repeated.

"Yes—you see just how I stand. You have grasped the whole wretched situation. Of course there's a chance that I'll right myself, but" . . .

"I'll take that chance," she broke in, quite forcibly withdrawing her hands. "So will you, Herbert. I prefer to look at it this way. We will both take the chance."

Hollister's face was full of reproach.

"Claire!" he exclaimed. "I see that you love this new life with a positive passion!"

"I love it very much," she answered. "I love it so much that I should suffer fearfully if I were turned adrift from it . . . Come, we will both go to the Vanvelsors' reception."

"No," replied Hollister. He walked away from her. By her lack of sympathy she had dealt him a cruel sting.

"Very well," responded Claire, as she watched his receding figure. "I am going."

His back was turned to her, but he suddenly veered round, facing her, and saying, with a bitter sharpness: "Go, if you please! Go, and leave me to my misery! If you cared for me in the right manner, you would not want to go. You would want to stay with me, and forget, for a while at least, the gay crowds that admire and court you!"

These words were utterly unexpected. He had never before alluded to her lack of fondness. She was embarrassed, ashamed. For a moment she could not speak. Then she simulated an affronted demeanor; it seemed her sole refuge. "I—I care for you as much as I have always cared," she said. "No more and no less."

She moved toward the door at once, after thus speaking. She wondered if he would seek to detain her. He did not. . . . She entered the coupe very soon afterward. During the drive to Mrs. Vanvelsor's reception she had a keen remembrance of just how Hollister had looked when her final gaze had dwelt upon him. She knew that she had stung at last into life the perception of how much he had been giving and how little he had received. Her conscience sternly smote her; she was more than once on the verge of ordering that the vehicle should be driven home again. But in her then mood any attempt at amendment seemed wildly futile.

What could she say to her husband? That she deplored his possible ruin? Yes; but not that such regret sprang from the sweet sources of a wifely, unselfish love. She could not regard the possibility of being flung down from her present high place with any unselfish feeling. Mrs. Diggs had touched the living and sensitive truth last night; her thirst for luxury had grown a vice. Soft raiment, obsequious attendance, a place of supreme social distinction, all these had become vitally, imperiously needful to her happiness.

It was not the sort of happiness which she believed high or fine. She could most clearly conceive of another, less fervid, less material, less intoxicating, fraught with a spiritual incentive and an intellectual meaning. But it was too late to dream of that now. She had taken the bent; she must have power or nothing. She regarded the idea of being obscure and with straitened funds as a calamity simply horrible.

Hollister must think her cruel as death; that was inevitable. She did not blame him for blaming her. She blamed herself for having married him with love less quality. Her reproachful words haunted her—but what could she do? He wanted genuine tenderness, sympathy, fortifying cheer. But he wanted these from an impulse of which her heart had always been incapable. Fate was avenging itself upon her. She had tampered with holy things.

Her marriage oath had been a mockery. Could she go back and tell him this? Could she go back and lie to him feign before him? No; best that she should not go back at all.

The reception was a great crush. Men they seemed to make way for her with a sort of obeisance. No one jostled against her; they all appeared to give her a little elbow-room in the throng, as they either bowed or stared. She was secretly agonized. She smiled and spoke as effectively as usual; she held her court among them all, as of late she had invariably held it. But her heart was sick; she was pierced by a portentous dread, and she was pierced with that self-contempt whose length of thrust is measured by a consciousness of how far the being we might have become surpasses the being that we are.

While she stood the centre of a small, courtly group, a gentleman softly pushed his way into her notice and held out his hand. She took the hand, and looked well into the face of him who had extended it. The new-comer was Beverley Thurston. As Cla

AND CANADIAN DAIRYMAN.

THURSDAY, MAY 8, 1884.

SIR Charles Tupper has retired from the Ministry, from Parliament, and betaken himself to the office of High Commissioner to England.

MONTREAL Witness:—General Luard's Valedictory is to the point—terse, frank, soldier-like. He is very discriminating in his thanks, which he confines to those officers and men, of whom there are many, who have striven to improve the appearance and discipline of the force.

IT is about time to frame laws which will lay on professed dynamiters the onus of dynamite crimes. If a company of innocent passengers are suddenly sent into eternity, it would be no injustice and would do the world no harm if a number of those who accept the responsibility of the act should be hanged for it.

THE determination of the British Cabinet to send an expedition to the relief of Berber will probably lead to an attempt to rescue Gen. Gordon at Khartoum. Sheney, which is reported captured by the Arab insurgents, and its garrison and a large number of its inhabitants massacred, is the principle station on the Nile between Khartoum and Berber; and it will probably have to be recaptured in order to allow of the escape of Geo. Gordon and the garrison of Khartoum.

A Bill to provide for the closing of public houses in England on Sunday was "talked out" in the British Parliament the other night. The opponents of the measure were apparently afraid to let it come to a vote. Only in the English portions of Great Britain is the public sale of liquor on Sunday now countenanced. The Forbes Mackenzie Act, which prevents Scottish liquor-dealers from opening their places between 11 o'clock on Saturday night and 7 on Monday morning, has been enforced for thirty years. More recently, Sunday closing was made law in Wales, and a year or two ago the Irish Sunday Closing Act was passed.

THE British House of Lords has, by a majority of 46 to 38 defeated a motion affirming that it would benefit residents in cities to have museums opened to the public on Sundays. Art galleries are opened in Manchester on Sunday, as the Chief Constable of that city asserted that the new order of things has resulted in a decrease of crime, Lord Thurlow, who moved the motion, quoted that functionary in support of the scheme. It is quite probable that the Chief Constable is correct. In the British cities the public houses are opened for traffic,, except during the hours when the service in the churches is held, and it may be that a diversion of the people's attention from liquor drinking and its attendant amusements to pretty pictures and curiosities from the ends of the earth has made them better behaved. It is odd to find noble Lords who would look on the closing of saloons on Sunday as confiscation strenuously opposing what appears to be at least a lesser evil, and which might be expected to curtail the drinking bouts of the all numerous class who find in the public house their chief Sunday resort,

ONE of the odd things about the jury system is that whereas it requires a grand jury composed of twenty-four persons to say whether there is or is not sufficient evidence on which to send an accused person to trial, a petit jury of only twelve persons is required to try the person so sent. Another odd thing is that the grand jury is always composed of a better class of jurors than those who compose the petit jury. The opinion is strengthening that a public prosecutor, versed in law and understanding how to weigh evidence, would be better able after hearing the evidence on both sides, to say whether an accused person should or should not be sent for trial, than a grand jury, which hears only the evidence on one side and knows nothing about either the law or the value of evidence. The best proof that a public prosecuter could do the work satisfactorily is to be found in the fact that the system has been in vogue for many years in Scotland, where they are probably fewer failures of justice than in any other country, and in the further fact that police magistrates have been entrusted with much more important functions.

OUR FOREIGN POPULATION.

(COMMUNICATED.)

The Toronto Morning News has of late been making spasmodic attacks upon immigrants, and throwing the blame of all the crime and lawlessness perpetrated on this continent on their shoulders. It may be that the editor does this to curry the favour of native mechanics, knowing that they are opposed to everything which tends to increase the number of labourers; otherwise, he shows woeful ignorance of the class of people who come into this country as immigrants. If he would go through the county of Oxford, and our population is not more foreign than that of the rest of Canada, he would find at least ten out of each twelve wealthy, respected farmers, men who came into this county as immigrants. Among the wealthiest and most successful of our business men there is also a large element of immigrants. A large number of the most distinguished members of the Legislature and the Bar, both in this country and the United States, are taken from the same class; and yet these are the people from whom the News thinks and openly preaches, the country has much to fear, because they have not been accustomed to free institutions and cannot be safely entrusted with the liberty which our people enjoy. In the face of this statement the News of yesterday exhorts the German residents of Toronto to use their influence to induce Germans to settle there, giving as its reasons for so doing, that the progress which the United States has made is mainly due to its German population. Everyone knows that there is less liberty in the institutions of Germany than in those of any other country which sends settlers to America. How can these statements be reconciled? Experience and statistics prove that too much liberty is the great cause of crime. More crimes are committed in the United States yearly than in any other civilized country. There is a large class there who prefer living by their sharpness and villainy rather than by manual labor, which they very complacently leave for the immigrants to perform.

The Stratford Outrage.

Stratford, May 5.—On Saturday last a man named Wm. Henry, a dealer in old iron and rags, and his teamster, George Scott, were arrested by the police charged with breaking into the office of the Stratford Times and destroying the type. To-day they were remanded till Wednesday next. The case has been very cleverly worked up by the detectives, and it is expected further arrests will be made.

Ontario's Health.

The weekly bulletin published by the Provincial Board of Health for the week ending April 26th contains the following information: Amongst fevers, intermittent has made a decided advance, amounting to over 7 per cent. of the total diseases. The same advance at this period of the year was noted last year. Enteric, though retaining a low degree of prevalence, persists in its prevalence amongst the twenty most prevalent diseases, a condition varying from that of last year in same week. The contagious zymotics still maintain an unusually low degree of prevalence for the season of the year, mumps, whooping cough and diphtheria being the only cases appearing in the twenty most prevalent diseases.

Colossal Criminal Case.

Naples, April 22.—The most colossal criminal trial of modern times was to have begun last Monday at Catania, in Sicily. No less than 300 prisoners were to be put on trial on charges of being members of the Maffia Secret Society, which has long been the most dangerous of the secret orders of the Irridentist nature and is supposed to combine brigandage with anarchism. Since the arrest of the prisoners an unexpected host of victims, to the number of 1,500, have sent in their names to the prosecuting officers and offered to appear as witnesses. Many of the prisoners are wealthy and influential, and a small army of 112 lawyers have been engaged for their defence. The result of these extensive preparations is that the Government has no public building big enough for the trials, and has been obliged to postpone them until June. The proceedings will then take place in the Benedictine Church, as the court-house is entirely too small, and the city gaol is being enlarged by the building of a new wing to accommodate the unusual number of prisoners.

Emigrant Sleeping Cars.

The Ontario and Quebec railway have just had built by James Crossen of Cobourg twenty magnificent emigrant sleeping cars, the first ever manufactured in the province. Five of them are now in Toronto. These are to run between Port Arthur and the west, the remainder from Ottawa along the line. They are similar to first class cars on the outside with the improved trucks, having 40 inch Krupp steel wheels, each car being fifty feet in length. They will seat and accommodate fifty-six persons besides the upper frames. They were designed by Mr. Van Horne, general manager of the Canadian Pacific railway. The ceiling and sides are composed of alternate strips of white wood and cherry, the paneling is of ash. Ventilation of the cars has been well attended to, being furnished with double windows. They will be heated by two improved heaters with hot air pipes extending along each side. The stoves are constructed to accommodate passengers with hot water.

The Pope Against Free Masonary.

(N. Y. sun.)

We publish this morning a translation of the full text of the Papal encyclical against Free Masonry.

The Pope assails that secret order, it will be seen as an essentially unchristian organization, and as a nursery of materialism and of hostility to the church. He treats it as an enemy with which religion can make no terms, and against which the Church must war with all the weapons at its command.

Free Masonary, says Pope Leo aims at the ruin of "the throne, the altar, and public welfare." "It seeks to overthrow all the religious and social order introduced by Christianity," he says further "and to build up a new order based on the laws of naturalism." And with Free Masonry he includes all similar secret organizations.

Accordingly, he warns Catholics against some such orders, and exhorts Bishops and priests to do whatever may be in their power to uproot them and their principles. Some of the individual members of those societies may be blameless, so far as responsibility for the general tone and acts of the orders are concerned, but he urges all such to fly from the contaminating influences about them.

Indeed, the Pope charges against Free Masonry that it has bred and fostered the worst social ills and the most deadly religious heresy and infidelity from which the modern world suffers.

FATE OF THE FLORIDA.

A State Line Steamship Wrecked at Sea—A Number of Canadians on Board.

New York, May 3.—Austin Baldwin & Co., agents of the State Line of steamships, this morning received a dispatch from Glasgow, as follows:

"The steamer Devon from New York to Bristol picked up, April 27, two lifeboats of the State of Florida without occupants or gear. A sailing vessel bound west signaled to the City of Rome, April 23, latitude 46, longitude 42, she had the shipwrecked crew of the State Line steamer on board.

The City of Rome arrived at Liverpool April 27 from New York. The State of Florida was 4,000 tons, was built at Glasgow in 1879.

THE SIGNALS.

London, May 3.—The City of Rome makes the following statements in regard to the signals of the sailing vessel spoke April 23. The first signal was 'shipwrecked crew.' Then followed two other signals. The first was supposed to be the "State," and presumed to refer to the State of Florida.

Sunk in Mid-Ocean.

Out of 167 Persons on Board Only 44 Rescued.

She has 24 of the crew of the steamship of State of Florida, the said steamer having gone to the bottom through a collision with a bark in mid-ocean. Out of 167 persons only 44 were saved, and of the bark's crew only the captain and two men. One hundred and twenty-three persons went down with the steamer and twelve with the bark, making the total loss of life 135.

THE DYNAMITERS.

The Plotters in Court—Dynamite Scare in London.

London, May 4.—The proprietor of a ship tavern in the vicinity of the Strand seized the effects of an absconding lodger and discovered a box containing twelve pounds of dynamite cartridges and gun cotton. The lodger is well known. The police are pursuing him.

DALY, EGAN AND MCDONNELL ARRAIGNED.

Birmingham, May 4.—Daly, Egan and McDonnell were arraigned in the Police Court yesterday charged with treason and felony. Daly asked why he was brought to Birmingham to be tried again after committal Thursday to await the Chester Assizes. The Prosecutor replied that after the charge was prepared against him at Liverpool enough evidence had been brought to light to justify his removal to Birmingham on graver charges.

WELL GUARDED.

The prisoners were closely guarded. Detectives surrounded them in the court-room and others were posted outside. They seemed to keenly feel their position, especially Egan, who listened to the evidence with close attention.

THE EVIDENCE.

It appeared from the evidence that prior to the recent meetings in Birmingham Town Hall addressed by the Marquis of Salisbury and Joseph Chamberlain, letters were received by the authorities containing threats that dynamite bombs would be thrown under the speakers' platform. Special precautions were taken to guard against this. Daly was arrested shortly before the Birmingham election campaign of Randolph Churchill and Col. Burnaby. It is believed the bombs found in his possession were intended to be exploded among the campaign gatherings.

Evidence was adduced showing that the prisoners had been in correspondence with each other for several years. Also that Daly and Egan often travelled together with Daly's brother Edmund; Egan knew Daly as McDonald during his early career.

The correspondent of Egan with J. Desmond and James Barnett, of London, John Morgan, of Kidderminster, and J. Stanton, of Walsall, was placed in evidence.

NO CAUSE FOR ALARM.

London, May 4.—The police attach little importance to the dynamite discovered at the Ship Tavern. The cartridges were such as are used in toy pistols.

A LYING WITNESS

Ennis May 4.—Patrick Slattery has made deposition that at the instigation of a Police Sergeant he subpoened witnesses to swear falsely against the brothers Delahunty, sentenced at Cork in 1883 to life servitude. He declares the Delahuntys are innocent.

Washington Letter.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

Washington, April, 28, 1884.

The 'booms' have been so badly mixed up by recent events that the friends and workers of the various candidates here at the Capitol are now fully on the qui vive. They begin to talk more freely, and there is no dearth of presidential speculation and prognostigation at the Capitol and about town. The result of the New York Republican convention is the subject of much discussion. Several unsuccessful attempts have been made by ambitious newspaper men to interview Mr. Arthur upon the subject. But he will not 'talk politics,' though it is said that those who possess his confidence have no difficulty in obtaining a perfect understanding of his views in regard to all political topics of the day. The President intends making a run over to his own state this week for a stay of several days, and it is hinted that the trip is not without significance. The Blaine men still keep up courage and enthusiasm. The historian himself has paused long enough in his work on the second volume to note, in conversation with his friends, as an interesting fact in recent political history, that although he is not a candidate, his friends came within a few votes of capturing the convention in President Arthur's own State last week. 'I am not a candidate,' he says 'I have not lifted a finger toward my nomination. I do not intend to do anything in Maine or anywhere else toward that end. I am busy with my book. But if any of the candidates should succeed in capturing a single district delegate in Maine—a single one—I would absolutely forbid the use of my name in the Chicago Convention.' It is reported that there is a coldness between General Logan and Secretary Lincoln, which may further complicate the respective booms. As the story goes, President Garfield first offered the war department to Gen. Logan, who declined, and named Mr. Lincoln for the position, with the understanding that Lincoln should not put his finger in the presidential pie, thereby injuring Logan's chances. This compact, as far as Illinois was concerned, was complied with by Lincoln. Gen. Logan's strength in the state was not divided. But the Senator thinks that the spirit, if not the letter, of the compact was violated by Mr. Lincoln and his friends working a Lincoln boom in the other states. Declinations from Democratic leaders are following each other so closely, that in such dearth of available candidates affectionate remainder has been made of the Hon. James W. Denver, of Virginia, Ohio, and Colorado. His boom is much talked of at the Capitol, and no less a statesman than Hon. Mr. Belford endorses him as a 'broad guage western man,' who so gained the respect of Colorado people that they named the chief city after him, and, as Mr. Belford takes care to add, it is a beautiful city, too.

In social circles here, the wives of the prominent presidential candidates are discussed from a feminine point of view. It is amusing, if not instructive, to hear the expressions of opinion. As a matter of fact there is a good deal in the question of the social qualifications of the women who do or do not aspire to be mistress of the White House. Some of those who are fitted for the duties are not strong enough physically to meet the demands of the public. They possess the tact and gracious kindness, in fact everything but health and robust strength. Among this number are Mrs. Robert T. Lincoln and Mrs. Joseph R. Hawley, two who would probably shrink from the ordeal. Neither aspires to be 'the first lady of the land,' but both possess a strong degree of will power which would enable them to conscientiously perform every duty in the White House. Mrs. Logan has tact, ability, and health, and would be a popular mistress of the Presidential Mansion. As a woman, she possesses much the same magnetism and tact and memory of people and names that Mr. Blaine has as a man. 'What a popular administration we should have if he could be Mr. President and she could be Mrs. President' comes from the women's point of view. Mrs. Blaine is cold-mannered and stately. She has a fine presence, and is thoroughly liked by her friends. But she would not be a popular mistress of the White House, and the people could not get very near her. Her entertainments would be faultless; but thoroughly American as she is, and scorning all pretense, she is nevertheless exclusive. She cannot help it. She is natural and too honest to be politic or other than what she is. She lacks tact; and tact in the White House is worth more than talent, and will accomplish more, whether the work to be done is social or political.

Dorsey of Star Route fame will begin to unfold his budget of scenations before the Springer investigating committee tomorrow. His testimony will be very interesting if he tells what he promises to tell.—LENOX.

TOWN NEWS.

Trout fishing is popular.

THE Salvation Army organ says Owen Sound is the devil's Canadian headquarters.

THE Credit Valley R.R. from the 1st of May will be known as the Canadian Pacific R. R.

MISS Alice Jones has opened a dress and mantle making room over Thornton's store. Entrance, stairway between Henderson's and Boles'.

ENTERTAINMENT.—The ladies of the Oxford Street B. C. Church purpose giving an entertainment on Monday evening, 26th inst. Particulars in another issue.

PERSONAL.—Messrs. Telfer and Lofrey, of the Merchants' Bank, Galt, have lately left that institution to enter the service of the new Bank of London, the former in the London, and the latter in the Ingersoll office.

DIED.—The funeral of Wm. N. Henderson, of Adelaide township, took place at the Catholic Church on Monday. A large concourse of friends congregated at the G. T. station on arrival of London train. Mr. Henderson was fourth son of the late James Henderson.

LITERARY ENTERTAINMENT. — The High School will give an entertainment in the Town Hall on Friday evening, May 16th. Proceeds to establish a library in connection with the High School here. All are invited. Admission 25 cents. For further particulars see small bills.

LONDON papers announce that Tuesday, the 17th June, has been selected this year as the opening day for the camp. It will be noticed the date is much earlier than usual, and consequently the camp will be in full swing before Dominion Day, so that the customary review on that day will not be one of the attractions this year.

THE following appeared in the "Bric-a-Brac" column of the Globe of the 3rd inst.: "A woman in Maine has formed 530 intelligible words from the letters of the familiar word 'incomprehensibility.'" A little girl in Ingersoll, under twelve years of age, having noticed the item, has, out of the same "incomprehensibility," formed 1,060 intelligible words.

R. C. CHURCH.—The ceremonies at the Church of the Sacred Heart on Sunday last were very impressive. Bishop Walsh of London officiated, aided by Father Molphy and two other priests. The masses were beautifully rendered by the choir. The Bishop preached a very eloquent sermon in the evening. Services were also held in the Church on Monday and Tuesday.

BASE BALL.—A match game took place on the Park on Tuesday afternoon between the "Beavers" under the captaincy of Robert Downing, and the "Lions" captained by Arthur Lee. The "Lions" were badly vanquished by the "Beavers," the latter club winning by 21 runs in five innings. The "Beavers" are prepared to down any club of their size and weight in this or any other burgh.

GRAND CONCERT—A musical and literary entertainment will be given in the Baptist Church here on Tuesday evening, May 13. Addresses will be delivered by Rev. Thos. Foster, B.A., Woodstock, Mr. Jos. Gibson and Rev. H. C. Speller. Excellent readings and music. A very enjoyable time may be expected, as the committee who have the matter in hand have spared no trouble to make this the best of the season. Tickets 25 cents. See programmes.

PHOTOGRAPHIC ART.—There is not in Canada to be found more artistic work than that turned out by our new townsmen, Messrs. Brouse & Rawe. These gentlemen turn out work that is unsurpassed in any city in this country, and having the best appliances they cannot fail to give satisfaction. They have secured the right to finish photos in the French Enamel, which is something new and beautiful, and should be seen by everyone. There are only two galleries in Canada possessing this right. These enterprising gentlemen will be found one door south of THE CHRONICLE Office—Wright's old stand.

THE CREDIT VALLEY EXTENSION. — The survey of the route of the proposed extension of the Credit Valley railway to Detroit is almost completed, but there appears to be an uncertainty whether the road will be built. The President of the Canadian Pacific says that the Credit Valley will not be built to Detroit unless the Wabash secures an independent line of its own into Chicago. There would be no use building to Detroit otherwise, as the Credit Valley has just as good a connection at St. Thomas as it could secure at Detroit under the present arrangements. What is wanted is advantageous connection for through Western business. That the Wabash could afford with its own through line, but cannot so long as it is at the mercy of the Baltimore & Ohio.

WEATHER SIGNALS. — The Government weather bureau at Toronto has about perfected arrangements for indicating the weather probabilities to the farming community by means of the express trains on the various railways. Signals of different shapes to indicate the weather that may be expected for the ensuing 24 hours will be carried on day trains leaving Toronto, and will be conspicuous enough to be seen at a considerable distance. The system has been in vogue on a number of American railways for a year or two, and has proved very valuable. The signals will be based on the same information as supplied to the daily press, which, however, does not generally reach the parties most interested till too late to be of use. Further particulars will be given hereafter.

MONTHLY MEMORIAL.—In the church of the Sacred Heart, on the 2nd inst., a solemn requiem high mass was celebrated by the Rev. Father Molphy, for the repose of the soul of Mrs. W. Hackett, who was taken away from our midst one month ago, and who always gave a living and pious example to her respected family and the Catholic congregation of Ingersoll. On this occasion the music was grand and solemn, Rev. Father Bayard, of Sarnia, formerly the pastor here, assisted the choir and inspired all with his familiar voice and sweet tones. Mrs. G. W. Watson as at the funeral service, by request, took charge of the organ again, managing the choir and organ with her supreme skill and artistic execution as ever, ably assisted by Rev. Father Brady, Woodstock who sung base, Miss Doty, Ingersoll, Miss Keating and her choir of the church.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES. — The Orillia Packet says:—Nearly two years ago the Rev. Mr. Grant left Ingersoll and accepted a call to the pastorate of the Presbyterian congregation of this town, in order that the two Presbyterian congregations of Ingersoll might unite, if so disposed. One of these congregations, we believe, was anxious for union, while there were a few in the congregation of which Mr. Grant was pastor who were unwilling to make the experiment. Believing that a union was utterly impracticable and that even if it were formed it would not last, Mr. Grant, not desiring to take any part in the negotiations, left the town. Some time afterwards a so called union was formed, and lasted a few months. Last Sabbath the congregations split again, and worshipped in both churches. There has, we understand, been a good deal of feeling, and a law suit is spoken of, about the church property.

CALEDONIAN CONCERT.—Regarding Mrs. Jessie Robertson, who has been engaged to sing at the Caledonian Concert, 26th May, the Kingston Whig says:—The star of the evening, Mrs. Robertson, of New York, fulfilled her promise to sing at the concert, though at great personal inconvenience. "Within a Mile o' Edinboro' Town" made a very favorable impression, and in complying with a recall she sang "Comin' Thro' the Rye" tenderly, pathetically, affectingly, and a perfect storm of applause followed her retirement. In the second part she gave "Auld Robin Gray" with marked finish and expression, and her popularity was wonderfully increased when she expressed, in a musical way, her love for the "Auld Scotch Sangs," the mention of which raised the enthusiasm of the audience to what one termed an explosive point. Perhaps her best contribution was "Auld Edinburgh Cries," composed for and dedicated to her. In this piece the shading was particularly noticed.

THE 24TH.—The Foresters of this town intend going to Brantford on Queen's birthday, (24th,) at which place there is to be a grand demonstration.

THE Police Magistrate has been kept quite busy of late. Several persons are anxiously awaiting his decision, particularly those whose pockets are likely to be made lighter by his magisterial edict.

A story is circulating of a boy who being asked by a schoolfellow to give him the core of the apple he was eating, promptly replied, "There ain't going to be no core." There's the making of a politician in that boy.

THE Canadian Pacific R. R. Co.'s new and magnificent steamer Algoma, will leave Owen Sound at 4 p. m. on 10th May, for Port Arthur, there connecting with the Canadian Pacific R. R. for Winnipeg and Northwest Territories. This heralds the opening of navigation.

CIRCULARS have been issued to the officers and employes of different systems, notifying them that on and after to-day the Ontario & Quebec Railway, with leased lines,—Credit Valley and Toronto, Grey & Bruce—will be operated as the Ontario division of the C. P. R., Mr. W. Whyte being General Superintendent.

TREE PLANTING.—The St. Marys Argus says:—For years the Council of this town has given 37½ cents for every tree planted, and as the result of this public spirited policy, the town has become a perfect arbour, almost every street being lined with beech, maple, chestnut, and other handsome trees, which are very attractive to visitors and are the pride and glory of the denizens.

THE destruction of shade trees, caused by the practice of using them as posts for tying horses to calls for interference on the part of the police. Several valuable young trees have been destroyed in various parts of the town by this careless habit of people who have occasion to tie up their teams, and it is time the law was enforced upon a few of these parties as a warning to other offenders.

THE editor of Harper's Magazine gives in the May issue his idea of an ideal newspaper. He says it pleases 'son and daughter as well as father and mother;' it is filled with 'airy and general gossip without pander, and touches 'all events of the day as the talk of the average household touches them, but governed and restrained by a skill which will permit no mischief.

WHITE MOUNTAINS AND SEA SHORE EXCURSION.—The noted excursion so successfully inaugurated by Mr. Brearley, of the Detroit Evening News several years since and which were carried over the picturesque Grand Trunk road, will be continued the present season under the direct management of that road. The excursions will be under the immediate supervision of Mr. William Robinson, the general agent for the road at Detroit.

A serviceable limp to storekeepers is given by the Registrar of the Ontario College of Pharmacy, in an advertisement just published. Those who sell Paris Green, London Purple, or "other arsenical insecticides," are required thereafter to label the packages with the name and address of the seller, and to keep a record of their sale. This under a penalty of $20 for the first offence and $50 and costs for subsequent offences. Pharmacy Act 1883, Sec. 24.

A DOCTOR COMMITTED.—The preliminary examination of Dr. James B. Whitley, of Goderich, and Dr. Thomas Reeve, of Clinton, charged with a misdemeanor in connection with the performance of their sending a small-pox subject, John Little, on a Grand Trunk car to London from Goderich, resulted in the acquittal of Dr. Reeve on the ground that he had erroneously diagnosed the case as one of chicken-pox. Dr. Whiteley, however, was committed for trial.

SWINDLING FARMERS. — Reports come from three or four different sections of the Province within the past week to the effect that farmers have been victimized by agents for hay forks. It is the old story over again of signing agreements that turned out to be notes. Those who allow themselves to be gulled in this way by unscrupulous and glib-tongued agents deserve but little sympathy, and reflect on the well known intelligence, as a rule, of the farming community.

A NATIONAL ARBOUR DAY. — The interest manifested in tree-planting this season is as surprising as it is gratifying. It is rapidly becoming general. It has been suggested that another be added to our holidays by having an Arbour Day for the whole country to be specially set apart for tree planting. The Inspector of Schools for Wentworth has granted a holiday to all the schools in his county when the children are to turn out and (assisted and directed we suppose) ornament their school grounds with trees.

HOUSEHOLD PESTS.—The following hints are given for getting rid of household pests: Rats are said to have such a dislike to potash that if it is powdered and scattered round their haunts they will leave them. A piece of rag well soaked in a strong solution of cayenne is a capital thing to put into rat or mice holes, as they will not attempt to eat it. A plug of wood covered with a piece of flannel so prepared may be used to fill up the holes. Cockroaches and ants have a similar dislike to cayenne, and a little strewed about a cellar will keep it clear of them.

MCMASTER HALL.—The closing of McMaster Hall, Toronto, took place on Tuesday. Principal Wolverton, Prof. Farmer and Trustee D. W. Karn from Woodstock College were present. McMaster Hall is now an established success, and is doing a great work for the Baptist Church. At this closing meeting, the following ministers who were graduates of the theological department of the Canadian Literary Institute, Woodstock, were admitted ad eundem gradum in the Toronto Baptist College:—Rev. John Harden Best, Chatham; Rev. C. W. Haycock, Lakeport, Cal.; Rev. Ebenezer Hooper, Kingston; Rev. John Wm. Clarke, Ingersoll.

THE USE OF BICYCLES.—A correspondent wishes to know whether it is true that in some cities in the province a by-law has been passed preventing the use of bicycles on the street. In every court and judical department where the question has risen it has been decided, without exception, that the bicycle is a vehicle, and as such has equal rights with other vehicles to the use of the streets and highways without discriminating restrictions, and subject to the same rules and laws which govern other carriages. Therefore it would be useless for any city to pass such a law, as such a measure would be unconstitutional without a doubt, and not in accordance with good law and common sense.

REMEDY FOR CABBAGE WORMS.—A correspondent of the Fruit Recorder, after long experimenting to discover an effectual remedy for the destruction of cabbage worms and yet not poisonous to human beings, says that a solution of common alum made by dissolving a pound in three gallons of water will auswer the purpose. His method was to dissolve the alum in a small quantity of warm water and then add sufficient water to make the three gallons. When cold put it into a common watering pot and sprinkle the cabbage and cauliflower plants, keeping it up as long as any of the insects are about, from the time the white butterfly began to lay her eggs. He also used this solution on currant bushes with equal results, and commends it for washing the trunks of young fruit trees, being a cheap, effectual and non-poisonous insecticide, acting instantaneously on the worm or caterpillar by means of its astringency and so contracting their tissues that they cannot breathe.

ENLIST THE RISING GENERATION.—The New York Sun in a recent issue says: To-day is "Planting Day" in New Jersey, and everybody in that State is encouraged to set out trees. The school children get a holiday and brief season of respite from the birch, a fact which will not make them any less likely to take an interest in the observance in the day. "Planting Day" and the "Arbor Days," which are appointed in various States, ought to have at least the effect of teaching the generation the importance of preserving the forests, provided this generation leaves any to preserve. At anyrate, the custom of planting trees is a good one for any State to encourage in all ways, and one day in the year is not too much to set apart for the purpose. The immediate success of this movement in favor of tree-planting depends to a great extent on the interest created in the minds of the young people and children. Cultivation of a love of the beautiful in nature should be a part of the education of every child at home and school. Thoroughly enlist the co-operation of the children in this matter and the success is ensured.

THE CAUSE OF THE SCARCITY OF FISH IN THE RIVER HERE.—The St. Mary's Journal says the reason the fish are not plentiful in the upper branches of the Thames is that the dam at Cashmere prevents it. The facts appear to be that an extensive fishery is carried on at that place for the Detroit, London, and other markets. True there is a fish-way at the dam, and matters seem all right to the Inspector whenever he presents himself, such visits being generally anticipated. But no sooner is the back of that worthy officer turned than illegal practices are recommenced. The fish are collected under an "apron" at the dam, and taken out by the barrelful. Another device is to "shingle" the river; that is throw across it a line to which a number of shingles are fastened, which, as they sway to and fro in the stream, keep the fish back by frightening them. When a multitude are thus collected in the water it is easy to haul in a barrelful at a time. All of which is very good for the Cashmereites, but bad for those who live higher up the stream and who care for fishing as a means either of food or pastime. The only way to stop the practices complained of would be to appoint a local sub-inspector on the spot, who would see the laws properly carried out.

Town Council.

The regular meeting of the above was held on Monday evening last.

They would recommend that the debenture stock and accrued interest held by this corporation against the C.V.R. be advertised for sale, and that a notice of said sale be inserted in the Toronto Mail and Globe and the Montreal Gazette, on Wednesday and Saturday of each week for four weeks, and that the Clerk be instructed to send to each of the above mentioned papers a copy of advertisement properly prepared for insertion. Respectfully submitted.

Your Committee have engaged Mr. John Goble to take charge of the work of repairing sidewalks at $1.75 per day. He has been over the town and estimated that it will take about 37,000 feet of plank to repair the different streets where the sidewalks are now. Your Committee would recommend that the tender of G. W. Watson be accepted if the quality of lumber is satisfactory, also the tender of Wilson & Robertson for nails be accepted.

On motion it was resolved to suspend Rule 37 for the evening.

Literary Notes.

A series of especially valuable articles on educational sujects will begin in the June CENTURY with a discussion by President Eliot, of Harvard, of "What is a Liberal Education?" The July number of THE CENTURY will have an exhaustive paper by ex-President Woolsey, of Yale, on the much-mooted subject of "Honorary Degrees." Other articles will follow these on the study of Greek, on Co-education, and on "The Collegiate Study of Women." This last paper is by Mr. Arthur Gilman, of Cambridge, the manager of the Harvard Annex of women.

Washington Gladden will contribute an article to the June CENTURY on the "Use and Abuse of Parties." Dr. Gladden holds that parties are necessary to all constitutional governments being based on the progressive and conservative tendencies of human nature. While claiming that the "dearth of principles and the strife for patronage are characteristic facts of our recent political life," he comes to the conclusion that—at least outside the cities—more of good can be accomplished by joining one party or another, working earnestly for its success, and bolting bad nominations.

The numbers of The Living Age for April 26th and May 3rd contains Anthony Trollope, Westminster; Christopher North, National Review; Machiavelli, Fortnight; King John of Abyssinia, Nineteenth Century; An Ancient Manuscript, Contemporary; A Pilgrimage to Selborne, Longmans; Temples and Worshippers in Japan, and Preachers and Worshippers of the Past, Temple Bar; The Wells of the St. James Gazette; Indians of Guiana, Athenæum; The Italian in Life and on the Stage, All the Year Round; With instalments of "Beauty and the Beast" "The Baby's Grandmother," and "A Renegade," and poetry.

The Bible and Its Value.

PAPER V.

In our last paper we wrote of the morality and precepts of the Bible; let us here say that those inherent powers tend to the noblest object. What is that object? Answer —To make men happy and useful, "wise unto salvation through faith in Jesus Christ." A saved man ought always, but sometimes must, be a happy and useful man. What scheme outside of the Divine purpose can accomplish this, and in fact, what aim that ever originated in the mind of any philosopher was ever so fully met? From the time of Thales, 590 years before Christ, to the days of Cicero, which were about 60 years before Christ, there were numberless aims and efforts to make mankind better by codes of morals intended to regenerate the word. But what of them? Where are they? Those systems, like their founders, have crumbled with age and fallen by the hand of time. The wisest sayings of Socrates of Greece, and of Confucius of China, could not produce a beginning in comparison with the noble aim of the Bible of God. What multitudes have been freed from the bondage of sin and made wise unto salvation, who before were ignorant of such a thing as the power and comfort of Divine grace, and multitudes yet unborn shall still increase the witnesses in fulfilment of the noble aim of Bible truth. The object of a Divine revelation necessarily associated with the gift of the Saviour of men, is the only efficient panacea for the world's woe, and the main spring of that happiness which alone is real and abiding. Permanent happiness cannot come from any other source. Many, very many, have tried other sources, but have signally failed. The monarch, the hero, the statesman, the orator, the poet, the wit and humorist, the artist, the man of fashion and of wealth, have all tried to find happiness without obedience to Bible precept, but all have failed. Take a few leading examples: Frederick the Great, of Prussia, the founder of that nation's prestige, and power above every other Prussian ancestor, almost always in the field of conflict, yet continually carrying in his pocket a viol of poison to take his own life, should he be taken a prisoner by an enemy. He drew nigh to the future, ripe with age and as miserable as could be. The good old Dr. Zimmerman pays him a kind visit to tell him of a speedy dissolution. "Thank you Dr." said he, "but when you do not see me, remember what a miserable man you saw when you beheld the last hours of Frederick the Great." Napoleon Bonaparte found no satisfaction that was lasting from the victories of Austerlity, or Jena, and we are sure the result of Waterloo, which made him a royal prisoner for life, brought him no happiness. These are his own words spoken at St. Helena, and the reader may find them in La Casa's Journal: "I am now a prisoner, having no satisfaction from all my conquests, having no satisfaction from the priests who incensed me into the belief that their reign is not of this world, and yet they lay hands on everything they can get, having no satisfaction from the Pope who is the head of that religion from heaven, while he thinks most of this world, etc." The fallen Napoleon continued his comments, after reading from the first chapter of Mathew, continued as far as Christ's sermon on the mount, "the expressed himself struck with the highest admiration at the purity, the sublimity and the beautiful morality the New Testament contained." William Pitt the younger, who by great brilliancy of genius and powers of oratory, became Prime Minister of England at 24 years of age; at the early age of 47 he died, seemingly with broken heartedness, exclaiming, "I fear I have neglected too much in life to rise to make it available on a death bed." George Brummell, of English history, at the age of 21 succeeded to property valued at thirty thousand pounds sterling. The tailors of the English Metropolis soon learned to regulate the fashions of the day by his decision and taste. In fact, just what Watt was to the scientific world, Brummell was to the fashionable world. One invented the steam engine, the other invented starched neckcloths. Brummell declared advisedly, and soberly, that a young man ought to make eight hundred pounds ($4,000) do for clothes in one year! This was his idea of happiness. But was he happy? Nay. Let your eye, gentle reader, turn from this gentleman in St. James' Street, in London, Eng., across the Channel many years after. He is that old man with rags and tottering steps walking so feebly along the streets, surrounded by children who jeer and mock him as he goes? Who? Geo. Brummell the man of fashion seeking happiness, until then, but never finding it, "the mighty one fallen." Fallen from his high estate, his life larrely a waste of precious opportunities. Ah! with what noble dignity the Bible refers to such a case by saying, "Use this world not as abusing it, for the fashion of this world passeth away." Here is one more example: William Beckford of the last century was a resident of the West of England. At ten years of age his father died, leaving to his son, property in the West Indies amounting to $500,000 per year. During his minority he was placed under guardianship, and so carefully had his guardians watched over his estate, that at 21 years of age young Beckford was worth in hard cash one million pounds sterling. He resolved to find happiness in worldly pleasure. The kitchen in which his dinner was prepared is thus described by his biographer: "A stream of water flowed through it, from which were formed reservoirs containing every kind of river fish; on one side were heaped up loads of game and venison; on the other vegetables and fruit in endless abundance and variety; beyond a long line of stoves extended a row of ovens, and close to them hillocks of finest flour, rocks of sugar, jars of the purest oil, and pastry in various abundance, etc. This circumstance must strikingly remind the reader of another circumstance of which is said, "There was a certain rich man who was clothed in purple and fine linen and fared sumptuously every day," etc. This wonderful manner of living did not satisfy Beckford. He then lived a life of ease on his father's mansion, which, by the way, had cost two hundred and sixty-three thousand pounds sterling to build, and ordering it to be pulled to the ground, he built on its foundation the then wonder of the West of England, Fonthill Abbey." A wall nearly 20 miles in circumference surrounded this mansion where Beckford dwelt in stately grandeur. Majesty itself was desirous of visiting this wonderful domain, but was denied admittance. But the time came when a great depreciation of his foreign property took place, when the famous mansion with its costly furniture, with gold and silver vases, were scattered by the hammer of an auctioneer. All this did not because it could not produce happiness. On the other hand, dark may be the cottage, scanty the meal, broken the vessels and tattered may be the garments of the poor, yet if they love and obey the truths of the Bible underneath the roughest exterior, there flows the royal blood of a son of God and an heir of heaven.

Mount Elgin.

Madame Huntley has secured license and is opened out in full blast once more.

Elisha McConnel has been lying seriously ill for some weeks, and we regret to learn his physician has given up all hopes of his recovery.

We extend the hand of friendship to Andrew Beath of Beachville, who has accepted the position made vacant by the departure of Mr. Maxwell.

Our genial friend J. Miller, senior member of the firm of J. & R. Miller, was home from the Welland Canal last week. He expects to complete their contract there in about four weeks.

Mr. Patrick Duffey died suddenly last Saturday morning after only a few days illness. He was one of the pioneers of this section and will be greatly missed by his numerous friends and neighbours.

The services of the Rev. Willet, of Toronto, has been secured by the Baptist denomination of this place and Salford. The reverend gentleman comes highly recommended and undoubtedly will be acceptably received.

Our butcher, Wm. O'Connor, drives too fractious a horse for his own good. It ran away twice last week, destroying his buggy the first time, and scattering his meat and waggon along the high way the second. Less speed more haste William.

Rev. J. T. Davis, of the M. E. Church, entered on his duties as pastor of this circuit last Sabbath. We were pleased to see that the choir had reorganized and were in their seats to assist in the services. Good singing adds materialy to the effect of the sermon.

Wm. Bolton while trying to throw off a belt with his foot, got caught, but fortunately was thrown clear of the pulley the first revolution, thereby escaping serious injury. As it was he was knocked senseless and his foot and ankle severely injured, which will lay him up for a week or two.

We have to regret the departure of our esteemed friend John Maxwell, clerk and operator for J. & R. Miller. His health failing, his physician advised trying Kansas and Colorado air, in hopes it might do for him what medical skill failed in doing. He left last week for Kansas City thence to Denver. That he may recover his usual health and vigor is the wish of his many friends in this locality.

Mt. Elgin Oddfellows held their anniversary services Sabbath afternoon, and although the weather was decidedly against travelling there was a fair congregation, and amongst the brethren we noticed a goodly number from Norwich and Salford (among the latter being our old friend Roy.) The Rev. J. Ferguson preached a very practical sermon and one that was appreciated by all present.

ANN M'CABE.

The Adjourned Inquest.

The adjourned inquest in the matter of Ann McCabe, of London South, was held on Monday night. Mr. Chas. Hutchinson represented the Crown, and Mr. Moorehead, of Mr. E. Meredith's office, the prisoner Geo. McCabe.

Mr. B. C. McCann testified to drawing up wills respectively for Geo. and Ann McCabe.

Peter Gordon, a hostler, testified to Mrs. McCabe being always active and cheerful, and fully competent to attend to the duties of the hotel and house; on the night in question he was awakened by McCabe, who told him to go for Mrs. McMillan, as Mrs. McCabe was very bad; Mrs. McCabe was shaking and quivering, and she told Mr. McMillan to hold her tight; while the spasms were on her, she appeared as if she were in the agony of death; "I think there were three or four spasms; I helped to keep her arms down; her face had a blueish look; she died in one of the fits; I was present when she died; when McCabe first called me he didn't tell me to go for a doctor; I didn't offer to go for a doctor; McCabe never said anything to me about Mrs. McCabe threatening to drown herself; he never told me to fill up an old well or tank with earth, so as to prevent Mrs. McCabe from drowning herself; McCabe never told me that his wife and tried to poison himself; I had no idea she would take her life, on the contrary, she had quite a cheerful disposition; I did not see her drinking anything after supper."

To Mr. Moorehouse—McCabe never quarreled with Mrs. McCabe; he was a good-humored man, but she seemed to be quarreling with him; Mrs. McCabe said herself that McCabe was a good natured man, that she couldn't make him angry.

To Mr. Hutchinson—Never heard of any strychnine in the house; never heard of Mrs. McCabe having poisoned any cats or dogs.

To Mr. Meredith—I think McCabe told me his wife would go crazy unless she stopped drinking.

Detective Schram—McCabe said when arrested, he was as innocent as I was; after the funeral I had a chance to speak with him for a short time; McCabe asked me what the doctors thought; I answered I didn't know; he said, "Well, if she was poisoned she must have poisoned herself." I said, "What makes you think she poisoned herself?" He said, "She threatened to take her life on three or four occasions."

He said once she had attempted to take her life by drowning; I asked him how she had tried to drown herself, and he replied that he had found her in the cellar attempting to pull off the boards and get into the well, and that he went up and fetched her away and brought her upstairs, and that he had ordered his man to pump out the water and fill up the well; then he said when she found she couldn't drown herself that she had threatened to take her life by poison; I asked him what he found in the house, and he said yes, and I asked him how he knew she had poison in the house; he said because she had poisoned three cats and a dog; Jarvis was present at pretty near all the conversation, and I think either Jarvis or McCabe told me where he got the poison, and he said her former husband had got it from Drs. Fraser and Stevenson, and he said poor Stevenson was dead now; he said he thought he could show me where one of the bodies of the cats had been thrown.

Coroner Smith then adjourned the inquest till Monday evening next.

West Oxford.

On Sunday morning, 27th ult, Mr. Wm. Rivers's house, on the 5th con. of West Oxford, was discovered to be in flames, and owing to the high wind which prevailed at the time was burned to the ground. Excepting some articles of household furniture everything was lost. The wind blew from the opposite direction Mr. Rivers states that it would have been impossible to have saved the barns and stables. Great credit is due to Mrs. Rivers for her presence of mind, and also to the neighbours for saving what they did. The loss is about fifteen hundred dollars, partly covered by insurance.

Salford.

A number of our citizens attended the Oddfellows anniversary at Mt. Elgin on Sunday.

"Daniel's Band," organized by Rev. Mr. Hunt, held their meeting here on Sunday in the Methodist Church.

Mr. Thomas Newton is building a commodious barn on the 1st con.

Mr. Robt Mitchell has lost three valuable cows this spring.

We understand the Ingersoll and Pt. Burwell gravel road is to be gravelled and repaired from Mt. Elgin to Ingersoll during this year.

Rev. Mr. Grillin moves to Springfield this week.

The farmers generally are through with their seeding. The rain on Sunday is making things grow finely.

Fred Row received first prize on his imported stallion at Aylmer, and diploma for having the best horse on the ground. The horse is a fine one, and considered by good horsemen the best in this locality.

W. H. Johnson came near having a runaway last week, while coming from Ingersoll. About a mile west of Ingersoll, on the Hamilton road, the hind axle of his waggon broke, frightening the horses and throwing Mr. Johnson out on the road, bruising him considerably but not seriously. His mother was with him when the accident occurred and jumped out, which gave her a severe shaking up.

C. L. Zehr, the East Zorra cattle dealer, has succeeded in effecting a settlement with his numerous creditors at 50 cents on the dollar, to be paid within a short time.

We hear from Innerkip that there have been a number of cases of black diptheria in that neighborhood. This is the most malignant type of this dreaded disease, In addition to the fact that it usually proves fatal in a very brief space of time, it is very contagious. It has already carried off a number of youthful victims.

Canadian vs. American Justice.

Short shrift was given Phipps, the wife murderer, across the river. Canadian justice, in less than two days, tried, convicted and sentenced him to death. If physician has given up all hopes of his recovery.

FARM AND DAIRY.

Value of a Pure-bred Bull.

Will it pay a farmer to keep a pure-bred stock? asks a stock man in the Rural New-Yorker. The reply to this depends upon a very simple question, viz., are pure-bred animals better than good grades and are not high and well-bred grades quite as productive as pure-bred ones, figuring from a strict money point of view? A pure-bred cow is too costly to be kept merely for the sake of her milk and butter. A pure-bred bull is worth more than any cow in the ratio of his increase of stock. And it is a well-known fact that a very large proportion of the grade cows that have been sired by good pure-bred bulls are equally valuable for a dairyman, and the grade Shorthorn and other steers are as good beeves as the pure-bred animals. This is a matter of experience. Then, what can a few associated farmers afford to pay for an excellent thorough-bred bull for the improvement of their herds? This is bringing the question down to a practical business point.

A good Shorthorn or Devon bull will sire fifty calves a year for ten years. A common scrub steer four years old will make 1,000 pounds, live weight, worth three cents a pound, or $30. A half-bred Shorthorn or Devon grade steer, three years old, will make 1,400 pounds or $70. It costs something less for one year's less feeding and herding, say $5. The difference in value, then, is $45; and multiplying the annual produce of 50 by $45 we get $2,240 as the yearly gain, or $22,500 in ten years. If the stockman is satisfied with 50 per cent. on his investment, he can afford to give exactly $3,750 for a bull. The sum produces $1,875 every year, or $18,750 in ten years, and this, with the price of the bull, makes the total sum mentioned. The owner can very well afford to bury the profitable animal at the end of his term and put a marble monument over him, or stuff his hide and mount it in a glass case and sacrifice the actual value of his carcass.

This is no fancy figuring; on the contrary, we have given the scrub more weight, as a four-year old, than he is entitled to, for few of them will draw over 900, and we have also allowed him the same market price as the grade, and he is not entitled to this by one-half or three-quarters of a cent; there is a greater difference even than this in our stock pen prices here at this time.

The Rearing of Calves.

There is no question that the rearing of calves requires more skill and attention than at any after period of the life of the animal. To make good oxen or cows, they must be more liberally dealt with than was customary in bygone times. It is a notable fact that there is a far greater mortality among calves in the early weeks and months of their life than afterwards. Of course the natural food of the young animal is milk, and the earliest milk of the dam is the first which is served up as being required by the calf, owing to the purgative character of that liquid. This is the uniform practice where the plan of hand-feeding from the pail is followed. When the calf is fed by suckling the mother, which is the natural process, it receives the first milk of the dam as a legitmate consequence; but that does not generally comport with the usual arrangements of the English farm, and perhaps nine-tenths of the breeders and rearers of cattle feed their calves by the pail.

The diseases to which calves are liable are various, and diarrhœa is but too common a complaint. A change of diet does good in these attacks, with a dose of half an allowance of food and a greater amount of warmth. It is due to the food and feeding, and seldom troubles the calf that suckles the dam. Dyspepsia in calves is not uncommon, and the symptoms are various—loss of appetite, hide-bound, and pain and pressure at the right of the belly, are all indications of the complaint; but, unless the stomach is diseased, it is devoid of danger. The hoove is pretty common and not frequently fatal. Typhoid fever is a form of attack to which calves are subject, and often an unaccountable mortality appears among calves rather diversified in character, which bears more or less of the foregoing symptoms.

Calf-rearing is the most important part of stock-farming, and may be pronounced the chief spoke in the wheel of the pastoral and arable farmer. February and March are the most advantageous months of the year for rearing calves. They are ready for taking a bite of grass when May and June come, and when the weather is warm. They stand the colds of the ensuing winter better than summer calves, especially in cases where good housing cannot be commanded. It is plain, too, that cows timed to calve in spring are in full milk when the grass is at its best. By these arrangements the object of breeding, which is to secure the largest returns in the shortest time from the consumption of a given amount of food, is most likely to be attained. Some farmers prefer purchasing their summer and winter stock, but taking one year with another, those who rear their cattle follow a more certain plan, and their stock are not so liable to be caught with infectious diseases. There is another consideration of some weight, namely, that store stock have been selling for some time at a higher proportionate value than fat animals.

Breeders on good farms put their heifers to the bull at about 15 or 16 months old, and thus they drop their first calf when two years old; but in ill-circumstanced districts as to climate and soil it is the practice to let them stand till a more advanced age. In most parts of Wales and in the dairy districts of the West of Scotland, the young stock intended for the dairy are sparingly fed, and to bring them in as breeders at the early age mentioned would impair their growth and value materially. The dam at two years would rear her own calf; but a three-year-old cow would do something more. —Breeders Journal for April.

The fattening qualities of corn as compared with oats, is shown by the greater amount of oil it contains, being nearly double that of oats. Thetefore, if used as food for working horses, it should be given in these proportions. Equal quantities of corn and oats should not be ground together. Such a thing is dangerous. Oats should be given whole, unless necessary to bruise them for a special reason. Corn ground with the cob adds to its bulk, and does away with some objections to its use. Hay fed with the grain, helps the digestion of the latter, We should prefer not to moisten the grain—particularly if the animal is a greedy feeder. Bran mashes should be given at least once a week in place of grain, or better still, carrots twice a week.—American Agriculturist for May.

NINE PHYSICIANS OUTDONE.

Mrs. Helen Pharviz, No. 331 Dayton St., Chicago, Ill., is now in her sixty-eighth year, and states that she has suffered with Consumption for about ten years, was treated by nine physicians, all of them pronouncing her case hopeless. Hereford Bull "Success," owned by T. L. Miller Co., Beecher, Ill., by "Banquo" 4, 3667, out of "Dolly Varden" 5.

We present our readers with a cut of the Hereford Bull "Success." He was imported from England by T. L. Miller in 1873, and has been in service in their herd from that time to the present, and is now as vigorous as at two years old. He has been a noted show bull, from a yearling down to 1879, and is yet a very fine specimen of the breed. We present this cut to our readers because the Hereford breed of cattle have become so popular in the States as well as in Canada. They seem, at the present time, to have the lead of all other beef breeds, considered in the prices they bring and their general adoption throughout the country.

The Herefords first became noted in 1775 and took a very leading position among the beef breeds of England from that time on. At the inauguration of the first fat stock show in London under the auspices of the Smithfield Club, a Hereford took the champion prize for best beast in the show, and it is said that they continued to hold that position for twenty years. They had taken as many premiums before that society as all other beef breeds combined up to 1851, and have always commanded a leading position in the London market for their quality of meat, and do to this day.

The reported sales in England during the month of March show a very large advance in prices there, both for exportation to America and for the formation of new herds in England. Several Canadian buyers are now in England buying the foundation beasts for herds in Ontario. These will be noticed in due time. The Wyoming Hereford Association brought over some 250 head in February which are now in Baltimore, Maryland, and will be released from quarantine early this month. This Association have now a herd of nearly 500 near Cheyenne, Wyoming.

We trust that our Canadian stock breeders may find all the satisfaction that they expect from the importations now being made or to be made shortly.

Swollen Tongue in a Cow.

Inflammation of the tongue is a very troublesome disorder. It causes swelling of the organ and difficulty of eating. It may be due to one of several causes, such as injury by thorns in the hay or sharp decayed teeth or by poisoning by absorption of matter from the decayed teeth or diseased jaw. It has also been found to occur from a special blood-poison which may be communicated from one animal to another by infection from the saliva of a diseased animal. The treatment is to give a dose of epsom salts, 16 to 24 ounces, in some linseed tea. Follow this by one ounce doses of hyposulphite of soda daily. Wash the mouth frequently with a solution of borax or vinegar and water, with honey added. Poultice under the jaw every day, with linseed meal. The feed should be chiefly liquid, as oat-meal and linseed well boiled, the rest soft, as bran mash. The hyposulphite may be given in the drink. It would be well that the other cows should be kept from contagion by isolating the sick one and using a special pail for feeding her. If the skin of the tongue sloughs off in places, these raw parts should be washed with a solution of one dram of permanganate of potash in a pint of water.

Notes.

The Japanese farmer cultivates all crops with a large chisel.

Vermont shotes have wintered well on ensilage with some grain in their rations.

Unless sheep are kept in a uniformly thrifty condition "jointed wool" is the result.

The average farm hands in England do not receive more than $3.50 per week, with cottage and small garden free.

Merino sheep, 205 in all, from Vermont and Michigan, recently destroyed by the Australian Government at Sydney, were valued at $10, 000. They were suffering from scab.

There are 11,169,700 horses in United States, also 13,501,000 milch cows, 29,046,000 oxen and other cattle, 50,626,000 sheep and 44,200-800 swine.

There is surely nowhere in this country this season any excuse for using small, scabby or otherwise imperfect potatoes for seed. It is safer even in years of scarcity to plant only smooth, ripe and well-shaped potatoes. The plant is in the nature of a cutting, and the product of tubers is strongly influenced by the character of the potatoes from which the eyes are taken.

Says B. G. Buell: "Sheep clover and plaster have done much to make Michigan celebrated as a wheat growing State. However, in those counties where the greatest number of sheep are kept, there is the greatest average production of wheat per acre. By a persistent course of seeding to clover and pasturage by sheep, I think the land is inproved faster than by the rest and nonstock system; and besides, there is a profit all the time accumulating from the sheep, an advantage the others do not have.

The old rule was that a heifer with her first calf could be reckoned half a cow. They will generally be better than this if well fed and cared for. If the family from which the heifer springs has been a good milking strain, they can usually be bought of native breeds for much less than they are worth. They will more than pay their way, and yearly increase in value until they are six years old, when they are in their prime.

Much that we read in agricultural papers about the advantage of old pastures comes to us from England, where they have successfully practised the plan of keeping land unplowed for nearly or quite 100 years. In this country, except on river bottoms annually overflowed, we have little or no old grass land. Somehow, when the grass is at its best, or at least as soon as it begins to fall, the average farmer bethinks himself how valuable the sod would be to plow under for manure.

A row of fine trees along the road-side forms an attraction to any farm; but it is not always desirable in every view. If the trees are close to the side of a field their roots will exhaust the soil for a rod or more inside the fence, and this to farmers who pride themselves on having crops even over the whole field makes the trees almost as much of a nuisance as they would be if not beautiful. It is the water that these trees take up that makes the crops poor under them, so that even heavy manuring does not entirely remove the difficulty.

That sheep will improve the fertility of your soil may be very easily demonstrated by yarding them a few nights in Spring or Summer on the thin and poorer spots, or on knolls that may be found in most of your pastures, those places where the grass grows weakly and where sorrel grows. Sow clover, timothy or blue-grass thickly, and then by a light portable fence confine your flock of sheep for a few nights on these places, and you will soon realize that by a little attention, and not very much labor, your soil will be improved in fertility, and and that your sheep, with a liberal use of clover and grass-seed and plaster, may be made the best and the cheapest fertilizing agents you can employ, particularly on fields most remote from your barns.

On level lands it is best to spread manure in the fields as fast as made in late Fall and during the Winter.

Prof. Brown of the Ontario model farm says: "An average cow for dairy purposes should give twenty pounds of milk per day during 200 days every year; eight pounds of cream from every 100 pounds of milk; forty five pounds of butter from every 100 pounds of cream; and fully ten pounds of cheese from every 100 pounds of milk."

The vegetable matter in all muck has a certain value on sandy or gravelly soils which need more humus to enable them to retain fertility. The farmer who owns a muck bed near a sandy knoll, as many do, can hardly mistake in trying the effect of the muck as a top dressing. Whether it will prove valuable for soil not naturally deficient in vegetable matter, depends on the character and composition of the muck. Some kinds of muck abound in mineral elements, and these are everywhere valuable.

It is very rare in farming that any single experiment can be regarded as conclusive. This is especially true of the cultivation and manuring of crops. Difference in seasons will make one manure more helpful during one season, While something else proves better the next. In the same year there may be wider variations in the fertility of portions of the same field than the experimenter suspects. It requires several years of careful study of a farm, and repeated experiments, to make results all certain.

Inside the poultry house no outside fittings should be permaneut fixtures. —Plenty of dry dust should be supplied, in which the birds may clean themselves. —Amateurs should commence with small flocks.—Meat is an important feed once or twice a week, and often times prevents feather eating.—Poultry yards should be long and narrow so as to facilitate plowing and cultivating at times.—Left to her own pleasure a hen eats a little of everything, hence in a yard a variety of food should be supplied.—Scalded hay, the greener cut the better, chopped fine is an excellent feed in Winter. So also is ensilage.—A successful poultry raiser feeds his nine fowls as follows: In the morning one pint of corn meal and one quart of shorts, seasoned and scalded. In the afternoon one quart of barley.

TROUBLE WITH CALVES.—There has been a good deal of trouble hard to account for in various darts of the country —a sort of epidemic, epizootic rather, of scours. The cows are affected. and so are the calves. The former stand it fairly, but the calves die—some of them. It is probablp on account of the cosmic dust, or the volcanic ashes of Java, or something of that sort. Nobody needs to search for its cause in his own barnyard, unless he does not take much stock in such things. Cows drink manure-water for the salt in it. Will regular salting stop the scours? It will stop their drinking that kind of water, in our experience. "Spring poor" half-nourished cows are very liable to scours, lice, hide-bound and other maladies, besides hollow-horn and wolf-in-the-tail, which are purely imaginary, although half the cows die of one or the other. The milk of a half-nourished cow will either constipate or scour a calf, and often both, but not at the same time. The milk of a cow giving very rich milk will often give the scour to her own calf, if the calf suck. The same milk skimmed, or half skimmed, may suit it very well. A calf early taught to drink is easily managed as to its diet. A little boiled milk thickened with fine wheaten flour added to the ration once a day will usually check the tendency to looseness. Calves should early learn to eat wheat bran, but it should never be given raw—always scalded or cooked, and in their drink. Ginger is a stiumlant to which cows rarely object, and a heaping tablespoonful in a bran mash will tone up a cow's appetite remarkably, and the tendency is to check scouring. Teaspoonful doses are good for weakly calves whose food does not digest well. Finely powdered charcoal is also excellent as an occasional corrective.

CRUELLY MURDERED.

In the Province of Ontario every year thousands are being slowly murdered by taking insuitable, untried nostrums for such complaints as Costiveness, Indigestion, Liver Complaint, Kidney Troubles, etc., who might easily regain lost strength and energy by using McGregor's Speedy Cure. To convince Diem that such is the case we will give them a free trial bottle at Gayfer and Kneeshaw's Drug Store. Price 50c. and $1. See testimonials from persons in your own town.

TEMPERANCE.

What Alcohol Does.

At one time it was thought that alcohol helped men to perform feats of physical strength: to-day this fallacy has been completely disposed of. Ask our professional athletes what they do when they prepare for some coming contest, and when they are wishing to bring up the body to its utmost physical strength, and they will tell you they carefully exclude alcohol from their diet, and drink chiefly, if not altogether, water or milk. When Tom Sayers prepared for all of his celebrated fights—fond as he was of liquor—and at last it killed him—he carefully abstained. "When I go in for business," said he, "water, and water only, is my drink." Ask Hanlan what he thinks about alcohol when training for a boat race. And at the present moment, Weston the celebrated English pedestrian, is walking all over the United Kingdom, performing many miles a day of hard walking, and in the evening delivering a temperance lecture. Again, as a medicine, its benefit is now very much questioned. Dr. Gardiner, of Glasgow, after very careful experiments, has proved that, instead of helping in the case of fevers, it is a dangerous and even fatal fluid. When he first watched its effects upon his patients, he found that 36 out of every 100 died—he gradually reduced the doses, and the percentage of deaths, decreased in proportion to the doses, until, at last, he decided to give up its use altogether; and now only 8 or 9 per cent, instead of 36, of his patients die. And thanks to the splendid discoveries of other eminent men of science, the medical faculty are reconsidering their practice, and are using this drug very differently from former days. Further, it is found to be a fruitful cause of disease. Twenty years ago, excepting delirium tremens, what is called "gin drinkers' liver," was considered to be about the only disease caused by alcohol; but now, it has been discovered, that not only this disease, but a number of others, are the result, directly or indirectly, of the use of alcohol. Notably, liver disease, paralysis, dyspepsia, heart disease and premature old age; and some eminent physicians do not hesitate to declare that 70 per cent. of all the diseases of Great Britian and Ireland springs from the use of alcoholic beverages. Again, it has been proved that heredity of disease results from its use. Dr. Mason has shown that inebriety in parents is a fruitful source of insanity in children —and out of 116 patients at one time under his charge in the insane asylum 92 were offspring of drunken parents. Is not this a fearful fact, and one pregnant with dire results to the future of our race? Another fallacy that has been disproved is that alcohol keeps out the cold. It is perfectly true that after a dose of alcohol the pulsations of the heart will rapidly increase but in a short time the reaction sets in and the heart beats much feebler than before the dose of alcohol was taken.—Stephen Caldecott.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Hints to Housekeepers.

Fruit stains can be removed by freezing.

Twenty buttons is the correct length for gloves for full evening dress.

English girls are wearing patent leather shoes, with uppers made of pale yellow kid.

Mildus may be removed by dipping the stained parts into butter milk, and putting them into the sun.

If a little salad oil is mixed with mustard for the table it is greatly improved.

Moth infested articles should be saturated in naptha or benzine. It injures nothing, and kills the destroyer.

It sooths and cools a feverish patient to bathe him with warm water in which a little salaratus has been dissolved.

A good Fever Drink.—Put a large spoonful of black currant jelly into a tumbler, and fill it up with boiling water. When cold, it is ready to drink.

To take the grease out of velvet, pour a little turpentine over the spot, then rub briskly with a piece of dry flannel.

All kinds of glass can be cleaned with tea leaves after they have been used. They take off the dull look, and leave the glass clean and clear.

To restore gilding to picture frames, &c., remove the dust with a soft brush, then wash the gilding in warm water, in which an onion has been boiled; dry quickly with soft rags.

If a bedstead creaks at each movement of the sleeper, remove the slats and wrap the end of each in old newspaper. This will prove a complete silencer.

Calisthenic exercises are calculated to cure deformities ot the figure, especially of the chest, to invigorate the system, and conduce to elegant deportment and symmetry of form.

The best way of removing the stain of ice cream from a pale-blue silk dress is to saturate it with perfectly pure cold water, and to rub the edges of the mark made by the water with flannel, so that it does not leave a stain.

One of the commonest mistakes made by parents is to ignore the fact that their children are growing up. They remain simply boys and girls to their fathers and mothers, while everybody else see plainly that they are already menaced by the dangers which beset the early maturity of life.

Three Minutes Pudding.—Take one tablespoonful of flour and of sugar, a tablespoonful of baking powder, and one egg. Place the mixture in a small long dripping tin, and bake lightly. When removed from the tin spread either stewed apples or preserved fruit over it, and roll it up like a bolster. It is described as a "three minutes' pudding."

Mince Collops.—Take a pound of good juicy beef, mince the whole very finely, as if for sausages. Brown a piece of butter in a stewpan, then put in the collops. Stir them well, adding a little flour, a little hot water or gravy, and season with a little pepper and salt. An onion may be chopped and put in along with the meat. Slowly simmer for an hour.

Veal Steaks.—Remove all the bits of skin and tallow, take out bone, and treat thoroughly with a beefsteak pounder. When you have sprinkled salt and pepper over them, cut into pieces the size of a large oyster; dip in beaten egg, then in bread or cracker crumbs; fry in lard and butter. After taking out the veal make a gravy of milk, and thicken with flour.

How to Make Potted Meat.—Get two pounds of hough (the middle cut is the best, as there is most meat on it) and two ox feet; wash the feet clean, and boil all together in two quarts of water until the meat quite leaves the bones, then take it out and separate the bone from the meat; cut the meat small, put it back in the pot, pepper and salt to taste, boil slowly for half an hour, then dish.

Unexplored Cities

The English are beginning in vague way to realize the magnitude of India, and to comprehend that it contains some fifty millions more people than all Europe west of the Vistula. Few, however, are quite aware of the number of its cities, or believe that it includes sixty-two with more than 50,000 people, and twenty-two with more than 100,000 namely, Bombay, Calcutta, Madras, Hyderabad, Lucknow, Benares, Delhi, Patna, Agra, Bangalore, Umritsur, Cawnpore, Lahore, Ahmedabad, Jeypore, Rangoon, Poona, Allahabad, Bareilly, Surat, Howre and Baroda. We give them in order of population, but, properly speaking in the English way of counting, Howra, the Southwark of Calcutta, should be included in the capital which with it contains above 866,000 souls, and is the greatest, as it is by far the wealthiest, city in the empire. Below the limit of 50-000 the towns became much more numerous, and there are hundreds with populations above 20,000. The majority of the latter are quite unknown to Europeans, an active magistrate or two expceted; and, so far as we are aware there is no book in English which gives the slightest account of their organization, or of the life and people in them. Yet many of them have histories of two thousand years, and in all flourish families which think themselves noble, and have long pedigrees and stirring tales to narrate. We hear every now and then much of Indian princes who in India are hardly mentioned, and of "educated natives," a scarcely perceptible class, but of the true "British India" as little is known at home as of the eastern provinces of Peru.—London Spectator.

"What is the best and only remedy that can be relied on to cure all diseases of the kidneys and urinary organs; such as Bright's disease, diabetes, retention or inability to retain urine, and all the diseases and ailments peculiar to Women"—
"And they will tell you explicitly and emphatically "Buchu."
Ask the same physicians
"What is the most reliable and surest cure for all liver diseases or dyspepsia; constipation, indigestion, biliousness, malarial fever, ague, &c." and they will tell you:
Mandrake! or Dandelion!"

An Ambitious Woman.

BY EDGAR FAWCETT.

"Let us be candid," said Claire. "Your note was almost a sneer."

He slowly shook his head. "It was a regret."

"You think I might have done greater things."

"I think you might have done better things."

"You admit that I have achieved success?"

"A marvellous success. It shows your extraordinary gifts. The town, in a certain way, is ringing with your name. If an ordinary woman had gained your place she would have found in it a splendid gratification. She would have been amply, perfectly satisfied."

"You mean that I am not satisfied. Pray allow it. Your tones and your look both show it me."

Thurston, smiled, transiently and sadly. "I mean that you are miserable," he said.

Claire bit her lip and slightly drooped her head. "You have no cause to tell me that."

He leaned closer to her. "I do tell you. It is true. I saw it in your face when I first looked at you. There is a change. I can't define it, but it exists. You are more beautiful than when I saw you last. You have an air of ease, dignity and command. But you express a kind of superb weariness, and yet occasional flashes of excitement are in your talk and demeanor. You see, I have watched you from a distance; I have my opinions."

"Yes, you have your opinions," said Claire, lifting her head and directly regarding him. "That is very plain."

"It all makes an exquisite picture," Thurston continued. I have seen the world, as you know. I have seen many beautiful women. Your personality, as I now encounter it, is an absolute astonishment to me. I don't know where, in these few months, you acquired your repose, your serenity, your magnificence, your air. Do you remember what I told you of the restless American type that you represent? I knew you would strive to rise; it was in you; you pushed to the front, as I was sure you would do. But I had no prescience of this mighty accomplishment."

"You are sneering at me, as your note sneered," said Claire, looking at him steadily. "Acknowledge it. I perceive it with great accuracy. I somehow cannot answer you as I would another. You warned me months ago. You knew what I desired, and told me of the danger that lay in my path. I recollect all that you wanted me to try and be. Perhaps I would have tried, under differing conditions."

She paused, and Thurston instantly said, "As my wife you would have tried—and succeeded."

"Perhaps," she answered, very low of tone, but not meeting his look. "But all that is past. Don't pull corpses out of graves."

"My love for you is living," he said to her. There was no touch of passion in his voice; there was only a mournful respect. "I don't think I am wrong to speak of it now. There's a sanctity and chastity about the feeling I bear for you which the fact of your being a wife does not affect. I want to know the man whom you have married; I am curious to meet him and know him well. He has a large publicity, as you are aware. They have heard of him in Europe."

"I understand the question you wish to put yet do not," Claire said, at this point. "You lead up to it very adroitly; I might play the rôle of ignorant innocence, if I chose. But I do not choose. You want to ask me whether I loved the man I married."

Thurston again stroked his mustache for a moment. "Yes," he presently said, "I should like to know that."

A silence now ensued between them. Claire broke it. "He loved me," she said.

"Which means that you did not care for him?"

"Oh, yes, I cared very much. It was no worldly sale of myself. He was not even rich when I married him. He attracted me—in a manner charmed me. I felt that I should never meet another man who would attract and charm me more. Do you understand?"

"Thoroughly. . . . Since then you have met Stuart Goldwin. I know him well. He is a man of exceptional fascination. They tell me that he is your slave."

"Do they?" said Claire, coloring under this rapid attack of candor. "Well, if he is my slave—which I, of course deny—then I am not his. They did not tell you that, I am sure. They did not even hint it."

"No. You have escaped the least breath of scandal."

"Be sure that I have. And I shall continue to escape it. I recollect that you once declared I was cold, and that my coldness would prove a safeguard. 'It is very protective to a woman,' you said."

"Quote me in full or not at all," he corrected, with a grim pleasantry. "I said that it is very protective to a woman—while it lasts."

"True," returned Claire. "And it has lasted. I prophesied that it would last, and I was right. . . . By the way, from whom have you learned all these important items? Perhaps from your sister. She is not my friend."

Thurston started a little. "She is not your enemy?" he said, putting the words as a distinct question.

"I hope not. But I am by no means sure. Thus far she has held herself aloof from me. She has not openly opposed me, but she has behaved with telling reserve. Everybody else has paid me tribute, so to speak. No, I am wrong. There is one other woman—her cousin, Mrs. Lee."

"Of course you know why poor Sylvia would be your foe. She is madly in love with Goldwin; she has been for years. You must have cost her dire pangs."

Claire chose to ignore this last statement. "I think your sister dislikes me from pride," she said. "I mean pride of family." Here she paused for a moment, and seemed almost bashfully reluctant to proceed. But her hesitation had in it a gentle, unassuming modesty; it sprang wholly from unwillingness to touch on a subject which she knew that only the most delicate tact should deal with, if to deal with it at all were not folly and rashness. "Your sister found out," she softly continued, "that you had liked me enough to ask me to be your wife. Heaven knows, Beverley Thurston, that I did not tell her!"

Thurston looked very grave. "I told her," he said. "Or rather, she drew it from me. I was foolish to let her. Cornelia is so clever. . . . Well," he suddenly went on, with an unusual show of animation, "do you mean that she accused you of having rejected me?"

"She did not put it in the form of an accusation. She stated it. Wait; I will tell you more; I will tell you when, where, and how it all happened."

Claire did so. He listened with deep attention. She narrated the whole episode of her well-remembered conversation with his sister in the dining-room at the Coney Island hotel.

"Ah, what a woman that sister of mine is!" he exclaimed in his subdued way, as Claire finished. "I must talk with her. I dine there to-night. I will find out if this knowledge has been at the root of her late behavior."

Claire laid her gloved hand lightly on his sleeve. "I think it best to say nothing. I feel that you are my friend—always my friend. As such you will more discreetly let matters rest where they are."

"Let matters rest where they are?" he repeated.

"Yes." Her face broke into a smile as she spoke the next words. "Mrs. Van Horn—the great Mrs. Van Horn—has withdrawn her disapprobation. The day after to-morrow she and Mrs. Lee lunch with me. It is a ladies' lunch. You have no idea how monstrously important an event her attendance is to be. It is my crowning glory. After that I shall have no more worlds to conquer. She is actually coming; I have it in her own graceful handwriting. Frankly, I am quite serious. If you had followed affairs, if you hadn't been off in Europe for months, you would understand the momentous nature of your sister's acceptance."

Claire rose as she ended her last sentence. The conservatory was quite empty of guests; the waning winter sunlight told of the hour for departure. "It is time to go," she now continued. "Remember, whenever you come to me you will be welcome. I shall be at the opera to-night. Drop into my box if you can get away from your sister's dinner before ten, and feel like hearing some music."

Thurston replied he would certainly do so. But, as it happened, he partially failed to keep his promise. Mrs. Van Horn's dinner was attended by several guests. He wanted to talk with his sister, and it was somewhat late before he found the desired opportunity.

"Did you enjoy it, Beverley?" said his hostess, referring to the dinner. They were in the front drawing-room together. Thurston had seated himself near the fire place, in a big chair of gilded basket-work, with soft plush cushions. He was playing with a small locket at his waistcoat, and his look did not lift itself from the bauble as Mrs. Van Horn spoke. She came near his chair, and stood at his side for a moment. She had been giving her servants a few orders relative to the morrow. She looked very well that evening. The color of her gown was a sort of tea-rose pink, and she wore a collar of large pearls about her throat, and ornaments of pearls in her blonde hair. While her brother was answering, she dropped in a chair quite near his own.

"I thought it about as successful as your dinners always are," he said. "Everything went off to perfection, of course. No, I forget; there was one drawback. A serious one."

"What was it?"

"Sylvia Lee."

"You never could endure Sylvia," said Mrs. Van Horn in her grand, cool, suave way.

"I think her abominable," replied Thurston. "Her affectations irritate and depress me. They appear to grow with age, too. She behaved more like a contortionist than ever, to-night. But it is not only the wretched, sensational bad taste of her poses and costumes. It is a conviction that she is as treacherous as the serpent she resembles. And then her religious attitudinizing . . . has she got over that yet? I suppose not."

Mrs. Van Horn, who would sharply have resented these biting comments if any lip but her brother's had delivered them, now answered with only a faint touch of petulance. "You will never believe any good of Sylvia, so it is useless to say that you are unjust in your opinions. But she is more profoundly absorbed in charities and religious devotions than ever before. If you could see some of the people whom she goes among, and whom she has constantly visiting her in her own house, you would be forced to grant that the shallow hypocrisy with which you charge her is a most sincere and active almsgiving."

"Say, notorious, too. She's a Pharisee to the tips of her fingers. I should like to know of one good deed that she has ever performed in secret. She parades her piety and benevolence just as she does her newest fantasies in dressmaking. She thinks them picturesque. She would rather die than not be picturesque, and I believe that when she does die she will make some ante-mortem arrangements about an abnormal coffin. It's a marvel to me that Stuart Goldwin should have put up with her nonsense as long as he did. . . . By the way, how does she stand his desertion?"

"Has he deserted her?"

"Oh, come, now, Cornelia, you know quite well that he has." Thurston was looking directly at his sister for the first time since their interview had begun.

Mrs. Van Horn gave a light, soft laugh.

"You can't disguise from me, Beverley?"

"Of course I do."

"I see that you have picked up some precious bits of gossip since you got back." He was watching her very closely, and perceived, knowing her as scarcely any one else knew her, that a severe annoyance dwelt beneath those last words. She slightly tossed her delicate head. "You are so relentless with poor Sylvia that I naturally don't want to feed the fuel of your disapprobation. Well, then, let me admit that Goldwin is devoted to your former friend."

"Say my present friend, if you please, Cornelia."

He saw a little gleam, like that of lit steel, creep into her pale-blue eyes. "Oh, then you still call her that?"

"Most certainly. Should I withdraw my friendship because she refused to marry me when I was old enough to be her father? On the contrary, I am liberal enough to applaud her good sense."

"Beverley," exclaimed his sister, in tones of harsh disgust, "how can you show so little self-respect?"

He saw that she had grown pale with anger. He set his eyes upon her face with a fresh attentiveness of gaze. He had a distinct object in view, and he was determined, if possible, to reach it. He leaned much closer to her while he said, in slow, deliberate tones:—

"My self-respect, or lack of it, is quite my own affair. Pray understand that. You never forgave Claire Twining for refusing me, Cornelia. You need not attempt to deceive me there. I repeat, you never forgave her. Your pride would not allow you."

Her voice shook as she answered him. She was bitterly distressed and agitated. He had touched an old wound, but one which had not healed. She loved him as she had never loved any other man. He was part of herself; his blood was hers; he belonged to the egotism which was her ruling quality. Her speech now betrayed neither wrath nor disgust; it was full of mournful dismay. The times in her life had been rare when her glacial composure had shown such excessive disturbance.

"I concede, Beverley, that it hurt me very deeply to realize your humiliation. It seemed to me then, as it seems to me now, that a girl of her class should be glad to marry a man of your place and name. What was she? And what were and are you?"

"Pshaw! I was and am an elderly, faded old fellow."

Mrs. Van Horn rose from her chair. She was visibly trembling. "You could have given that adventuress a position far more stable than she now holds, as the wife of a lucky stock-gambler!"

Thurston remained seated. "You call her an adventuress," he said, "and yet you visit her—you put her on a social equality with yourself."

During the vigilant scrutiny with which he accompanied these words, Mrs. Van Horn's brother decided that in all his experience of her he had never seen her show such perturbation as now.

"People acknowledge her," she said, a little hoarsely. "I have never been to her entertainments. I have never accepted her, so to speak. If you inquire, you will find this to be true. It is current talk, my reserve, my disapproval."

He shot his answer with quiet speed, meaning that it should hit and tell. "You are going to the lunch that she gives on Friday. I happen to be certain of this—unless you have had the wanton rudeness to write her that you would go while meaning to remain away." He rose as he spoke the last word. Brother and sister faced each other. There was a tranquil challenge in Thurston's full and steady gaze.

She recoiled a little. "I—well, yes—I did intend to go," she replied, below her breath, and actually stammering.

"What is your reason for going," he questioned, "if you despise and dislike her so?"

She threw back her head; her self-possession had returned, and with it a stately indignation.

"You are violent," she said.

Thurston broke into a hard laugh.

"Yes," he exclaimed, "I am insolent to the great lady because I detect her on the verge of some petty revenge! Oh, I know you too well, my dear sister," he went on, with stern irony. "You can't rebuff me in that way. There is something behind this fine concession. Sylvia Lee and you have been putting your heads together. Your revenge and her jealousy will make a rather dangerous alliance. You are both going to the lunch. You are both employing a new line of tactics. What does it mean? I demand to know. I have a right to know."

He was very impressive, yet his voice was hardly raised above that of ordinary speech. She had always admired his gravity and calm; he had been for years her ideal and model gentleman; she hated excitement of any sort, and to see it in him gave her a positive feeling of awe.

"Beverley," she murmured, half brokenly, "remember that if I had any thought of punishment toward the woman who trifled with you and humbled you, it has been because I am your sister—because I was fond of you—because——"

He interrupted her with a quick, waving gesture of the hand. "You talk insanely," he said. "She neither trifled with me nor humbled me. I was a fool even to tell you how sensibly she acted. What you call your fondness is nothing but your miserable pride. I see clearly that you have some detestable plan. Do you refuse to tell me what it is?—me, who have the right to learn it?"

Every trace of color had left her cheeks, and she was biting her lips. There was very little of the great lady remaining in her mien or visage now.

"You have twice spoken of your right," she faltered. "On what is such a right based? How can you possibly possess it? You are nothing to her. You are neither her husband nor——"

"I am her lover," he broke in. "I am her lover, reverent, devout, loyal, and shall be while we both live! She is the most charming woman I have ever met. I met her too late, or she would be my wife now. It was not her fault that she refused me. She is not a bit to blame. Good Heavens! have I the monstrous arrogance to assume that she should have married an old fossil like myself because I was of a little importance in the world? No, Cornelia, that preposterous assumption belongs to you. It is just like you. And you call it love—sisterly love. I call it the very apex of intolerable pride. But admit for the moment that it is I and not yourself whom you care for. Will you tell me, on that account, what it is you mean or meant to do?"

Before he had finished, Mrs. Van Horn had sunk into a chair and covered her face with both hands. Her sobs presently sounded, violent and rapid. In these brief seconds she was shedding more tears than had left her cold eyes for many years past.

"I mean to do nothing—nothing!" she answered, with a gasp almost like that which leaves us when in straits for breath.

"Do you give me your sacred promise," he said, "that this is true?"

The words appeared to horrify her. She looked at him with streaming eyes, while a positive shudder shook her frame.

"Oh, Beverley, what degradation this seems to me! Degradation of yourself! You may call me as proud as you choose. It is no insult. It is a compliment, even. I am proud of being proud. I had never given up hope that you would marry some woman of birth, good antecedents, your equal in time—young enough, too, to bear you children. I am childless myself—how I would have loved your children! Their own mother would not have loved them more. Every penny of my large fortune should have gone to them. This has been my dream for years past, and now you shatter it by telling me that an upstart, a parvenu, a nobody from nowhere, holds you ensnared beyond escape!"

Thurston was not at all touched. This outburst, so uncharacteristic and so unexpected, did not bear for him a grain of pathos. He saw behind it nothing save an implacable selfishness that chose to misname itself affection. The ambition of Claire saddened him to contemplate; it had so rich a potentiality for its background. He was forever seeing the true and wise woman she might have been. Even the nettles in her soil flourished with a certain beauty of their own, proving its fertile resources if more wholesome growths had taken root there. But in Cornelia Van Horn's nature all was barren and arid. The very genuineness of her present grief was its condemnation. Her tears were as chilly to him as the light of her bravest diamonds; they had so nothing of the same hard sparkle; she wept them only from her brain, as it were; her heart did not know that she was shedding them.

"The bitter epithets which you apply to my ensnarer," he said, with a momentary curve of the lips too austere to be termed a smile, "makes me the more suspicious that you harbor against her designs of practical spite. I want your promise that you will refrain from the least active injury—that you will never use the great social power you possess, either by speech or deed, to her disadvantage. Do you give me this promise, or do you refuse it? If the latter, everything is at an end between us. The monetary trusts you have consigned to me shall be at once transferred to whatever lawyer you may appoint as their recipient, and from to-night henceforward we meet as total strangers."

"A quarrel between me and you, Beverley!" said his sister, trying to choke back her sobs, and rising with a cobweb handkerchief pressed in fluttered alternation in either humid eye. "A family quarrel! And I have been so guarded—so careful that the world should hold us and our name in perfect esteem—Oh, it is horrible!"

"I did not infer that it would be pleasant," he answered. "You yourself have power to avert it or bring it about. All remains with yourself."

"I—I must make you a promise," she retorted, in what would have been, if louder, a peevish wail, "just as though I had really intended some—some gross, revengeful act! You—you are ungentlemanly to impose such a condition! You—you are out of your senses! The creature has bewitched you!"

He saw her eye, tearful though it was, quail before his own narrowed and penetrating look. He felt his suspicion strengthen within him.

"I do impose the condition," he said, perhaps more determinedly than he had yet spoken. "I do exact the promise. Now decide, Cornelia. There is no hard threat on my part, remember. You don't like the idea of an open rupture with me, you don't think it would be respectable; it would make a little mark on your ermine—a défaut de la cuirasse, so to speak. But your beloved world would possibly side with you and against me; you would not lose a supporter; you would still remain quite the grand personage you are. Only, I should never darken your door again; that is all. Come, now, be good enough to decide."

She sank into her seat once more; her eyes had drooped themselves; the tears were standing on her pale cheeks. "I did not know you had it in you to be so cruel," she said, uttering the words with apparent difficulty.

"I am afraid I always knew that you had it in you," he returned. "Come, if you please. . . . Your answer."

"You—you mean my promise?"

"Yes. Your faithful and solemn promise. We need not go over its substance again. If you break it after giving it I shall not reproach you; I shall simply act. You understand now; I have told you."

She was silent for some time. She had got her handkerchief so twisted between her fingers that they threatened to tear its frail fabric.

Without raising her eyes, and in a voice that was very sombre but had lost all trace of tremor, she at length murmured:—

"Well, I promise faithfully. I will do nothing—say nothing. My conduct shall be absolutely neutral—null. Are you satisfied?"

"Entirely," he said.

He at once left her. He reached the opera just as it was ending. Claire, in the company of two ladies and two gentlemen, and attended by Goldwin, was leaving her box when he contrived to find her. Hollister had purchased one of the larger proscenium boxes some time ago; he had given a great price for it to an owner who could not resist the princely terms offered.

"You are very late," Claire said, giving him her hand, while Goldwin, standing behind her, dropped a great fur-lined cloak over her shoulders, and hid the rich costliness of her dress, with its laces, flowers, and jewels. "Have you been dining with your sister all this time, or were you busy for the last act, but talking with older friends elsewhere?"

"No," replied Thurston, who had already exchanged a nod of greeting with Goldwin. He lowered his voice, so that Claire alone could hear it. "I arrived but a few moments ago. I have been talking seriously with my sister. You might have visited; there were several receptions that afternoon, at which her presence would have been held important by their respective givers. Even the known jeopardy of her husband's position would have heightened the value of her appearance, adding to her popularity the spice of curiosity as well.

More than once she said to herself: "I will go to one of these places. I will show them how quietly I bear the strain. If by to-morrow no crash has come, they will admire my nerve and courage. For if I once went, they should never discover a trace of worriment or suspense. I think the fact of my being closely watched would even make me talk better and smile brighter. The wear and tear of the whole thing might make me forget a little, too. And I want so to forget, if I can!"

But she did not go. The morning papers lay on a near table. She read every word that they had to tell her of the financial turmoil. Some of the stern figures that they quoted made her heart flutter with afright; some of their ominous and snarling editorials wrought an added discomfort.

It Hollister weathered the storm, she decided, all would remain as it had been before. Or, if not precisely that, the general outward effect would continue much the same. She would shine among her courtiers; she would dazzle and rule. He would feel his wound, now that he knew her indifference, but he would make the engrossing ventures of his business life drown its pain until this had perhaps ceased forever. They would drift further apart than they had ever done in recent months, but to the eye of the world there would be no severance. It was possible that he would vex her with no more reproaches. It was probable that as time passed he would forget that he ever had any reproaches to offer.

While Claire's reflections, nervous and fitful, took by degrees some such shape as this, she found a desperate, yearning pleasure in the hope that she might still drink the vin capiteux of success. She a most felt like flinging herself on her knees and praying that the delicious cup might not forever be dashed from her lips. To this stage had her triumphs brought her.

She was the same woman who had made those resolves of abstinence and reformation which her biographer has already chronicled. She was the same woman whose conscience had smitten her with a sense of higher and purer things when the farewell of Thurston warned her by such appalling remonstrance, and when she found herself confronting her father's placid tomb amid the solemnities of Greenwood. And yet how abysmal was the difference between then and now! The chance of radical change in heart, aim and ideal had been given her; but now all thought of such change woke only a wilful, imperious dissent. Her vision turned upon her own soul to-day, and showed its mighty lapse from grace, its supine and and incapable droop. The debasing spell had been woven; what counterspell was potent enough to break it? Occasional flashes of regret and aspiration might well assail her spirit, or of recognition that she had lost a high contentment in gaining a low one. This was natural enough. It has been aptly put into metaphor that the saddest place in Purgatory is that from which the walls of Paradise are visible.

WE DO NOT CLAIM

that Shaker Blood Syrup will cure everything but the fact that on the purity and vitality of the blood depends the vigor and health of the whole system, and that disease of various kinds is often only the sign that nature is trying to remove the disturbing cause, we are naturely led to the conclusion that a remedy that gives life and vigor to the blood, eradicates scrofula and other impurities from it, as Shaker Blood Syrup undoubtedly does, must be the means of preventing many diseases that would occur without its use; hence the field of its usefulness is quite an extended one, and we are warranted in recommeading it for all derangements of the system which are caused by an unnatural state of the Blood.

Gentlemen—I was a great sufferer from Salt-Rheum on my limbs, for a dozen years previous to the summer of 1876, at which time I was cured by Shaker Blood Syrup. The skin would become dry, chap, crack open, bleed and itch intensely, so that I could not help scratching, neither of course made them worse. At the time I commenced taking Shaker Blood Syrup (in the summer of 1876) they were so bad that they discharged, and I was obliged to keep them bandaged with linen cloths. The skin was drawn so tight by the heat of the disease that if I stooped over they would crack open and actually bring tears to my eyes. The first bottle benefitted me so much that I continued taking it till I was cured. Hoping many others may learn the value of Shaker Blood Syrup, and receive as much benefit as I have, I am,
Very truly yours,

She Knew How to Manage Him.

There is a neat story told of a lady whose husband had a very small foot, of which he was extremely proud. She flattered him and encouraged his vanity, so that every time he bought tighter and tighter shoes. It was excruciating pain to go about in them, but he would not confess it. However, when he reached home in the evening his slippers were such a welcome relief that it was a difficult matter to induce him to go out after dinner. From a great club man he became noted for his domestic habits. Madam smiled to herself but said nothing.

Saving the National Game.

First Professional Baseballist—Something has got to be done; the receipts are falling off dreadfully.

Second P. B. B.—Yes, and I think I know the reason.

'You do? Well, out with it, we can't stand this.'

'The reason is that the public have an idea that all games are set up beforehand.'

'Well, what of that? The boys play as well as ever.'

'But don't you see that if the people think the game is set up they won't bet, and consequently they lose interest.'

'I never thought of that; but we can soon change public opinion in that regard.'

'How can we?'

'By telling the boys to get up an excitement at the close of every game.'

'Yes, but how?'

AND CANADIAN DAIRYMAN.

THURSDAY, MAY 15, 1884.

ALBERT E. Wrightman has been found not guilty of any connection with the Silcox murder. He was re-arrested on a charge of burglary.

THE Commissioners for enquiring into the conspiracy case, appointed under the Act passed last session, are :—Vice-Chancellor Proudfoot, of the Court of Chancery; Judge Scott, of Brampton; and Judge Sonkler, of St. Catharines. The Commission will probably enter upon its work early in July.

THERE was great excitement in Wall street, New York, yesterday. Scenes of the ever to be remembered "Black Friday" re-enacted. Five large brokerage houses and the Metropolitan Bank closed their doors. This was the largest panic since "Black Friday."

NO MORE important Act was passed in the late session of the Ontario Legislature than the one entitled "An Act to make further provisions respecting the public health." It places the health of the Province under a Provincial Board of Health, and establishes in each municipality a local board. Should the council refuse or neglect to appoint a local board, the Provincial Board is empowered to do so. A medical health officer and sanitary inspector may be appointed. To this board all the powers of health officers are given, and upon its members devolve the duty of seeing that the provisions of the Act are carried out. Stringent regulations are made in regard to the isolation of persons suffering from contagious diseases, and provision is made for disinfecting the houses, clothing and effects of those who have recovered from such. A form of by-law is appended which is to come into force in every municipality on the 1st of July next.

THE LOST FLORIDA.

RETURN OF THE ONLY CABIN PASSENGER SAVED.

Mr. Bennett of London Tells the Story of His Wonderful Escape.

JAS. R. Bennett, of London, the only cabin passenger saved from the steamship Florida, when 135 lives were lost, was interviewed on his return home. He gives the following interesting account of the wreck :—When I found the vessel was sure to go down, and that the boat was in a bad fix, I just took a header the way we used to do at the elm top, and down I went. It was a pretty good height, and I went down quite a bit. When I came bobbing up serenely from below there was a fellow grabbed me, but I shook him off. I only had steam enough for a single passenger, and any extra cargo just then would prove fatal. But, I tell you, when I looked around me, in the dim light, I saw a sight I'll never forget. The poor fellows who couldn't swim were coming up for the first, second, and some for the last time. The moans and groans were fairly heartrending. One face in particular—I fancy I can see it now—a young man—he came right up from under me; his white face rose up to the surface, the eyes starting from their sockets. He gave one gulp, the water poured from his mouth and he sank to rise no more. I thought it best to get away from that spot and just as I turned to go a hand grasped me with by the shoulder. It was now, do or die. With one terrific wrench I tore myself from his grasp and shot away, not one moment too soon, as just then down went the steamer, and the suction was so terrific that it drew all near it beneath the briny flood. One of the sailors told me afterwards that he was hanging on to something for all he was worth, but the suction was so strong that it drew his boots off. I now swam for the boat, which I found bottom up. There were five already on it—I made the sixth. We at once arranged to decline three on each side, with one arm over the keel and the other arm around each other's necks. This answered two purposes; one was to keep the boat trim, and the other to keep us from being washed off by the waves.

THE WATER WAS COLD

and the waves had a miserable feeling. First would come a medium wave, taking us up to the knees; then would come a larger one that would take us up to the waist, and—Oh, oh!" here the speaker drew his breath quick and sharp, illustrating the feeling a person experiences getting into cold and deep water. "But, boys, when the big wave came, as come it would once in a while, then there was a struggle, as the water would sweep right up to our chins.

THE POOR FELLOWS INSIDE,

how my heart ached for them. When the boat went over there were seven or eight imprisoned inside, and what little air they had soon became feted and poisonous. Their struggles were something frightful, and the kicking against the inside of that boat are sounds that I will remember to my dying day. Just let one of you kick that table from below," said Mr. Bennet, and one of the gentlemen in the back parlor did as he was told. "Harder than that," said Mr. B., and the table was kicked still louder. "Now, just fancy that sensation under you

FOR WEARY HOURS..

In addition to that the poor fellows prayed. Oh! such prayers. One man even sung a hymn—one evidently that he was taught in his young days by kind ones at home. And, I'm sorry to say, one or more cursed with bitter curses. It was sad, sad, out in the wild and dreary ocean to hear your fellow mortals struggling with one of the most fearful deaths I believe it is possible for a man to die. They knew we were above them, and would cry in most piteous tones : 'Take us out! Oh for the love of the dear Saviour take us out! Why don't they come! Oh, how long are we to suffer this agony!' If I had been inside," continued Mr. Bennet, "I should certainly have dived down and come up on the outside. I would never remain there till I either became insane or was suffocated. In about four hours the sounds began to get and at length ceased altogether, all except one man. At 5 o'clock in the morning one of the boats came to our rescue. We had then been holding on to each other and to the boat for over five hours, and, my word, what a relief it was for our aching limbs. When the last man was taken aboard they were going to pull away, when I told them I thought there was one man alive inside of the boat. The hardhearted boatswain exclaimed, 'Pull away, boys; we can't help him,' when up arose

A HEROIC NORWEGIAN,

Henry Anderson by name, and said he would brain the first man that laid hand to an oar, and with one jump he sprang on to the upturned boat. He then took one of the heavy oars, and using it like a battering-ram, he, by dint of crushing blows, stove in a large hole in the bottom of the boat, out of which we dragged

THE ONLY SURVIVOR.

He was alive but only delirious and refused to come at first; in fact, he drew back at our approach, but we pulled him out by main strength. We then examined the inside, but found all the rest dead. The story of our 35-hour trip in the boat has already been described.

"Had you any tobacco?" inquired one of the visitors.

"Yes, I had a plug of myrtle navy. It was wet, of course, but we cut it up fine and spread it out to dry. We then discovered a short clay pipe, and one passenger had a few matches. We allowanced each man three puffs an hour, as you are aware we had nothing to eat or drink with us. At the end of the 35 hours—more like 35 years to us—we were at length discovered by the Norwegian bark Theresa.

McCABE COMMITTED.

FOR POISONING HIS WIFE.

A Verdict of Murder given by the Coroner's Jury.

Ann McCabe Came to Her Death by Strychnine.

One-Fifth of a Grain Found in the Stomach —Strong Medical Testimony as to Cause of Death—Two Ingersoll Witnesses in the Box.

The McCabe inquest was resumed at London Monday night. George Morehead appeared for the prisoner; Chas. Hutchinson for the crown.

A WET CELLAR.

Thomas McLeod (recalled)—The well in the cellar had been a great trouble to Mrs. McCabe since a short time after Mr. Baldie died, because it overflowed; she had it drained, and often pumped out. I have found the water in the cellar up to my knees.

To Mr. Morehead—Don't know that it overflowed since the drain was constructed; never heard of its being pumped out since on account of overflowing.

To Mr. Hutchinson—Know nothing of the cellar troubling her since the McCabe marriage; heard Mrs. McCabe say the overflow did not trouble her since the drain was dug.

PRISONER'S VISIT TO INGERSOLL.

John J. Hoyt, M.D., of Ingersoll, sworn—Am acquainted with McCabe; know him when he lived in Oxford, about two miles east of Ingersoll; I know Dr. Bowers, who practices in Ingersoll; saw McCabe in Ingersoll within four or five weeks ago; can't fix the date; it was before I heard of Mrs. McCabe's death—perhaps two or three weeks before; I saw him go past my office in the direction of where Dr. Bowers lives; did not see him go into Dr. Bowers' place nor in Dr. Bowers' company.

To the Coroner—I have read the evidence of Mrs. McMillan since coming to the city; thought there was a striking familiarity in the symptoms described by Messrs. McMillan and those caused by strychnine poisoning.

To Mr. Morehead—Would not swear that McCabe's visit to Ingersoll was not six weeks ago; Dr. Bowers lives about 30 yards west of my office; the last I saw of McCabe, he was going towards Dr. Bowers'; he went into a grocery at the corner of King and Mill streets; saw him last three or four doors from Dr. Bowers; did not see him after that; think it was in the afternoon, but can't say what day.

John Byran, sworn—Live in Ingersoll and am acquainted with McCabe; saw him there about two months ago, and some five or six weeks before I heard of Mrs. McCabe's death; saw him standing by Brady's Hotel on Thames street; I said "Hello, Mack, what are you doing here?" he used some rough language and said he had come down to see that Judas, Wells; he asked me to go in and have a drink; he had a letter with him; when I last saw him he was on the same side of the street as Dr. Bowers' and about 100 yards distant; he was going in that direction; do not know where Mr. Wells lives.

A DRINKING SCENE.

Stephen Gareide and Wm. Tait gave evidence as to having been in McCabe's Hotel, buying whiskey and beer, which they drank in a shed between S and 10 o'clock the night prior to the morning on which Mrs. McCabe died. A youth named James Howard was with them. Mrs. McCabe prevented them from borrowing a bottle. She was angry and appeared to have been drinking. Tait, who knew her well, said he never saw her so drunk that she could not attend to business.

STORY OF THE SPITTOON.

Detective Schram (recalled)—Had a conversation with McCabe in his cell in jail on the 6th; the turnkey (Colville) was present and some prisoners; I wanted McCabe to sign an order for payment of her funeral expenses ($7.10); the order was from Jarvis; McCabe said "Will you ask Jarvis if he has washed out those spittoons in the sitting room? he said his wife had vomited into one of the spittoons the night she was taken ill and had wiped her mouth with a shawl; I asked him what time in the evening she was taken sick and he said he could not tell, but thought it was a little before 10 o'clock; I then said, "Well, sign this order now. I don't want to hear any more about that;" after he signed the order I said that I would tell Jarvis about the spittoons; I got the money from Mrs. Kelly; I gave orders to Jarvis to take charge of the spittoons; he said they had not been washed, and were just as they were left.

THE BOTTLE BEHIND THE CLOCK.

Wm. Jarvis, sworn—I have charge of the Dowdrop Inn; Mr. McCabe asked me to take charge the day of the funeral; first became acquainted with Mrs. McCabe the night Mr. Baldie died; she appeared to be a healthy woman; have seen her twice under the influence of liquor; was in the habit of seeing her three or four times a week in passing; have been at the house probably once a week; was not at the house the night of her death; did not hear of it till next day about noon; did not see McCabe till the day of the funeral; I saw her body; as one of the jury I viewed it; had no conversation with McCabe about the death or the cause; when I took charge of the hotel on Sunday evening I found Peter Gordon, the hostler, present; made an examination of the premises with Mr. Schram, who took away some Paris green and some medicine bottles, one of which contained some fluid, afterwards another bottle was found behind the clock in the barroom; it was three parts full of a clear liquid; I gave it to McLeod, who took it away (it was given to detective Schram); the large spittoon at the head of the lounge appeared as if some one had vomited in it; it was half-full; there is some fluid in another spittoon; both spittoons are in the same condition; Schram gave me orders to keep them as they were and I have done so.

To Mr. Morehead—McCabe called me in about 1:30 the day before she died; I asked him how she was as I passed; he said, "Oh, go in and see her"; I went in and asked to borrow a ladder; she was in liquor, staggering; I joked with her about going with Mack to Manitoba; she treated McCabe, the hostler and myself; she was pretty drunk; can't remember that he ever asked me to go in and quiet her; never heard her say anything about a will, nor threaten to commit suicide; never knew her to be despondent; she was always cheerful; the day in question was one of the two occasions on which I saw her drunk; she was able to prepare the dinner.

To Mr. Hutchinson—She talked intelligently enough; the liquor had evidently not gone to her head; they often joked about going to Manitoba.

The Coroner stated that he had not yet received the result of the analysis, but believed it would be on hand to-morrow (Tuesday) night, and he adjourned the inquest accordingly.

NARCOTICO-ACRID POISONING.

Dr. Waugh was sworn and read his statement, showing the result of the post-mortem examination which he made. It contained in detail a discription of the condition of the body and all the organs.

To Mr. Morehead—The bright red color covered only a small proportion of the stomach: it would not be caused by drinking.

To Mr. Hutchinson—One grain of strychnine would cause death; one-tenth of a grain has caused death in a child; it would be difficult to find the quantity, as it might be diffused through the system.

To the Coroner—The length of time between the taking of the poison and death would depend on whether the poison was solid or fluid and whether the stomach contained food or not.

DEATH ATTRIBUTED TO STRYCHNINE.

Dr. Wishart, sworn—Assisted Dr. Waugh in making the post-mortem examination: my written report (put in) corresponds with that of Dr. Waugh in all particulars; I agree with her statement and opinions expressed; after hearing former witnesses, I conclude that death was caused by strychnine; before that, I believed death resulted from the class known as narcotico-acrid poisons, one of which is strychnine.

To Mr. Morehead—One of her kidneys was slightly diseased.

To the Coroner—According to my reading, half a grain of strychnine has caused death in an adult; if given in solution, it will act more quickly than if solid; it dissolves more readily in spirits than in water.

To Mr. Morehead—I agree with Dr. Waugh regarding the effect of liquor; dont believe that intoxicating drink had anything to do with her death; a person may take a large quantity of drink and not effect the organs.

OTHER STRIKING SYMPTOMS.

Dr. Brown sworn—I was present and observed all that was done at the post-mortem; left my written report home; it is very similar to that of Dr. Waugh and Wishart; all the organs were perfectly healthy except the stomach, brain, spinal cord and Goth kidneys; the latter were only slightly affected; all the blood was perfectly fluid; when the skull cap was removed a large quantity of blood flowed from the brain and the spinal cord; the fluidity of the blood is always found in cases of poisoning by strychnine; what also struck me particularly was the great cogestion of the membrane covering brain and spinial cord, produced by spasms of the muscle, such as described in this case; strychnine would produce such spasms; a very small portion of the stomach was congested; the examination was most complete and careful; I watched the examination on behalf of the prisoner; there was not the slightest trace of injury to the organs from intoxicating liquor; examined the liver particularly and found it as healthy a one as I ever saw; she appeared to be a woman in perfect health; the slight adhesion found in the kidney was probably due to age; I came to the conclusion that the cause of death was a violent one and that it did not proceed from natural causes; thought the unnatural cause was strychnine.

To Mr. Moorehead—It is remarkable that the organs of women are less affected by liquor than those of men; it is remarkably rare to hear of a woman having delirium tremens; the appearance of the stomach was caused by the poison, not by drink; deceased could not have been a confirmed drunkard; people who eat well are not so liable to injury from drink; I know a man in this city who is saved in that very way.

THE ANALYSIS DISCLOSES STRYCHNINE.

The Coroner then read the following letter from Dr. Ellis, public analyst, Toronto :

Sir,—I have examined the stomach of the late Anna McCabe, brought me by Mr. Schram, and found it to contain about one fifth part of a grain of Strychnine.

The Coroner also read a note from Dr. Ellis, in which he stated that other parts of the stomach remained to be examined, but enough has been done for the purposes of the inquest; the balance of the analysis could be completed for the trial in case the prisoner was committed.

The Crown Attorney stated that he had telegraphed to Toronto to have the analysis completed at once.

In addressing the jury, the Coroner stated that the evidence disclosed beyond a doubt the cause of death. There had been nothing adduced showing any tendency on the part of deceased to suicide, and therefore the question for them to consider was, who had given her the poison.

THE VERDICT—WILFUL MURDER.

In about a quarter of an hour the following verdict was returned :

"The jury in this case, after having carefully weighed the evidence, are unanimously of the opinion that the deceased, Ann McCabe, came to her death by the administration of strychnine, the same having been administered by her husband, George McCabe, and therefore find the said George McCabe did on the 25th day of April, 1884, at the township of Westminster, county of Middlesex, feloniously, wilfully and of his malice aforethought kill and murder the said Ann McCabe."

Prisoner was then committed for trial and the case is to be brought before the grand jury at the present assizes.

Washington Letter.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

Washington, May 5, 1884.

The House has been talking tariff all this week, with the rusult that new recruits have been enrolled under the Morrison banner. Among the converts were Mr. Hill, of Ohio, Mr. Geo. D. Wise, of Virginia, and Mr. John S. Barbour, of Virginia, all of whom voted against the consideration of the bill. Compromise talk has of course been very rife in the lobbies, though it was less fruitful of success than the debate in the chamber of the House. The passage of the bill by the House seems very probable, though Mr. Randall says that he has forty seven democrats who will 'stand staunch and true against the 'Morrison iniquity,' and that they will strike out the enacting clause. It is generally understood that Mr. McKinley will make the motion to strike out the enacting clause to-morrow, but the feeling prevails at the Capitol that this move will certainly fail, and that the only hope of the opponents of the will is to amend it unmercifully. The reformers are working quietly and appear to be gaining ground. Some of Mr. Randall's friends say that the bill will doubtless pass if the five republicans who voted for its consideration support the bill. The outside influence brought to bear on many of the republicans is strong, and it said that national banks are working on the republicans to get them to pass the Morrison bill.

The probability of the Morrison bill passing the House invests it with some interest in the Senate. Its chances in the latter body are occasionally discussed among Senators. The prevailing impression seems to be that neither the Morrison bill, nor any other interfering with the tariff, could go through the Senate at the present session, but there are Senators who contend that such a measure would pass. Senator Van Wyck believes that if the House sends over a tariff reduction bill it will receive the approval of the Senate.

Mr. Eaton, who once attempted rather unsuccessfully to distinguish himself by 'jumping on to Blaine,' in the Senate, did some big jumping on his party during the tariff debate, for the amusement of the over-bored galleries, and to the intense satisfaction of the opponents of the bill. Assuming that his forty years of democracy justified him, as he said, in 'some plain talking,' he proceeded to haul the tariff reformers over the coals and to read them a lecture in a strain of caustic rebuke. Mr. Eaton or 'Oldbill-eaton,' as his friends delight to call him, is a hard-hitter, and when his blood is up doesn't care much whom he hits. Of all things he prides himself on his democracy which is of the most orthodox, Jacksonian Jeffersonian sort; and to be called a 'barnacle,' as he was recently, and to have a hint dropped that funerals in certain eastern states were essential to democratic success was rather more than the old gentleman could stand. So he hit back yesterday, and he gave some blows that brought blood. The Morrison bill he stigmatized as not 'a step in the right direction,' but 'a crab step,' and 'the staggering of a political inebriate.' It merely 'cut the tail off a misbegotten republican bantling that its parents were ashamed of,' and might have been drawn by any car driver who knew enough to use his car-hook. I'll have none of it,' he exclaimed 'and the country won't.'

The statute of Chief Justice Marshall has been set at the west front of the Capitol, and will be unveiled next Saturday with appropriate ceremonies. The statute is of classic size, and represents the Chief Justice in a sitting posture, enveloped in his robes of office, his hand outstretched, as if he was delivering an opinion. The front of the base bears the inscription John Marshall, Chief Justice of the United States. Erected by the members of the bar and Congress.' Two sides are adorned with classic figures in Trucian drapery is bas-relief. On one side is Minerva dictating the Constitution to Young America; on the other, Victory is leading Young America to Swear Fidelity to the Union. On the fourth side is simply a wreath. The programme on Saturday will be impressive. It begins with music by the Marine Band, followed with the opening address and unveiling by Chief Justice Waite, oration by Hon. William Henry Rawle, of Philadelphia, and the benediction, with appropriate music between the several ceremonies.

The work of laying stone on the Washington Monument progresses rapidly. A two-foot course will be laid each day during favourable weather. Stone is prepared to raise the structure to a height of 470 feet. The monument will be dedicated on the 22 of next February when there will be a grand procession, and oration by Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, and a salute of 100 guns.—LENOX.

DYNAMITERS IN CANADA.

Something More Serious Than a Mere Scare.

A Scheme to Kill the Governor-General.

Evidence of an Organized Plan to Blow Up the Parliament Buildings.

Toronto, May 13th.—Information has been obtained from a reliable source that something more was intended than a mere scare in dynamite cartridges being placed under the Parliament buildings. Ever since the threatened attempt to blow up Rideau Hall, Ottawa, the Dominion and Provincial authorities have had fuller information of the actions of supposed dynamiters than the public are aware of, several discoveries of dynamite having been recently made in different parts of Canada which have been kept secret.

The operations of dynamiters in Canada have, it is alleged, been carried on under instructions from

HEADQUARTERS IN NEW YORK.

In January last a vote of $2,500 was made from the "Emergency Fund" to carry on the work in Canada. Three men, Nesbitt, O'Hare and Mullane, undertook to expend this sum in the destruction of public buildings in this country.

O'Hare and Mullane spent a good deal of their time in Toronto, and were believed to be

HERE LAST WEEK.

At all events they were here when the dynamite was discovered in the Parliament Buildings, as they were seen next day at the Humber. There is no doubt they with the intention of blowing them up, but why they did it so carelessly is open to conjecture. Other circumstances in corroboration of the above can be cited.

Two dynamiters took a couple of airguns to Ottawa about the beginning of April last year to KILL THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL,

and a man named O'Brien who was working on the Ottawa & Occidental Railway under the name of O'Neil, was to use a dynamite dart. O'Brien applied for a situation at Rideau Hall, but in the meantime the plot was discovered. O'Brien escaped but his baggage was seized at his boarding-house. This was the cause of the special guards being placed around Redeau Hall at that time. Dynamitists also intended to when she was in Toronto last September, but got no opportunity. She was warned, and when she visited Montreal shortly afterwards she wore a thick veil. There is no devilish act that members of this brotherhood would not do. It is opposed not only to the English Government but to all European Government. Its members are to be found in every European country, and branches exist, in Toronto, Ottawa, and Montreal.

INGERSOLL gives cash prizes at the celebration on the 26th. Woodstock's offers of brass jewellery, pipes, hats, etc., will send the crowd to Ingersoll.

THOSE desirous of purchasing a good residence and nicely situated lot in this town cannot do better than look at the Oxford-st. B. C. Church property, which is now advertised for sale.

BOARD OF HEALTH.—A Board of Health for this town was appointed at the last meeting of the Council. See Council report for their names. Now that the appointment has been made we hope to see good results.

BASE BALL.—A game of base ball was played in Victoria Park on Saturday afternoon between the High School club and the Pickwicks of this town, and resulted in a victory for the former. Mr. O. E. Robinson, acted as umpire.

TEMPERANCE LECTURE.—The W. C. T. U. of this town have succeeded in securing the services for one evening, of Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, of Boston, a woman of the highest culture and scholarly attainments. She comes highly recommended.

EXCURSION.—The Ancient Order of Foresters of London have made arrangements for an excursion to Brantford from London and intermediate points on Saturday, May 24th. Train leaves Ingersoll at 8.45 a.m., returning will leave Brantford at 9 p.m. Fare $1.

THE TOWN HALL.—The kalsomining and frescoing of the Town Hall, is about completed, and will result in a great improvement in the inside appearance of that structure. Mr. Redman is the artist, and the work is certainly a credit to his taste and ability.

GREATEST TREAT OF THE SEASON.—Miss Churchill, the Famous Boston Reader, will give a series of reading, May 20th. Miss Churchill comes recommended by the Poet Longfellow and a host of others. Keep yourselves disengaged. Particulars next week.

CROPS IN KANSAS.—I. M. Elliott, of Springhill, Johnson County, Kansas, in renewing his subscription for another year, says:—"The spring here has been very wet. Corn not all planted yet; wheat and grass looks excellent; fruit will be immense, all kinds, except peaches."

KNOX CHURCH.—The Rev. Mr. Hallam, has consented to preach again in Knox Church, next Sabbath (May 18th) morning and evening. We feel sure that all who heard him last Sabbath, will avail themselves of this opportunity to hear him again and will bring their friends with them.

HIGH SCHOOL ENTERTAINMENT.—The pupils of the Ingersoll High School will give an entertainment in the Town Hall to-morrow (Friday) evening. Proceeds to establish a library in connection with the High School here. Admission 25 cents. The entertainment will consist of a debate, music, recitations, tableaux, etc.

ACCIDENT.—One day last week while repairing a tank at the Noxon Co's works, Louis Fisher, who was working on a scaffold some twenty feet from the floor, felt the scaffolding giving way beneath him and jumped to save himself, alighting on a scantling breaking the small bones above the ankle of the left foot, making a very painful wound.

FAREWELL TEA.—In a few weeks the Oxford Street B. C. Church will be closed, and before so doing the members are arranging to hold a farewell tea which will take place on Monday evening, 26th May. A fine spread will be made in the church and served from six o'clock until a late hour. A good programme of addresses and music will be submitted, and a good time spent generally. Tickets are placed at 25 cents. Keep in mind the date, 26th May.

INTERMEDIATE EXAMINATIONS.—The only material change in the curriculum for the present year is the introduction of reading and writing. To encourage the study of music a paper will be given on the subject and the marks taken added to the aggregate. Those holding third-class certificates and trying for a renewal will be awarded by the Inspector, marks (not to exceed 100) for efficiency in teaching to be added as a bonus to their total marks taken at the non-professional examination. Candidates will have to pay a fee of $1 and $2, if they desire to try second and third class examination. Blank forms of applications may be had from the Inspector, which must be filled up and sent in by the 17th of June.

BAPTIST CHURCH ENTERTAINMENT. — As usual with the Baptist congregation, their entertainment on Tuesday evening was a complete success. The pieces rendered by their own choir were ably executed. The solo by Miss Clouse was very finely rendered. The readings of Mr. T. Meshennick and Miss H. Dyke were exceedingly good and warmly applauded. Mr. Gibson made some very appropriate remarks anent the article in Saturday's Globe, "Causes of Insanity." Rev. Mr. Trotter, who has always been a favorite with the Ingersoll people, spoke very liberally and intelligently on the vagaries of the Salvation Army. The chairman, Rev. Mr. Speller, was as usual very happy in his introductions of those who took part in the programme.

RESOLUTION OF APPRECIATION. — The fourth quarterly meeting of the B. C. Church of this town held its sessions a few days ago. There was a deficiency on the year's account which the stewards promptly provided for. Twelve persons had been received into society during the year, while the present membership is 71. Fearing the changes of the future through Methodist union, yet hoping withal, the Board unanimously passed the following resolution as a token of esteem and good will: Moved by Bro. Wills, seconded by Bro. Rose, and resolved, "That this Quarterly Board take this opportunity of placing on record an expression of approction of the services of our pastor, the Rev. R. B. Rowe, during the past year. His labors among us have been with untiring zeal and energy. His faithful devotion to his duty and calling being the more marked owing to various uncontrollable circumstances arising of a discouraging and disheartening nature. Despite these drawbacks apparent to all, we feel strongly in this expression of our admiration of his fidelity and ability. We respectfully urge that the coming stationing bodies will so arrange that he remain with us again for the coming year, if the new order of things will so permit. We further request that our representative will use his utmost endeavour to secure the desire of this request."

PRESBYTERY OF PARIS.—The Presbytery of Paris met in Knox Church here, on Tuesday last, when a report was read by Rev. W. T. McMullen, convenor of the committee appointed to meet with the minority in Knox Church which had declined to go into the United Church. The report was to the effect that the minority still refused to go into the united Church, asked the Presbytery to organize them as a separate congregation, and entitled to the property and furnishings of Knox Church building the same as if the late union had not taken place, and that the Presbytery procure for them a supply of Gospel ordinances. Messrs. Hewitt and Birss were heard as representing the minority at present worshiping in Knox Church, and Messrs. Gordon and Merchant on behalf of the congregation now worshiping in the building formerly known as Erskine Church. After a long discussion the following was adopted:—That the Presbytery agree to grant the minority petition for organization under the name and title of "Knox Church, Ingersoll," under condition that the said church shall assume the entire amount of the debt on Knox Church before the union, and that a commission be appointed to discern in reference to the debt and any other matters.

CALLING cards and wedding invitation with envelopes to match at the CHRONICLE office.

THE owner of a horse was fined four dollars in Clinton because the animal had been permitted to nip the bark off a shade tree.

AT the next meeting of the Ontario Legislature it is said the Minister of Education will so modify the regulations that the election for municipal councils and school trustees will be held on the same day.

G. W. R. CHANGE OF TIME.—A new time table will come into operation on the Great Western Division G.T.R. on Monday morning, May 19th. Besides a few minor changes in time, three important ones have been ordered.

STRUCK BY LIGHTNING.—The wires leading into the telephone office at Woodstock were struck by lightning during the storm Friday morning, and the building was considerably burned before the fire was extinguished.

So unprecedentedly mean, drizzly, damp and altogether unlively a spell of May weather as the one we have had with us for some days would make the fortune of any weather crank, did he but happen to prophesy it.

PROUD DAN SCOTT.—The following birth is from the Glasgow (Scotland) Evening Times:—

SCOTT.—At 7 Burnside-street, on Sunday morning, the wife of Dan Scott was safely delivered of triplets, two boys and one girl—all doing well—this making seven of a family in 4 years and 7 months, having given birth twice to twins. August 23, 1879, twins; October 21, 1883, twins; March 29 1884, triplets. Other papers please copy.

GOOD MOVE.—The fruit store keepers of Toronto have been instrumental in getting the Aldermen to place a license fee on every vehicle used for the peddling of fruits. Some of the Aldermen were in favor of taxing the peddlars also. The argument used by the store keepers is that while they have to pay high rents and heavy taxes, the peddlars escape almost scot free, and are thus enabled to undersell them.

THE COMING CAMP.—It is said the military will go into camp at Carling's farm, London, on the 17th of June. The 17th is earlier than the camp has been formed heretofore, but it is done with the view of having only one Sunday in camp and to make it more convenient for farmers. By a new order which has been issued no company will receive pay unless it has the full complement of 32 men and at least two officers.

ARBOR DAY.—Thursday last was Tilsonburg's first Arbor Day, and was a grand success, judging from the manner in which other towns have kept the day, at any rate. Considerably over three hundred maple and walnut trees were planted. The Council took the best means for having the tree planting part carried out. They employed men for two days before to select trees for the citizens to plant, and in this way the people were saved the trouble of going to the woods. Rows and double rows of neatly planted trees can be seen on almost every street.—Liberal.

THE WEATHER.—The weather is raw and cold just now, but according to a usually well informed meteorologist, after the 15th inst. we may look for an unusual rapid rise of temperature, culminating, before May 27-29, 1880, when the mercury went up among the nineties in Ontario, 96 at Philadelphia and Washington and even to 100 degrees in North Carolina. The termal conditions now prevailing over the country generally are highly favorable to all growing crops, if the fall of rain is followed by anything like a reasonable degree of heat.

ATTRACTIVE GIRLS.—Any girl, by baths and wholesome food, and by breathing pure air, can render her complexion clear and soft. With care her hair, teeth and nails can be daintily kept. Her clothes, however cheap, can be fresh and becoming in color. She can train her mind, even if of ordinary capacity, to be alert and earnest. And if she adds to these a sincere, kindly, sunny temper she will win friends and love as surely as if all the fairies had brought her gifts at her birth. It is of no use for a girl whose person is soiled and untidy, and whose temper is selfish and irritable at home, to hope to cheat anybody by putting on fine clothes and a smile for company. The thick muddy skin and sour expression will betray her.—Exchange.

HOW TO KEEP COOL.—A writer in Harper's Weekly thus lays down a plan of ventilation which he claims will materially alleviate the distress caused by summer heat. The plan is so simple that many are in a position to profit by its application if it possesses any efficacy, and we have no reason to doubt that it does. The night air is generally from five to twenty degrees cooler than that of the day. His plan is to store up this cooler air of the night for utilization during the day, in cases where space will permit of it. The plan is simply this: Open the windows during the night, and cool down those apartments not being used to the temperature of night air. At sunrise close all the southern windows and protect them with shades. "Leave windows on the opposite side sufficiently open from above for ventilation, and keep the doors shut. In this way you shut in the cool night air and if you shut in enough of it you can keep your house cool all day. Ordinarily the temperature can be reduced 15° by following out this plan.

THE HON. JOHN B. FINCH'S LECTURE.—The final lecture of the "Star Lecture Course," under the able management of Dr. Yeomans, of St. Catharines, and arranged for by the ladies of W. C. T. U. of this town, was delivered Wednesday evening of last week, in the C. M. Church, by the Hon. John B. Finch, Nebraska, U.S. The expectations raised by the highly commendatory notices which had preceeded Mr. Finch were more than gratified by the eloquent and convincing lecture by which his intelligent and appreciated audience were most pleasing and pitifully entertained. Those who were, through the inclemency of the weather or from other causes, hindred from attending, missed not only a rich treat but a life long benefit. The lecturer is not only a gastleman and a scholar, but a profound reasoner, and his keen and telling logic was most effectively brought to bear upon the absurdity and enormous wickedness of the system of licensing the sale of alcoholic poisons. It may safely be said that it will be a long time before the people of Ingersoll and the surrounding country, will be favored with another such opportunity as they had last night, an opportunity which was enjoyed to the full by those who were so happy as not to miss it.—COM.

THE B. C. CHURCH.—The sixth and last of a series of lectures on Bible history was given by the pastor, Rev. Mr. Rowe, in the above church, Oxford street, last Sabbath evening. Considering the fact that the evening congregations have been broken by by the pastor supplying other pulpits, a good congregation assembled to hear the last of the series. About 50 diagrams of colored linen have been used descriptive of the whole country from the city of the Pharoahs to Mount Zion, and also of the tabernacle of the Jews with the golden vessels of the Sanctuary. These lectures have proved very interesting and particularly instructive, showing that much labor and time must have been devoted to their preparation. We are sorry to find and to state that the country part of the work having been cut off, and the negotiations for the transfer of the property to the M. E. Church having fallen through, that it now is concluded by necessity to close the church at the expiration of the present month. Some of the friends have offered to more than double their subscriptions if it could be kept open, but the total amount would not be sufficient to keep an independent church in connection with the Methodist body. The property is now for sale. The church and congregation have worked together, with one exception, most harmoniously and have done their best to secure the services of the Rev. Mr. Rowe again next year, as far as their power can do, as seen by a resolution in another column. The short time Mr. Rowe has been in town he has made many friends and we wish him success in the future, wherever that future may be.

QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY IN WOODSTOCK.—The town of Woodstock has this year set a good example to all lovers of legitimate amateur athletic games. All the clubs in the town have been formed into one central organization, called "The Woodstock Amateur Athletic Association," which—without destroying the separate existence of the several clubs—will control all the sports of the town. This new association begins its career with splendid prospects. All the citizens seem to be taking it up as a town affair, and the membership will be fully 500. The executive officers of the Association are Capt. F. W. Macqueen, of the 22nd Oxford Rifles, Andrew Pattullo, of the Sentinel Review, E. W. Nesbitt, and Geo. Middleton, who are working energetically to secure success. They have leased new grounds for games, on which they have expended between four and five hundred dollars. An asphalte bicycle track—quarter mile long, twelve feet wide, and twenty at the start—has been laid down, and the grounds levelled and thoroughly prepared for all kinds of games. These grounds will be formally opened by a grand athletic tournament on the Queen's Birthday, to be celebrated Monday, May 26th, when—we are informed, about $500 worth of gold and silver medals, cups and other handsome prizes will be awarded. The programme is a very elaborate and attractive one, consisting of baseball and lacrosse matches, tug-of war, foot races, bicycle races, etc., etc., to conclude with a grand concert in the evening, at which Miss Nora Clench, the celebrated violinist, and Miss Reidy, the popular vocalist, will appear. Excursion rates will be given on the railways. We have no doubt that the 26th will be one of the "biggest days" ever seen in the county town of Oxford. Ade.

The Bible and Its Value.

PAPER VI.

In our last paper it was shown that solid happiness cannot be found by resting on earthly things. Let us enquire a moment. Why is this? We answer because everything is governed by its own respective law. An intellectual problem could not be solved by physical appliance. A spiritual problem cannot be solved by physical law. But each and every problem in the vast universe may be solved by its own respective law. Take the petal of a rose, or a leaf of the tree, apply to it the microscope, it would make the leaf appear as broad acres, with its insects like small cattle finding shelter under its downy branches. Now apply the same instrument to that faith spoken of in the scripture as compared to a grain of mustard seed. Will that instrument enlarge the faith? Or apply the telescope towards the stars. With axis and lenses fixed properly you can tell the size, color and velocity of the distant worlds, by drawing them nearer by scientific appliances. But apply the same instrument towards the cross of calvary, will that bring nearer to view the Saviour as "mighty to save?" Of course not. They do not simply because they cannot. In like manner, every immortal spirit longs for happiness and satisfaction, and one might as well expect to fill an empty stomach with an intellectual treat, or vice versa as expect to satisfy the cravings of our spiritual nature by any earthly thing, only the Christ of the Bible is the "bread of life." He alone can satisfy. No wonder then that men of fashion and pleasure find, despite all effort, only an aching void the world can never fill. The astronomer by the telescope looks into the great book of scientific truth, and so the believer by the eye of faith looks into the Bible as a mine of truths, so noble and so pure, that every point of discovery is a gem of infinite worth. It is an infinite storehouse, an inexhaustible treasury, of all things needful to our mental and spiritual nature, for time and for eternity. The only true factor which can make us wise unto salvation, making us happy and useful to the end, and beyond this life for evermore.

ONE OBJECTION

raised against the Bible in its claim to pre-eminence above all other books is this: "It has no higher origin than Jewish intellect, and it can only rank as a book of Jewish history in common with all other histories, by different people, of their several and respective nations." Of course it can be seen at a glance that such a conclusion at once robs the Bible of its primary value and of its rightful claim. Our satisfaction on this point is this: though the Bible came through the Jews, it is not of the Jews. There is a clear distinction and difference between being the origin of a thing and the medium. The Jews were but a circumstantial medium in the hand of God, as any other might have been, were they like ourselves unmastered, unacquainted with the plans and purposes of God. Hence while it may easily be granted that the mechanical part of the Bible began with the Jews, the spirit and origin of it came from God. Take an illustration. A little while since we had occasion to visit a salt spring in the West. As the water was pumped up it looked as clear as crystal, and it was a wonder why so much salt could be contained therein. In our curiosity we tasted a little of the flowing stream, and we needed no further argument to prove to our entire satisfaction that the source, the origin, as the cause of its saltness was "pretty well salted down." Now it is so in reference to books and their contents, as seasoned by the proclivities of their authors. We have read the history of Oliver Cromwell, as seen from the royalist stand point, and we have found "The Lord High Protector" pictured in strong colors as a monster of vain ambition and as a hypocrite of the basest sort. We have also read his life from the whig stand point, and have found him pictured as a saint of the most high in the strongest terms, and with some of the finest periods of eloquence possible. Both pictures could not be correct. Each strongly savored of the proclivity of its source. And it might be said just here that a man will not drink at the stream of English history very long, as transmitted to posterity by Macaulay, before tasting the salt of Episcopalianism, and his utter lack of sympathy with all the principles of nonconformity. Referring to the struggles of the Puritans, Macaulay says, "At this time Puritans turned Atheists and Atheists turned Puritans," etc. Pretty strong! A little seasoning is good in most preparations, but that slice of history served out to the world was, to say the least of it, pretty strongly salted. What then is the inferential proof in connection with these things? Just this. If the Bible had no higher origin than Jewish intellect, or the capabilities of the Jewish nation, it would rise to its level and stop there. No stream, according to the science of hydraulics, can rise above the level of its source. Therefore had the Bible found its source only in Jewish capacity, it could not possibly have risen above their highest point of education intellectually, nor above their highest point of morals spiritually. Put that down! But as it is, the Bible is imbued with the dignity and divinity of its author, so much so, that it rises immeasurably above the intellectual possibility of the most learned Jew, and the most devoted Rabbi. Our conclusion for this paper is as follows: It is a physical law, though it might imply a physical impossibility that should any material planet wander from its orbit it could never find a resting place through all the voids of space, but by coming back again to the orbit from which it wandered, and in which God placed it. In like manner, the restless mind of immortal man can find no rest, but by moving in the orbit of obedience to God's law, man's first estate; and amid all worldly philosophies, true wisdom is from above—from the mind of that God who is infinitely wise, high over all and blessed for evermore.

QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY IN INGERSOLL.

A GRAND CELEBRATION

Tug of War—Lacrosse Match—Scottish Games—Highland Dancing—Athletic Sports—Music by 22nd Battalion Band and the Pipers—Scottish Concert in the Evening

Arrangements have been made for a colossal celebration in Ingersoll, the 26th May. The principle feature will be an athletic contest conducted on such a scale hitherto unapproached in this vicinity. Energetic men have taken the arrangements for the demonstration in hand, and from the success which has attended the Caledonian Society in the past, we may confidently promise that the coming one will be no exception, but if possible the best yet.

Visitors from the country who may wish to celebrate the Queen's Birth-day in a pleasant way can rely on seeing a good day's sport in Ingersoll on Monday, the 26th, the day set apart as the holiday.

Following is a summary of the events of the day:—Nissouri vs. Dorchester, great trial of strength in a Tug of War, between picked men, for a purse of $40. Lacrosse match at 10.30 between a team from London, and the Dufferins of Ingersoll. Music by the 22nd Batt. Band and Caledonian Pipers. Highlanders, Pipers, Dancers and Atheletes from all parts of the Dominion. Some of the greatest dancers in the United States and Canada will be present, and give exhibitions of Highland Dancing.

In the evening a Scotch Concert will be held in the Town Hall, at which the following well-known and celebrated vocalists will take part, all of whom have been secured at great expense: Mrs. Jessie Robertson, of New York, Queen of Scottish, English and Irish songs; Miss Ryckman, Hamilton's charming soprano; Mr. James Johnston, of Hamilton, a favorite in Ingersoll; Mr. F. W. Wodell, the great Baritone singer of Hamilton; Masters McCrimmon, of Lucknow; the Misses Cruickshanks, of London, and others, will delight the audience with their Highland songs and dances.

Admission to Park 10 cents. Carriage 25 cents. Admission to Hall 50 cents. Reserved seats 75 cents. Reserved seats tickets can be had at Richardson's Jewelery Store from Wednesday, 21st May, until noon of the day of the games.

A STARTLING DISCOVERY.

The Skeleton of a Human Being Unearthed. Was it a Murder?

On Tuesday afternoon while Samuel Wright, who is working the Angus McKay farm on shares, was ploughing the field just south of the latter's residence, in Ingersoll, the plough came in contact with a harsh substance which on examination proved to be a human skull. Upon a search being instituted the remainder of the skeleton was discovered. The skull is perfect, even to the teeth, one of the front ones being filled with gold, the remainder of the frame is in small portions. The bones were found just beneath the surface and must have lain there for thirty years or more. The field in which the discovery was made has never before been ploughed, having been used since it was cleared as a pasture.

In connection with this remarkable find it may be mentioned that some thirty-six years ago a cyclone swept over this part of the country, directly through this field, then a forest, uprooting trees, overturning fences and doing other damage. It is supposed by some that the remains may be those of some one who was killed and covered over at that time. It is hardly probable that if it was a case of murder the body would have been buried so near the surface, although in the hurry this might have been done.

Literary Notes.

FRANK LESLIE'S SUNDAY MAGAZINE.—The brilliant June number closes the fifteenth volume, and the claim of this periodical to public appreciation must, we think, be universally recognized. It is admirably conducted by its talented and popular editor, T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., who has in this number two most interesting articles, "The Resurrection" and "Hard on Others," and a sermon "The Sword Sheathed in Flowers." There are articles (most of them beautifully illustrated) by Rev. Geo. T. Rider, Alvan S. Southworth, G. A. Davis, Alfreton Hervey, J. Alex. Haldane, etc., etc. The serial and short stories, sketches, etc., afford pleasant and edifying reading.

A unique contribution to the history of the war in Egypt in 1882 will appear in the June Century. It is the diary of a young daughter of Gen. Stone, Chief of the Khedive's staff (who himself contributes an introductory note, in which he sharply criticises the British for the precipitancy of the bombardment of Alexondria). The family of Gen. Stone were in Cairo during the bombardment, and were in constant danger of massacre by the Arabs, from which the tact and courage of Mrs Stone alone delivered them, her husband being on duty at Alexandria.

On Monday afternoon our usually quiet village was aroused by cries of fire, and on investigation it was found that the barn belonging to Western Stevens, situated across the road from the mill, was in flames and had made such progress that it was impossible to save the building. Fortunately the wind was favourable to enable the surrounding buildings to be saved, thus preventing what might have been the destruction of the greater part of our village. Cause of fire was the children playing with matches.

East Nissouri.

On Monday last Mr. Thos. Alderson, of the 11th con., raised a fine new barn, which when completed will be the finest in that section. The Tracey Bro's did the framing, which reflects great credit on their skill as workmen in this line. Mr. E. Day, of Ingersoll, and Mr. A. Thornton, of London, were chosen as captains, and proceeded to choose sides, when about half the men had been chosen, Mr. Thornton said he would go no farther as Mr. Day had the best men. Mr. Cade and Mr. Weston were then chosen. Mr. Cade's side being victorious, having their side up some ten minutes before Mr. Weston's. After the work was finished they repaired to the house and partook of an excellent supper, after which a tug-of-war and numerous other sports were indulged in. All went home highly pleased with the day's work and sport.

A prominent citizen of our village who determined no longer to endure the miseries of a bachelors paradise has, according to dame gossip, accomplished the desire of his heart by finding a partner to share the ups and downs of life.

FARM AND DAIRY.

Feeding and Fattening Systematically.

Systems of feeding must, of course, vary greatly with the locality; the variety of foods used will be governed by quality and price; those costing least money, if of equal value, will have the preference. One proposition should commend itself to everybody in all localities alike—never to allow an animal to get poor in Winter or Summer, and especially is this important if it is designed for fattening. It seems too plain to be doubted that just in proportion to the loss of flesh in Winter, will the animal be reduced in value; it must be brought back to a thriving condition equal to that before shrinking before any profit can be made.

How many farmers act upon this self-evident truth, even in the great grain-producing regions of the United States? Those who do are mostly those who make stock their primary industry. It should commend itself equally to those who make the selling of grain their principal means of profit; these of all farmers, should have a surplus of grain. There can be but one reason why so many of this class starve their stock in Winter—they do not reflect that a certain portion of food given goes to supply the daily animal waste, and they "cannot afford" to take journals devoted to their interests, from which they might learn.

The stock breeder and feeder is more a reader of papers devoted to his calling, and also a reader of books upon live stock. He is not afraid they will conflict with what his father knew "about farming." He rather hopes they will; what his father knew has been pretty well drilled into him, and he wants to know something more.

Forty years ago it was the almost universal practice to allow all, except fattening stock, to shift for themselves in Winter with a little hay and an occasional nubbin. There was more reason for it then than now, when cheap transportation carries feed (grain, mill stuff, bran etc.) a thousand miles at a slight advance upon its cost where grown. Thus the East has profited by the settlement of the West owing to the cheap freight. Many Eastern farmers have, indeed, been obliged to change or at least to modify their cultivated crops; but not to the lessening of their profits. When the value of the manure is considered, there is money in feeding in the East. There cattle and sheep bring more per pound than stock shipped from the West. The lower freightage on stock, and the manure have been held by intelligent feeders to compensate for the increased cost of feeding.

The general farmer cannot too soon learn from the best stock feeders, if he will not from first-class agricultural journals, lessons in the science—yes, science—of feeding. The feeder who never lets his stock fall off in condition always has something fat to sell. He buys cattle raised by the men who do not believe in books, or papers, or, at least who will not profit by their teachings. These cattle, thin in flesh, but with frames capable of being filled up with good meat, he buys at two or three cents less per pound than if they were fat. For instance, he buys a steer weighing 1,000 pound at the Chicago stock yard for four cents a pound, $40. He puts on 300 pounds of flesh, largely fat, and sells the same steer for six or seven cents per pound, or $78 to $91. He has not only increased the price by what he put on, but has enhanced the price of the original carcass by two or three cents per pound. Facts are none the less valuable because they happen to be written facts. On the other hand, there is great danger in the opposite extreme, stock taken from a fresh pasture or from the straw-yard cannot eat and digest so perfectly as to assimilate all the value of large rations of grain; they must be accustomed to the change gradually, and their stomachs must be kept extended by some coarse feed. The feeders who has learned his business understands this. The man who doesn't, and "who doesn't take much stock in book larnin' anyway," if he ever gets the idea that there is money in good feeding, generally rushes off in this extreme, stuffs his stock to repletion, causing indigestion, scours, or some other trouble. Oh, yes, he learns a lesson; and too often becomes fixed in the belief that there is no money in "fattening on grain." "Hain't he tried it." Yes! but if he had read more, he would have known better how to feed and would have made money.

Fancy Cheese Making.

The following is the pith of an essay on "Fancy Cheese Making," written by T. D. Curtis of Syracuse, N. Y.: "Pure, whole milk from healthy cows in sweet pastures, or fed duly balanced rations in stalls, is requisite. The more directly it goes to the vat the better. If kept over night reduce the milk to 65°. An agitation to keep the cream from rising is desirable. Mix night's and morning's milk when ready to work. If cream is to be incorporated, warm it and pass it through a wire strainer. Heat the milk slowly to 84° or 86°. Add your colouring matter and rennet enough to begin coagulation in ten or twenty minutes, as desired. Cut the curd as soon as it can be done without waste, as fine as beech nuts. Slowly raise the temperature, gently stirring it the while, to 98°. Hold it there to the end. Draw the whey as soon as there is the least sign of acid, or before. Get sufficient rennet action to expel the whey before the acid developes. This prevents the phosphate from washing out, and insures a digestible cheese when properly cured. If you cheddar and grind, or not, thoroughly stir and air the curd, to get rid of bad odors and develop flavor. Put to press not above 80°, and place in an even-tempered curing room at 65° to 70°. Avoid direct draughts of air and carefully turn and rub the cheese which will be prime.

No Cabbage for Milch Cows.

After reading Mr. Ferris's excellent prize essay on butter-making in the Rural of March 20, I must disagree with him on one point, as the result of some experiment of mine. He intimates that cabbage is good food for milch cows. As the odor of the food consumed by a milch cow sensibly affects her milk, I would entirely exclude cabbages and turnips from her bill-of-fare. Butter salted with half an ounce of salt to the pound of butter, and made from cream gathered before it has become sour, from the milk of cows fed on cabbages, would not meet with ready sale either in town or city markets, according to my experience. I would churn the cream when slightly sour, and use more salt.

Improvement of the Dairy.

J. N. Muncey, of the Iowa Agricultural College says:—The successful dairyman is a man of business habits. He is able by books and figures to show, at least approximately, the profits of keeping cows. He is enabled by milk and butter records to know the most profitable cows in his possession. His education taught that farming, like other occupations, needs a system of book-keeping. Keeping detailed records of any work is comparatively simple, but the habit of doing it is not acquired in a single day.

In the improvement of a herd of native or pure-bred dairy cattle, it is important:

1. That milk-records be kept. This is not expensive and unpractical as is frequently urged. A daily milk-record is unnecessary. If the daily yield of each cow is recorded once each week, you have figures sufficient to enable you to calculate very approximately the annual yield. Are not such facts worth more than the time required to obtain them? From such records you can accurately determine the best and poorest cows. This work is practical, because it enables you to sell according to the relative value of the cows.

2. That a butter and cheese record be kept. The value of this record depends largely on the dairyman's knowledge of cream-raising, churning and weighing. With the majority of farmers such a record could not be satisfactorily kept, because of the lack of appliances.

3. That in breeding, those animals be selected which have most prominently developed the points of good milkers. Did you ever see a cow having a large head, thick heavy neck, heavy shoulders, thick horns, coarse hair, and narrow hind-quarters that was a good milker?

There is science in selecting cows from which to breed. I dare say in your herd all the points of good milch cows are prominent, though not in the same cow. Your success in breeding depends largely on your good judgment in selecting those cows having the most good points.

4. That the foundation of a dairy begins with pure bred stock. A pure bred bull of some dairy breed should be selected. If you are the owner of a pure bred cow inclined to lay on flesh, it will not pay to purchase a pure bred bull of a dairy breed and begin cross-breeding. This system of improvement would be too expensive for any farmer to follow.

It may generally be regarded in breeding that the male animal transmits his qualities of skin, back, loins and hind quarters, and that the female transmits her qualities of the head, fore quarters and nervous system. This does not, however, always prove true, no more than the law that "like begets like." It is better, however, to breed with these general principles clearly understood, than to breed by any indefinite and narrow system made up of your own limited experience.

It is very important to select males and females that combine to the greatest extent that system of form so desirable in milch cows. The great mistake made by many dairymen is in the selection of inferior male animals. The same farmer that pays $15 to $25 for the service of a pure-bred Clydesdale or Norman stallion, refuses often to pay $5 for the service of a pure-bred and choice bull. He somehow sees the importance of raising good colts, but underestimates the importance of raising good calves.

On many questions concerning the care of a dairy herd, breeders disagree. This is not surprising, for the science of breeding has not yet reached perfection.

The practice of allowing the bull to run with the herd is still held by good breeders of pure-bred stock to be the most satisfactory and profitable. It is true as many cows cannot be served by a male in this way, but the certainty of getting cows with calf is worth considerable. On the contrary the Prejudice engendered by the system of separating the male from the herd has often been due to improper care of the male animal, resulting often from overfeeding. During summer a bull should have no extra allowance of food aside from good pasture.

The practice of breeding heifers so that their first calf would be dropped at about 20 to 22 months, is also a subject on which breeders disagree. It is evident that early breeding diminishes the size of the dam and produce, but the uncertainty of the fertility of older animals has forced some breeders to adopt early breeding, and increase as much as possible, the size of the dam by liberal feeding. When the science of breeding is not convincing, we must be guarded by the doctrine of probabilities.

Saving Seed.

There are many varieties of seed that with a little pains, the farmer would find he can save more economically than he can purchase, and having the advantage of knowing that his seed is genuine, fresh and reliable. Every farmer is aware, of course, that some seed is more difficult to clean and save than others, and that a number of plants do not mature their seed in one season, but that the plants must be wintered over and allowed to grow another season to properly mature. One advantage with this class of seeds is, you are better able to judge what plants are best to mature for seed. Lettuce, radishes, mustard, spinach, tomatoes, melons, squashes, and cucumbers all mature seeds the first year. A selection of the plant must be made before it is fully matured. I find it a good plan to select some of the earliest plants, considerable more than I expect to save the seed from, and either mark them by sticking down an ear stalk or transplanting to a place by themselves, and then before the seed matures destroy those that do not come up to what I expected.

One fault with many who save garden seed is, they are to willing to save the leavings; the bed of lettuce is picked over and used, and what is left is allowed to go to seed. Peas and beans are picked over, until those that are missed in picking get too ripe and are finally gathered for seed. No wonder in a short time the seed runs out and the crop fails to come up to your expectations. The best, and only the best, must be saved for seed, and these should be early as well as prolific.

With peas and beans, my plan is to save as many rows as I think will furnish me with what I need and then select the earliest and best of these; and the same with lettuce, radishes and spinach—select a number of plants and from the best of these select what I want for seed. These are nearly all easily cleaned and packed. I always wait until the larger per cent of the seed is ripe and then cut off the tops and let dry a day or two. I believe it to be the best policy to dry these in the shade, then lay the tops on a clean sheet and thresh out the seed; they can be very easily cleaned by holding up and letting run down upon a sheet; the winds will blow out the larger per cent of trash. If melons, squashes, etc., are wanted for seed, they should not be planted close together, as they will mix. If you do not intend saving seed from them, it does not so much matter. In raising cucumbers I always allow one or two vines to mature seed, while the rest are carefully picked clean. With tomatoes, the earliest, largest, and smoothest should be reserved for seed. Both of these plants should be allowed to lie a few days after picking before cleaning. Washing is the quickest way of cleaning pulpy seeds of all kinds.

In selecting plants, such as cabbage, salsify, parsnips, carrots, beets and turnips, the largest, smoothest and most solid should be saved and stored in a safe place where they will keep in the very best possible condition. They should be set out in the Spring, where they will yield up a stock that will mature seed. Only a few need be saved; three or four of either kind, if we except turnips, will furnish you with all you need for your own use.

Many of these seeds are sold at a high price. They can be raised with very little trouble, and the majority are easily cleaned. Be sure they are perfectly dry before storing away, for unless care is taken to have this well done there is considerable risk of loss, as they are easily damaged. They should also be stored where mice can not reach them, as these pests seem to have a special liking for garden seeds.

In making selections of varieties, you should have both early and late, so that you can keep up a succession as long as possible. In some cases one variety only is necessary, while with others three or four will be found profitable; of course these must be kept separate. If you mix them do it when you come to sow, so then you can tell better in what proportion you want them, Label them as fast as you store them away, and you will save much time and trouble in finding what you want next Spring.—N. J. Shepherd, Miller County, Mo., in Prairie Farmer.

Notes.

England has one head of cattle to every fifty-two acres, Ireland one to each four acres, and the island of Jersey twice as many cattle as acres.

A Vermont dairyman says a young calf should be fed three times a day. Overfeeding at long intervals, and especially with cold food, kills a good many valuable calves.

The milk of the Devon cow is considered by scientific men to be the best for family use, because the cream rises more slowly than on the Jersey or Guernsey milk, and it is richer than Durham.

In turning cows to pasture in the spring they are very sure to eat too much of the young grass and bring on the scours. This can be guarded against by putting the cows up at night and letting them stand to hay.

While milk is standing for cream to rise, the purity of the cream, and consequently the fine flavor and keeping of the butter, will be injured if the surface of the cream is exposed freely to air much warmer than the cream.

Probably the largest yield of milk from any known cow, is from the Holstein cow; Echo, which has given 20,389¼ pounds in 307 days, and her owner expects she will give 23,475 pounds for the full year. Last year she gave over 18,000 pounds.

The mule is a valuable farm animal, and there is a certain profit in rearing them. The mare to be used in breeding should be large, so as to give greater size to the progeny. A team of heavy mules will outlast two teams of horses, besides being less liable to accident and disease.

Wherever it is found by experiment that the commercial fertilizer helps the crop they should be used to the limit that they are found profitable. Only part of their benefit is given to the first crop and if this pays the expense, as it often will, the surplus is so much accumulated capital to be drawn upon in future years. With some kind of crops extra heavy manuring is the only means of securing paying crops.

An exchange ventures the following good advice: "Better to borrow money with which to purchase cows and young thrifty calves, than to go in debt for machinery that is not absolutely indispensible. The first will continue to appreciate in value, while the latter will continue to depreciate. The first will pay the principal and the interest. The latter will lose a part of the cost annually."

When a cow loses one of her teats it does not follow that her actual value is impaired, except as it may make milking more difficult. After the milk veins have become accustomed to the change, all the milk secreted will go to three teats as well as to four. Losing a teat is an indication that a cow is or has been a great milker, and may, therefore, be worth more than one that has never had any such difficulty.

Where stones are plentiful it is a common practice to pile them up in large heaps, usually over a large rock, stump or some other supposed to be permanent obstacle to good farming. In course of years these heaps increase in size until they become disagreeable eyesores and very expensive to remove. There is really nowhere in or around a tilled field that a stone heap can be made with a certainty that it will not soon become a nuisance.

At this season the farmer whose land is either naturally or artificially well drained is able to begin plowing, while his neighbor on undrained land is obliged to keep men and team in unprofitable idleness or engaged in work that is of comparatively little importance. The time thus gained by the former is kept through the season, so that on drained land the farmer may always be ahead of his work, do it at less expense and grow better crops besides.

There is one point about feeding ensilage that every one seems to be agreeing about, and that is, feeding it to dry, pregnant cows. It seems to put the bowels in good condition and relieve them of the feverish condition that dry or concentrated food encourages, and which is fatal at calving time with heavy milkers. If ensilage will keep up this good reputation it will be of much service, even if it should prove to be not so beneficial when fed to cows in milk. Then, again, it will probably be good for young stock and bulls when fed with reasonable ration of hay.

I began using it both internally and externally, and before two bottles were used I was radically cured. We find it a household medicine, and for croup, burns, cuts and bruises, it has no equal.'

TEMPERANCE.

What Alcohol Does.

Thus far, the subject of temperance has been treated negatively, rather than otherwise, or in reference to the relations of intemperance to the ill health, or as the prominent causes of most of the diseases of all communities. If true, therefore, the most of the ills of mortal life are attributable to drunkenness for the reason that such physical sins are productive of material sufferings, in the line of penalties, the converse must be true, that temperance must be promotive of the highest degree of health. It is reasonable to assert, therefore, that temperance used in the broadest signification—implies a proper use of all allowable articles—abstemiousness—and the utter disuse of all objectionable articles, a course which legitimately must result in the highest physical development. This is what we may regard as health ease, and the natural condition of the human frame, as it would have aside from the entrance of sin into the world. In the natural condition, it would demand more effort to become a drunkard, enduring its penalties, than to be temperate, and happy; more effort and toil to be a glutton, intemperate in the use of foods, than to be abstemious and healthy. It follows, therefore, that we are as certainly the architects of our physical, as of our mental and moral states, the highest degree of attainment in all being secured by obedience to the laws relating to the three natures, these laws being of divine orgin, all, alike obligatory. In accordance with those principles, other things being equal, the temperate and abstemious must be the healthiest, the most vigorous, the most enduring, attaining the greatest longevity, and the men of the broadest thought and purest principles. These are but the legitimate sequences, for, to be temperate and abstemious, is to obey God's law! an epitome of this whole subject, written by an able teacher, in a new school books is as follows:

1. Alcohol is a stimulant and a narcotic.
2. Alcohol interferes with appetite for food.
3. Digestion is delayed and made imperfect by alcohol.
4. Diseases of the stomach and organs of digestion is caused by alcohol.
5. Alcohol unduly hastens the circulation of the blood, and causes congestion of the blood-vessels.
6. Alcohol increases the work of the heart, and thereby exhausts its power.
7. Alcohol softens the muscular fibers of the heart, and weakens it by changing the fibers into fat.
8. Alcohol relaxes the small arteries and unfits them for their work.
9. Alcohol weakens the plasma of the blood, and overcomes its nourishing properties.
10. The corpuscles of the blood are contracted by alcohol, their size and form are changed, and their capacity to supply oxygen, and remove carbonic acid is diminished.
11. Alcohol interferes with the burning of waste matter in the capillaries, and thus poisons the blood, and and prevents it from feeding the body.
12. Alcohol congests the blood-vessels of the brain, and causes apoplexy.
13. The substance of the brain is hardened by alcohol, and its thought-producing power injured.
14. Alcohol collects in the brain, and causes paralysis and death.
15. Alcohol effects the size, shape, and color of the cells of the brain, and produces insanity.
16. Alcohol absorbs water from the nerves, and paralyzes their action.
17. Alcohol, by its effects on the nerves, interfers with and weakens muscular movements.
18. Alcohol diminishes the heat of the body, and makes it sensitive to severe cold. It is not a protection against cold.
19. Alcohol affects injuriously men of all the different temperaments.
20. Alcohol intoxicates.
21. Alcohol causes delirium-tremens, and leads to other forms of insanity.
22. Alcohol tends to injure the moral sense, and leads to crime.
23. Appetite for alcoholic liquors may be inherited.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Some Plain Receipts.

The following receipts were given by Miss Maria Parloa in one of her lectures.

CUP CAKE.—Five cups of flour, three of sugar, one of butter and one of cream, five eggs, one teaspoonful of soda; season to taste.

COOKIES.—Take one heaping cup of sugar, twelve tablespoonfuls of melted butter, six tablespoonfuls of hot water and one teaspoonful of soda. Mix quickly, with flour enough to roll; roll thin, and bake in a quick oven on well greased tins; keep in a stone jar.

RICE WAFFLES.—One quart of flour; half a teaspoonful of salt; one teaspoonful of sugar; two teaspoonfuls of baking-powder; one large tablespoonful of butter; two eggs; one and a half pints of milk; one cupful of hot boiled rice. Sift the flour, salt, sugar and baking-powder well together; rub the butter into the flour, beat the eggs well, separately, and add the stiff whites last of all.

BUNS.—Two quarts of warm water, two pounds of sugar, one and a half pounds of butter, two ounces of allspice, six eggs beaten by themselves, one pint of yeast. Put the flour, yeast and water together about as thick as pudding, set it by the fire, let it rise to a sponge, and mix the sugar and butter together. Then beat the whole together after rising and knead in flour enough but not very stiff; make the buns small and brush them over with egg just as you put them into the oven.

PUT AU FEU.—Take a good-sized beefbone with plenty of meat on it, extract the marrow and place it in a pot on the back of the range, covering the beef with three or more quarts of cold water; cover tightly and allow to simmer all day long. The next day, before heating, remove the grease from the top and add a large onion which has which has been stuck full of cloves and roasted in the oven till of a rich brown color; then add any other vegetables which one might fancy. Just before serving, burn a little brown sugar and stir through it. This gives a peculiar flavor and rich color to the soup.

LOAF CAKE.—Two quarts of sugar, seven cupfuls of butter, six quarts of sifted flour, six pounds of fruit, one pint of wine, one pint of yeast, eight nutmegs, mace, twelve eggs, one quart of milk. It should be made at such an hour (being governed by the weather) as will give it time to get perfectly light by evening. It should stand about six hours in Summer and eight in Winter. Put in half the butter and eggs, and the milk, flavor and yeast, and beat thoroughly. In the evening add the remainder of the butter, rubbing it with the sugar, the rest of the eggs and the spice. Let the cake rise again until morning; then add the fruit. Put in deep pans, let rise about half an hour. Bake from two to three hours in a slow oven.

Ventilation.

It is true that a cold draught is dangerous. Dr. Angus Smith, the great English authority on air, says, "It slays like a sword." But impure air is no better, and if one causes pneumonia, the other creates consumption. Bringing air through the furnace flues is all very well, provided it is taken from a pure source of supply. But if, as in most cases, the cold air box of the furnace ends over a damp, dirty area adjoining one of our unswept and filthy streets, the supply is far from wholesome. Dr. Loomis and other specialists long since pointed out the bad effects of New York dust upon the human lungs, yet the dusty air from our streets is sucked into 10,000 furnace cold-air boxes, and is the chief lung food of our population. Because this air has been warmed it does not follow that it is wholesome.

It is perfectly easy to prevent a draught by raising the sash a few inches and placing a narrow board in the space below, so that the cold air will enter between the upper and lower sash and be deflected toward the ceiling without causing any annoyance to persons in the room. There are a number of patented devices for the same purpose, but the arrangement here described can be adopted by any one at the cost of a few cents. The chief difficulty about ventilating most dwelling houses is that there are not sufficient means of carrying off the foul and heated air. If provision is supplied for doing this, them plenty of fresh air will leak in through the window casings and cracks, as most of our houses are not tightly built. Great benefit may be obtained from open fire-places, which, to the æsthetes are coming largely into use. All fire-boards should be abolished.

The art of ventilation has been called one of the lost arts, if, indeed, it ever was an entirely developed art. In our modern houses and flats, with their masses of upholstering and decoration to obstruct the sunlight and prevent free circulation of air, and with the many sources of impurity, such as cooking, washing and plumbing appliances, and still more the gaslights and steam heating apparatus, the necessity for attention to ventilation becomes daily apparent. The almost universal prevalence of catarrh, and the worn out, wearied look of Americans, which Herbert Spencer noted, may be justly charged to the bad ventilation of our houses, and it is time our people should take hold of the matter promptly.

Jannet and Her Minister.

When Whitfield was in the zenith of his popularity he came down to Scotland on a missionary tour, and while there he announced his determination to preach from a well-known elevated spot on Cathkin Braes above Rutherglen. There a great multitude attended to hear the far-famed speaker. After the service was over, and the people returning home, the parish doctor, in the way of his own duties, happened to fall in with a well-known old woman—a farmer's wife—when the following conversation ensued: 'Weel, Jannet,' said the doctor, 'were ye hearing that great man, Whitfield?' 'Weel I wat I was, doctor,' said Jannet; 'but ye ha'e named him richtly, for he is truly a great man.' 'And what,' says the doctor, 'was the subject o' his discourse?' 'Well,' replied Jannet, 'he spak' strangly against the Jews, for their cruelty in crucifying our Saviour.' 'And what did you think yourself o' that subject he so warmly discussed?' asked the doctor. 'Weel, doctor,' said Jannet, 'the cruelty he spak' about happened so long ago, and so far awa', I wad fain hope it's naething mair than a pack o' big lees.' 'Weel,' said the doctor, 'I see, Jannet, there is still a gude grun' o' solid worth about your heart, although your logic could hardly stan' the wrangling o' the poopits.'

"What is the best and only remedy that can be relied on to cure all diseases of the kidneys and urinary organs; such as Bright's disease, diabetes, retention or inability to retain urine, and all the diseases and ailments peculiar to Women"—

"And they will tell you explicitly and emphatically "Buchu."

Ask the same physicians

"What is the most reliable and surest cure for all liver diseases or dyspepsia; constipation, indigestion, biliousness, malarial fever, ague, &c." and they will tell you:

THE FIRST SORROW.

Beautiful boy so still to-night;
Little pale face 'twas once so bright;
Weary mother with tearful eye,
Patiently hoping he will not die.
Oh, there is no grief so deep and clear,
None springs from the heart like a mother's tear.

Why wilt thou leave the bright green earth?
When the sunshine and roses are bursting forth,
When joy and plenty are on the wing,
Away to welcome the beautiful Spring,
And clouds of light from the crystal shore
Are gliding in at the window and door?

Why wilt thy go my own sweet child?
Is the world too cruel, too sin-defiled?
Canst thou not venture thy spotless soul
Where waves of the deepest color roll?
Nor dare to launch thy little boat,
Sweet boy, on the waters unbound afloat?

Ah! I have watched thee with jealous care,
And watted thy name on the wings of prayer.
Have listened thy tones with earnest joy,
And caressed thy form, my angel boy.
Heaven wills it, I rise this test above,
With the faith and trust of a mother's love.

MAN'S MORTALITY.

[The following poem is justly considered a poetical gem of the highest order. The original was found in an Irish MS. in Trinity College, Dublin. There is reason to think that the poem was written by one of those primitive Christian bards in the reign of Diarmid, about the year 554, and was sung and chanted at the last grand assembly of kings, chieftains, and bards, held in the famous halls of Tara. The translation is by Mr. Donovan.]

Like a damask rose you see,
Or like a blossom on a tree,
Or like the dainty flower in May,
Or like the morning to the day,
Or like the sun, or like the shade,
Or like the gourd which Jonah made:
Even such is man, whose thread is spun,
Drawn out and out, and so is done.
The rose withers, the blossom blasteth,
The flower fades, the morning hasteth,
The sun sets, the shadow flies,
The gourd consumes, the man—he dies.

Like the grass that's newly sprung,
Or like the tale that's new begun,
Or like the bird that's here to-day,
Or like the pearled dew in May,
Or like an hour or like a span,
Or like the singing of the swan;
Even such is man, who lives by breath,
Is here, now there, in life and death.
The grass withers, the tale is ended,
The bird is flown, the dew's ascended,
The hour is short, the span not long,
The swan's near death, man's life is done.

Like to the bubble in the brook,
Or in a glass much like a look,
Or like the shuttle in weaver's hand,
Or like the writing on the sand,
Or like a thought, or like a dream,
Or like the gliding of the stream;
Even such is man, who lives by breath,
Is here, now there, in life and death.
The bubble's out, the look forgot,
The shuttle's flung, the writing's blot,
The thought is past, the dream is gone,
The waters glide, man's life is done.

Like an arrow from a bow,
Or like a swift course of water flow,
Or like the time 'twixt flood and ebb,
Or like the spider's tender web,
Or like a race, or like a goal,
Or like the dealing of a dole;
Even such is man, whose brittle state
Is always subject unto fate.
The arrow shot, the flood soon spent,
The time no time, the web soon rent,
The race soon run, the goal soon won,
The dole soon dealt, man's life soon done.

Like to the lightning from the sky,
Or like a post that quick doth hie,
Or like a quaver in a song,
Or like a journey three days' long,
Or like snow when summer's come,
Or like a pear, or like a plum;
Even such is man, who heaps up sorrow,
Lives but this day, and dies to-morrow.
The lightning's past, the post must go,
The song is short, the journey so,
The pear doth rot, the plum doth fall,
The snow dissolves, and so must all.

An Ambitious Woman.

BY EDGAR FAWCETT.

By four o'clock Hollister had not returned. But Mrs. Diggs had made her appearance instead, and Claire welcomed it as a happy relief from the torment of her own thoughts. "My dear," said this lady, "there has been nothing so dreadful in Wall street since the crisis of the famed Black Friday. My poor Manhattan came home at three o'clock utterly jaded out. I made him go to bed. He could scarcely speak to me. I asked him about your husband's affairs, but he gave me only mumbling answers; excitement had put him into a kind of stupor, don't you know?"

"Yes," assented Claire, understanding the nature of the collapse perfectly. "So he told you nothing of Herbert's affairs? Nothing whatever?"

"Nothing that I could really make out. I should be in a wild state, and have a feeling about the soles of my feet as if I were already going barefoot, don't you know, if I hadn't long ago insisted upon Manhattan's putting a large and comfortable sum safely away in my name."

Claire thought of the house that had been assigned to her, of her jewels, of her costly apparel. But to remember these only aggravated her distress. What a meagre wreck they would leave from the largess of her past prosperity!

"Well, I wouldn't be awfully worried, if I were you," continued Mrs. Diggs. "If will be should come, your husband some...re to save something handdo. Some great speculators always up after the thousands always turn. Perhaps he form has blown over. ...granier things begin again, and do ..." That is ...e ever before."

Claire with a bitter consolation," said "I know it is for the who have been tossing, Claire, dear, to my dimes. I may hundreds things, but I won't. I say horrid retribution for your extra talk of all that. But I so detest faces, and avais bien dit style of rebuke. ...ous l' your faults, of course. But have always my sweet, beautiful Claire're heart will ache for you if ...y thing frightful should happen. ...say it to your face, dear, ...I would say it behind your back, ...that you are the one woman of all others whom money perfectly adorns. ...You spent it like a queen, and you ...ked like a queen while you spent it. You remember how I used to gush over Cornelia Van Horn's grand manner? It could never hold a candle to yours. I'm afraid I abused you like a regular pickpocket the other night. Oh, yes, I pitched into you just as hard as I could. But at the same time I was thinking how well you carried your worldliness—what a kind of beau role you made of it, don't you know? And whatever should come, Claire, always recollect that I'll stick to you, my dear, through thick and thin!"

The vernacular turn taken by Mrs. Diggs during this eager outburst gave it a spontaneity and naturalness that more than once brought the mist to Claire's eyes. She felt the true ring of friendly sympathy in every word that was spoken; the touches of slang pleased her; they were like the angularities of the lady's physical shape, severe and yet not ungraceful. She was sorry when her visitor rose to go, and had a sense of dreary loneliness after she had departed.

It would soon be the hour for dinner. But she could not dine. She knew that the decorous butler who waited on her would perceive her efforts to choke down the proffered food. Perhaps he would tingle with secret dread regarding his next wages. He read the newspapers, of course; everybody read them nowadays; and her husband's impending ruin had been their chief and hideous topic.

As the chill winter light in the room turned blue before it wholly died, she sat and thought of how many people would be glad to hear the very worst. They seemed to her a pittiless legion. Then, as she thought of how many would be sorry, three names rose uppermost in her mind: Mrs. Diggs, Thurston, and Stuart Goldwin. Yes, Goldwin surely would have no exultant feeling. He was full of arts and falsities, but he could not fail to regret any calamity that brought with it her own sharp discomfiture.

"He has lately been Herbert's rival in finance," she told her own thoughts. "Circumstance has in a manner pitted them against each other. Herbert rose so quickly. They have not been enemies, but they have stood on opposite sides in not a few matters of speculation. Still, I am sure he will indeed be downfall, if it really comes. He will do so for my sake, if for no other reason. I should have questioned him more closely last night at the opera. I am sure he wanted me to speak with more freedom of the threatening disaster. I should have asked him"——

And then Claire's distressed ruminations were cut short by the quiet entrance of her husband. The door of the chamber had been ajar. Hollister simply pushed it a little further open and crossed the threshold.

The dusk had begun, but it was still far from making his face in any way obscure to her. As she looked at it, while slowly rising from her chair, she saw that it had never, to her knowledge, been so wan and worn as now. He paused before her, and at once spoke.

"Have you heard?" he said.

She felt herself grow cold. "What?" she asked.

"I'm cleaned out. Everything has gone. I though you might have seen the evening papers. They are full of it. Of course they don't know the real truth. Some of them say that I have five millions hidden away." He laughed here, and the laugh was bleak though low. "But I tell you the plain truth, Claire—there's nothing left? The truth is best; don't you think so?"

He was steadily watching her as he thus spoke, and the detected irony of his words pierced her like a knife. A wistful distress was in the frank blue of his eyes; they seemed to reflect from her own spirit the wrong that she had done him.

"Yes, Herbert," she answered, still keeping her seat, "I think that the truth is always best."

A great sigh left his lips. He put both hands behind him, and began slowly pacing the floor, with lowered head. While thus engaged, he went on speaking.

"I can't think how I ever shot up as I did. I never was a very bright fellow at Dartmouth. I always had pluck enough, but I never showed any very great nerve. Wall Street brought out a new set of faculties, somehow. And then everybody liked me; I was popular; that had a great deal to do with it. I suppose—that and a wonderful run of luck at the start. And then there was one thing more—one very important thing, too. I see now what a tremendous incentive it really was. I mean your wish to rise and rule people. If it hadn't been for that, I'd have let many a big chance slip."

He paused now, standing close beside his wife's chair. "I was always weak where you were concerned," he said, regarding her, very intently, and with a cloud on his usually clear brow that bespoke suffering rather than sternness. "You know that, Claire. I yielded always; I let you wind me round your finger—was so fond of the thing, you had said, Herbert, do this or that fully, I'd have done it, and it wouldn't have seemed half so much a folly because of your loved command. Is not this true?"

He came still closer to her after he had uttered the last sentence. He was so close that his person grazed her dress.

Claire was very pale, and her eyes were shining. "It is perfectly true," she answered him.

Hollister's tones instantly changed. They were broken, hoarse, and of fervid melancholy. "Perfectly true. Yes, you admit it. You know that I am right. I gave you everything—love, interest, energy, respect, obedience. And what did you give me? Your marriage vows. Claire!—were those falsehoods? Speak and tell me! I never thought so till yesterday. Good God, woman! I never thought about it at all. You were my wife; you were my Claire. You were stronger in nature than I, and I loved your strength. I loved to have you lead, and to follow where you led. But your love—oh, I counted on that as securely as we count on the sun in heaven. And yesterday the truth burst on me! It wasn't that you cared for. It was the high place I could put you in, the dresses and diamonds I could buy for you, the——"

He said only broke off. A great excitement was now on his visage, his voice, his whole manner. Whether from pain or wrath, it seemed to her that his eyes had taken a much darker tint, and that an unwonted spark, chill and keen, lit them.

"If it all is true," he went on, speaking much more slowly, and like a man who locutions had without openly showing it, "then I thank God no child has been born of you and me!"

She sat quite still. She was utterly conscience-stricken. From all the facile vocabulary of feminine self-excuse her bewildered and shamed soul could shape no sentence either of propitiation or denial. At such a time she felt the infamy, even the farce of lying to him. And how could she respond with any sufficiency, any gleam of comforting assurance, unless she did lie?

"You say that I led you into this disaster, Herbert," she presently responded, with an effort, and more than a successful one, to steady her voice. "I don't deny it, but at the same time remember that my forethought provided for us both in a case of just the present sort. I have the other house, you know. Its sale will bring us something. And then there are my jewels—and"—

His eyes flashed and his lip curled. "You talk in that business-like style," she cried, "when I am asking you if you ever really loved me! Is your evasion answer, Claire? Were your marriage-falsehoods?"

He kept silence, thout mem, and then hurried with g... toward the door, again pausing steps of madness, that was born of possessed him and visibly showed sway. "Get some one else to put back into luxury," he went on, lifting hand toward his throat, as though make the words less husky that were leaping from his lips. "Get Goldwin to do it. Yes, Goldwin. You're only to and he'll kneel to you—as I knelt. Perhaps he's got from you what I never could get. You know what I mean—I've told you."

He passed at once from the room, flinging the door shut behind him. The room was in dimness by this time. Claire almost staggered to a lounge, and sank within it. His wild insult had dizzied her.

He had not meant a word of it. He was tortured by the thought that she had never cared for him. He had used the first fierce reproach that his sorrow and exasperation could hit upon. He went to his own apartments, dressed, and then left the house. He forgot that he had not dined, but remembered only that there might be some sort of forlorn financial hope discovered by a certain assemblage of men less deeply involved than himself, yet all sufferers in a similar way, which would take place that evening at a popular hotel not far distant. All recollection of having suggested an infidelity to Claire quite escaped from his perturbed and over-wrought brain. The piercing realization that she had never loved him still continued its torment. But he failed to recall that the desperate sarcasm of his mood had ever hurled at her the name of Goldwin.

A knock at the door of the darkened room waked Claire from a kind of stupor. The knock came from her maid, and it acted with decisive arousing force. Lights were soon lit, and dinner, that evening, was ordered to become a canceled ceremony.

"You may bring me some bouillon, Marie," Claire directed. "That, and nothing else."

She drank the beverage when it was brought, and changed her dress. The glass showed her a pale but tranquil face.

"I would have clung to him if he would have let me," incessantly passed through her thoughts. "But now he tells me that another can give me the luxury that I have lost. He is right. Goldwin will come this evening; I am sure of it."

Goldwin did come, and she received him with a mien of ice. Underneath her coldness, there was fire enough, but she kept its heat well hidden.

"I came to talk intimately with you," he at length said, "and you treat me as if we had met once, somewhere, for about ten minutes."

The smouldering force of Claire's inward excitement started into flame at these words. "I know with what intimate feelings you came," she replied, meeting his soft glance with one of cold opposition. "You want to tell me that you can set Herbert right with his creditors."

"Yes," he answered, slowly, averting his eyes, "I did have that desire. Is there anything wrong about it?"

"Yes. You should not have come to me. You should have gone to him."

"Why?" he asked.

"Why?" repeated Claire, breaking into a sharp laugh. A moment later she tossed her head with a careless disdain. "I'm not going to tell you why. You know well enough. See Herbert. Ask him if he will let you help him."

"You are very much excited."

"I have good reason to be."

"You mean this dreadful change in your husband's affairs?"

"Yes, I mean that, and I mean more. You must ask question me."

"Very well, I won't."

But he soon did, breaking the silence that ensued between them with gently harmonious voice, and fixing on Claire's half-averted face a look that seemed to brim with sympathy.

"Would Hollister take my help if I offered it? Does he not dislike me? I believe so—I am nearly sure so. You tap the floor with your foot. You are remarkable, and I understand your misery. So am I miserable—on your account. I know all the ins and outs of your distress . . . ah, do not fancy that I fail to do so. He has said hard things—undeserved things. He has perhaps mixed my name with his . . . what shall I call them? . . . reproaches, impertinences? You have had a quarrel—a quarrel that has been wholly on his side. He accused you of not caring enough for him. It may be that he has accused you of not caring at all. Of course he has dilated on your love for the pomp and glitter of things. As if he himself did not love them! As if he himself has not given all of us proof that he loved them very much! Well; let that pass. You are to renounce everything. You are to dine on humble fare, dress in plain clothes, sink into obscurity. This is what he demands. Or, if it is not demanded, it is implied. And for what reason? Because he still sees you are beautiful, attractive, one woman in ten thousand, and that having gambled away every other pleasure in life he can still retain you."

Claire rose from the sofa on which they were both seated. She did not look at Goldwin while she answered him. Her voice was so low that he just caught her words and no more."

"To what does all this tend? Tell me. Tell me at once."

Goldwin in turn slowly rose while he responded: "I will tell you, if you will tell me whether you love your husband well enough to share poverty with him after he has insulted you."

"I did not say that he had insulted me."

"Tell me at once."

"I infer it. Am I right or wrong?"

Still not looking at him, she made an impatient gesture with both hands.

"Answering you are right. What then?"

He did not reply for several minutes. He was stroking his amber mustache with one white, well-shaped hand; his eyes were now turned from hers, hers from him.

"I shall go abroad in a short time. I shall go in less than a fortnight," he said.

It was a most audacious thing to say, and he knew it thoroughly. It was the bold stroke that must either annul his hopes completely, or feed them with a fresh life.

Claire seemed to answer him only with the edges of her lips.

"How does that concern me?"

"In no way. I did not say it did. But you might choose to sail a week or two later. Alone, of course. It would be Paris, with me. You have told me that you wanted very much to see Paris."

She turned and faced him then, more agitated than angry.

"You speak of my husband having insulted me. What are you doing now?"

"I am trying to save you."

"Good heavens! from what!"

"From him. Listen. I do not mean for you to go directly to Paris. You would travel. But at a certain date I could meet you there. I could meet you with—well, with a document of importance."

"Explain. I don't understand you at all."

"Suppose I put the case in certain legal hands here. Suppose they worked it up with skill and shrewdness. Suppose they gained it. Suppose they secured a divorce between you and him on —grounds. . . ."

"Well. What grounds?"

"Of infidelity. You know the life he has lived. Or rather, you don't know. He has been so gay, so prominent, of late, that almost any well-feed lawyer could—"

"Claire interrupted him there. "Leave me at once," she said pointing toward the door. "Leave me. I order you to do it!",

He obeyed her, but stopped when he had nearly reached the threshold.

"As my wife," he said, "you would reign more proudly than you have ever reigned yet. The moment you were free I would be so glad to make you —you the loveliest woman I ever ..., and the most finely, strictly ... me," she repeated; but he ... from the room before her words ... in the direction whence ... her, and then, ... straight ahead as ... she dropped ... hands and ... there, star- ... th tight- ... med

CHAPTER XX.

She heard Hollister re-enter the house that night at a very late hour, and pass to his own apartments. It was only after dawn that she obtained a little restless and broken sleep.

By nine o'clock she rang for her coffee, and then, after forcing herself to swallow it, began to dress, with her maid's assistance. Marie was a perfect servant. As she performed with capable exactitude one after another careful duty, the ease and charm of being thus waited upon appealed to Claire with an ironical emphasis. The very softness and tasteful make of her garments took a new and dreary meaning.

She had forgotten for weeks the dainty details of her late life, its elegance of tone, smoothness of movement, nicety of balance. These features had grown customary and inconspicuous, as cambric will in time grow familiar to the skin that has brushed against coarser textures. But now the light, so to speak, had altered; it was cloudy and stormful; it brought out in vivid relief what before had been clad with the pleasant haze of habit. The very carpet beneath Claire's tread took a reminding softness; the numberless attractions and comforts of her chamber thrust forward special claims to her heed; even the elaborate or simple utensils of her dressing-table had each its distinct note of souvenir. She must so soon lose so much of it all!

As if by some involuntary process, memory slipped images and pictures before her mental vision; she had noted them in the still, dark hours of the previous night, and they remained unbanished now by the glow of the wintry morning. She saw herself a child, cowed and satirized by her coarse and domineering mother; she witnessed the episode of her gentle father's firm and protective revolt; she lived again through the prosperous rise of the family fortunes; she watched herself brave and quell the insolence of Ada Gerrard, and slowly but surely gain rank and recognition among those adverse and disdainful schoolfellows; she endured anew the chagrin of subsequent decadence—the commonness and disrelish of her public school career, the disappointment and monotony of her Jersey City experience, and then, lastly, laborious and deathly tedium of Greenpoint.

Here the strange panorama would cease; the magic-lantern of reminiscence had no more lenses in its shadowy repository; the actual took the place of dream, and startled her by an aspect more unreal than though wrought merely of recollection.

Had these recent weeks all been true? Had she climbed so high in fact and not in fancy? Was the throne from which fate now gave harsh threat of pushing her a throne not built of air, but material, tangible, solid?

The strangeness of her own history affected her in a purely objective way. She seemed to stand apart from it and regard it as though it were some lapse of singular country for which she had gained the sight-seer's best vantage-point. Its activities were so sheer, its valleys were so abrupt, it took such headlong plunges and made such unexpected ascents.

The discreet and sedulous Marie divined little of what engrossed her mistress's mind, and withdrew in her wonted humility of courtesy when Claire, no longer needing her service, at last dismissed her.

But before doing so, Claire took pains to learn that Hollister had not yet descended for his breakfast, which of late he had usually eaten alone in the great dining-room. She soon passed into her adjacent boudoir, where fresh treasures and mementoes addressed her through a silent prophecy of coming loss.

Here was a writing table, well supplied with various kinds of note-paper, all bearing her initials in differing interwisted devices. Not long ago she had questioned her husband on the subject of the Hollister crest; she would have been glad enough to receive from him some clue that might lead to its discovery; but he expressed frank and entire ignorance regarding any such heraldic symbol.

Claire took a sheet of note-paper, and in a hand that was just unsteady enough to show her how strong an inward excitement was making stealthily attack upon her nervous power, began a brief note to Stuart Goldwin. When finished, the note (which bore no ceremonious prefix whatever, and was unmarked by any date) ran as follows:—

"The words which you chose to address to me last night have permanently ended our acquaintance. As a gentleman to a gentlewoman, you were impolite. As a man to a woman, you were far worse. I desire that you will not answer these few lines, and that when we meet again, if such a meeting should ever occur, you will expect from me no more sign of recognition than that which I would accord to any one who had given me an unpardonable insult.

"C. H."

Claire sealed and directed the note. She did not send it, however. After its completion she went downstairs into the dining-room.

Hollister was seated there, being served with breakfast. He had already found it impossible to eat; he was sipping a second or third cup of strong tea.

When his wife appeared, he slightly started. Claire went to the fire and stood before it, letting its warm glow hold her in thrall for quite a while. Her back was now turned to him; she was waiting for the butler to depart. He presently did so, closing a door behind his exit with just enough accentuation to make the sound convey decisive and final import.

Claire then slowly turned, removing one foot from one of the polished rods that bordered the flame-lit hearthstone. She looked straight at her husband; she did not need to see how pale he was; her first look had told her that. She had chosen to ignore all that he had said last night. It did not cost her much effort to do this; she had too keen a sense of her own wrong toward him not to condone the reckless way in which he had compiled her name with Goldwin's. Besides, had not Goldwin's own words to her, a little later, made that assault seem almost justified? She felt nothing toward him save a great pity. Her pity sprang, too, from remorse. She lacked all tenderness; this, joined with pity, would have meant love. "And I cannot love him!" she had already reflected. "If I only could, it would be so different. But I cannot."

When she spoke, her words were very calm and firm. "I thought you might have something more to tell me," she said. "I came down to see you before you went away, for that reason. You said last night that everything had gone. There will be a day or two left us, I suppose; I mean a day or two of —possession."

He was stirring the tea with his spoon. His eyes were bent on the table as he did so. He spoke without lifting them. "Oh, yes," he answered. "Perhaps four or five days. They will seize the house, after that," he went on, "and all the furniture and valuables. Of course they can't touch what is really yours. I mean your diamonds, your dresses, etc."

A pause followed. "To-day I have a luncheon-party," said Claire.

"Yes—you told me. I remember."

"I hope nothing of—of that sort will happen to-day."

"No." He had taken the spoon from the cup, and was staring down at it, as though he wanted to make sure of some flaw in the metal. His face was not merely pale; it had the worn look of severe anxiety. "You can have your luncheon party with impunity. By the way, our own chef gets it up, doesn't he? You didn't have Delmonico or any one else in, did you?"

"No," she answered. "Pierre was left all. He had his full orders several ago."

AND CANADIAN DAIRYMAN.

THURSDAY, MAY 22, 1884.

SIR Richard Cartwright addressed a great public meeting in Toronto for two hours Thursday night. The Hon. Messrs. Blake, Mackenzie, and Mowat also spoke.

AN amendment to exclude Ireland from the operation of the Franchise Bill was defeated Tuesday in the Imperial Parliament by a vote of 332 to 137, Lord Churchill and other Conservatives voting with the Government.

THE Standard's dispatch from Cairo states that all officers of the Commissariat have received orders to prepare for an English expedition to Soudan, the first step to be the purchase of 1,200 camels.

AT this time of the year the people want a holiday, a contemporary therefore suggests that in view of the old age of the Queen, the 24th of May might be appointed a national arbour day. There is one very important objection to this day being appointed is its lateness. Dominion arbour day should be a month earlier.

THE New York Legislature has passed a Bill compelling telegraph and telephone companies to place their wires under ground. A great deal of money will have to be expended in putting the wires in suitable subways, but it is believed that the cost of subsequent maintenance will be very materially reduced.

THE Governor-General has informed the various Lieutenant-Governors that the celebration of Her Majesty's birthday on the 28th of June has reference to the official celebration only. Notes coming due on the later day will have to be met then, and courts appointed to sit will sit. The banks will have to keep the 28th of June, and will not have to observe the 24th of May.

THE Toronto News says:—The signing of petitions for the reprieve of murderers should stop. If the courts fall into disrepute, as they will if this sort of thing continues, lynching will become almost as common in Ontario as it is in the Southern States. We want no lynch law in this province, but if the feeling becomes widespread that when a murderer goes before the courts the chances are that if he is not acquitted his sentence will be commuted, mobs will take things into their own hands and hang supposed murderers without trial.

THERE is general dissatisfaction throughout the country at the Queen's action in postponing the date of the celebration from the 24th of May to the 28th of June. Three days afterwards is Dominion Day, and this will of course be observed as a holiday. The two holidays would thus be brought too close together. The better plan (and which will be pretty generally adopted) will be to observe the 24th of May as a holiday in the usual manner and ignore the proclamation fixing the celebration for the 28th of June. The day is celebrated not altogether out of an exuberance of loyalty, and should not be changed.

THE opinion prevails very generally that in the Middlemiss murder case there has been a miscarriage of justice. If Wrightman is innocent of the crime, the question arises, who was it that murdered the feeble old man on that December night? The victim's last words were "Ah, Wrightman did it." Public opinion is almost a unit in its view of this murder. The folly of appointing incompetent men as constables has been fully demonstrated in this case, when through the stupidity of two of them, a murderer was allowed to escape justice.

THE friends of Phipps, the wife murderer, are making an effort to secure a reprieve for him. It should not be granted. The mawkish sympathy for murderers so prevalent in the United States, should never secure a foothold in Canada. The results of recent murder trials in this country are attracting much attention and a feeling of indignation prevails among respectable people. There is a feeling of widespread dissatisfaction and uneasiness abroad, and many people vigorously denounce the jury system, and give voice to the opinion that justice would be much better served by the doing away with it altogether and having crimes tried by a commission of judges.

THE folly of our Government in voting the Canadian Pacific Railway Co., a further grant becomes clearer every day. Even the most blind partisan cannot shut his eyes to the fact that the Conservative party has put a tool into the hands of the company which they are vigorously using to the detriment of the people. Ostensibly the Government gave the company a monopoly in the North-west for twenty years, but virtually the power now placed in their hands gives them a monopoly over the whole Dominion until the people strip them of it by force, for it must come to that sooner or later. For years the people have been granting bonus after bonus to different railway companies, and saddling the municipalities with debt in order to obtain "competition," and now find that they have been acting very like children running after brilliant soap-bubbles. This overgrown modern Goliath has gobbled up the whole, by means of the money granted "to enable them to complete the Railway in a short time." The Credit Valley and the Toronto Grey & Bruce have fallen into their hands, and the Grand Trunk is (hoping, we presume, to get a share in the snug little presents which the Dominion Government occasionally makes the C. P. R.,) are seeking an amalgamation with this Giant of the West, that together, they may fleece the people to their hearts' content. Though the object for which those bonuses were granted was never attained, and the will of the people frustrated, the debt of the municipalities remain, and the money, when paid, will go to enrich those whom the people sought to restrain within the limits of justice. Besides this, through the trickery and cussedness of their representations, the people are further cursed with a tax to enable this monopoly to frustrate their design. The people of Canada have given hundreds of millions to the different railway companies that they might have protection from monopoly, now this Government "of the people, for the people, and by the people," as the political farce now runs, give these same monopolists the power to sweep the whole into their pockets. These companies have not kept faith and the people should not keep faith with them. The object for which the money was granted has been ignored and the debt incurred thereby should be repudiated. We may be legally bound to fulfill our part of the contract, but in justice we are not, and the people should be governed more by the broad principles of justice than by legal quirks and quibbles. What good is political power to the people when any band of swindlers and money-grabbers who have sufficient funds to bribe their servile government into subserviency, can get measures through the House allowing them to make a competency by over-charging the people?

Washington Letter.

From our regular correspondent.

Washington, May 12, 1884.

The conventions now in progress here, and those to come, demonstrate the fact that the Capital of the Nation is a favorite city for conventions. The most notable affair of the week was the great congress of doctors numbering twelve hundred and forty from all parts of the Union. They came here for the annual session of the American Medical association, to talk sanitary science, but they have managed to combine much pleasure and business. The doctors have been shown favor by the President, who gave a brilliant reception to them at which there were about three thousand guests. Not only were the entire suite of state apartments on the first floor thrown open and brilliantly lighted, but the private rooms, including the President's own chamber on the second floor, were opened to the visitors and the corridors and executive offices as well. This was an inner glimpse of the White House not to be expected, and it was much appreciated by the visitors. The East Room was as elaborately decorated with tropical plants and cut flowers as on any previous occasion in the season's gayety. Many officials were informally invited to meet the knights of Esculapius. The President was assisted by the members of the Cabinet. In addition to the President's Reception, there have been numerous dinners, suppers, and other entertainments extended them by private individuals, notably the reception by Mr. and Mrs. L. Z. Leiter at the Blaine Mansion, and that given by Chief Justice Waite.

I witnessed rather a novel affair in the presentation of the Siamese Embassy to the President. The Embassy consists of his Royal Highness Kron Mun Nares Tarariddi (the envoy) who is half brother to the king of Siam, Major Yrag, Prince Sonapandit, Nai Tuan, Mr. Wyke and Mr. Loftus. They came from the department of State, and were accompanied by Secretary Frelinghuysen, Counsel Smith, Admiral Rodgers and Lieuts. T. B. M. Mason and T. M. Potts, the naval officers specially designated to look after the distinguished visitors on behalf of the government. The Siamese were in full court dress, a costume far more magnificent than any court dress heretofore seen at the national capital. Prince Nares, who is a very small man, was attired in a tight-fitting coat, with heavy gold embroidery, loose-fitting purple silk knee breeches, white stockings, patent leather slippers with large gold buckles. A light cape hung about his shoulders, composed entirely of gold netting. On his head he wore a black helmet, with gold trimmings. His sword was heavily mounted with gold. The others were similarly attired. The presentation, which was made in the Blue Parlor, was formal, and at one moment promised to be formidable. The brief introductions were made by the mention of names, accompanied with the shaking of hands and very low, ceremonious bows, on the part of the Orientals. Then Prince Nares, the chief ambassador, received from Mr. Wyke a roll of written manuscript tied with gold cord, from which he read his speech. Then the President received a roll, tied with blue ribbon, from the Secretary of State, and adjusting his eye glasses, read his brief reply, with sudden interruptions from the glasses, which would not stay adjusted. Fortunately the Orientals did not take in the ludicrous situation, and the determined frown on the handsome face of the Secretary of State saved the dignity of the occasion, for the other members of the Cabinet, looked "sixty ways for Sunday," rather than at one another, in the fear of betraying their levity at this august period of speech reading. A graceful conversation upon social topics then prevailed, which Secretary Frelinghuysen quickly cut short by closing the performance, and taking the visitors on an excursion to Mount Vernon. The ambassadors have come to America for the purpose of seeing and examining tools, machinery, and firearms.

Washington has been so cool and delightful that preparations for the summer exodus have been slow. It is now expected that Congress will adjourn by the first of July, and many congressional families will remain till that time. It looks as though horizontal reduction" has at least reduced the length of the session by a month or more, and legislatures are rejoicing at the prospect of getting away before the settled hot weather. The cool, spring days are a delight to sight-seeing visitors now crowding the hotels and boarding houses, and the national capital was never more beautiful or more deserving of the praise daily bestowed by enthusiastic tourists.

Mr. Hewitt is now going to try his hand at "tinkering the tariff," having prepared a bill which, he thinks, will cut down the revenues from customs duties about seventy million dollars.—Lenox.

GENERAL GRANT lost a fortune through his trustfulness in the speculative abilities of his son and his son's partner Ward. The information that he has been placed on the retired list of the United States army, on full pay, will therefore be welcome news to his many friends. Grant did his country good service at a critical moment when a less energetic general might have pursued tactics that would have disrupted the union, and for this he well deserves the gratitude of the nation, which has taken a very satisfactory shape at a time when misfortune struck him. General Grant's pay will amount to about $17,500 yearly, and his total income from this source and from the interest of the secured fund raised for him some years ago will foot up to $30,000 annually. With this snug sum the General ought to rub along quite comfortably. He has been a good soldier, but a poor business man. If he is wise, he will keep out of speculative ventures in the future.

THE report has been circulated that it is the intention of Mr. Harley, M. P., for South Oxford to resign his seat. In connection with this it has been suggested that the vacancy be offered to the Hon. T. W. Anglin. Now we wish to make a few remarks just here. We don't know whether it is Mr. Harley's intention to retire or not, probably he will inform his constituents through THE CHRONICLE next week. But, in the event of such a step, it may as well be understood now as any other time that South Oxford is quite capable of sending a representative from its own borders, and will not open its arms to receive the Hon. Mr. Anglin or any one else at present without a seat. This the Liberal leaders may feel assured is the sentiment of the party in South Oxford. It is something of a reflection upon a populous constituency when it has to look outside its own borders for a capable representative. As a contemporary remarks: "The only exception, if any, that should be made to the rule of giving local men the preference, is when the outsider for whom the suffrages of the constituency are sought is a man of such marked ability and weight that his conclusion from Parliament might be regarded as a public loss. Then a local man may be asked with propriety to forego his claims, and the constituency appealed to." In the case of Mr. Anglin however, South Oxford does not feel that his exclusion from Parliament would be a public loss. If the Liberal leaders think differently, probably they can find a seat for him elsewhere.

County and Vicinity.

Mr. C. Grambsy, of Orono, has purchased the Burtch Farm in W. Oxford, where he purposes making it his home at no distant date.

We regret to announce the death of Samuel Whaley, which took place at his residence at St. Marys early on Wednesday morning. Mr. Whaley had been confined to his bed for the last six months. He suffered from no particular malady, but a general break up of a once remarkably strong constitution. He was a resident of St. Marys some thirty years ago, but spent most of his life in the township of North Oxford, only going back there to spend the balance of his days. His remains were buried in Ingersoll.

THE OTTERVILLE SENSATION

WAS HE POISONED?

MAN AND WIFE CHARGED WITH MURDER.

"The Old Man's a Nuisance."

The village of Otterville, in this county is at present disturbed by a poisoning case. From what has been learned it appears that among the residents of Oxford for a considerable period was

ONE HENRY VANSICKLE.

He was a man of respectable character, possessing excellent connections, and was seemingly upwards of fifty years of age when death overtook him. Latterly he resided in Woodstock, but last fall he removed to Otterville and engaged in the hotel business. It is stated that he had been for some two or three years a widower, but that about five or six months prior to his death he entered again into a matrimonial alliance, bestowing his heart and hand upon Miss Lester, whose relatives live in the town of Woodstock. The

was a young woman, who apparently had attained to the age of about thirty, and who is said to be of good manners, graceful appearance and attractive person. In the course of his business Vansickle had occasion for the services of a bartender, and the person who figured in that capacity bore the name of Robert Pearce. He is a young man, possessing a good figure, pleasant manners and rather taking appearance, and according to the testimony of a witness living in the house, and the statements of others, acquired such intimacy with the young wife that they indulged in buggy rides and similar amusements together. All went along merrily enough, however, until the 19th of November, when Vansickle expired in a rather unlooked for manner. At the time some suspicion appears to have been entertained that everything was not exactly right, but nothing further transpired until recently. Then a fresh development took place through a conversation held by a young man named James Donaldson—who had for a short time prior and for some months subsequent to the death of Vansickle been a boarder at the hotel—with Mr. Alexander McFarlane. The result of this conversation was that the young man was induced to make a solemn declaration, after which Nathan Vansickle, of Lynden, a brother of the deceased, proceeded to Woodstock and laid an information before Dr. G. C. Fields, Police Magistrate of that town. Upon the authority of this a warrant was issued for the apprehension of Pearce and the woman, and this was placed in the hands of Constable Tisdale, of Otterville, for execution.

A HONEYMOON STOPPED.

But in the meantime another unexpected circumstance had occurred. It is stated that Pearce had continued his attentions to the widow with such acceptance that on Tuesday last the couple were united in the bonds of wedlock by Rev. W. Williams, and proceeded to Otterville on Wednesday. It is surmised that they were about to depart upon the bridal tour, when on Thursday afternoon about five o'clock the honeymoon was brought to an abrupt termination through the arrest of the swain by Constable Tisdale. On Friday morning Pearce and his newly-made wife were brought to Woodstock for examination before the Magistrate, and after hearing the testimony of James Donaldson the P. M. remanded the two for eight days, pending the production of further evidence.

DONALDSON'S STORY.

The testimony given by Donaldson was of a very important character, and if sustained cannot but involve the prisoners in a very serious charge. He said:—I have lived in Otterville for three years, and am wood-worker in the Otter Sweeper Co.'s works; have known the prisoner Pearce for three years, and Mrs. Pearce for about six or eight months; Henry Vansickle came to Otterville in October last and kept hotel and Pearce was bartender for him; I boarded there and was there for three months after his death; remember 19th of November last—that was the day Vansickle died; he died between 7 and 8 in the evening; when I came home to tea at 6 o'clock I was told by Mrs. Pearce that Vansickle was sick, and had been taken sick about 4 in the afternoon; about 7 o'clock I helped to carry him from his sitting-room to the bed; he was perfectly well when I left at noon; after carrying deceased to bed I went to the station and when I returned at nearly 8 o'clock prisoner Pearce told me he quit attending bar in the morning because he and Vansickle had had a quarrel, but when I returned in the evening he was attending bar again; when I carried deceased to bed he was purplish in the face; his lips were swollen, and his tongue as he could not speak; both prisoners were present at the time; after laying him on the bed he rolled off on the floor, and we lifted him up again, when he made a motion that he wanted a drink; prisoner Pearce went down stairs and returned with a glass of what I thought was whiskey, but the deceased refused to drink it; then Mrs. Pearce went and brought him a glass of water, which he drank; he then made motions to have his legs rubbed, and we took off his socks, when I observed his legs were swelling fast; a few nights before his death deceased and his wife and Pearce was present; Pearce said to me, "The old man is a nuisance," and coaxed me to drive to Norwich or Simcoe to buy croton oil to give him so they would get him out of the way; I refused to go and he offered to pay me for my time and trouble; he asked me the next night and I still refused; another night his brother John called me up and treated; Mrs. Pearce called Rob. and wanted him to get the old man a drink; Rob poured him out what I thought was rye into a glass; he then put some mixture into the glass, when his brother told him not to, as he would get himself into trouble; he said he did not care a d——n if he did; he then went up-stairs with it, and when he returned he said he guessed the old man suspected there was something wrong with the liquor as he shook his head after he drank it; the mixture was in a small tumbler and was of a lightish brown colour. I judge there was about three-quarters of an inch of the

HE WAS DEAD;

HAD A SPAT,

and he put in about a spoonful into the liquor; after his death Vansickle's widow carried on the hotel and Pearce continued to act as bartender; after about two months Mrs. Vansickle left, and a few days later Pearce left; previous to Vansickle's death the persons went driving together and also to parties; on two occasions I know they went away together and were gone for a couple of days at a time; I never told any one these facts until the other day I was talking to Alex. McFarlane and told him about it, when they made me make a declaration before Melvin Durkee.

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION.

It is understood that in the interim an effort will be made to have the remains exhumed and the contents of the stomach submitted to chemical analysis if possible. After his death a post mortem was held upon the remains at the solicitation of his relatives, and that the operator returned a verdict of death from natural causes. It is rumored that a statement has been made by a young man living in Otterville to the effect that some stuff which the deceased vomited was thrown out on the street and that a dog which partook of some of it died from the effects.

A TRUE BILL.

Found Against McCabe for Poisoning His Wife.

The Grand Jury returned a true bill against George McCabe, for the murder of his wife Ann McCabe, on the 25th of April last. The prisoner was brought into court and placed in the dock. He was arraigned on the charge and pleaded

NOT GUILTY.

In answer to the inquiry he said he was prepared to go on with his trial.

Mr. Macdougal stated that he was not prepared to go on with the trial at the present Assizes, and asked to have it traversed to the Fall Assizes. Lord——'s request was granted, an application to be taken back to his cells, as he had no bail, which was refused in a case of murder.

Did Wrightman Do It?

It cannot be said that the verdict in the case of the Silcox murder trial has given satisfaction to the public. What is said on all hands is that a miscarriage of justice has taken place. There can be no doubt that the result is disappointing. Not that anyone was eager for the blood of the accused, but it is apparent that the crimes of house-breaking, robbery and manslaughter have been committed, almost in public, and yet one who seems to have been so closely connected with the crimes has been let off scot free. The fact of the matter is, the case was bungled from the first. The untrained constables bungled their part of the business at Mills' tavern, Iona, when Wrightman was arrested. And it was unfortunate that no certified statement was had from Silcox before his death, such as could be used in evidence. He was sensible for two hours after the assault has been made upon him. The last words he spoke were "Ah, Wrightman did it." And no one doubts that the dying man spoke the truth. He had no interest or object in making any statement as he lay sinking into the arms of death that was not true. But as he was not asked (as he should have been) if he made the statement in the belief that he was about to die, the important, the conclusive statement was ruled out of court. He had been robbed, attacked and fatally injured by a man whom he knew right well. And he told Mr. Lucas on what proved to be his death bed "Ah, Wrightman did it." Another bungle that took place was the joint indictment of Graham, (against whom there was no evidence) with Wrightman, to whom the evidence pointed as the guilty man. The effect of this was to lead to the supposition that neither of them was guilty. And the case was not presented to the jury in that forcible way which it merited. It might be all very well for Crown counsel to forbear to press a charge unduly against an accused person. At the same time there is a duty to the public, whose servant he is, which cannot be denied and should not be shirked. We confess to a doubt if the killing of Silcox really amounted to a murder in a moral sense, although it undoubtedly did in a legal one.

If conviction had taken place it is scarcely likely that Wrightman would have been hanged, because it is evident that he did not have the intention of killing Silcox. He did not attack him with a revolver, a dirk or a bludgeon. He merely shied the weights at him which he found lying on the shop counter. It was more an act of devilment than of premeditated murder, even taking this view of the case, still their remains behind the fact that robbery and manslaughter were committed. And against whom does the charge of commission come home so closely as to Wrightman. If he did not penetrate them who did? The last and dying words of the bleeding Silcox were "Ah. Wrightman did it."—Free Press.

THURSDAY, MAY 22, 1884.

TOWN NEWS.

B. C. Farewell Tea on Monday.

COURT of Revision for Ingersoll, on Thursday, 29th.

"CHANGE not a clout till May is out," is old but sound advice.

READINGS.—Miss Churchill will give a series of readings on May 30th.

BUSINESS will proceed as usual on Saturday. Monday will be a public holiday.

FOOTBALL.—A football club has been organized by our High School boys.

WE have had plenty of rain for the present, Mr. Weather Clerk. Now for the sunshine.

WHILE Ingersoll is increasing the value of her assessment, Woodstock has lowered hers $162,000.

EXCURSION.—The A. O. of F., of London, have made arrangements for an excursion to Brantford, on Saturday, May 24th.

FARM SOLD.—John Thompson, of this town, has sold his 100 acre farm, 2nd con., Dereham, to John Groves, for $7,000.

OUR STORY.—"I Am Ambitious Woman," now running in THE CHRONICLE, is one of the most popular tales we have published.

ICE.—Walter Mills advertises pure ice from King's pond for sale, delivered to any part of the town. Orders may be left at S. King's shop.

HAY FORK SWINDLERS.—We hear that the hay fork swindlers from the east have been in town. A farmer in East Nissouri is the only victim we have yet heard of

THE DETROIT EXTENSION.—The work of building the C. V. R. extension to Detroit will commence very soon from Ingersoll. Eleven engineers are here now.

THE first open air concert of the season will be given to-morrow (Friday) evening, by the 22nd Band, on their stand at the corner of Thames and Charles streets.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH.—The Board of Health should give notice in the papers that all yards, hog pens, closets, cess pools, etc., must be cleaned up by an early date.

A reader takes the bright side and reminds us of the old saying :

"Plenty of rain in May Plenty of hay."

KNOX CHURCH.—Principal Cavan, of Knox College, Toronto, will occupy the pulpit of Knox Church next Subbath morning. The evening service will be conducted by the Rev. Mr. Willoughby.

I. B. C.—All members of the Ingersoll Bicycle Club are earnestly requested to meet at the market at 9 o'clock a m. sharp, on Monday May 26th, for a run around town.

THE 24TH.—Quite a number of the Ingersoll Ancient Order of Foresters purpose visiting Brantford on Saturday, at which city there is to be a great Foresters' demonstration.

HIGH OPINION.—Poet W. H. Longfellow speaks thusly: Miss Churchill's conception and rendition of "Hiawatha" teaches us that it is harder to find readers than writers. She is full of the spirit of the song.

VISITORS from the country who may wish to celebrate the Queen's Birthday in a pleasant way can rely on seeing a good day's sport in Ingersoll on Monday, the 26th, the day set apart as the holiday.

CANADIAN NEWSPAPER DIRECTORY.—The Mail Advertising Agency have issued their first edition of the Canadian Newspaper Directory, which is compiled and arranged in a neat and convenient form, and furnishes information of value to all advertisers.

PROMENADE CONCERT.—St. John's Day, 24th June, will be celebrated in Ingersoll by a promenade concert in the Skating Rink, under the auspices of the Masonic fraternity. The band of the 7th Fusileers, London, fifty strong, have been engaged.

ARRANGEMENTS are being made for the Ingersoll Knights of Labor to attend in a body and take part in the great Semi-Centennial Celebration in Toronto during the first week of July. We have not heard of any other society receiving a like invitation.

ST. ANDREW'S CHURCH.—The sacrament of the Lord's supper will be administered in this church on Sabbath at the morning service. Preparatory services will be held to-morrow (Friday) at 11 a.m., and 7:30 p. m., when the Rev. Mungo Fraser, of St. Thomas, will officiate.

BASE BALL.—A match game of base ball was played in Victoria Park on Saturday last, between the Landsdowne (High School) Club, captained by H. Sumner, and the Clippers, Wm. McLeod, captain, which resulted in a victory for the Clippers by 12 runs, the score being 15 to 3.

FORGETFUL.—We thought by this time everybody knew that it is an inviolable rule of all respectable newspapers to insert no communication unless accompanied with the name of the writer. "A viewer at a distance" forgets this. If he will give us his name we will publish his communication.

RUNAWAY.—On Friday evening last a team belonging to Mr. Wm. Seldon took fright, while fastened opposite Ellis' hardware store, and made speedy flight around the block, their mad career being stopped by coming in contact with a telegraph post near McMurray's barn. Luckily no particular damage was done.

FIRE.—On Saturday afternoon a fire broke out in a stable belonging to Councillor Horsman, on the old Hall estate, in the rear of W. Sudworth's residence. The engine was out promptly, but it was found that the hose would not reach the building from the Park, the nearest water avacable. The building was entirely destroyed.

LACROSSE.—The Dufferin Lacrosse Club this season is in a flourishing condition, having over forty members. Although the weather has not been very favourable for practice, still the boys have made good progress. They send a team to Paris to play the Beavers, on Saturday, May 24, and will play a club from London, at Victoria Park, Ingersoll, on Monday next, at 10:30 a. m. The club has adopted a very handsome suit and present a very neat appearance. We wish them success.

TO CORRESPONDENTS,—Some of our correspondents are in the habit of sealing their letters and affixing a one cent stamp. This causes considerable annoyance in the post offices, and necessitates our paying two cents in each case for "additional postage." In one or two cases we have been put to the trouble of remitting the extra postage to the dead letter office and having the copy returned. By simply turning in the edge of the letter and leaving it unsealed, or, if disposed to seal, nipping off the corners of the envelopes, our correspondents can save the postmasters and us this annoyance, provided the envelope contains nothing but matter for publication.

A rather amusing scene occurred during the progress of the sedition case of Faulder vs. Brady at the Middlesex Assizes yesterday at London. The plaintiff, a woman between thirty and forty, refused to answer questions put to her by defendant's counsel, and was told by the judge that if she did not answer the questions he would strike out her evidence and her father would be saddled with the costs. Notwithstanding the entreaties of her solicitor, she persistently refused, saying she was ashamed, whereupon the judge recorded a verdict for defendant, saying he had no sympathy with a woman of 30 or 40 who brought a suit for seduction.

FAREWELL TEA.—Our readers will not forget the Farewell Tea to be given by the adherents of the Oxford-street B. C. Church on Monday evening next, 26th inst. As this will be the last entertainment under B. C. auspices in this town owing to the closing of the church, brought about by the consummation of the Union, it will be an interesting affair, and it is to be hoped that "the little church" will be liberally patronized. Tables will be spread in the church and grounds and tea served from six o'clock up to a late hour. Weather permitting, ladies will have stands for the sale of ice cream, fruit and seasonable delicacies. A programme of addresses by the town ministers, and appropriate music by the choir and others, will be submitted after tea. Tickets placed at the low figure of 25 cents.

PERSONAL.—J. L. Grant left on his return trip to Liverpool on Sunday.—Fredk. D. Canfield, M.D., who has recently returned from a course of hospital practice in New York, has decided to establish himself in the neighbouring city of London. Since Dr. Canfield received his degree, his experience both in this country and the neighbouring States has been large. We bespeak a successful career for him.—James White, son of David White, dry goods merchant, left yesterday for the Rocky Mountains on a surveying trip.—D. A. McMichael, B.A., of Toronto, was in town last week. This gentleman was for some years principal of the Strathroy High School, and, through his untiring efforts and indomitable zeal, made it rank among the highest in the Province. Mr. McMichael was compelled through ill health to retire from school teaching, and is now in commercial life. We are glad to see that he is "looking himself again."

FRIENDS in the country, bring the family in on Monday next and enjoy the fun.

RINK MEETING.—The annual meeting of the Curling and Skating Rink Co. will be held to-morrow (Friday) evening.

GAS LIGHT CO.—The annual meeting of the Ingersoll Gas Light Co. will be held on Monday afternoon, June 2nd.

SEATS are being taken up lively for the Scotch Concert. Fifty were reserved yesterday before 12 o'clock.

NOT DEAD AFTER ALL.—Robt. Robinson, who was reported to have died in Chicago last week is still in the land of the living. He had a severe fit, and while unconscious was pronounced dead. He recovered in time to save being buried alive.

SILVER CUP.—Mr. H. Richardson, jeweler, has presented the Dufferin Lacrosse Club of this town with a handsome silver cup for competition in long distance throwing, which will be competed for by members of the club on Monday, 26th instant, in Victoria Park at 9:30 o'clock a. m.

THE Council of the township of London offers a bonus of 25 cents per rod to all farmers in the township who will build wire fences on all roads running north and south. Other township councils ought to follow suit, and then heavy snow drifts would be almost unknown.

PROFESSIONAL CHANGE.—The partnership heretofore existing between Messrs. Fletcher & Finkle, Woodstock, as been dissolved. Mr. Alex. Finkle, who has had an experience of 18 years, will continue the practice of his profession as heretofore. We wish him continued success, as his abilities deserve.

PRESIDENT ELOT, of Harvard, will discuss in the June Century the question, "What is a Liberal Education?" Among other things he makes a strong plea for the study of English, and in a historical review of the changes in diversity curricula shows what a hard fight was necessary to procure the introduction of Greek three centuries ago.

THE frontispiece of the June Century is an engraving of St. Gaudin's statue of Robert Richard Randall, founder of the home for disabled seamen on Staten Island known as Sailors' Snug Harbor. An accompanying sketch contains many sailors' yarns and anecdotes about the old tars who have found a safe anchorage here.

DISGUSTING BUT TRUE.—The Tilsonburg Observer says:—The Salvation Army lasses from Woodstock who are leading the meetings here just now have introduced a new act. It is called "going to glory," and consists in going into alleged trances about twelve o'clock at night and coming out of them any time before daylight.

By a regulation it it enacted that holders of third class teachers' certificates who desire a renewal or extension of such certificates, are required to present themselves at the non-professional examination for third class on July 7th 1884, at the county town, otherwise the Minister will grant no extension unless under special circumstances, and valid then only until next examination.

SALE OF REAL ESTATE.—At the auction sale of the Jesse Brown estate by James Brady, on the Market Square, on Saturday last, the building known as the Royal Hotel here, was sold to J. B. Capron, of this town, for $1,000. Lot No. 5, 1st con., North Oxford, containing 100 acres, to Thos. McFarlane, for $6,000 ; and Lot 1, 13th con., East Nissouri, containing 50 acres, to Donald Patience, for $4,015.

CURCULIO.—Those who own plum trees should recollect that this is the season when the curculio devotes itself to business. Before the blossom breaks, put a desert spoonful of Paris green in a pailful of water, mix it well, and syringe the tree thoroughly. If a shower of rain follows, syringe the tree again, and keep on doing so after every rain until the young plum is as large as a white bean.

HIGH SCHOOL ENTERTAINMENT. — The pupils of the High School gave a most successful entertainment in the Town Hall on Friday evening last. The debate "Resolved that English Intervention in Egypt was Justifiable" was decided by the audience in favor of the negative, which was sustained by Messrs. T. Pearce and Geo. McKay. The affirmative was handled by Messrs. H. Case and E. Lemon.

WOODSTOCK'S POPULATION.—The assessors of Woodstock have completed their work this year and make the total value of real and personal property, and taxable income, $1,067,590 ; population, 6,060. Last year the real and personal property was $1,829,760, and the population 6,020. This shows a large decrease in the assessable value of property and an increase of 70 in the population.

THE HOLIDAY.—The Queen's birthday falls on Saturday this year, but the Council, in order to suit the convenience of the shop keepers, resolved to change the day from Saturday to Monday. The Queen's birthday however is a statutory holiday, and the banks will be closed on that day. Other business will proceed over as usual. The places of business and public schools will be closed on Monday,

A MEDICAL CASE.—Dr. Scott, Ingersoll, attended the family of a farmer named Billington for a long time, and charged $900 for services and medicine. Billington declined to pay more than $540, and the case was taken to London assizes. The evidence was all medical. Several doctors declared the charges were moderate, while other asserted they were excessive. The jury gave a verdict awarding $540 the amount tendered by defendant, plaintiff paying costs.

TO VENDORS OF POISONS.—A serviceable hint to storekeepers is given by the Registrar of the Ontario College of Pharmacy, in an advertisement just published. Those who sell Paris Green, London Purple, or "other arsenical insecticides," are required hereafter to label the packages with the name and address of the seller and to keep a record of their sale. This under a penalty of $20 for the first offence and $50 and costs for subsequent offences. Pharmacy Act 1884, Sec. 24.

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.—The annual meeting of the Institute was held on Wednesday evening, May 14th. The reports of the secretary and the Auditors were presented, showing the Institute to be in debt to a small amount. Officers for the ensuing year were elected : President, F. W. Merchant ; Vice-President, Joseph Gibson ; Treasurer, R. J. Robertson ; Secretary, Wm. Briden. Directors—C. H. Shawson, R. W. Woodroofe, W. Tripp, R. W. Smith, W. B. Nelles, W. K. Sumner, R. H. Young. Auditors—H. Richardson and J. S. Deacon.

VALEDICTORY SERVICES.—By the "Methodist Union" taking legal effect on the first Sabbath in June, and by virtue of a resolution passed at the Woodstock Provisional District Meeting, the last religious services for this individual society will be held in the B. C. Church, Oxford street, next Sabbath afternoon at 2.30 and 7 p.m. The society has concluded to hold a sacramental service after the evening meeting, to which all the members are expected to attend, and who will be pleased with the presence of any members of the sister churches. The evening service will be a special and a very interesting time. On Monday evening there will be a farewell gathering at the church in the form of a public tea, served from 6 p.m. After tea a public platform meeting will be held, when short addresses will be made by Revs. D. Hunt, J. Reynolds, P. R. Ross and others. Mr. Joseph Gibson, chairman. Tickets 25 cents.

AN INTERESTING MATCH.—A match for $200 took place in the presence of some 300 spectators on lot 16, con. 12, Brooke Township, on the 16th of May inst., between M. T. Buchanan's Double Acting Pitching Machine, made in Ingersoll, and Wortman Ward's Machine, made in London. The match arose out af a challenge given by one W. E. Kearney, agent for the Ward machine, and printed in the Guide-News of Watford, challenging Mr. Buchanan for a test for the above-named machine. Our townsman with his usual display of pluck accepted the challenge, the money was put up, agreements signed, and judges appointed, namely, Henry, Goff, Reeve of Metcalfe, Jas. Hall, Reeve of Warwick, Mr. E. Sedwick, acting as referee. The London machine being elected to pitch first, went thro' its work in as lively a manner as was possible to be done with the London machine. When the London machine was taken off the track, and the Ingersoll machine put on the same, the latter machine accomplished the same amount of work in fourteen seconds less than one-third of the time taken by the London machine. Thus the Buchanan machine was declared the winner by the judges, and awarded the money. M. T. Buchanan, of this town, has thus added another spoke to the wheel of fortune with which he seems to be possessed, as he has been awarded first prize over all competitors at London in the years 1879, 1880, 1882, and was awarded first prize and diploma last Fall in London, beating the same machine that he pitched against last Friday. Although this is the first trial of hay forks that has taken place in Canada, in actual work in a barn, it terminated so much in favour of the Ingersoll machine as to not leave a shadow of doubt in the minds of the public which to buy for handling loose grain and hay. The Buchanan machine was handled by M. T. Buchanan, the manufacturer ; Mr. Simon Demaray, of Adelaide, handling the horse, and the London machine was handled by Mr. R. Johnston, of Watford ; Mr. W. E. Kearney, of same town, handling the horse. Messrs. A. J. McCarthy and John McKeller, of this town, witnessed the match and they describe it as one of the most interesting events ever witnessed by them. These gentlemen are of the opinion that the Buchanan machine could unload nearly four loads in each end of the barn while the London machine would be unloading one load.

SOCIAL.—A pleasant social in connection with St. Andrew's Church was held at the residence of James Gordon on Tuesday evening.

DON'T fail to see the "gem of art" at Brouse & Rawe's photograph gallery when you come to town on Monday. Their Fresh Enamelled Pictures cannot be excelled. One door south of CHRONICLE office.

ARBOR DAY.—Stratford's first "Arbor Day," was very successful as far as the tree planting was concerned, about 1,500 trees having been put in at the new park and along the thoroughfares.

AGRICULTURE SOCIETY.—A meeting of the Directors of the North and West Oxford Ag'l Society was held in the Council Chambers on Friday evening last at 6 o'clock p. m., to confirm the action of the Executive Committee with the Town Council, in the agreement in reference to removal of the Agr'l Buildings, &c., to Victoria Park.

CARNIVAL OF AUTHORS.—Miss F. H. Churchill, of Boston, Mass., the celebrated elocutionist and teacher, will give an evening of readings and recitations in the Town Hall, on Friday, May 30. Tickets 25 cts. Reserved seats 10 cents extra. Miss Churchill is everywhere greeted with a spontaneous enthusiasm such as is rarely elicited. Her audiences have invariably testified to her power and success in the warmest expressions of gratitude and appreciation. Her careful training and thorough mastery of her art win for her the favor and admiration of the most critical and refined, and her sympathy and genius evoke the warmest appreciation from all who hear her.

A BLOW IN WOODSTOCK.—A wind storm passed over the southern part of the town on Thursday evening last, doing about $3,000 worth of damage. The fences, grand stand and judge's stand on the race course were blown down. Chimneys were knocked over. One boy was injured and has since died from his injuries. Several men were laying the asphalt track for the Athletic Association and when they first saw the storm coming, the most prudent of them lay prostrate on the ground, but one not thinking of this, had his coat taken completely off, and the man himself thrown a distance of forty feet. In the woods adjoining the Driving Park, trees two feet in diameter were twisted from their trunks, and nearly everything in the route of the tornado succumbed to the terrific force. The storm took precisely the same course as the cyclone which visited this section about twelve years ago, but was, if anything, more severe.

THE eleven St. Thomas rioters now in Woodstock jail, awaiting trial for the murder of Antonio Malette, are not all Irish emigrants as has been supposed. Andrew O'Brien is a native of Belfast, Ireland, and is an old soldier. He draws a pension of £3 8s 6d per quarter, from the district master of Halifax, and has a wife aud family residing in St. Thomas, where he has lived upwards of two years. Edward McFadden is a Scotchman, born in Glasgow. He served in the Indian war, and retired from H. M. service with honors. Patrick White was born in Pennsylvania. He is a young man, about 23 years of age. He has resided in St. Thomas about two years. Thomas Fahey, is a lad of 14 or 15 years of age, rather intelligent. The other seven are all Irish immigrants, who were sent out here by the British Government, under the superintendence of Col. Gaskill. It is understood the rioters will be tried separately. The council for the defence is empowered, in a case of felony punishable with death, to peremptorily challenge 20 jurors for each man, so that in the event of the whole eleven being tried together, and the prisoners severing in their challenges, he would be allowed under the statute to challenge no less than 220, not to speak of those challenged for cause. The panel, therefore, would require to be almost inexhaustible. For this reason it is conjectured, each man will have a separate trial. They will be tried at St. Thomas.

Farmers' Insurance Companies.

To the Editor of THE CHRONICLE.

SIR,—I notice in your issue of the 8th instant that a Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Co. had been organized in the North Riding of this County with headquarters at Embro.

I am pleased to see that farmers are beginning to look into this matter of insurance against loss by fire.

There is a Company now doing business in the townships of East Nissouri and North Oxford, which has been organized about five years, and I was informed by one of the Directors that the expense had amounted to $6.70 on each $1,000 of risks for the five years. I have heard it remarked that this Company has been unusually fortunate, and to show that such is not the case, I will give a few figures from reports of Companies in the State of New York, where some Companies have been doing business on the co-operative plan since 1859. In the annual report of the Sanquoit Valley Farmers' Insurance Association for 1880, we find that the number of policies in force was 286 ; amount of risks, $483,205 ; losses during the year, none ; expenses during the year, $35. Fifth annual report of the Topkins Co. Fire Relief Association for the year ending May 21st, 1881, shows number of policies in force, 520 ; amount of risks, $1,032,011.75; total losses and expenses for year, $226.31 ; cost for year on $1,000, 20c. In a report presented to the New York State Grange at Rochester, Jan. 29th, 1880, we find the following Companies report :

Tompkins County cost	$0.64 on $1000	for 1 year
Ontario County cost	0 70	"	"
Livingston County	1.60	"	3 years
Seneca County	1.40	"	1 year
Wayne County	0.68	"	"
Chemung, Schuyler & Yates.	1.12	"	"
Chautauqua County	0.21	"	2 years

The report says further : "The report of the Insurance Commissioner of the State of Michigan, for the year 1878, shows 47 Companies carrying risks to the amount of $112,662,690, on which the total loss was $139,997.78. Many of these Companies took extra hazardous risks, such as mills and shops, yet their average cost of insurance for the year was $1.22 per $1,000. The Farmers' Mutual Insurance Company of Kalamazoo, Mich., report their average expenses for seventeen years to have been less than 12½ cents per $100 per year. Sixteen Mutual Companies of Ohio report having carried $9,000,000 of risks for the year ending November, 1879, at an average cost of less than 80 cents per $100. Twenty-two others report risks to the amount of $13,500,000, at a cost of 70 cents per $1,000. Nineteen other risks $13,000,000, cost 62 cents per $1,000."

A report was presented to the New York State Grange, Jan. 26th, 1881, in which we find twenty-five Companies report carrying risks to the amount of $20,716,028, at an average cost of less than 6¼ cents per $10a per year. The report concluded by saying, "It must be borne in mind that we now in clude twenty-five Companies, and the cost of organizing and supplies are included in these figures.

We have another report on insurance presented to the N. Y. State Grange, in January, 1882, from a number of Companies in this same is sixty, amount of risks $57,746,230, at a cost of $93,548.89 or $1.62 on each $1,000 for three years. I find in the report of the sixty Companies that the amount of risk carried by each, varies from $91,805 to $7,225,480, and that the cost varies from 25 cents per $1,000 to $6.80 per $1,000, for three years.

Now, Mr. Editor, if figures "don't lie" it is easy to see how the farmers of our County may save a great deal of money, and at the same time have their property insured in the very safest Companies. And I hope some of our leading farmers will take this matter in hand, and I know it will not be difficult to organize a good Company. If the South Riding will not as a whole enter the Association, Dereham and West Oxford might organize for the two Townships.

FARMER.

The Bible and Its Value.

PAPER VII.

Our paper last week referred to the Jews as the human medium through which the word of God has come to us, as against the notion that the Bible is only a Jewish book and having no higher origin. We will carry this idea forward a little farther before we dismiss it, and adduce two or three more points by way of evidence. Who could be a prouder people than the Jews were ? They even regarded the Gentiles as dogs in comparison with themselves. Now the Bible strongly denounces pride and haughtiness and enforces the grace of humility. The Jews were very intolerant. The Bible teaches forbearance. The Jewish religion was largely exclusive ; Bible religion was spiritual. The Jewish race is very exclusive. The Bible declares mankind to be of one blood, one family, in the bonds of a common brotherhood, and that God is no respecter of persons. It will therefore be seen that the insinuation or statement of the Sceptic, that the Bible is only a book of history in common with others, and is but a book of Jewish origin, is a very branny article and is not marketable in an enlightened age. Many strong minded men have wandered far away in the field of theological speculation, and when they could find no rest for the soles of their feet, they have been glad to come back again to the Bible as the ark of God's covenant. Take a single case for an example. The celebrated Joseph Barker held a long and learned controversy against Messrs. Sweabery, Beachville, Zion, Model—One change. Salford, West Oxford, Pipers—One change. Oxford Center, Oriel, Vandecars, Curries—Two men. Springford, Newroad, Newark, Millers, Salem, Zion—Two men. Otterville, Erbtown, Berkton Sunnerville, Norwich, Little Lake, Zion—Two men. Norwich—One change. Eastwood, Bethel, Innerkip, Cathcart, Woodbery Zion—Two men. Strathallan—No change. Richwood—Same. Washington—Same. Plattsville, Bright and Bethel—Two men. Princeton, Etons, Falkland, Bethel, Salem —

FARM AND DAIRY.

Cows for the Dairy.

Good tools do the best work; and good cows are necessary for success in the dairy. These are indispensable, because it costs no more to feed a cow that will produce 250 or 300 lbs. of butter in a year, than one that yields only 75 or 100 lbs. Good cows are costly no doubt—to buy, but they cost no more to rear than a poor one, and some poor ones will consume more food to merely live, than a good one requires to live and yield butter. It costs a good deal of money for a farmer to provide himself with a stock of good cows, if he has to buy them; simply because the farmer who has reared them is not willing to sell them for the price of poor cows. So that one who desires to have good cows must raise them and so make time answer in place of money. We have previously described some of the leading pure breeds of cattle, but as there are but very few of these comparatively, in existence, dairies cannot be stocked with them unless at a large cost of money, and it is necessary to look to the common native cattle for stock. These cattle are by no means a poor race, because they have sprung from the best stock originally and have been made up of a mixture of various breeds. It is very unfair to despise them because a few of the pure bred cows surpass them in value and product. It would be far better to try to improve these common cows by better breeding and good feeding and so raise them in value. At the present time the native stock produces nearly all the cheese and butter, both in the United States and Canada and if the proper means were taken to improve them there is no doubt they might be doubled in value.

The native stock is made up of a mixture of Ayrshires, Devons, Herefords and Durhams or short horns, which have been brought to this side of the ocean from Great Britain. It is reasonable to suppose that the cattle brought over were the best of their kind as they were for the greater part brought out by persons able to procure the best. But without constant selection of the best for breeding and without the best care and feeding the most valuable and productive stock will retrograde and become poor. It is not so difficult, however, to regain what is lost, when a good character is inheirited, as it is to raise up a race which never were of good character. Time is required as well as a right method, and the better the method the shorter the time will be. There are many instances in which the common stock have been greatly improved in a few generations, and a generation is two years. Ten or twelve years of patient werk may be required to double or treble the value of a herd of native cows, but it will pay to spend even that time, very well, because each generation improved pays its way and helps to make the next step easier. The way to do it is to select the best cows and save their calves. It is important to have these calves sired by as good a bull as can be found, and it is also important that the bulls reared should be from the best cows. There are a great many bulls of pure breeds whose services can be procured, and if farmers would only learn how profitable it would be to pay a liberal sum for the use of such an animal, the greatest difficulty in the way of improving the stock would be removed. But, as a rule, farmers cannot be brought to see this and will refuse to pay $5 or even less for a calf from a Jersey or Ayrshire bull, which might become a valuable cow, worth $25 more than her dam. A cow is worth less or more as her product may be less or more, and a cow that will yield 7 lbs of butter a week ought to be worth more than twice as much as one that yields 3 lbs. because the product is double and the calves of such a cow are more valuable than common ones. If this is true, then the calf would be cheap at the cost of $5 for the service of the sire. And almost in every locality pure bred bulls can be found and their services secured for $5 or less. For the dairy the Ayrshire or the Jersey should be chosen, and for butter alone the Jersey would be preferable, although there are many Ayrshires who equal the Jerseys as butter cows. In selecting a cow from which to rear calves, a well formed animal should be chosen, having a fine neat head, a thin neck, light forequarters, heavy deep hindquarters, a well formed udder, and a soft skin with a yellow colour. Such a cow will usually be a good milker and butter yielder, but if not her calves will probably make good cows and almost certainly if the bull is from a good cow. The rearing of the calf is an important part of the business. It should be well cared for and well fed. Good feeding tends to increase the appetite and the digestion, and a good feeder with a good digestion will turn its food into milk and butter with more profit than a spare feeder. It is a great mistake to grudge food to an animal. The best animals both for the dairy and for beef are good hearty eaters and it is their ability to turn food into useful products which gives them their larger value. And this habit and character are acquired by training from the first, It is here that the feeding comes to the help of the breeding which alone would be useless and is only the means by which the habit of good and profitable feeding is made permanent. Once this character is fixed it is continned by breeding, but unless it is encouraged and supported continually it will be lost again as it has been through scores of years of neglect. And it is thus that cows for the dairy may be produced and reared in course of time, with very little cost indeed.

Noxious Weeds and Diseases Infecting Fruit Trees.

Chap. 37, 47th Victoria, is an Act respecting noxious weeds and diseases affecting fruit trees and was passed last session of the Ontario Legislature. As some of its provisions are important, we give an epitome of them.

It shall be the duty of the owner or occupant of any land when and as often as necessary in each and every year as is sufficient to prevent the ripening of the seeds, to cut down or destroy Canada thistles, ox eye daisy, wild oats, rag weeds, and burdock, and all others noxious weeds, growing on his land, to which this Act may be extended by by-law of the municipality, and also to cut out and burn all the black knot found on plum or cherry trees, so often as it shall appear on such trees and cut down and bury any peach, nectarine, or other trees, on his land infected with the disease called the yellows, and to destroy all the fruit of the trees so infected.

The council of any municipality may extend the operation of the Act to any other weed or weeds, or to any other disease to which trees may be subject, and the council shall upon petition of fifty ratepayers appoint an inspector. It shall be the duty of such inspector to give notice to the owner or occupant of any land on which such noxious weeds are growing, requiring him to cut such down within ten days, and it shall be necessary for such inspector to give notice for the first time not later than 10th July in each year. In case a person neglects or refuses to comply with notice, then the inspector shall enter upon land and do what he required by the notice. Provision is however made when noxious weeds are in growing crops.

It shall be the duty of overseers of highways to see that the provisions of the Act are complied with and that the noxious weeds are cut down or destroyed at the proper times on their respective highways, such work to be performed as ordinary statute labour. If the inspector is notified in writing that yellows, or black knot, exist, it shall be the duty of the inspector to investigate into the matter of complaint, and proceed as authorized by the Act.

Any owner or occupant of any land who neglects or refuses to cut down and destroy noxious weeds, or who suffers any black knot, or keeps any peach or other trees infected with the yellows, shall be liable to a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $20.

Any person who knowingly sells or offers to sell any grass, clover, or other seed grain, in which there is seed of Canada thistles, or other noxious weeds shall for every such offence be fined.

Any person who offers for sale or shipment, or sells or ships, any fruit of trees infected with the yellows, shall be fined.

Every inspector, overseer, of highways, or other officer, who refuses or neglects to discharge the duties imposed on him by this Act, shall be liable to a fine of not less than $10, nor more than $20.

The Council of every municipality in Ontario shall require its inspector, overseer of highways, and other officers to faithfully discharge all their duties under this Act.

Notes.

A great many horses can work as well or better without shoes than they can with them. Before shoeing a young horse he should be tested awhile to see if shoeing is necessary. It is never certain that an untried horse will not kick, and, if unshod, his kicking will be much less dangerous to his attendant.

Dr. Lawes truly says: Animals and their products remove very little fertility from the soil; and fortunately as land becomes more impoverished, and population increases, the greater becomes the demand for milk, butter and meat.

Farmers should buy only from well known and respectable dealers, who value their reputation too much to sell grades for thoroughbreds.

A common sized Southdown sheep weighs 100 pounds, and a common cow 800. This makes eight sheep equal to one cow, which agrees very well with our experience in feeding good hay to both. Sheep, however, chew their food fine, digest it more thoroughly, will eat many things which a cow rejects, and can be kept at less expense for the same live weight.

Our farming classes must take a more decided interest in the selection of proper rulers, both in State and nation. Having the numercial power the farmers may dictate the policy of this country through their chosen representatives, yet it seems much easier to neglect this important function of citizenship and then croak and lament over the prevailing extravagance and unequal taxation. The farming classes will never receive respectful hearing, much less favorable legislation, unless they unite in the exercise of their right and prerogative.

Cows that are watered from stagnant ponds or from wells in the barnyard will give milk more or less tainted, and from which it is impossible to make the best butter. So large a part of milk is water, that the drink of the cow is of quite as much importance as her food.

It is a good plan to make a thorough cleaning out of corn cribs and granaries at least once a year, in order to get rid of rats and mice. If every vestige is removed the new crop will suffer much less loss than by usual careless methods. Wheat kept for years in granaries is liable to be infested by the weevil, which is very destructive.

It makes little difference whether clover seed is sown early or late. It will not grow until the temperature of the air is nearly or quite fifty above zero. In wet weather the seed swells a little, then shrinks back under a cold snap, and with very early seeding this process is sometimes repeated several times before growth fairly begins. Delaying clover seeding until the land can be harrowed is as sure a way to insure a catch as we know of, besides helping the Winter grain with which clover seed is commonly sown.

Some poulterers affirm that fowls cannot be fed too much, that liberal feeding is essential to large egg production. It depends somewhat on the way the fowls are fed and the breed. The Asiatic varieties used to be excited to exercise, and unless they get it in securing their food they will become too lazy and fat to lay eggs. The non-sitting varieties can hardly be fed too much for profit, especially if wheat be the staple grain used. No matter how low wheat may go in the market, it is always worth a dollar or more per bushel to feed to laying hens.

There is hardly any point in the management of dairy cows of more importance than that of having them regularly fed. If there is one thing on earth that a cow remembers better than another it is the hour that her feed is due. If she has a good normal appetite she will grow restless and anxious as the hour approaches, and this state of mind is said to be very injurious upon the quality of the milk. If they are loose, under such circumstances, they are certain to begin hooking one another. It is a very bad habit for hands to get into, and keeping regular hours should be impressed upon them. When one man gets behind it is certain to delay every other man on the place where there is customary system in vogue; if the feeding is delayed the milking must be also, and that sets back the hour for setting away the milk and washing the utensils, and so the first delay works mischief all round.

To assist nature most effectually in her efforts to throw off or resist serious disease, it is essential that an impulse should be given to functions which growing ill health suspends or weakens, namely, the action of the bowels, bilious secretion, and digestion. Oftentimes, though this is impracticable by the use of ordinary remedies, it proves an easy task when Northrop & Lyman's Vegetable Discovery and Dyspeptic Cure is resorted to.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Roast Beef and Yorkshire Pudding.

These famous and appetizing dishes were made the subject of a lecture by Miss Parloa. The lady took a sirloin roast, from which she cut the suet, leaving the fat to improve the flavor. She wiped it dry with a towel, and then dredged it on all sides with salt pepper and flour, in the order named. On the bottom of the baking pan she laid a rack to support the meat, explaining that roast meat should never be laid directly upon the pan. The bottom of the pan was lightly covered with flour and salt and pepper, the meat laid on the rack, and set in a very hot oven for a few moments, to brown the flour in the pan, then add enough hot water to cover the bottom. In ten minutes baste the meat with the gravy, dredge with salt, pepper and flour, and repeat this every fifteen minutes turning the meat as it becomes brown. The heat should be very great at first to harden the albumen and thus prevent the escape of the juices of the meat. After it is once crusted, the heat can be diminished. The salt draws out the juices of the meat, but the flour forms a paste which keeps.

With this roast Miss Parloa served a Yorkshire pudding, prepared as follows; Take one pint of milk, two-thirds cupful of flour, three eggs, and a scant teaspoon of salt. Beat the eggs very light, add the salt and milk, pour half a cupful of the mixture on the flour, beat till perfectly smooth then add the remainder. Take up the meat, pour off the gravy and pour in the batter, return the meat and bake forty-five minutes. The pudding is to be served, hot, with the meat.

A Yorkshire pudding may be made with any roast meat except pork, a shoulder or a leg of mutton does very well with it.

Useful Hints.

"Any housekeeper can prove the honesty of her grocer or his butter by melting it. Pure butter melted produces a pure limpid, golden oil, and it retains the butter flavor. Melt oleomargarine and the oil smells like tallow and looks like tallow, and a scum rises to the surface. Butterine is a mixture of dairy butter and fats. Melt that and the butter oil will rise to the top. Pour this off and you will find the fat at the bottom, whitish in color and giving off a disagreeable smell."

Celery seed is a great addition to the filling for stuffed eggs. A little goes a great way, too.

It is said by one who has tried it that if you forget to put dried corn in water to soak all night, steaming it for two hours will soften it much more than boiling for the same length of time, and it will retain its sweetness and distinctive flavor better also.

Last summer's cotton stockings that are streaked or faded can be colored and made to look like new by using some of the patent dyes which come in packages, and which are a boon to the economicel woman who wishes to have her children look neat and fresh.

An appetizing sauce for meat of any kind, or for fish, is made of two tablespoonfuls of grated horse-radish, one of made mustard, half a teaspoonful of salt, the same quantity of sugar with vinegar enough to cover it. The quantity, of course, may be increased, but these proportions should be observed.

Fresh herrings are a popular dish at this time of year with many cooks, but no one has eaten then at their best if they are fried. They should be boiled, and be served with nice sauce, made of melted butter with a little sprinkling of flour, and with parsley or olives chopped and put in. Pour this over the fish.

An excellent meat sauce is made of one pint of vinegar, two spoonfuls of mustard seed, two of horse-radish grated, two small onions cut in fine bits, a teaspoonful of red pepper, and a little salt. Put this in a glass can and set it away for a week or two, and it will be very well prepared for the table. If any scum rises to the top skim it all off before pouring out the sauce.

Very rich fritters are made of one and one-half pints of flour, the yolks of eggs, two small teaspoonfuls of baking powder, butter the size of a large hickory nut, suit to taste, with enough milk to make a thick batter; fry in lard that is heated to the boiling point. A rule for plainer ones may be wished for also. Two eggs, one cup of sweet milk, a little salt, and flour enough to make a stiff batter. These are nice with maple syrup.

Custard made in this way is delicious for the filling of a layer cake:—Heat a coffee cup of sweet milk in a bright tin basin, beat one egg very light, and beat with it until smooth one heaping teaspoonful of flour, and sugar to suit the taste; when the milk is hot stir the flour, eggs, etc., into it; it will thicken in a very few minutes. Take it from the fire and flavor with lemon; if you choose, blanch some almonds, cut them in three or four pieces and stir into custard.

It is too early to think of putting cotton stockings on the children, and yet it is possible that in many cases this must be done, or new woollen ones must be bought; this you may not care to do, so I will tell you of a way by which the old ones may be repaired. The kness are worn out of course, so cut the worn part off, and piece the stocking up with parts of other worn stockings, or with a strip of stockinette. If you make a fine seam, and sew it carefully so that it is smooth, it will not rub or hurt the tender flesh of the smallest child.

Potatoe rolls for breakfast are make in this way: Boil six good-sized potatoes with their jackets on, take them out with a skimmer, drain them, and squeeze them with a towel to insure their being mealy and dry, then remove the skin, mash them until perfectly free from lumps, add a tablespoonful of butter, the yolks of three eggs, a pint of sweet milk, and a tablespoonful of yeast should be beaten in with them when they are cool enough so that the yeast will not be in danger of being scalded. Beat in just enough flour to make a stiff dough; when this rises make in the shape of small cakes, let them rise the same as biscuit, bake a delicate brown. These are nice for breakfast or supper.

There comes a time in every little girl's life when she is seized with a longing to cook; by all means indulge her. Do not wait until she is a young lady and then send her to a cooking-school to learn how to make a pudding or cake—what she might have learned in the kitchen at home, and been happy in learning. A neighbour of mine who put this theory in practice presented me with a plate of cookies made by her daughter of five; they would have been creditable to a much older cook. The child faithfully and delightedly followed her mother's instructions. If some older member of the family superintends but does not lend a helping hand, a good deal of valuable knowledge will be acquired in this way. Let them begin with something very simple; try, for instance, this rule for crackers:—To three pints of flour put one teaspoonful of soda, dissolved in sour milk; melt a teaspoonful of butter, or butter and lard mixed: make the dough very stiff; roll it very thin; bake slowly.

TEMPERANCE.

"Your Health Sir."

BY REV. JOHN HALL, D. D. N. Y.

I know several permanent invalids, whose steady decline kept pace with the repetitions of the good wishes of their friends. Like dreams, their benedictions went "by contraries." The way of it was this: One held up a glass appropriately filled, and said, "Your health, sir," and then drank its contents. Of course, the compliments had to be returned. The gentleman had many friends. They had often to be civil, to say, "Your health, sir," in the same way, and the friendship grew warmer and more demonstrative, according to a common law of our nature that feeling is intensified by expression. It certainly is by expression of this kind. It has often gone into complete oblivion of self, even of the presence of others, even of the decencies of life.

For the first sixteen years of my life "moderately" conversant with his benevolent attention. Then I came to be resident in the house of a most hospitable man, all whose guests showed concern about his "health." Without any promise, but on good advice, I left his "health" to take care of itself. There were frequent dinner parties. The lady of the house appreciated my difficulty, and practised a little "pious fraud" for me. I had a jam and water which looked so like the medicines the others took for the host's health as to prevent any conspicuous awkwardness. Ah me! the results to them were not salutary. Then I came under the influence of one of the best Irishmen I ever knew, a man whose visit to America made him known. His portrait looks down on me as I write. Dr. Edgar opposed the drinking of all "intoxicating liquors," in which he did not put wine, though he did not drink it except for "medicinal or sacramental purposes." On this line I moved until I became a minister with a large congregation, including many well-to-do country people. They came into town on market days, had little solid food, were cold or hot as the case might be, and little tired, or had nothing to do, or wanted to be civil, or felt bound to drink something for the benefit of the house where they put up their carts, and so they say "Your health" to one another until they were the worse for it.

To my remonstrances they would reply: "Well, you rich ones can drink wine; we are not rich, and we take what we can buy." Then it was that I came to say: "Well, I don't think there is bad in wine, but I can do without it; and to make my advice to you of more use I'll stop it." On this plan I have gone on for thirty years. No one has said to me. "Your health, sir;" and unlike the friends mentioned in the beginning, I have been for the most part vulgarly well all the time.

A Bold Sheep.

Philadelphia press.

In the center of a rat pit in this city Thursday night stood a stout, short legged sheep, with his neck encircled by a brass collar and his black nose sheathed in a kid muzzle. His name was Brum, and he was there to kill rats on a wager made by his owner and trainer, "Stone" McAlister. Between 50 and 60 spectators were present. Last fall McAlister who is a sporting butcher, found three dead rats in Brum's pen. A day or two later he saw the sheep kill a rat. That act saved Brum from being converted into chops. His owner resolved to train him. Under training Brum improved so rapidly that McAlister made five matches in which the sheep was to kill rats against time. The first match came off last night, McAlister wagering $100 that the sheep would take the lives of 10 rats in 60 minutes. In the betting the odds were against the sheep, and McAlister and two or three of friends made wagers right and left, and at 9 o'clock the 10 rats were emptied out of cages into the pit. The rats scampered about the pit, the referee called time and McAlister let go of Brum and vaulted into the pit, leaving him muzzled. "The muzzle! The muzzle! Take off the muzzle, Stone!" shouted half a dozen men.

"He don't kill 'em with his mouth," replied Mr. McAlister seating himself complacently on the railing of the pit, and adding: "That sheep'll fool you all." So it proved. The sheep, without paying the slightest attention to the crowd, made two leaps to the corner of the pit in which a dozen or more rats huddled. Then raising himself on his hind legs, he brought the carefully sharpened hoofs of his fore feet down like a flash in the pile of rats. This act was repeated five times in almost as many seconds, the dead bodies of eight rats lay on the floor. Racing about Brum gave a shrill blast and darted across the pit to another nest of rats. There he repeated the stamping, and strewed the pit with dead rodents. At the end of nine minutes there were but thirteen rats alive in the pit. These Brum chased with the pretinacity and determination of a bulldog, and killed them one by one. The fortieth rat was slaughtered in exactly 34 minutes from the time Brum was loosed. Several times during the match rats fastened their teeth in the leather muzzle, but the sheep easily shook them off.

WASN'T A LIAR.

Why the Squatter Objected to His Name—A Bad Witness.

'What is your name?' asked the United States Attorney of an old squatter who had been summoned before the court as a witness.

'Which name, Squire?'

'Your right name, of course.'

'I ain't got none.'

'What, you don't mean to say that you haven't got a name.'

'Oh, no, sir.'

'This summous says that your name is Ananias Peters. Is that so?'

'Reckin' it is.'

'Thought you didn't have a right name?'

'I ain't.'

'Look here, sir. Don't you trifle with this court. Your prevarication will not be tolerated here. Why did you say that Ananias Peters was not your right name?'

"'Cause it wasn't right to name a boy Ananias, therefore it ain't a right name. The Bible, I b'lieve, sorter called Ananias a liar.'

'Which,' interposed the judge 'make it peculiarly appicable to your case.'

'Look-a-here, jedge, I don't want to progic with you, 'case you've got the upper hand of me, but I don't want you to hit me with the Bible. A man's in a bad enough fix when yer fling the law at him, but when yer fling the law an' gospil both, he ain't got no show.'

'Where do you live?' asked the attorney.

'At home.'

'But where's your home?'

'In the neighborhood o' whar I live.'

The judge turned away to conceal a smile, and the attorney, giving the 'squatter' a look of extreme severity, said: 'Do you know where you are, sir?'

'Yes, sir, I'm here.'

'You won't be here much longer unless you answer my questions.'

'I am answerin' your questions, 'squire. Go on with your rat killin'.'

'Where were you when Mr. Jasen, the defendant, cut timber from the government land?'

'When did he do the cuttin'?'

'That's what I want to find out. I think it was sometime in October.'

'Wal, some time in October I was in one place an' sometimes in another.'

'Did you ever see him cutting government timber?'

'I believe I did.'

'When?'

'Durin' the war when he was in the army?'

'None of your foolishness now. Didn't you come along the road one day in October and talk to the defendant while he was chopping down a tree?'

'No, sir.'

'Remember that you are under oath. So you didn't see him while he was chopping down a tree?'

'Didn't say that, 'squire, fur I did see chopping down a tree?'

'Did you stop and talk to him?'

'Yes, sir.'

'Thought you said you didn't stop and talk to him?'

'Didn't say it.'

'You did.'

'Didn't say it.'

'What did you say?'

'Said I didn't talk to him while he was choppin', fur when I came up an' spoke, he quit choppin'. Ef thar's anything else you wanter know, fire away.'

VITAL QUESTIONS!!
Ask the most eminent physician
Of any school, what is the best thing in the world for quieting and allaying all irritation of the nerves and curing all forms of nervous complaints, giving natural, childlike refreshing sleep always?
And they will tell you unhesitatingly
"Some form of Hops!"
CHAPTER I
Ask any or all of the most eminent physicians:
"What is the best and only remedy that can be relied on to cure all diseases of the kidneys and urinary organs; such as Bright's disease, diabetes, retention or inability to retain urine, and all the diseases and ailments peculiar to Women"—
"And they will tell you explicitly and emphatically "Buchu."
Ask the same physicians
"What is the most reliable and surest cure for all liver diseases or dyspepsia; constipation, indigestion, biliousness, malarial fever, ague, &c." and they will tell you:
Mandrake! or Dandelion!"
Hence, when these remedies are combined with others equally valuable
And compounded into Hop Bitters, such a wonderful and mysterious curative power is developed which is so varied in its operations that no disease or ill health can possibly exist or resist its power, and yet it is Harmless for the most frail woman, weakest invalid or smallest child to use.
CHAPTER II.

TRANSCRIPTS FROM NATURE.

THE GIANT BEECH.

A million little beech leaves sway
In the warm wind above me here;
A speckled mavis sings quite near,
The cuckoo calls from far away,
But only beech leaves can I see,
Trembling and tossing carelessly—

A world of green lost in the fair
Surrounding space of azure air.

OLD FISHER BOAT.

Bright as a burnished shield, the sea
In calm, in moveless peace doth sleep,
Only the tide's faint ripples creep
Along the black sands hushfully,
Till now they lap the old worn boat
That nevermore on them will float.

A year ago a wild storm made
The sands a grave where it was laid.

A HERRING SHOAL, WEST HIGHLANDS.

Between dark hills on either side,
The salt sea-loch runs for a mile;
And now, suncharmed to a smile,
Gleams bright its flowing, frothing tide.
But, lo! each wave to silver turns,
In dazzling fire the whole loch burns.

Millions of herring dart and splash,
Each one a living lightning-flash.

An Ambitious Woman.

BY EDGAR FAWCETT.

She herself was not aware of the loveless chill that touched every word she had just spoken. There was something absolutely matter-of-fact in her tones; they rang with a kind of commercial loudness. It was almost as though she were proposing a mercantile truce between man and man.

Hollister visibly winced, and slowly rose from the table. Every sentence that she had uttered had fallen into his very soul. His pride was alive, and keenly so. But he was not at all angry; he felt too miserably saddened for that.

"Claire," he said, "we had best not talk of being friends. If I spoke to you harshly last night, I am sorry. I don't quite recollect just what I did say. Of course we must have a serious talk of how we are to live in the future. But not now, if you please—not now. Your luncheon party will go off all properly enough. Things are not so bad as that. I shall be away until evening. Perhaps when I come home again we can have our talk."

Claire looked at him with hard, bright eyes. She assured herself that he had causelessly repulsed her. Even allowing the wrong that she had done him of marrying him without love, why should he now repel, by this self-contained austerity, an advance which, in her egotistic misery, she believed to be a sincere and spontaneous one? She was wholly unaware of her own unfortunate demeanor; it seemed to her that she had done her best; she had tried to conciliate, to appease, to mollify. Was not her note to Holdwin now in the pocket of her gown? Was not that note a defense of Hollister's own honor as of hers? She made the distinctly feminine error, while she rapidly surveyed the present contingency, of taking for granted that her husband possessed some obscure and mesmeric intuition regarding this same unseen piece of writing.

"Oh, very well," she replied, with an actually wounded manner; "you may do just as you please. I might have resented the unjust and horrible thing you said to me last evening, but I did not. I did not because, as I told you, I thought it best for us to be friends once again."

"Friends." He repeated the word with a harsh fragment of laughter. His changed face took another speedy change; it grew sombre and forbidding. "You and I, Claire, can never be friends. While we live together hereafter I'm afraid it must only be as strangers."

"Strangers!" she repeated, haughtily and offendedly.

"Yes! You know why. He walked toward the tapestried door of the dining room, and flung one of its curtains aside, holding it thus while he stood on the threshold and looked back at her. "You yourself make the reason. I'll do all I can. I don't know of any unjust or horrible thing that I said last evening. I only know that you are and have been my wife in name alone."

He had forgotten his speech regarding Goldwin. He had never had any suspicion, however remote, that she had transgressed her wifely vows. He simply felt that she had never loved him, and that she married him for place and promotion in a worldly sense; that, and no more.

The draperies at the door at once shrouded his departing figure. Claire stood quite still, watching the agitated folds settle themselves into rest. "He meant that Goldwin is my lover," she told herself. "What else could he possibly have meant?"

She had sworn half-formed intent of hurrying after him and venting her indignation in no weak terms. Best if she had done so; for he might then have explained away, with surprise and perhaps contrition, the fatal blunder that she had made. But pride soon came, with its vetoing interference. She did not stir until she heard the outer door close after him. Then, knowing that he was gone, she let pride lay its gall on her hurt, and dull her mind to the sense of what wrong she had inflicted on him by the permitted mockery of their marriage.

"He has no reason to judge so vilely of me," sped her thoughts. "His approval of that intimacy was clearly implied, however tacit. What must our lives together now become? He has brought a shameful charge against me; if I loved him I could doubtless pardon him; love will pardon so much. But as it is, there must always remain a breach between us. A continuance of our present brilliant affluence might bridge it over. The distractions and pleasures of wealth, fashion, supremacy, would make it less and less apparent to both; but poverty, and perhaps even hardship as well,—how should these fail to mercilessly widen it?"

Everything looked black, threatening, and miserable to Claire as she began to attire herself for the great lunch. Her maid had just finished dressing her hair, when a note was handed them.

It was from Mrs. Van Horn. Very brief and entirely courteous, it expressed regret that a sudden sick headache would prevent her from numbering herself among Claire's favored guests that morning. "The first token of my altered fortunes," she thought, with a pang that was like a stab. "This woman was the last to come under my ensign; she is the first to desert it."

She recalled Thurston's words to her at the opera on the previous night. Surely there was some grave discrepancy between these and the acts of his sister. As for the headache, that was of course transparent sham. If this lofty lady had wanted to deceive, she might have done so more plausibly. But perhaps she did not care whether or no her excuse looked genuine. Rats leave a falling house. That was all the letter meant. Claire could have thrown it down upon the floor and stamped on it. In reality, she tossed it with seeming unconcern into the fire, and gave a quiet order to Marie which she wished taken directly to the butler, regarding the reduced number of her coming guests.

When Marie re-entered the apartment, she bore a card. It was the card of Thurston. On it were written in pencil these words: "I beg that you will see me for a few moments, if you can possibly manage."

She at once went down and received him. He looked fixedly in her face for a slight while, after they had seated themselves. He knew all that had happened, and he understood just how savage and calamitous must seem to her the blows from which she was now suffering. He read excitement and even despair in every line of her features, though he clearly perceived that both were held under a determined repression.

"She means not to let herself go one inch," he decided. "If she did she would break down altogether. She has wound herself up to a certain pitch. She will keep just this way for hours yet. She will keep so—if nothing strange and unforeseen should happen."

A deep and vital pity pierced him while he watched her. He loved her, and his love made him unreasonably lenient. A sacred sadness invested her, for his eyes, in this hour of her misfortune and overthrow. He forgot how blameworthy she had been, and could remember only that destiny would soon hurl in the dust the crown that she had worn with so much grace and grandeur.

"Did you come to speak of my—my trouble?" she said, her lip quivering for an instand and no more.

"No," he replied. "But since you speak of it, is all chance of recovery gone? May not matters right themselves somehow.

She shook her head in quick negative. "I think not. He has lost everything—or nearly that." She broke into a smile, which had for her companion only the brightness one might see in tears. "I suppose it seems to you like a punishment—a retribution." Her gaze dwelt on him with a mournful kind of pleasantry. It was like the spirit of Comedy slipping her gay mask a little down, and showing beneath it a glimpse of pallor and fatigue.

"But do not let us talk of that. You wanted to talk of something else. What was it? your sister's refusal, at the eleventh hour, to come to my lunch?"

"Has she refused?"

"She has a sick headache," returned Claire, with a bit of joyless laughter—the saddest he had ever heard leave her lips. "I don't doubt our disreputable downfall has given it to her. Don't make excuses for her; she is quite right to have her headache. It's a fastidious perogative, you know. I shan't require a physician's certificate. I only hope that all the others will be cruel in just as civil a manner."

The tragic bitterness of these words, though they were quietly enough uttered, stung Thurston to the quick. When a man loved as he loved, compassion waits the ready vassal of tenderness. He had a momentary feeling of hostility against an elusive, disembodied foe—against circumstance itself, so to speak, for having wrought discord in a life that was meant to hold nothing but melody.

He swiftly decided not to tell the real truth regarding his sister. "I would not concern myself with Cornelia's absence," he said, "Another matter, of much more import, must be brought to your notice. It is then settled that Cornelia remains away. I did not know that she would do so. She made no mention of it during our interview last night."

"Her headache had not arrived. Neither had the morning papers, which said such hard things of my husband."

"As you will. Let all that pass. I wish to speak of a lady who will almost certainly be present at your entertainment to-day. I mean Sylvia Lee. Don't ask me why I warn you against her, for I can't give you any lucid reasons. She intends some mischief. I suspected it last night from something my sister let fall, and I visited Mrs. Lee this morning with a most detective purpose. I gained no clew, and yet my suspicions were by no means lulled. I have never liked Sylvia; we are related, but she has always struck me as an abhorrent kind of creature, bristling with artifice, destitute of nearly all morale, capable of the worst cunning, equipped with the most subtle resources of treachery. Be on your guard against her to-day. This sounds mysterious — melodramatic, if you will; but she has some snare laid for you, some petty, but perhaps ugly revenge. You know why I use that last word. She has wanted to marry Goldwin for years. She isn't above the grossest, most unscrupulous hatred. She told me that she didn't believe in your husband's ruin, and that a few more days would see him on his feet again. This makes me all the more convinced that she will not put her little sharpened dagger back into its sheath. She has hatched some sort of horrid plot. Thwart it if you can. I wish I could be here to help you."

Claire had grown very pale, but her eyes sparkled vividly. "I am your debtor for these tidings," she said. She drew a deep breath, and he surmised that under the soft curve of her joined lips she had for a brief moment set her teeth closely together. "I thought the lunch would be a hard ordeal, even as matters stood," she went on, "and that I would need my best nerve and courage to get through it all right, with proper coolness and dignity. But now the task looks far less easy. Still, I shan't flinch. I wish you were to be here; but that is not possible."

Just then a clock on the opposite mantel gave one little silver stroke that told it was half-past twelve. Claire rose as she heard the sound. "I must leave you now," she pursued. "I have only an hour left for my toilette, and I shall need it all." She threw back her head, and a dreary smile gleamed and fled all along her lips. "I mean to meet all these grand ladies without one sign of defeat. I shan't wear my heart on my sleeve. This lunch was to have been my crowning triumph. It proves my funeral feast in its way, but they shan't find me playing chief-mourner. I intend to die game, as the phrase is." She gave a slight shudder, drooping her eyes. "It will be as though I stood in a house whose walls might crumble all about me at any moment—as if I could hear the crack of plaster and the creak of beams. But I shan't run away; I shall stand my ground very firmly, depend on it, until the bitter end. When the crash comes nobody will be buried in the ruins but myself—that is certain, is it not?"

Here her joyless laugh again sounded, and Thurston, swayed by an irresistible mood, caught one of her hands, pressing it hard within his own.

"You shall not be buried in the ruins," he exclaimed. "Take my word for it, you shall not! It will at only be the beginning of a new and better life. You shall have learned a hard, yet salutary lesson—that—and nothing more."

She shook her head, meeting his earnest eyes. "You are my good genius," she said. "It is too bad you have not had more power over me."

"Who is your evil genius?" he asked, with slower tones, while she drew her hand from his.

"Myself," she answered. "I am quite willing to concede it." . . . She appeared to muse for a little while. "I shall have one true friend here to-day," she soon continued. "I mean Mrs. Diggs. She is loyal to me; she would do almost anything I should ask. You don't like her, or so she tells me, but I hope you will like her better than your other cousin, Mrs. Lee."

"I respect her far more. I have never doubted her goodness. But she gives me nerves, as the French say. She is at such a perpetual gallop; if she would only break into a trot, sometimes, it would be like anybody else's walk. . . . You think you can trust her as an ally to-day?"

"Implicitly. She has promised to come early, too—before the others, you know." . . . Claire locked the fingers of both hands together, and held them so that the palms were bent downward. The weary smile again touched her lips and vanished. "What a day it is to be! And what a day it might have been!" She held out her hand to him, after that. Good-by. With all my heart I thank you! You have done all that you could do."

He did not promptly reply. He was thinking whether he had really done all that he could do. . . . And this thought followed him hauntingly as he left Claire to meet whatever catastrophe fate had in store for her.

Mrs. Diggs kept her promise, and was shown into Claire's dressing-room a good quarter of an hour before the other guests were due. The lady started on seeing her friend, whose toilette was now completed, and whose robe, worn for the first time, was of a regal and unique beauty. It was chiefly of white velvet, whose trailing heaviness blent with purple lengths of the same lustreless and sculpturesque fabric. The white prevailed, but the purple was richly manifest. In her hair she wore aigrettes of sapphires and amethysts shaped to resemble pansies, and while the sleeves were cut short enough to show either arm from wrist almost to elbow, and permit of bracelets that were two circles of jewels wrought in semblance of the same flower and with the same blue and lilac gems, her bust and throat were clad in one cloud of rare, filmy laces, from which her delicate head rose with a stately yet aerial grace. Excitement had put rosy tints in either cheek; the jewels that she wore had no sweeter splendor than her eyes, and yet both by color and glow in a certain way aptly matched them. A gear of velvet is dangerous to women in whom exuberance of figure has the least assertive rule. Velvet is the sworn enemy of embonpoint. But Claire's figure was of such supple and flexile slenderness that the weight and volume of this apparel made her light step and airy contour win a new charm and a new vivacity.

"It is all perfect—quite perfect," said Mrs. Diggs, after taking a rapid survey of Claire's attire. "But, my dear are you perfectly sure that" . . .

"Sure of what?" Claire asked, as her friend hesitated.

"Well . . . that it is just in good taste, don't you know? I mean, under the circumstances."

"What circumstances?" she exclaimed, putting the question as though she did not wish it answered, and moving a few paces away with an air of great pride. "I intend to fall gloriously. The end has come; the fight is lost; but I shan't make a tame surrender—not I! They shall see me at my best to-day, in looks, in speech, in manner. I'm glad you like my dress; I want it to be something memorable."

"You say that with a kind of bravado, Claire. There's a bitter ring to your mirth. Oh, I'm so sorry for you! That lovely dress hides an aching heart. You will suffer, poor child. This lunch will be a positive torture to you."

A moment after these words were spoken, Claire was close to Mrs. Diggs' side, holding one of her hands with firm pressure.

"You don't know how much of a torture it must be," she said, "and for what reason." She immediately repeated all that Thurston had told her. When she had finished, Mrs. Diggs was in a high state of perturbation.

"I haven't a doubt that Beverley is right!" she exclaimed. "If there was any plot Cornelia Van Horn was in it, too, and her brother has made her throw away her weapons. But Sylvia Lee intends to deal the blow alone . . . What can it be? I'm at my wit's end to guess. There's but one thing to do—keep a continual watch upon her. Claire, can you be, by any chance, in that woman's power?"

"Her power?" faltered Claire. . . . "I hope not," she said. . . . "I know not," she said, as the full sense of Mrs. Diggs' question struck her, and using a tone that was one of surprised affront.

"Now, don't be offended, my dear. I merely meant that Sylvia isn't a bit too good to magnify some slight imprudence, or twist and turn it until she had got it dangerously like an actual crime. . . . But mon dieu, mon Dieu. After all, Beverley's fears may be groundless. With all my heart I hope they are!"

Not long afterward Claire was receiving her guests. All the great ladies came, except, of course, Mrs. Van Horn. The last arrival was that of Mrs. Lee. She contrived to make her entrance a very conspicuous one. She was dressed with even more fantastic oddity than usual, and she spoke in so shrill and peculiar a voice that she had not been in the drawing-room more than five minutes before marked and universal attention was directed upon her.

"Sylvia is in a very singular state of excitement," Mrs. Diggs murmured to Claire. "I know her well. That slow drawl of hers has entirely gone. She acts to me as if she were on the verge of hysteria. I don't know whether you can see her hand tremble as it snook yours, but I thought that I plainly saw it tremble. Just watch her, now, while she talks with Mrs. Vanvelsor. She has a little crimson dot in each of her cheeks, and she is usually quite pale, you know. There's something in the wind—Beverley was right."

"Her place at the table is rather distant from mine," said Claire, with a scornful, transitory curl of the lip. "So there is no danger of her putting a pinch of arsenic into my wine-glass."

"You are not nervous, then? I am. I don't know just why, but I am."

"Nervous?" Claire softly echoed. "No, not at all, now. I've other more important things to think of. What could she do, after all? Let her attempt any folly; it would only recoil on herself. . . . Ah, my friend, I'm afraid I'm past being injured. This is my finale. I want it to prove a grand one."

"It will, Claire. They have all come, as you see. They have met you with perfect cordiality, and you have received them with every bit of your accustomed grace. I dare say that some of them are stunned with amazement; they no doubt expected to find you shivering and colorless."

The repast was magnificent. There were more than thirty ladies present, and these, all brilliantly attired and some of striking personal beauty, made the prodigal array of flowers, the admirable service of many delicious viands, and the soft music pealing from the near hall just loudly enough not to drown conversation while it filled pauses, produce an effect where the most unrestrained hospitality was mingled with a faultless refinement.

Claire's spirit seemed to rise as the decorous yet lavish banquet proceeded. Her laugh now and then rang out clear and sweet, while she addressed this or that lady, at various distances from where she herself sat. Mrs. Diggs, whose place was next her own, observed it all with secret wonder. She alone knew the bleeding pride, the balked aspiration, the thwarted yearning, which this pathetic and fictitious buoyancy hid. It was a defiance, and yet how skilled and radiant a one! Could you blame the woman who knew how to bloom and sparkle like this, for loving the world where such dainty eminence was envied and prized? Was there not a touch of genius in her pitiable yet dauntless masquerade? Who else could have played the same part with the same deft security, and in the very teeth of failure and dethronement?

Claire's gayety and self-possession made more than one of her guests lose faith in the tale of her husband's ruin. They were all women of the world, and they all had the tact and breeding to perceive that their hostess, now if ever, merited their best courtesy. They could all have staid away at the last moment; Mrs. Van Horn held no exclusive claim to the possession of her headache; its right to appropriation belonged elsewhere. But they had not availed themselves of it; they had chosen to sit at Claire's board, to break her delicate bread. Hence they owed her their allegiance to-day, even if to-morrow they should find expediency in its harshness opposite. But it now appeared to them as if she were refuting the wide-spread rumor of her husband's misfortunes; her own equipoise and scintillance bespoke this no less than the irreproachable chic of the entertainment to which she had bidden them.

Mrs. Lee was not very far away from Claire, and yet the latter never addressed or seemed to notice her. But Mrs. Diggs noticed her; she indeed maintained a vigilant, though repressed, watchfulness.

"You have quieted her," she found a chance to murmur in Claire's ear, sure that the indefinite nature of the pronoun would not be misunderstood. "She is still looking excited and queer, but she has almost relapsed into silence. Perhaps she really wanted to poison you, and feels hurt at the lost opportunity." Mrs. Diggs had had several sips of good wine, and felt her anxiety lessened; her jocose ebullition was the result of steadied nerves. "I never saw you so spirituelle, Claire," she went on. "You have said at least eight delicious things. I have them all mentally booked, my dear. When we are next alone together I will remind you of them."

"Pray don't," Claire answered, putting the words into a still lower aside than her friend's. "I shall have hard enough work to forget, then. I shall want only to forget, too."

She had just finished this faint-spoken sentence when one of the servants handed her a note. As she glanced at its superscription the thought passed through her mind that it might be some dire and alarming message from her husband. But the next instant a flash of recollection assailed her. She remembered the handwriting—or, at least, in this festive and distracting environment, she more than half believed that she did so.

Her hands, while she swiftly tore open the envelope, were dropped upon her lap. She read several lines of a note, and then crushed it, quickly and covertly. As her eyes met those of Mrs. Diggs she had a sense that she was becoming ghastly pale.

"What is it?" whispered her friend.

"Oh, nothing," she afterward remembered saying. The servant was still close at her elbow. She turned her head toward him.

"Let her wait," she said. "Tell her that I will see her quite soon."

The whole affair had been very rapid of occurrence. No one present had given a sign of having observed it.

"If I had only not been so pale," she thought.

The paper was still clutched in her left hand, and she had thrust this halfway beneath the table-cover. With her right hand she began to make a play of eating something from the plate before her, as she addressed the lady on her other side. What she said must have been something very gracious and pleasant, for the lady smiled and answered affably, while the servants glided, the music sounded, the delightful feast progressed. Everything had grown dim and whirling to Claire. And yet she had already realized perfectly that Mrs. Lee was striking her blow. It had come, sudden, cruel, direct. Her blurred mind, her weakened and chilling body, did not leave that one fact any the less clear. She understood just what it was, why it was, and whence it was.

The note had been from her mother. It was half illiterate invective, half threatening rebuke. Its writer waited outside and demanded to see her. "If you don't come," the ill-shaped writing ran, "I will come to you." Claire knew that this thing had been Mrs. Lee's work as well as if a thousand witnesses had averred it. The missive contained no mention of Mrs. Lee, but she nevertheless had her certainty.

"I must go," she told herself. "I must go and meet her. Can I go? Can I walk, feeling as I do? Should I not fall if I tried?"

She always afterward remembered the food that her fork now touched and trifled with. It was a sweetbread croquette, with little black specks of chopped truffle in its creamy yielding oval, and the air that they were playing out in the hall was from a light, valueless opera, then much in vogue. She always afterward remembered that, too. So do slight events often press themselves in upon the dazed and dilated vision of a great distress.

"Can I rise and walk?" she kept thinking. "Should I not fall if I tried?"

The Clinton Outrage.

The young lady who was brutally outraged at Clinton by three young men the other day was Miss Rebecca Bates, instead of Miss. Ball, as at first reported. She is the sister of a prominent citizen of St. Thomas, and is held in high esteem by all that knew her. The account of the outrage shows that a hackman, engaged to drive the young lady to the station purposely missed the train and then, telling her that as he was to blame for not having called for her in time he would drive her to Goderich, persuaded her to go with him. He had arranged with other two villians who followed in another conveyance, and on reaching a quiet place they forcibly took her out of the cab and ravished her. If ever men deserved to be dropped into hell from a hangsman's scaffold, these scoundrels do.

That's Nonsense.

The poet Tennyson can take a worthless sheet of paper and by writing a poem on it make it worth sixty five thousand dollars. That's genius.

Vanderbilt can write a few words on a sheet of paper and make it worth five million dollars. That's Capital.

The United States can take an ounce and a quarter of gold and stamp upon it an "egale bird" and make it worth twenty dollars. That's money.

The mechanic can take the material worth five dollars and make it in to a watch worth one hundred dollars. That's skill.

The merchant can take an article worth twenty-five cents and sell it for a dollar. That's business.

A lady can purchase a very comfortable bonnet for ten dollars, but she prefers one that cost one hundred dollars. That's foolishness.

The ditch digger works ten hours a day and shovels three or four tons of earth for two dollars. That's labor.

HEREDITARY SCROFULA.

Are you aware that in your blood the taint of scrofula has a prominent place? This is true of every one. It is liable at any time, on the slightest provocation, to develop itself in some insidious disease. Consumption and many other diseases are outgrowths of this impurity of the blood. Shaker Blood Syrup has a wonderful power over all scrofulous troubles, as the remarkable testimonials we have received unmistakably prove.

We refer by permission to Mrs. P. Elliott, Hanover. Maine, who was cured by Shaker Blood Syrup of 11 Scrofula Sores, the severity of which confined her to the house for two years. Six months, previous to taking Shaker Blood Syrup, she could not get about her room without crutches. Her friend says I did not think it possible for her to live many months, she was reduced to a mere skeleton. Her cure is hardly less than a miracle. There is no doubt that in Shaker Blood Syrup we have the most remarkable medicine that has ever been produced, and a positive cure for Syphilis and Scrofula in their numerous forms. 3i

SPRING CLEANING.

"SPACIALLY JIM."

I was mighty good-lookin' when I was young,
Peert an' black-eyed an' slim,
With fellers a-courtin' me Sunday nights,
'Spacially Jim.

The likeliest one of em all was he,
Chipper, an' han'some, an' trim,
But I tossed up my head an' made fun o' the crowd,
'Spacially Jim!

I said I hadn't no 'pinion o' men,
An' I wouldn't take stock in him!
But they kep' up a-comin' in spite o' my talk,
'Spacially Jim!

I got so tired o' havin' 'em roun'
(Spacially Jim!)
I made up my mind I'd settle down
An' take up with him.

So we was married one Sunday in church,
'Twas crowded full to the brim;
It was the only way to get rid of 'em all,
'Spacially Jim.

THE assessment in Ingersoll has been raised considerably over that of last year. There could be no objection to this on the part of the ratepayers if it were possible to increase the value in an equitable manner, for although our taxes will be no less, the rate being lowered will have an influence on persons who contemplate taking up their residence here. The greatest difficulty in the way, however, is in placing the increased value on property in such a manner as to be fair to all. Particularly is it a difficult matter to arrange the tax on income, for while some whose incomes are modest give in the full amount, others whose revenue from different sources runs up in the thousands, pay taxes on far less than their actual income. There are sixty appeals against the Court of Revision, thirty-seven being by one ratepayer.

THE commissariat has always been the weak spot in British military movements. The terrible mismanagement and redtapeism in connection with this department during the Crimean war, when such painful sufferings were endured by the British troops for want of adequate supplies, are recalled by the exposures now made by the investigation into the manner in which the commissariat and transport departments were conducted during the Anglo-Egyptian campaign of '82. The disclosures show not merely a shameful degree of inefficiency but the grossest swindling. All the devices known to army contractors for defrauding the government were put into operation, the hay supplied being not only moldy but loaded with stones to increase its weight. Cattle were allowed to fall into the hands of the enemy by hundreds in order that more might be purchased. Mules were disabled by cruel treatment, stores were thrown overboard from transport vessels, and the service was so bad that detachments of troops were left in a starving condition.

THERE appears to be no reason for doubting that the Ontario Minister of Education will solve the school-book question in a manner which will be satisfactory alike to the great majority of parents and teachers. Mr. Ross is an educationist of mature experience, and he has not gone through and made a study of the different stages of school life without obtaining a pretty correct idea of what their requirements are. He has recently been on a visit to Lindsay, where he had a most cordial reception from the County Victoria Teachers' Association. We learn from the Post that there was hearty applause when the Minister informed the convention that in future there will be but one series of school books and that the series is now in course of preparation. There is to be one small simple grammar for public schools. An advanced grammar and an advanced geography will be provided for high schools. These announcements are most gratifying. The fewer and the more simple the books for the junior pupils are the better it will be for them, while at the same time the expense to parents will be reduced.

THE Ontario Bureau of Industries has received reports from over six hundred correspondents, showing that the condition of fall-wheat throughout the province though not uniformly good, is much more satisfactory than in May last year. The most noticeable exceptions to the generally favourable outlook are at the extreme eastern and western ends of the province. The crops in the middle district promise well, and the favourable weather of the month has resulted in a marked improvement throughout. The returns of the acreage under crop are incomplete, but so far as received they indicate a reduction of the area devoted to fall wheat, amounting to about twenty per cent. In portions of the Lake Erie counties the crops suffered somewhat from the intense cold, and considerable areas had to be plowed up or re-sown. Spring frosts and east winds had also an injurious effect, but in the eastern section of this group the farmers are hopeful of an average yield. The crop in the Lake Huron counties also suffered greatly from spring frosts, and not more than half or two-thirds of a full yield is expected. The accounts from the Georgian Bay section are also depressing. The West Midland counties promise a full average crop, excepting in Perth. Reports from the counties bordering on Lake Ontario are highly encouraging, and a yield about the average is looked for, especially in the western portion of this area. The returns from the St. Lawrence and Ottawa group show a largely decreased acreage, and vary greatly as to the prospects. Lennox and Addington are the only counties from which the reports are generally favorable. In several others the fall wheat is almost a total failure. The crop in the East Midland counties is not expected to equal the average unless the weather is particularly favorable.

The decreased area devoted to fall wheat is a good sign, indicating a tendency on the part of farmers to devote more attention to other branches instead of staking everything on the success of the wheat crop.

The London Truth says that at a royal marriage in England some years ago the bridegroom was a German Prince. Only members of the royal family were present at the ceremony, with a few of the chief officer of the household. When the bridegroom came to repeat the words, "with all my goods I thee endow," an indignant exclamation was heard from the royal circle, "Good God! the very shoes the fellow wears are not paid for!" It was the old Duke of Cambridge who had blurted out this awkward truth in one of his fits of abstraction.

A DAY'S DROWNINGS.

Three Persons Perish in the Grand River at Galt—Boys Drowned at Durham and Belleville.

Galt, May 26.—Two lamentable accidents occurred on the Grand River here to-day resulting in the drowning of three persons. The first accident occurred some time this morning, and seems to have been caused by two young girls, aged about twelve and nine respectively, getting into a rowboat that was lying partly on the shore and partly in the water. Their movements while playing in the boat caused it to float out into the river, and the elder child, named Mary Morton, becoming frightened jumped and sank immediately, never rising again. The body was recovered shortly afterwards, life being extinct. The other child remained in the boat floating around until rescued.

THE SECOND ACCIDENT

occured about six o'clock this evening. It appears Abner Davidson aged 20, and Minnie Paltridge, about 17, were out together on the river in a row-boat, and while rowing around in the neighborhood of the dam were noticed to reach a point where the current is very strong, caused be the broken dam sluice-gate at the end of the dam. They were drawn through the opening in a moment and dashed into the boiling waters below. The water is about twelve feet deep at this point, very active and the river bed rocky, making it extremely improbable that any human could come through the sluice way alive. The bodies were seen once after passing through the rapids, but sank before anyone could reach them.

BOY LOST AT DURHAM.

DURHAM, May 26.—A sad case of drowning occurred about a mile from town this morning. A young lad about fourteen years of age, named McQuarrie, while assisting in washing sheep, was suddenly dragged into the stream and carried away before assistance whatever could be given. The body has not yet been found.

DROWNING AT BELLEVILLE.

BELLEVILLE, May 26.—About eleven o'clock this morning a boy about eight years of age, son of Mr. Gordon Baker, fell into the river from a wall adjoining the upper bridge and was drowned. The body has not yet been recovered.

A YOUNG MAN DROWNED AT LONGFORD MILLS.

A young man named William Baron, lately out from Kent England, was accidentally drowned out of an canoe, about fifteen feet from shore, in Lake St. John, near Longford mills, Sunday evening. He has been in the employ of the Longford Lumber Company only two weeks. He has in England a mother, brother and three sisters.

A YOUNG WOMAN DROWNED AT DUNNVILLE.

Miss Annie Lynch the daughter of a farmer living about two miles from Dunnville, was drowned, in the Grand River Saturday night. She said she was going down to the bank to fish. Nothing further is known as she was never seen alive afterwards. On it becoming late and she did not return, search was made and her body was found in shallow water, a little place down the river. It is supposed she lost her footing on V. R. Moore's bridge, and fell into the water there.

Poisoned by Eating Chicago Tinned Beef.

The prejudice against American tinned meats has been revived by a sad event which occurred at Scarborough Eng. A large quantity of beef imported in tins from Chicago, and know here as "Chicago brawn," has recently been sold in Scarborough, and to-day several of the persons who had eaten of it were taken ill with symptoms of poisoning. One man has died and three other are reported to be dying. There is intense excitement in the town and the event has caused a sensation in London, and especially in Parliment, where it is likely to have an effect upon the Cattle Disease bill now pending in the House of Commons. An inquest has been begun at Scarborough and a thorough analysis of the suspected meat is in progress.

THE OTTERVILLE SENSATION.

The Case Against Robert Pearce and His Wife Dismissed.

The case against Robt. Pearce and Mrs. Pearce (late Mrs. Vansickle) for Poisoning Harry Vansickle at Otterville, on the 20th of November last, came up in the Police Court, Woodstock, at ten o'clock Saturday morning, before Police Magistrate Field. F. R. Ball, Q. C., was counsel for the Crown, and Ashton Fletcher appeared for the prisoners. The court-room was crowded, and a great deal of interest appeared to be taken in the case by those present. The witnesses examined were Gordan Kelvan, George Mason, Otterville, Mrs. George Mason, Donald Shepherd, Dr. Collvin, Dr. Beard and Mrs. Pearce. Kelvan was staying at Clare's, Otterville, at the time of Vansickle's death, and had seen deceased about five o'clock on the afternoon of his death. His evidence was unimportant. Geo. Mason, brother-in-law of the prisoner Pearce, who, in company with Mrs. Vansickle, Pearce, and Pearce's sister, had gone to Simcoe, Windham Centre, and Delhi, where they had stayed several days before Vansickle's death, was able to recollect very little of what occurred on that trip, and much of the evidence he did give was contradicted by his wife, a sister of Pearce to whom he was not married at that time. Donald Shepherd, who kept a hotel at Delhi at that time, remembered the party coming to his place and taking two bedrooms, remaining over one night. Dr. Collver, of Otterville, testified to having attended Vansickle professionally early in October. He had chronic inflammation of the larynx with ulceration. The disease remained, although the acute attack passed away. Vansicle evidently indulged in drink. When he had the acute attack he was hardly able to articulate. It might be that he died from spasm of the glands at the opening of the larnyx. He had no suspicion of poisoning; he looked like a man who had been asphyated. He said croton oil might produce the spasm, but he did not believe traces could be discovered at this time. Dr. Beard testified that the symptoms as given by Dr. Collver might have terminated his existence. The symptoms described might readily result as Dr. Collver supposed. Mrs. Pearce's evidence was unimportant. Mr. Ball retired for a few minutes with Drs. Beard and Collver, and on returning to the court room stated that he did not feel justified in asking that the case be remanded. He was hardly prepared on the evidence elicited to go to the trouble and expense of a post-mortem examination. The Police Magistrate then discharged the prisoners.

SALVATION ARMY SEQUELS.

How their Operations in Other Places are Regarded.

There is a lesson in this failure of the Salvation army to perpetruate a disturbance, which is worthy of notice of authorities of other cities. The capital stock of the band consists in disturbances, and disturbance they must have, by some means, to create the excitement they covet. Under the name of the founder of the Christian religion they enact scenes of boisterous excitement and bring contempt upon all religious motive. The failure of their methods in Rochester should encour[illegible] authorities of other cities threatage the a[illegible] of the army. It ened with the presence of the captain was stated last night that [illegible] would return again soon and "stir them up." It is possible that such may be the case, and if so, the authorities will have only themselves to blame if the disgraceful scenes of the first week shall be reenacted.

From the Chatham Tribune.

Miss Junett of Chatham township was thrown out of her buggy in consequence of the horse running away—owing to the furious pounding of the Salvation Army drums. She is very low. The usefulness of the drum, and the dancing capers of the Army on the streets have long passed, and it is high time that this intolerable and dangerous nuisance should be stopped, or we shall hear of more serious results. There is not the least objection to the Army worshiping in whatever way it has a mind too, but its intolerance of other people's feelings and safety is itself becoming intolerable.

From the St. Thomas Journal.

In this city public opinion has veered around from favorable to unfavorable, not because the Army may not have done good in some direction, but because of the undeniable injury it has wrought among the younger members of the community by lessening in them repsect for religion. The fact is, St. Thomas is not large enough to hold the Salvation Army.

Washington Letter.

(From Our Correspondent.)

Washington, May 19, 1884.

The pace at which the appropriation measures have gone through the Houses of Congress the past week is in full spirit with the cry now echoed about the Capitol, "Pass the appropriation bills and go home." But the national legislature, as its name implies, is the law-making branch of government, and not merely a board of audit accounts. The salaries of government servants from the President to the scrub-women, the expenses of federal courts, the payments for mail service, the interest on the public debt, the obligations to the pensioners and other wards of the nation;—these must all be met, as a matter of course. It was never intended, however, that Congress should devote itself to settling the compensation of clerks to the exclusion of such questions as the electoral count, the protection of the public domain against incorporated robbery, the postal telegraph, the relief of the Supreme Court, the civilization of the Indian, the creation of a national militia system, the revival of American shipping, the establishment of a court for the adjudication of private claims, and a dozen other measures of equal importance; and it is to be hoped that the inclination towards a "short, business session" will give way before the necessity of important legislation. Adjournment talk in the House now says that early in July will mark the end of the session, but in the Senate the idea is that adjournment will come later. There are now but three appropriation bills left in committee—the tha fortifications, sundry civil, and general deficiency, and Mr. Randall expects to report all these before the end of the month. It is understood that nothing has yet been done on the post office and naval bills in conference, but it is not thought that the deadlock upon these bills will be allowed to prolong the session very much.

Benjamin Franklin Butler was conspicuous upon the floor of the House the day following his nomination by the anti-monopolist's convention. Tilted back in a cane seat chair, and with a red flower in the button-hole of his closely buttoned coat, the ex-Governor chatted glibly of his prospects for the Presidency. He seemed in excellent spirits, and held quite a reception, Speaker Carlisle and Representative Turner, of Georgia, being among those with who he conversed. In response to a query he declared that if he was not nominated by the Democracy at Chicago he would run independently.

The Swaim court of inquiry is one of the most interesting places in town now. The number of spectators and listeners has increased every day. General Pope, in a full uniform, sits at the head of the table, a perfect model of impassive judicial dignity. General Augur, who sits at his right, has a high and handsome head, long white side whiskers, and an aquiline nose. General Sackett is the third member of the Court. Colonel Robert Scott, the judge advocate, covers the bald spot on his capacious head with a black office cap, and regrets each moment the court is in session that smoking is prohibited. The evidence is all in, and on Wednesday next the arguments of counsel will be heard. There is intense interest among Army officers to know what is coming out of it. Everybody thinks it strange that General Swaim should have gone to law about a few hundred dollars with the banker Bateman, who has been his friend, and with whom he had been mixed up in so many transactions. Swaim is said to be worth over $200,000. He owns several farms in Kansas, and is a close and successful business man. The Swaim inquiry has revived talk about the famous Army Poker Club. This was a rather remarkable institution. There were only three Army officers in the club, the other members of it being civilians. They hired a room by the month on New York avenue and the business is said to have been large. The janitor of the club—which, of course, is now defunct—is at present the coachman of Senator Palmer, of Michigan.

Washington is par excellence the 'cyclist's paradise. Its smooth asphalt streets are unsurpassed for bicycling, and its surburban beauties, combined with the attractions of the National Capital, make it an objective point for all wheelmen. The fifth annual meeting of the League of American Wheelmen is now in progress here, and it has attracted visitors from nearly every section east of the Mississippi. It is a great bicycling event. The exercises include a parade of about fifteen hundred bicycles, which will go over a route of ten miles through the city and will be reviewed by the President as it passes under the balcony of the Executive Mansion. There will also be a procession at night upon Pennsylvania Avenue, under the reflection of the revolving electric light upon the apex of the Dome of the Capitol.—LENOX.

A Kansas girl was caught in male attire, and, as she refused to pay a fine of $10, a Justice sent her to prison for ten days. As there was no worse intention in her conduct than to play a prank, and the State has no law against what she did, her rich father has sued for damages.

The late Duke of Buccleuch and the Duke of Northumberland once found themselves in a carriage going northward with a commercial traveller. The conversation was general between the three. At Alnwick station the Duke of Northumberland got out, and was borne away in a showy equipage. "That must be a swell," said the commercial traveller. "Do you know who it is?" "The Duke of Northumberland," replied his Grace of Buccleuch. "And they say," exclaimed the traveller, "that our nobility is haughty! Why, he talked to two snobs like you and me as though we had been his pals!"

FIRST SEMI-ANNUAL
Great Sales of FARM LANDS
BY PUBLIC AUCTION.
To be held in the different County Towns of Ontario early in autumn, the dates of which will be given shortly, making over Forty Large Sales.

Messrs. MACKINTOSH & PETERS beg to announce that they have arranged to hold a series of Auction Sales as above, and now invite immediate entries for them.

LAND HOLDERS, FARMERS, OWNERS OF MILLS, FOUNDRIES, and OTHER PROPERTY will find this a ready and satisfactory way of selling their property. The several properties will be offered subject to an upset price or unreservedly, at the option of the owner.

The catalogues of entries will be lavishly advertised and distributed throughout this Province and in England, thus ensuring a big attendance at all the sales of buyers from all parts.

No plan so good has ever before been presented for effecting sales.

Briefly put, our plan is to secure entries of lands in all parts of Ontario, and to sell them by public auction to the highest bidder, subject to an upset, or unreservedly, as we may be authorized, the sales to be held at the different County Towns in June next.

With each entry we charge a fee of $10, payable in advance, to cover the entire expenses for advertising. 2 per cent. on the first $2500; 1½ per cent. on the second $2500; 1 per cent. on any amount over $5000. Commission will be claimed if property is sold at private sale to a purchaser of our finding. No charge whatever if no sale is made. Parties desiring to put their property into these sales should make the entries at once, as catalogues must be out shortly. For terms and fuller information, apply to

TOWN NEWS.

THIS is a cold wave.

DIVISION Court yesterday.

THE watering cart has appeared at last.

MISS CHURCHILL at the Town Hall to-morrow (Friday) evening.

GREAT damage has been done to the gardens by the heavy frost of last night.

KNOX CHURCH.—The Rev. W. McKibbin of Brockville Presbytery will occupy the pulpit of Knox Church next Sabbath, morning and evening.

THE water for the streets is now forced from one of the tanks of the Noxon Bros. Manufacturing Co., and is a great improvement on the old plan.

BEYOND a doubt the easiest way of making a garden look bright and gay is with bedding plants, which are now sold so cheaply by florists.

REV. C. R. Morrow has been engaged by the Scott Act convention to organize for the campaign in East Elgin from the 19th to the 26th of May.

BASEBALL.—The Woodstocks were victorious over the Alerts, of London, in the baseball match—the first of the championship league games.

OUR Farm and Dairy, Household and Temperance departments on fourth page will be found as interesting as usual this week. We pride ourselves on their excellence, and endeavour to give the best in each.

GREAT LUCK.—Geo. A. Cook, M.P.P. for South Oxford, is having a great run of luck. First he was elected to parliament, then the Council of Norwich placed a lamp post opposite his residence, and now he has become the father of a daughter.

HANDSOME FOWLS.—Mr. J. T. Malone, of this town, is the proud owner of as handsome and well-bred a black-red game cock as it has been our pleasure to see. He, along with three pullets were sent to Mr. Malone by a friend in Ireland.

LAWN TENNIS.—Lawn tennis is more popular than ever this season. The different clubs have a large list of members who are getting quite enthusiastic over this charming game, and propose to emulate neighboring towns and cities in becoming expert in play.

CARNIVAL OF AUTHORS.—Don't forget to embrace the rare opportunity afforded of hearing Miss F. H. Churchill, of Boston, Mass., the celebrated elocutionist, in the Town Hall to-morrow (Friday) evening. Tickets 25 cents. Proceeds devoted to High School Library Fund.

DIED.—Many of our readers, particularly those connected with the Baptist denomination, will learn with regret of the death of Mrs. Dr. Fyfe in Woodstock, on Thursday at the age of 69 years. She was the widow of the late Dr. Fyfe, principal of the Canadian Literary Institute.

AN OVERSIGHT.—The St. Thomas Times forgets to give us the customary credit for our report of the Ingersoll cheese market. THE CHRONICLE AND DAIRYMAN being an authority in this country on dairy matters, the report would be considered more reliable by the Times' readers if it had the proper credit.

MEMORIAL SERVICE. — Many of our citizens know that Alexander Gordon who has been a resident of Ingersoll for 35 years and a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church here for over 30 years, has passed away. A memorial service will be conducted in St. Andrews Church, by the pastor, Rev. P. R. Ross, next Sabbath evening, at the usual hour.

COMMUNION Services were held in St. Andrews Church on Sabbath last, the pastor, Rev. P. R. Ross, occupying the pulpit at the morning service, and Rev. Principal Caven, D.D., of Knox College, Toronto, in the evening. Preparatory services were held on Friday, Rev. Mungo Fraser of St. Thomas officiating. A thanksgiving service was held on Monday, conducted by Rev. Principal Caven. The church was well filled on each occasion, the services being very impressive.

THE SKUNK OF THE "SENTINEL."—The "cad" who edits the Sentinel of Woodstock, true to his instincts, cannot discuss any question without resorting to language unbecoming one in his position. We avoid personalities as far as possible, but on this occasion we cannot allow the opportunity to pass without giving expression to our utter contempt for the impotent malignity of this cur. Our remarks last week on the celebrations in Ingersoll and Woodstock were intended to draw the badger, not the skunk. As it was the latter animal which appeared in reply, THE CHRONICLE declines to enter the pit for a fight with any such malodorous beast. Even if THE CHRONICLE succeeded in crushing the journalistic skunk of the Sentinel, this paper would carry away no trophy of victory, but would only bring disgrace on itself by having been contaminated by the stench of the vile thing which had been slain.

PRESENTATION.—A number of young men who were converted last winter at the Zion Methodist Church, on the Salford circuit, have banded themselves together for church work, under the name of "Daniel's Band." The band is in connection with the church, being officered by church members, and working through prayer meetings, and every possible method to induce others to give their hearts to God and unite with the christian church. These young men were mostly converted through the instrumentality of Rev. T. A. Moore, and on Monday evening, after their weekly prayer meeting, they showed their appreciation of his labors by presenting him with several volumes of biographical and theological value. Mr. W. H. Barraclough, Captain of the Band, in a neat speech, said many things of Mr. Moore, referring to his success in church work, his acceptance among the people, and the sorrow of heart that the relations of pastors and people will so soon be broken. Mr. Moore made a suitable reply.

FAREWELL.—The tea meeting held in the B. C. Church on Monday evening was one of the most successful in the history of the little church. The attendance was good and all appeared to put in a real pleasant time. The spread was among the best efforts of the ladies of that congregation, and reflected great credit upon their skill in this direction. Not only were the edibles of the best description, but the supply was so large that there was more than enough left to feed 300 persons. Excellent addresses were given by Rev. Reynolds, Lawrence, Ross, and Rowe. Mr. Joseph Gibson acted as chairman, and appeared to feel quite at home in this position, his address and introductions of the speakers being instructive and in good taste. The Menhennick Bros. contributed some quartets in their usual good style, with Mr. Clouse as accompanyist, and received the hearty thanks and applause of the audience. After votes of thanks to the chairman, speakers, and ladies, the meeting closed with the Benediction. Thus ends the little church, which is now closed by the Methodist Union.

INGERSOLL'S CELEBRATION TAKES THE LEAD.

GREAT GATHERING IN VICTORIA PARK.

THOUSANDS VIEW THE CALEDONIAN GAMES.

The Tug of War—Lacrosse Match—Scottish Games—Highland Dancing—Concert in the Evening.

The fourth annual celebration under the auspices of the Ingersoll Caledonian Society took place in our beautiful park on Monday, and proved a great success in every respect. Athletes from distant parts of the country were present and the sports was keenly contested. The Highland costumes of nearly all the contestants and Highland pipers in great numbers added picturesqueness to the scene.

The annual Caledonian sports in Ingersoll are now an established thing. We doubt whether another town in Canada could gather such a crowd as assembled on the grassy slopes of Victoria Park on Monday last. We hope that now the success of their gatherings is assured beyond any fear of the rivalry of neighbouring places, they will be held every year, whether on the Queen's Birthday or on Dominion Day. The Society has every reason to be pleased at the repeated success they have met with, which is due to the earnest systematic work of the members of the Society.

The officers of the Society this year are Wm. Ewart, chief; D. White, chieftain; A. W. Murdoch, first chieftain; Joseph Gibson, second chieftain; Robt. Vance, third chieftain; James Murdoch and John McDonald, honorary chiefs; J. S. Smith, treasurer; C. R. Patience, secretary; Wm. Sutherland, financial secretary; T. H. Webb, John Russell, Geo. White and W. C. Noxon, assistant secretaries; Rev. P. R. Ross, chaplain. Directors—Dr. McKay, Jas. Gordon, Alex. Murdoch, W. Tennant, Angus Matheson, Wm. McBain, Jas. Brady and Angus McLeod; Reception Committee, D. White, John M'Kellar, Jas. McIntyre, Dr. McKay, Jas. Gordon, and G. A. Thompson; Marshals, J. A. McInnes, J. Podmore, and Dr. McKay; Bard, James McIntyre; Standard Bearers, A. McLeod, Ingersoll, and D. McKay, Embro; Piper, Geo. A. Matheson, Hamilton.

During the day music was furnished by the 22nd Battalion Band, and by several Highland pipers who were present in costume. Conspicuous on the grounds was a large delegation representing the London Caledonian Society of London. The following, in attractive Highland dress, were subsequently seen upon the grounds: Maud Cruickshank, Blanche Cruickshank, Maggie Templeton, Bella Gordon, Bertie Bonthorn, Robt. McPherson, John Rattray, Frank Wilson, Roby Burns, Peter Fairgrieve and John Trennan.

ON THE LACROSSE FIELD.

During the forenoon the park was well patronized by the lovers of lacrosse. The first event was a contest for a silver challenge cup, given by H. Richardson, jeweller, for the longest throw made with the lacrosse stick, cup to be held three years in succession before becoming the absolute property of the winner. The best throw was made by C. Cowan, of Ingersoll, 126 yards six inches, the next being by E. Dundas, only seven feet behind. Then followed an exciting game of lacrosse between the Ontarios, of London, and the Dufferins, of Ingersoll. A. Middlemiss acted as umpire for the Dufferins; W. Morey, field captain; umpire for the Ontarios, J. Darch; field captain, J. Robinson. Postmaster Joseph Gibson, of Ingersoll, officiated as referee. The two teams were made up as follows:

Ontarios.	Positions.	Dufferins.
A. Lashbrook	Goal keeper	J. H. Hegler.
A. Watson	Point	D. Kitchen
F. Lashbrook	Cover point	R. Malone
G. Stinson	Defence field	J. Vance
W. Fysh	"	C. Cowan
J. Hill	"	J. C. Atkinson
W. Moses	Center	E. Dundas
W. Bennett	Home field	J. O. Matheson
G. Watson	"	W. Smith
T. O'Toole	"	W. Booth
Ed. Rogers	Home	F. Smale
J. O'Toole	"	E. Cowan

The game was for the best three out of five. Ingersoll won the first goal in fourteen minutes, E. Dundas making the lucky shot. At the expiration of four minutes after the ball was faced the second time Fred Lashbrook, of the Ontarios, made an easy shot and the second goal was won by the visitors. The Dufferins won the third goal in 24 minutes, and also the fourth after a close and earnest struggle of 50 minutes, E. Smale throwing the ball through one goal and E. Cowan through the latter.

THE TUG OF WAR.

The last, and by far the most exciting feature of the afternoon, was the tug of war between picked teams from the townships of Nissouri and Dorchester. The tug was a desperate one, the teams being fairly well balanced, and both doing their best. Nissouri won the first pull, and Dorchester the second and third amid tremendous cheering and applause. The personnel of the teams was as follows:

Dorchester—Capt. Jas. Day, A. Armour, R. Fleming, A. Fleming, T. McMillan, W. Smith, T. Hicks, T. McKenzie, T. Hennessey, E. Mitchell and C. L. Campbell.

Nissouri—John Wood, Capt. Frank Day, John McClure, Hugh Day, John Flynn, John Hughes, John Murray, Joseph Faircloth, Geo. Alderson, Israel Day and Wm. Froel.

The prize was divided between the two teams.

SCOTCH CONCERT.

A grand concert was given in the evening, the Town Hall being filled to the doors. A number of famous vocalists took part, including Mrs. Jessie Robertson, of New York; Prof. Moon and twelve of his pupils from London, and Miss Blanche Cruickshank, of London, also took part, besides all the Highland pipers and dancers who were on the ground during the day. The concert which was a brilliant success in every respect, closed the amusements of the day.

Our local poet, Jas. McIntyre, evolved the following lines on the occasion:

"On grassy amphitheatre
Spectators sat to view the war
Mong bold contestants in the plain
Where each did strive the prize to gain.
When charming little boys and girls,
In Highland dress and waving curls,
From London danced the Highland fling,
The whole mass did their praises sing."

WOODSTOCK'S CELEBRATION.

Large Attendance and Keenly Contested Sports.

One of the best and most successful day's sports ever seen in Woodstock, was held on Monday. Weather was all that could be desired, and by ten o'clock the town was crowded with people. The Bicyck, foot races and base ball and lacrosse matches were contested in the keenest manner. The Woodstocks were victorious over the Alerts, of London, in the base ball match, the first of the championship league games; but the Beavers, after a very hard contest, were defeated by the Brants, of Paris, in the lacrosse match. In both of these matches the public took the greatest interest, and the applause of the crowd spurred the players on to do their best. The liveliest and most intense interest was manifested in the bicycle and foot races, entries for which had been received from the most prominent athletes in Canada. Messrs. Moffat and McWood, from the Argyle Athletic Association of Montreal, arrived early on Sunday morning to engage in all the foot races, besides several others from Hamilton, Goderich, Orilla and other places. To crown the success of the day the concert in the evening drew such a large crowd that the town hall was not spacious enough to hold the crowds that came flocking in. There is no doubt that the wide-spread reputation of Miss Clinch as a violinist and Miss Reidy as a vocalist helped very materially to fill the town hall, while Mr. Jas. Brydon and Mr. J. F. O'Neil, of "The Why Not Club," were great acquisitions.

Queen's Birthday in Tilsonburg.

Saturday, 24th inst., was not observed in Tilsonburg as a holiday, business being transacted as usual; but on Monday, 26th inst., all business was suspended and the citizens generally turned out to enjoy themselves. A large number took advantage of the attractions our sister towns were offering, and journeyed hence in search of pleasure. Ingersoll, especially, received the largest quota, and those who went there report having enjoyed themselves immensely. Those who did not roam to foreign fields for enjoyment clubbed together for amusement and succeeded admirably in putting in what at first betokened a rather quiet day. The Methodist Church had a pic-nic in the woods on the eastern bank of Lake Lisgar, and spent a very pleasurable time. The Band enlivened the proceedings. The Cricket Club turned out in full force, and put in a whole afternoon in the practice of the noble game. Sides were chosen—Messrs. Jackson and Sheppard being the respective captains. The score at the end of the game stood 76 to 52 in favor of Mr. Jackson's side. The irrepressible small boy held high revelry, turned out in full strength, and made the air resound incessantly with all sorts of noises from early morn till midnight. Altogether, the day, although inclined to be somewhat quiet and uneventful, was spent enjoyably by all parties, and was not marked by any of the abuses which generally meet the eye on every hand on occasions like this, and which serve to detract from and rob the day of its otherwise pleasant and agreeable associations.

Board of Health.

A meeting of the Ingersoll Board of Health was held on Saturday last.

Present—Jas. Noxon, D. S. Burdick, Jas. Crotty, Geo. Foster, Dr. Hoyt, John McKellar.

On motion R. A. Woodcock was elected Secretary.

On motion Dr. Williams was recommended to be appointed as Health Officer.

On motion J. B. Capron was recommended as Sanitary Inspector.

The Board then adjourned till the call of the chairman.

THE Woodstock hotel was sold to D. W. Karn for $3,350. It cost $22,000 to build it.

DIED OF HIS INJURIES.—Mark Grandy, who was injured about two weeks ago by being thrown from a buggy in which he was coming home from Ingersoll with Dr. Lancaster, died from his injuries on Saturday afternoon. His remains were interred in the cemetery at Delmer, on Tuesday, the 20th. He was over 70 years of age.

HAY FORK SWINDLERS.—The hay fork swindlers have reached this section, and have succeeded in getting a farmer to act as "agent" and also in getting his note for $300. As the hay fork men are swindlers, and having procured Mr. Baxter's name under false colors, he has advertised the note as worthless, as he has received no value for the same.—Tilsonburg Liberal.

AMATEUR VS. PROFESSIONAL SPORTS.—The sports in many places this year were not open to professionals but the prizes were given with the laudable desire of encouraging amateur athletics. We think this a good plan and hope next year that our society will offer prize to amateur athletics and thus encourage our young men in money outdoor sports. There should be classes open to amateurs only.

FINE WEATHER—Finer weather was never known than we are having now. The small grain is coming along wonderfully and promise a splendid yield. Corn planting is nearly or quite through with and some of it is already above ground, showing strong and healthy shoots. There was a great fear that the seed would prove to be of poor quality but so far there is no indication that such is the case.

THE CABBAGE FLY.—A good many growers of cabbages and cauliflowers think they would sooner light the cabbage worm than the little fly which destroys the plants when they are first set out. We have proved to our own satisfaction that if the plants be shaded on the south and east side with shingles the fly will never touch them, and they will grow strong and healthy. The shingles should be kept on till the plants have attained a good size.

LACROSSE.—On Saturday last the Dufferins went to Paris, and played a friendly game with the Beavers of that place, which resulted in an easy victory for the Paris club, the latter taking three straight games in about fifty minutes. Our boys speaks in the highest terms of the treatment they received at the hands of the Beavers, who they say are without exception the best lot of fellows it has been their good fortune to meet. They have signified their intention of meeting the Beavers again at no distant date.

THE greatest indignation exists in and about Middlemiss over the miscarriage of justice in the Wrightman case, and threats of lynching Wrightman in the event of his being allowed his liberty are openly made. It is not very probable that the accused will be liberated for many a day to come. After his trial for Campbell robbery and St. Thomas he will be tried for the robbery of the murdered Silcox, the crown counsel at the Middlesex Assizes, Mr. Colin Macdougall of this city, having caused a warrant to be issued for his examination on the minor charge, his acquittal rendering it impossible to try him again for the capital crime.—St. Thomas Times.

SEASONABLE HINTS.—The Sanitary Journal gives some "Seasonable Hints," which are worthy of attention. In view of the near approach of the bathing season our contemporary advises: "Be not too ready to get into cold water out of doors. Better to bathe at home until the weather and water get decidedly warm. Go not into cold water when overheated, nor when cooling off, nor when cold, nor remain in too long at first. Fatal cramps are caused by such indiscretions. Dry off quickly, and dress as soon as possible, on leaving the water." Referring to the too common habit of leaving off under-flannels on the first warm day, the Journal says that indiscretion "has been the prime cause of many a death. Better to be uncomfortably warm than fatally cold. It is a good idea to wear lighter flannels for a few weeks before leaving off altogether, although many do not. They might be left off at night, if so worn, at almost any time."

Letter from Colorado.

260 LINCOLN AVE.,
Denver, Colo.

DEAR CHRONICLE.—As I promised a good many subscribers to write from this Far West, I will commence by saying I arrived here safe and sound on the 15th inst., after spending two days in Detroit, three in Chicago and one in the greatest railroad centre in the United States, viz.: Kansas City. I travelled by the Great Rock Island Route from Chicago to Kansas City, and in all my experience they have the most perfect road it has ever been my fortune to travel on, good dining cars and attentive and obliging trainmen. From there my route was over the "Sanata Fe," a southern route, and all through the country there is a prospect of an abundant harvest, wheat and grass look particularly good. The season in Colorado is a little more backward than farther South, but more so on account of the immense snows that have been in the mountains this winter, which retard all business as well for a short time. The miners cannot work when the snow is so deep, and it is impossible to get them in their supplies, as they have all to be packed up the mountains by mules. Here in Denver we have lovely weather, warm and pleasant, the thermometer ranges about 75 degrees, and the nights cool, which is the way all summer, never gets above 94 degrees, and you need a heavy blanket for covering every night in the year, of course the reason is the continual snows on the Rockies, which are all along the west side of the city, and on Sunday when we had such pleasant weather here, at a little mountain town, 30 miles distant, over three feet of snow fell. Denver as a business centre is destined to be the largest city between Chicago on the one side and San Francisco on the other, lying as she does at the end of the great plains and the commencement of the mountains, or about midway between the two cities. There is to-day 17 Railway Lines occupying its central depot, and others are being built. In 1882 Colorado produced twenty-seven millions of gold and silver, or one-hundred and seventy millions altogether since mining commenced, and had one-hundred and four million dollars worth of sheep and cattle eating the prairie grass, at no expense, except to herd them as they are out all winter, never get into a barn. In 1880 Denver had a population of 40,000, in 1882, 70,000, or a growth of 75 per cent. in two years, and has increased in the same proportion since, both in population and resources. As Denver is the Capital of the State, we have all the State and public buildings, which, with the churches and schools would put to blush many of the greater and older cities of the east. After I get more settled I will give you another letter, meanwhile I remain, Yours, R. F. HUNTER.

The Bible and Its Value.

PAPER VIII.

Another evidence of the value of our Bible is the record it gives of the Saviour of mankind. If any other book could give equal information concerning the "Prince of Life" as the only hope of a fallen world, then the Bible would lose its unapproachable preeminence as the "book of books." But no other record in all the libraries of the world can give the narrative of the predicted and accomplished life of the "altogether lovely." By common consent the best readers always value most highly a faithful and descriptive of men who have figured most prominently in the world's history. Even Pliny, and Tacitus, and Celsus, and others of like stripe, could not deny the truthfulness of the new Testament as giving a correct description of the desire of nations, the one who filled a gap in history no one else could possibly fill. Not only so, but if the integrity of the Chronicler be unimpeachable, then the best evidence of the genuineness of any record is found when the writer is most intimately connected with the person of whom he writes. Admitting the integrity of Queen Victoria, no one could be more fitted to write the life of her noble consort Prince Albert, than Her Majesty; while at the same time the testimony given concerning that heroic or princely life, beautifully agrees with what is publicly and historically known. In like manner, the spirit of God possessing essential purity, was eminently fitted to make known to us the character and prerogative of Jesus the "ancient of days," and the spirit of truth plainly testified that Jesus dwelt with the Father in glory ineffable before the world's were made. Yea! long before the stars on high circled in their nightly splendour, or any of the charms of nature laughed with beauty and gladness, he lived and reigned with princely majesty and kingly power. Now this Bible testimony of the hidden or pre-existant life of Christ finds its counterpart most ample and complete in what is written by the Apostles, and what is also chronicled in the world's history, whether sacred or secular. Peter said, "We have not followed cunningly devised fables when we made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, for we were eye witnesses of His Majesty."

THE HISTORY OF THE BIBLE

is the history of light, fighting against darkness, of truth fighting against error. The divinely inspired record, the Bible has lain under mountains of difficulty and persecution, and for a time, again and again, wrong appeared to triumph over right. But though the enemies of the cross have more than once held high carnival over the bodies of the saints, and over the apparent extinction of truth, yet in every case, as events proved, defeat was more apparent than real, and in the end of every conflict the conquest of Bible truth became the more complete and its divine power the more abundantly manifest.

The high priests Long ago gathered at "a place called Calvary" and there in high glee did they chuckle and laugh with strong congratulations among themselves over a dead Christ on the cross. But their apparent success and victory over Christ only served, in a thousand fold, their amazement, when in a short time after they found an empty tomb. This argument is not an exception to the rule, for "history often repeats itself."

When surely in the light of our relationship and dependence on Christ for both worlds, our appreciation of that blessed book, the Bible, which contains the true record, cannot be over estimated nor over valued. Jesus the Saviour, in coming to visit this world, was the most illustrious visitor the world ever had, and we are sure that by the work of Christ in our behalf, He is the world's greatest benefactor. The British slave trade which gave a clean profit to the English Governmont of £256,000 sterling, every year was broken up and every slave was freed by the efforts of Wilberforce, England's best benefactor. But a ruined race depended on the benefaction of Christ Jesus. What a benefactor!

As a teacher, Christ eclipsed all competitors, even the wisest of all the wisdom of Greece. What a stir was made in Palestine when Christ began His work! His fame spread through all the land. All men made haste to hear what words of blessing or denunciation might fall from his lips. They marvelled at His wisdom and were dumb stricken at the manifestations of His power. The Eastern world at that time beheld in Christ a dignity, a grandeur, a gracefulness, and a tenderness of which before in all their lives they had no conception. The emissaries of Christ's worst enemies carried back to their employers the report "never man spake like this man." We have had this record of Christ's life and work for more than 18 centuries, and its equal has never yet been known. It never has been, because it never could be. We have made a trial of His teachings in our own experience, and observed their influence on men individually and on the destiny of the nations generally, and comparing them with competing and opposing doctrines of every description, an impartial mind must be led to the fullest conviction possible, that there is no wisdom under heaven among men like that which flowed from the Saviour's lips, and there is no such example of moral excellence as that exhibited by Jesus Christ. Then surely the book which tells of such a person by a narrative of unqualified veracity must be a book of great value.

DISTRICT NEWS.

Dereham.

A sad accident occured near Verschoyle, on Saturday, 17th. As Mrs. King, of Michigan, was returning to see her father, the late Mark Grandy, the horses became restive and the hind seat in the democrat in which she was coming from Ingersoll, in company with her brother-in-law, A. D. Deane, not being fastened, fell out, throwing her to the ground and breaking her arm in two places. To add to the trouble her father had expired a few moments before her arrival.

Mr. Alfred A. Little, son of Mr. James Little, of the Township of Dereham, died at Chicago of inflammation on Sunday, 25th inst. He had gone to Chicago to look after some property which he owned there, and was overtaken by this terrible malady which proved fatal. He spent four months with his parents and friends in Dereham during the winter, and had only left about three weeks ago. His brothers, Henry and Charles, went to Chicago, and had his remains brought home and buried in the family burying ground in Dereham. He was 28 years old and a promising young man. Truly life is uncertain and death is sure.

Rev. Wm. Barraclough, of Sweaburg, will occupy the pulpit in this place next Sabbath evening.

Nine bicyclists passed through our village last Sabbath en-route to Woodstock to take part in the race at that place on the 26th inst.

Mrs. E. McDonald of Brigden (daughter of J. McLaughlin of this place) who has been visiting relatives and friends in this vicinity for the past two weeks, returned to her home last Wednesday.

Mrs. G. B. Hoyt, of Detroit, is spending a few weeks with her friends here.

Glad to see Mr. Andrew Beath home for a day or two to see his friends and the sport in Woodstock.

Mr. Joseph Notwell, who has been suffering from a severe attack of inflamation, is slowly recovering and is expected to be around again shortly.

Our butcher, Mr. K. Stewart, sustained quite a loss last Friday evening, when the door of his slaughter house was broken open and a considerable portion of a fine beef carried off by dogs.

The Caledonian Society's celebration drew quite a number of our citizens to town on Monday, and all agree that they were well repaid by the excellent days' sport afforded by the "games."

The annual excursion of the Sweaburg and Beachville Public Schools is fixed for the 20th of June, to Burlington Beach. The very low rates of sixty and thirty cents have been secured, of which it is expected a very large number will take advantage. The excursion will leave Beachville at seven a.m., returning by the evening train, arriving here at 7:30.

Our new P. C. is not realizing the bright hopes entertained by many on his appointment, for as one swallow does not make summer, neither does one arrest make constant order.

The Caledonian games at Ingersoll on Monday, drew crowds from Nissouri and altho' in the tug-of-war their team was defeated, they all concur in saying that had the odds been at all equal the result "might have been" different.

The Rev. Professor McLaren, of Knox College, occupied the pulpit of St. Andrews church on Saturday, Sunday and Monday, during the communion, and gave the congregation most excellent sermons, as did also Mr. Kippen of Dorchester, and Mr. Stuart of Wallaceburg. Mr. Cameron is highly fortunate in being able to secure such valuable aid.

Mr. Steele, milk-drawer to this factory, met with a painful accident on Monday, by which his leg was broken below the knee. In getting on the wagon his foot slipped and he fell beneath it, the horses starting at the same moment, the whole weight of milk and wagon passed over his leg. Strange to say, altho' in such a populous part he lay until the people were returning from church before being found. Dr. McWilliams set the fractured limb.

Dr. Draper, of Listowel, has taken up his residence in Tilsonburg, and goes into partnership with Dr. Sinclair. He comes to us with the best of recommendations as to his many good qualities, he having been honored with an address, expressing regret at his departure, by the citizens of Listowel a short time ago.

A runaway occurred on Broadway last Friday evening that created considerable excitement and comment. It appears that the Band and Salvation Army were parading the streets, both coming from opposite directions, and a farmer driving his horse leisurely along got in between the two. The noise and din made by the opposing factions for supremacy was more than the horse could stand, and consequently, he bolted. In this sudden escapade, he broke the reins of the driver, smashed the willetree, and scooted down the street like a streak of blue lightning, with the farmer vociferously shouting, and his thick stock of hair streaming in wild confusion in the air, following up in the rear. It was a stern chase, but at last the farmer, with the assistance of a lot of boys, ran the animal into a deserted yard, where he was cornered and captured.

Literary Notes.

THE steady policy of the Century Magazine seems to be to make every number surpass its predecessor in the excellence of its illustrations and the interest of its reading matter.

FRANK LESLIE'S POPULAR MONTHLY.—The June number opens with a coloured picture, artistic in design and finish, entitled "A Morning Call." The contents embrace valuable articles—historical, biographical, scientific, natural history, etc., contributed by E. V. Smalley, H. D. Woolfe, Duyckinck, Noel Runyen, Elsom and other popular author. There are a variety of short stories, sketches adventures and poems of great merit and exceedingly interesting. Indeed the 128 quarto pages are brilliant with literary and artistic attractions; the illustrations number over one hundred!

FARM AND DAIRY.

How to Build a Silo.

The first silos as we have seen, were simple pits dug in the ground, and the soil thrown out was used to cover and protect the ensilage. In many soils these pits serve but temporary purpose; and the next step in their development was a lining of masonry to give the pits a permanent character. From the difficulty of keeping the water out of these pits in many localities, silos of masonry were made above ground, and these at first were massive and expensive. The next step in advance, which quite naturally followed, was, to substitute a movable cover of boards, with weights to give the required pressure, for the cover of earth which had been used in the less perfect form of the silo. As an air-tight inclosure was found to be the essential condition in the construction of a silo, higher walls were made as a matter of economy, with good results, and even frames of timber, lined with boards and planks, were substituted for the more expensive structures, with complete success.

A balloon-frame of scantling of suitable size, covered on the outside with matched boards, and lined on the inside with two thicknesses of one-inch match boards, with a layer of tarred paper between them, thus securing a practically air-tight inclosure surrounded by a dead-air space as a protection against frost, is, the opinion of the writer, the best and cheapest form of construction. If the boards and timber are saturated with hot coal-tar, which can readily be done with trifling expense, the durability of the silo will be very much increased. From the fact that wood is not so good a conductor of heat as walls of masonry, it will be seen from what follows, that wooden silos may have an important advantage over any others in preserving the ensilage, which in connection with the saving of expense in their construction, must have an influence in bringing them into general use.—Manly Miles, M. D., in June Popular Science Monthly.

A Suggestion for Cheese Factories.

As a specimen of cheesemaking art we have seen nothing lately that compares with the make of the C. F. Bullock factory at Bennet's corners. Their September cheese last year was made expressly to supply a home demand. Ira L. Snell the salesman of the factory, informs ous that it was strickly a sweet-cured cheese. The whey was drawn before it had soured in the least and the curd was salted and put to press at once, without the development of acid. The result was a porous cheese which would not meet the views of shippers, but the eating qualities of which are admirably suited to the wants of home customers. The cheese to-day is rich and mellow, and as perfect in flavor as could be desired. Without being sharp or stinging, it has just enough tang to make it delicious to the palate, and it leaves a perfectly clean taste in the mouth. Mr. Snell informs us that last year he kept some of the make of September, '82, until July and August and it remained just as perfect as this. We make special mention of these facts for the benefit of other factories, which might, if they tried, market a portion of their make at home, at better prices than they can get in the geneeal market. Mr. Snell sold about all of his September and October cheese at something like a cent above the leading price of the Utica market.—Utica Herald.

Milk Fever.

In some localities frequent cases of milk fever in cows have been developed this spring, even though the cows have come in before going to grass. It is more prevalent during certain seasons than at others, the reason of which is difficult to explain. As a rule, there is much more danger to be apprehended when cows come in directly after going to grass. Then the milk ducts and secretions are extended abnormally and when that occurs, it is the proper time to guard against milk fever, which desease seeks its victims among the best animals in the herd and those in the highest condition, seldom attacking an ordinary cow. It is wise to look sharp after such valuable cows soon after going to grass, and when about to come in. If the bag becomes fully extended, it is safe to draw away some milk daily before calving. After the cow drops her calf, protect her from wet and from undue exposure generally; give warm drink sparingly, feed on grain until all danger is past, apply cold water freely to the bag, and if she shows any symptoms of trouble with her milk give a small portion of salts with a tablespoonful of saltpetre, and after operation follow with a warm bran mash. If vigilance and care are used, fatal cases will seldon occur. Dairymen should ever bear in mind that one ounce of pervention is worth more than a pound of cure.

Beef Cows in the Dairy.

THE Rural Californian has an interesting argument against the beef cow in the dairy, in which it says that the dairy cow produces seven times her own live weight in milk yearly and half her weight in cheese besides a large amount of butter. We do not suppose this means that she does all of these things every year but we agree with the Rural in the further argument that the cheese and butter are worth as food three times as much as an equal weight of beef, and this produce is kept up for ten years. The comparative value of a dairy cow is then equivalent to a beef animal of three times her weight every year, and if such a steer could be killed ever year for ten years it would be worth as much as a cow and no more. So that one good cow is realy worth as a producer of food, as much as ten fat beeves of 2 500 pounds each, and her calves and her beef at the end of her useful life are thrown in. The only thing is that we would not want the contract to fatten her for the pleasure of eating her. We will leave that to those dairymen who think it profitable to carry a large proportion of bone and belly ten years to make a second-rate beef of.

Notes.

Four hundred and seventy thousand dollars worth of eggs were imported from Canada in three months of 1883.

Unworked butter melted and mixed with vinegar and simmered together makes a good ointment for sore or chapped cows teats.

Scalding the milk befor feeding will usually remedy scours in calves if taken in time. Checking the discharge too suddenly is a common mistake, as the druge usually given for this purpose permantly injure the digestion, which is all important for the animal either for beef or milk.

Much damage is done to pastures by letting stock on them too early in the Spring. Not only is the grass injured by being bitten too closely, but the treading by the stock when the ground is soft greatly injures the grass roots and they will not recover for a long time. Stock should never in any case go on the meadow in Spring. It is expensive pasturing.

This is a critical time for milch cows where the ensilage has given out, and while it is yet too early to cut green food for soiling. A little extra care in feeding with bran and corn-meal now will make the cows better for all Summer. If they are allowed to shrink their milk now the full flow will not be regained until the cow has another calf.

A writer in the Southern Planter thinks that the best way to make ensilage is to cut it down, shock it up and let it stand one week in the field before beginning to cut it up. The advantage of letting it stand for a while is that some of the water sap is evaporated. It seems to be sweeter, and loses that sickening, green smell which fresh green fodder has when cut up.

For very early planting of potatoes some farmers drop sets in every third furrow when plowing. It is an expeditious mode of planting, but of course it is impracticable by this method to make rows more than one way. A more serious objection to this method is that the plow is quite as apt to turn a stone over the potato in stony ground as anything else. The method succeeds best in sod, plowing very shallow and setting the tubers at the outside of each third furrow so the plants will come up between. Straight plowing and furrows of uniform width are essential in this method of planting.

A market gardener had a very fine cow that was milked week after week by hired men. He observed that the amount of butter he carried to market weighed about a pound more on each alternate week. He watched the men and tried the cow after they had finished milking, but always found that there was no milk left in the teats. He finally asked the Scotch girl who took care of the milk if she could account for the difference. "Why, yes," says she, "When Jim milks, he says to the old cow, 'So my pretty muly, so!' but when Sam milks he hits her on the hip and says, 'Hist you old brute.'"

Farmers in England are taking to beet growing. In Norfolk they have undertaken to grow this season at least 900 acres of sugar beet from selected seed, and on the faith of this an association has been formed, which, long before the beet is ready, will have $100,000 worth of plant on the ground ready to make sugar as fast as the roots come in. The farmer will get $5 a ton for the white beet delivered at the works, and as he can grow from fifteen to wenty twenty tons to the acre he will, after allowing for heavy manuring and all cost of land, labor, seed, and transport, be able to reckon, even in an indifferent season, upon a return of at least $15 an acre, which must seem to him, after recent experience, "wealth beyond the dreams of avarice," as Dr. Johnson said of the revenue of Barclay's brewery.

Charles Mathews used to tell, with great glee, a little story of Charles Lamb, which he vouched for as authentic, and believed to be unpublished. One evening Mary Lamb took a violent fancy to have some Stilton cheese for supper—an article of which they had not a scrap in the house. It was very wet, and getting rather late; but Charles, with that self-denial which shows itself in a life-long devotion to his sister, at once volunteered to try whether any could be got. He sallied forth and reached the cheese-monger just as the shutters were being put up. In reply to his demand, he was assured that he had some fine ripe Stilton; and the shopkeeper proceeded to cut off a slice As it lay on the scales, Lamb's attention was forcibly arrested by the lively gambols of maggots which came to the surface of the "fine ripe Stiltin."; "Now, Mr. Lamb," said the cheesemonger, "shall I have the pleasure of sending this home for you?" "No th-th thank you," said Charles, "If you give me a bit of twine, I cou cou-could, perhaps, l-l-l-lead it home.

TEMPERANCE.

"Horrible London" and Strong Drink.

Canon Farrar in a late address referring to the agitation in London concerning the condition and needs of the multitudes of the outcast poor, says: "We have heard much in these days of 'Horrible London,' and of the bitter cry of its object. What makes these slums so horrible? I answer with certainty, and with the confidence of one who knows—drink. What is the remedy? I tell you every remedy you attempt will be a miserable failure. I tell the nation, with conviction founded on experience, that there will be no remedy till you save these outcasts from the temptation of drink. Leave the drink, and you might build them palaces in heaven; leave the drink, and before the year is over your palaces would be reeking with dirt and squalor, with infamy and crime."

An Ounce of Prevention.

Our children must be taught to avoid alcohol and narcotics. A prepossession against unhealthy stimulants and narcotics should be rooted in every mind so early that temptations may be met character that is drink-proof. This is far more important than weather-proofing one's house or water-proofing one's dress. It is to fertile brain and warm heart of women that we are indebted for the organization of this sentiment in Pennsylvania. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of that State, hopes to secure the passage of act by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in 1885, providing for the instruction of public school children in the physiology and hygiene of temperance. It seems to us that no scheme, remedial or repressive, can compare with this proposal to secure preventive measures. Michigan has a law which goes into effect in 1884, specifying this educational method as an essential feature of public school instruction. Thoughtful citizens in Vermont and New Hampshire are forwarding similar measures. The Medical News, of August 4, 1883, says: "It is in the school-house that the dram-shop shall find its strongest foe. Give it twenty years and it will win." In the Church Catechism "temperance, and "soberness" are made a part of one's duty to one's neighbors. It has been the misfortune of catechetical instruction too often to dwell more on the doctrinal than on the moral elements contained within the limits of the Catechism. How much more profitable it would be if the ethics of the Catechism were more fully impressed on the children than those mysteries which simply puzzle a child's mind. To create a strong moral bias in children against practical evil will save both their bodies and souls. By all means let this noble theme of temperance be stamped indelibly on Sunday-School children.

Useful Hints.

Some of the English medical journals have already begun to point out the great impotance of not over-feeding infants with starchy foods, such as bread, farina gruel, &c., as the warm season approaches. According to authorities like Sir James Paget, such over-feeding is a fruitful cause of the large infant mortality in the warm weather. The one article most necessary to the life of the child at all times is water.

In a paper read before the Edinburgh Health Society Dr. Almond referred to the custom of having the head covered out of doors and uncovered within doors as very injurious on account of its making people so sensitive to draughts of air as to cause them to take cold. Boys, he said, who went bare-headed out of doors could stand a greater amount of ventilation in school-rooms and sleeping-rooms than those who wear head coverings.

Tinware that is stained with fruits, or otherwise tarnished, may be easily cleaned by dipping a dampened cloth in common cooking soda, and rubbing the ware briskly, after which, rinse and wipe dry.

TO REMOVE DANDRUFF.

Pour a pint of boiling water on a heaping teaspoonful of sulphur in the morning; stir it several times through the day. The next morning turn off the water from the dregs and apply a portion of it to the roots of the hair, thoroughly wetting it. Continue its use daily for six weeks or more, as the case may require, and it will remove the dandruff and cause the hair to become more soft and glossy. A small, soft sponge is the best thing with which to apply it.

A pretty heading for a lace curtain, which is so simple as hardly to deserve to be called a lambrequin, is made of a piece of handsome goods, used to cover furniture with. It may be of any width to suite your taste. The edges should be cut in points, and each point and the notch between the points should have a small tassel. These may be of silk, or they are very tasteful made of crewel, and then picked out with a needle, so that they are soft and fluffy.

A friend whose beautiful plants are the delight of her life and the envy of all her acquaintances revealed the secret of her succes. The soil is about two-thirds good garden soil, and the rest is sand. It is kept light and loose about the roots; they are watered as they appear to need it, and not according to any particular rule; but the chief reason for their wonderful growth and bloom is this:—"When any of the leaves wither and fall, instead of picking them up and throwing them away, I make little rolls of them; and tuck them down in the earth and let them decay; and this is the only fertilizer I have ever used. "This," she added modestly, "seems to be Nature's way. And the plants that have the afternoon sun, only, grow and rival those that have the morning sun."

Domestic Recipes.

Lemon fritters are delicious. To one cup of milk and one egg allow the juice and pulp of one lemon. These may be served with sauce; in that case add the grated peel of half the lemon to flavor the sauce.

Muffins without soda, if baked in a hot oven, will be light and excellent. Take one cup of sweet milk, one cup of flour, one egg well beaten, about the third of a teaspoonful of salt. Have your gem pans very hot, fill about half full, and bake. These are nice with butter alone, or with maple sugar syrup added.

An appetizing dish appeared on the table the other day, called on the menu "smothered heart with lemon sauce." It was made of slices of beef heart cooked in a very little water until tender, then dipped in flour and nicely browned in butter. The sauce was of flour, butter, and hot water, and was flavored with lemon. This is to be served as an entree only, and not to take the place of a roast, which forms the piece de resistance at the ordinary dinner.

DEVILED HAM.—Chop cold, cooked ham, and with it the whites of as many eggs as you wish; for about every one-half cupful of the ham, make a salad dressing of the yelk of a hard-boiled egg, rubbed smooth with a little butter, and a teaspoonful of mustard, half a teaspoonful of sugar. Add enough vinnegar to make it quite thin; then stir in the chopped ham. It is nice eaten with bread and butter, or to make sandwiches for the children to carry to school. These sandwiches are also greatly relished at pic-nis.

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

ADDRESSES A BIG AUDIENCE IN TORONTO.

Clear Exposition of Liberal Views.

The Grand opera house was filled on last Tuesday night, when Sir Richard Cartwright stepped forward to commence his first address to a Toronto audience. The audience was one of the most intelligent, judging both from action and appearance, that could be gathered in any city in America. The speaker was accorded a careful and quiet hearing, with the exception of one interuption. The speech was one that deeply interested the audience.

Capt. McMaster occupied the chair. On the platform, among others, were Hon. Edward Blake, Hon. Alex. Mackenzie, Hon. Oliver Mowat, Hon. T. B. Pardee, Hon. A. S. Hardy, Hon. A. M. Ross, Hon. T. W. Anglin, Sir William Howland, G. W. Bagerow, M. P. P., John Dryden, M. P. P., J. D. Edgar, William Johnston, Peter Ryan, John Cameron, Robert Jaffray, B. B. Osler, Q. C., and a score of equally prominent Reformers,

Sir Richard Cartwright was greeted with a round of applause that increased to a cheer that was repeated again and again. His opening remarks were devoted to a statement of the causes that led him, fourteen years ago, to forsake the Conservative party. He had had sufficient cause for that action in his history, he said, and though he had the highest respect for every honest Conservative that could give a reason for the faith that was in him, yet he had never seen cause to repent or feel ashamed of his action. Good sound Conservatives were as necessary as ballast to a ship, but when they were led by bad and unscrupulous men they became shifting ballast, the most unstable ballast that could be used.

He would first, he said, devote his attention to the aims of the Liberal party, and he was sorry if he would be compelled to say some things that were not pleasant. He held the opinion that the people of Canada had in some important respects retrograded from the high position they occupied some years ago. They had a less firm hold on liberty, less of self-government than they were possessed of fifteen or twenty years ago. Yet this was not unnatural. It was always easier to attain than to retain liberty, and with them, as politics became more complicated, and other pursuits more lucrative, it was more and more difficult to get the best men of the country to undertake the task of governing the country. In the United States, after independence had been obtained, the government of the nation fell more and more into the hands of inferior men, and that history was being repeated in Canada.

Ontario, he said, was far from possessing her due weight in the councils of the government, while Quebec had greatly more than her share, and in the history of the United States, and the deplorable results of governmont by inferior men and place-hunters, there was a warning for the provinces. He did not blame Quebec, but he did blame the representatives of Ontario who would not stand up for their rights as the Quebec delegates did.

This being so, what an opening there was for an unscrupulous man to seize on power and hold it, and how more and more difficult it became to oppose him.

The difficulties they had to face were these: They were practically confronted with a sinister combination such as any country on earth rarely had to face. The leaders of their opponents and of the government were perfectly unscrupulous men whom their followers knew to be so, and drew their inferences therefrom. Behind them was a large body of contractors, who found it very convenient to subscribe to a testimonial, to aid in an election, or to subsidize a newspaper. After these came a small, though very powerful body of monopolists, and following them an array of place and subsidy hunters that were very leeches upon the country. And lastly come a legion possessed with the idea that the government existed for the special purpose of granting special privileges to special favorites. They must further consider that these had all been well-drilled by a Past Grand Master in the art, and then they could form some idea of the difficulties that had to be faced.

He declared explicity that they had not a free government, but a government by bribery, the like of which had never been seen in the world. Walpole he thought, was not a patch on the present government, as far as bribery was concerned. When the men that were elected in 1878 were elected it was as if the people of the United States had, knowing the records of the men, elected Boss Tweed for president, with Jim Fisk as his minister of railways, and Oakes Ames to handle the money. And the consequences, they might be sure, would be the same if they did not take care.

Sir Richard said the proofs of all he had said were to be found in the records of the country, past and present. This brought him to the question of our financial condition, which he dealt with exhaustively. Some of his figures are very interesting. At the time of confederation our population was 3,375,000, and our expenditure $13,500,000. In 1874 our population was 3,830,000, and our expenditure $23,316,000. In 1878 our population was 4,124,000, and our expenditure $23,500,000. In 1884 our population had only increased to 4,400,000, but our expenditure had increased to the formidable dimensions of $31,000,000. There never was, he contended, a more disgraceful exhibit. Here, in times of prosperity, and at peace with all the world, we were as bad off financially as the United States was in 1867 after four years of disastrous and desolating warfare; and far worse off than the Americans are to-day. In the United States the expenditure was $25 per family and in Canada $35 per family. If in England they had gone in as we had the expenditure would be $170,000,000, instead of $85,000,000, and in the United States it would have been eight hundred millions instead of only two hundred and sixty-five millions. From 1867 to 1884 the various governments of Canada had collected from all sources of revenue $420,000,000. Add to this $52,000,000 tacked on last session, and $133,000,000 that had been borrowed and spent, and which they had the pleasure of paying interest for, and in all the total amount was $550,000,000, or $600 for every family in the land, that had been expended during the past seventeen years.

In 1883, $40,000,000 was exacted from the people of the Dominion, and they must remember that three-fifths of that sum was paid by the Province of Ontario. It was no wonder that many Canadians left the country to escape such excessive burdens. That such was the case was easily proven. The United States census of four years ago showed that 700,000 native-born Canadians were residents of the United States. Further, our own returns showed that of 342,000 emigrants whose passage had been paid to Canada by the Canadian government, scarcely 90,000 remained. He had nothing to say against money wisely spent in bringing to our shores those who would assist in developing the resources of the country but he had much to say against spending $500,000 a year in bringing over men who had to be supported by charity after their arrival, or who earned a living by displacing our own laborers.

The taxes on the people were really $45 per family, and if this was computed at 4 per cent., the result in the last forty years was equal to a mortgage of $1,100 on every family in the land. He did not believe it was possible to inflict this huge burden of taxation, and at the same time confer a benefit. His reason taught him that it was impossible to make a people rich by adding to their burdens, though that had been the theory upon which this country had been governed during the last half-dozen years. He quoted further statistics to show that in all the years while the American people had been growing and developing into a great nation, they had been economically and frugally governed; governed in a way that gave Canadians cause to blush. The difference between the two countries was just the difference between honest government and government by dishonest means.

The speaker then turned his attention to the governmental acts of legislation of last session. He dealt in a masterly manner with the Canada Pacific loan, and said the subsidies to the provinces were simply a huge system of bribes, to reconcile prominent followers to that loan. He also dealt at length with the Mousseau affair, the Exchange bank loan, the Chapleau scandal, the Calgary land scheme of Lieutenant-Governor Robitaille, the Sir Charles Tupper whitewashing act, and the Section B. affair.

At this stage of the address John A. Macdonnell stood up in the audience and asked what fee a certain lawyer had received for advocating the cause of the contractors before the arbitrators. John was greeted with hisses and loud cries of "put him out," "knock him down," etc. Finally he was induced to subside, and upon leaving his seat and the building a few minutes after was greeted with a perfect storm of hisses.

Sir Richard said he neither knew nor cared who defended these men, but when they got a large sum of money awarded them, and when John Shield failed as he had done, to press his libel suit against the Globe, he felt justified in saying that the money was not given for a good purpose or spent righteously. At any rate he could say

With every feature of the job complete,
If it be honest 'tis a devilish cheat.

He then turned his attention to the late ministry, and euglogized Mr. Mackenzie. That gentleman, he said, had fallen in 1878 because he would not bribe. He might have offended by being too stubbornly honest. At any rate the people in 1878 had decided that they wanted the unjust steward, and a nice specimen they got. Mackenzie thought of country first, party next, and lastly of himself, and therefore had been most hopelessly defeated.

The aim of the Reform party should be: To stop this systematic corruption; to maintain the local rights of the provinces; to redress and amend the present fiscal system; to educate the people to a better sense of their public duty; to amend the present constitution of the Senate; and, if possible, to destroy the effect of the gerrymander and obtain a fairer representation in the House of Commons.

Sir Richard then entered upon a speculative phase of politics, and announced that in so doing he was speaking for himself alone. He had found, he said, a great unrest, a doubt as to the stability of our present governmental institutions. That feeling would develop and to meet it they had before them three courses. The first was annexation to the United States, a course that did not for a moment receive his approval. Next came the question of independence of which he did approve, a sentiment which the audience cheered to the echo. Lastly, they could form a federation of all the English-speaking people of the world. This scheme might be too vast; if so, they must prepare for self government. He concluded a speech of two hours' duration by asking the audience to ponder well the thoughts he had placed before them. Upon taking his seat he was loudly cheered.

In response to calls from the audience, Hon. Edward Blake and Hon. Alex. Mackenzie each shortly addressed the people, after which the meeting came to a close.

A BLESSING TO ALL MANKIND.

In these times when our newspapers are flooded with patent medicine advertisements, it is gratifying to know what to procure that will certainly cure you. If you are bilious, blood out of order, Liver inactive, or generally debilitated, there is nothing in the world that will cure you so quickly as Electric Bitters. They are a blessing to all mankind, and can be had for only fifty cents a bottle of John Gayfer. [2t

NOTHING gives such beautiful colours as the Star Dyes.

C. A. Livingstone, Plattsville, says: "I have much pleasure in recommending Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil, from having used it myself, and having sold it for some time. In my own case I will say for it that it is the best preparation I have ever tried for rheumatism."

What's gone, and what's past help
Should be past grief.

WE believe the cause of the wonderful success of our MURRAY & LANMAN'S FLORIDA WATER may be found in the fact that the principal aim in its preparation has always been to give the simple natural perfume of flowers, without any chemical addition whatever, and to avoid, by all means, the great error of making a heavy, sickly, sweet perfume.

Want of care does us more damage than want of knowledge.

A Berlin correspondent writes: 'A singular light is thrown on the moral condition of the Berlin population from the fact that on Wednesday of last week no fewer than five trials came off in three different law courts which necessitated the strict exclusion of the public.'

One of the best stories told of the late Duke of Buccleuch was his rebuke to the servant of a gentleman who was staying at Dalkeith on a visit. The proud stomach of the gentleman's gentleman would not sit at table with the lower servants. He complained to the Duke that he was accustomed only to mix with the upper servants. 'Very well,' said the Duke, 'ask your master to let you dine with him and me. You may, for all I care.' The gentleman's gentleman ceased to grumble at having to dine in common with the lesser domestics after that.

A LULLABY.

From Chambers' Journal.

Sleep, my child! the shadows fall;
Silent darkness reigns o'er all;
Bird and bloom are lost to sight
In the folded arms of night.
Stars will soon from cloud towers peep;

Breathe thou softly! Rest is sweet
For tired hearts and aching feet:
No dull care nor toil is thine—
Nor sin, thou blessed child of mine;
Tranquil on thy soft couch rest,
With dreams of heaven in thy breast.

Buds are sleeping; close thine eyes;
Waken with a soft surprise;
Greet the morning with thy smile,
And sweet prattle without guile.
Scents lie sleeping in the flowers;
Slumber till the daylight hours.

Sleep! Thy father guides thy rest;
Lay thy head upon my breast;
Safer than these arms which hold thee,
His dear love will firm enfold thee;
Higher love than mine shall He
Give beloved one, to thee!

Sleep! The waves have long been sleeping;
Angles o'er thee watch are keeping;
O'er us both the pale stars shine
With a radiance half divine,
Slumber, innocent and lightly,
Fall from heaven on thee to-night.

An Ambitious Woman.

BY EDGAR FAWCETT.

CHAPTER XXI.

It is doubtful if any guest save Mrs. Diggs and one other had seen Claire either receive, open or read her note. The constant movement of the servants hither and thither, and the little conversational cliques formed among the ladies at this central stage of the entertainment, would have made such an escape from general notice both natural and probable. But Mrs. Diggs, who had thus far kept a furtive though incessant watch upon Mrs. Lee, soon felt certain that her cousin had not merely seen what had passed; she was visibly affected by it as well; she could not help regarding Claire across the considerable space which intervened between them. Her expression was a most imprudent betrayal; it clearly told, by its acerbity and exultance, that she held the present occasion to be one of prodigious and triumphant import. No one except Mrs. Diggs was watching her, and she was unaware of even that sidelong but intent gaze. The natural mobility of her odd face, which repelled some and attracted others, needed at all times a certain check; but chagrins or satisfactions were both readily imprinted there. It corresponded to the pliability of her body; it would have been a face in which some clever actress might have found a fortune. She usually restrained it with discretion, but just now the force of malign joy swept aside prudent control. Before Mrs. Diggs's exploring search of it ended, her last doubt had fled.

"I never saw her look more like the snake that she is," Claire's friend had thought. "The mischief—the deviltry, it may be—lies in that letter. Claire has grown as white as its paper; but nobody notices that, thank Heaven! She won't faint—she isn't of the fainting sort."

"Claire," she now said aloud, yet in tones which the most adroit of eavesdroppers could not have more than just vaguely overheard, "did you get any bad news a minute ago?"

Claire was no longer addressing the lady at her side. "Why do you ask?" she responded. "Do I look pale?"

"Not at all; not the least in the world; I've never seen you more composed," returned Mrs. Diggs with enormous mendacity, hoping that her charitable lie would bear reassuring and tranquilizing results.

It did, as soon became apparent. Claire's condition was that in which we grasp at straws. Perhaps she grew several shades less pale on hearing that she was not so.

"I must leave the room," she said, pronouncing the words with the edges of her lips. "I must leave immediately."

"Are you unwell?"

"No—yes—it isn't that. I must go. Could I do it without—without—?" She paused here; she had not enough clearness of thought, just then, to finish her sentence coherently.

"Without causing remark?" gently broke in Mrs. Diggs. Why, of course you could, my dear. Are you not hostess? A hundred things might call you away for a little while. No one would dream of thinking it in the least strange. Why on earth should one?"

There was a light nonchalance about this answer that Mrs. Diggs by no means felt. She knew that something had gone terribly wrong. Her rejoinder had been a stroke of impromptu tact, just as her recent glib falsehood had been.

Its effect upon Claire was immediate. Her friend was doing her thinking for her, so to speak, and was doing it with a rapid, unhesitating aplomb.

"You don't know what has happened, do you?" she now said.

Mrs. Diggs at once felt the helpless disability of mind and nerves which this last faltered question implied.

"Give me your note," she said. "Slip it under the table, you will not be seen."

Claire obeyed. Mrs. Diggs had long ago learned how and why her friend had left home, before that episode began of her residence with the Bergemanns. She read the note like lightning, and digested its contents with an almost equal speed. The spread of its writing was uncouth enough, but not illegible.

For a slight space horrified sympathy kept her silent. Then she said with a coolness and placidity that did her credit, considering the cause in which she employed them:

"I would go at once. You can keep everything quiet. Of course you can. I will follow you shortly. I will make a perfect excuse for you. You are feeling a little unwell—that is all. No one has noticed; take my word for that; I am simply certain of it. When you return—which I promise you you shall do quite soon—scarcely a comment will have been made on your absence. Go, by all means. Go at once, as I said."

"Some of her color has come back," at the same time passed through Mrs. Diggs's anxious and agitated thoughts. "I knew she wouldn't faint; it isn't in her. She will see that I am right in a minute. Her wits will begin to work. She will go."

Claire did go. She had no after recollection of how she left the great dining-room. But she had indeed moved from it in no silent and so swift a way that her chair had been vacant several seconds, and her skirts were sweeping one of the thresholds of exit, before the fact of her departure became even half perceived among the guests.

Once in the large, empty drawing-room immediately beyond that which she had quitted, she felt her leaping heart grow quiet, and her bewildered brain clear. It took only seconds, now, to restore in a great measure her self-possession and her courage.

She passed into the further drawing-room. Both were as void of human occupant as they were rich and stately in their countless beauties of adornment. Her visitor was not there. Then she remembered the smaller reception-room which opened off from the main hall. She directed her steps thither. They were firm steps; she had grown sensible of this, and of her newly acquired composure as well.

Two breadths of Turkish tapestry hung down over the doorway of the reception-room, thus obscuring its interior. As Claire softly parted them and entered, she saw her mother.

Mrs. Twining stood near a white-and-gilt table that was loaded with choice ornaments. The chamber was one of great elegance and charm. It was all white and gilt and pink; there were cherubs on the ceiling throwing roses at each other; its hangings were of rose-color, and its two or three mirrors were framed in porcelain of rare design. A connoisseur who was among Claire's admirers had once assured her that this little room was exquisite enough to stir the dust of Pompadour.

Mrs. Twining did not look at all as though she might have been any such famous ghost. Not that she did not present a ghostly appearance. Her black eyes seemed to be twice their former size, so lean and haggard was her altered face. Its cheek-bones stood out with sharp prominence. You saw at once that some serious illness had wrought this wan havoc. Her garments were dark and decent; she did not seem to be a beggar; no rusty and shabby poverty was manifest on her person. She had refused stoutly to wait in the hall, and the servant who had admitted her, being hurried with other matters, had yielded to her insistence, yet deputed an underling to keep watch on the reception-room after showing her thither. Claire had not seen the sentinel, who was stationed at a little distance up the hall, and who joined his fellows when sure that the lady of the house had condescended to meet this troublesome intruder.

Mrs. Twining looked boldly and severely at her daughter. The drapery had fallen behind Claire's advancing figure. The two faced each other in silence for a lapse of time that both no doubt thought longer than it really was. Each, in her different way, had an acute change to confront. Claire scarcely recognized her mother at first. Mrs. Twining, on her own side, had good reason to be prepared for a difference, and the superb human frame had in a way told her, too, what she might expect. But still, for all that, this was Claire! This was her Claire, whom she had last seen not far removed from slums and gutters—who had gone forth from the little Greenpoint home, not two years since, to follow her father's charity-buried corpse! And here she stood, clad in her white-and-purple vestments, a shape of more lovely and high-bred elegance than any she had ever looked upon. The face was the same—there could be no doubt of that. But everything else—the figure, the attire, the jewels, the velvets, the laces, the movement, the posture, the mein . . . it was all like some fabulous, incredible enchantment.

Forewarned and forearmed as she had been, Mrs. Twining stood wonder-stricken and confused. The soft strains of the near music seemed to speak to her instead of Claire's own voice, and with a disdain in their melody. She saw no disdain on Claire's face, however, as her eyes scanned it. But it was quite inflexible, though very pale.

Claire broke the silence—if that could be called mere silence which was for both so electric and pregnant an interval.

"You have come at a strange time. And your note shows that you chose it purposely."

Mrs. Twining gave a sombre laugh. What associations the sound woke in its hearer!

"I was all ready for just this kind of a welcome," she said, knitting her brows. She began to stare about the room. "It's very fine. It's mighty splendid. But I wonder the walls of this house don't fall and crush you, Claire Twining: I wonder I ain't got the power, myself, to strike you dead with a look!" Her voice now became a growl of menace; there was something very genuine in her wrath, which she had persuaded herself to believe an outgrowth of hideous ingratitude. "But I didn't come to show you your own badness," she went on. "You know all about that a'ready. What I've come for is to quite another kind of a thing—oh, yes, quite." Here she laughed again, with her mouth curving downward grimly at each corner.

"What have you come for?" inquired Claire.

"To get my rights!—that's what I've come for! To let the people see who I am, and how you've cast me off—me, your mother. I'd'clare I don't believe there ever was so horrible a case before. Perhaps some o' the folks in yonder can tell you if they ever knew one."

Claire kept silent for a moment. Her face was white to the lips, but there was no sign of flinching in it.

"I did not cast you off," she said. "I left you because you outraged and insulted the dead body of my father. I have never regretted the step I took, nor do I regret it now. You say you've come here to get your rights. What rights? Shelter and food? You shall receive these if you want them. I will ring and give orders at once that you shall be taken to a comfortable room and be treated with every care that it is in my power to bestow. In spite of what I said to you on the day when you shocked and tortured me into saying it, I would still have sought you out and rendered you my best aid, if I had known that you were ill. For I see that you have been ill—your appearance makes that very plain. But I had no knowledge of any such fact. You were stronger than I when we parted—stronger, indeed, and better able to work. This is all I am willing to say at present. In an hour or two I will join you, and hear anything you may chose to tell me."

While Claire was in the midst of this rather prolonged reply, Mrs. Diggs quietly entered the room. The speaker saw her, and did not pause for an instant, but put forth her hand, which Mrs. Diggs took, while she steadily watched the large, gaunt, hollow-cheeked woman whom her friend addressed.

If anything could have intensified the vast sense of accumulated wrong in Mrs. Twining's breast, it was this placid appearance of one who so promptly indicated that she stood toward Claire in a supporting and accessory attitude.

"So, you'll make terms, will you?" said the parent of Claire. "You'll browbeat me—me, your mother,—with your fine clothes and fine house and fine servants? And where's my satisfaction, if you please, miss? Hey? Oh, I ain't any saint—you know that by this time. I ain't going to forget how I laid eight months in Bellevue Hospital, crippled and nearly dying. First it was the typhoid fever, 'n then it was the pneumonia, 'n then it was the inflammatory rheumatism. And where were you all that time? Spending your thousands as fast as the Wall Street stock-gambler you married could scrape 'em together. Who's this friend that steps in and looks as if she was going to protect you? Hey? You're both afraid I'll go in among those grand folks you've got eating and drinking somewheres, and speak my mind. You'll send me up to a comf'table room, will you? You'll give orders to your servants about me, will you? And s'pose I object to be treated like a troublesome tenth or 'leventh cousin? S'pose I go straight into where they all are, and just tell 'em the square, plain truth?" The scowl on her wasted face was very black, now. She had made several quick steps nearer to Claire and Mrs. Diggs. Once or twice during this acrid tirade she had waved one hand in front of her, and made its finger and thumb give a contemptuous audible click. But her voice had not noticeably lowered.

Claire had been watching her with great keenness. She had been reading her mood. By the light of the past—the retrospective light flung from weary years lived out at this mother's side, did this daughter now swiftly see and as swiftly understand.

"Claire," said Mrs. Diggs, spurred by an impulse of heroic interference no less than an alarmed one, "let me speak a few words; let me—"

"No," interrupted Claire. Her simple veto seemed to cut the air of the room. She turned and met Mrs. Diggs' gaze for a moment, while dropping her hand. "I thank you Kate; but please leave all to me."

Then she faced her mother's irate glare. She was still decidedly pale, but in her clear voice there was no hint of tremor.

"Very well," she said, "suppose you do go in and find my friends. Suppose you do tell them everything. I do not merely invite you to go; I challenge you to go. I will even show you the way myself."

"Claire!" faltered Mrs. Diggs, below her breath.

Claire walked toward the curtained doorway and slightly parted its draperies. She was looking at her mother across one shoulder.

"Will you come?" she asked. "I am quite ready."

The enraged look began to die from Mrs. Twining's face. She receded a little. "I can go myself when I choose," she muttered. "I can find the way myself, when I'm ready. I ain't ready yet."

Claire let the draperies fall. She resumed her former position. "You will never be ready," she said with melancholy scorn, "and you know it as well as I. You thought to come here and make me cringe with terror before you, while you threatened and stormed. But you had no intention of bringing matters to any crisis. You think me very prosperous, very powerful, and very rich. You are secretly glad that I am. You would not on any account harm me as a person of importance; but you wanted to keep me as one in a state of rule, a state of subjection. By that means you could climb up to a place something like my own . . . so you have argued. You would share what I have secured. You were always a very ambitious woman. Your sickness (which heaven knows I am sorry enough to hear about) hasn't changed you a particle. I thought at first that it might have turned or clouded your brain—have made you reckless of consequences. But it has done nothing of the sort. You are precisely the same as ever."

Here Claire paused. Her mother had sunk into a chair. In her working lips and the uneasy roll of her eyes a great, abrupt dismay was evident.

"I think I can guess just what has occurred to send you here," Claire soon proceeded. "You became sick; you got into the hospital. While you were there a certain lady now and then visited your bedside. You told this lady who you were. Perhaps she asked you questions and drew out all your history—perhaps you gave her all of it voluntarily. The lady was an enemy of mine. She put this and that together. She began by suspecting; she finished by being certain. We will say that you described me to her with great accuracy; or we will say that she knew I had once lived with the Bergemann family, and that you easily recalled the fact of Sophia Bergemann having been my friend long ago at Mr. Arcularius' school. It is of no consequence how the real truth transpired, it did transpire. As you grew better the lady formed a little plot. I think you perceived this; it is like you to have perceived it. You saw that the lady wanted to make you her tool, her cat's-paw."

Here Mrs. Twining rose, and put out both hands. "She didn't do it, though," was her flurried exclamation. "She thought she'd have me come here and get him some. I was cute enough to see that. I was reading her just like a book, all the time."

"I have no doubt of it," said Claire, with the same melancholy scorn. "But you chose this time at which to come. You were willing to be her accomplice that far."

"She wouldn't tell me where you lived nor what was your name," protested Mrs. Twining. "She kept putting me off whenever I asked her. She fixed things at the hospital so's I only left it to-day; she made 'em keep me there, though I was well enough to quit more'n a week ago."

"She told you to-day, then, of this entertainment? She told you that if you came to-day, at a certain hour, you would find me surrounded by friends?"

Mrs. Twining set her eyes on the floor. She had begun to tremble a little. "Well, yes, she said something of that sort. And I knew what she was up to, just as clear as if she'd told me she had a grudge against you and was crazy to pay it. I was going to stay away till the party was all over—but I . . . well, I . . ."

Here the speaker raised her eyes and flashed them confusedly at her daughter. That glance was like the expiring glow of her conquered, treacherous wrath.

"Look here, Claire, I'm weak, and I can't stand this kind of thing much longer. Let me go up to that room and lay down. I'll wait till you come up. We can talk more when all your big friends have gone."

"I will send a woman to you," said Claire. "You can give her what orders you please. . . ."

"Do you feel strong enough to go back at once?" asked Mrs. Diggs, when she and Claire stood, presently in the front drawing-room.

"Oh, yes, perfectly," was Claire's answer.

Mrs. Diggs kissed her. "Claire," she said, "the more I see of you, the more you astonish me. I thought everything was lost, and how splendidly you turned the tables! Ah, my dear, you were born for great things. You ought to have been on a throne. I hate thrones. I'm a Red Republican, as I told you the first time we met. But I'd change my politics in a minute if you represented an absolute monarchy."

Claire smiled. The color was coming back to her cheeks. "I am on a kind of throne now," she said. "Only it's going to pieces. Kate, you have seen that woman. She is my mother. I wish you had seen and known my father. Whatever strength there is in me comes from her. But what little good there is in me comes from him."

They went back into the dining-room immediately afterward, and Claire spoke with lightness to a few of the ladies about having felt a temporary indisposition, which had now entirely ceased. She at once changed the subject, and throughout the remainder of the repast betrayed not a sign by which the most alert watcher could have detected the least mental disturbance.

A watcher of this sort was Mrs. Lee, and both Claire and Mrs. Diggs were certain of it. "She hasn't tasted a morsel for three courses," soon whispered the latter. "Upon my word I don't think I could be restrained from throwing a glass or a plate at her, if I were sure it wouldn't hit someone else. I was always a wretched shot."

But Mrs. Diggs delivered another kind of missile after the banquet had broken up and the ladies had all passed once again into the drawing-rooms.

"I want to speak with you, Sylvia, if you don't object," she said dryly to Mrs. Lee. The latter had opportunely strayed away from her companions; she was pretending to scrutinize a certain painting in the front apartment. This gave Mrs. Diggs precisely her desired chance.

"You know I never liked you, Sylvia, and I don't think you ever liked me," her cousin began. She showed no anger; her voice was so ordinary in tone that she might have been discussing the most commonplace of matters.

Mrs. Lee started, and twisted herself, as usual, into a fresh pose. "I really don't see the occasion, Kate," she murmured, "for this vast amount of candor." She had got back her old drawl. She was concerned with a knot of roses at her bosom, which had or had not become partially unfastened; her gaze was drooped toward the roses, and thus avoided that of her kinswoman.

"You don't see the occasion for candor, Sylvia? I do. You know just what you have tried to do this morning. There is no use of denying."

"Tried to do?" she repeated, raising her eyes.

"Yes," sped Mrs. Diggs, with a kind of snap in every word. "We've never liked each other, as I've said, and I prefaded my remarks with this statement to show you why, from to-day henceforth, we are open foes. You would have had Claire Hollister's mother rush like a mad woman into that dining-room. You wanted it. You planned, you plotted it. There's no use of asserting that you didn't."

Mrs. Lee threw back her head. "Oh, very well, since the poor woman," she began, "has really betrayed me, I—"

"Betrayed you?" broke in Mrs. Diggs, "She has done nothing of the sort. If you exacted any promise from her, I know nothing of that—nor does Claire. We understood that you were behind the whole affair, and when Mrs. Twining was taxed with your complicity she did not presume to disavow it."

Mrs. Lee looked at her roses again, and touched some of their petals with a caressing hand.

"If you think me culpable to have told a poor wretch in a hospital the address of a daughter who had deserted her," she said, "I am only sorry that your code of morals should differ so widely from mine."

"Morals?" replied Mrs. Diggs, with a quick laugh that seemed to cackle. "It's amusing, truly, to hear such a word as that from you to me, Sylvia!"

Mrs. Lee again lifted her eyes. She was smiling, and her small, dark head, garnished with a tiny, crimson bonnet, was set very much sideways. "My dear Kate," she said, "did it ever occur to you how enormously vulgar you can be at a pinch?"

"I'd answer that question if I didn't see through the trick of it. We're not talking of manners, if you please; we're talking of morals. Do you consider that there is anything moral in a mean, underhand revenge? That is exactly what you resorted to. To serve a spiteful hatred, you would have had Mrs. Twining dart like a fury into yonder dining-room."

"If it were not unladylike, I should tell you that you are uttering a falsehood."

"Bah! You can tell me so a thousand times, if you want. Why did you never let Claire's mother know her marriage name or her address until to-day? Why did you keep her in the hospital until to-day? Why, unless you wanted to unloose her like a raging lioness?"

"Really Kate, you have passed the bounds of impertinence. You are now simply diverting."

Mrs. Diggs laughed a second time. "I intend to divert you still further, Sylvia, before I have done with you."

Mrs. Lee took a step or two in an oblique direction. The lids of her dark eyes began to move rapidly. "I have the option of declining to be bored," she answered in a muffled voice, "unless you intend personal violence. In that case, you know, there are always the footmen."

"Answer me one question, please, if you have a spark of honesty left. What right had you to believe that Claire Hollister ever wronged her mother?"

"You haven't yet become violent. You are still diverting. So I will answer. She left her alone in poverty, neglect and misery."

"She left her after a life of tyranny and persecution. She left her a strong, hale, able woman. She left her with ten, twenty times as much money in her pocket as Claire herself had—for Claire had scarcely anything, and this persecuted heroine of a mother had enough money to give her dead husband a decent Christian burial, yet refused it. Did she tell you that, Sylvia, when you found her sick in the hospital? Did she tell you how her daughter cried out in grief, beside the very body of a dead and beloved father, that if he only were not laid in Potter's Field—if only he might receive the holy rites of interment, she would work, even slave, for her mother's support? Did she tell you—this model and deeply wronged parent—that her child got from her nothing but a surly refusal? Did she tell you that Claire then, and only then resolved to leave her forever? Did she tell you how Claire, faithful till the last, followed her father, on foot or by street-cars, to his pauper grave, and saw the clod heaped over him as if he had been a dead dog, while she, his lawful wife, stayed shamelessly at home? I will warrant that she made another plausible story, nearly all false, with just a grain of truth. And you readily accepted it, because it suited your malicious ends to do so."

By this time Mrs. Lee had produced an exquisite fan of dark satin, painted with charming figures of birds and flowers. While she used the fan, slowly and gracefully, she answered: "And is it possible that you credit this theatrical improbability, Kate?"

Mrs. Diggs looked stern. "I don't merely believe it—I know it," she said. "I have seen the woman. To see her—to hear her speak, was enough. You, too, have had both experiences."

Mrs. Lee still slowly fanned herself. "That is quite true, I have. The charity-burial story is the purest nonsense, the most preposterous invention on your dear friend's part. That is my confident belief; I assure you it is. Do you want me any more, Kate? Or are you going to keep me here with your wild tales an hour or two longer?"

Mrs. Diggs never in her life, with all her personal deficiencies, looked so simply and calmly dignified as when she responded:

"I shall keep you only a very little while longer, Sylvia. You may or may not have wanted Claire's mother to enter that dining-room. But you had your hour for her coming neatly timed, and any mortification, any distress that you could have inflicted would have been a pleasure to you. But I think that in all this wily and clever performance you quite failed to remember me. I'm very staunch, very loyal to Claire. And I give you my word that your share in the event of to-day shall not go unpunished."

Mrs. Lee stopped fanning herself. "Unpunished?" she repeated haughtily.

"Oh, yes. Are you surprised at the word? Let me explain it. I merely mean that in as short a time as I can possibly command Stuart Goldwin shall know every detail of your recent behaviour. And pray don't have the least fear that he will disbelieve me. He knows how devoted I am to Claire Hollister. You know just how devoted to her he is. I wonder in what kind of estimation he will hold you after I have narrated my little story, not missing a single particular—not one, Sylvia, rest certain of that!"

Mrs. Lee began to fan herself again, and at the same time moved away. Mrs. Diggs' eyes followed the slim, retreating figure. She had already seen that her cousin's face wore an expression of pained affright. Claire's guests had begun to make their farewells. Mrs. Lee did not join them in this civility. She slipped from the drawing-room, instead, unnoticed by any one except her late antagonist, and perhaps Claire herself.

"She will try to meet Goldwin before I do," thought Mrs. Diggs. "But she will not succeed. I, too, will leave without saying good-by to Claire, who might not approve my scheme of chastisement if she learned it. But it is no affair of hers. I am doing it entirely on my own account. I propose to make Sylvia Lee remember this day as long as she lives."

Among the carriages of the departing guests, that of Mrs. Lee was the first one to roll away. The carriage of Mrs. Diggs soon followed it. Both were driven at a rapid rate, and for a certain time in the same direction. But ultimately the courses of the two vehicles diverged.

Each lady sent a telegram to the same destination less than ten minutes afterward. And each lady, after so doing, employed the same formula of reflection: "He will come as soon as he receives it."

But Mrs. Diggs' summons was the more potent; it contained the name of Claire.

CHAPTER XXII.

Goldwin was the recipient of the two telegrams. He went first (being driven rapidly in a cab from his Wall Street place of business) to the house of Mrs. Diggs.

He remained with her for at least two hours. It was now somewhat late in the afternoon. He dined at his club, and by eight o'clock in the evening was ringing the bell of Mrs. Lee's residence.

She was alone, and received him with a freezing manner. "At last you are here," she said.

"At last," he replied, with careless ambiguity, throwing himself into an arm-chair, and looking straight at a very comfortable wood fire that blazed not far off.

"Did you receive my telegram?"

"I did."

"In time to come to me when it entreated you to come?"

"I received it this afternoon. I have been prevented from making my appearance until now."

His voice was quite as cold and distant as her own. She went up to his chair and laid her hand upon his arm.

"Your manner is very abrupt and strange," she said, in greatly softened tones. "Has anything occurred?"

He turned and met her

The Ingersoll Chronicle

AND CANADIAN DAIRYMAN.

THURSDAY, JUNE 5, 1884.

THE Liberals of Hamilton met last night and commenced a thorough organization for the expected election following the resignation of Mr. Thomas Robertson, M. P.

THE Ontario government has issued a report of the geographical surveys in northern Ontario. According to this report it is a grand country, with magnificent mining, fishing, and agricultural resources, and the finest water power on the continent.

WHILE we in Canada have been complaining of rainy, cold weather, the English lament the prevailance of long-continued drought. No such dry season, the cable informs us, has been known for over fifteen years, and the farmers are suffering severely.

THERE are, as Sir Richard Cartwright said in his recent speech, many Liberals who have not always been such. And that class is constantly growing and must continue to grow as the results of the recklessness and corruption at Ottawa press more and more heavily upon the people.

THE law of compensation is illustrated by the effect of the cold wave of a few days ago, which did so much damage to some crops. The low temperature of Wednesday and Thursday last is stated to have killed off millions of parsitical insects, especially those infesting fruit trees. So that while early vegetables have suffered, the fruit crop will probably be much larger on account of the cold snap.

THE London Advertiser in referring to Sir Richard's remarks on independence, says :—Why should he not discuss independence, aye, and advocate it, too, if he feels so disposed? For our part we are glad to see that he is taking the stand every free man should occupy—speaking his mind regardless of who may dissent. No one but a human ostrich imagines for a moment that Canada is ever to remain as she is. Whether the times are ripe for independence is a matter of opinion, but a discussion of the subject is always in season.

THE encouragement of speculative sales of securities and products—sales effected by people who do not own the property sold—is beyond question one of the most serious evils in the commercial world. It causes the markets to be unstable and porperty to have a fictitious value; it demoralizes the public; seduces men from the paths of honor and leads to the violation of trusts, to fraud, embezzlement and robbery in all its forms. Not only do the speculators themselves suffer, lose their honor, their property, and sometimes their lives, but innocent people all over the country suffer.

THE regular Washington correspondent of THE CHRONICLE sends the following gossipy letter anent the coming Presidental election :—The absorbing subject of interest in Washington at present is the National Republican Convention, though there has been a great exodous of politicians and journalists from the Capital to Chicago. Even Congress has practically adjourned for the great act which is to be consummated this week. The Senate has shut up shop altogether, and the House is merely "going through the motions" of existence. Nearly one quarter of the Congressmen of the Republican faith are either in Chicago or on their way there. Of rumours of combinations there is no end, and the difficulty is to separate the wheat from the chaff. There is a beautiful chance for guessing about the result of the convention, but it is a curious fact that, though several millions of people are engaged with this conundrum, the rural voter, sitting around the grocery store in the backwoods of Maine or Minnesota, has just about as much real knowledge on the subject as the best informed men in Washington or Chicago. There seems to be but one thing about which there can be little doubt, and that is that the two candidates who have the most strength at Chicago are the present incumbent of the White House and the late Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine. There are others, of course, who have some strength and will be heard of, but these two are easily the most powerful before the convention.

I hear a great deal of Tilden talk just now in Washington. From some statements it would appear that the Democrats ha ve decided to take the old man alive or dead. As the eccentric "Gabe" Houck, of Oshkosh, expresses it, "Tilden is the man if he is alive, and if he is dead we'll nominate his bones." A prominent democrat lawyer who has just returned from New York tells me that it is the programme to nominate Tilden and Payne or Tilden and Hoadley. "The old man won't run with Hendricks on any terms," he said, "but he will take the nomination if the other name on the ticket is that of a man he thinks would be a proper one to take the office if he should relinquish it. He will head the ticket if the second man is one the people would be willing to elect to the first place, and he believes either Payne or Hoadly would be such a man." Another gentleman, who was one of Mr. Tilden's most confidential managers in 1876, says that after the Republican ticket is put up there'll be a conference of Democratic leaders, and if it is deemed necessary that the old man should step into the breech he will do so, but if it is thought the election can be carried with another candidate then Mr. Tilden will decline and publish a letter saying so, in which case Flower will be the nominee of the July Convention. Flower is characterized by his advocates as a good square man, worth ten or twelve millions, and with courage to put up all that is needed for the election. He has never held office except one term in Congress, at which time he published the whole of the Constitution of the United States as a part of a speech, and then circulated immense numbers of them all over the country, declaring to his friends that he had become convinced that the people needed to read it.

Flower's actual fortune is estimated at about $3,000,000. He made it rather easily by succeeding to the business of Mr. Henry Keep, the great railroad operator in Wall street, who died a few years ago. Keep was a poor newsboy who came down from northern New York and built up a fortune of $10,000,000 by operation in Wall street. At the time of Keep's death Flower was a dealer in Jewelry up in Watertown, in New York, where Keep came from. He started out in his Congressional career with a series of dinners at Wormley's, just above the Treasury, to which Congressmen were invited in squads, so that "go to one of Flowers dinners" became one of the jokes of the season. Rumor had it that the dinners were very bad. The cause was found one day when Wormley was interrogted upon the subject, and said, "of course it was a bad dinner. How could it be anything else at $3 a plate?"

DYNAMITE EXPLOSIONS.

A NUMBER OF BUILDINGS SHATTERED.

Thirteen Persons Wounded and in Hospital —The Reports of the Explosion Resemble Claps of Thunder—The Rosa Faction Jubilant.

London, May 31.—The authorities and public are astounded at the audacity of the dynamiters who planned last night's explosion in Scotland Yard and Pall Mall. The explosion occurred at a time when the sidewalks were thronged with pedestrians and the carriage ways crowded with vehicles returning from the Oaks. The explosion in Scotland Yard frightened many horses on Parliament, Government and Northumberland avenues, sending them ploughing through the crowd and causing many casualties. The explosion in front of the Carlton Club in Pall Mall thoroughly scared the habitues of that aristocratic resort, many of whom rushed bareheaded into the streets, and got home with all possible speed to see if the explosion had extended to their residences. All kinds of rumours are in circulation. Nearly all the houses in St. James' Square suffered from the force of the concussion. Lights in the Army and Navy Club buildings were extinguished and windows blown in. A policeman and a few others of the injured are in a precarious condition. An inspector of the police passed the dynamite placed in Scotland Yard just before it exploded, and many other officers were in its vicinity during the early part of the evening. The excitement among the public is at fever heat. Special editions of the Standard and Echo were issued, giving all the known details of the explosions, and the people are maddened by the thought that no life is safe if such outrages are possible in the heart of the metropolis.

WORSE THAN ANTICIPATED.

The damage caused by the explosion is fully equal to worst anticipations. Dense crowds of excited people are visiting the scene. Policemen are drawn up in line across streets in the vicinity so as to prevent access to the multitudes. Orders have been given that the wreckage shall be left untouched until a thorough examination is made by the Chief Inspector of explosives.

THE SCENE AT ST. JAMES' THEATRE.

At St. James' Theatre, one hundred yards distant, the explosions sounded like two claps of thunder. The audience were seized with alarm, which came near resulting in a panic. Several ladies fainted and men were ready for a stampede.

EFFECT OF A BOMB.

A second bomb in St. James' Square exploded against the residence of Sir Watkin Wynn. It produced a huge white fracture four feet in height by three in breadth. The windows were smashed and furniture damaged.

HOW THEY FIXED IT AT THE CARLTON.

At the Carlton Club dynamite was carried down the steps leading to the kitchens and cellar, and placed under a pathway. The force of the explosion was most destructive on the west side of St. James' Square. Windows in the Duke of Cleveland's house and in the War Office in Pall Mall were shattered. At Sir Watkin Wynn's residence a bomb was thrown over a railing by a pedestrian and lodged upon a stone sill a foot below the dining room.

THE NELSON MONUMENT.

The dynamite under the Nelson monument failed to explode, owing to a defective fuse. Had the sixteen packages exploded the monument would have been demolished and widespread ruin and loss of life caused.

PRESS COMMENTS.

The Telegraph says it behoves in English people to reflect whether further and sterner measures should not be taken to put a stop to the public peril and mischief to which they are now exposed. The Standard declares no concession can be made to the outrage. So far the only result it has attained, has been a failure, and penal servitudes. If the attempt had fully succeeded last night, we could not answer for the reprisals of the London populace. The News thinks the occurrence is evidence that the dynamite conspiracy is more widely spread and served by more astute agents than has hitherto been suspected.

The Times in an editoral says that the brief interval which has elapsed since Mr. Trevelyan introduced his Tenants' Purchase bill shows that the attempt, like all preceding ones, to pacify the Irish irreconcilables, has failed, and that the measure does not come up to their Irish standard. The Times asks how long dynamiters are to fight with only the results of penal servitude. It hints that if the law fails in punishing the perpetrators, reprisal must be expected from the enraged London populace.

La Republique Francais is moved by the recent explosions in London to say that on reflection it believes O'Donovan Rosa's crowd cannot be longer tolerated, and that hound and his cowardly pack should be stamped out at once and forever. The Berlin press, in view of the explosions in London, unanimously urge the necessity of the Powers adopting Bismarck's proposal for a mutual understanding in regard to socialists, anarchists and dynamiters.

RESPECTING the annuities which the Provincial Treasurer proposes to issue it is explained that they are not contingent upon the life of the purchaser, but are in the form of half-yearly payments, continuing for forty years in any event.

CREMATION seems to be becoming popular both in England and the United States. The arguments in favor of burning the bodies of the dead instead of burying them are stronger in the crowded centres of civilization than in the country districts, where land is pentiful. The arguments from a sanitary point of view are all in favor of cremation. The chief argument against it is that it does away with all evidence of poisoning, as the body cannot be exhumed for examination when suspicion arises. But this could be provided against.

THE captain and crew of the Norwegian barque Athena, which went down in a recent collision, were lost because instead of lowering the boats they engaged in prayer for their safety. This is another illustration of the Biblical injunction to work as well as pray, which the Highland ferryman so firmly impressed upon the late Rev. Norman Macleod. The distinguished preacher was crossing in a row-boat from the mainland to one of the western islands, when a heavy storm came up. He was accompanied by a friend, who perceived the danger and suggested that Dr. McLeod should pray for deliverance. "Na, na," replied the boatman, "ye can pray if ye hae a mind tae, but the big ane (Dr. Macleod) maun tak' an oar." The appropriateness of the protest was not lost on the reverend gentleman, and the shore was reached in safety.

THE death of Sir Henry Edward Bartle Frere last Thursday removes one who has been an active servant of the British Government in the Asiatic and African sections of its colonial empire. He was born in Wales March 29, 1815, and at the age of 18 received an appointment in the Bengal civil service. He rose rapidly, rendered great service during the Sepoy mutiny, and became governor of Bombay in 1862. In 1867 he returned to England, was appointed a special commissioner to visit Eastern Africa and inquire into the slave trade, and received the governorship of Cape Colony in 1867, which he held till his resignation in 1880. The Zulu war and the attendant massacres were some of the results of his policy. He was obstinate, with strong opinions of his own, but an able administrative officer. The empire has lost a servant whose zeal exceeded his discretion.

Washington Letter.

Washington, May 26, 1884.

As the time draws nearer for the great quadriennial race at Chicago for the Presidental stakes, the last round of political combinations are being made, and great activity in the cause is manifest here at the Capital. This Presidential year furnishes a noticeable difference from most of its predecessors in one respect. We are now within less than a fortnight of the great struggle, and no man who has any judgement worth speaking of dares risk it by essaying to name the winner. The shrewdest and clearest-headed politicians in Washington do not care to make predictions, for at national conventions it is the unexpected that usually happens. It has been so twice in the history of the Republican party, and the third time may possibly come this year. In the see-saw game of Republican candidacy Arthur's prospects seem to be mounting a little just now, and the increase in his strength has furnished material for much speculation. He is said to have quite a strong support from northern democrats who are at the head of large business interests, among them Mayor Martin, of Boston, and Sam Sloan, the president of the Delaware and Lackawanna railroad.

Excited by the freshening of the Arthur breeze, the Blaine men have been inspecting their tackle again, and making everything snug, although they continue to express the conviction that it "isn't going to be much of a shower after all." Blaine stock rallied on Saturday upon the receipt of telegrams by Congressmen stating that Conkling and Grant had declared in favor of the Maine Statesman. They have concluded, it is said, that the fight is between Blaine and Arthur, and of the two they greatly prefer Blaine. The air is also full of mysterious suggestions regarding the return of Senator Cameron, who is said to have come to the same determination as Conkling and Grant. From hints let fall by one of the friends of Mr. Blaine it would appear that Senator John Sherman is likely to become Mr. Blaine's ally at Chicago, and will fall heir to all the strength that the Plumed Knight can transfer in the event that Mr. Blaine should be convinced after a prolonged struggle that his chance for the nomination is hopeless. It was claimed by an enthusiastic Sherman man yesterday that whenever a break occurs at Chicago the ex-Secretary of the Treasury will trot to the front very rapidly, as he is certain of material support from Connecticut, Indiana, Illinois, and Kansas, with scattering votes from several southern states.

A leading politician said last week that among the friends and managers of Mr. Blaine's interests at Chicago would be Whitelaw Reid, and Medill of the Chicago Tribune. Besides these allies, Senator Sabin, of Minnesota, will be one of his active working friends. "Blaine's corps of workers," said the republican, "will be the best drilled on the ground, and if skill and discipline count for anything he ought to win." "But who will they be for in case their man cannot win?" There is no second choice. We are for Blaine first and last," was the answer.

Of all the horses in the President's stables the one which excites the most inquiry from visitors is a clean limbed, trig-looking, little Indian pony given to Mr. Arthur by an Indian chief last summer on his trip through the Yellowstone Park. Every effort has been made to tame and break him in, yet without avail. Never for a moment is he off his guard, and he successfully eludes every artifice which human ingenuity can invent whereby to subjugate and render him like unto other horses. Put him in traces, let him feel a buggy behind him, and he acts as though perfectly bewitched; round and round in a circle he will go with almost lightning-like rapidity, a course which, in every case where he has been tried, resulted in speedy distruction of the vehicle, and to the occupant an unpleasant celerity in reaching the ground. But true to his former training and native instincts he will bare any amount of burden on his back. One morning last week the President, determined to test for himself the qualifications of the little nag in this respect, ordered him saddled that he might enjoy a ride to the Soldiers' Home, a trip which in the early portion of each pleasant morning, is of almost daily occurrence with him. What Mr. Arthur's sentiments may be regarding the other qualifications of his steed, those concerning his swiftness are of the highest order. No sooner was he in the saddle than the pony rushed forth like Orestes pursued by the furies, down the path of the White House grounds, and into the distance beyond. When after a marvellous short space of time he returned to the White House, it was remarked to the waiting goom that the bolt witnessed by him at the departure of the twain on their exit from the gates had terminated only upon their return to the same spot.

Messrs. MACKINTOSH & PETERS beg to announce that they have arranged to hold a series of Auction Sales as above, and now invite immediate entries for them.

LAND HOLDERS, FARMERS, OWNERS OF MILLS, FOUNDRIES, and OTHER PROPERTY will find this a ready and satisfactory way of selling their property. The several properties will be offered subject to an upset price or unreservedly, at the option of the owner.

No plan so good has ever before been presented for effecting sales.

Briefly put, our plan is to secure entries of lands in all parts of Ontario, and to sell them by public auction to the highest bidder, subject to an upset, or unreservedly, as we may be authorized, the sales to be held at the different County Towns in June next.

With each entry we charge a fee of $10, payable in advance, to cover the entire expenses for advertising. 2 per cent. on the first $2500; 1½ per cent. on the second $2500; 1 per cent. on any amount over $5000. Commission will be claimed if property is sold at private sale to a purchaser of our finding.

PICKPOCKETS are operating on the Great Western Division.

DR. McCausland has announced his intention of going to California.

COURT OF REVISION.—The Court of Revision has been adjourned till Monday, 16th inst., at 7.30 p.m. See advt.

HORSE SOLD.—Frank Carroll has sold his bay Fearnaught gelding to Louis Forest, of Albany, N. Y., for a tidy sum.

MAJOR McMillan, of Ingersoll, has purchased the double brick house at the corner of Wellington and Piccadilly streets, London, from Mr. Hall, for $3,350.

LOCAL TROT.—Guggisberg's bay pacing mare beat Carroll's bay Fearnaught Gelding, in Victoria Park on Friday afternoon last, in two straight heats.

THE POSTPONED TROT.—The race announced to have come off on Monday last between Guggisberg's bay pacing mare and Ezra Day's black pony has been postponed until Friday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

THE Salvation Army had a big turn-out at Woodstock Friday. Sufficient funds were raised at one meeting to buy out one of the Methodist Churches, which since the union will not be required.

ROLLER SKATING.—Negotiations are pending between parties in St. Thomas and the directors of the rink here for renting the latter for a term of years, to be used in summer for roller skating.

JOURNALISTIC.—The American Dairyman, published at New York, has been enlarged and improved. It is the leading authority on dairy matters in the United States and we are glad to note these signs of prosperity.

TWO of our councillors had a somewhat heated discussion the other night. Somebody called the other a "liar" which lead to blows. The "mill" was a short one, however, one round closing the affair. Nobody hurt.

MOSES Leach, one of the Bayham lambs, sentenced in October, 1882, to three years imprisonment in the Penitentiary for robbing Canada Southern cars, has been released from confinement after serving half his term. Leach is in failing health, and cannot live many months.

THE SEMI-CENTENNIAL.—Court Marquis of Lorne has received an invitation from the Foresters of Toronto to take part in the grand demonstration in that city on Society Day, July 4th. Action upon the invitation depends chiefly upon the liberality of the railway companies.

THE FROSTS.—Farmers report that the damage occasioned by the late frosts has been confined in this district principally to small fruits and early sown vegetables. The clover and wheat crops are not injured to any great extent, and the damage occasioned to vegetables is remediable, as the crops can be replanted.

ANOTHER SKELETON FOUND.—Mr. John Sproule, of the 6th line, Plympton township, while doing his statute labor and digging in a gravel pit, unearthed the skeleton of a large sized man. The bones are all perfect, and they are supposed to be the remains of some Indian buried there a great many years ago.

ST. ANDREW'S CHURCH.—The Rev. Dr. Bucher, of Auburn Theological College, N. Y., who is attending the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, now in session in Toronto, is visiting friends in Ingersoll, and will occupy the pulpit of St. Andrews Church next Sabbath, both morning and evening. All are cordially invited to attend.

HOTELS AND FIRE INSURANCE.—We have been shown a circular issued by one of the leading English fire insurance companies to the local agents, which states that on account of the unsettled condition of the liquo trade in Ontario, they have decided to decline all applications for the insurance on hotels and saloons, and directing their agents to decline to renew all existing policies on such property.

DOMINION DAY IN INGERSOLL.—The firemen of Ingersoll have decided to celebrate Dominion Day, July 1st, by horse, bicycle and foot racing in Victoria Park. Arrangements are being made to have a tug-of-war between the same teams from East Nissouri and North Dorchester that pulled on the 24th. The Caledonian Society is willing to let this decide the result as to which team is entitled to the $40, and the fireman purpose adding $20 to the purse.

KNOX COLLEGE.—The Rev. Principal Caven, D. D., who for some time has been canvassing among the Presbyterians of Ingersoll and vicinity, on behalf of the endowment fund of Knox College, Toronto, has, we believe, completed his work. The Principal has been very successful in the task he has undertaken, receiving as near as we can learn, the sum of $247 from Knox church, and the sum of $850 from St. Andrew's congregation.

LONDON C. M. CONFERENCE.—The last meeting of this conference was held in Guelph yesterday. The following are the places where changes have been made in this district. Appointments not referred to will retain their present pastors:—Ingersoll, Wm. Kettlewell; Salford, Hugh McLean, E. J. Clarke; Norwich, James E. Dyer; Otterville, P. W. Jones; Princeton, David Hunt; Strathallan, C. R. Morrow; Drumbo, Thos. A. Moore.

AGRICULTURAL MEETING.—The Directors of the North Riding of Oxford, Blandford and East Oxford Agricultural Societies met in Woodstock on Saturday. It was unanimously agreed to hold the autumn exhibition under the auspices of the united societies on Tuesday, 30th Sept., and Wednesday, 1st Oct. These dates are later than usual, but the directors felt constrained to choose them in order to avoid the days selected by the Toronto, Provincial, and Western Exhibitions.

STRIKING COMPOSITORS.—A short time ago the compositors in the London Free Press office struck work and left the office in a body without an hour's notice. We are glad to see that our cotem. has not been forced to give in to the unreasonable demands of its employees, who surely could not have had their employers' interests at heart when they took such action without giving timely notice. The Free Press looks as well as ever. No lasting good was ever gained by strikes.

THE SMALL POX CASE.—One day last week John Little, the smallpox patient, having entirely recovered, left the London hospital and returned to this county, near Woodstock, to work for his former employer. On Saturday he was surprised to receive a call from Detective Ryder, of London, who placed him under arrest and took him back, after which he was remanded to jail. The charge against him is that at Goderich, on April 19, he unlawfully and wrongfully conspired and agreed with J. B. Whiteley, M. D., to commit a nuisance in London. Dr. Whiteley's case comes on for trial at the sessions this week, and it is understood Little will be used as a witness against him.

MISS CHURCHILL'S ENTERTAINMENT.—A small but appreciative audience greeted Miss Churchill Friday evening at the town hall. The gifted elocutionist was deserving of a large house. The programme was enjoyed by all. It was one for the classic, the rabid, the frivolous,—one which the most critical and fastidious might declare faultless. Her rendition of the various pieces on the programme was beyond criticism. Her impersonation of the Positive Widow Beddott and Negative Deacon was true to life, and kept the house in screams of merriment. The rendition of "Hiawatha" was grand; full of pathos and expression. Miss Churchill possesses a powerful and well cultivated voice. In rendering that familiar poem it was shown to splendid advantage.

Re Daniel's Band.

To the Editor of THE CHRONICLE.

SIR,—Some people would like to know by what authority the above "band" is posing as a Methodist organization. Has the Canada Methodist Church authorized or sanctioned such a society? Have the congregation of the Salford Circuit been consulted about the matter? Are the bandsmen required to subscribe to the Methodist Creed and join that church as a qualification for membership? If these questions are answered in the negative, how can the "band" claim the prestige and protection of Methodism?

A LIVE CONCERN.

A Glance at John Russell & Co.'s Agricultural Works—A Fast Growing Business—Doubling Every Year.

We think no town in Canada, at the present moment, can show more life in its various industries than is seen in Ingersoll. While in many places we hear of hands being discharged owing to a slackness in orders, we find the very opposite here to be the case, the tendency being to put on extra help, besides, in some instances, running both late and early. To this fact our attention has been chiefly directed by the great activity of late displayed at the above agricultural works, to which we will for a short time direct our readers.

It is but three years since the present firm, consisting of Messrs. John Russell, John McKellar, and John W. Russell, purchased the works on Charles street from Mr. Thos. Brown, and in that short time have so far succeeded in attaining such business proportions as to secure not only an extensive local and provincial trade, but also a trade extending as far as British Columbia to the west, and St. John, New Brunswick, to the east.

THE INGERSOLL FOUNDRY

was established in 1837, and is so well known that we need not here give a general description of it, only to state that of late the buildings have been much enlarged and everything accomplished to meet the fast increasing demand, so much so that the producing capacity has been more than doubled, and, with the addition of $3,000 of new and most improved machinery put in by the present firm, places this foundry among the foremost and best equipped in the country. At the present moment some fifty hands are employed, many of them having grown up with the works, being first-class workmen, fully alive to the requirements of the age. Indeed, a good hand in the Russell Works appears to be a life-long fixture, for such is the harmony that exists between the employers and employees that changes among the workmen rarely takes place except in the way of promotion. This, no doubt, is the great secret of the excellent work turned out, and the wide range of country which place their orders at the hands of Messrs. John Russell & Co.

On visiting the works the other day we were forcibly struck with the systematic way in which the general details of the business are conducted. From the clerks' offices, through the various machine rooms, finishing rooms, down to the shipping house everything is moved like clockwork. The workshops are models of order and cleanliness. Even the yards have the same distinguishing features as pervade the works in general. What was but a short time ago a chaos of many hundreds of saw logs, neat piles of lumber, etc., have risen, showing the rapid progress made by the saw mill, which has been running all night for some time past, having just completed its work for the present season.

With this cursory glance at the Russell Works we will now briefly refer to the principal implements manufactured by this pushing firm. First comes

THE INGERSOLL REAPER.

This machine is what is termed a light single reaper, combining simplicity of construction, ease of management, with efficiency and durability. This machine is meeting with a ready sale, and those who have purchased it speak very highly of its merits.

INGERSOLL STAR MOWER.

This season has called forth a large demand for this implement, being a medium weight machine, combining the strength of the heaviest machines without their unnecessary weight, and the lightness of the more modern ones without the flimsy weakness of the latter. This mower is much admired wherever introduced, and is said to be the most perfect working mower that has yet been produced.

BROWN'S IMPROVED PATENT HAY LOADER.

This implement has only to be seen to be appreciated. Since the first introduction of this loader, each succeeding year has added new evidence of the practibility of it and shows conclusively the necessity for pitching hay on the wagon in the field by machinery. It will load a ton of hay in five minutes, and as much time is saved in pitching hay with this machine as is saved by the mower, horse rake, horse fork or hay carrier.

This machine has many advantages. It requires no extra men or horses to work it, being attached to the rear of the wagon, and operated by the same team that draws the load. It has no violent motion or side draft when in operation, and is built so strong as to last a lifetime. The saving of actual labor in pitching hay on the wagon in the meadow is enough in itself to pay every farmer who cuts any amount of hay, for purchasing this loader. This machine is meeting with a large sale, which is not to be wondered at. Mr. Orange Clark, a gentleman well known to our readers, used one of these loaders when farming in North Oxford, and from experience realizing the great advantages derived from its use, lately ordered one for his farm in Michigan, preferring this hay loader to any which he has yet seen. Last year six of these machines were sent to British Columbia, and there is more to follow. Some fifteen were sent as far east as St. John, New Brunswick, besides many orders that were filled from the Province of Quebec.

OTHER IMPLEMENTS.

Space will not permit us to refer at length to other excellent machines turned out by the Russell firm, only to state that they manufacture field and corn cultivators, land rollers, straw cutters, Pitt's four and ten horse powers, sawing machines, etc. The land rollers particularly are meeting with great demand, many being forwarded to Manitoba.

CHEESE FACTORY FITTINGS.

This is also a special line with this firm, and for which orders are coming in thick and fast. At the time of our visit to the foundry they were shipping several cheese presses to various factories in the province. Their trade in this department is assuming quite large proportions.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

In penning this article it affords us pleasure to note the sign of prosperity which is falling to the old and well-known Ingersoll Foundry, and in which our townspeople have naturally a great interest. The amount of wages paid out by the Russell firm ranges over $20,000 per year, irrespective of the large amount expended in extension to buildings, for saw-logs, etc. Under the new regime, prosperity reigns, and the "hum" is very plainly visible—not the "hum" of political economists, but that emanating from the indomitable push and determination which has marked the career of the firm since its formation here, the individual members thereof apparently taking for their motto: "Onward and Upward." Their business under the present arrangement has doubled every year, and to-day over four times the business is being done that was accomplished three years ago. Perfection of workmanship, superior finish, best quality of material, right prices, are the ruling traits of the Ingersoll Foundry, and are such that will accomplish great things in the near future.

In conclusion we must not forget to state that each department of the works has its head—and a practical one, too. The general supervision is under the keen eye of Mr. John McKellar, whose business tact, long experience and matured judgment, makes him "the right man in the right place." The iron shop is under the direction of Mr. John R. Warnock, who is well and favourably known to our many readers. Mr. Angus Murray has charge of the wood shop; Mr. John Todd looks after the moulding department, while Mr. David Armour has control of the painting shop.

Solomon Peter's Sorrow.

The St. Thomas Times says:—Ald. Midgley, at the meeting of No. 2 Committee last evening incidentally mentioned that he had a few days ago rented the city hall to Rev. Solomon Peter Hale, to deliver an oration on Sunday afternoon, the understanding being that the exhorter should pay $1.50. Solomon looked upon the scheme as a bold and big experiment, but thought he could undertake it, and he did. He delivered a lengthy address on temperance, which he said was "always in order." "What a curious thing rum is," said he. "People drink it in the winter to keep 'em warm, in the spring fo' fear it's agoin' to be warm, in the summer 'cause its warm, and in the fall fo' fear they are goin' to get the cramps. And it never misses. It fetches 'em all, by and by."

"Ladies and gentlemen," said Dominie Hale from the platform, "this here is a Meth'dis' meetin' and the Meth'dists is famous for wanting money, so I will step around and wait on you."

But the receipts only aggregated $1.38, and Solomon waited upon the Alderman next morning and by explaining to him the facts succeeded in inducing Mr. Midgley to accept $1 and cry quits.

The Late Alexander Gordon.

The services in St. Andrews' church last Sabbath evening, in memory of the late Alexander Gordon, were very impressive. An able and instructive sermon was preached by the pastor, Rev. P. R. Ross, from Rom. 4, 18, "The path of the just is as a shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." The speaker said: In this short verse I think we can find the blessed biography of our dear brother who has just gone to his rest. Born in the parish of Rogart, Sutherlandshire, Scotland, in the year 1809, when he was but two weeks old his father was accidentally drowned. His mother, a most devoted christian woman, characterized by deep piety and more than ordinary sagacity, early taught him to walk in wisdoms ways. When young he was thoroughly trained in the principles of the word of God and the Shorter Catechism that excellent compendium of Christian doctrine. His bible training was steeped in earnest, fervent, believing prayer. Starting from such a home with such a training, we need not wonder that he never strayed from the path of duty. At the age of 17 he left his home in the Highlands for the city of Glasgow, where he remained for about 21 years. He did not as many young men do upon leaving home, throw off all pious restraints and become careless and indifferent in religious matters. He regularly attended divine service, first in the old Tron Church, then in Duke St. church and afterwards sat under that celebrated man of God, Jonathan Anderson. Having shared in the glorious quickening which produced and accompanied the disruption, he naturally cast in his lot with the Free Church people. Leaving Scotland, he came to Canada in the year 1847, coming west as far as Embro where he left his two children in care of his elder brother who had preceded him by a few years to this country. Settling in Hamilton for a time he enjoyed the ministrations of the late Dr. Irvine with whom he had been very intimate while in Glasgow, and who was perhaps the most polished speaker that ever occupied a Canadian pulpit. Leaving Hamilton, Mr. Gordon commenced business for himself in Beachville in 1849 but thinking that Ingersoll was a better point for his business, moved here in 1850, where he remained until the close of his calm and peaceful life.

As a citizen he always enjoyed the confidence and respect of his fellow townsmen, but owing to his retiring disposition he never took a prominent part in civil matters.

As a christian he was a humble follower of the meek and gentle Jesus. Upon coming to Ingersoll he at once connected himself with Knox church which at that time was under the pastoral care of the Rev. Robt. Wallace, now of Toronto.

The congregation soon found out Mr. Gordon's excellent qualities and at once elected him to the eldership of the church, a position which he has held with increasing usefulness for the last 34 years. As a elder we may truly say that he was "sober, just, holy, temperate, blameless, vigilant and of good report of them which are without. He was several times sent as commissioner to presbytery and synod and discharged his duties well. For some time he took charge of the poor fund of the congregation here, and not only did he give the money placed at his disposal by the church, but knowing that "he that hath pity upon the poor lendeth to the Lord" he gave liberally of his own means, and many of the poor of our town will yet rise up to call him blessed.

As a member of the session of this congregation, Mr. Gordon was regular in attendance on its meetings, taking an active interest in all matters that came up for discussion. Possessing a kind catholic spirit, he naturally went heartily into every good work that had for its object the advancement of the kingdom of the Redeemer in this world. He took a lively interest in Sunday school work and for 30 years was closely associated with the Bible Society as a member of the local committee and latterly as vice-president. He entered with great heartiness into negotiations with the late Erskine Church for the union of both Presbyterian congregations in town, and rejoiced to think, that after much trouble; peace, harmony and concord was again restored to this congregation. His piety was quiet, deep, unaffected, humble, reverent and full of sunshine. He had clear views on all doctrinal points, strong faith in God, bright hopes for the future, and was pre-eminently a man of prayer. Long may the church be blessed with such elders. His summons from the Master came suddenly at last. For a year he had complained of a pain in his breast, continuing for a short time and then getting relief without interferring with daily duties. While sitting in his son's office on Thursday, 22nd ult., a severe attack of this pain which proved to be heart disease set in, with difficulty he walked home, and medical skill proving of no avail, he passed quietly into his rest on Saturday morning, 24th ult.

His place is now vacant, absent from the body, he is present with the Lord, and all the gold and silver of earth could not win him back.

True goodness and mercy followed him all his life, but now he dwells in the house of the Lord for ever, and all we would say is; Rest brother, rest from thy labours, thy works do follow thee.

Thou art gone to the grave but we will not deplore thee,
Whose God was thy ransom, thy guardian and guide,
He gave thee, he took thee, and he will restore thee,
And death has no sting, for the Saviour has died.

While E. Elliott was dipping out whey at the cheese factory, on Saturday morning, his horse became frightened and ran away. Except breaking the shafts, little damage was done.

On the evening of the same day, Mr. F. Foster had a more disastrous runaway while returning from the factory with a can of whey, having got out to pick up a bolt, lying under his wagon, his horses suddenly started off and one of the wheels passed over him, injuring his back and leg. The tongue of the wagon was broken and the milk can badly battered. Although too sore and stiff to do much for two or three days, Mr. Foster is about again.

Dereham.

Dereham Council met at Tilsonburg, June 2nd, in regular adjourned session. All the members present. The Reeve in the chair.

Minutes of former session read and confirmed.

Petition from Wm. Fewster and six others asking for assistance for James Hanley, an indigent.

Accounts from W. T. Hockey, repairs to a road scraper, $2.00; W. H. Cook, material and work on T. Line between Dereham and Elgin, $22.90; Gravel from Dr. Joy's pit, 336 loads, and from John Shelton's 99 loads.

John Reid and Henry F. Price stated that the water had cut out the bottom of the Reynold's creek to the outlet in Dereham, and there are some gravel bars and obstructions, which, if removed would give two feet more fall, they had got $120.00 subscribed towards removing the same, and asked the Council to give some assistance.

Mr. Pettman asked for a grant on the Cuthbertson hill, which is in a bad state and has very little statute labour on it.

A by-law appointing Jas. Bradburn, J. V. Bodwell and John Markham members of the board of health for Dereham, was passed.

The following accounts were ordered to be paid, John Shelton, 99 loads gravel, $6.18; Dr. Joy, 336 loads, $21.00; W.H. Cook, work on T. Line between Dereham and Elgin, $11.45; Jas. Hanly, an indigent, $5.

Council then adjourned.

The members nominated were: N. C. McCarty, Samuel Towle, and Francis Howes. Dr. Sparks of Lakeside was appointed medical health officer, and the salary of the members was fixed at $2 per day, when attending to the business of the Board. The By-law having been read three times was passed and ordered to be engrossed No. 236.

The Court of Revision was held as advertised, but the business was of the smallest, consisting principally of a few dogs, which were allowed off, and one case of appeal against the assessor's valuation in which $300 was allowed off.

Glass water guages on boilers are not always reliable, as the firm of J. & R. Miller have found to their cost. On Monday afternoon one of the pipes leading to it got stopped up and while the guage showed plenty of water the contrary was the case, for when the stoppage was discovered it was found the three first rows of flues were bare. A very few moments longer and we would have had to chronicle a serious explosion. No doubt the cause of so many boiler explosions could be traced to the same cause. About three days work will repair the damage in this case.

The I. O. O. F. concert advertised for Tuesday night proved a grand success in every particular and certainly the boys have fulfilled their promise that this should be one of the best. The array of talent was so excellent and all the different parts so well rendered that it is difficult to particularize. However, if there was any one star of the evening, it was Miss Gertie Gregg, a young lady of five summers, whose recitations was simply grand. Among our old time favourites we noticed Mr. and Mrs. Edgington, Miss Banbury, Misses Hadcock, Miss Jones, Mr. Copeland and our string band composed of the Mayberry Bros., Messrs Hadcock and Brown. The music furnished by this band now equals if not surpases many of the so-called professional string bands. Amongst the new favourites we noticed the Misses Thompson, Tilsonburg; Mr. McKay, Norwich; Mr. Elliott, Dereham Centre; Mr. Beath, Beachville; and Mr. Sumner, Ingersoll; whose renderings were warmly applauded. The chair was occupied by Mr. Steinhoff of Norwich who added very materially to the success of the meeting by the very able manner in which he fulfilled the duties of chairman. We will be pleased to welcome him again. After the concert closed the visiting brethern and all those who so kindly assisted in the programme were entertained at a spread laid out in the lodge room. After justice had been done to the good things so liberally supplied we departed well pleased with our enjoyment and hope the boys will soon ask us to assist in a similar one.

A BLESSING TO ALL MANKIND.

FARM AND DAIRY.

ENSILAGE OF PARTLY CURED FODDER.

Too Much Moisture Avoided.

I made my first trial of ensilage last Fall, but under what I then regarded such unfavourable circumstances that I felt considerable misgiving as to the result. My necessities at the time have given me what I believe to be some good hints, which I intend to take advantage of this year. My experience is sufficiently at variance with the practices of some of your correspondents to induce me to give it to your readers.

The drouth of last year not only retarded the growth of my corn a full half, but it partially cured it while standing. When I was about to procure a cutter, an odd genius came along with a home-made affair, run by a one-horse tread power, and agreed to fill my silo, 1,500 cubic feet capacity, within twelve hours (which he did). The knives of this machine were so imperfectly fitted that the corn stalks came through in lengths varying from two to twelve inches, while the foliage was not cut at all. After the silo was filled I had no straw to place under the planks, and not wishing to use fine hay, I sent the men to the woods for a load of leaves. The ensilage was so coarse and dry that it could not be trodden with any satisfaction. Stones were put on the planks, however, to the depth of three feet, which pressed the ensilage into two-thirds its original bulk in four days. My silo is perfectly constructed with stone, laid in cement, and plastered smoothly on the inside.

The silo was opened on the first of December. The contents were simply perfect—just what I had conceived ensilage should be. The odor was fragrant and agreeable, and without perceptible alcoholic or acetic fermentation. It was the first specimen I have ever seen in which a considerable portion of the sugar was unchanged. On splitting any of the long pieces the pith was as sweet as when the corn was standing in the field. The whole mass was much less acid than I have before seen. Now inasmuch as the result was so satisfactory, the conditions must have been correct. It will be noticed that I have made six points; viz, a perfect silo, filled in one day, with partially cured corn fodder, cut very coarse, covered with forest leaves and heavily weighted. I might add another, that there were no feed rollers on this rude cutter, so that the stalks were not crushed and laid open to the air.

This year if I am not so unfortunate as to be overcome by another such drouth as has blasted New England for the last two years, I shall cut my corn one or two days before running it into the silos, and leave it in the field to cure partially. I think those who advocate too wet cutting, and even of wetting in the silo, make a mistake. I have seen accounts of ensilage so wet or juicy that water ran in streams from under the silo. I suppose it was such ensilage put into such silos that has brought some discredit upon the system. I have seen many silos opened and it has always seemed to me that the more succulent and wet the corn at the time of cutting, the more intensely acid has been the ensilage, and the more liable to rapid fermentation after exposure to the air. A sufficient natural moisture (sap) in the stalk to generate a vapor during the period of heating, to soften the woody fibre and render it more digestible, is all that is required. More than this means labor in handling and a retardation of the heating process.

If it is true that the destructive fermentation in ensilage is due not only to oxidation but to the generation of organic germs not dependent upon oxygen for their vitality, and that a definitely high temperature destroys them, then the sooner this temperature can be attained, the less will be the loss and the more natural the product. At any rate, I am determined to get as little loss from oxidation as possible. I am not afraid that I shall not get heat enough, and soon enough, to kill any organic germs, real or imaginary, without the aid of atmospheric oxygen. I believe that the silo should be filled as rapidly as possible and weighted very heavily. If the fodder is partially cured it will receive any amount of weight without pressing out the juice to settle at the bottom of the silo, as I notice some persons have complained about.

There is another point in connection with partially cured ensilage worthy of consideration. Many small farmers, especially in New England, are in the habit of raising from one to five acres of corn as a rotation crop. Their field of corn is generally a measure of the amount of manure they make. They seldom buy fertilizers or much grain. It seems to them a great loss to cut this corn green, only a few days before the ears will give them the golden harvest which alone they have been in the habit of regarding of much value. If they could have the ensilage and the grain too, they would be speedy converts to the silo. Now, I believe this is just what they can do. In New England varieties of flint corn are generally raised. The ears are small in comparison with the large dent varieties of the West. Where such small areas are planted, the ears could be plucked as soon as the kernels are "glazed," and proper facilities provided for curing with small additional cost. All small immature ears could best be left on the stalks.

The stalks and most of the foliage are yet green and full of sugar, starch, gums, etc., just in condition to make excellent ensilage, every pound of which would be eagerly eaten. Nothing is lost for food. The yards and manure cellars are not filled in the Spring with long, coarse stover, which usually amounts to a large portion of the crop. And even in the West, where the difference in varieties of corn requires it to stand longer in the field, I think the large, heavy stalks will be found to contain sufficient juice after heavy frosts to make an excellent quality of ensilage. Under high culture, such as will produce a hundred bushels of corn per acre, it is possible that this method of food production will be thought by some to be the most economical. Those who raise sweet corn for market or canning certainly can find no better place than the silo for their green stover.

There are several facts in connection with the feeding of green fodder in the Summer, which all persons who practise the soiling system must have observed, and which I think may have some bearing on the subject of partially cured ensilage. It is well known that animals are more fond of green forage which has been cut several hours before feeding and allowed to wilt. They eat more of it, digest it better, and of course give a larger return. In rainy weather, however, when forage is not only unwilted, but covered with water, it is not eaten with so much relish, is digested with discomfort, and the yield of milk falls off one-tenth. Wet clover we know is specially liable to produce acute indigestion. I will not say now that the conditions of wet ensilage and wet soiling crops are exactly analogous, but I have an impression that too much water in the silo is a violation of one of the proper conditions requisite to perfect ensilage. Without further experience, I should say, keep all water, whether from the heavens or the earth, out of the silo. Coarse cutting I think of some importance. It facilitates rapid work, it requires less power, and it gives the minimum exposure of surface to the air. It does not admit of solid treading, and hence it diminishes somewhat the capacity of the silo, unless a crate be used. Heavier weighting should be used than with finely cut ensilage. Forest leaves make a most perfect covering before placing the planks. They pack down very closely, and are as impervious to the air as anything can be. They cost nothing, and make good bedding for the stock.

Much ado is made about the labour of weighting a silo. This is unnecessary. It can and should be done, not only without extra, labour, but with a positive gain; i. e., in a manner to utilize another necessary labour. Dry earth is needed as an absorbent in the stable all the year round, but it is seldom used in the Winter, partly from neglect and partly from scanty storage room. Farmers who buy shorts and chemical fertilizers have many sacks about the premises. These can be rapidly filled during the Summer with dry loam, and placed under cover near the silo. At the time of weighting they can be handled rapidly, and piled up to any height over the planking. Thus storage room is found for a large quantity of good loam in the proper condition and place for Winter use. In absence of bags, boxes or barrels can be used, or the earth can be dumped in a mass over the silo. Fortunately rocks are not accessible on all farms, but earth always is.

The whole subject of ensilage is one of great importance. On the whole it appears to me to mark the greatest step in agricultural progress which has been made in any age. The approval it has received, in spite of the many trials made by persons little accumstomed to exact processes, indicates its very general adoption at no distant day. People will soon learn how imperative are the conditions of success, simple though they be, and a poor sample of ensilage will no more be charged to the system than a worthless jar of preserved fruit is now charged to the canning system. Poor Dr. Bailey has been made the butt of much ridicule and censure. His honest extravagancies have hardly been realized yet, but I do not feel so certain that they may yet be nearly so. His book has done no harm, to say say the worst of it. Nothing short of such enthusiasm would ever awake the dead. I believe he is more nearly right than that other Boanerges, at the opposite limits of Massachusetts, who denounces ensilage, early and late, in no more moderation.

There may be no objection to making hay a unit of feeding value, since every farmer, no matter how limited, has from experience more or less knowledge of its value; but it should not be forgotten that even in the strongest corporation there may still be preferred stock. In the much exhausted regions of our country hay is no longer a free gift to the agricultural plunderer. As a cultivated crop, on land adapted to varied products, it is generally regarded as a relatively expensive forage. Progressive farmers have long felt the need of some economical substitute. There appears to have been nothing so generally adopted as the maize plant. It more certainly resists the accidents of climate than any other plant; it is a great cropper; it can frequently be worked as a second crop; it is greately relished by all animals; it is raised with moderate manuring, and it is easily cultivated. Its use as a Summer soiling crop is universal in all milk-producing districts. And, yet, when its cultivation for this use began to be so general as to attract public attention, it was hardly less vehemently denounced on theoretical grounds than is ensilage to-day. Green corn the year round! That is what captivated the minds of the dairy people.—O. C. W., Providence, R.I., in Country Gentleman.

Which Calves will make Good Cows.

That statement of our corresponden about the prizes awarded by the Ayrshire Agricultural Society to year-old heifers, a condition being that the competing animals should be presented as yearlings, registered and marked to return as three-year-old in milk, to compete for the prizes, opens a subject which we have ever since had in mind to discuss with our readers.

Anybody can pick out the good milkers in a herd if he can milk them once a month for a year. Who can pick out the best milkers by inspection only? Many can do it with great accuracy. Some know and can tell why they select or prefer certain cows; others make their selection only by an intuitive judgment taken in connection with the general look of the cows It is not very difficult to judge of springers—even heifers—whether they will make large milkers, but very few people can tell how long a cow is likely to hold out in her flow of milk.

Those proficient in Guenon's "bastard marks," prehaps can do so—they claim to, but we have rarely seen any proof that they could—nor, in fact, that the Guenon marks are of much account anyhow.

True, they sometimes help to sell a poor cow, but they never do a good one any good. As to calves, it takes a genius to pick heifer calves out of a drove it will pay to raise: yet it has been done. A few days ago we saw a drove of calves, nearly half of which were heifers, about six to eight weeks old waiting for the knife. There were beauties amoung them, big-uddered, wedgeshaped, thin-necked, fine-boned, big-teated calves and it did really seem a pity to see them killed. Some farmers had fatted and sold them, who might much better have kept them if he has present or prospective use for good milch cows. We see every day in farmers' yards cows not worth the hay they eat in the winter, at $5 a ton, except for beef, and these same men, no doubt, will fatten and kill heifer calves which, if they only knew it, were worth to them $30 apiece, even if they have to wait three years before they come to milk.

TEMPERANCE.

Insanity and Intemperance.

Lord Shaftesbury, in his evidence before the select committee of 1859, says: "In the year 1843 I stated that a large proportion of the cases of lunacy were ascribable to intoxication, and that remark applies equally to the present time, for it is applicable to all times that habits of intemperance in so many instances lead to the development of insanity. We shall see how large a proportion of the cases of lunacy is ascribable to intoxication but we shall draw, moreover this startling conclusion that if thousands are deprived from this cause of their reason and incarcerated in mad houses, there must be manifold more who, though they fall short of the point of absolute insanity, are impared in their understanding and moral perceptions." His lordship added that he had communicated with medical authorities, and the general concensus of opinion is that an immmse proportion of cases of insanity rise more or less from the use of strong drink. I go a step further, and hold that there is abundant evidence to prove that to dissipation, druukenness, and moral depravity, either directly or consequentially by transmission to the next generation, is to be charged an immense proportion of the annual increase of lunacy. No person of authority will, I think, be found to deny that evil corrupt living in the parents bears fruit in an unhealthy state both of body and mind in their offspring. In the lower animals the transmission not only of generic qualities but even individual singularities is a famillar fact; so with mankind it is not to be expected that a pure stream will issue from a polluted source; and how foul and corrupt that source must be any one who sees the habits of the swarms of unfortunate creatures who nightly crowd on the streets of any of our great cities may determine for himself.

A Doctor's Experience.

At a large and influencial meeting of temperance reformers, held in the Lecture Hall of the temperance League, 337 Strand, London, Dr. Munroe, of Hull, made the following remarkable statement, which we give in his own words:—

"Are not medical men, by the promiscuous ordering of intoxicating drinks for their patients, answerable for much of the drunkenness which is now the great cures of the land? If so instead of sending your patient to his own wine celler or the public-house, would it not be safer and better to prescribe alcohol in the regular form of medicine, as the Pharacopaeia contains many formula for the administration of wine and alcohol? With regard to the prescription of alcoholic beverages, I will relate a circumstance which occurred to me some years ago, the result of which made a deep impression upon my mind. I was not then a teetotaler—would that I had been!—but I conscientiously, though erroneously, believed in the health-restoring properties of stout. A hard-working, industrious, God-fearing man, a teetotaler of some years' standing, suffering from an abcess in his hand which had reduced him very much, applied to me for advice. I told him the only medicine he required was rest; and to remedy the waste going on his system, and to repair the damage done his hand, he was to support himself with a bottle of stout daily. He replied, "I cannot take it, for I have been some years a tectotaler.' 'Well,' I said, 'if you know better than the doctor, it is no use applying to me.' Believing, as I did then, that the drink would really be of service to him, I urged him to take the stout as a medicine, which would not interfere with his pledge. He looked anxiously in my face, evidently weighing the matter over in his mind, and sorrowfully replied. 'Doctor, I was a drunken man once; I should not like to be one again.'

"He was, much against his will, prevailed upon to take the stout, and, in time, he recovered from his sickness. When he got well, I, of course, praised up the virtue of stout as a means of saving his life, for which he ought ever to be thankful, and rather lectured him on the foolishness for being such a fanatic (that's the word) as to refuse taking a bottle of stout daily to restore him to his former health. I lost sight of my patient for some months, but I am sorry to say that, on one fine summer's day, when driving through one of our public thoroughfares, I saw a poor, miserable ragged-looking man leaning against the door of a common public-house, drunk, and incapable of keeping an erect position. Even in his poverty, drunkenness and misery, I discovered it was my tectotal patient, whom I had, not long ago, persuaded to break his pledge. I could not be mistaken. I had reason to know him well, for he had been a member of a Methodist church, an indefatigable Sunday-school teacher, a prayer-leader, whose earnest appeals for the salvation of others I had often listened to with pleasure and edification. I immediately went to the man, and was astonished to find the change which drink, in so short a time, had worked in his appearance. With manifest surprise, and looking earnestly at the poor wretch, I said, 'S——! is this you?' With a staggering reel, and clipping his words, he answered, 'Yes, it's me. Look at me again. Don't you know me?' 'Yes, I know you,' I said, 'and am grived to see you in this drunken condition. I thought you were a teetotaler.'

"With a peculiar grin upon his countenance, he answered, 'I was, before I took your medicine.' 'I am sorry to see you disgracing yourself by such conduct. I am ashamed of you.' Rousing himself, as drunken people will at times to extraordinary effort, he chaffingly replied, 'Didn't you send me here for my medicine?' and with a delirious kind of chuckle, he hiccupped out words I can never forget—'Doctor! your medicine cured my body, but it's dammed my soul!'

Brandon, Man., Jan. 17, 1883.

About a year ago I was taken with a severe cold which settled on my chest and brought on bleeding of the lungs. I bled very freely and was very low. I feared it would ultimately turn into consumption. Consulted a number of physicians, and used a number of so-called cough remedies and lung pads, but all to no avail until I saw a notice of Dr. Wild's Pulmonary Cherry Balsam in a paper. Although a forlorn hope I purchased a bottle, and to my surprise found it doing me good, I persevered in its use and am now completely cured. Please publish this that others may be saved,

Yours truly,

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Diseases of the skin, ringworm, scurvy, scorbutic eruptions and swellings, sore heads, and the most inveterate skin disease to which the human frame is subject, cannot be treated with a more easy and reliable remedy than Holloway's Ointment and Pills, which act so peculiarly on the constitution and so purify the blood, that those diseases are at once eradicated from the system, and a lasting cure obtained. They are equally efficacious in the cure of excoriations, burns, scalds, glandular swellings, ulcerous wounds, rheumatism and contracted and stiffened joints. These medicines operate mildly but surely. The cures effected by them are not temporary or apparent only, but complete and permanent.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Useful Hints and Recipes.

Excellent sauce for fish is made by putting one cup of milk and one cup of water on the fire to heat. When it is hot stir in a heaping teaspoonful of flour that you have mixed with a little cold water, so that there are no lumps left in it. Beat and then strain three eggs, and stir them in with two tablespoonfuls of butter, and pepper and salt to suit your taste. Pour this over the fish.

Dr. Ritzy has found hot water systematically employed as a gargle of great benefit in overcoming the sensation of rawness incident to acute pharyngitis. He found that the use of hot water paled the red and inflamed mucous membrane more or less permanently. And, so far as unpleasant personal sensations went, it cured the pharyngitis. He also believes that this simple plan of treatment would prove beneficial in diphtheria in patients old enough to gargle intelligently. In ordinary tonsilitis hot water, he thinks, would hardly fail to act well. The water should be used as hot as can be well borne, and gargling should be practised for several minutes at a time.

A mixture which is excellent for removing grease spots and stains from carpets and clothing is made of two ounces of amonia, two ounces of white castile soap, one ounce of glycerine, one ounce of ether, cut the soap fine, dissolve in one pint of water over the fire; add two quarts of water. This should be mixed with water in the proportion of a teacupful to one ordinary-sized pail of water. Mix thoroughly, and wash soiled garments in it. For removing spots use a sponge or clean flannel cloth, and with dry cloth rub as dry as possible. Woollen goods may be made to look bright and fresh by being sponged with this.

SHAMPOOING PREPARATIONS.—A correspondent inquires for the chemical name of the "salts of tartar," the solution of which is used by many barbers for shampooing the head. The salt is simply carbonate of potash, and is objectionable for the purpose, on account of its alkaline character, especially when employed in so strong a solution as is often used. A taespoonful of powdered borax in a quart of water forms a safe shampooing liquid; but still better is the yolk of an egg, worked thoroughly into the hair, applying a little at a time, and then washed out. The egg will leave the hair surprisingly clean, and the scalp soft and free from dandruff.

TO FRY BEEFSTEAK.—Set the frying-pan over the fire, and when thoroughly heated, lay the steak in quickly, after having well pounded it, if not tender. Place a cover over it and allow it to cook one minute; raise the cover and turn the steak quickly. Replace the cover for a minute longer. Take up pepper and salt, and, if liked, lay a bit of butter on each piece. Serve while hot,

CUSTARD PIE.—Take double the usual number of eggs; use only the yelks for the custard, reserving the whites until the pies are done. Beat the whites to a stiff froth, add a tablespoonful of pulverized sugar for each pie, flavor with lemon, and spread smoothly over the top of each pie. Return to the oven for a few moments until of a light brown; then set away in a cool place.

England and Her Colonies of One Mind.

It is wonderful with what celerity and certainty the benefits of a great discovery originated in England are communicated to our possessions in all parts of the world. As the pulsations of the heart send the stream of life through every fibre of the frame, so so does each beneficial development in science, emanating from British genius and skill, disseminate its blessings throughout the whole British Empire. The general use in all our colonies of HOLLOWAY'S celebrated medicines is a striking illustration of this fact. Starting, forty years ago, from the great centre, with the sanction of the home millions as their credentials, they have found their way unto the remotest sections of the vast colonial circle upon which the sun never sets. The axiom that greatness does not receive due honour in its own country, fails in the case of THOMAS HOLLOWAY. His new and simple, yet rapid and effective remedies, were thoroughly appreciated at the outset by the people of England of every class, and foreign experience has merely confirmed the verdict of the British public.

The Canadas, the least remote of our important transatlantic possessions, were the first to echo the laudations bestowed upon the preparations here. They appear to have displayed the ineffective prescription of the provincial pharmacopœia with singular dispatch. The stereotyped preparations for fever and ague, dyspepsia, scrofula, &c., were at once superseded by them, and the press announced their cures as the commencement of a new era in the sanitary history of British America.

To suppose that the colonial popularity of the preparations is the mere reflection of her European fame, would be to undervalue both the sagacity and the independence of our brethren beyond the sea. They may receive our opinions with respect, but they test them in the crucible of experiment before adopting them. They try our remedies for the disorders of the body politic, and of the human frame by the same rule. Where our system of jurisprudence fits their necessities, they apply it, and when our medicines prove to be specifics for the leading diseases of the soil and climate, they joyfully accept and employ them. Hence we consider the popularity of Holloway's remedies in the colonies as direct a compliment to the inventor as the encomiums passed upon them here.—Lancashire Pioneer.

Did She Die?
"No!
"She lingered and suffered along, pining away all the time for years,"
"The doctors doing her no good;"

THE FARMER'S WOOING.

The daisies nodded in the grass, the buttercups were sleeping,
And just across the river sang the farmers at their reaping;
Upon the hills so blue and fair, the maple leaves were showing
Their soft white beauty in the breeze that from the sea was blowing.
A little maid came through the lake with song and rippling laughter;
The buttercups made way for her; the daisies nodded after.

A strong young farmer saw her pause beside the parting river;
She drew a lily from its depths, with golden heart a quiver.
"Though art more fair than lilies are," said he with hand uplifted,
And threw a poppy as the stream toward the maiden drifted,
She set the flowers in her hair, the red and white together;
A cloud grew black before the sun, and rainy was the weather.

He came across the river then, the farmer from his mowing;
He minded not the water's depth, he cared not for its flowing.
"O, love," he said, "if gleaming sun and cloudless skies o'er lean us,
The river's barring width may roll, unpassed, untried between us;
But when the loud thunder fills the air, and clouds and rain come over,
I'll cross the ocean to your side, I am no fair day lover!"

And so one day the village bells rang across the river;
Their music set the buttercups and daisies all a quiver;
While some one drew a lily from the stream so blithely flowing,
And plucked a blood red poppy that amid the wheat was growing.
The maiden set them in her hair, the red and white together,
With many a smile, a tear or two, and glances at the mother.

They passed beneath the chapel's shade the farmer and the maiden,
Where arches crossed above their heads, with snowy blossoms laden,
And in that place of holy calm the binding words were spoken;
He in the heart bore out the truth, she on her head the token.
The years went by, and some were bright, and some were clouded over;
But ever stood he at her side; he was no fair day lover.

An Ambitious Woman.

BY EDGAR FAWCETT.

She recoiled once more. "Use the word?" she half stammered, as if thrown off her guard by this unexpected thrust. A moment afterward she went on, with renewed vehemence, all her native drawl flurriedly quickened by excitement. "I used it because Kate Diggs used it—because she presumed to say that I brought this poor, deserted, outraged mother face to face with her daughter for this reason. I don't doubt that Kate has invented the same nonsense for you that she tried to foist upon me. She is very loyal to her friend. She has most probably told you that Mrs. Twining was always a monster to her daughter, and that she insisted on having her dead father buried by charity, in spite of prayers, supplications, adjurations from the bereaved offspring. For my own part, I choose utterly to discredit this trumped-up tale. I never heard any thing that resembled it from the feeble lips of the wretched woman who had lain for weeks in the hospital. I only heard"—

Goldwin here broke in with a voice more hard and stern than any which Mrs. Lee had known to leave his lips.

"If you will pardon me for saying so, I do not wish to continue your listener. If you think my interruption outrageously rude, then let me admit with frankness that I can not—yes, literally can not—endure what you now choose to state."

She gave her small, dark head a passionate toss. "You can't endure it," she cried, "because you think that woman perfection! You can hear nothing that is not in her praise. You used to tell me that you thought Kate Diggs ridiculous; you used to laugh at her as a wild, eccentric creature. And now you are willing to credit her fictions."

"They are not fictions," said Goldwin. "All she told me to-day was pure truth. Don't try any longer to shake my credence of it. Your efforts will not avail, I assure you."

Mrs. Lee shivered. She put both hands up to her face, pressing them there for a moment, and then suddenly removed them. She set her dark eyes on Goldwin's face; they were glittering moistly.

"You think I edged that woman on, to serve purposes of revenge," she faltered. "Well, Stuart, if I did so, what was my real reason?"

Goldwin was drawing something from an inner side-pocket of his evening-coat. "Truly," he said, in dry, tepid tones, "I have no idea." He flicked with the required something while he thus spoke. The next moment he had produced it. It was a slim packet of letters.

"I want to give you these," he said, with a brief, formal bow.

He handed her the packet. She examined it for several minutes.

"My letters," she murmured.

"Your letters," he answered, with a slight repetition of his recent bow.

She thrust the packet into her bosom. "You . . . you have kept all these?" she questioned, after hiding them.

"Yes," he said.

"And you give them back to me now," she pursued, "with a meaning? Well, with what meaning?"

Goldwin walked quickly toward the doorway that led into the adjacent hall. "Oh, if you want the meaning put brutally," he said, using a tone and demeanor of much suavity, "I . . . I—well, I am tired."

"Tired?" she repeated. Her next sentence was a sort of gasp. "You—you hate me for what I have done!"

"I did not say that." His foot was almost on the threshold of the door while he spoke.

"Stuart!" she exclaimed, hurrying toward him. The lithe symmetry of her shape was very beautiful now: her worst detractor could not have said otherwise. She felt that the man whom she loved was leaving her forever. She put a hand on either of his shoulders. She tried to look into his eyes while he averted his own.

"Will you leave me like this?" she went on. "You knew me long before you knew her! Don't let us quarrel. I—I confess everything. I—I have been very foolish. But you won't be too harsh with me—you will forgive, will you not?"

He did not answer her. He removed her hands. Then he receded from her.

"Stuart!" she still appealed.

"I have given you back your letters," he responded, standing quite near the threshold.

"Tell me one thing—do you love her? Is it because you love her that you want to part from me? I—I have scarcely seen you for weeks. You once said that a day wasn't a day unless you had seen me. Do you remember? I've been stupid. But you won't mind so much when you let me explain more. Don't go quite yet. Stay a moment and . .

He had passed quietly from her sight. She waited until she heard the clang of the outer hall door. Then she understood what a knell it meant. The alienation must now be life-long. She had made him despise her, and she could never win him back. Seated before the fire that snapped and flashed as if in jarring glee at her own misery, she wept tears that had a real pathos in them—the pathos of repulsed love. She had never believed herself at fault in her conduct toward Claire. Jealousy had speedily blackened the filial act of her rival, but in any case, the story, as Mrs. Twining told it, would have roused her conviction that this desertion had been a most unnatural and cruel one. So esteeming it, she had played the part of castigator. She was not sure that she would have done very differently if Claire had not been at all an object of her hatred. She had not found the least difficulty in persuading herself that it was wholly a moral deed to use with vengeful intent knowledge which she would have been justified in using with an intent merely punitory.

But now she had wrecked her own fortune by seeking to destroy Claire's. Mrs. Twining had broken faith and betrayed her. The passion which she felt for Goldwin was an irrecoverable one. Her detestation of the woman who had caused their ceaseless parting, grew as she wept over the ruin of her hopes, and mingled its ferocious heat with the more human tenderness of her tears. She passed a lurid hour, there in her picturesque little parlor; she was in spiritual sympathy, so to speak, with its Oriental equipments. She could have understood some of those clandestine assassinations which the poisoned draught, the stealthy bow-string, and the ambushed scimitar have bequeathed to history and legend. Her past pietistic fevers had left her with no memento of consolation. A stormy turbulence had taken hold of her mental being, and shaken it as a blast will shake a bough. In her sorrow she was still a woman; in her hate she was something grossly below it.

She at length remembered the letters that she had returned to her, and drew them forth from her bosom. For a moment the anguish of loss gained mastery in her soul, and she held the packet clasped between both hands, her eyes blinded to any sight of them, and her frame convulsed with racking, internal sobs. She knew that she must read them all over again, and thus replunge into coverts of memory whose very charm and fragrance would deepen her despair. To re-peruse each letter would be like prying open the slab of a grave

A sudden impulse assailed her as the violence of her grief subsided. She rose, and raised the letters in one hand, meaning to hurl them into the opposite blaze, and thus spare herself, while the destructive mood lasted, fresh future pangs. But at this moment her glance lighted on the packet itself. It was of moderate thickness, and tied together by a strip of ordinary cord. Inside the cincture so made, and held there insecurely by one sharp corner, a folded paper had caught which seemed foreign to the remaining contents. Mrs. Lee disengaged this paper, opened it, and cast her tear-blurred eyes, carelessly enough at first, over some written lines which she had immediate certainty were not her own.

She presently a little cry left her lips. She turned the pages with a rapid jerk, searching for a signature. She did not find any, but found merely two initials instead. She dropped into her seat again, and with a fire in her dark eyes that seemed to have quickly dried their last trace of moisture, she read, pausing over nearly every word, and pondering every sentence, a letter which ran thus:

Friday.

DEAR MR. GOLDWIN,—I think that I meant all the harsh treatment I gave you last evening. When I recall what my feelings then were, I am certain that my indignation was quite sincere. But very much has happened since then to change me, and to change my surroundings as well. I suppose I am in a most reckless mood while I write these lines; my head is hot, my hands are cold, and tremble so that the words I am shaping have a strange, unfamiliar look, as if they were not those I was writing them at all. Well, for that matter, the same woman from whom you lately parted, is not writing them. Another woman has taken her place. She is a wayward, desperate sort of creature; she is a coward, an ingrate, a worthless and feeble egotist.

But this new identity of mine will last. I have made up my mind to take a bold step, and nothing can now deter me. I shall not be explicit; at some other time I will send for you and tell you everything. You shall hear my reasons for acting as I propose to act. I don't claim that they are strong or good reasons, and yet I feel they contain a certain plausibility to my pitiful mind. My marriage has been an irreparable mistake; I can't go back and live the last year over again; I can't repossess my yesterdays. Hence I have become wilful and headstrong about my to-morrows. If I had ever really loved Herbert, all would now be so different! But I have never loved anybody who is now living. There you have a frigid confession. You never roused in me anything but a decided liking; that other woman—the woman who called herself by my name a few hours ago—used to disapprove a good deal there is about you. But my new self will doubtless pass over these faults very indulgently; she will have enough of her own to account for. Still, she can never do more than think you good company. I fancy that when I was a very young child nature locked up a certain cell of my heart, and then threw away the key where no one can ever find it.

I mean to go abroad, very secretly, after the sale of certain property and chattels shall have put me in possession of the needed funds. It will be a flight—and a flight from more than you are yet aware of. If we meet abroad—say in Paris—I may even stoop to discuss with you that question of a divorce. It is horrible for me to write these words. It is a sin, and I feel the stab of it. But surely Herbert deserves to be rid of me, and perhaps he will come in time to value his freedom. I should want him to have the right of marrying again. Would not that be a possible arrangement? I know almost nothing of the law on these points.

It does not now seem conceivable that I should ever become your wife after I had ceased to be his. I have had enough of marriage without love. But if you should prevail with me, it would be only because of your great wealth, and the ease and distinction that are now slipping away from me. You see I am hideously candid; I dont mince matters . . . where would be the use? Do not answer this, but destroy it immediately. In regard to the last request, I count with perfect confidence upon your honor. Were it not that I did so, I should never send you this imprudent, daring, perilous scrawl.

Do not come until I send for you. I cannot tell how long that will be.

C. H.

Before Mrs. Lee refolded the letter which contained these words, she had read them through certainly five successive times.

Not until then had she made up her mind just what to do. She would put the letter in an envelope, and direct this, very legibly, to Herbert Hollister. Her determination was as fixed as fate. . .

When her guests had all departed, on the afternoon of this same day, Claire slowly walked the spacious drawing-rooms for at least twenty minutes, with her eyes bent upon the floor.

She felt literally hunted down. The end had come; the clock had struck twelve, and her fineries were rags, her coach-and-four was a pumpkin and mice. She had carried it off well until the very last; she was sure of this, and that surety gave her, even now, a bitter pleasure. She had no doubt that the coming of her mother, with imperative demands of support and countenance, would mean a return of all the old taunts and gibes. If Claire's wealthful life of to-day had been destined to continue, this prospect would have opened a less dreary vista; as it was, she saw only a dropping back into the former ruts and sloughs of maternal acrimony and intolerance. The history of her past would in a manner repeat itself. There would be poverty again, or something closely akin to it; there would be the mother's unpardoning disapprobation of her child's ill-favored lot. For one marked difference, Herbert would be present, as a fresh, assertive force. And what a miserably adverse force it must prove! To exist with him would be hard enough, now, under any circumstances. But if he felt perpetually the shadow and weight of this second gloomy and heavy personality, what new hostile traits might not his depression, his impatience, his revolt develop?

Claire tried to take a very calm survey of the whole potential consequence. In so doing she regarded the advent of her mother as one factor that consorted with other untoward agencies; the central knot of the tangle would be wrought of several tough and stubborn threads. There could be no unraveling it. 'But the knot could be cut,' she thought, silently continuing her metaphor, as she paced the stately rooms.

It sent a thrill of actual terror to her when she reflected how the knot could be cut. To the feet that have set their tread on slippery ways, evil can do much downward work by a gentle push. Claire felt herself lapsing, now. . . .

What if she wrote to Stuart Goldwin a letter very different from the one she had already written him, and which was then hid under the fleecy laces that clad her bosom? What if she told him that she must fly from it all?—the love that she had outraged by cold hypocrisy, the keen if mute reproaches that would be punishment and torture alike, the thrusts and innuendoes from a tongue whose venou had poisoned her childhood, the tarnish in place of splendor, the dullness in place of brilliance, the obscurity in place of prominence, the service in place of mastery—perhaps even the toil in place of ease?

She tried, in a pitiable way to rebuff temptation by taking the sole means at hand of ending these desperate reflections. In reality she took the most cogent means of rendering temptation more potent. She tightened its black clutch upon her soul; she went upstairs and talked with her mother.

Mrs. Twining had been securely convalescent some time ago. She had passed through a complicated and dangerous illness; she had given Death odds, yet won with him. She was still subject to those attacks of fatigue which are inevitable with one who has proved a victim in so grim a wrestle. But she had once more gained a very firm foothold on that solidity which bounds one known side, at least, of the valley of the shadow. She intended, in a physical sense, to live a good many years longer; her freshening vitality was like that of fire in a forest, which has stretched an arm of flame across a bare space, at the risk of its reaching it, but in the end has caught a mighty supply of woodland fuel.

Claire found her stretched quite luxuriously on a lounge, with a little table beside her, which held the remains of a hearty repast. She had the traditional vast appetite of the recovering invalid. She had devoured enough to have sunk a hearty person of average digestion into abysses of dyspepsia. She had enjoyed her meal very much. It had appeared to her as an earnest of many similar joys.

She promptly began a series of her characteristic sarcasms and slurs as soon as Claire appeared. Mingled with them was an atmosphere of odious congratulation—a sort of verbal patting on the back—which her daughter found even more baneful than her half-latent sneers. She was thoroughly refreshed; her food (mixed with some admirable claret) had gone straight to the making of bodily repairs. She had never had anything so fine and wholesome in the hospital, though after the patronage of Mrs. Lee she had been supplied with not a few agreeable dainties. The temporary result was that she had become in a great measure her real self.

Claire said very little. She did a large amount of listening. She had never known her mother not to be without a grudge of some sort. It brought back the past with piercing vividness, now, while she sat and heard. The vision of a pale, refined face, lit by soft, dark-blue eyes, rose before her, and the memory of wanton assault, many a surreptitious wound, appealed to her as well. Her father had stood it all so bravely—he had been such a gentleman through it all! She had stood it only with a sturdy, rebellious disapproval through many of the years that preceded his death.

She stood it, now, with a weary tranquility. When she went away from her mother, these were her parting words:

"I do not think I shall tell my husband, for some days, that you are here. There are reasons why I should not. He has some very engrossing matters to occupy him. But you will be perfectly comfortable in the meanwhile. Order what you please. The servants will obey you in every particular. If you should need me, I will come immediately. You have only to send me word. I shall be at home for the rest of to-day, and all through the evening."

Claire went into her own private sitting-room, after that. When she had been there a little while, she had torn up her first letter to Goldwin. When she had been there a little while longer, she had written the second letter. Having finished it, at last, she promptly dispatched it, by messenger, to Goldwin's private address.

Between the hours of ten and eleven that same evening, the following note from Goldwin was brought to Claire:—

Friday Night.

In some unaccountable way I have lost the letter which you sent me to-day. I feel in honor bound to tell you of this loss, after a protracted search through my apartments and numerous inquiries and directions at my club. I cannot sufficiently blame myself for not having at once burned it to a crisp. But I thrust it into my pocket after many readings, with the wish to learn each word by heart before it was finally destroyed. Do not feel needlessly worried. I shall do my best to recover it, and even if it should be read by other eyes than yours and mine, the fact of your mere initials being signed to it is an immense safeguard. S. G.

Claire had grown deathly pale as she finished the perusal of this note. She had prepared herself for a night of wretched unrest, but here was a dagger to murder sleep with even surer poignance.

It was past midnight when she heard Hollister go to his apartments. She fancied that his step was a little unsteady. If this was true, no vinous exhilaration made it so. An excitement of most opposite cause would have explained the altered tread.

A saving hand had interposed between himself and ruin. The chance had been given him of starting again—of meeting all the fiercest of his creditors, and appeasing them. Instead of utter wreck, he had chiefly to think of retrenchment. Perhaps what Claire believed unsteadiness in his step was a brief pause near her own door. But even if an impulse to tell her the good news may for a moment have risen uppermost, there must have swept over him, promptly and sternly, the recollection of a dark and sundering discovery.

Meanwhile Claire, wondering if the lost letter had, through any baleful chance, drifted into his hands, lay pierced by that affrighted remorse which a monition of detected guilt will bring the most hardened criminal, and which of necessity strikes with acuter fang the soul of one yet a neophyte in sin.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Hollister passed downstairs the next morning at a little after nine o'clock. He had obtained some sleep, of which he stood in sad need. The cheerful elasticity of his temperament would have placed him, by natural rebound, well in the sunlight of awakened hope and invigorated energy, and after hours of miserable disquiet he would now have felt relieved and peaceful, but for one leaden and insuperable fact. This had no relation whatever with financial turmoils and embarrassments; it concerned Claire, and the desolate difference with which her image now rose before his spirit.

He had told her that they must henceforth be as strangers, but already the deeps of his unselfish love were stirred by a longing, no less illogical than passionate, to make reality of what had once been illusion, and to verify Claire's indifference through some unknown spell of transformation into that warmth which had thus far proved only lifeless counterfeit. Already Hollister found within him a spacious capacity of pardon toward his wife. Already he had begun to exonerate, to make allowances; and more than all, he had already vowed himself that to live on without her love would be a hundredfold better than to part with her companionship. Here cropped out the old vein of complaisance and conciliation which had run through his earlier collegiate life, which later experiences amid all sorts of risks and rivalry had never wholly obscured. It had been his power to concede, his amiable pliancy, wed with a peculiar intellectual shrewdness, that had gone far toward the accomplishment of his phenomenal successes. The man who makes the best of things by instinct is very apt to have the best of things made for him by fortune.

His inalienable love for Claire caused him to regard her long hypocrisy with fondly lenient eyes. The wrong done himself rapidly took a secondary place; it was nearly always thus with Hollister, except in those grosser cases of wanton injury from his own sex; and now, when it became a matter between his heart and the woman that heart devotedly loved, he was ready to forego a most liberal share of the usual human egotism.

He had a hard day before him. Exertion, diplomacy, astuteness, concentration, all were needed. He was still to fall, but no longer with a headlong plunge. He would now fall on his feet, as it were, but it required a certain agile flexibility to make the descent a graceful one. At any other time he would promptly have left the house after breakfasting. As it was, he waited for Claire. She appeared sooner than he had expected her. She had drank her coffee upstairs. He saw her figure, clad in a morning robe of pale-tinted cachemire, enter the front drawing-room. He had lighted a cigarette, and was standing beside the hearth, where a riotous fire flung merry unison challenge to the sharp weather outside. He at once threw away his cigarette, and went forward to meet her.

She perceived him when he gained the centre of the second drawing-room. She stood perfectly still awaiting his approach. There was more than a chill misgiving at her heart lest some inimical hand had sent him her own fatal letter. She did not know how she would act in case he immediately accused her. Hours of sleepless unrest had not supplied her with a single defensive plea.

The new serenity on Hollister's face struck her at a glance. It gave her a sudden relief; it was like a reprieve just before execution. When he said "Good morning" he answered him with the same words. She wondered if he had already noticed her pallor, or that a dark line lay under either eye. Her dressing-mirror had told her of these changes. . . . Might he not guess at sight the guilty agony that she had been enduring?

Her altered looks were not lost upon him. They were a new intercession in her behalf. "I have good news for you," he said almost tenderly. He went toward the richly-draped mantel just opposite to where she stood, and leaned one arm along its edge. He purposely let his eye wander a little, so that she would suspect in him no intentness of scrutiny.

"Good news?" she repeated softly.

"Yes. I thought it was all up with me yesterday. But a friend of yours has placed funds at my disposal which will enable me, with wise management, to weather the worst of the storm. He used the nicest delicacy and tact. Before I actually realized that he was offering me very substantial aid, he had done so. And yet, with all his graceful method, he didn't beat about the bush. He was frankly straightforward. He said just why he wished to see my affairs righted—or at least credibly mended. That reason was his deep respect and sincere admiration for you. He told me, with a winning mixture of humor and seriousness, that you represented for him the one great ornament of his bachelorhood. And when I looked at his world worn sort of face, and decidedly gray locks, and began to wonder whether he meant his amazing proposition in any unpleasant sense, he assured me that he had always seen in you the daughter whom he had probably missed being the father of. . . Of course you now recognize his portrait; or have I not drawn it clearly enough?"

"Do you mean Beverley Thurston?" asked Claire.

"Yes. You see, now, how generous an act of friendship he performed?"

"Yes, I see," Claire murmured.

"The funds he proffered—and which I accepted—are by no means all his own. His influence is so great, his standing is so secure, that he has actually been able to associate four well-known capitalists, (one of whom, by the way, chanced to be my personal friend) in carrying out this benevolent work." Here Hollister paused for a considerable space. "Of course," he at length went on, "I shall not do more than just escape a positive dead-lock. The next few years must be full of cautious living and thinking. I have accepted the burden of a huge debt; but I firmly believe in my power to pay it off. And I have learned a lesson that I shall always profit by. They shall never call me a Wall Street king again. I have seen my last of big ventures. I shall want, if I can manage hereafter when every penny of liabilities shall be settled, to drift slowly but safely into a steady banking channel. I shall have friends enough left on the street; I shan't have lost caste; I shall still hold my own. At least twenty good men have gone clean down in this flurry, without a chance of ever picking themselves up again. But I am going to pick myself up—that is, thanks to the helping hand of your precious elderly friend; for I could never have done it alone."

Claire knew not what to answer. She was thinking of the sweet, deceitful kindliness that Thurston had employed. She was thinking how little she deserved his timely and inestimable support. She was asking herself whether he would not have shrunk in sorrowful contempt from all such splendid almsgiving if he had known the real truth concerning her recent mad and sinister act.

While she was trying to shape some sort of adequate reply, the entrance of a servant rendered this unnecessary. The man handed Hollister a letter, bowed, and departed.

Claire's heart instantly began to beat hard and fast. A mist obscured her gaze while she watched Hollister tear open the envelope and unfold its contents. There was a sofa quite near; she sank into it; she felt dizzy enough to close her eyes. But she did not. She looked straight at her husband, and saw him begin a perusal of the unfolded sheet. Was it her letter to Goldwin? Why should she even fancy this? Were there not hundreds of other sources whence a letter might come to Herbert?

In a very little while she saw her husband grow exceedingly pale. He left off reading; he looked at her and said: "Did you write this?" He held the paper out toward her as he spoke.

Claire rose, crossed the room, and cast her eyes over the extended page.

"Yes, it is mine," she answered him.

The voice did not seem his own in which he presently said: "I must read it. I must read it with my full attention. If I leave you for a little while, will you remain here until I return?"

"Yes," she said.

"You promise this?"

"I promise—yes."

Without another word to her, he walked back into the dining-room. Perhaps twenty good minutes passed before he returned. Claire had meanwhile nerved herself to meet something terrible. She had no idea what her husband's wrath would be like, but she felt there might almost be death in it.

Hollister had hardly begun to address her before she perceived that he did not reveal a single trace of wrath. His eyes were much brighter than usual; he had not a vestige of color; his voice was low, and of an increased unfamiliarity, but it did not contain the slightest sign of indignation.

She had seated herself on the sofa again, and he now came very close to her, standing while he spoke. He held the letter in his hand, which trembled a little.

THURSDAY, JUNE 12, 1884.

TORONTO Telegram says:—The politicians have been saying for years that the country is not yet ready for independence and this is what Sir Richard says now. It would be interesting to know when it will be ready. Probably not until a collapse of the Confederation has occurred—something which does not look a great way off.

THE native population of Canada is 3,725,502 out of a total of 4,334,820 and the foreign 689,218. Of the foreign population 30 per cent are Irish, 28 per cent English, 16 per cent Scotch, 13 per cent American. The foreigners make up 13.62 per cent of the whole, being almost precisely the percentage in the United States, which is 13.32. There are 37 Irish-born persons for every thousand of the whole population in the United States and 43 to the thousand in Canada. Canadians constitute 1.43 per cent. of the population of the United States, while Americans make 1.76 per cent. of the population of Canada.

MR. LILLIE's new "Life of Buddha" contains a different view of Buddhist theology from the one commonly entertained. According to Mr Lillie, the soulless and atheistic Budhism is a corruption of an earlier and purer theology. Nirwana is not necessarily a state of extinction or inactivity, but only of exemption from physicial evils. The originalities of the Buddhist movement Mr. Lillie names as enforced vegetarianism and abstinence from wine, abolition of slavery, the principal of the forgiveness of injuries, antagonism to religious rites which are opposed to the spiritual development of the individual, and for religious teachers bachelorhood, continence, and asceticism.

IN another column will be found a copy of an interesting document anent our C. V. R. Bonds, to take action on which our Town Council met last evening. Every ratepayer should read it. It will be a "surprise party" to many, particularly to those who have declared from time to time that the bonds held by the corporation were "not worth the paper on which they were printed." They would have been long since sacrificed had it not been for the abiding faith of our Mayor (Mr. Noxon) who all along has turned a deaf ear to minor offers, being convinced that in time the interest would be paid and that the bonds would yet realize dollar for dollar. It is true, perhaps, that the new stock would not at the present moment realize 100 cents on the dollar, but nobody will deny that the present stock is much more valuable than the old stock, as was admitted by the members of the Council last evening. For the old stock, offers of 80 cents on the dollar have been made, and with the additional value secured to the new stock surely we cannot be far astray in thinking that Mr. Noxon's predictions will yet come to pass. Then, again, we have the tangible feature of the prompt payment of some $2,800 interest per annum; the first moiety of which is now placed at the disposal of our Corporation. For other interesting features we would again say, read carefully the communication. The Council are to be congratulated upon the satisfactory arrangement offered, and we are sure no one will begrudge the honor that must fall to the Mayor in standing by the much despised C. V. R. Bonds, and whose fidelity to the town's interests in this matter must in all time to come meet with the approval and approbation of every ratepayer interested in the welfare of this town.

Cut flowers are now carried in refrigerators from Italy to England, a journey of two days. The cost of packing and carriage is much less than that of the forcing process in England. The possibilities of this traffic are infinate; for by the refrigerator process flowers can be transported a thousand miles, looking as fresh as if just cut.

The dynamite scare has become a terrible nuisance to travellers in England. Visitors from America hitherto have passed easily through the customs at Liverpool. Tobacco, spirits, and silver being the only taxable articles, tons of trunks have gone through without being even opened. Now every article is examined for dynamite. And this extra severity is also carried on in regard to baggage between England and all continental ports and railway depots.

Cincinnati is superstitiously interested in the case of a woman who, falling asleep in a railroad train, dreamed vividly that her child at home had been seriously hurt. She was so deeply impressed by the vision that, on arriving at the city, she drove directly to a physician's office and carried him hastily home to her residence, where the youngster was found to have been thrown from a swing at precisely the time that the mother had dreamed. The story is told circumstantially by the persons concerned.

Judge McKennon, of Pennsylvania, spoke no uncertain word in his decision against the manager of the Louisiana lottery who had sued for libel a Pennsylvania editor who had attacked the lottery scheme. While the courts of Louisiana may hold that lotteries are lawful, Judge McKennon gives it out flatly that in Pennsylvania a lottery manager is an infamous criminal; and it is not only the right of Pennsylvania editors to assail them, but it is a duty devolving on every law-loving citizen.

Rev. J. D. McColl was a highly esteemed preacher at Westover near Hamilton. He was married and had seven olive branches. He took a fancy to a Miss Shaver who played the organ in his tabernacle and is a very pretty girl. He sold his furniture and his wife's goods, put she proceeds in his religious pocket; took his wife and olive branches to his wife's parents, and left them there without a nickle. Then he went to a place called Dover in Illinois and sent for Miss Shaver who went to him and is now living with him. This is bad enough but it is not the worst. Miss Shaver's sisters wrote to the reverend humbug giving him a dressing down. He replied saying that all he had done was for the best and that he still hoped to serve the Lord in the ministry of the church; if the church objected he would continue his christian efforts in another field.

THE REPUBLICAN NOMINEES.

James Gillespie Blaine.

James G. Blaine, of Maine, who has been selected by the National Republican Convention as candidate for the Presidency, is a native of Pennsylvania, and was born in Washington county on January 31st, 1830, being, therefore, over 54 years of age. He received a common school education as a basis, but graduated at Washington College in the same State. Shortly after his graduation he selected journalism as his profession and went to Maine, in which State he has resided ever since. He edited the Portland Advertiser and the Kennebec journal ably and successfully, and while still a very young man was elected to the Legislature, where he served from 1859 to 1862, being for the last two years Speaker of the House. He was then elected to the National House of Representatives, where he served from 1864 to 1876, being twice elected to the Speakership, succeeding Mr. Colfax. During the years that Blaine was Speaker he was propably the most popular man in the Republican party. As a speaker he never had an equal, and his control over the House is described as being simply wonderful. An eloquent talker and a thorough Parliamentarian, familiar with almost every precedent from the birth of Congress to the very hour in which he spoke, he was never at a loss to answer the most difficult question, to solve the hardest problem or to disentangle the knottiest network of procedure into which the House might have drifted. The Democracy coming into control of the House, he once more took his position on the floor. During those years his name had been prominent as among those of the probable Republican candidates for the Presidency. In 1876—he having meantime been appointed to fill the vacancy in the Senate caused by the elevation of Lot M. Morrill to the Secretaryship of the Treasury—he was nominated in the Cincinnati Convention by Robert G. Ingersoll in a speech which he still remembered as being the most eloquent ever heard in a national convention. Roscoe Conkling was a candidate in the same convention, but the choice fell upon Rutherford B. Hayes. Mr. Blaine was elected to the Senate at the expiration of Mr. Morrill's term and served through the four years following. In 1880 he was again a candidate, his being considered the strongest opponent of General Grant, but once more the choice fell upon a man—James A. Garfield—whose name had only been casually mentioned for the place. It was understood that Garfield had been nominated by Blaine's friends at Blaine's suggestion, when he feared that he could not possibly secure the nomination, and in return for this Garfield made him Secretary of State, Blaine resigning his seat in the Senate to take that elevated position. While Secretary of State he inaugurated what is known as "a vigorous foreign policy," causing a good deal of talk about his "Jingo" propensities. Before his policy had had time to make itself felt, Garfield was stricken down, and for the brief interval between the President's death and the changes which followed in President Arthur's Cabinet, Blaine remained almost entirely inactive. Since then he has devoted himself to private business and to literary work. His book, recently published, has occupied the greater part of his time. He is a man who is so positive in his political views, and in his social views as well, that it is said of him, "All those who are not his devoted friends are his bitterest enemies."

John Alexander Logan.

Gen. John A. Logan, of Illinois, the Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency, was born in Jackson county, that State, on February 9th, 1826. He received the common school education of a country boy in those days, when the common schools of Illinois were very poor schools indeed. Logan, although a man of extraordinary intelligence and remarkable originality and force of character, is not by any means a well-read or well-informed man in the broad meaning of these terms. His knowledge of matters outside of the limited range of his own vision, from boyhood up, is not such as to inspire admiration or pride among his friends. He handles the English language with a reckless disregard for the rules of grammar, and his sentences are sometimes constructed in a manner which leaves his listeners in the most blissful ignorance as to his meaning. But he has delivered some of the most powerful speeches ever heard in the Senate, and his bad grammar has been entirely lost sight of beneath the thunder and weight of his arguments. He speaks extemporaneously, and yet his speech on the Fitz John Porter Bill, lasting three days, went into the history of the war and embraced not only the American rebellion, but he quoted from memory the precedents which had been established upon the battle-fields of the old world, with an eloquence which carried everything before them. Off the subjects with which he is familiar Logan talks with a dynamic force, and but few men have ever been able to embarrass him even for one moment in the course of his speech. He deserves credit, too, for remaining silent when questions with which he is unacquainted are before the Senate for discussion. Logan served in the Mexican war as adjutant of the First Illinois Infantry; he studied law afterward with his uncle, A. M. Jenkins, and at the Louisiana University, and was admitted to the bar in 1852. He soon obtained a large practice and became a political favorite. He was elected prosecuting attorney of the Third Judicial District of Illinois (as a Democrat) in 1852, and served until 1856; was elected to Congress from Illinois in 1859 as a Douglas Democrat, serving until 1861, when he resigned to enter the army. He was commissioned Colonel of the Thirty-first Illinois volunteers, distinguishing himself at Belmont, Fort Donaldson, Pittsburg Landing, Vicksburg, Chattanooga, and as Commander of the Army of the Tennessee. He was made Brigadier-General in 1862, and Major-General in 1863. He declined in 1865 the ministry to Mexico, tendered to him by President Johnson; represented Illinois in Congress for two terms, 1867 to 1871, when he was elected to the Senate. He was defeated for the Senate in 1877, but was elected again in 1879, his present term expiring in 1885. It is said of him that he was the best general officer in the army, as he was certainly one of the bravest. During the campaign of 1880 he was an ardent Grant man. He was a candidate for the Presidency this year, but it was easily seen that he could not carry the Convention.

The Richest Man in the World.

In January, 1883, Vanderbilt told an intimate friend who dined with him one day he was worth, $194,000,000. "I believe I am," said Mr. Vanderbilt, "the richest man in the world. In England the Duke of Westminster is said to be worth $200,000,000, but it is mostly in land and houses. It does not yield him two per cent. a year. From now I shall be worth more than $200,000,000, and will have an income equal to six per cent. on that amount." Vanderbilt can take life comparatively easy on an income of $12,000,000 a year, and watch his wealth pile up without any effort of his. From his Government he draws $2,372,000 a year; from his railroad stocks and bonds, $7,394,320; from his miscellaneous securities, $575,695, or $10,342,045 from his investments alone. Thus every day they earn for him $28,334.25c. Every hour sees him $1,180.25c. richer, and every minute means $91.67c. added to his hoard. Besides this, he calculates to make $2,000,000 every year by fortunate sales. It is not supposed that the recent financial crisis has seriously affected Mr. Vanderbilt's securities.

Women and Alcohol.

At the coroner's inquest at London on the body of Ann McCabe, Dr. Brown, of London, being cross-examined, said—It is a most extraordinary thing, and we can't explain it, that the organs of a woman can stand more alcohol than men; I have never known of a woman having the delirium tremens; a woman might drink considerable quantities of liquor and her organs not show it; women drink by starts, they are not constant drinkers; I do not think deceased was a confirmed drunkard; there was nothing to show it; the appearance of the stomach was caused by acrid poison, not by strong drink; I think a woman might have been drunk two or three times a week for a considerable time and not show it; there is resistance to the influence of liquor where the appetite remains and a person can eat well; as long as they can do that they are safe.

OSCAR SATISFIED WITH MATRIMONY.

Oscar Wilde, who was married last Tuesday to Miss Constance Lloyd, has written a silly and thoroughly characteristic letter to a friend, in which he he says he has not been disappointed in married life. He feels confident of his ability to sustain its labours and anxieties, and sees an opportunity in his new relations of realizing a poetical conception which he has long entertained. He says that Lord Beaconsfield taught the peers of England a new style of oratory, and similarly he intends to set an example of the prevading influence of art in matrimony.

THE MAORI KING AND THE BALLET GIRLS.

A London cablegram says the Maori King Tawhia, who has been in England a week, has astonished as well as pleased his supporters by keeping perfectly sober. He has been chaperoned to a great many of the theaters, and has developed an admiration for the ballet which is almost beyond retraint. Last night he was conspicuous at the Alhambra, where he ogled the girls to his heat's content. Afterwards when he had his supper at the Savage Club, he became so enthusiastic in a description of the wonders he had seen that he made a bold but abortive attempt to imitate a pas seul. The members of the club enjoyed the fun, and encouraged each new effort with bravos and peals of laughter. A cold in one of his eyes and a rather severe attack of rheumatism unfortunately prevented the King from lunching with the Lord Mayor to-day.

THE MAORI CHIEFS FALL ASLEEP AND SNORE IN ST. PAUL'S

A comical scene was witnessed at St. Paul's Cathedral Sunday morning. The ten Maori chiefs who accompanied King Tawhai to London were taken to the cathedral to attend morning prayer, and were expected to be profoundly impressed with the grandeur of the edifice, the beauty of the music, and the solemnity of the service. The untutored New Zealanders, however, were by no means impressed, but, were on the contrary, unmistakably bored. They listened with some appearance of interest to the music but they found standing up during the responses and kneeling during the prayers too exhausting, and finally kept their seats. When it came to the sermon they could evidently stand it no longer, and the entire ten fell asleep and snored scandalously throughout the discourse. King Tawhai did not attend, being confined to his room by rheumatism and sore eyes.

NOTES.

Miss Fortescue has further lowered her chance of big damages by appearing in a revival of Byron's well-known play "Our Boys."

The weather has now definetly broken in England, and there has been a succession of thunder storms and fierce rain. The farmers are delighted for the crops badly wanted water, while sporting men are consoled for the diminution of attendance at race meetings by the improvement of the ground for horses.

In Paris Marie Farrel has just been asked in marriage by Jules Courtois, in in whose breast she lodged two bullets a couple of weeks ago, and a Belgian town council of an anti-religious turn has rechristened a street from St. Bernard to Sara Bernhardt, on the ungallant ground that the name suits a street which is very long and very narrow.

It is significant of the progress of female employment in England that the Providential Company, one of the greatest insurance offices, is now entirely served by female clerks, and that 4,353 are employed in Government offices, but the excess of women is still so great that Lord Shaftesbury has declared that the greatest benefit that could be conferred on England would be the emigration of from 200,000 to 300,000 women.

A cock-fight took place on Easter Monday between Kent and Surrey for £300. The main took place in 'a walled in orchard attached to the county seat of a gentleman, who entertained those invited to breakfast prior to the commencement of the fight.' This scandal is made the more objectionable because the forbidden sport was arranged in all its details without the least pretence of secrecy. Some years ago a Liverpool a match took place in a steam-tug hired for the purpose and taken out to sea. But in the case of the Easter Monday cock-fight, the movers and supporters being persons of position, the contest was not disturbed in any way.

Vennor is dead. As a geologist and ornithologist he was clever, well informed and useful. As a weather prophet he was no better nor no worse than any other man. He happened to make a few correct guesses, and built up a reputation upon these hits, that hundreds of misses failed to destroy in the minds of credulous people. That he knew what the weather was to be like half a year, or a month in advance, is of course utter nonsence, and with even chances for and against the correctness of his prophesies, the percentage of misses was against him. Nevertheless there are other weather prophets who could be better spared than Vennor.

TOWN NEWS.

COURT of Revision next Monday.

COUNTY Council meets next Tuesday.

OUR continued story will be completed next week.

THE East Nissouri fall fair will take place on Tuesday, 7th October.

SETTLED.—The unpleasantness between two of our town councillors has been satisfactorily arranged, and the nation again breathes freely.

TROTTING RACE.—A race between Ezra Day's Black Pony and Guiggisberg's Pacer, was won easily by M.. Day in two straight heats on Monday afternoon.

ROLLER SKATING.—Messrs. Pyne and Street of Cairo, Mich., have leased the skating rink, here, for a term of two years, to be used for roller skating, etc., in the summer.

ST ANDREWS CHURCH.—A very successful Lawn Social in aid of the Sabbath School of the above church was held at Maple Grove last evening. Over $50 was realized.

BIBLE SOCIETY.—The Ladies' Auxiliary Bible Society will meet on Tuesday, the 17th, at the house of Mr. Thos. Wells, at 3 p.m. A full attendance of collectors is requested.

FARM SOLD.—Thos. A. Newton of Hastings County, who has been visiting friends in Dereham, has purchased the farm of Edward Topping, East Oxford,—132 acres—for $8,000.

GIVE THE PROPER CREDIT.—It keeps us busy calling the attention of our cotems. to their carelessness in not giving us the proper credit for our Ingersoll Cheese Market reports. The St. Thomas Journal is the last to neglect to do this.

THE POOR.—It will be noticed by report in another column that had it not been for the Charity Ball last winter, the poor of the town would have fared very badly indeed. Out of $135, only $7 was secured by private subscription; the ball neted $119.

PROMENADE CONCERT.—A promenade concert takes place in the rink on Tuesday evening, June 24th, under the auspices of the Masons of this town. The committee have secured the services of the 7th Batt. band of London, who will be in attendance during the evening.

CHANGE IN MAIL ROUTES.—There is some talk of the mail route from Bayham through by Brownsville to Ingersoll being changed, viz.: Brownsville to get her mail from the C. S.R. and Culloden three mails a week from Brownsville, and Bayham to get her mail from the Loop Line. A petition is being circulated against the proposed move.

FIRE.—George Bailey's carriage shop, containing a large quantity of stock, took fire early Monday morning and was completely destroyed. Mr. Bailey recently failed, and the property is in the hands of his creditors. Origin of the fire unknown. No one has occupied the shop recently. Insured for $1,500. The firemen worked hard and saved the adjoining property. Messrs. J. F. McDonald and John Byram, each lost a phæton which they had stored there.

HYMENEAL.—Yesterday afternoon Mr. H. O'Connor, jr., insurance agent, of this town, was married to Miss Mason, only daughter of Mr. John Mason of this place. The wedding ceremony was performed at the home of the bride's parents by the Rev. E. M. Bland, in the presence of the relative and a few of the intimate friends of the contracting parties. After the ceremony Mr. and Mrs. O'Connor left on a trip to the Falls and down the St. Lawrence to Montreal.

THE SALVATION ARMY.—In London vigorous measures are being taken to suppress the drum beating and shouting of the Salvation Army on the streets and to compel them to confine their antics to the barracks. The press and public who were at first in their favour are now determined that the members of the army shall observe the laws of the city. A number have been lodged in gaol and more arrests are made daily. In St. Thomas also the authorities are taking measures to abate the nuisance, the police clearing them off the streets and parks whenever they appear.

SCOTT ACT REPEAL IN HALTON.—The officers of the Anti-Scott Association of Halton county met E. King Dodds at Halton on Monday, for the purpose of deciding on the filing of the petition for the repeal of the Scott Act in the county. It is stated that a scrutiny of the lists showed that 2,500 electors had signed the petition, about 300 of whom had three years ago signed the Scott Act petitions. The largest Parliamentary vote ever cast in Halton was about 3,750. Mr. Dodds stated that he believed the majority of the electors in Halton were disgusted with the Act and he proposed to fight them on their own vantage ground. He said he was confident that the repeal will be carried by a handsome majority.

OBITUARY.—On Friday last Mrs. J. H. Hegler, wife of J. H. Hegler, Barrister, died at her home in this town. Deceased had enjoyed the best of health up to the first of the present year, since which time she has been a constant sufferer, her disease baffling the skill of the numerous physicians who attended her. Mrs. Hegler was in her 47th year at the time of her death; she was born near Brockville and was married on the 11th January, 1859, and together with her husband lived here for the past twelve years. She leaves no children, and we feel sure her husband has the heartfelt sympathy of the whole community in his affliction. The funeral of the deceased took place on Sunday. The pall bearers being the six following barristers of this town:—Messrs. Brown, Wells, McDonald, Walsh, Reid and Holcroft.

PERSONAL.—Rev. Mr. Laycock, who has changed appointments with Rev. Mr. Reynolds, has moved to Ingersoll and commenced his ministry.—Rev. W. Kettlewell, who has had charge of Zion Tabernacle, Hamilton, has been stationed at Ingersoll.—D. Holmes, an old resident of this town, but now of Barrie, has recovered so as to be able to resume business.—T. D. Millar, cheese buyer, returned from Europe on Tuesday.—John Calder has gone to Ogdensburg, N.Y., to buy cheese for Boyd & Grant of this town and Liverpool.—John Podmore, cheese buyer, returned home on Tuesday from an extended tour through the dairy centres of New York and Eastern Canada. Alex. W. Grant, commision merchant, returned to New York on Saturday.—James Cuthbert graduated in mathematics with first class honors at the late examinations at Toronto University.—Edgerton Waterhouse has succeeded in passing his final examination at Toronto University, and is now a B.A.

DAMAGING RAIN STORM.—The rain storm on Monday burst forth in all its force in Dorchester, Harrisatville and Nilestown. The rain commenced to pour down about 3 o'clock and continued with increasing force for about three hours, part of the time coming down in torrents. Thunder pealed, lightning flashed, and a strong breeze set in during the time. The creeks and river commenced to swell, until between 5 and 6 o'clock they were at flood height. The first effect which the rain had was to overflow the banks of the creek between Nilestown and Dorchester, wash away two culverts and a quantity of earth. The creek overflowed near the railway track west side of Dorchester station, sweeping away some 28 feet of the track. Further down the creek two more culverts and a small wooden bridge gave way beneath the volume of water, and were swept along with the earth and debris. On the main road between Dorchester and Nilestown the water was over a foot deep, and travel on foot was impossible. The creek, which before the rain could be forded on foot, was impassable, and horses were obliged to swim to get across with their loads. The greatest damage was done to the track, some 28 feet of which was torn up and washed away into the adjoining fields.

$50.000 to Loan on Real Estate at Lowest Rates. Apply to Brown & Wells, Barristers. 1593tf

DOMINION DAY.—Subscriptions are being solicited by the firemen for the purpose of celebrating the 1st of July.

ACCIDENT.—Henry Cotton, one of E. Caswell's farm hands broke one of his legs while scuffling with a friend on Monday.

C. M. CHURCH.—The services in the King street Methodist church last Sabbath were conducted by the Rev. Geo. Lawrence in the morning and Rev. Mr. Lacock in the evening.

THE Agricultural and Arts Association of Ontario has appointed Mr. E. W. Chambers, "Springvale Farm," East Oxford, to be superintendent of the Cattle Department of the Provincial Exhibition, to be held in Ottawa during next September.

BASE BALL.—A game of base ball took place on Saturday afternoon between a nine players north of the river, and a club captained by Marshall McMurray, resulting in an easy victory for the latter by a score of 48 to 8.

OH, GIRLS.—According to the Jarvis Record the young ladies of Jarvis are a very ungrateful set of creatures. It says: "One of our young men gave some peanuts to a lot of young ladies who were sitting on the seat behind him at the concert on Saturday night and when they had demolished the nuts they rammed the shells down the back of his neck."

ONTARIO'S SCHOOL OF ART.—A circular has been issued from the Education Department, stating that it is proposed to conduct special free industrial drawing classes at the Ontario School of Arts Educational Department during the ensuing summer holidays, s for the benefit of Public and High School teachers. Intending applicants should send in their names without delay to the department.

LACROSSE.—A Lacrosse match was played on the park on Friday afternoon between the Victors and Clippers, both junior clubs of this town. The victors were captained by Fred Gayfer, and resulted in a victory for the former by three goals to two. J. Vance acted as referee, H. Sumner and W. Smith was umpires.

PICTURESQUE CANADA.—The agent has been delivering this week parts 29 and 30 of this excellent work. We have so frequently referred to "Picturesque Canada" that it would be only a repetition of praises to say more. Every Canadian should have it. It continues to improve in the beauty of its engraving. The last two numbers treating of South Eastern Canada and its beautiful scenery. The illustrations of Lake Memphremagog, Murray Bay, Cape Trinity and views on the St. Lawrence and Saguenay are gems of art.

SUCCESSFUL.—Her many old schoolmates will be delighted to know that Miss Ella Gardiner, youngest daughter of Rev. James Gardiner, D.C.L., Ingersoll, has passed her third year examinations in the Arts course, at Toronto University, with enviable success. She succeeded in taking first class honours in English, second class honours in history, first class honours in French, German and Italian. The fact that Miss Gardiner read up for this examination at home without a tutor, will add to the value of her success, and indicates an unusual degree of ability and application. Miss Gardiner took honours a year ago in several departments in second year work. She was formerly a pupil at the collegiate institute in Hamilton, and has fairly earned the hearty congratulations which will be showered upon her by her many friends.

GEO. MCCABE'S EFFUSION.—A couple of weeks since, George McCabe, the proprietor of the Dew Drop Inn, London South, and who is at present in jail on the serious charge of poisoning his wife, wrote a long letter in which he purported to give the particulars of the sudden death of wives Nos. 1 and 2, and also attempted to narrate circumstances attending his trial at Woodstock. From letters and statements which have been received since the publication of the letter in question, there is reason to believe the narrative was in many respects a tissue of falsehoods. There is no doubt in the world that McCabe penned his effusion with the view of turning public opinion (which was very strongly against him) in his favor, but the very reverse has been the result. Now it is hinted that if he can, he might give the public some insight into the circumstances attending the death of his first wife (he must have been blessed with four) which occurred in Michigan, while the couple were out boating on an inland lake. The mystery surrounding her death by drowning will stand clearing up.—London Free Press.

SUMMER SERMONS.—The spectacle of ten Maori chiefs falling asleep during divine service in St. Paul's Cathedral may have been an interesting one, says the Toronto Telegram, but it was certainly not a high tribute to the preacher. It seems that they were able to stand everything but the sermon. When it came to that they succumbed, going off into a gentle slumber with as much earnestness as the most accomplished Christian. It may be concluded from the collapse of the ten Maori chiefs that while that part of the service known as the sermon may be suited to civilized people it is hardly the thing by which to convert the heathen. The heathen cannot be preached into embracing Christianity, and the Maori chiefs probably concluded that the sermon to which they were subjected in St. Paul's was a mild species of torture which Christirns have to undergo on Sundays for not living up to their faith during the preceding six days of the week. Everybody knows the soporific effect of a sermon, especially during the summer months, when the heat is intolerable, and the total collapse of the ten Maori chiefs in London may be taken as an intimation to the preachers of Christendom that it is time to cut their sermons short if they do not wish to preach their hearers into dreamland. The ten Maori chiefs may be unwittingly performing a good service to civilization.

THOROUGH BRED HORSE, "GOOD ENOUGH."—Owners of good mares will do well to notice that the services of this magnificent thoroughbred colt, 4 years old, can be had for a limited number of choice mares only. Mr. I. N. Hall has not issued any bills this season, as the reputation of his colt is deemed sufficient to secure all the service he is willing to give him, being sired by the world renowned Steeplechaser Milesian, whose great record at Long Branch in 1872 has never been equalled, while the dam of Good Enough is the well known charming mare Nobby of noted blood and performance, whose dam was sired by Old Dan Webster, he by imported Priam, the latter also being three generations removed from Milesian, and further, this colt Good Enough speaks for himself, having visited all the great Canada fairs in 1882 and 1883, as well as the spring show of stallions 1884, and coming home crowned with laurels from all of them; Toronto, in the hunter class; Provincial, Guelph; Thoroughbred, Tilsonburg; Trotting class, Nissouri; Trotting class, Kintore; Carriage class, Ingersoll; Thoroughbred class, London, first in 1882 and also 1883 trotting class, and then at London after taking first 1883 in trotting class, fat and plump, 3 years old, he came out in the hurdle race and beat the fine thorough-bred racehorses belonging to Major Leys and Geo. Watson, under the tremendous applause of 12,000 spectators. His pedigree is unsurpassed and invites the criticism of most expert horse-breeders, while his individual appearance and points of excellence are marvellous. Mr. Hall takes great delight in showing his beauty and giving private exhibitions to appreciative horse admirers. Having heard that this colt thought nothing of jumping over a large lumber waggon with box on, a number of admirers paid a visit to his stable, and the first time he cleared the box like a deer, next time he would not be satisfied with the box but sighted for the highest point of the hind wheels and cleared them beautifully and then stood up on his hind feet and played as if he would like to try the driving house. Truly he is a grand colt and the owner may justly be proud of him. He stands well over 16 hands, of the richest bay colour and the strongest muscled colt we ever saw, and for beauty in every point he cannot be surpassed. We understand Mr. Hall has strong inducements from prominent horse-men to take his horse on the racing turf and should he conclude to do so the breeders of this section who neglect to secure his services may lament when it is too late as they did when his famous sire Milesian was here in Mr. Demster's time, and after one season secured by that noted scientific breeder of thoroughbreds, Mr. Quetton St. George, of Toronto, who has owned the best thoroughbred stallions of the Dominion; having secured Milesian after the death of his famous horse Ruric, sire of Terror the great sire of the many winners of to-day, 4 of his colts coming in for the Queen's plate of this year, 1st, 2nd, 4th and 6th amongst 6 horses. It is a note-worthy fact that Milesian colts are winners of many great races; a son of his took Queen's plate 1882, another son took the great Maryland Steeplechase at Baltimore this season, &c., and last not least Mr. Geo. Watson's horse of London which was beaten at the Western fair last fall by Good Enough in the hurdle race, has proven his excellence as a steeplechaser by taking the railway steeplechase handicap race at Toronto, May 26, beating Rienza, the great prize winner of the great North American steeplechase at Saratoga last year and also the great winners Lady Archibald, Defiance and others.

TOWN COUNCIL.

Special Meeting Last Evening—An Important Document, in Which Every Ratepayer is Concerned—A Rise in the Value of the C.V.R. Bonds.

A special meeting of the TOWN Council was convened last evening, His Worship Mayor Noxon, in the chair.

Members present—Messrs. Watterworth, Seldon, Gibson, Horsman, Walley, Richardson, McInnes, Buchanan, O'Connor and Matheson.

The Mayor briefly referred to the reason for calling the meeting, which he stated was on account of the receipt of the following important communication, which he requested the Clerk to read:—

The Credit Valley Railway,
Secretary & Treasurer's Office,
Toronto, June 9th, 1884.

His Worship
THE MAYOR,
Corporation of the Town of Ingersoll,
Ingersoll, Ontario.

DEAR SIR.—I have much pleasure in advising you that the sum of £1,416 5s 0d stg. in the £5 per cent. Permanent Debenture Stock of this Company has been placed at the credit of your Corporation.

This sum is for interest on the £10,300 of Debenture Stock (held by your Corporation) from April 1st, 1881, to December 31, 1883, at 5 per cent per annum.

I have also to inform you that a cheque for $1,187.88 has been made in favor of your Corporation, being interest on the full amount (£11,716 5s 0d) from January 1, '84, to May 31st, 1884.

The cheque and a certificate for £11,716 of The £5 per cent. Permanent Debenture Stock of The Ontario & Quebec Railway Co., (interest at 5 per cent. per annum guaranteed by The Canadian Pacific Railway Co.,) will be handed your Corporation upon surrender of the C.V.R. Certificate for £10,300 at present held by your Corporation.

Allow me to congratulate yourself and your Corporation upon such a satisfactory termination to this matter.

Yours truly,
H. E. SUCKLING,
Sec.-Treas.

Moved by Mr. Buchanan, seconded by Mr. McInnes, that this Council hereby express their approval and acceptance of the offer conveyed in the communication just read, and that the Mayor proceed to Toronto as early a day as possible, and make the surrender and collect the interest as set forth in said letter.

MR. GIBSON—Thought that a member of the Council should accompany the Mayor to Toronto to make the exchange of bonds.

MR. O'CONNOR suggested that Mr. Gibson accompany Mr. Noxon. He (the speaker) would like to know how their position was bettered in making the exchange? It was only giving one stock for another.

MR. WATTERWORTH—An Act was passed in 1883 giving power to the C. V. R. to amalgamate with another Company, and to raise $5,000 per mile increased mortgage to meet their wants. The exchange was one of compulsion not of desire. The stock would be better under the present arrangement.

MR. BUCHANAN—They had held C. V. R. Bonds for a number of years, and had been compelled to take stock. A long bill of interest had piled up. Now, the new company came forward and gave them the back interest in stock, and paid up the interest on the old and new stock from Jan. 1st, '84, to May 31st, 1884. The interest was guaranteed by the Canada Pacific Railway. Things were now coming to a statisfactory conclusion. They had now a guarantee of $2,800 interest per year. They now held first preferential claim on the C.V.R. backed up by the C.P.R. If an endorsation is good at all, there surely must be value in the additional endorsation to the stock. The cheque is good, and the best feature about the arrangement was that they had no chance to lose. Had yet the same claim against the C.V.R.

Several Voices—No! No!!

MR. BUCHANAN—Yes! Have it on the adjoining part as well as the short end of the line. Objected to sending another delegate to Toronto. A large sum was expended last year for delegation expenses. The Mayor could only do what he was authorized, and could not exceed that authority.

MR. GIBSON—There was a large amount involved. Something might arise requiring important legal advice, and it was also necessary to see that the documents were all correct. It was imperative to make the exchange. The road is a better one now with its present connection and has added largely to its financial standing by amalgamation. The new stock would be better value to hold. As an amalgamated road it desires to put its business into proper shape.

MR. SELDON briefly referred to the remark of Mr. Buchanan respecting the costs of delegates last year. All that was paid out was $47.50, through the payment of which some $85,000 were saved. He saw no objection to the Director, Mr. Watterworth, going along with Mr. Noxon. Would do no harm anyway.

At this stage an amendment was offered adding Mr. Watterworth's name to the motion as a delegate to Toronto, which, on being put was carried amid considerable confusion, things getting somewhat "muddled." The chairman ruling the original motion invalid, a motion was put and carried to rescind the action just taken. The motion of Mr. Buchanan as given above was again put, with the addition of the names of Mr. Watterworth and Mr. Gibson as delegates to accompany Mr. Noxon, and was carried unanimously.

Moved by Mr. Watterworth, seconded by Mr. Seldon, That the Treasurer be instructed to surrender the C.V.R. Bonds to the deputation appointed to proceed to Toronto to make the exchange as directed in above resolution. Carried.

On motion the Clerk was ordered to prepare a copy of Mr. Buchanan's resolution, and attach the corporate seal thereto, for the use of the deputation.

The Council adjourned.

Literary Notes.

The well-known English writer on political subjects, Mr. T. H. S. Escott, editor of "The Fortnightly Review," will contribute to the July Century a careful and critical estimate, including some anecdotes, of John Bright as an orator and a parliamentarian. He concludes that the great English radical has an innate Conservatism which has saved him from extravagance, and although he considers him neither a great administrator nor legislator, he shows why he was indispensable to the legislation of his time—as an "eminently faithful representative of the English Character." A frontispiece engraving after a full-length photograph accompanies the article.

The Art Interchange for May 22nd, contains a very useful design in color suitable for tile decoration, stained glass or embroidery. Six beautiful designs for fruit plates and two designs of decorative heads—one surrounded by peacocks' feathers and the other by sunbeams—are given on a separate sheet. Among the other illustrations are a charming study of violets; a unique water lily pattern for embroidery, showing disks enclosing the full bloom flower with a border of stems and buds and a vigorous and original design for stencil work.

Frank Leslie's Sunday Magazine for July opens with a descriptive article by Rev. Edward Barrass, M. A., entitled, 'the Cannibal Islands,' with thirteen illustrations. Another, by Laurence Lamb, is descriptive of "The Cherokee Nation," with seven illustrations. "The Gospel According to Rembrandt' is a remarkable article, giving etchings by that eminent artist, and arguing that his works show what the common people in Holland and Germany actually believed in the sixteenth century concerning the Gospel of Jesus Christ. "Scenes in and about New Orleans" has eight illustrations. The editor, Rev. T. De Witt Talmage has a characteristic article on "The Divorce Abomination," and a sermon in the Home Pulpit, "The Floral Gospel."

MR. CHARLTON AT MT. ELGIN.

A Liberal Association Formed—Speech by Mr. Charlton, M. P.

At a meeting held here Tuesday afternoon by John Charlton, M.P., a Liberal Association for the Township of Dereham was organized.

Officers elect:—Wm. Nancekivell, President; J. D. Smith, M.D., Vice-President; Adam Fierheller, Secretary and Treasurer. Vice-Presidents—Subdivision No. 1, S. Foster; No. 3, S. Sherwood; No. 4, J. H. Read; No. 5, Wm. Ferguson; No. 6, E. B. Brown.

After this business had been transacted, Mr. Charlton addressed the audience for over an hour in a most able manner. His speech, which was most enthusiastically received, was a synopsis of the main questions of the day. At the close the following resolution was moved and carried unanimously:—

Resolved, That this meeting express their continued confidence in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, as well as their continued confidence and appreciation of the efforts of the present member, Mr. Charlton.

The Bible and Its Value.

PAPER IX.

In our last papers we made a statement en passant without proof that the Bible was the best advocate of monogamy (marriage of one wife) against polygamy, the practice of the heathen of the past and the Mormons to day. Now let the intelligent reader look at this question a moment in the light of history. Is it not true, and as plain as true, that the several distinctive morals of the nations bear ample evidence of the meral influence of the Bible for good above everything else? Look at the influence of Bible Christianity upon and throughout Christendom, as seen in the domestic comfort of family life; in comparison with the influence and morals of Mohammedanism, and the Alkoran as known to exist so wretchedly in the miserable harems of Islamism, or Hindooism, or Mormonism. These several systems are in the main antagonistic to Bible doctrine. Bible Christianity alone gives to the gentler sex the true dignity of womanhood, restoring them from Kaffirism to life's true and noble mission. Let any one compare impartially the condition of the female class belonging to the Teutonic race, with the condition of the same sex belonging to the Slavonic or Mongolian and other races of mankind; and there can be but one conclusion, viz.: that every queenly author of modern literature, and every true woman in the domestic circle, owe their liberty, influence and general comfort to the Bible of God, as the source of all the blessedness of Christianity. And in proportion as nations and men learn the great line of Bible truth, running through the whole, so, in like proportion, will nations and men settle their differences by arbitration, and put forth efforts to stem the tide of intemperance. The Bible is the best advocate of all things noble and pure. We need not wonder that Rousseau (one of the most clever men that ever penned a line against the Bible) was compelled by the force of a strong conviction to confess the following: "All the books of the wisest philosophers, with all their pomp of diction, are contemptible when compared with the Scriptures. Their majesty strikes me with the highest admiration," etc. The Bible is the unchangeable map of the plan of God's purposes concerning mankind, and is the only key which can unlock the vast storehouse of infinite truth. The map of the world has often been changed, but this great chart of truth remains the same through all ages. The fortress of Gibraltar has been for more than one thousand years the object of international envy, as the key to the riches of the East, and many have been its masters. Around the Rock of Gibraltar, from the days of the Saracens, the roar of battle has thundered forth. Africans, Arabs, Castilians, Moors and Englishmen, have been its trial at Wood-stock. From letters and statements which have been received since the publication of the letter in question, there is reason to believe the narrative was in many respects a tissue of falsehoods. There is no doubt in the world that McCabe penned his effusion with the view of turning public opinion (which was very strongly against him) in his favor, but the very reverse has been the result. Now it is hinted that if he can, he might give the public some insight into the circumstances attending the death of his first wife (he must have been blessed with four) which occurred in Michigan, while the couple were out boating on an inland lake. The mystery surrounding her death by drowning will stand clearing up.—London Free Press.

SUMMER SERMONS.—The spectacle of ten Maori chiefs falling asleep during divine service in St. Paul's Cathedral may have been an interesting one, says the Toronto Telegram, but it was certainly not a high tribute to the preacher. It seems that they were able to stand everything but the sermon. When it came to that they succumbed, going off into a gentle slumber with as much earnestness as the most accomplished Christian. It may be concluded from the collapse of the ten Maori chiefs that while that part of the service known as the sermon may be suited to civilized people it is hardly the thing by which to convert the heathen. The heathen cannot be preached into embracing Christianity, and the Maori chiefs probably concluded that the sermon to which they were subjected in St. Paul's was a mild species of torture which Christirns have to undergo on Sundays for not living up to their faith during the preceding six days of the week. Everybody knows the soporific effect of a sermon, especially during the summer months, when the heat is intolerable, and the total collapse of the ten Maori chiefs in London may be taken as an intimation to the preachers of Christendom that it is time to cut their sermons short if they do not wish to preach their hearers into dreamland. The ten Maori chiefs may be unwittingly performing a good service to civilization.

THOROUGH BRED HORSE, "GOOD ENOUGH."—Owners of good mares will do well to notice that the services of this magnificent thoroughbred colt, 4 years old, can be had for a limited number of choice mares only. Mr. I. N. Hall has not issued any bills this season, as the reputation of his colt is deemed sufficient to secure all the service he is willing to give him, being sired by the world renowned Steeplechaser Milesian, whose great record at Long Branch in 1872 has never been equalled, while the dam of Good Enough is the well known charming mare Nobby of noted blood and performance, whose dam was sired by Old Dan Webster, he by imported Priam, the latter also being three generations removed from Milesian, and further, this colt Good Enough speaks for himself, having visited all the great Canada fairs in 1882 and 1883, as well as the spring show of stallions 1884, and coming home crowned with laurels from all of them; Toronto, in the hunter class; Provincial, Guelph; Thoroughbred, Tilsonburg; Trotting class, Nissouri; Trotting class, Kintore; Carriage class, Ingersoll; Thoroughbred class, London, first in 1882 and also 1883 trotting class, and then at London after taking first 1883 in trotting class, fat and plump, 3 years old, he came out in the hurdle race and beat the fine thorough-bred racehorses belonging to Major Leys and Geo. Watson, under the tremendous applause of 12,000 spectators. His pedigree is unsurpassed and invites the criticism of most expert horse-breeders, while his individual appearance and points of excellence are marvellous. Mr. Hall takes great delight in showing his beauty and giving private exhibitions to appreciative horse admirers. Having heard that this colt thought nothing of jumping over a large lumber waggon with box on, a number of admirers paid a visit to his stable, and the first time he cleared the box like a deer, next time he would not be satisfied with the box but sighted for the highest point of the hind wheels and cleared them beautifully and then stood up on his hind feet and played as if he would like to try the driving house. Truly he is a grand colt and the owner may justly be proud of him. He stands well over 16 hands, of the richest bay colour and the strongest muscled colt we ever saw, and for beauty in every point he cannot be surpassed. We understand Mr. Hall has strong inducements from prominent horse-men to take his horse on the racing turf and should he conclude to do so the breeders of this section who neglect to secure his services may lament when it is too late as they did when his famous sire Milesian was here in Mr. Demster's time, and after one season secured by that noted scientific breeder of thoroughbreds, Mr. Quetton St. George, of Toronto, who has owned the best thoroughbred stallions of the Dominion; having secured Milesian after the death of his famous horse Ruric, sire of Terror the great sire of the many winners of to-day, 4 of his colts coming in for the Queen's plate of this year, 1st, 2nd, 4th and 6th amongst 6 horses. It is a note-worthy fact that Milesian colts are winners of many great races; a son of his took Queen's plate 1882, another son took the great Maryland Steeplechase at Baltimore this season, &c., and last not least Mr. Geo. Watson's horse of London which was beaten at the Western fair last fall by Good Enough in the hurdle race, has proven his excellence as a steeplechaser by taking the railway steeplechase handicap race at Toronto, May 26, beating Rienza, the great prize winner of the great North American steeplechase at Saratoga last year and also the great winners Lady Archibald, Defiance and others.

Daniel's Band.

To the Editor of THE CHRONICLE.

MR. EDITOR,—Enquirer in your last week's issue seems anxious to know something about Daniel's Band. If I can give him any information with reference to said Band I shall be glad to do it. Most of them belong to the Methodist church, and so far as I know are worthy Christian men. I organized them into a band of Christian workers myself, and they took the name by which they are known themselves, to which I have no objections. As long as they conduct themselves as Christian men should, and do their work as they have been doing it, they will have my confidence, friendship and direction, and I have no doubt they will have in time to come, as they have had in the past, the confidence and help of the Methodist church on the Salford circuit.

Yours truly,
D. HUNT.

Farmers' Insurance Co's.

To the Editor of THE CHRONICLE.

DEAR SIR,—In your issue of the 22nd ult., I notice an article over the signature of "Farmer," in which your correspondent evidently wishes to air his knowledge of insurance matters generally, to which I would offer no objections, had he not called particular attention to the East and West Nissouri and West Zorra Mutual, which also does business in North Oxford and part of Dorchester, misrepresenting its affairs in a manner that would tend to mislead and prejudice your readers, the apparent object of his letter.

It appears very strange indeed that that "Farmer" should have wandered through New York, Michigan and Ohio, in search of Companies, whilst there are over sixty Companies registered in Ontario, fifty-two of which are doing a purely mutual business, and still more so that he should be conversant with the affairs of those foreign Companies, and yet remain so entirely ignorant of the affairs of those existing in our own province.

I assume this from the erroneous statements that "Farmer" has made in relation to the Nissouri Co., and having depended on "hear say" for his information.

For the benefit of those who would like to know I subjoin the following statements.

We commenced business in May, 1878, and took risks and sustained losses as follows:

	Amt'of Risks.	Amt'of Losses.
1878	$154,650	$ None
1879	153,940	200.50
1880	153,945	920.00
1881	212,105	70.50
1882	182,530	None
	$857,170	$1,200.00
1883	407,040	1,556.00

Now, Mr. Editor, if figures "don't lie" it is easy to see that the members of the East and West Nissouri and West Zorra Mutual Fire Insurance Company, have on the average only had to pay about $1.55 per $1,000 for losses during a term of five years.

Persons who insured in this Company from the first and have stood all losses for the five years, have been called upon to pay $3.76 per $1,000.

Our expense account shows an equally clean sheet and will compare favorably with any Company doing the amount of business that we are doing.

On the 31st Dec., 1883, the amount in force was $1,075,566, and is now largely increased.

I was as bad with Bilious Fever and Indigestion as I think any one could be, I have taken three bottles and am nearly well and can eat any kind of food without it hurting me. FARM AND DAIRY.

Cheese as Food.

Professor L. B. Arnold says, in a letter to the Live Stock Journal of Chicago that "Canada has become the greatest cheese-producing country on the continent, if not in the world in proportion to population," but it may be added, the consumption of cheese is quite limited, considering the amount produced. In England the annual consumption is ten pounds a head, and in the U. S. over four pounds per capita, whilst in Canada we only consume 3½ pounds. This is a very small share of the total product of the country. The cheese exported from Canada last year amounted to 58,041,387 and the total amount made was over 75,000,000 pounds or a production of 15 pounds per individual; yet we only consumed the one-fifth part of this. One of the causes assigned for such a small consumption is that cheese does not agree with Canadians, and Prof. Arnold agrees with this and attributes the indigestibility of cheese to the fact that it is never cured properly, but eaten too fresh, and that in this state it is as insoluble as a stone. But the same authority says that cheese, when properly made, and thoroughly cured, so that all of its substance is available for food, has twice the value of butcher's meat for sustaining life, and is quite as easily digested, and as wholesome. But all cheese even when well cured, is not equal to its highest possibilities. Many circumstances interfere with its perfection. In the first place, good cheese can only be made out of good milk, and this is not always at the command of the cheese maker. The milk which was good when it came from the cow may not be so when it reaches the cheese vat; it may be sour or stale, or uncleanly; and, further, milk itself is liable to wide variations in its constituents, thereby varying the quality of cheese made from it. But these are only accidental irregularities, that are not always present, and cheese made from milk which is free from them should not be condemned on that account. They are avoidable, and do not, in fact give much ground for complaint against the use of cheese. There are only things connected with the use of cheese equally avoidable, which give rise to well-grounded complaints, that are telling heavily against its good name, and use. Bearing in mind the indigestible, and consequently unwholesome, condition of newly-pressed curd, or, as it is called, and remembering that this condition only abates gradually, as the cheese advances in curing, the ill effects of putting it into consumption to soon, while it is yet in its green state, will be understood. Those who are at all familiar with the traffic in cheese know very well that much of the cheese of commerce, when it goes into consumption, is too imperfectly cured to have its food value fully available. It is so indigestible as to be unhealthful, and it is used at a loss because much of it is not digested at all. Thus the practice of thrusting green cheese upon the markets gives rise to just grounds for objections to its healthfulness and value, and greatly restricts its consumption, all of which would be obviated by retaining the goods in the curing room till they are fit for use. There are several reasons why this is not done. One is, that, if fairly made, cheese acquires an agreeable flaver before it is much cured; another is a desire on the part os the producer to save shrinkage, labor in earing for it, and to realize on it as soon as possible; and a third reason is that much of the hot-weather cheese, from being imperfectly made, and the use of bad rennet, is so short-lived that it must be disposed of while young, or it would spoil on the maker's hand before curing was possible. All these causes conspiring, together with the total ignorance on the part of the makers, middle-men, and consumers as to the actual state of facts, tends to push cheese on to the markets when it is so little cured that it can by only about half digested, and therefore justly liable to the charge of unwholesomeness, which would not lie against cheese properly made and cured. The average price of cheese is not above that of butchers' meat, if it is as high. Perfect cheese, having twice the life-sustaining power of meat, ought to bring twice as much. The fact that when used as an article of necessity, a pound of it brings only the price of one pound of meat instead of two, is evidence that practical use accords to it but half of its possible merit. There is no need of such sacrifice in the use of cheese, for it can be, and some of it is now, made so that it is as unobjectionable as bread, and can be eaten by invalids with impunity; but the sacrifice will continue till persistent discussion forces a better knowledge of the causes of its dietetical defects.

Canadian Cattle Trade.

The Canadian live cattle export trade increased from $36,000 in 1877 to $3,500,000 last year, and special efforts are now being made to develop it still further. Prof. Brown, of the Guelph Agricultural College, now in Scotland, is urging the cattle-raisers of Great Britain to transfer the scene of their operations to Ontario, where stock raising can be carried on at about half the expense involved in England, while thoroughbred stock sells one-third higher than at home. The increase of the Canadian imports has excited the ill-will of some English farmers, who object nearly as strongly to competition with the Dominion as with the United States, and whenever plausible grounds present themselves, charges are made that the Canadian cattle are diseased. Last Summer it was alleged that a Canadian shipment were suffering from Texas fever; and a fortnight ago it was alleged that Canadian cattle sold in Cambridgeshire, had foot-and-mouth disease. It has been amply proved, however, that the cattle had been inspected and found healthy before embarkation; that they were subjected to 10 or 12 days' quarantine on board the ship; that they were inspected in Liverpool and declared to be healthy, and that after staying four days there, a clean bill of health was again given. Now, as foot-and-mouth disease manifests itself within three days of inception, if these animals were really suffering from the malady in Cambridgeshire, they must have contracted it after landing in England.

REGULARS.

One of the strongest proofs of the value of Kidney-Wort as a remedy for all diseases of the Kidneys, Liver and Bowels, is the fact that it is used and prescribed by "regular" physicians. Philip C. Ballou, M.D., of Monkton, Vt., says: "Take it all in all, it is the most successful remedy I have ever used."

Dairying in Scotland.

On the last day but one of April, I had the honor to give a lecture in the Town Hall of Ayr, under the auspices of the Scottish Dairy Farmers' Association, my subject being "Some of the Principles of Dairying." This Association, which is just now in course of formation, embraces at present several of the southwestern counties of Scotland, the home of the Ayrshire cattle, and a famous dairying district; and its object is to improve and develop the dairy interests of that part of the United Kingdom. On the supposition that the Association remains united, I may predict that it will become a very powerful body, and that its influence will tend very materially to the improvement of the dairy products of Scotland. Our Scotch cousins, usually very level-headed and sedate, become energetic and even enthusiastic, once they are roused to action, as they now are in this matter.

Many years ago, the late Joseph Harding, of Marksbury, who may be regarded as the chief apostle of Cheddar cheese-making in England, just as the late X. A. Willard was its chief exponent in America, was employed by the Scottish farmers to expound and demonstrate the principles of Cheddar cheese-making; and, since his day, Scotch Cheddars have held a high position in the markets of these islands. To a great extent, Mr. Harding's method supplanted the old Dunlop system, which had been so long employed in Galloway and other districts of Scotland, and to-day his system, in all its primitive simplicity of principle, and with comparatively unimportant changes in details, in utensils and the like, is employed in a large proportion of the dairies in that part of the country. In America and Canada, however, various improvements have been worked out in the Cheddar system, and improved utensils have been invented, with the result of placing the cheese of the American continent on a higher footing in our English markets than anybody dreamt, a quarter of a century ago, that it would ever attain. The Canadian cheese, in particular, has become a very formidable rival to the Scotch Cheddars in the Scotch markets, and to this may be ascribed the action which is being taken, in the formation of the Scottish Dairy Farmers' Association.

The meeting at Ayr was on the occasion of the "Ayrshire Derby," the annual exhibition of the Ayrshire cattle to which this well-known and somewhat euphemistic designation has been given. A large number of the leading farmers of this part of Scotland may always be found at this annual show, and this year, as an additional object, they had on hand the formation of the Dairy Association.

And the "Ayrshire Derby" is a sight worth going a long way to see by any one who is fond of the excellent breed of dairy cattle, which is the leading feature of the show. It may be taken for granted that no more useful breed of cattle than the Ayrshire exists, so far, at all events, as milking is concerned, and in this part of Scotland it is found in the highest degree of perfection. To see, therefore, scores upon scores of the choicest specimens of the breed paraded in the show ring, is a spectacle all the more charming because it cannot be, or at all events is not, equaled anywhere else in the world. The native home of the Ayrshire, like that of the Jersey, is contiguous to the sea, and it is probable that these choice breeds can hardly be preserved in an unchanged condition in districts far away. This being a correct assumption, the Ayrshire farmers have a great future in store, in the way of breeding stock to maintain the quality of the breed in other parts of the world. Professor Brown was a purchaser of Ayrshire stock for importation into Canada, as he had already been of Herefords and other English cattle, as well as of Clydesdale and other breeds of draught horses. He informed me that he had paid £500 for a Hereford bull, which had been bought last year for £65! Hurrah for the Britisher! But Mr. Brown has a long purse, viz., that of the Government, and so it is all right for everybody.—Prof. Sheldon in Rural New Yorker.

Notes.

Clover hay is much better for milch cows than timothy. It produces a larger quantity of milk, and also of a better quality. All butter-makers know how yellow the butter is which is made from the milk of cows fed on clover hay.

The brisk walk is the gait in horses that is of most value to farmers. When going on the road with a load what is gained by trotting on level places is more than offset by the slowness of the gait afterwards.

In times of peace prepare for war. When you are eating that nice, fragrant, yellow grass butter remember that with the proper food the cows would make just as good butter next winter; and set about raising sufficient mangels or carrots so they can each have a generous feed every day next winter. Don't delay another day, because it will pay twice over, pay in the quantity and quality of the butter and in the healthfulness of the stock.

A farmer who bought a cow which neither he nor his men could milk found that he could make her profitable to suckle calves, which were very high priced that season. Her own calf sold for $15. Then another was left for her to rear and brought $12. During the season the farmer sold $65 worth of calves reared on this kicking cow, fed her a few dollars's worth of meal and turned her off for beef the following winter. This plan is well adapted for a large dairy where a number of cows calve in succession.

In breeding colts the influence of the dam can scarcely be over-rated. It has been too much the habit of horsemen to consider only the sire. They appear to have proceeded on the assumption that if the sire were good it mattered little what was the quality of the other animal. Greater things would have been accomplished than have yet been in the improvement of our horses had care been exercised in this respect.

There are but few places, perhaps none, in the country where hay can be grown and sold from the farm at a profit. The farmers who do this are surely robbing their land, and the amount of receipts per acre is much less than from other crops which will afford the purchase of manure. The selling price of clover hay, especially, is rarely more and often less than its value for manure, besides the profit that can be got in first feeding it to some animal on the farm.

The flesh of hogs fattened in Canada contains a large proportion of lean meat, because barley and peas are mainly fed to produce it. These are nitrogenous rather than starchy foods, and hogs fed on these grains are less liable to disease than those fed exclusively on corn.

Farmers are not careful enough concerning the shoeing of their horses. Many blacksmiths in these days have never served an apprenticeship at this branch of their business, and are unable to do good work. There is as much difference in the way a horse is shod as anything else, and a good horse is far too valuable an animal to run any risk of injury from incompetent horse shoers.

The past winter a large number of fine cattle have been stall-fed in Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia. It has long been the custom of the farmers in Eastern Pennsylvania and in the great Valley of Virginia to purchase lean cattle in the fall to consume the abundant produce from the farms, which had been kept in a high state of fertility by this practice. Gradually the system is spreading, and it is a good thing to know of and to imitate. It is the quickest and easiest way to make the land rich, and the most profitable way to dispose of the farm products. Not a bushel of corn is sold. Wheat is sold, but bran and other feed is purchased, and it is a great favor for a townsman to get a sheaf of straw from one of these farmers whose principle is that to take the straw off from the farm, unless it is brought back as manure, is a robbery of the land. It would require a long and wearisome search to find better farmers and handsomer homesteads and more comfort and thrift than prevail in these localities, where this good husbandry is practised.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Hints and Recipes.

Children should never be allowed to wear garters, they are most injurious, and impede growth and circulation.

Clear boiling water will remove tea stains. Pour the water through the stain, and thus prevent its spreading over the fabric.

To clean the waste pipes leading from the sink, pour down them a strong solution of potash dissolved in hot water. Be very careful that none of this mixture gets on your hands or or clothing, as it will destroy all animal matter that it comes in contact with.

It is a good plan to vary the manner in which you flavour the roast of beef; this can be done by squeezing the juice of half a lemon over it and putting the other half inside the roast. Another way is to put half of a carrot, one small onion, and a little parsley in the dripping pan, and lay the roast over it. Do not be led by any bad adviser to put one drop of water into your dripping pan until you have tried the experiment of roasting beef in this way. It makes a striking difference in the flavour of the meat.

Cracker Pudding.—Take 6 crackers rolled fine, 1 quart of milk, the yolks of 3 eggs, ½ cup sugar, beat altogether, add a little salt and nutmeg, 1 cup raisins; bake in rather quick oven. Then beat the whites of the eggs to a stiff froth and spread over the top and place in the oven to brown. (A Reader).

A pretty table is made as follows: Take in an old fashioned washstand cut off the back piece and take a square board on the top over the circle, paint and varnish the whole black. When dry, take bright cardinal canton flannel, and cover the top and bottom; tack on pretty drapery fring, with brass headed nails. (Mrs. J. W.)

Fig Cake.—A very good fig cake is made as follows: take a pound of figs and cut them in thin slices and flour them. Make a dough of one cup of butter, one and three quarters of a cup of sugar; one of sweet milk; 3 pints of flour; 2½ teaspooonfuls of baking powder, and the whites of 10 eggs, then mix in the figs and bake in a tin lined with buttered paper in a moderate oven, frost the top of the cake and add a few drops of vanilla to the frosting.

Chocolate Cake.—Take 1 cup sugar, 2 eggs, ½ cup butter, ½ cup milk, 2 cups flour, 1 teaspoon cream tarter, ½ teaspoon saleratus, beat altogether 10 minutes and bake in a shallow tin. For the frosting use 4 table spoons grated chocolate, 4 table spoons powdered sugar, white of one egg, beat to a stiff froth; beat altogether then place in a tin dish, that will fit over the top of the teakettle and stir all the time, for 10 minutes, and spread on the cake just as soon as you like it from the kettle.

Pound Cake.—Make a pan a little warm, put one pound of butter and one pound and a quarter of loaf dust sugar together in it. Beat them together with your hand till it becomes like cream; add twelve eggs, bnt only three of them in at a time. When the three are well beaten in, add the others. When the last three are beaten in, add one pound and a quarter of sifted flour. Mix it lightly with your hand; then add three pounds of currants, two ounces of peel, and two drops of essence of lemon.

TEMPERANCE.

Early Training.

The teaching of the principles of hygiene in the public schools, the simple explanation of the laws which govern physical health, would bring the dread results of stimulants directly before the growing intelligence of every child in the country. A judicious turn given to their powers of observation—which have, alas! but too frequent opportunity of being exercised on examples—a familiar discussion now and then to invite thought and inquiry, would do more to give impetus to a genuine temperance movement than all that has ever been done before. Many of these children unfortunately come into the the world with hereditary tastes and an appetite for excesses, which only those who have to struggle against an inherited bias can comprehend. But of all forces for uprooting and inculcating that of early training is strongest. We have our temperance lectures—as we have our strnggles against immortality of every kind—too late. We begin them only after the mischief has been accomplished. Instead of sowing the good seed of uprightness, of honor, and of self-respect in the comparatively virgin soil of the child's soul, we wait until this has had time to become overrun with every noxious weed, incapable alike of reclaim or cultivation.

If this view of the temperance question appears far-fetched or impracticable it is because the person so viewing it has not had time for sober thought. It is the crusade which is impracticable as a cause of lasting results. These sudden enthusiasms of thought and action are specious factors in solid improvement, especially in cases where, like this of intemperance, the temporal is so mixed with the spiritual, and one is obliged to fight at once physical appetite and moral disease. There can be found no sudden remedy for a chronic ailment; the age of miracles is passed with the age of faith; what is to be wrested now from the jaws of destruction must be by patience and perseverence, by labour and by prayer. Any revolution that aims at the overthrow of bad habits and worse principles must begin from the beginning; there is not more difference between bending the pliant sapling and the stubborn oak than between instilling reform in the tender soul of the child rather than the seared conscience of the man. Where one is wax the other is adamant.

GREAT MEN'S PLEASURES.

Poets and Authors Who Loved Animals and Children—Statesmen Who Gambled and Generals Who Made Love.

"All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy," and whether applied to man or beast, prince or peasant, illiterate or learned, the quaint proverb holds its own. Some of the greatest minds have sought relief from brain-work in the simplest amusements and sports of childhood; others in feverish excitement, and others in wild and romping, noisy or athletic pleasure. The amusements of great men, especially authors, are so varied and so different frequently from what we would imagine from the record of their lives left on history's page, that some of the more unusual can not prove uninteresting.

Cardinal Richelieu used to exercise by jumping over furniture, and once was discovered kicking with his servant, trying who could kick the highest against a wall. Count De Grammont once made a bet that he could kick or jump higher than the diplomat, but he was careful not to beat him, and thus, by the loss of a little small change, he rose high in his favor.

Sam Johnson the literary bear, used to touch every post on Fleet street that he passed, and if he missed one by chance back he went and touched it. He was careful, says Boswell, his historian, always to set his foot down in the middle of a flag-stone, and when he returned from his walk the Doctor made it a rule to cross the threshold on one particular foot. In order to accomplish that he was compelled to calculate his steps a certain distance from the door.

Shelley, the poet, found amusement in sailing paper boats upon the Serpentine and the lakes of Hyde Park.

Jean Jacques Rosseau, when he was in the country, used to pack huge stones up to some tall cliff, and dash them down in the waves beneath, just as the boys used to throw stones in the well to hear them go "cherlunker."

Cowper, the poet, used to play with two pet horses, which afforded him as much pleasure as a cat did the poet Dante. Sir Walter Scott's favorite hound attests to that author's love of hunting. Dean Swift found lots of fun in harnessing up his servants with cord and driving them upstairs and down through his deanery. George Washington was a lover of fox-hunting, and took a turn with the hounds two or three times a week when in the country. Peter the Great liked to be wheeled about in a wheelbarrow over the flower-beds and neat pastures, and Sir William Temple took it much to heart when the Russian monarch rode rough-shod over the tulips and roseheds of his garden. Another amusement of Peters was getting stone-blind drunk. John Bright, the English Commoner, is fond of the rod and line. Fox the orator, loved the gambling table, and said the greatest pleasure in the world was to play and win, and the next greatest to play and lose. Old Burton, who spent all his life in a library, wrote a book that was the only one that ever got Dr Johnson out of bed two hours before he intended to rise, found his sole recreation in going down to Folly Bridge at Oxford, and listening to the jokes of bargemen. Byron loved to shoot with a pistol at a coin in a cleft stick, and Henry V. loved tennis. Pope Innocent III. used to play new pieces, and Bacon, Cowley, Evelyn, Buffon and Addison loved to walk in their gardens. Henry VIII. was fond of hnnting, and all out-door rough and tumble manly sports, when he was not engaged in killing his wives. Milton found recreation in playing on the organ; Parson, the scholar, and Thomas Wharton the historian of English poetry, in frequentng low taverns joking and being joked. Leonardi da Vinci loved to look at garbage piles, and the slime and filth of the Florentine slums. Godolphin patronized the cockpit. Charles II, spent much time in a chemical laboratory, and Prince Rupert was fond of mechanical pursuits and by his discovery of mezzotinto left something besides the name of a gay cavalier for posterity.

Matthew Prior, an elegant poet, loved to go and converse with a soldier and his slattern wife at a low public house in Long Acre, and William the Conqueror was fond of hunting and field sports. Philip, the Duke of Burgundy, spent much time in contriving houses full of trap-doors, spring snares and pitfalls, and then enjoyed the fun of seeing some stranger brought in to be soused in water or battered with flour sacks, which came raining down. Gladstone amuses himself with chopping down trees in Hawarden. Daniel Webster was fond of fishing and snipe-shooting at his country home in Marshfield, and Henry Clay, his compeer, enjoyed a game of cards. Tycho Brahe amused himself making mathematical instruments; D'Andilly in walking through forests; Balzac, the French novelist, in making crayons; Pierese, in collecting medals and antiques; the Abbe de Marrolles in engravings, and Rohanlt in watching different mechanics at work. Domitian, the Roman Emperor, found rare sport in catching flies and sticking them through the body with a bodkin. The philosopher Spinoza loved to train spiders, Macaulay to romp with children, and Goldsmith to teach his dog to stand on his hind legs. Nero, who fiddled when Rome burnt, amused himself with making hydraulic clocks.

PITT, THE STATESMAN,

Had queer amusements, according to Lady Hester Stanhope. He used to go to a barn where hay and corn were kept for the horses. He had a room fitted up with a table and two or three chairs, Oh, what slices of bread and butter I have seen him eat there, and hunches of bread and cheese big enough for a plowman. George the Third's favorite amusement was music, of which he was passionately fond. It was music of the highest character, for grandeur and sublimity of conception, by which he not only gratified a well turned ear, but exalted his devotional feelings. Italian music he did not favor, but the phlegmatic Dutch fiddling, with stately measure and solemn tread, was his greatest delight. Dancing he loved when it was staid and formal. The ravishing waltz was then unknown. Queen Victoria, when young, was fond of archery, and a painting of Her Majesty at Buckingham Palace represents her in an archery field holding a bow, and earnestly watching the flight of a spent arrow. The late President Lincoln delighted in telling stories, and at the Cabinet meetings every incident of business reminded him of a story that was wont to set the table in a roar. Old Peter Pindar, Dr. Walcott, used to take his recreation by lying all day in bed. Tom Moore found his recreation in ladies' society, at the brilliant receptions of the Countess of Blessington, where he was the admired of all, the centre of attraction by his brilliant and ready wit and rare musical faculties. Charles Lamb, the author of "Essays of Elia," found pleasure in good dinners of rare roast pig, a quiet pipe and hot drink. Pope, cynical dwarf that he was, loved to eat lampreys and show off his treasures at Twickenham. Burns loved to get royally drunk, and his position as Gauger enabled him to gratify his love. Ben Jonson and Beaumont and Fletcher found pleasure with Drayton and Shakespeare and others, in drinking enormous flagons of ale and going to bed, as gentlemen did in those days, with their boots on. When Lord Nelson was not fighting he was playing the gallant to Lady Hamilton, his mistress, for whom he possessed a strong infatuation.

THE ANCIENTS

Were noted for their odd amusements. When Cato, of Utica, lost his election to the Senate he went to play at tennis. Farmerlane the Great was a famous chess player, and Themistocles was fond of dancing and playing the flute. Pericles, the statesman, was fond of Aspasia, his mistress, and spent his hours of recreation with her, and Julius Caesar, when captured by pirates, found it a great suorce of pleasure to compose speeches and recite before them.

Marcolini.

It was midnight.

The great clock had struck, and was still echoing through every porch and gallery in the quarter of St. Mark, when a young citizen, wrapped in his cloak, was hastening home from an interview with his young mistress.

His step was very light, for his heart was so.

Her parents had just consented to their marriage. The very day was named.

"Lovely Giulietta!" he cried, "and shall I, then, call thee mine at last! Who was ever so blest as thy Marcolini?"

But as he spoke he stopped; for something glittered on the pavement before him.

It was a scabbard of rich workmanship; and the discovery, what was it but an earnest of good fortune?

"Rest thou there!" he cried, thrusting it gayly into his belt. "If another claims thee not thou hast changed masters!"

And on he went as before, humming the burden of a song which he and his Giulietta had been singing together.

But little we know what the next minute will bring forth.

He turned by the Church of St. Geminiano, and in three steps met the watch.

A terrible murder had just been committed.

The Senator Renaldi had been found dead at his door, the dagger left in his heart.

The unfortunate Marcolini was dragged away for examination.

The place, the time, everything served to excite, to justify suspicion.

And no sooner had he entered the guardhouse than a damning witness appeared against him.

The bravo in his flight had thrown away his scabbard.

And smeared with blood—with blood not yet dry—it was now in the belt of Marcolini.

Its patrican ornaments struck every eye.

When the fatal dagger was produced and compared with it not a doubt of his guilt remained.

Still there is in the innocent an energy, a composure—an energy when they speak, a composure when they are silent—to which none can be altogether insensible; and the judge delayed for some time to pronounce the sentence, though he was a near relation of the dead.

At length, however, it came, and Marcolini lost his life and Guilietta her reason.

Not many years afterward the truth revealed itself, the real criminal in his last moments confessed the crime; and hence the custom in Venice, a custom that long prevailed, for a crier to cry out in the court before a sentence was passed 'Remember poor Marcolini.'

TAKEN AT THE RIGHT END.

P. A. McArthur, of Alton, Ont., had a cold which he didn't like. It wasn't so very bad, but it hung on him a long time and was getting seated. The usual medical remedies did no good. He tried Dr. Wilson's Pulmonary Cherry Balsam. The first dose benefited him, and in a short time he was perfectly well. It is not necessary for any cold to obtain a foot-hold in any constitution as long as Dr. Wilson's Pulmonary Cherry Balsam is at hand. What Quinine is to fever, Dr. Wilson's Pulmonary Cherry Balsam is to throat and lung diseases.

KIDNEY-WORT

A ROMAN GENTLEMAN'S IDEA OF HAPPINESS.

Translated from Martial, Epig, X., 47.

What makes a happy life, dear friend,
If thou wouldst briefly learn, attend.
An income left, not earned by toil;
Some acres of a kindly soil;
The pot unfailing on the fire;
No lawsuits; seldom town attire;
Health; strength with grace; a peaceful mind;
Shrewdness with honesty combined;
Plain living; equal friends and free;
Evenings of temperate gaiety;
A wife discreet, yet blythe and bright;
Sound slumber, that lends wings to night.
With all thy heart embrace thy lot,
Wish not for death and fear it not.

IN THE LAND OF THE SHAMROCK.

In the land of my birth, far away o'er the foam
Of the pathless and treacherous deep;
In my own native land, in the bright sunny home
Of my childhood, oh! there let me sleep.
Ye know not the deep love I bear for that place
Nor the tears that drop fast from my eye
As I think that away from the home of my race
From the land of my birth, I must die.

There grows the bright Shamrock, a carpet so green
In even the dusk woodland spot;
There cluster the wild rose and sweet eglantine.
The daisy and forget-me-not;
There waves in the sweet breeze the slender blue bell
'Neath the woodbine that climbs towards the skies;
And there in my own, my sweet native dell,
In the land of my birth, let me die.

Where the silvery waves, rushing on to the shore,
Make music from morn till eve;
Where birds skim the waters, like delicate oars,
In the land of my birth let me live.
Where clustering violets grow o'er the tomb
Decked with dewdrops, like tears from the eye;
Where the bright stars look down on my dear childhood's home,
In the land of my birth, let me die.

An Ambitious Woman.

BY EDGAR FAWCETT.

"You wrote this to Godwin, and it has been lost by him. Some one else has found it, and sent it to me. The handwriting on the envelope is not his."

Claire looked at him in blank amazement. It did not seem to her that he could possibly be the man whom she had thus far known as Herbert Hollister. He appeared radically and utterly changed. She could not understand just where the change lay, or in what it consisted. She was too bewildered to analyze it, or in any way draw conclusions from it. She was simply pierced with a pungent sense of its existence.

"He lost it," she said. "He wrote me that he had lost it. You are right in thinking that some one else has sent it to you."

She wondered what he would now say. She forgot even to feel shame in his presence. She was asking herself what had so completely altered him. Why was he neither angry nor reproachful? The very expression of his features looked strangely unusual. It was almost as if the spirit of some new man had entered into his body.

"Whoever has sent this," he soon said, "is your enemy, and wishes you great harm. But thank God I have it!" He crushed the paper in his hand, immediately afterward, and thrust it within his pocket. Claire rose from the sofa. Her hands hung at either side in a helpless way. Her eyes were still fastened upon his face.

"Are you acting a part?" she asked, with a sort of weary desperation. "I realize that I have done a horrible thing. But tell me at once what course you mean to take. If I am to leave your house, and never to be noticed by you again, order me to go, and I will go. The letter shows you that I care nothing for that man. I don't make excuses; I have none to make. But I am not an adulteress even in thought. Remember what I say. My sin, dark as it is, has not that one hideous element. I wanted to desert you—to go abroad—you read the whole story in the letter. You have only to speak the word, and you shall have looked upon me for the last time. . . . It is your silence that tortures me. . . . Why are you silent? Here I stand before you, without a shadow of right to defend myself, and yet you force from me a certain kind of miserable defense, because you will not either rebuke or denounce me."

He had been looking at her very steadily. He now caught one of her hands in both his own.

"Claire," he said, "I have only one wish—one thought: to save you."

"Save me?" she repeated.

He went on speaking with great speed. His eyes were fixed on her own, and they were filled with a light that was rich and sweet. She had never known him to be like this before; he was just as tender as of old, but beneath his tenderness there was a strength, a decision, a virile assertion, that gave him a new, startling personality.

"Yes," he said, "to save you. There is no great mischief done, as it is. I think some woman sent me your letter. It is just what some envious or spiteful woman would do. But I have it, and can destroy it. You ask me what course I mean to take. You ask me whether I shall bid you leave my house. My only answer, Claire, is this: if you have no love for me, then I have a very great love for you. I think you knew this long ago. I am your friend, poor child—not only your husband, but your friend. You shan't go wrong while I have the brain and the nerve to stand between you and folly. Other men might take another course. I don't care. You are pure still; I am certain of it, and you shall remain pure. You are my wife; I will protect you; it's my duty to protect you. You have never loved me; you married me without a spark of love. But I gave you as large a love as man ever gave to woman. It's in my heart still. It can never die. If it were not so large and so true it would not seek to guard and shield you now. But it does—it must . . . Claire, Claire, you have been terribly foolish! A little more, and I must have cast you off. But as it is, I can and will plant myself between you and disgrace!"

He had been holding her hand all through the utterance of these words. But now he released it, and slightly withdrew from her.

She advanced toward him. There was a look of absolute awe on her face. She recognized how much her own blindness had been hiding from her. His very stature seemed to have risen. His tolerance appealed to her with such amity. It flashed through her mind: 'What other man would have acted as he has done?'

In a few brief moments she knew him as the noble and high being he really was. The tears besieged her eyes. The enormity of the wrong she had done him horrified her. She stood quivering in his presence. The impulse assailed her literally to kneel before him. She grasped his arm; her dry, tearless eyes searched his pale face with a madness of contrition in their look.

"Herbert," she faltered . . . "Herbert, I—I never knew till now that you could be so grand and strong! What kept me from loving you was your own love for me. It seemed to make you weak; it seemed to put you below me. You were always yielding to me—always paying me reverence. But I should have bowed before you. You were worthy of it, and I did not see . . . I never saw till now! . . . Herbert, I love you! . . . Oh, these are not idle words! They spring straight from my soul! If you want the repentance of my future life, it is yours! Why did you not show me your real self till so late? What shall I do to prove my love? You must not pardon me so easily—no, I cannot endure that! It makes me sick with shame to be treated so! Such a mercy would be cruelty. You must punish me somehow—I must undergo some penance, the harder the better. You have no right to trust me again until I have passed through some sort of cleansing fire—suffered, been mortified, humiliated, taught a stern and fearful lesson! You gave me everything; there was nothing in the world I did not owe to you; you lifted me from dependence into the most brilliant prosperity. And I—Good Heavens! I was a viper of ingratitude! I might call it madness; I might say that the lust for riches and power made me conceive this treacherous and contemptible idea of deserting you—made me decide that we could not live together when the wealth had gone. But it was no madness—there was too clear a method in it for that. It was merely base and mean—it can have no palliative. . . . . Herbert, don't look at me with any love, any pity in your face. I can't bear it—I—I want to creep away somewhere and die. I am not fit to have you touch me—No, no! you must not!"

She had receded from him; she meant to quit the room, though her limbs felt weak and her head giddy, and she was not sure whether she could reach the doorway without falling. But on a sudden his arms clasped her. How strong they seemed! She had never till now had so keen a sense of even his bodily strength. When his lips touched her own she burst into tears. She was still struggling to free herself, but he held her too firmly; she could not escape.

"Claire," she heard him say, with a tenderness of tone more exquisite than any he had yet used, "I couldn't help forgiving you, dear, no matter how hard I might try. Oh, darling, let us begin all over again! You say that you do love me at last! Well, I believe you! I want to believe you, and I will! How could I ever punish you? You haven't been so greatly to blame—don't torment yourself by thinking you have. People were flattering and courting you; they made you a perfect queen; they turned your head. Now all that is over. I think there is a great happiness in store for both of us, my love—a happiness that the money never brought us while it lasted. Perhaps, after all, it is better that I should find you weak. It makes you more human in my sight. I hasn't bow down before you any more, as you say that I did; I shall only love you . . . love you forever—love you till death, and beyond it, too, I hope!"

He was kissing her cheek as he uttered these final words; but it had already seemed to take a certain chill, and in another moment he was forced to draw up his form, for it had no power whatever of self-support. She had fainted in his arms. . . . .

She found him close beside her when she regained consciousness. She lay upon the lounge in her own dressing-room upstairs. He was bathing her forehead with cologne, and holding to her nostrils a handkerchief drenched with it. He began to be alarmed at her continued swoon. The first thing that her eyes reopened upon was his smile of glad relief.

The light of that smile stayed with Claire through years. It bathed her life with perpetual sunshine.

Everything altered in a few more weeks. They left the great house and came to live in the smaller one, which Claire personally owned, and which Hollister would not let her give back to him, though she pleaded with him more than once on this subject.

"No," he would always say. "It is yours, and that means it is mine as well. I meant, when the crash first came, that you should keep it, and I was glad that you made it yours. If I let you give it back to me, this would look as if I had lost faith in you. And I have lost no faith; I have gained a new faith—that is all."

"To think that I should ever have known this man and not have loved him!" she would say to herself again and again.

Every successive day brought with it a dear surprise. She felt toward her husband as though his nature was a region through which she had journeyed heedlessly but was now revisiting with sharpened vision, vitalized intelligence. Traits and qualities that she could not but remember him to have possessed, now assumed a beauty, a harmony, a proportion, an allurement that she had never known to find recognizing. A fresh light, so to speak, flooded the beloved landscape of his character. Vale, grove, wayside, were all preciously different from of old. Over them sang awakened birds, and still higher leaned a shining sky, fond, fathomless, prophetic.

Very few of their former fashionable acquaintances showed the slightest sign of deserting them. Hollister had been one of the many victims of the dire panic, but it soon became generally understood that he was going to make honorable settlement with his creditors—that he was on the list of the seriously wounded, so to speak, and not on that of the killed. In many instances there was even an increase of civility. Cards were left at the door of the small house, just as they had been left at the door of the more spacious one. Society made it a matter of amour propre not to drop them. It had taken them up: it could not afford to discountenance them for the single fault of a reduced income. The thorough-paced plutocrat is always very slow to admit his claim founded on anything so vulgar as a purely mercenary basis, but the aristocrat, on the other hand, will often pay you a kind of proud loyalty when he has once openly ranked you as his equal. Moreover, both Claire and her husband had an ample personal popularity to fall back upon. They had been graceful and charming young figures, felicitously harmonizing with their festal background. Their absence left a sensible void.

But it was an absence, and as such it continued. Claire's love for the superficial glitter and pomp of what she had always inwardly felt to be sham and falsity was no longer even a dumb sensation. It had become the merest memory, and by no means a pleasant one. She had changed for the last time in her life. The change was securely permanent now. If she looked into the future and asked herself what unfulfilled desire lay there, it was always to thrill with the hope that Herbert might one day be rid of all financial worriment, and that their home, already lit and warmed by a precious mutual love, might receive the blessing of happy tranquility as well.

For a long time this hope looked very far from being realized. She was untiringly devoted to his interests, and would hold long talks with him regarding the complicated and distracted nature of his affairs. Her apt mind, her ready and shrewd counsel, no longer surprised him; but he recognised with an untold joy the different motives that now spurred and animated her. In the end light began to break from darkness. Hollister still kept steady the extraordinary nerve which had before enabled him to set aflame and continue such astonishing pyrotechnics of speculation. It slowly and surely became evident to him that he would soon have steered clear of all disastrous reefs, and bring forth from the final dying rage of the big tempest a ship not so wholly shattered that careful repairs and cautious sailing hereafter might not keep it very seaworthy for many years.

Claire had meanwhile exulted in her economies, and conducted them with that same easy tact and skill which had never been at fault supervision of a large and splendid establishment. She still preserved a certain residuum of friends. There was no ascetic renunciation of all worldly pleasures, either on her own or Hollister's part. It amused her to observe just whom she retained as her intimates and allies. The survival of the fittest, in this respect, was something to note and value. It showed her that the gay throng in which she had shone was not all made of worthlessly flippant members. But those, both men and women, whom she now liked to have about her had each stood some pleasant test, had each presented some sort of sterling trait of mind or character, which gave them a passport into the gentler, healthier, and wiser conditions of her new life.

Beverley Thurston paid only rare visits to her home. She understood why he did not come oftener; she never pressed him to come. She had thanked him for his great service, with moist eyes and breaking voice. But she had not told him of the sweet ascendancy that her husband had gained. She had tried to let him see this change. Such revelation had been less difficult than spoken words; for all words on a subject that had now become so holy appeared to her impious.

During many days after imparting to her husband the knowledge that he must henceforward receive her mother into his household, she had dreaded the clash of their widely opposite natures, and foreseen trouble that would only lend weight and severity to that which fate had already inflicted. But by degrees she found herself laughing with Herbert at the shadows of her own fears. He treated Mrs. Twining as a kind of grim joke. With her invigorated health, she was prepared to hold him strictly accountable for his altered circumstances. Her sarcasms were more pitiless than Claire had ever remembered them. She took the attitude of a person who has been shut out from a banquet until the viands are all demolished, and then admitted to feed upon the unsatisfactory debris. She had no intention whatever of forgiving Hollister his misfortunes. In all her career of repulsive deportment she had never achieved a more obnoxious triumph. And yet, by the sheer force of good-humored, gallant, conciliatory kindness, Hollister at length succeeded in conquering her. She found it simply impossible to annoy him. He insisted upon not taking her seriously. His amiability was so impenetrable that she finally receded before it, and began to profess toward him a sort of gloomy, reluctant liking.

"I see," Claire said to him one day, "She is my punishment. But why should you share it?"

"Nonsense," he answered. "I think she is immense fun." It seemed to Claire that he was quite in earnest as he thus spoke.

"She really does like you," Claire said. "In all my life, Herbert, I have never known her to like—actually like—any one till now."

"That makes it all the funnier," he returned, with a slight, blithe laugh. She knew he was in earnest, then, and felt a deep sense of comfort.

Once Claire had spoken to him of Goldwin. It already seemed far back in the past, now, although it was scarcely a year ago. Her words had been very few; her cheeks had burned while she uttered them.

"Herbert," she had said, "I feel that I must ask you whether you have—have met"— And here she paused. Then, while he saw the pain and shame on her face, she went stammeringly on: "Oh, you know whom I mean—I don't want even to speak his name again—but it is best that I know on—on what terms you are, and all that."

He grew pale while he looked at her. His voice was very grave, but perfectly kind.

"I see him nearly every day, Claire. That is inevitable, you know. I have spoken to him only once since—that time. I didn't quite know whether I was strong enough to keep my temper. But I did keep it. I told him that I had learned everything. And then I told him, very quietly, that if he ever dared to address me again I would find an excuse for cowhiding him."

Claire sprang up from her seat. "Oh, Herbert! did you say that? And did he—stand it?"

"Yes, he stood it. I didn't think he would, for a moment or two. It was imprudent of me, perhaps—on your account, I mean. But he walked away, without a word. And now, Claire, promise me that you will never, as long as we both live, refer to this matter again."

She threw her arms about his neck. "Never!" she cried. "I didn't want to speak of it, as it was. I promise you, with all my heart!"

They had been married several years when a child, a boy, was born to them. Claire made the most adoring of mothers. Mrs. Diggs, who was forever dropping in upon her friend, with even more than her former intimacy, said, once, while she watched the baby laugh on its mother's lap, after the bath that Claire had lovingly given with her own hands:—

"Upon my word, it does seem so odd, don't you know? I can't just quite realize it, even yet, Claire, dear."

"Realize what?" said Claire, looking up from the little rosy treasure on her lap with a smile and two touches of color, for which the joy of her own motherhood was solely responsible.

"Why, that you are the same being I used to know. It's a perfectly lovely change. You remember how I used to dote on you then. But I dote on you even more, now. Still, where have all your grand ambitions flown to?"

Claire looked serious, for a moment. Then she gave a light, sweet laugh. "Oh, I'm a very ambitious woman, yet," she said.

THE END.

Capers of a Drunken Locomotive.

The water at a certain railroad station out West gave out, and a supply had to be brought in barrels for the engines. One dark night an engine was by mistake filled up with six barrels of whiskey and eight or ten of beer, just arrived at the station for delivery to members of the temperance club in town. The engineer never had such a time in all his life, as the engine got drunk. It whistled constantly, snorted and reeled, the bell rang, and with difficulty the machine was kept on the track. And when they got to the terminus nothing would persuade the engine to go in its home in the round house; it stayed out all night. —Boston Post.

The Jersey Cow Liar Turns up in Ohio.

The Jersey cow liar, who has figured in the newspapers for the last two or three years, has settled down in this vicinity, it seems. He sends us his compliments in a little note as follows: "Having purchased the gentle creature and led her home in the evening, I turned her into the barn yard to rest, for she was weary from our tramp. In the morning I marshaled the family out to admire our prize. No Jersey was to be seen. In this spot where she had lain down was a damp, greasy spot. The poor beast had actually turned to milk and butter during the night."—Toledo Blade.

A Very Exacting Old Lady.

On one occasion Henry Irving, the actor, who was traveling through Scotland, met an old Scotch woman, with whom he spoke of her Majesty Queen Victoria. "The Queen's a good woman," he said. "I suppose she's gude enough, but there are things I canna bear." "What do you mean?" asked Mr. Irving. "Well, I think there are things that even the Queen has no recht to do. For one thing she goes rowing on the lak' on Soonday, and it's not a Chreestian thing to do!" "But you know the Bible tells us—" "I know," she interrupted angrily; "I've read the Bible since I was so high, an' I knaw ev'ry word in't. I knaw aboot the Soonday fishing and a' the other things the good Lord did, but I want ye to knaw, too, that I don't think any the more o'en of Him for a-doin' it!"

The Spiritual Effects of Drunkenness.

An editorial in "Topics of the Time," of a late number of the Century says: "The loss of self-respect, the lowering of ambition, and the fading of hope are signs of the progress of this disease in the character. It is a mournful spectacle—that of the brave, ingenuous, high-spirited man sinking steadily down into the degredation of inebriety; but how many such spectacles are visible all over the land! And it is not in the character of those alone who are notorious drunkards that such tendencies appear. They are often distinctly seen in the lives of men who are never drunk.

"Sir Henry Thompson's testimony is emphatic to the effect that 'the habitual use of fermented liquors, to an extent far short of what is necessary to produce intoxication, injures the body and diminishes the mental power.' If, as he testifies, a large proportion of the most painful and dangerous maladies of the body are due to 'the use of fermented liquors, taken in the quantity which is conventionally deemed moderate,' then it is certain that such use of them must result also in serious injuries to the mental and moral nature.

"Who does not know reputable gentlemen, physicians, artists, clergymen even, who were never drunk in their lives, and never will be, but who reveal, in conversation and in conduct, certain melancholy effects of the drinking habit? The brain is so often inflamed with alcohol that its functions are imperfectly performed; and there is a perceptible loss of mental power and of moral tone. The drinker is not conscious of this loss; but those who know him best are painfully aware that his perceptions are less keen, his judgments less sound, his temper less serene, his spiritual vision less clear, because he tarries every day a little too long at the wine. Even those who refuse to entertain ascetic theories respecting these beverages may be able to see that there are uses of them that stop short of drunkenness, and that are still extremely hurtful to the mind and heart as well as the body.

"That conventional idea of moderation, to which Sir Henry Thompson refers, is quite elastic; the term is stretched to cover habits that are steadily despoiling the life of its rarest fruits. The drinking habit is often defended by reputable gentlemen to whom the very thought of a debauch would be shocking, but to whom, if it were only lawful, in the tender and just solicitude of friendship, such words as these might be spoken: 'It is true that you are not drunkards, and may never be; but if you could know, what is too evident to those who love you best, how your character is slowly losing the firmness of its texture and the fineness of its outline; how your art deteriorates in the delicacy of its touch; how the atmosphere of your life seems to grow murky and the sky lowers gloomily above you,—you would not think your daily indulgence harmless in its measure. It is in just such lives as yours that drink exhibits some of its most mournful tragedies.'"

An Anecdote of Peter Cooper.

The head of the Woman's Art School of Cooper Institute writes of Peter Cooper: "One day he stood watching the portrait class, who, to the number of thirty pupils or more, were drawing likenesses of the same model from different positions. One scholar made the face in profile; another had it turned a little into the shadow; a third saw more of the full face; while others worked still further into or away from the light. He had stood observing the scene for a few minutes, when he said, 'Such a sight as this should be a lesson in charity, when we perceive how the same person may be so different, according to the way he is looked at by various people.'"

A Slow Young Man.

"I am afraid that young Featherly, who calls on you so often, is rather a fast young man," said a father to his daughter.

"Oh, no he isn't, father," replied the little brother, who was present.

"What do you know about Mr Featherly?" demanded the old man.

"I only know," he replied, "that I heard him ask sister for a kiss last night, and she told him he could have one if he would be quick about it. But it was the slowest kiss that I ever saw."

The Human Pulse.

The human pulse has rather a wide range, but the general average may be put about as follows; At birth, 140; at two years, 100; at from sixteen to nineteen years, 80; at manhood, 75; old age, 60. There are, however, great variations consistent with health. Napoleon's pulse is said to have been only 44 in the minute. A case is also related of a healthy man of 87 whose pulse was seldom over 30 during the last two years of his life, and some, not over 26. Another man of 85 years of age enjoyed good health and spirits with a pulse of 29, and there is also on record the curious instance of a man whose pulse in health was never more than 44, and to be consistent in his inconsistency, when he had fever his pulse fell to 40, instead of rising, is as usual.

England's Wealth.

Since the days of the Stuarts the increase of wealth in England has been more rapid than the increase of population In 1860 the wealth of England and Wales was equal to £45 per head: in 1872 it was £127, and last year, £249. Public wealth quadrupled since the Waterloo epoch, and doubled since the accession of Queen Victoria. Since 1840 wealth had increased four times more rapidly than population, which led Prof. Jarvis to remark that they disproved the Malthusian theory, so far as England was concerned.

'No,' the lady replied sorrowfully. 'I can put no more trust in men. My experience has been too, too bitter.'

Big Inducement.

'I don't think I'll insure with you,' said Jenkins, as the life insurance agent entered the office.

'Why not?'

'Well, you see, the agent of another company called in yesterday, and offered me much better terms than you do.'

'Yes, I suppose he represents one of those snide companies that are willing to insure for less money than we ask. I am not authorized to guarantee it, but I give you my word as an insurance agent, that if you insure with us, you will be under the sod ten years before you will think of dying if you insure in that other company. Give us a trial. We are offering you the biggest kind of inducements.'

A Mortifying Circumstance.

AND CANADIAN DAIRYMAN.

THURSDAY, JUNE 19, 1884.

In exchange for our old C. V. R. stock we receive permanent debenture stock in the Ontario & Quebec R'y, running between Toronto and Montreal. This is a first lien on the road and therefore may be considered a safe investment. The interest of 5 per cent. is guaranteed by the C.P.R. Co.

THE movement started by the Victoria County Council, looking to the repayment by the Dominion of all municipal bonuses given to railways since declared to be in the interests of the Dominion generally, is a movement which has justice at the back of it, remarks the Globe, Quebec was repaid her expenditure on the North Shore on the pretext that the road was for the general interests of the Dominion. Why should not Ontario and Ontario municipalities be recouped likewise?

The following prominent Republican and Independent journals have already refused to swallow the nomination of a man like Blaine:—New York Times. New York Post New York Herald, Harper's Weekly, Puck, Illinois Staats Zeitung, Westliche Post (CARL SCHURZ'S paper), Chicago News. Boston Advertiser, Boston Herald, Philadelphia Record, Buffalo Express, Springfield Republican, and Brooklyn Eagle. There never was so strong a protest against any regularly chosen candidate, except perhaps against Abraham Lincoln, but in his case the objections came from the element in the party which corresponds to that now favourable to Blaine.

THE Montreal Witness having changed the style of its make-up, deems it necessary to make a sort of apology, which it does in this wise:

"It used to be considered by the London Times bad journalism to allow people to know too well where to look for anything, as people got into the habit of skipping certain parts of the paper and often missing what was very important. We have not followed this principle, but we may be allowed to think that no great injury will be done our most cursory readers by their having to look the paper through once in five or ten years. They may find that those pages for which they have not hitherto found strength to turn the leaf are of some interest to them."

MR. Tilden declines most emphatically to be a candidate for the Democratic party in the coming election. He is in feeble health and feels that he is unable to fulfil the duties of any public position. Some of the party, however, still persist in declaring that he should be nominated. But it is doubtful if in view of his positive refusal and his feeble health, his name will be kept much longer before the party. There is a strong feeling growing up, in favor of Governor Cleveland, of New York who carried the State two years ago by an overwhelming majority, and he is one who has never taken a prominent part in politics outside of his own State, he has the advantage of having no bad record which can be brought up against him. He would be popular in his own State, and would probably run as well as anyone else in the other States.

THE New York Post says the nomination at Chicago means the triumph of the agencies which have been long at work for the disintegration of the Republican party. The jobbing, corrupt element in the party, which sees in politics simply the means of distributing dividends of the national exchequer, and to which all political issues are simply devices to distract public attention from their industry, has long been slowly coming to head in the fashion of a tumor in James G. Blaine. A cold, silent man could never become the lodgment of this portion of the party. Thecham pion had to be cheerful, jolly, hail-fellow-well-met, not over particular, audacious, unscrupulous, and faithful to his friends; a sort of man whose own weakness gave him sympathy with the prevailing weaknesses of his followers. Such a man they have got in Blaine. What he thinks about the main questions of the day they do not know and do not care. All they know is that if he were in power no man would have the cold shoulder turned to him because of his crookedness, and there would be in politics much of the noise, and tumult, and surprise in which they delight, and in which good opportunities for adventurous spirits most abound.

THE most pronounced result of Mr. Gladstone's Franchise Bill, if it is carried will be to hand over the Irish representation to the Nationalists, with the exception of a few Ulster constituencies. The National League estimates that the new deal will give Ireland about 800,000 voters, as against the 226,082 comprising the present electorate, and that three-sevenths of the new voters will be of the laboring class. A writer in the Edinburgh Review does not put the figures quite so high. He estimates that the bill will add about 400,000 electors to the list. But there is no doubt as to the effect of the change in increasing very largely the number of Nationalist representatives. The total representation of Ireland in Parliament is 103, of whom thirty-five or forty are followers of Parnell. Their numbers will at least be doubled. With a solid following of eighty in a House of 658 members Parnell will easily hold the balance of power unless parties are much more equally divided than is usually the case. If, under these circumstances, the Irish do not secure from England every reasonable concession, including as large a measure of Home Rule as Canada now possesses, they will have only themselves to blame.

THE nomination of Mr. Blaine by the republican convention has been received with unmixed satisfaction. Viewed from the independent standpoint, the issues presented to the delegates of the people were of an unusually wide and comprehensive character. They transcended the limits of party considerations, and were as purely national as can well be imagined. The country enjoyed rest and quiet, together with a wise and judicious administration of its affairs in the interest of the people at large. These it had secured through the wise and pure rule of President Arthur. As much in the interest of the people as in that of the party which he was the head, he calmed the dissensions within the Republican ranks. A policy would have dictated the nomination of the man who had so served the state, not out of mere gratitude, but because his retention in office would have been a guaranty of the continuance of the conditions of affairs we have depicted. Blaine represents everything in politics against which the people have been protesting for years past. He is a machine politician of the worst kind. He has no reforms to promise. He is personally tainted with corruption. He has made himself rich in politics. He secured the nomination by an intrigue with his supporter Gen. Logan. He is everything a Republican candidate should not be. No one has disproved the charges made against him; nor have they ever been withdrawn.

ROYALTY IN A SWEAT.

The Maori King Takes a Steam Bath in the House of Commons.

London, June 12.—The Maori King, Tawhai, and his ten attendant chiefs, occupied seats in the Gallery of the House of Commons to-day, and appeared almost as much bored by the debates as they were by the service at St. Paul's last Sunday. One of them loudly expressed his disgust in robust Maori profanity at not being permitted to smoke a villainous-looking pipe with which he was provided. All were overcome with the heat, which was really intolerable in the gallery, and loosening or discarding the uncomfortable garments of civilization, they slumbered and snored through most of their visit. At the end of half an hour they declared that they had seen all they wanted to of the pow-wow, and departed, the King leaving his collar and necktie behind.

The Government fenced payment as long as they could, but were finally forced to pay, and in order to get even with the bank paid in sovereigns and half-sovereigns, which are at a discount in New York, where they were shipped. The bank in question has a Government deposit of only $25,839, and the Government could not bluff the bank by demanding their deposit in gold.

HAMILTON, June 17.—"Naiad of St. Lamberts," a Jersey cow just tested by the American Jersey Club's experts at Oaklands farm, produced in a week milk which gave 22 lbs. 2½ oz. of butter. This cow has been milked only three months, and her record is the second for a cow of her age.

Just as Good as a Libretto.

A dude took a lady to an "Uncle Tom's Cabin" show, and as an usher seated the pair the dude looked around laughingly, and asked the usher: "Have you a libretto of the opera, you know?" The usher looked at him a minute and said: "We have no libretto, you know, but we have two Markses, two bloodhounds, and two jackasses, besides yourself." The dude sat down on his hat and never told his love all the evening.

Putting His Feet to Bed.

The other morning, Johnny's mother discovered the little fellow sitting on a high stool beside the bed with his feet on the pillow, carefully covered with the bed clothes.

"Why, Johnny," she said in great surprise, "what do you mean by such a position?"

"Oh, mamma," demurely replied the little fellow, "my feets have gone to sleep, and I thought if I'd put 'em to bed they'd stop tickin' me."—Scissors.

Turned His Head.

"I wish I had eyes in the back of my head," said a young lady the other evening.

"Why?" asked a devoted admirer breathlessly.

"So that I could see what was going on without the trouble of turning my head."

"You can turn my head without any trouble," responded the youth with a gloomy sigh.

TOWN NEWS.

COME to Ingersoll on Dominion Day.

SEVENTH Batt. Band in the rink on Tuesday evening.

COME to Ingersoll on Dominion Day and enjoy the fun.

LIVERY SOLD.—Frank Carroll has sold out his livery to A. Hirsch.

THE Band of the 7th Fusiliers, London, will give a grand concert in the rink on Tuesday evening, June 24th.

FIREMEN'S Demonstration in Ingersoll, on Dominion Day, July 1st.

THREE Canadian newspapers have failed within the past few weeks, including the Chatham Tribune.

A BIG EGG TALE.—A North Oxford man, Chas. Edwards, has an egg 11 inches in circumference. This beats the "big egg" record.

PINK EYE.—Mr. Jackson's fine Clydesdale stallion has entirely recovered from a severe attack of pink eye G. W. Dunphy, V.S., Salford, brought him through.

OUR SERIAL.—This issue brings our continued story to an end. We shall publish short stories, complete in each issue for a few weeks, and then probably commence the publication of another interesting serial.

MASONIC ENTERTAINMENT.—The citizens of Ingersoll may expect a musical treat on Tuesday evening next, at the rink, when the 7th Batt. Band of London will be present. Everybody should go and hear this musical organization. Tickets only 25 cts.

COWS.—The poor man's cow is again boss of the public streets of our town. The rich man is entitled to put on two cows and he generally does. Shade trees, garden fences and garden truck take the damage, and the sidewalks begin to put on the variegated hues of Summer in Cowville.

BROKE HER SHOULDER—Jas. McMulkin's Stockwood filly dislocated his shoulder while running on the Park one day last week. She showed signs of great speed, was four years old, and worthy of her famous sire. Mr. McMulkin has hopes of her recovery, so far as to be used for breeding.

PERSONAL.—A. J. Reid, Barrister, with Brown and Wells, left last week for Simcoe, on business; he will be absent two months. —W. S. King returned from Great Britain on Saturday.—Mrs. John P. Webster and Mrs. Thos. Robinson left to day for a two weeks' trip through Michigan.

HARNESS BUSINESS.—Wm. Tripp, so favorably known to many of our readers as a resident of Dereham, and latterly of this town, has purchased the harness business on King street, opposite the Bank of London, formerly carried on by W. T. Feightner. Mr. Tripp has the reputation of being a shrewd, straightforward business man, and we wish him success.

DOMINION DAY.—Tuesday, the 1st of July, will be celebrated in Ingersoll by a demonstration under the auspices of the Fire Brigade. The amusements will consist of horse races, bicycle races and hose reel, obstacle, hurdle, 100 yards, and wheel barrow races, etc. See posters for prize list and further particulars.

THE Ladies' Aid Society of the King st. Methodist Church will hold their usual Dominion Day Social at the residence of Mr. Thomas Seldon, Albert street. Tea served from five o'clock. Ice cream, strawberries, and other refreshments will be served from five to 10 o'clock. The Band of the 22nd Batt. will be present during the evening. Admission to grounds, 10c.

MUTUAL MARRIAGE AID.—Many people will not be surprised to learn that the Mutual Marriage Aid Association, of Hamilton, is in trouble. Some time ago this institution was exposed in these columns. If some of the policy holders have lost as much money as they say they have, the general verdict will be that it served them right. There is a certain kind of a man who is soon parted from his money.

COURT OF REVISION.—There has been considerable interest manifested in the meetings of the Court of Revision, which has been in session during this week. There are some 160 appeals, and much feeling has been displayed at the trials. F. R. Ball, Q. C., is present on behalf of the corporation. It is to be hoped that the trials will result in a fairer assessment all around than the present.

ROBBERY OF $500.—George Davidson, of Harrietsville, hotel-keeper, has been arrested and remanded to jail. Some time in November last a robbery took place at his hotel in which a drover named R. Cline was "hocussed" and robbed of $500 which he had received for a drove of cattle. Since the time of the robbery no clue has been discovered until a day or two ago information came into Cline's hands, which resulted in the arrest of Davidson.

WOODSTOCK'S FINANCES.—The financial condition of Woodstock is not in the most satisfactory condition. We learn from the repors of the last Council proceedings that there has been a deficit of $26,000 in three years. Mr. Totten, a member of the Council reviewed the mismanagement of the town finances for a number of years past, and proposed to issue this year school debentures for $2,000, and to introduce a By-law to also issue debentures for $4,694. These amounts, together with the $10,000 issued under the By-law to consolidate the debt, would clear off the overdraft.

CHURCH OF THE SACRED HEART.—On Friday next, 20th inst., the feast of the Sacred Heart will be celebrated with unusual pomp in the R. C. Church. A solemn high mass will be held at 10 o'clock by the pastor, assisted by Rev. Chancellor Tiernan and Father Carlin, Arch-Deacon and Sub-Deacon. The Rev. Father Welsh, of London, will preach a sermon on the nature and object of the devotion of The Sacred Heart. The Rev. gentleman is well known in London as an eloquent and fluent speaker, and we have no doubt many will be glad to hear him.

N. & W. O. AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.—A meeting of the Directors of the above Society took place at the Council Chamber on Monday, 16th instant. Thomas Brown, President, in the chair. A great deal of important business was transacted, and the initiative move towards the removal of the buildings to Victoria Park was taken into consideration. Also a thorough revisal of the prize list for the Exhibition of 1884. Every effort is being made by the Directors to make the fall show a perfect success, and Committees have been appointed to carry out each and every branch of the work. The Township as well as Ingersoll are to be congratulated on the choice made in Directors for this year's Exhibition, and we hope the Town Council will aid them in every way possible.

"IMMIGRANT CHILDREN."—John T. Middlemore, the founder of the Orphan Children's Emigration Charity, London, Ont., left Liverpool on the 12th inst., in the S. S. Parisian with a party of fifty girls and 100 boys between the ages of 5 and 15 years, who are brought out to this country for adoption or hire, chiefly among farmers. They are expected to arrive at the Guthrie Home, near the city, on or about the 25th inst. This will be Mr. Middlemore's 12th annual visit to these shores with juvenile emigrants from Birmingham, England, since 1872. Already many applications accompanied with good references have been made for the children expected to arrive, but more are required. Further particulars may be obtained by addressing H. GIBBENS, Manager or the Guthrie Home, London, Ont.
