sole proprietor of five wives. How far these women are responsible for the irritable temper and lack of courtesy-displayed by this pillar of the church is something on which we hardly dare venture an opinion. The Scripture says that he that getteth a wife hath secured quite a desirable possession, and from this we might be led fairly to suppose that a multiplication by five would be productive of an amount of happiness great as mortal might ever hope for in this weary world. Of course when a man will go to extremes like Solomon he can hardly expect his domestic machinery to run smoothly but surely self denial like that of our friend ought to have some attendant compensation. The concentrated glances of affection shot from five pairs of lovely eyes ought to warm the heart of an anchorite an cause his countenance to break forth in sunny smiles of conjugal sweetness as enduring as the clay tabernacle itself. For alleiand them, finally decided between Minnie Adams and Sir Frederick; and her father and mother, duly appealed to, had not refused their consent, though it is only fair to say that Hiram P. had finalitated for some time, and only gave way under the extreme pressure

P. had liestiated for some time, and only gave way under the extreme pressure brought to bear upon him by his wife.

That worthy lady was in an ecstasy of delight at the notion of having a baronic for her son in law and a titled daughter; the only drawback to her happiness being that Sir Frederick had imisted upon the marriage taking place in a very uniet manner.

Mrs. Adams had hoped to have had a long list of aristocratic guests to grace the wedding, but her future son-in-law had informed her that this would not be in any case, as the members of the dasglifier; the only dasaback to her happiness being that Sir Frederick hamsted upon the marriage taking place in a very quiet manner.

Mrs. Adams had hoped to have had a long list of aristocratic guests to grace the wedding, but her future son-in-law had informed her that this would not be in any case, as the members of the aristocray had not yet returned to London, and it was not considered the "correct thing" to have fashionable marriages in the off season.

So the worthy couple had agreed to everything Sir Frederick proposed, and the baronet had succeeded so well, that, aided and abetted by Mrs. Adams, he had induced Hiram P. to settle a very large dowry upon Minnis.

"Only on one condition, though, Sir Frederick, "Mss. Adams had said, "and that is that we fix ourselves somewheres does by your un-town readence, and that is that we fix ourselves somewhere does by your un-town readence, and that is that we fix ourselves somewhere does by your un-town readence, and that is that we fix ourselves somewhere does by your un-town readence, and that is that we fix ourselves somewhere does by your un-town readence, and that is that we fix ourselves somewhere does by your un-town readence, and that is that we fix ourselves somewhere does by your un-town readence, and that is that we fix ourselves somewhere does by your un-town readence, and that is that we fix ourselves somewhere does by your un-town readence, and that is that we fix ourselves somewhere does by your un-town readence, and that is that we fix ourselves somewhere does by your un-town readence, and that is that we fix ourselves and the door.

The possibilions started off, and before the rid min whether you would see her, and told her so."

When the servant had left the room the declare, I must have been dreaming. "I thought we were at Braux-holle again, walking by what used to be poor Mrs. Moreton's cottage, only quite a different person lived there then some one whom we did not recognize at all. Well, I must not keep this lady waiting any longer." And wi concluded to locate ourselves in London, where we can get the worth of a hundred cents for every dollar we Frederick Randall, and the London sea-hundred cents for every dollar we spend."

It was not without a strong protest that Himm P. had consented to this part of the programme, for the English way of living did not suit him at all. Like most Americans he was gregarious, and to the that up in a large room, with contract the most Americans he was gregarious, and to the that up in a large room, with contract the most Americans he was gregarious, and to the that up in a large room, with contract the most Americans he was gregarious, and to the thin partity much as bad as solitary confinement in the Penitentiary in Philadelphia.

It was not without a strong protest that Himm P. had consented to this year of a ple sant April evening and the streets were filled with men returning, from business to their homes, while in the more fashionable parts of the town, carriages were driving up and down, either, bringing back their occupants, who had been paying calls and shopping, or waiting to convey their proprietors, then engaged upon their toilets, to some fresh scene of pleasure.

fast-trotting horses, evidently on business titled over his eyes, his boots neadly balanced on the stove-top, at level with his face, and a large, brown spittoon handy for reference, without uttering the consecutive words.

Occasionally, he would ejaculate, "Say," but he never said anything himself, or, "Wal," but that was merely a safety valve, for fear constant silence should cause him to explode.

He dailiked the English method of eating and drinking, detested the huge joints, grieved miserably over the missing delicacies of Indian-corn, buckwheat-cakes, cold alsw, raw beets, clam chowder, and cramberry sauce, and declared there was not a man that he had yet met throughout the length and breadth of Great Britain, who could fix up a Santa Cruz punch that was worth drinking.
