Only then is an offence committed. That would not normally apply to a person who had a private collection in his house although I think one would have to read the recent case of the Queen against Berringer, a maritime case, in order to be absolutely certain of your ground there. That case is interesting when I read it—and I have just read it hurriedly—in that it discusses the case where a person with a private collection invited others in to view it, and whether than can be circulation or publication. If it is purely a private collection there would be no possibility of an adverse verdict under this section.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to ask the minister a question with respect to subsection 6 which provides:

> (6) An appeal lies from an order made under subsection (4) or (5) by any person who appeared in the proceedings—

Suppose an individual has brought this matter to the attention of the magistrate. Does this mean that this individual and the crown attorney and the defendant, all three, would have the right of appeal or any one of the three?

Mr. Fulton: The only persons who would have the right of appeal are those who are represented in a technical sense in the proceedings. The attorney general or the crown prosecutor or the crown, shall I say, certainly if either appeared and was represented in the proceedings in defence, I think he would have the right of appeal. If the owner, that is to say the distributor or person on whose premises it was found appeared, he would have the right of appeal also.

Mr. Fisher: Suppose in a small town there was a league of decency and they went out and picked up these books and brought them to the attention of the magistrate. They would have nothing to do with this matter at all. They would have no right of appearing in an appeal on it.

Mr. Fulton: If this prosecution were initiated by such an organization or an individual as a private prosecutor to appear, then he or she would have the right of appeal. If, however, he merely laid an information and the crown carried the prosecution, the private individual would have no right of appeal.

Mr. Carter: The minister told us that this definition in this section or in these two sections are aimed practically at the pulp trash. I am sure we must agree with that objective. But the corruption comes from reading this stuff. Why do people read it? They read it because they are attracted to it on the newsstands by some lurid title or by some lurid picture on the cover. Is there anything anywhere else in the Criminal Code by which that sort of thing could be prohibited or by which we could destroy the attractiveness of this literature on the newsstands to people by way of the picture and the title.

Mr. Fulton: I hope that we will have done it by the combination of section 150 of the code as it presently stands and the new amendments that we are now introducing. If in fact these publications are obscene—and I think the ones to which my hon. friend refers are obscene—and are so found under the new definition, then they will be subject to immediate removal from the newsstands because they are forfeit to the crown. I think the effective thing to do would be to provide a means, as we have tried to do here, of getting at the publication itself; because if we do that we have also incidentally got at the devices by which they are publicized and made attractive.

Mr. Carter: What is the procedure when somebody has informed a judge or magistrate that a certain person has books on the shelf for sale as to which there are reasonable grounds for believing they are obscene and these books are confiscated and are found to be obscene by the judge and there is no appeal. What is the procedure for eliminating these books from all the other bookshelves throughout the country or in the same city.

Mr. Fulton: It would be up to the law enforcement officers of the crown. If those books were found upon any other book shelf or upon any other book store shelves for sale I would imagine that the sensible thing to do would be for the crown attorney or the police officers to inform the individuals concerned that they had better get them off their shelves, not because the police officer thinks so but because the court has found them to be obscene. If the person in question disregarded such a warning, then I imagine there would be a prosecution because then I should think that the attorney general would consent to a prosecution under clause 7 of the amendment we are now introducing. But while it is true that ignorance of the law is no excuse, we put that in on purpose so that there would be an opportunity of warning a person and if he voluntarily withdrew the books from circulation, then we would hope that the attorney general would not authorize a prosecution. But if he defied a verdict of the court and continued to offer them for sale, then I should think the attorney general would order a prosecution.

Mr. Carter: How would a news vendor or a bookstore in Newfoundland know that something like this had happened in Quebec, for example.

Mr. Fulton: I have just suggested that it would be up to the crown attorney or the police officers who have knowledge of these things to warn persons who are found selling them that there has been a decision of the court that they are obscene and that they had better get them off their shelves. After all, in this matter I should also say that we rely—and I am sure that all law enforcement officers must do so—upon the assistance of well-intentioned individuals, service clubs, religious organizations and others who will be, I am quite satisfied, very watchful of developments in this sphere. They will be watching to see what are the decisions of the courts in various parts of the country or, in particular, in their own province and they will bring to the attention of the responsible officials, if the responsible officials miss it, knowledge of such verdicts. Then, as I say they can warn the persons who may be continuing to sell these articles and give them a chance to withdraw them. The reason we put in clause 7 is, however, to permit of a warning being given and to provide that the attorney general must consent to a prosecution in the expectation that he would not consent to a prosecution unless a warning had been given but would authorize a prosecution when the warning was disregarded.

Mr. Godin: May I ask the minister whether he feels that if in one province an order has been made declaring certain literature or publication to be obscene it is required for the purpose of confiscation under clause 150A that these motions be repeated in all areas where these books are found for the purpose of confiscation?

Mr. Fulton: That is the usual situation. Each province is responsible for the enforcement of the law within its territorial areas.

Mr. Godin: The minister means that in every community concerning every store in the province a motion will have to be made?

Mr. Fulton: No, not at all. I have endeavoured to explain the situation as I would see it develop. Let us for example take my own province. Suppose in the city of Vancouver there is a proceeding under new section 150A and the publication is adjudged to be obscene. The crown prosecutor of the city of Vancouver will know about it. His policemen, I would think, would be instructed to be on the lookout for that publication in any of the stores. If they see it they will warn the proprietor, I would think, that there has been a judgment and that this book has been found to be obscene.

I should think that would produce the result that within a reasonable time all those publications would be withdrawn in that city. I would also imagine the attorney general of the province would be aware of the decisions of the courts of the province and would instruct his departmental agents throughout the province and the police, who are the agents of the attorney general in this matter, and in that way word would be disseminated throughout the province. All you would need is to issue a warning, and if there was a refusal to comply you could prosecute under the new clause 150.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 12—Warrant of seizure.

Mr. Crestohl: We were discussing clause 12, Mr. Chairman, only in relation to clause 11. I think we might deal with clause 12 much more directly, and I would like to concern myself with the first part of the clause. This clause creates what we know in civil law as a seizure before judgment. In other words, the right is given, by information upon oath, to walk in and effect a seizure at once before guilt has been established. It is true there has been a complaint under oath, but I would compare it with a search warrant where there has been no conviction. Here we have a similar sort of right given, and it is a new concept, I think, in our criminal law; it is a form of invasion upon civil property.

Assuming then that a warrant is sworn out upon oath, seizure is effected and the judge comes to the conclusion, as the clause says further on, that it is not obscene and the merchandise should be returned, a very difficult situation would develop there. The business of this man might have been seriously affected, if not altogether ruined. It is true that the clause speaks of expeditious action to be taken within seven days. But the judge must make a decision, and assuming he comes to the decision that it is not salacious or obscene and therefore orders the merchandise to be returned, what right of action has a person whose business has been thus invaded merely because information was provided upon oath? Has he a right in damages against the person who has sworn the complaint? Will he have the right to proceed in damages against an officer of the crown who in good faith may have thought the publications were obscene and who was of the opinion that it was a fit subject to be confiscated?

Would the minister inform the committee, as I am sure he is able to do, how a victim of this treatment, for example a merchant who suffers an unjustified raid upon his store, as it subsequently, turns out to be in the opinion of the judge, has any remedy to be restored to the same position he was in before that unjustified raid was made?

Mr. Fulton: There is no remedy, Mr. Chairman. If the warrant was properly taken out, there is no remedy in damages against anybody. I would like to direct my hon. friend's attention to subclause 5, which provides that if the court is not satisfied that the publication is obscene it shall order it to be returned to the person from whom it was seized. There are also in addition a number of other cases where there is authority given in the Criminal Code for persons to enter and make seizures of articles before there has been proof of guilt. I refer my hon. friend, for example, to section 429 (1) where there is provision for authorizing the seizing of anything in a building, receptacle or place in respect of which there is reasonable ground to believe it will afford evidence with respect to the commission of an offence against the act. There are some other cases as well in which seizure is authorized without proof of guilt and there is no right of action, to use my friend's words, given to the person from whom the property has been seized even if it should later have been proven that no offence was committed. The only thing which can be done is that the suspect copies can be seized and an example or exhibit taken to court and the issue speedily disposed of. If an offence is proved to have been committed, then the matter in question is forfeited to the crown; if there is no offence, it is ordered returned to the person from whom it was seized.

Mr. Crestohl: But heretofore the practice has been that if there is a suspicion that there is obscene material somewhere officers of the crown have purchased one or two copies which they use as exhibits which, after examining them, they come to the conclusion are obscene. Then a complaint was sworn out and an arrest made. If guilt was proven after trial was held the merchandise or obscene literature was ordered destroyed or removed from circulation; but here the destruction and the removal as well as prejudice is caused in advance—

Mr. Fulton: The destruction is certainly not caused in advance, and I suggest there is no prejudice caused in advance either because there is no charge laid. It is a proceeding in rem without prejudice to the individual.

Mr. Crestohl: Surely the minister realizes that once you have walked in and practised a seizure in the same way as you would practise it after guilt had been proven, you are practising seizure before guilt is proven. It is true it is provisional, I realize that. I also realize it is done for the purpose of expedition; but a great deal of injustice can result from changing the procedure from a seizure after conviction to a seizure before conviction. If guilt is not proven, even though you return the merchandise afterwards, the magazine, or whatever it is, may be out of date and the store may have suffered serious financial loss.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I might point out to my hon. friend that it would be perfectly open, without this clause at all, under the present law for a police officer to go into a store with a search warrant and seize, and then bring a prosecution on the basis of the article seized. We are really providing nothing different here except that it will make it possible to dispose of the issue without laying a charge against the individual.

Mr. Crestohl: The clause in the first paragraph speaks of copies which are kept for sale or distribution in premises within the jurisdiction of the court. Then the magistrate is called upon to render an opinion as to whether or not the material is obscene. It really becomes just a matter of opinion. Can the minister not realize that a judge in one province will come to one conclusion and another judge in another province having the very same material before him reach a different conclusion? I would go further than that; for example, a judge in the city of Montreal who has jurisdiction in the district of Montreal may come to a different opinion on the very same exhibit laid before him from a judge elsewhere in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Fortin: It happens every day.

Mr. Crestohl: Yes, it does happen every day, but here we are dealing with obscene literature. What does the minister suggest is the remedy to make this uniform right across the country?

Mr. Fulton: Appeal.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul: Mr. Chairman, may I address a few remarks to the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl).

The hon. member has referred to the situation which might develop if a denunciation under oath was drawn up against an individual who might have bad literature in his possession. He also expressed amazement at finding this section, as worded, does not provide any recourse against a person who would unfairly denounce some other person or lay an unfair charge against someone. By reason of what has been his calling for many years, the hon. member for Cartier knows very well that civil law does not maintain criminal law and that, at any time, any person feeling prejudiced by a baseless accusation or charge would always have as provided by civil law the possibility of appealing to the provincial courts, whether there be a provision to this effect in the Criminal Code or not.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere (Mr. Paul) and those of the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) with regard to criminal intent.

I am convinced that with regard to obscene literature, the Minister of Justice has sought to make it harder to commit the offence. If I refer to clause 150 of the Criminal Code in its present form, I find that a distinction is made between the person who prints obscene literature and the person who sells it.

Whereas the printer cannot plead justification or ignorance, the seller can prove or invoke some excuse.

Now, Mr. Chairman, who provides the publicity and promotes the propagation of obscene literature?

I believe the main source of that publicity to be newspaper and magazine vendors.

I am sure that if those who carry on this business were a little more closely checked, they would be more careful about buying this or that publication, no matter who the publishers or distributors might be. When those people are charged, they usually say in court: "Your Honour, I did not intentionally sell obscene literature; I sell those books by the hundreds and I cannot normally read all the books I have in stock."

I believe that, if the Minister of Justice had wanted to make the act more effective, by reaching those who are responsible for the distribution among the public of obscene literature, he should have been more severe towards the vendors of such publications, because he surely knows that printers or wholesale distributors of obscene literature do not operate in the open. There are not a great many of them but, unfortunately, they operate in various ways that enable them to circumvent the law. Distributors and vendors of obscene literature are almost invariably acquitted because of the plea that they did not know what was in such a book.

Then, Mr. Chairman, if the Minister of Justice had wanted to make the act stricter and really do something to eliminate those evil publications, he could have removed, for instance, from subsection 2 of section 150, the words:

(Text):

—who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse.

That is where the fault lies. There is the source of the faults we have on account of obscene literature, because if you are looking for the printers or publishers you will never find them, or if you find them once they will start in another part of the province or in another part of the country.

I think the minister has taken a step forward but we humbly suggest it is not the step which he promised to take publicly in the province of Quebec in the presence of thousands of people. He promised to stop this obscene literature from being distributed all over the country, and I think the Minister of Justice would have been more well received had he included in the second paragraph the words "who are knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse". I am saying that in subsection 6 of section 150 it is clearly stated:

Where an accused is charged with an offence under subsection (1) the fact that the accused was ignorant of the nature or presence of the matter, picture, model, phonograph record, crime comic or other thing by means or in relation to which the offence was committed is not a defence to the charge.

This means that an accused is denied the defence of saying: I did not know about it, or I had a lawful excuse, or I had justification.

I have brought these observations to the Minister of Justice and hope that he will really commence to have this obscene literature swept from the newsstands, from the stores and even from private persons who distribute it in backyards. I think he has to get at the real source, those who are really responsible for this obscene literature, and I do not know why the government is allowing such latitude to printers and publishers.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to, first of all, correct what was said by the hon. gentleman. He said that I promised as Minister of Justice to stop the distribution of obscene literature across this country. I made no such promise, because I knew it does not lie within my power to do so. I promised to bring in legislation which will give the law enforcement officers effective means to prevent the sale and distribution of this literature, and I believe we have done that.

Having corrected the hon. gentleman's misinterpretation of what I promised, I should like to say that I think he has a point which does deserve consideration in connection with whether or not the publisher himself must be proven to have had knowledge of the contents and the nature of the publication. We did consider whether we should make any new provisions with respect to this proof of intent or anything having to do with the nature of degree of guilt, but we felt that rather than deal with that which can only be to some extent on an empirical and hypothetical basis the best thing was to adopt the new procedure embodied in clause 12 of this bill under which this material could be seized wherever it was found, whether in the hands of the printer, the publisher, or the vendor, and then the issue of whether or not it is obscene may be tried and disposed of without any reference to knowledge on the part of the person in whose possession it was found. Having been adjudged offensive, then, of course, if it continued to be sold the person responsible would be liable to prosecution and conviction because he could not then claim he did not know it was obscene.

Mr. Crestohl: Subsection 5 of the present article 150 of the Criminal Code reads:

For the purposes of this section the motives of an accused are irrelevant.

Might that give the latitude which the hon. member for St. Denis has suggested.

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman, I do not think so, once there had been an adjudication under the proposed new procedure that the publication in question was obscene.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, with reference to subclause 2 I should like to ask the minister what would happen if the judge neglected to issue the summons? In the event of a seven-day delay, would the merchandise be restored to the person? It sometimes happens.

Mr. Fulton: I would think they would have to start the proceedings over again, issue a new warrant and make sure the judge did issue the summons in time.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I feel we should do something more than we are doing to avoid discrimination against people who might be subject to unlawful seizures. The emphasis is on speed and under this clause action has to be taken within seven days. That is not too bad, I suppose, because the period is not longer than a week in which these books would be either restored or destroyed. In the case of an appeal, however, that would be a much longer and more costly procedure which could have extremely serious consequences for the person concerned.

It is quite conceivable, as my friend the hon. member for Cartier pointed out, that within the seven-day period two separate seizures may be made in two separate provinces. In one province the magistrate may decide that it is not obscene and it may be restored. In the other province the magistrate may make the opposite decision and have the goods destroyed. The burden is then imposed on the person who has been charged to appeal his case.

Mr. Fulton: But it might work the other way. The attorney general in the province where the verdict went against him may decide to appeal. This, however, is something that happens all the time under the Criminal Code under the system of law we have in Canada. There is nothing that I can see we can do about it here unless parliament and the provinces should decide to amend the constitution with regard to that question of the administration of the criminal law. Until that happens, the provinces are responsible for the administration of the law and different courts in different provinces may continue to give different verdicts under much the same set of facts and circumstances. That is why we have the Supreme Court of Canada, so that in important cases we can get one final definitive decision laying down what is the law of Canada.

Mr. Carter: But the trouble with appeals is that they cost money. Justice then depends on a person having a big pocketbook. That is something we should try to avoid.

Mr. Godin: After listening to some of the comments made this afternoon I should like to indicate to the committee that the amendment before us does not make it obligatory that the forfeited matter be adjudicated as obscene within seven days. A judge may find himself extremely busy for three months and the matter would be under consideration for that period. I have heard many comments to the effect that this is expeditious and that in seven days the matter would be heard but it is not so provided in this amendment.

I should like from the minister a clear answer as to the meaning of subclause 4 under which an order is made declaring the matter forfeited to Her Majesty in right of the province in which the proceedings take place for disposal as the attorney general may elect. I notice that different words are used. Subclause 4 refers to "matter", but subclause 7 makes reference to "copies of a publication". The same words are not used. If five copies of a publication on a newsstand are found to be obscene by a magistrate I fail to see that this involves forfeiture of all the copies of that publication throughout the entire province.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry if my hon. friend misunderstood me. I never said that an order made in that case would automatically result in the forfeiting of all copies of that publication throughout the province. What I said was that it would provide an immediate and ready method whereby the law enforcement officers could bring to the attention of all vendors the fact that there had been an adjudication with respect to a publication and that they had better withdraw if from publication, and that if this warning were disregarded further prosecutions in individual cases would be permitted without the necessity of going through the proceedings in rem as contemplated under clause 12 of the bill.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I think we should give further consideration to what I should like to call this innovation of showing cause. This is something that is really foreign to our criminal law.

Mr. Fulton: It is not at all foreign, Mr. Chairman. There are several examples of it in the Criminal Code at the present time, to which I have already referred.

Mr. Crestohl: That the burden is shifted to the accused?

Mr. Fulton: No, there is no shifting of the burden. I thought that my hon. friend was referring to the seizure in advance of adjudication. I apologize for having interrupted.

Mr. Crestohl: I am speaking of the accused being summoned into court to show cause that what he did was not an offence. Basically that is something new in our criminal law. The United States system of law depends to a large extent on the show cause principle. Perhaps it is effective and desirable but because it is something new to us I think we should devote more time to it.

Under the English system of law on which our own is based the accused is not deemed guilty until he is proven guilty. I should like to hear further comments from the minister concerning reasons which justify the introduction of a new concept into our Criminal Code. I am rather disturbed by it. Once we open the door in this legislation we run the risk of undermining our concept of British criminal law whereby every person is deemed innocent until proven guilty and an accused is not forced to step into the box to prove that he is not guilty.

Of course the minister knows full well that an accused charged with a criminal offence cannot be compelled to step into a witness box to offer evidence. Here we are somewhat distorting that concept by providing that an accused must step into the box and offer some explanation. He must show cause that what he did was not a crime. This is a new concept which parliament should consider most carefully before introducing it into our system of government.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend has completely misapprehended the nature of these proceedings. I say again there is no foundation for this allegation that the onus of proof is shifted from the crown to the person in whose possession the goods are found.

In the first place there has to be an information upon affidavit to such an extent that a judge becomes reasonably satisfied that there is cause to believe that a publication complained of is obscene. To that extent the crown has initially to make a case. There is an onus on the crown that it has to discharge. The crown must show the judge that there is reasonable cause to believe that this publication is offensive. If the crown does discharge that onus of preliminary satisfying the judge to this effect, the judge then makes an order or issues a warrant for the seizure of the material. The material is then brought into the court. There is the crown's case. The crown must first provide preliminary satisfaction to a judge that there is reasonable doubt to believe that there is an offence, and then the article claimed to constitute the offence is brought into the court and placed before the judge. Then, the crown has to present its case if it wishes to argue on the material, but there is also evidence presented by the crown to prove its case in discharge of the onus of the crown in these two ways that I have described.

What would happen if we did not say that the person should be summoned to show cause? We might come to, then, what right would a person have in whose premises the articles were found, what right would we have unless he was served with some sort of summons calling upon him to come in and in effect enter his defence? That does not mean in the first proceedings that the person concerned has to come into court and prove that there is no offence. He is only called upon to show cause when the crown has discharged these two preliminary onuses, the onuses which are imposed upon it in the first place, so that there is no question. It is a complete misapprehension to say that the onus of proof is shifted to the person. All that is done here is to give the person concerned the right to come in and answer the crown's case.

Mr. Crestohl: The minister surely recalls and knows that we have rules of procedure even in our criminal courts. This is a new procedure by which a person is summoned into court on a summons by a judge and is not accused.

Mr. Fulton: That is right.

Mr. Crestohl: I do not know under what section of our criminal procedure that is permissible.

Mr. Fulton: It is the only new part of this provision. The only new principle established is that we are providing for a procedure in rem, and in order to get the person concerned into court we have resorted to a show cause summons which has been in the United Kingdom procedure for many years; but I say there is no new principle introduced beyond that. We have not introduced the principle that the person concerned must answer the case before the crown has established a prima facie case. The crown has to discharge two onuses of proof by way of satisfying the court before this person is called upon to speak to the court at all. Therefore, there is no shifting here. It is true we have resorted to a new procedure to get the person into court. That is the only new principle. Instead of charging him and getting him into court, we serve him with a show cause summons and get him into court that way and I do not think there is any prejudice of the individual whatsoever.

Mr. Crestohl: I do not want the minister to be under the impression that I am opposing the procedure; I just want to understand it. I think we all want to understand what is the procedure here. The summons is laid, because the minister speaks of the crown making a prima facie case by producing what he considers to be obscene literature. After he produces it and lays it before the judge the judge on oath issues the warrant. The minister says that that is a prima facie case.

Mr. Fulton: One.

Mr. Crestohl: At the present time when a prima facie case is made nothing else happens but the so-called accused is ordered to stand trial. But there is certain procedure at the preliminary hearing at which the prima facie case is made. The accused does not have to step into the box. That is quite different, as I see it, and he cannot show cause in any other way except by taking an oath. I do not know whether the hearing will be a new form of preliminary hearing that will be held, but there has to be some machinery set up by which he will show cause. The only way in which he can do that is to step into the box, take an oath and attempt to show cause. That, I say, is prejudicial to the person who may have been accused because if he does not succeed in showing cause he will have given evidence; there will be a deposition taken which will certainly be used against him afterwards at trial if he is sent for trial. That is the different concept that I see that disturbs me.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, again I think my hon. friend misconceives the nature of the proceedings. There is no accused here; there is no accused person who has to step into the box and give any evidence whatsoever.

Mr. Crestohl: But he will be an accused later.

Mr. Fulton: No; he will not have given any evidence that can be used against him at a trial later if he becomes accused. The cause he shows would consist of argument; he is not in the box to give evidence in the sense of an accused person giving evidence in his own behalf; for there is no accused here. If I might strain the simile, the accused is the publication. There is an allegation made that the publication is obscene. It is recognized that the vendor, whoever the person is on whose premises it is found, has an interest in establishing that it is not obscene and therefore he is given the opportunity of coming into court, if he wishes, to argue that it is not obscene. He is not giving evidence in his own behalf which may be held against him if later on he should become an accused and tried. Remember this, too, that the prosecutions with respect to a publication adjudged to be obscene in the new procedure can only take place subsequently with the consent of the attorney general of that province. I suggest to my hon. friend that there is complete protection against such a malicious attempt to use anything that was said in an inquiry of this nature against the person who might later be accused.

As I see this scheme developing, if this person accepts the adjudication—he may or may not appeal—when the matter is finally disposed of, if he withdraws it from publication, makes no further attempt to publish or to sell it, I cannot see the attorney general authorizing the prosecution at all. If he wanted to prosecute him he would prosecute him in the first instance rather than resort to the procedure of disposing of the matter in rem.

I do not know whether I have satisfied my hon. friend or not. I do not think I can make it any clearer. I can only state as a fact that there is no accused; that the crown does have in two ways to make out a prima facie case. Therefore, it has two obligations on it, first, to satisfy the judge that there is a reasonable case for believing that here is an obscene publication; second, producing the publication in court by way of evidence; and, I would think in almost every case, a third obligation, namely to enter some argument before the judge who would feel that the case had been finally established. Only after these things are done, at least the first two of them, is there any case at all for a person on whose premises the matter was found to come in and answer it? I see no application of my hon. friend's argument at all.

Mr. Crestohl: Because this is an innovation I should like to ask the minister to allow me to examine it from another standpoint. Let us assume that someone has been brought into court because of literature that was seized on his premises. He has to show cause that it is not obscene. What will he first proceed to do? He will first offer his own opinion. He will then invite experts, specialists, sociologists, and offer all this evidence to the court that the literature is not obscene. He is showing cause. His own word will not be sufficient. He may differ from the judge's opinion and it is the opinion of the judge against the opinion of the man before him. He wants to show cause and he will show cause by bringing to bear on the court all the opinions, all the knowledge, all the information, in an attempt to show that this is art, that this is science, that this is something else, that it is not obscene. Now, let us assume that that is completed and the judge is not impressed. He thinks it is obscene and he he orders a complaint laid.

Mr. Fulton: There will be no complaint laid. The only order the judge can make then is for the forfeiture of the material.

Mr. Crestohl: That is, confiscation. The complaint is subsequently ordered by the attorney general, or whoever it will be, if the court is of the opinion that it is obscene. In some form a complaint will be laid against him. He then comes to trial.

Mr. Fulton: May I make it clear that it does not automatically follow that the charge will be laid. The charge can only be laid when the attorney general consents.

Mr. Crestohl: I said that. Assume now the attorney general has ordered that the charge be laid and the man ultimately comes to trial—now, he is the accused—what more at trial can the accused do? What more evidence can he offer than he offered at the time he was called upon to show cause? He has no time to prove, as the result of expert evidence, that it is not obscene. He has attempted to do that at the time he was called upon to show cause. He will then have exposed any defence he may have had on the show cause procedure. There are certain procedures at the trial which protect him. For instance, at trial, he may not go into the witness box but on a show cause procedure he may step into the witness box and he may say things in the show cause procedure which he might be protected from saying at a trial.

Mr. MacLellan: With respect, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the hon. member for Cartier has missed the whole point of this legislation. We all agree that we want to clean up this obscene literature. The only dispute is upon the method of doing it. I feel that the minister has brought forth a provision which is going to do the job very well.

The trouble with section 150, as it is now, is that it requires a prosecution against an individual. People were reluctant to bring charges against the merchants who were selling these magazines. Normally, when a charge was brought, a merchant would come into court to defend himself, not because he wanted to protect the literature, but to defend his own name because he did not want to be branded in the community as a person selling literature of this type. Now we have a section which will allow the municipal authorities to go out and gather up literature that is salacious, and not the proper type to be circulated in the community, without the storekeeper being charged. This section will help to eliminate the opposition of the merchant, who will not come into court and battle to protect his name because his name is not before the court.

As far as this "show cause" summons is concerned, the show cause summons is an important part of the section. I say that because I have seen the advantages of the show cause summons in general law practice. It is familiar in probate court procedures, for example, where a show cause summons is issued when it is not expected that persons summoned will appear. For instance, in the closing of an estate a citation is issued to the heirs, legatees, creditors and so on to inform them of the closing and to invite them to come in and show cause why the estate should not be closed. If they do not show up, then they have no cause for complaint. The minister has brought into use the show cause summons in this legislation so that the merchant will not have to defend himself as a person distributing salacious literature but, in his absence, the magistrate or judge can adjudicate on the matter and if so warranted, order the material destroyed.

There is another very good point about this section so far as I am concerned, and that is that no charge can be brought except with the consent of the attorney general. This provides that the merchant will not be personally charged as a result of the evidence brought forth without the consent of the attorney general, and therefore the merchant is not so likely to come in to fight each case. As the hon. member well knows, the problem so far in connection with cleaning up this indecent literature in any town has been that wherever the municipal officers try to prosecute a man they have the usual difficulty in securing convictions because magistrates do not like to adjudicate on matters where their decisions will reflect upon the reputations of men who are otherwise well regarded in the district. I think the show cause summons is an important part of this legislation in that the man himself is not upon trial but only the literature. The man, therefore, is not going to come forward to do battle to protect his name and thereby hinder literature clean-up efforts.

I believe this is a provision whereby we are going to be able to clean up the obscene literature in the nation, and that there is no other system of doing it. The show cause summons is part of this system. I think we have to keep it, so that a magistrate or judge can come to a conclusion that literature is obscene without charging anyone. Further the owner of the bookshop or newsstand is not worried about his good name being taken away as a result of publicity on a criminal conviction because his name does not come into it. Only the magazine comes into it, and he is probably not interested in the magazine. This is a big step forward that we are taking, and I believe it will permit us to erase this literature from the nation. We could not do this under section 150, but we can do it under this section. We should not weaken the amendment by taking out of it the very things that make it vital, and able to do the job we want it to do.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) will perhaps admit that the only power conferred to the judge under the proposed amendment is that of deciding whether the publication is obscene or not. If the literature, or publication, is considered obscene, the judge immediately advises the alleged guilty person and within seven days, that person has to prove that the literature is not obscene. Now, this literature may be obscene; but, being legally in possession of it, the vendor may claim that he was unaware of the fact. Under this amendment, that person will have to appear in court and will only be able to plead one thing: "The publication is not obscene", but, will not have the right to prove non-awareness with regard to possession of such literature or to any other legal plea.

Consequently, the case of anybody really in possession of a publication and who has the right to sell and distribute it, will go before the attorney general and will be prosecuted. Consequently the difference is that while formerly, the obscene literature could not be seized, whereas under this amendment, it can be so. Therefore, why have two prosecutions when a single one would be appropriate? If the publication is proved obscene, nothing prevents the Minister of Justice from prosecuting, and all the indicted person may say is that the literature is not of obscene character or that the accused was unwittingly in possession of it.

Thus, the procedure would follow the English practice, which has always been applied in Canada, i.e. that the accused is presumed innocent until proven guilty. Now, this principle would be saved and the amendment introduced by the Minister of Justice would have its full effect if the confiscation of the publication were simply permitted and immediately followed by the prosecution.

To my mind, such proceedings, by which the accused or the alleged accused may be summoned to show cause or move that his publication is not obscene become superfluous. Besides, everything is the plain consequence of a statement by one person before a judge, saying: "Here is an obscene publication". The judge, recognizing it to be so, then calls the vendor within seven days in order to prove that the publication is not obscene. That is all the law provides.

The crown prosecutor or crown attorney, is not informed of that procedure. Now, we must not forget that if all this handicaps the accused it may also be unfavourable to the crown because the crown lacks the necessary evidence that the literature is indeed obscene.

As the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) said, the accused may ask for a hearing of experts and attempt to prove that the said literature is not obscene, while the crown is not there to help the judge decide if the publication is so or not.

I consider this a step forward by the minister, but otherwise he knocks at the wrong door and, though the legislation presents some progress, it is a very small step forward. For that reason, we will nevertheless support the proposed amendment, because it is better to have half a loaf than none.

(Text):

Mr. Eudes: May I ask the minister to clarify one point in his reply to the hon. member for Cartier. Suppose that a warrant has been issued under subsection 1 of section 150A and that the court has been satisfied that the publication is obscene. The attorney general institutes—

Mr. Fulton: And that there are reasonable grounds for believing it is obscene.

Mr. Eudes: Yes. Then the attorney general decides to take proceedings. Will the evidence given before the court under subsection 4 serve in the proceedings instituted by the attorney general.

Mr. Fulton: No; I do not believe so. In fact, I think it is quite clear that the proceedings before the judge under the proposed section 150A would not be admissible in evidence in a criminal prosecution for the same publication at a later stage. These are entirely new proceedings. They would have to be commenced de novo, I would think. As I think I have said this before, a court of concurrent jurisdiction, however, would regard the reasons for judgment in the proceedings in rem as of very real authority in reaching a decision on the question only of whether or not the publication complained of is obscene. But so far as the question of whether the accused has had this article in his possession is concerned, whether he offered it for sale and all those matters which are purely evidentiary matters, the evidence, if any, given in the proceedings in rem would definitely not be admissible in evidence in any criminal proceedings.

Mr. Eudes: That is exactly the reason why I have asked that question of the Minister of Justice because I noticed in his reply to the hon. member for Cartier he said that this evidence would not serve. But it is not included in this new clause of the bill. I am just wondering whether, not being included, that evidence would not serve.

Mr. Fulton: I am satisfied that you do not need any provision. I am satisfied that the present provision of the law is clear. Here you have two entirely different proceedings. They are not different stages of the same proceedings. They are entirely different proceedings. In the earlier proceedings in rem, as I understand it, there was no accused before the court to give evidence which might be admissible against him later on. I am satisfied that the present rules of evidence and the present procedural rules would clearly establish that these are two different things and that the proceedings in one are not admissible in the proceedings of another.

Mr. Eudes: That would be another matter for discussion among lawyers.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, it might be convenient for the committee if I were to pass on to subclause 2 of clause 12 which is section 150B. However, I do not want to cut short any other hon. member who may have questions on the clause. I feel that when we come to this clause, we find something that is certainly most amazing in its form and in the manner in which it will change "criminal guilt" in our country. Inasmuch as I am absolutely opposed to and see a grave crime in the tied sales mentioned in the explanatory note, I feel that the matter can be handled justly only in either of two ways, neither of which is the manner in which it is stated that it will be handled. In order to convict a person of a crime of trying or purporting to make a tied sale so called I think the Minister of Justice should have a good deal of courage and ban tied sales in the matters of publication and ipso facto it would be a crime in this country to try to sell literature in the manner of tied sales.

Mr. Fulton: I have done so.

Mr. Godin: If he fails to have that courage to ban tied sales, he should then apply only just methods. If this clause is construed, here is the manner in which the Minister of Justice intends to bar tied sales. They are not barred automatically. I say it should be done automatically. I say that he should bar tied sales in publication matters.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): What is a tied sale?

Mr. Godin: It is explained in the note if the hon. member would read it. A tied sale is where a person will say, "I want to buy these five magazines" and the other person says, "I will only sell you these five magazines if you buy these too". That is a tied sale.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Any magazine or just obscene magazines?

Mr. Godin: No; any magazine. Then comes the matter of obscenity after that has occurred. Then a man is convicted of a crime according to this amendment, if the person to whom a tied sale is offered is apprehensive only that the literature may be obscene. This is a fair comment. It amounts to the position wherein I lay a charge of theft against somebody, he goes to court and proves that he did not steal it but still is found guilty because I thought he did. That is what this section says. It says that everyone commits an offence who refuses to sell a certain number of magazines—unless he sells them to a person—and he is found guilty if the other person is only apprehensive that the literature may be obscene. I say to bar tied sales absolutely in matters of publication or else, if you are going to do something else, you have to do it according to justice and not permit a man to hide behind the fact that he may have thought that the other two were obscene, go to court and show that they are not obscene and the man be found guilty of a crime that he has never committed.

That is the position in which this section places citizens in this country and it amounts to the example I have given where a person may lay a charge of theft against somebody and then that person is acquitted—and properly acquitted—but still he is found guilty because the other man thought he did it. That is section 150B. I am sure the Minister of Justice will admit that. Although I am absolutely opposed to tied sales, I think it is a great crime to be in that situation. If you wish to do so in matters of publication, bar all tied sales. If you do not do that, at least you must do it justly and not put one citizen in a position where he is found guilty of a crime if the other person only thinks he is guilty.

Mr. Carter: The minister allayed our fears somewhat about this show cause clause and putting the burden of proof on the offender when he pointed out to us that when the crown had to prepare a case, first somebody had to provide information on oath. First, somebody had to provide information on oath and then the judge had to be satisfied that there were grounds for confiscating the book. Then the person concerned, the vendor, is summoned to show cause. The minister's argument will be considerably weakened if the vendor has to appear before the same judge because this judge has already tried the case and given judgment. So that the vendor is placed in the position of persuading the judge to reverse his judgment, and certainly if he is to show cause he should be summoned before another judge, not before one who has already tried the case.

Mr. Fulton: In that case without question the judge would feel he was biased and would withdraw, and make certain another judge or magistrate tried the case.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond thought perhaps I had missed the point of this clause. I want to assure him that I am just as anxious to provide the machinery to clean up this obscene literature in our country as is he or any other hon. member of the committee. I am afraid it was not I who missed the point of the debate, it was he. We are discussing an innovation in our law, and if it is a proper innovation we will deal with it. But the question of showing cause I fear a little because of the element of there being the possibility of a person being placed in double jeopardy. His case is tried on its merits before one judge under the show cause procedure that it is not obscene; the court does not agree with him, and later through the intervention of the attorney general a complaint is laid. He is then summoned before another court and he must again prove that the material is not obscene. He is being placed in double jeopardy there. He is being tried twice, and that is a thing we should try to avoid. In the province of Quebec we do not have to show cause in civil matters as in the other provinces; but we are dealing with a criminal matter, and that is something I am really concerned about. If there is no double jeopardy here, even in a minor form, I do not agree. The fact is that a person or his literature in question is being tried twice—of that there is no doubt—and it is something which is foreign to our Criminal Code.

On the other hand, I would draw to the minister's attention that a court under subclause 8 means, as far as the province of Quebec is concerned, a judge of the superior court. Whether it is a judge of the superior court sitting in criminal matters or whether it is a judge of the superior court sitting in civil matters, I do not know. Our judges in the province of Quebec sit in civil matters unless they are especially delegated to sit in a criminal matter.

Now, assume a person is summoned before a judge of the superior court to show cause. Then he is summoned before another court, not before a judge of the superior court, but a criminal court. Here he is exposed to difficulties. I submit that whilst there is anxiety to provide legislation or machinery in our law to deal with obscene literature, let us not jump out of the frying pan into the fire. Let us not in an attempt to clean up one thing create another danger, which may be a very serious one. I would like the minister's explanation with regard to subclause 8 of clause 12 in which a court is defined as a judge of the superior court in the province of Quebec.

Then if a case is to be met and the person summoned does not succeed in showing cause, he will be transferred to another court, which is a criminal court. Would the minister kindly correlate this procedure, and also answer the question whether or not, because of this innovation of showing cause, an accused may not be exposed to double jeopardy.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not know quite how I can explain any more clearly than I have. In the first place, there is no question of double jeopardy, because no one is placed in jeopardy in the proceedings in rem at all by any stretch of the imagination. We have further provided that with respect to the publication adjudged to be obscene by these proceedings in rem no prosecution against any individual on a charge of selling that publication in that province shall be launched without the consent of the attorney general. Therefore no one can even be placed in jeopardy once unless the attorney general thinks it is a proper case, or for such reason as, for instance, the vendor, notwithstanding the adjudication that it was obscene, did continue to sell it instead of withdrawing it from circulation. So only if the attorney general consents can anyone be placed in jeopardy, and then under the amendments that we have introduced he will be placed in jeopardy for the first and only time.

There is no question of transferring anybody to another court or transferring the proceedings to another court. I have said, and I say again, that these are two entirely distinct, separate and non-related proceedings. One is an inquiry in rem to adjudicate upon the merits of the issue: Is or is not a publication obscene? The other, if a prosecution is instituted, is an ordinary criminal prosecution started in the ordinary courts where such prosecutions are made, in which an accused, for the first time accused, is placed in jeopardy for the first time. The proceedings before the court which were the in rem proceedings are not admissible in the criminal court where the accused is charged.

I cannot make it any clearer than that. I only hope my hon. friend, if he is not satisfied with my explanation, will say so because we cannot get any closer together, and I am afraid the only course open to him then would be to express his dissatisfaction by voting against the clause.

Mr. Crestohl: No, it is not a question of voting for or against it; we all want to attain the same objective. Let me illustrate what I mean. A man is suspected of having stolen goods in his possession. A search warrant is ordered and the police seize the stolen goods and bring them to headquarters. There they are identified by the owners as their property. Then the accused is told, "Now, sir, we have prima facie evidence that you are in possession of stolen goods; come and show cause that you have the right to hold that stolen merchandise." The minister will at once admit that under our system of criminal law, if he is called upon to show cause there he is really placed in a very serious and prejudicial position. I only give that as an illustration to indicate that this show cause provision is foreign to our law. It may not be in other jurisdictions in other countries, but it is foreign to our law. It may be a good system, and it may be desirable, but we should be convinced that it is desirable or we should debate with great caution before we vote on it.

Mr. MacLellan: Is the hon. member of the opinion that this section requires a man to show cause or just invites him? He does not have to show up, you know.

Mr. Crestohl: He does not have to show up but he will have himself condemned by his absence.

Mr. Fulton: He will not be condemned; the magazine will be condemned.

Mr. Crestohl: Yes, the magazine will be condemned, however, it is this show cause procedure which I question.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. MacLellan: But that is what makes it easy.

Mr. Crestohl: It may make it easy in this instance but it may cause great anxieties in connection with our criminal law elsewhere.

Mr. Godin: I should like the minister to give an answer to what I said regarding section 150B.

Mr. Fulton: About all I can do is to read the section and ask the hon. member to consider carefully what it says. It proposes:

> Everyone commits an offence who refuses to sell or supply to any other person copies of any publication for the reason only that such other person refuses to purchase or acquire from him copies of any other publication that such other person is apprehensive may be obscene or a crime comic.

This relates the matter to obscenity with which we are dealing here. The hon. member invites me to deal with the question of tied sales generally. On another occasion and under other conditions I might be glad to discuss the matter with him but we are not dealing with the law with regard to the commercial or economic aspects of tied sales in general, but with tied sales as connected with or having a bearing upon the distribution of obscene literature. That is why the clause is drafted in this way and that is the only explanation I can give.

Mr. Godin: Does the minister realize that a person can be found guilty of a crime while obviously committing no crime?

Mr. Fulton: No. The hon. member has not read the section, or else he has obviously misunderstood it. This relates not to whether or not a publication was obscene but to whether or not a person refuses to supply other publications to a person who apprehended it was obscene.

Mr. Godin: Is that not putting the position of one citizen in a position inferior to that of another?

Mr. Fulton: I believe the only way this could work is if the person in question who is resisting the sale says: I do not want to take magazine X because I think it is obscene, I should prefer to take Y, and the publisher says: no, I am sorry, you cannot get Y without taking X, and the distributor insists, I do not want X because it is obscene. If the publisher persists in trying to make the sale and refuses to sell Y and if the distributor says, No, I won't take it, the publisher is guilty of an offence. There is no question of supposition or anything else there. It is just to prevent tied sales contributing to the distribution of obscene literature.

Mr. Godin: Is that not placing the tied sale in public instead of parliament dealing with it?

Mr. Fulton: I cannot follow the hon. member's argument. Parliament is being invited to deal with this question. The matter is before parliament; we have defined a tied sale. Now parliament is asked to approve or disapprove it.

Mr. Godin: If the Minister of Justice is a purchaser of books in a business, all he has to do to bring up the tied sale problem is to say: I feel that the two others you want to sell me may be obscene, and the man is found guilty of a crime.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, no.

Mr. Godin: Inasmuch as I admit the awful crime of tied sales when they are proved to be used, in the sense of justice there is no other way to render a man guilty of a crime if it is proven that he had attempted to pass on obscene literature under a tied sale arrangement. Otherwise you cannot honestly find the man guilty of that crime unless you bar tied sales altogether, which the Minister of Justice has indicated he is not prepared to do, then the only other way to do it is to find the man guilty of the crime if he has really tried to pass obscene literature in a tied sale and in no other way, not on the word of another businessman who is dealing with it.

(Translation):

Mr. Eudes: Mr. Chairman, while I do not wish unduly to impede consideration of this section by the committee, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) to explain a point with regard to paragraph (a) of subsection (8), which reads as follows:

"Court" means a county or district court, etc. . . . or in the province of Quebec, the Superior Court;

Could the minister tell us if only the superior court will be authorized to adjudicate in the case of seizures to be executed under that section 150a, because under our court system in the province of Quebec, the superior court is essentially a civil court which, occasionally, hears criminal cases, but in assize court.

Criminal cases are dealt with especially by the court of the sessions of the peace. Therefore, I would like the Minister of Justice to tell us if that reference to the superior courts is restrictive.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: I think the hon. gentleman will find—and I had to be reminded of this—that there was a gap originally in the criminal jurisdiction of the Quebec superior court, but the Quebec legislature amended the appropriate act last year to give the superior court criminal jurisdiction. It has the jurisdiction, and as there are no district courts in Quebec it was for that reason we selected the superior court.

Mr. Eudes: What about the cours de session de la paix which is not a superior court but which has jurisdiction in criminal cases?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, it is true that the cours des sessions de la paix have criminal jurisdiction but we thought it was better to select the same court for this purpose as was selected last year to hear appeals from decisions of the tariff board under the Customs Act in connection with obscene literature. We thought it was logical that these hearings should be in the same court.

Mr. Eudes: So they would have to come before the superior court.

Mr. Fulton: Correct.

Mr. Eudes: Which would mean, before a civil court.

Mr. Fulton: No, because the superior court of Quebec is now vested with criminal jurisdiction.

Mr. Eudes: Yes, but the justice of the superior court is not the justice of the session de la paix. How would he be able to judge a case in the criminal court?

Mr. Fulton: Because it is now a court of criminal jurisdiction by express enactment of the legislation of the province of Quebec. Jurisdiction in criminal matters have been conferred on it.

Mr. Crestohl: As far as I understand, the judges of the superior court, when they sat in a court of criminal jurisdiction have sat in the court of Queen's Bench. I do not think a judge of the superior court will sit in any criminal jurisdiction other than on his own level, and that is the crown's side. I do not think the minister intended that a judge in the province of Quebec to have jurisdiction over this matter must be a judge of the superior court. It certainly would complicate the whole operation of this clause if that were what the minister intended. I believe the matter could be simplified by changing the meaning of the word "court". It would be of assistance if we were to say that the word "court" means a superior court or court of the sessions of the peace or any other court that has civil or criminal jurisdiction.

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend will examine the legislation in Quebec to which I have referred he will see that this is the proper terminology to refer to that court for this purpose. My recollection is that the question came up first in connection with the jurisdiction of the Quebec superior court and judges thereof to hear appeals of summary convictions. We found that there was a gap. We entered into correspondence with the attorney general of Quebec and asked if he would prefer to take care of the matter by provincial amendment or have it taken care of by amendment to the Criminal Code. He replied that he would prefer to have it done by provincial legislation and this was accomplished. This court now has authority under its provincial statute to accept jurisdiction in criminal matters, and when we, in a Criminal Code amendment, confer jurisdiction to hear criminal or quasi criminal matters, I do not think there is a question of the jurisdiction to do so.

Mr. Crestohl: Does the minister really intend that a judge of the superior court of Quebec should hear complaints such as these or charges laid for offences committed under this clause which are normally heard in the court of sessions of the peace in the province of Quebec and are then followed by an appeal to the court of Queen's bench?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, they are not normally heard because this is a new jurisdiction, but the way I have to answer the question is by saying I am satisfied that they are in a position where this jurisdiction can be transferred upon them by this amendment to the Criminal Code.

Mr. Crestohl: Conferred upon them to the exclusion of all other judges of all other courts in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Fulton: We very frequently confer initial jurisdiction or exclusive jurisdiction on magistrates or county court judges, as the case may be, to take up a matter in the first instance. For example, we here confer exclusive jurisdiction on the county or district courts of all the other provinces of Canada to hear these matters. There has to be a court designated.

Mr. Eudes: Mr. Chairman, with all due respect, I suggest that the minister study this clause again so as to extend the jurisdiction to judges of criminal courts, not only judges of the superior courts, whose roles usually are restricted to civil cases.

(Translation):

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, the fact that the Superior Court of Quebec does not sit between June 30 and September 1 might give rise to some difficulties. If a case of this kind should occur during summer, the situation would certainly be embarrassing in our rural districts, because the judges of the Superior Court sit there only one week per month, while the district judge who has a concurrent jurisdiction in criminal and civil matters goes out there more often.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be stubborn about this thing. We will therefore be quite prepared to let it stand over the dinner hour and consider it again. I doubt if the committee will complete its consideration of the rest of the bill before six. I would urge, however, that we dispose of all other matters relating to these two clauses so that we might have just the one matter outstanding.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to let clause 12 stand over the dinner hour?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fisher: Would that cover 150B?

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend wishes to refer to 150b he may be free to do so. Although it comes under clause 12, it has not been stood.

Mr. Fisher: I have just been referring to the evidence presented to the special committee of the other place on the sale and distribution of salacious and indecent literature, the minutes of the proceedings dated February 25, 1953. I was interested particularly in statements made by Senator Croll, at that time a private hon. member of this house, who represented the periodical distributors of Canada. He makes the case that the wholesale distributors are not in themselves responsible for setting up block buying or tied buying and that this comes into effect from the publishers. He makes the point that there are what could be considered good features of block buying. It means, for instance, that any magazine that passes customs will receive distribution in Canada and will not be stopped from having it just because someone at a corner store happens to have a complaint against it. This seems to me to have a certain degree of validity. The provisions of 150B may be setting up each retail outlet as a potential censor of what is going to be distributed. Is that not a possible consequence of this provision?

Mr. Fulton: I am not sure I have fully apprehended the hon. gentleman's point, but I will suggest this to him which may dispose of the matter. It is true that the periodical publishers say that they do not impose these tied sales or block sales upon vendors. On the other hand the vendors, both individually and through their associations, maintain with equal vigour that they are victims of a tied sale sytsem imposed by the distributors. If the distributors do not impose tied sales, there can be no harm done to the distributors by making such sales illegal under these circumstances.

Mr. Fisher: Senator Croll said at this hearing that the distributors did not create the system whereby they buy in block but, unsatisfactory though it may be, it is the system which prevails and if the wholesale distributors wish to continue in business they are obliged to conform to it. It seems to me that Senator Croll was suggesting that the onus for this rested on the publishers and not on the distributors. How, then, is this problem going to be met?

Senator Croll, as reported at page 144 of the minutes of the meeting, dated February 25, 1953, went on to say:

—a simple letter or phone call to the distributor, and he may cancel delivery of future issues of any title he does not wish to handle, without fear of curtailment of class publications. The distributor does not have this privilege with the publisher.

Mr. Fulton: Our proposed provision would apply at any level whatever, between the vendor and the retail distributor, between the retail distributor and the wholesale distributor and between the wholesale distributor and the publisher. If this proposal were to carry, refusals to sell to the next person down the line because that person said, "I do not want such and such magazine because it may be obscene", would be an offence at whatever level it took place in the distributive chain.

Mr. Fisher: Is it not possible that tied sales could be handled under the Combines Investigation Act?

Mr. Fulton: It possibly could be done there and we would, as I said, be prepared at the right time and in the right context to give consideration to it, but we were particularly concerned with its impact on the distribution of obscene literature and that is why we have dealt with it as a separate item here.

Clause stands.

On clause 14.

Mr. Fisher: I am concerned about messages sent by radio as referred to in this clause. Is this designed to keep people from using small transmitters at race tracks in order to transmit information from a race track to beyond? That is one point. The other point is:

—transmits, delivers or receives any message by radio—

In other words, if a person is listening to a straight broadcast by radio from a park in which the odds were listed, would he now be convicted under this clause because of the change that has been made?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the reason for this amendment, to answer the first question, is that it was recommended by the deputy attorney general of Alberta, and arose from a case reported to him by the Edmonton city police in which a radio station in Alberta was said to have broadcast for racing fans in northern Alberta selections of bets in horse races being conducted that day in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan.

While section 177 of the Criminal Code is intended to embody the general principle that the transmission of information primarily or relating to or intended to be used for betting should be prohibited, it was held, in the example where radio was used in this manner, that this was not at the present time prohibited by this section; so we designed this amendment to fill in the gap.

The second part of the question as I understood it was whether an occasional broadcast on the running of races from a park where races were being run could be brought in and prosecuted under this section. I would say no because the offence is willfully and knowingly sending any message by radio or otherwise that conveys any information relating to bookmaking, pool selling, betting or wagering, or that is intended to assist in bookmaking. Therefore, I would say that the ordinary rules of mens rea and intent would apply and would be used to exclude such a case as my hon. friend refers to.

Mr. Fisher: I would like to give an example. I do not know whether it still holds but there was one radio station in Hamilton a couple of years ago that always used to give the race results and the odds throughout the afternoon. It also gave the entries beforehand. This station was listened to by the bookies around Toronto and they used to pay off on that particular information. I have been in corner cigar stores where they would be listening to the results and the people would be there to place their bets and on those results the pay-off would be made.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, if it was used for the purpose of enabling bookmakers to settle bets or, as I read it, to convey any information relating to bookmaking, pool-selling, betting or wagering; if it was used for that purpose, then I would say once this clause passes, such information conveyed by radio would make the sender liable to prosecution.

Mr. Fisher: Would it not also make the receiver, someone who had his set on and listening to this particular station, liable to prosecution, if he were using the information for the purpose mentioned?

Mr. Fulton: If it was wilfully and knowingly received for that purpose, yes.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman I am not in the habit of frequenting cigar stores in connection with race track bets, but I do want to ask this question. If a person is there and witnesses this sort of thing would he be considered an accessory after the fact?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman, because the ordinary provisions of criminal law prevail. It has to be a wilful act in the technical sense of the word used in the Criminal Code.

Mr. Pickersgill: In the example given by the minister it was a radio station in Saskatoon.

Mr. Fulton: No, a radio station in Alberta.

Mr. Pickersgill: A radio station in Alberta?

Mr. Fulton: The race was in Saskatoon.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say whether the prosecution has to be instituted by the provincial authorities?

Mr. Fulton: There could be a private complaint, but normally the prosecution would be brought by the attorney general's department.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would it be possible for the attorney general of Alberta, since the minister said that was where the suggestion came from, to prosecute a station in some other province?

Mr. Fulton: No, and he would not have to deal with the case. In the case here, a station in Alberta passed information with regard to races in Saskatoon over to persons in northern Alberta who may have bet on the races.

Mr. Pickersgill: Suppose the broadcast was from Lloydminster, if there is a radio station on the Saskatchewan side of the provincial boundary, and suppose it would reach northern Alberta just about as well as the other one in Edmonton, it would not be possible. After all, we are making a general law and not a law for the situation in Edmonton.

Mr. Fulton: No, quite so. It would not be necessary for the attorney general of Alberta to try to prosecute a radio station in Saskatoon, because there is an attorney general in Saskatchewan. That is where the offence is committed.

Mr. Pickersgill: The fact is, because of the effect on the revenues of Alberta surely it is very unlikely that the attorney general of Saskatchewan would prosecute.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think my friend should make that suggestion because to my knowledge the attorneys general of all the provinces are quite concerned with the law in their particular provinces. If the attorney general of Saskatchewan is given evidence which indicates that an offence is committed in Saskatchewan he would discharge his duty in that regard.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think this clause will be very effective but I have another question. Did he have any suggestions to amend from any other sources except the deputy attorney general of Alberta, and can he say who was the attorney general of Alberta at the time this complaint was received?

Mr. Fulton: I have not got the information here, but I would think it would be the present attorney general of Alberta. This is my impression because I do not think this is of more than two or three years' duration at the outset.

Mr. Fisher: Because of the fact that many radio stations do broadcast the racing results and the odds, I cannot conceive of their doing it just to improve the breed. That is one of the great arguments for racing. Of course, we know that the provinces and to a certain extent the federal government have an interest in getting as much betting at the tracks as possible because it is one way in which they raise money; but it seems to me under this clause the minister could proceed against quite a number of radio stations that give the results because it is certainly arguable that the majority of their listeners would not be interested, for example, in who ran third in the fourth at Woodbine and the pay-off unless they were interested in the betting part of it. I was wondering whether this may not go a little bit far in making radio stations open to prosecution in this particular regard?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, it is an offence now for any person to wilfully and knowingly send, transmit, deliver or receive any message by telegraph, telephone, mail or express that conveys any information relating to bookmaking, and so forth. There is an offence now. We have evidence that there is a gap. The gap is that if a person sends it by radio or transmits or receives it by radio it is not an offence. We are, therefore, merely plugging that gap. The intent still has to be there. We are not saying that any radio station that broadcasts results of a race meet which is of general interest to its listeners, for the purpose of informing those listeners and thereby inadvertently gives information which some bookmakers use, is guilty of an offence. He is not because the words of the section make it clear it has to be done wilfully and knowingly for the purpose of betting, bookmaking, and so forth. I do not think my hon. friend need fear that there will be a whole rash of prosecutions against innocent radio stations.

Mr. Fisher: I do not think they are so innocent.

Mr. Pearson: If the radio station that broadcasts those messages regarding betting and that sort of thing was outside the country where it is legal to broadcast this kind of information, would the receipt of that kind of information in Canada be a crime?

Mr. Fulton: The receipt for that purpose of information in connection with betting would be, yes; if it was for the purpose of bookmaking, betting and so forth.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 15—Certificate of analyst prima facie evidence.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Shall clause 15 carry?

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 16 to 26, inclusive, agreed to.

On clause 27—Time for payment.

Mr. Crestohl: When we were discussing the principle of the bill mention was made of the setting up of a system to provide for the payment of penalties by instalments. There is a feeling that this clause would encourage crime or would encourage the commission of offences rather than discourage it. While our courts have jurisdiction to allow the accused time to pay a penalty in special circumstances, this clause seems to almost establish a right of the accused to demand time to pay a penalty, and the court could, itself, impose payment of penalties on the instalment plan.

I feel that while this is not altogether novel as a practice, as a law it is something that is altogether novel. I had thought the minister would have explained the background of this clause. If it were not a new section, if it were just amending an existing section, it would not require this explanation which I feel the committee and the country should receive from the minister. We should have the background, whether it is a historic background or a legislative background which has prompted the minister to make this proposal. I cannot say I oppose it and I cannot say I favour it. It is because it is something new that I should like to hear some explanatory remarks from the minister in connection with this proposal.

Mr. Fulton: I should have been very glad indeed to explain the background of this clause, if my hon. friend had given me a chance before he spoke himself.

Mr. Crestohl: If the minister will excuse me, I may say that the other clauses were being carried so quickly I thought this one would be, too.

Mr. Fulton: The fact that the hon. member rose was the first intimation I had that members were concerned about this clause, because this amendment is as good as all the other amendments we are proposing to the Criminal Code.

Perhaps I might be permitted on this clause, Mr. Chairman, to give an explanation of clause 31, which is related to clause 27, the one immediately before the committee. These two clauses amend the law so as to make provision for the giving of time for the payment of fines. The present state of the law is that, first, where a fine is imposed for an indictable offence there is no provision for the giving of time and, second, where a fine is imposed for a summary conviction offence subsection 3 of section 694 authorizes the court to direct that the fine shall be paid forthwith or, if the accused is unable to pay forthwith, at such time and on such terms as the summary conviction court may fix.

What is proposed by clauses 27 and 31 may be summed up very briefly as follows: The law on this subject is to be made the same for indictable offences as for summary conviction offences. A duty is to be imposed on the sentencing court to satisfy itself that the convicted person has the means to pay a fine before sending him to prison for failure to pay. The objective of these amendments is to eliminate, so far as our criminal law is concerned, to the greatest extent possible any remnant of imprisonment for debt. We hope that the result of the amendment will be that imprisonment for failure to pay a fine will only occur where there has been a contempt of court, that is a failure by the convicted person to pay a fine ordered by the court even though he has the means to pay it.

In the result it is anticipated that the state will benefit morally, economically and socially by a decrease in the number of persons who would otherwise be started on a career of crime by reason of prison associations, that is that they have been sent to jail because they were unable to pay their fines, and that the state will also benefit financially by an increase in receipts from fines and a decrease in the prison population with a resultant decrease in the expense of maintenance of prisons.

I should perhaps remind the committee that this is not the first time this change has been advocated in this house. It was advocated by the Prime Minister on a number of occasions when he was a member of the opposition, and specifically it was advocated by him in 1956 when he introduced a bill which would have had the effect of amending the Criminal Code. This bill was No. 167 of 1956 and, although not in exactly the same terms as the proposal now before us, it was certainly to the same effect. I should remind the committee also that this proposal was advocated by the Fauteux committee report, and that there is similar legislation in the United Kingdom. The general experience with legislation of this kind has been that, far from encouraging the commission of crime, it has been calculated to produce the result that instead of having people sent to jail simply because they did not have the money to pay their fines they are kept out of jail and thus the association of those persons with hardened criminals is reduced, with consequent benefit to the whole of society.

Clauses 28 to 31, inclusive, agreed to.

Mr. Fulton: Following on clause 31 I should like to ask leave of the committee to amend the bill by adding a new section 32 and by renumbering the subsequent claused accordingly. The amendment I would propose is as follows:

That the bill be amended as follows:

1. By adding thereto, immediately after clause 31 thereof, on page 12, the following clause:

"32. Subsection (5) of section 697 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(5) A summary conviction court that waives jurisdiction in accordance with subsection (4) shall name the summary conviction court in favour of which jurisdiction is waived, except where, in the province of Quebec, the summary conviction court that waives jurisdiction is a judge of the sessions of the peace or a judge of the municipal court of the city of Montreal".

2. That the present clauses 32 to 37 be renumbered as clauses 33 to 38 respectively.

That is the amendment I would propose. I would ask one of my colleagues to be kind enough to move it.

Mr. Starr: I so move.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I should explain the reasons for the amendment. The purpose of this clause is to facilitate the work of the municipal court of Montreal. I have therefor to refer to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Megantic on clause 1 that in the definition of "magistrate", the word "recorder" should be deleted and "municipal judge" should be added. He said, as I understood him, that there were no recorders now and that the jurisdiction should be conferred on municipal judges.

On looking into the matter, I find that the position is that recorder's courts have not been abolished but their names have been changed to municipal courts.

In this connection I should like to refer my hon. friend to section 1 of chapter 52 of the statutes of Quebec of 1952-53 which reads as follows:

1. Every recorder's court existing in the province at the time of the coming into force of this act, by whatever legislative authority established, shall hereafter be designated by the name of "Municipal Court of the City of (name of the city)" or "Municipal Court of the Town of (name of the town)" as the case may be.

It is to be noted that the provincial legislature went to some lengths in making this change in the name of these courts to avoid any possibility to there being any difficulty in connection with the jurisdiction conferred by federal legislation. In this connection it is important to read section 4 of chapter 52 of the Quebec statutes of 1952-53, which is as follows:

4. Every recorder in office at the coming into force of this act and every municipal judge to be appointed in the future shall act in the province as recorders, with respect to the jurisdiction attributed to a recorder under the acts by the parliament of Canada.

It is to be borne in mind, of course, that the provincial legislature is responsible for the constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction. It will therefore be seen that not only is this amendment appropriate but that the use of the word "recorder" in the earlier clause of this bill is appropriate.

(Translation):

Mr. Eudes: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to note that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) has followed the suggestions we made when subsection 1 of the bill was being considered.

Now, I wonder whether the proposed amendment should not likewise extend to section 16 of the bill, amending section 225 of the Criminal Code.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that I am unable to understand the hon. member's question if it relates, as I understood him to say, to clause 16 of the present bill. I do not see the connection.

Mr. Eudes: Court, justice or magistrate; just to clarify the section you should add "municipal judge".

Mr. Fulton: I wonder whether my hon. friend has asked the question on the right clause. We are dealing with a clause which

I have moved or which has been moved by one of my colleagues and which refers to the waiving of jurisdiction. I do not quite see the relationship between this proposed amendment and clause 16 of the bill.

Mr. Eudes: Municipal judge. Of course, this clause was passed; but at the time the clause was passed you did not have this amendment.

Mr. Fulton: But clause 16 refers to the making of an order prohibiting a person convicted of certain offences from driving a motor vehicle on the highway in Canada and we have inserted there the offence of leaving the scene of an accident by the addition of subsection 2 of section 221. I do not see what relationship that has to the question of waiving jurisdiction by certain courts in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Eudes: The point is this. Under section 16 you have the word "magistrate". It seems to me that the proposal now extends the power of the magistrate to a municipal judge and in section 1 of this bill with the word "magistrate" is not included the word "municipal judge".

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to have to say that I am unable at the moment to understand the problem which my hon. friend was posing to me. I am most anxious to make certain that we do not leave a gap in the jurisdiction of the courts of the province of Quebec, but before I can answer my hon. friend I would ask him to be kind enough to restate the question he has in mind.

Mr. Eudes: The minister in his remarks made reference to what the hon. member for Megantic said last week about replacing the words "recorder" by "municipal judge", and "recorder's court" by "municipal court". Am I correct or not?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Eudes: This is a reply to the remarks that the hon. member for Megantic made last Tuesday on clause 1 of this bill when he said, if I remember, that in the province of Quebec a recorder and a recorder's court did not exist, and that both were replaced by municipal judge and municipal court. So that if this amendment were added after clause 31 I thought it would be the proper time to submit to the minister that in clause 1, "municipal judge" and "municipal court" should be added to the existing phrasing. At the same time, I mentioned a moment ago that under section 225—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think the answer to my hon. friend is found in the fact that section 4 of the statute of Quebec, which changed the name of the recorder's court to the municipal court, also provided that:

> Every recorder in office at the coming into force of this act and every municipal judge to be appointed in the future shall act in the province as recorders, with respect to the jurisdictions attributed to a recorder under the acts by the parliament of Canada.

So that every time we refer in our statutes or our bills to a recorder in the province of Quebec that automatically means, so far as Quebec is concerned, a municipal judge. Therefore I do not think we need change the terminology of our act, because the province of Quebec has by its statute in effect allowed us to continue the terminology of "recorder".

Mr. Eudes: I thank the minister for his explanation; that is the point I wanted cleared up.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, may I add that the explanation is very clear, since the bill in clause 1 uses the words, "a recorder". But the clause now in dispute is clause 31, which amends the section by adding—

Mr. Fulton: I am afraid my hon. friend misunderstands the situation. I have just introduced an amendment to add a new clause as clause 32 of the bill, which would amend section 697 of the code. Then I have asked leave by the amendment to renumber the subsequent clauses of the bill accordingly. We are discussing the new clause 32 of this bill.

Mr. Godin: Would the minister explain how a municipal court judge in the province of Quebec can make an order prohibiting a person found guilty in his court of the offences mentioned in section 225 (1) as amended from driving in Canada.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am unable to understand again the question of my hon. friend, because clause 32 of the bill, now clause 33 by virtue of the amendment we have just adopted, relates to the definition of court of appeal so far as the province of Newfoundland is concerned.

Amendment agreed to.

On clause 32 (new 33)—Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I notice here in (aa) under clause 32 (1) that it says:

> —in the province of Newfoundland, a judge of the supreme court.

And then later on, with reference to Ontario, (d):

> —the county court of the district or county or group of counties—

I was wondering why the county court judges in Newfoundland were not also included. There may be some good reason for it, I do not know.

Mr. Fulton: I think the answer is that the county court judges of Newfoundland have been comparatively recently appointed, as my hon. friend knows, and we have not yet been advised by the government of the province of Newfoundland that they are prepared to have the jurisdiction over appeals from summary convictions, conferred upon their county courts.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am a little touched by that reference, because they were appointed just at the time I was appointed to the privy council and became a candidate for this parliament. I do not like to think it is all that recent, but I am satisfied with the hon. gentleman's explanation.

Mr. Fulton: I used the word "comparatively" and I think it applies in both cases.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 33 to 35 (new 34 to 36) inclusive agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall we revert to clause 12?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: No. Clauses 2 and 3, I think, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Shall we revert to clauses 2 and 3?

On clauses 2 and 3.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to point out to the committee that on July 1, during the debate which took place on that day, the word "flight" in clause 3 raised for examination many of the ramifications of the drafting process that do not ordinarily come to notice outside the mind and office of the draughtsman.

In subsection (1) of the proposed section 5A reference is made to an aircraft "in flight" and to the termination of a "flight" of an aircraft. In this context, no definition or other aid to the interpretation of either "flight" or "in flight" is required. Obviously "flight" has the primary dictionary meaning of "act... of flying or moving through the air" and "in flight" means in the act of flying or moving through the air. No definition is required to make it clear that "flight" is not used in any of the many other dictionary senses of the word such as, for example, "running away" or any of the other modern senses such as, for example, the designation of a scheduled trip of a commercial airline

Any such sense is clearly inapplicable. Most words in the English language have several senses. Where the appropriate one for a word used in a statute is dictated by the context, it would be unnecessarily cumbersome to spell it out by a definition.

In the proposed section 5A of the code the function of subsection (4) is not to designate the sense in which the word "flight" is used. It was on the contrary, inserted to extend for the purpose of the provision the meaning of "flight" in its ordinary sense of the act of flying or moving through the air by adding on to that act, the act of taxiing at each end of the true flight. To accomplish this, subsection (4) was worded as follows:

(4) For purposes of this section and paragraph (3) of section 2 an aircraft shall be deemed in flight from the moment the aircraft first moves under its own power for the purpose of taking off until the moment it comes to rest at the end of its flight and when it so comes to rest that flight shall be deemed to have terminated.

So worded I do not think any person reading subsection (4) with subsection (1) could fairly misinterpret its effect and I do not think any court after proper argument could misinterpret its effect. However, that, taken by itself, can be misconstrued, as established by the debate that has taken place.

The point that bothered some hon. members, justifiably, I think, can be eliminated by deleting the words "at the end of its flight" in lines 27 and 28 so that the subsection would read:

(4) For purposes of this section and paragraph (30) of section 2 an aircraft shall be deemed in flight from the moment the aircraft first moves under its own power for the purpose of taking off until the moment it comes to rest and when it so comes to rest that flight shall be deemed to have terminated.

However, as was made to appear by one hon. member at the end of the debate—I think it was the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo—this would completely distort the whole concept in the ordinary case of a take-off by terminating the "flight" when the aircraft comes to rest at the end of the runway to wait for clearance from the tower. This experience, I may say, is instructive and underlines the danger involved in making amendments on the floor of the house.

Various alternative suggestions occurred to us, with regard to which I do not think I need go into detail, in an endeavour to meet all the possibilities, and I should like to ask leave of the committee to withdraw the amendment now before us and to substitute therefor the following:

That clause 3 be amended by striking out lines 24 to 29, both inclusive, on page 2 and substituting therefor the following:

(4) For the purposes of this section and paragraph

(30) of section 2, "flight" means the act of flying or moving through the air and, where an aircraft has been in flight, the flight shall be deemed to have commenced when the aircraft first moved under its own power for the purpose of taking off and to have terminated when the aircraft ceased to be in motion.

That, it seems to me, would cover the case both of the movement for the purpose of taking off and the other related but distant case of the aircraft which comes to rest in Canada at the end of a flight, as we attempted to define it, though not at the end of the so-called scheduled flight. We have taken care of that, I think, by the use of the words "to have terminated when the aircraft ceases to be in motion". So that whether the aircraft was involved in an accident and crashed in Canada, as one hon. member suggested, or whether it landed at Winnipeg, in the case of a Scandinavian airlines plane, in both cases the flight would have terminated when the aircraft ceased to be in motion in Canada and therefore the Canadian courts would have jurisdiction.

May I have leave to withdraw the amendment, in which case a new one will be moved by my colleague?

The Chairman: Has the minister leave to withdraw the amendment as requested?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Starr moved:

That clause 3 be amended by striking out lines 24 to 29—

Mr. Pickersgill: Dispense.

Mr. Crestohl: I wonder if we might have the amendment read, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Very well. The amendment reads as follows:

That clause 3 be amended by striking out lines 24 to 29, both inclusive, on page 2, and substituting therefor the following:

"(4) For the purposes of this section and paragraph (30) of section 2, "flight" means the act of flying or moving through the air and, where an aircraft has been in flight, the flight shall be deemed to have commenced when the aircraft first moved under its own power for the purpose of taking off and to have terminated when the aircraft ceased to be in motion."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Carter: That covers everything except the very short period between the time it comes to rest at the end of the flight and then taxies up to the terminal. That period is not covered.

Mr. Fulton: I think if the hon. member will recall most of the occasions when he has been on a commercial aircraft in flight, the aircraft lands on the runway, slows down, but does not as a rule come to a complete stop, then turns on the runway to go to other concrete approaches, approaches the landing ramp and stops. It is true that in a particular case if the aircraft comes to a stop before it gets up to the ramp the flight would have terminated there, but the pilot could have radioed ahead and had Canadian peace officers awaiting him when he brings the aircraft to rest.

Mr. Pickersgill: That brings us to a serious point. Is the minister aware of the situation at Stephenville where the plane lands on the United States runway and then comes to rest on the Canadian apron? I had not envisaged that until my friend the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo mentioned the case. This has in fact happened to me: the plane has landed at Stephenville, come to a complete stop while still on the United States base where our peace officers would not have any jurisdiction, and has then resumed its motion though not its flight before coming into the terminal.

Mr. Fulton: I think the answer to that is that the United States base in Newfoundland is still in Canada and therefore the Canadian peace officers would still have jurisdiction under the particular circumstances we are covering in these amendments.

Mr. Pickersgill: But is the minister really sure of that? The last time I was at the United States base I was rather surprised to find an R.C.M.P. officer there. When I told him this he gave some explanations which I do not think I should repeat in the committee but which indicated quite clearly to me that he did not have any power to arrest anyone.

Mr. Fulton: Probably because we had not taken jurisdiction as we are under these amendments with respect to crimes committed on aircraft.

Mr. Pickersgill: It had nothing to do with crimes committed on aircraft.

Mr. Fulton: I think the situation there may have been one of, shall I say, neutral accommodation as to the particular circumstances under which Canada might seek under ordinary circumstances to exercise jurisdiction on this base. There is no question about the right of the Canadian parliament and Canadian law officers to act with respect to rights on Canadian soil.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not wish to hold up the committee, but I wish the minister would look into the situation a little further because I do not think he is right.

Clause 2 and clause 3, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 12—Warrant of seizure.

Mr. Fulton: Our discussion this afternoon was with regard to subclause 8, and particular reference was made to the designation of the court in the province of Quebec which would have jurisdiction over these proceedings in rem. I should like to express appreciation to hon. members opposite and to other hon. members from the province of Quebec because I think they have raised a point which is quite a valid one under the circumstances. I feel that the situation would be better taken care of if I were allowed to suggest the following amendment:

That subsection 8 of section 150a, as contained in clause 12 of Bill No. C-58, be amended by deleting the words "superior court" in line 17 on page 5 thereof, and by substituting therefor the words "court of the sessions of the peace or magistrate's court".

I would ask one of my colleagues to move accordingly.

Mr. Starr: I so move.

Mr. Crestohl: While I am in favour of the amendment, I wonder if the minister has before him the section of the Quebec statutes to which he referred earlier in the day to which an amendment was made conferring upon the superior court jurisdiction in criminal cases?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman, I do not have it before me. My advisers and I consulted it during the dinner recess and I find it was restricted to giving the Quebec superior court jurisdiction in appeals from summary convictions.

(Translation):

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, for the information of the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl), this is an amendment passed last year and which may be found under section 193a, chapter 21 of the consolidated statutes of Quebec 1957-58. The amendment decrees that:

(Text):

The superior court shall have jurisdiction to hear appeals permitted by part 24 of the Criminal Code only.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING TRANSFER OF OFFENDERS, ETC.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-26 (from the Senate), to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should explain briefly the purpose of this bill. It consists of two main provisions. The first authorizes the transfer from the province of New Brunswick to the province of Nova Scotia of female Catholic prisoners. The second provision authorizes the attorney general of Manitoba to direct by warrant the removal of a person from one institution in that province to another.

The first provision is made necessary because the convent in New Brunswick known as the Good Shepherd reformatory which formerly used to receive Catholic female prisoners has been closed. By agreement between the governments of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia it has been arranged that Catholic female prisoners in the province of New Brunswick may be transferred to and received by the appropriate reformatory convent in Halifax.

The second provision in the bill is placed before parliament by the government at the request of the attorney general of Manitoba in order to give the attorney general of that province the same authority as is enjoyed by attorneys general of several other provinces with respect to the movement of prisoners between provincial institutions.

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I have read the bill and consulted with my colleagues from New Brunswick. We are in agreement with the amendments placed before us this evening. I have not consulted with my colleagues from Manitoba—

Mr. Pickersgill: I agree.

Mr. Roberge: —but we do agree with the principle of the bill.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express in somewhat similar terms our endorsation of the principles outlined in the bill. Unfortunately we could not consult with our colleagues from Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or a few other provinces. However, we do wish to indicate general support for the provisions outlined in the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

On clause 4—Transfer of offenders.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps the minister might indicate whether this provision is in effect in respect of a number of provinces. I wonder whether he can indicate in which province this provision is in effect, or if it is shorter to do it the other way, indicate which provinces do not have this provision applying to them.

Mr. Fulton: I think the first way is the shorter way, Mr. Chairman. The same provision as is now provided in the bill is in effect with respect to the transfer of prisoners in Alberta and in British Columbia.

Mr. Howard: Is it normal to make such provision only at the request of the attorney general of the particular province which might want to have this arrangement apply?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, that is correct because, as I understand it, the present provision of the Prisons and Reformatories Act says that prisoners may be transferred between provincial institutions only by order in council of the provincial cabinet, and it is only where a province has requested that this provision be waived or amended so as to permit it by warrant of the attorney general or the director of institutions within the province that we have made the appropriate change. Unless we are requested by a province to make the change we leave the act stand as it is.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps this may be a bit outside the scope of this bill or of the act, but I am not familiar with that. Can the minister indicate whether advantage is taken under a provision such as this to transfer inmates from one jail to another within a province where such transfer is necessitated because of additional facilities or better facilities for rehabilitation or for training which might exist in one jail but do not in another?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, we do not inquire too closely into the reasons why a province requests this; it is a matter of prison administration, and we are not prepared to insist that a province continue to pass orders in council authorizing the transfer of prisoners between provincial institutions. If the province wants relief from that provision, particularly in the light of the fact that prisoners may be transferred between federal institutions by order of the commissioner of penitentiaries, which does not require an order in council of the dominion government, we do not see any reason why it should require an order in council of the provincial government.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps I did not pose the question clearly. Does the minister know whether, under a provision such as this, if a province desires to transfer inmates from one jail or reformatory to another they can take advantage of this provision to make the transfer because of the training facilities which might be available in one institution but not in the one from which the transfer is made?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, they can take advantage of this provision for any reason whatever, as long as it is in the interests of the inmate concerned.

MARITIME COAL PRODUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING APPLICATION, INCREASING AMOUNTS OF LOAN, ETC.

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-68, to amend the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act and to authorize certain amendments to the agreement made under that act with Dominion Coal Company, Limited.

(Translation):

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, has the minister no comments to make at this stage?

(Text):

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I have already stated the purposes of this legislation in the debate on the resolution. Certain questions were asked, however, that I would like to answer. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) referred to certain matters having to do with coal that are, perhaps, not strictly related to the legislation before the house. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will take this opportunity of advising the hon. member.

Reference was made to the application by the Dominion Coal Company for a loan in order to build a cleaning plant. This application was not made under the terms of the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act which provides that the applicant must carry one-third of the cost of any project under the act. To grant the applications would have required special legislation and the dominion coal board, after a very thorough study, did not feel that they could recommend any such special consideration. If the company makes a further application under the terms of the legislation as it may be amended, their representations will be fully considered. If, also, they apply independently of this act, their revised proposals will be given careful study.

The hon. member also referred to the May statistics on coal production and imports. The statistics for a spring month are usually somewhat different from the annual. The drop in household consumption coincides with the opening of navigation on the lakes and the build-up of dock stocks of imported coal.

The decrease in production referred to by the hon. member was almost entirely in Nova Scotia.

There are ample supplies of Nova Scotia coal available on the Montreal docks for delivery to consumers. The enlarged assistance reported to the house by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on March 17 will permit delivery of this coal at a price competitive with imported coal in Quebec and in a very wide area of Ontario. Orders on hand for delivery of Nova Scotia coal to Ontario in the fiscal year 1959-60 are some 650 per cent higher than in the year 1957-58.

The fact that the Nova Scotia mines operated on short time during May has been caused by the extraordinary build-up of stocks during the previous 18 months and the background for this condition was reported to the committee on lands, forests and mines during their examination of the estimates of the dominion coal board.

The increase in estimates for the month over those for May, 1958 is due in large measure to the necessity to build up the decreased inventories of industrial coal and particularly the greatly decreased stock piles of coking coal held by the large steel plants in Ontario. At the end of April this year these inventories were less than half those of the previous year or, indeed, of any normal year and provided protection for operations for only about one month. To permit full operation of these vital plants an increase in coal supply is essential. This condition has been brought before the house by my colleague the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) in his reports as to the priority through the canal of vessels carrying ore and other materials to these plants. This quality of coal is produced in limited quantity only in Nova Scotia and the available output is consumed in the steel plant in Sydney.

Finally, the hon. member referred to the projected study of the maritime coal situation. If this study is to be of real value I believe hon. members will agree that it is important to define and lay down terms of reference that will adequately define the area of investigation. Considerable study has been given to this by all concerned, and it is expected that the scope of the full scale investigation will soon be reviewed by the premier of Nova Scotia and the final organization agreed upon.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) referred to the possible co-ordination of this legislation with the national energy board or some other national planning board. This legislation amends an act that has been in existence for 10 years and this predates any formal investigation of energy. It extends this measure for a term of five years, within which period it will be possible to study the necessary methods of co-ordination between the national energy board and the long established dominion coal board. I can assure the hon. member that the subject of his remarks will be studied and held for consideration in the light of further developments.

Finally, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) asked whether any specific requests for assistance had been received from individual operators in the western provinces. Since the existing legislation was limited to the maritime provinces, no specific requests were made. The possible extension to other areas has been discussed on several occasions by members of the dominion coal board with western operators, and with the operators' associations in western Canada. As a result of these discussions the board recommended the extension. Interest has been shown in this proposal by individual operators in the three western provinces and if the amendment is passed, I have no doubt that coal producers in Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia will make renewed and intensive studies of their marketing and production plans with the intention of modernizing their operations with this proffered assistance.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Speaker, the minister's remarks are most interesting. But when the legislation was submitted to this house last week at the resolution stage, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) expressed the official opposition's point of view and added that the government might count on our cooperation to facilitate the passing of this bill and have it sanctioned as soon as possible.

This act, dating back to 1949, has been added to a whole group of statutes passed under former governments to help the coal industry. The 1949 act became obsolete at the end of the year because, as from October 31, no other loans could be granted under this legislation. That is why this government thought it appropriate to prepare the amendments now before us so as to extend the act for a further five years, that is until 1964, to bring up to $20 million the aggregate principal which may be loaned while increasing also to $12 million the total principal of loans which may be granted to one producer, to extend its application to all producers in every part of Canada and, lastly, to authorize amendments of a loan convention with the Dominion Coal Company Limited.

According to the minister, this act has proved a real success, providing remarkable help to the operators of coal mines. As a matter of fact, the minister is perfectly right and what he says is indeed confirmed by comments found in the annual report of 1957-58 of the national coal board.

For instance, on page 14 of that report, in the chapter entitled "Progress of mechanization", we may read the following:

The mechanization of mines has at least helped to limit operation costs. Nova Scotia coal is expensive, but in view of the help offered in the form of subsidies not expensive to the extent of being unable to compete. If the mechanization program had not been started when it was begun, it might be quite possible that with the former methods operating costs would have brought the price of coal to a level which would have priced it out of all our present markets.

Further on in the same report, on page 28, we find the following paragraph:

As we mentioned elsewhere, the mechanization of Cape Breton mines has now reached the stage where a substantial increase in the productive potential was felt during the fiscal year 1957-1958. Among the mechanization highlights of the year, may we mention the addition of mechanical undercutters, loaders, diesel engines and mining vehicles.

The original mechanization program of Cape Breton mines included the building of a new central cleaning and washing plant. The steel required for the building of that plant has been ordered and part of it has been delivered. However, construction will be delayed, since there were not enough funds out of the loan authorized, to cover two-thirds of the cost of completion of the plant and installation of modern automatic cleaning equipment. The difference between the first estimation of the cost and the one made recently is mainly the result of the increase in labour, construction material and equipment costs.

If I mention that last paragraph, it is precisely to follow up the remarks that the minister added to those he made last week at the resolution stage, and thus reply to a question directed to him by the hon. member for Gloucester.

I believe it is most important that such a cleaning plant be installed as soon as possible. The minister added that perhaps the installation cost would exceed the amount which could be allocated to that company, that is the Dominion Coal Company, and that the latter might perhaps be obliged to come back before the dominion coal board to discuss the project with the officials of that division, and see whether it would not be proper, perhaps, to grant a special loan in order to allow the construction of that plant.

In some of the remarks which I will make later on, I will speak again about that project.

Now in the dominion coal board report, it is interesting to note that, with the exception of the Dominion Coal Company, whose loan is covered by a section of this bill, the principal has been reimbursed in accordance with contractual obligations.

Mr. Speaker, I say that the coal industry in Canada is still in a serious plight. I do not propose to repeat here what was said in the course of the debates last winter, or in the course of the debates of the 1958 session, but, just the same, that industry is important enough to warrant, from time to time, a review of its difficulties, that is to say a reconsideration of its difficulties, as well as a review of the possibilities of solving them.

The prospects for the coal industry appear bright enough in a slightly more distant future, and indications are that the industry's situation will improve through a considerable increase in the industrial use of coal. Also, the operation of thermal power plants will eventually open up important new markets.

The next decade promises to be a critical period for the coal industry. The provincial minister concerned in Nova Scotia has broadly described the position, and if we have raised the question in this house it is because it is imperative that every effort be made to try to maintain this industry in operation in the forthcoming years. I must say that the only means now available is to grant subsidies. It is a temporary remedy, but it will have to be continued in order to maintain at least the major mines in operation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I at this time express my views on this matter once again, and say what should be done to pull the coal industry out of its present predicament.

First, greater use of coal in the maritimes themselves should be encouraged by every possible means. That is where greater use of coal is to be expected in the future, and action must be taken so that residual petroleum products, which are threatening to replace coal, will not have an opportunity to do so.

Secondy, an effort should also be made in eastern Canada, in Newfoundland for instance, and in the province of Quebec, as well as in eastern Ontario.

Third, every possible effort should be made to increase sales of Nova Scotia coal in Ontario centres.

To achieve the above purposes, I think we should resort to the following means—and when I say we I mean coal producers, the federal government and the provincial governments as well. Progress should be made in the mechanization of mines, for the simple reason that if no attention is paid to mechanization, coal production not only will remain at its present level, but it will decrease, because production costs will be too high.

In 1958, at a meeting of the standing committee on mines, forests and waters, the chairman of the dominion coal board made the following statement:

> Machines must be installed, and if you will allow me time, I shall explain the matter in my own terms, without going into too many technical details. Otherwise, I shall yield the floor to Mr. Ignatieff who once a year, makes a survey of the progress achieved in the field of mechanization and developments. Incidentally, his report of last year is quite favourable, encouraging and accurate. Mechanization is achieved in a proportion of about two thirds, but its benefits are not up to two thirds of the value. It is the last third that will enable us to see if the aim has actually been reached. Perhaps I should illustrate my remarks by way of an example. At the present time 60 per cent mechanization will give a 50 per cent yield but 95 or 100 per cent mechanization should yield from 80 to 90 per cent. Therefore, the true increase of efficiency will depend on the next third of mechanization, which includes the coal-dressing apparatus as well as various other machines which have just been developed.

Mr. Speaker, that is how we realize that mechanization must be quickened as soon as possible to give a yield of at least 80 to 90 per cent.

Now, we should also improve the quality of coal—that is the producers should get organized to provide the consumers with a purer and better dressed product.

Moreover, if possible, we should facilitate and modernize the transportation and handling facilities of coal.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter and I know that at this stage of the study of the bill, it may not be proper to insist on those points. However, I wanted to put my own point of view on record and, as the hon. member for Gloucester said last week, we are in favour of the adoption of this legislation and we hope that it will be approved as soon as possible.

We also hope that the companies concerned will come and submit their plans to the dominion coal board. Besides, I hope that those companies will mechanize their mines as quickly as possible. I hope that, through this bill, the government will make loans to those companies to enable them to speed up mechanization.

I am rather surprised to note that the amounts made available for mechanization are raised only to $20 million. I believe that it should have been brought up to $30 million. However, the hon. minister indicated to us that if the companies would come here and submit larger plans, the government would study them and that they would probably be favourably received. That attitude is encouraging, not only to the coal producers of Nova Scotia, but also to those whose living depends on that industry.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we support this bill and we hope that it will be used in the best possible way.

(Text):

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few brief comments in connection with this bill. First of all, let me say that we support the principle of the bill as being a short and timid step in the right direction; and that direction is recognition by this government of the fact that the economic health and welfare of the coal industry is a national problem. We are pleased to note that that is indicated in the bill by the extension of the application of this act to all coal producers in Canada for the obtaining of assistance in the modernization of their plant, equipment, machinery processing and so on. But the bill itself has limited application even in that respect because the major concern of the coal companies in Canada at the present time is markets. While this bill will assist in more efficient production and possibly will lower costs in some respects, it does not provide the markets which are necessary in order to keep the mines operating.

I was greatly interested to hear the minister make reference to a study being undertaken in connection with the coal industry in Canada. We shall look forward with great interest to the result of that study.

I cannot deal with this subject without thinking of a small city in southeastern British Columbia which has suffered severely in recent years. It does not happen to be in my constituency; it is in Kootenay East. However, I am sure the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. McFarlane) would support my remarks in this respect. I refer to the city of Fernie which has suffered severely in the last year or so because of the closing of a large coal mine which had been in operation there for over fifty years. From our point of view some of these companies show a lack of a sense of responsibility in view of the advantages they have enjoyed throughout the years as a result of their operations in Canada. Here is a company engaged in a successful operation and a profitable one.

The mine I am speaking of is very close to Fernie, and the workers for the most part live in Fernie and have done so for over 50 years. But it is completely United States owned. They have not closed the mine because they are losing money in the Crowsnest pass coal mines as a whole; they closed the Fernie mine because by so doing they will maintain their rate of profit. They can maintain their profit by keeping their other mine operating in the Crowsnest pass. There is no consideration for investment by the province or the municipality in the development of the city, public services, streets, hospitals, schools and all that sort of thing. There is no concern for the workers directly concerned. This coal mine was closed on, I think, about a week's notice, being given to the council of the city of Fernie after all these years of operation at a good rate of profit. I might also mention, Mr. Speaker, that this company has received very generous consideration throughout the years from the government of British Columbia.

It creates a situation, as it were overnight, where there is unemployment and a lowering of values of properties within the district because of lack of demand for houses, and need for certain facilities; it also entails a lowering of the value of investments on the part of the province, on the part of the municipality, and on the part of the workers concerned in connection with their homes.

It is the opinion of the members of this group, on behalf of whom I am speaking this evening, that it is not good enough in this age to allow companies to act in what we consider to be a completely irresponsible way so far as recognizing their responsibility to the province, the municipality and to the people directly concerned. What are we going to do about it?

In our opinion, we will never overcome this type of situation unless we have a national policy, first of all, with respect to the development of coal mining and the marketing of coal. That policy should develop as the result of co-operation with the provincial governments. I notice that there are very few questions nowadays concerning the development of natural resources where we find that, unless there is co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, it is very difficult to achieve any success or make any headway. That is essential, and it means that this government and the provincial governments concerned have to get their heads together and see what can be done. After that co-operation is established we need some planning with respect to the development of mines, the provision of markets and so on; we need a co-ordination of activities.

I think a great deal can be done in a democratic society if we do really make up our minds to tackle the problem. It is a serious question which will not be settled overnight, but if we get federal and provincial governments working together and co-operating with the coal owners, as well as the labour organizations which are directly responsible for the welfare of the workers, we should make progress in this respect. There is the question of markets and transportation costs, the distribution of any subsidies which might be required to place coal in distant markets, and so on. There are a lot of problems to be faced, and if they are going to be solved they must be faced at once.

We do urge that this government take the lead in seeking the co-operation of the provincial governments, and also take the lead in suggesting that both governments seek the advice and co-operation of the coal owners and labour organizations which represent the workers concerned. We are quite convinced that over a period of time, with the right spirit, there can be developed a national coal policy which will change this situation into one where the owners and the workers concerned will be at least assured of a measure of security and reasonable remuneration.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the minister for the consideration he has given to this matter in bringing it in a national fuel policy act, and in that way recognizing the part coal has played as one of our forms of national energy. We would also like to thank the minister for the consideration which has been given particularly to the Dominion Coal Company in recognition of some of the problems which have developed in sales; and we would like to ask if the government has supplied technical advice to the Dominion Coal Company with regard to getting an extended loan for the installation of the wash plant which has been widely discussed. There was some discussion to the effect that this wash plant was not economically feasible a few years ago, and we are wondering if the department has given any technical advice with regard to this matter and has cooperated with the company in looking into whether it is advantageous for the company to instal this wash plant at this time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Dumas: A few moments ago, the hon. minister answered a question which had been put to him the other day by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) who had asked him whether the coal-producing concerns in Western Canada had applied for a loan or some loans under this legislation, and the hon. minister answered that the matter had been discussed. But his answer was rather vague and I wonder whether this question had been discussed with the western producers or whether it had been merely discussed with the dominion coal board?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, western operators have rather frequent relations with the dominion coal board. One of the directors of the board is in Calgary and he very often meets with the officials of coal companies. His name is Mr. Whittaker. He is one of the directors of the board and one of the experts on coal production. He meets very often with the producers and his relations with them have enabled him to make the dominion coal board aware of the wishes, intentions and projects of the concerns which have expressed on many occasions their wish to take advantage of this act which had been passed solely for the maritime provinces. This enables us to draw the conclusion that as soon as the amended legislation is passed, we will receive applications for loans from western producers and from producers in various provinces.

There are some mining operators in the three western provinces who have indicated their intention to take advantage of the act when it is passed. Of course, the dominion coal board has not yet received any application because the legislation is not yet amended.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, we are very happy—

Mr. Comtois: I cannot give any more detailed information. No official request was submitted to the dominion coal board.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I am very happy that the scope of the legislation has been broadened in order to enable producers in any part of this country to take advantage of it. But the western producers I hope will make their needs known to the dominion coal board and, in this way, we shall be able to speed up the mechanization of coal mines in this area.

(Text):

Mr. Tucker: I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I rise to express the hope that the Dominion Coal Company which has received so much assistance from the federal government, will make a better effort in the future than it has done in the past to supply coal to the consumers of Newfoundland.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Coal producer.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: We are also pleased to see that those amendments to the act provided an opportunity to say that this measure will now come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, since the dominion coal board comes under his department. It is therefore natural that the application of this measure should come under his administration.

(Text):

On clause 4—Aggregate Amounts of Loans.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, referring to section 4, I said a few moments ago that, instead of an amount of $20 million, we would have preferred an amount of $30 million.

I find that, from 1949 to 1959, that is during the last ten years, there was an amount evaluated at $17 million spent for mechanization under that act. The government loaned about $10 million, or rather $9,998,000 dollars. That fund was exhausted, or almost so, two or three years ago.

I even think that those companies would have benefited from that legislation, if the dominion coal board had had the money in hand and could have said: "Yes, we have several million dollars at our disposal and if you submit your plans, we will help you in so far as we think that it is in the best interest of producers or of the coal industry.

I very much doubt that the additional amount of $10 million will be enough for that five year period; I am very much afraid that these $10 million will not be enough. However, I understand the minister may always come before parliament, and since members of parliament are very well disposed toward the coal industry—at least I hope so—he will be able to obtain perhaps additional amounts of money. I would deplore the fact that because no more than $10 million was considered, mechanization should be slowed down as a consequence. In my opinion, mechanization is the industry's only means of salvation.

Since we are on that point, I suggest that the coal producers should inform the population of the communities concerned of their projects, and if they have, at times, to hire fewer workers in certain coal mines, the population should be so informed, because what we want is the industry to keep producing, since it has been reported on many occasions that if a mine closes, it is very difficult to re-open it. So, it is very important, especially in Caape Breton, to maintain the mines in production.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for Villeneuve for his remarks and suggestions.

I must add this: perhaps $10 million is not a very large amount; on the other hand, loans requested by ordinary coal mining companies average between 500, 600 and 700 thousand dollars. The greatest demand has always been from the Dominion Coal Company. Now the loan application I have mentioned was originally for $7,500,000. That was the last application received during the year, and it was that application that was turned down by the dominion coal board because it was made on the basis of 100 per cent, whereas the act states that the borrower must provide or have an equity equal to at least a third of construction costs, or of the purchase price of the business. I wish to point out that the company was not refused that amount; rather, we asked the company to make a proposal which would be acceptable and in accordance with the requirements of the act. We have told them to invest 30 per cent or 33 per cent—that is, one-third—and that we would lend them the difference.

I believe that, with $10 million, and even if a loan of about $4 or $5 million were granted to the Dominion Coal Company, it would still leave $5 million with which to satisfy to a great extent the requests that we expect will be made to us.

I must also add, Mr. Chairman, that, as far as I know, since I have been a minister, the dominion coal board has turned down no request because of lack of funds. We have never turned down a request for a loan because of a lack of funds. The funds have been recently used up by the Avon Company of New Brunswick and even then, we still had $2,000 left at that time.

It often happens that requests made to the dominion coal board cannot be accepted because they do not comply with the requirements or because the proposal, as it is put, is not acceptable to the dominion coal board which feels, for instance, that it is exaggerated or out of proportion with the capital, the production and the market that the company can hope to have.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for giving this information to the committee. I am surprised that such a substantial request was made by the company and I hope it will revise its proposal in order to comply with the terms of the act. It is very important that this cleaning plant be built.

Now, I also read in the paper that a New Brunswick company, the D.W. & R.A. Mills Ltd., proposes to apply to the dominion coal board under this act for an amount of $2 million. I believe the company will have to devote 33 per cent of that amount to the purchase of a power shovel. Therefore an amount of $1,500,000 will be loaned to this company. The Dominion Coal Company will be asking for about $5,000,000 if they decide to carry out their project. Thus, there will be left a balance of $3,500,000 that could be used by western producers who will apply for loans under the legislation we are now considering. However, I do not wish to delay the adoption of this bill and, if the minister deems it advisable to come back before parliament, I hope that all hon. members will gladly approve the additional amount he may ask for.

(Text):

Mr. Regier: Is the minister now able to inform me about the matter I inquired into the other day. Which of the provinces asked for this amendment to the act? Was it British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba? Which province asked for it and which mining concerns are involved in each of the provinces.

Mr. Comtois: If the hon. member had been here when I made my statement a few moments ago he would have heard my answer. He will have to read it in Hansard tomorrow. I am not going to repeat it. I gave the answer to that question in the opening discussion on the bill. Unfortunately the hon. member was not here. If he insists on my repeating it, I will, but he will find it in Hansard tomorrow if he wants to read the debate.

Mr. Regier: I am very surprised that the minister is as reluctant as all that to repeat an answer that could only occupy a moment of his time.

Mr. Comtois: There is no reluctance on my part at all. I have already made my statement once. If the hon. member was not here it is not my fault.

Mr. Regier: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I must repeat that it would occupy only one minute of the time of the committee if the minister were to reply concerning which of the western provinces asked for this amendment to the act.

Mr. Comtois: I am not going to be a bad boy. I can tell the hon. member that I gave the answer to the committee this evening. We have never received any formal application from the western provinces. In a general way they mentioned their intention and desire to take advantage of the act and their desire to see an amendment passed by the house. According to the desire they expressed, here we are with an amendment to the act. This desire was expressed by coal producers from the three western provinces, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. Regier: I fail to understand the minister's answer. He says he has heard no expression of opinion from the western provinces but concludes his remark by saying that he has had demands from each of the three western provinces. That is incomprehensible.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I said that we never received any formal application or official application. Discussions were held and representations were made to one of the directors of the dominion coal board, Mr. Whittaker, of Calgary. These reports were transferred from the coal board. That is how we know that in the three provinces there will be some applicants seeking to take advantage of this act.

Mr. Regier: I have heard a number of announcements made by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in regard to the future of the coal mining industry in Canada. May I ask the minister at this time how the amendments he is offering in this bill will affect the coal mining industry in Fernie, British Columbia?

Mr. Comtois: If the company wishes to improve its operations or increase the mechanization of its equipment it has only to make application to the board for a loan and the application will be considered.

Mr. Regier: That is a most inadequate answer. The minister knows full well that this company which was the most important coal mining industry in that part of the province is now defunct. The minister reveals a remarkable lack of knowledge of the coal mining enterprises in western Canada. At this I should like to ask if there is any area in western Canada from which he has had any expression of hope that the bill would be of any assistance at all either in Alberta, Saskatchewan or British Columbia. He has now indicated that it will mean nothing in Fernie.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Mr. Regier: No, Mr. Chairman. I hope the minister, as a minister, will be able to indicate at least one mine in all of western Canada that is hoping to gain anything as a result of the legislation now before us.

Mr. Comtois: My advisers tell me that the facts are that the Crowsnest pass coal company had two mines, one at Fernie and one at Michel. They decided to close the Fernie mine and concentrate their operations at Michel. That was their decision and we cannot interfere in their decision unless they want to reopen the Fernie mine and make an application to the board for a loan so that they can finance their new operation. That is all I can say at the present time until we receive an application and full details from the company.

Mr. Regier: I do not want to misinterpret what the minister has said but he has indicated that as far as Fernie is concerned the amendment he is now offering means nothing.

Mr. Speakman: Nonsense.

Mr. Regier: As far as Michel is concerned, he said it may mean something.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Regier: The minister has not given any evidence at all that anyone in the whole of Canada is going to benefit from this legislation or has even asked for it. Unless the minister is able to offer some evidence that other areas outside of the maritimes have asked for the extension of the benefits of this legislation and unless other areas are able or willing to benefit, all of this is a bunch of hooey—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Regier: —and a smokescreen. I will repeat that statement. This amounts only to a smokescreen unless the minister is able—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Regier: A lot of hon. members are saying, "oh". May I repeat; if at least one mine can be cited by the minister that is going to continue in operation, and if one mine will indicate that it is willing to continue in operation, we are prepared to support this legislation. However, unless the minister is able to indicate that one mine has asked for this and that one mine will be helped thereby, I see little use in this amendment.

Mr. Benidickson: I am not too concerned about whether or not a private industry asks for anything. I am more concerned about whether or not when the state advances a subsidy it will have an advantageous application in all sections of the country. I was interested in the argument of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and I wonder whether the minister has an illustration comparing the advantages under this legislation with, say, a mine in the western territory vis-à-vis the maritime points. Could we just compare the two to indicate what the results might be?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, as an example, suppose a coal operator in the west obtains a market in Japan, for instance, and in order to produce the coal to meet the requirements from Japan he wants to improve his equipment. Then he will apply to the dominion coal board for a loan. His case will be examined, discussed and studied. If the application is worth while and his request for a loan is sound and apt to be of some profit to the borrower, well, in that case the loan will be granted and everything will go through.

Of course, there is a difference between a loan and a subsidy. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River seems to mix up the question of subsidy with special loans. It is a totally different thing.

Mr. Benidickson: Will the minister assure us he has the feeling that this formula he proposes to the house is apt to help in the western Alberta and British Columbia regions in a similar way as it will help the maritimes?

Mr. Comtois: I think so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: Is he able to be more specific in his illustrations?

Mr. Comtois: Nobody can tell until we have an application at least from a company.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources assured the people of Alberta very recently that there was a new deal afoot, and that the coal miners and the operators of the coal mines had something to expect; that there would be something forthcoming at the present session of parliament. I now realize that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys has nothing new to offer. He is simply amending the act to extend it to all areas of the nation, and yet the mining operators of British Columbia, Alberta or Saskatchewan have not asked for the benefits. The minister is unable to cite any instance at all where those mining operators have asked to be included under the benefits of the act, and yet he is asking us to agree to amend the act. I imagine that he and his government are going to attempt to tell the people of the nation that they have now extended the benefits of this act, which used to apply only in the maritimes, to the whole of the nation. The minister has not yet offered one iota of evidence that this legislation has been asked for, or that it will be used by any of the mining operators in the three western provinces, or that it is actually going to be of any use at all. I ask the minister to explain why this house ought to pass this legislation at this time.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member was not here when he explained it.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the amendment appears to be justified to the extent that the dominion coal board and the committee have now seen fit to recommend $4,500,000 for a new washing plant for the Dominion Coal Company. It is my understanding that this matter was raised on previous occasions in the dominion coal board and it was felt at that time that this particular plant was not economically justified.

The question has been raised, what is it going to do for other areas? There are other sections of the coal industry that are in the same difficulty. There is the problem of the remodernization of equipment of all the coal mines in Canada. Many of them are faced with the serious problem of loss of markets, increased costs of production and decreased sales. Particularly in view of the fact that United States production of export coal has increased by large amounts, is the $6,500,000 that we have put in sufficient to modernize other companies that are finding it necessary to modernize to compete not only with the United States exports but with the Dominion Coal Company.

The minister was asked a fair and reasonable question in regard to the matter in British Columbia because a good example is the A. V. Roe Company which owns a major part of the coal industry in Canada. They have a large plant in the maritimes and they have been willing to close one particular plant in British Columbia to allow another one of their own operations to exist. I think we should be assured that the $6,500,000 is going to be enough to modernize the other mines in Canada along with the $4,500,000 and the allowances that this bill makes. I have no objection to that at all. I think this bill is necessary. If we are going to pass this amendment to take care only of some of the problems of the Dominion Coal Company, then I think there is no need to change the name or to give the impression that this is a very important bill. We must be assured that there is enough money.

I think it is absolutely necessary for the minister and his department to supply the facilities of his department in technical research and whatever is involved in the technical part of the department so that assistance can be given to many of the operators who are now finding it impossible to continue operations. This is true in Alberta and in Saskatchewan and it certainly is true in British Columbia, and it is proved by the fact that a number of the mines are closed down. I think we would still like an answer to some of these questions, so may I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if we could not complete this bill tonight? We would be quite prepared to go ahead.

Mr. Regier: May I say that if the minister will indicate how, in any little way, this will help British Columbia, Alberta or Saskatchewan, we might be prepared to let this go.

Mr. Benidickson: That is the very question I raised, and I associate myself with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. I think we all want to co-operate in this respect.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, it is not very easy to tell in advance what may happen in three, four or five years. Representations have been made to the dominion coal board by different companies in the west, and at the same time we have this application from the Dominion Coal Company. The board has calculated that the amount of $10 million would meet the applications we expect in the next few years, maybe one, two, three or five years at the most. We cannot foresee events and give the details of what might happen next year or the year after.

We are presenting a bill for $10 million. This application of the Dominion Coal Company has not been decided. We know this is the maximum that can be granted, and that is all we can say at the present time. Who can tell what the situation will be in so far as coal is concerned within the next year or two? We are doing whatever is possible. The dominion coal board is studying the whole case. They have their officials looking over the matter in the western provinces and in the maritime provinces. We are doing our best. We ask for $10 million additional and will try to meet the requirements at the present time.

May I say that the committee should be satisfied with the explanation I am giving. I am very frank with the committee in giving this, and very sincere.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister is referring to a regional problem. Certainly we are all very sympathetic to this problem. The minister, I am sure, would be willing to make it known to the committee that if a similar situation existed elsewhere on a specific basis he would use his best offices to do as he has done in this case and provide some assistance for that situation.

Mr. Comtois: That is exactly what we intend to do.

Mr. Regier: May I say this: The minister has asked for money under this amendment, and while we are not averse to that if this will help the coal mining enterprises in the maritimes, at the same time he is making a pretense that this will help the coal mining enterprises all over the Dominion of Canada. He has not yet presented any evidence whatever that this will help the coal mining enterprises in British Columbia, Alberta or Saskatchewan. Therefore, may I call it ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Fifth report of standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Cathers.

ROYAL VISIT

STATEMENT ON WELCOME TO HER MAJESTY IN CHICAGO

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house I would like to say a word or two with regard to the events yesterday in Chicago. That city and the state of Illinois accorded to Her Majesty the Queen and Prince Philip a welcome which was certainly unequalled in my experience. It was one that typifies the relationship between the commonwealth and the United States in which Canada has a particular interest.

The warmth of the reception and the scope of the welcome accorded Her Majesty and the prince was an unforgettable experience and enduring evidence, I believe, not only of the esteem in which the Queen is held but also of that regard, important as it is, which the people of the United States showed yesterday they have for the necessity for and the preservation of unity in freedom as between the United States and the commonwealth.

I want to say one word more, if I may, of thanks and appreciation to the mayor of the city of Chicago and the governor of the state of Illinois and those associated with them for the outstanding arrangements which were made in order to make yesterday a day of historic significance.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I once had the privilege of living in Chicago in the days when Big Bill Thompson was the mayor of that great city, and when I suspect a visit from the King or the Queen of England might not have been received so enthusiastically as yesterday's visit was. It is encouraging to learn from the Prime Minister that all the vigour and vitality of that great city was directed to giving the Queen of Canada and Prince Philip such a warm welcome. I am sure it was appreciated by the Queen and the prince, and that they had good cause to realize that Chicago is not only warm in its welcome, but also that it is a city of art galleries and symphony orchestras as well as stockyards.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the members of the C.C.F. group are very pleased at the tremendous tribute given to the Queen and Prince Philip by the people of the city of Chicago. We agree with the Prime Minister that it was a tribute to the person who occupies the position of Queen of Canada and to Prince Philip. It was also a tribute to the very good relations between Canada and the United States, and to the esteem that we feel is held for Canadians and for Canada in the great and friendly nation to the south.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

COMBINES ACT AMENDMENT—REQUEST FOR LEAVE TO WITHDRAW LEGISLATION

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I should like to make a statement with respect to the government's proposals regarding Bill No. C-59, about which inquiries have been made from time to time by the Leader of the Opposition and others.

Bill C-59 was designed to accomplish two main purposes; first, to clarify and improve the law relating to combinations, mergers and monopolies; and second, to enact three provisions for the protection of small business and consumers against unfair practices, including misleading advertising.

Since the introduction of the bill we have received representations from businessmen and trade associations that the measure should be deferred until they have had an opportunity to study it more thoroughly and make representations with respect to the combines and merger provisions. In a matter of this kind it is of particular importance that all interests have every reasonable opportunity to make their submissions.

We have therefore decided that the proper course is to proceed with those parts of the bill which relate to the problems of small business, because we believe them to be urgent and because there have not been the requests for opportunities for further representations in this connection that there have been in connection with the other matter; and to defer until next session the provisions relating to combinations, mergers and monopolies and the other incidental provisions of the bill. The provisions we propose to proceed with, if the house agrees, are the enactment of the three provisions relating particularly to small business, including the section on misleading advertising. It will also be necessary to introduce a fourth provision dealing with the situation in the fishing industry in British Columbia.

A statement of evidence has been submitted by the director under the combines act to the restrictive trade practices commission and to various fish packing companies, associations and individuals, alleging that certain agreements and activities relating to the supply of raw fish by the fishermen to the companies are illegal. As a result of the doubt thereby cast upon the legality of such agreements and activities the companies have declined to negotiate prices with the fishermen's union, as they have done in past years, and it appears that a strike may result which could lead to the loss of the salmon catch and perhaps other catches of fish.

There is a provision in the anti-combines legislation to the effect that nothing therein shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees, and it will, I believe, be argued by the fishermen that they come within the protection of this provision. If, however, it should turn out, as a result of the inquiry, that the agreements dealt with therein are in whole or in part illegal, it may be that the report will disclose a situation with which we shall have to take steps to deal in a definitive manner, but it is not possible to do so now.

Meanwhile it is essential that all reasonable steps be taken to prevent the loss of the salmon and other catches, and I shall therefore propose a clause in the new bill to the effect that the anti-combines legislation shall not apply to arrangements between fishermen or associations of fishermen in British Columbia, and persons or associations of persons engaged in the buying or processing of fish in British Columbia, relating to the prices, remuneration or other conditions under which fish shall be caught and supplied, between the 1st day of January, 1959 and December 31, 1960. By the latter date it is hoped that the remaining steps in the inquiry will have been concluded and a report will have been made by the restrictive trade practices commission so that we may be able to assess what, if any, further action should be taken to dispose finally of the situation.

I have spoken to the Leader of the Opposition and to the leader of the C.C.F. party about this matter, and in accordance with those discussions, and for the reasons I have outlined, I would request the unanimous consent of the house to drop the order for second reading of Bill C-59 in order that I may introduce a new bill containing only the three provisions in the present bill which I have mentioned and the new provision regarding the fishing situation in British Columbia.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are glad on our part to give the proposal the consent that is required. We think the decision of the government to withdraw Bill No. C-59 at this time is a wise one, in that it will give those organizations and persons particularly concerned in these important measures an opportunity to appear before a committee next year and make their views known.

It is clear from what the minister has said that the bill which he proposes to introduce, while more limited, is still very important. We still think on this side that that bill should be sent to a committee for the same purpose I have mentioned in connection with the larger one.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, with a knowledge of all the circumstances, and particularly in view of the importance of this measure and its application to the province of British Columbia, we readily agree to the proposal to withdraw the bill as was suggested by the minister. This withdrawal will considerably shorten the session, because we had a number of well documented, well prepared and critical speeches to make on the bill. We think the withdrawal is a sensible measure in the light of all the circumstances. It will provide an opportunity for representations from various groups interested in and concerned about this problem, and will provide an opportunity for further consideration by the government.

We hope, as the leader of the official opposition said, that it will be possible to refer the bill to a committee at another session. With respect to the new amendment suggested by the minister in his closing remarks, we think under all the circumstances, and particularly as we come from British Columbia, that it is a most sensible arrangement.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order arising out of the repeated use by the hon. member for Kootenay West of the phrase "leader of the official opposition". There is no such person, Mr. Speaker. There is a Leader of the Opposition, known to the constitution.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I was chastised by the leader of the official opposition the other day for making that kind of reference.

Mr. Pearson: No, the hon. member was not. Mr. Speaker, my only comment on the point of order is that a rose by any other name would smell as sweet.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the unanimous wish of the house that order No. 6 on today's order paper be discharged and that Bill No. C-59 be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ANNOUNCEMENT OF GRANTING OF LEAVE TO VICE PRESIDENT

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in the unavoidable absence of the Minister of National Revenue he asked me to read this statement.

I am advised by the C.B.C. that Mr. R. L. Dunsmore, speaking for the C.B.C. board of directors, said today that the executive committee of the board had met in Montreal over the week end and had granted leave for a period of up to two months to the corporation's vice president, Mr. E. L. Bushnell.

Members of the committee who attended the special meeting were Mr. R. L. Dunsmore, Mrs. Kate Aitken and Mr. Raymond Dupuis. Other members of the executive committee are C.B.C. president Alphonse Ouimet and Mr. Bushnell. Mr. Bushnell, who has been acting president of the corporation for the past six months, is now on leave.

Mr. Dunsmore also announced an emergency measure taken by the executive committee in naming a management committee to carry on C.B.C. operations in the absence of the president and vice president. The corporation president, Alphonse Ouimet, who underwent surgery three weeks ago, is expected to return to his desk within the next two to four weeks.

The management committee, composed of senior head office officials, will be under the chairmanship of Colonel R. P. Landry, assistant to the president. Other members of the committee are Marcel Carter, controller of management, planning and personnel; Charles Jennings, controller of broadcasting; James P. Gilmore, controller of operations; Max Henderson, comptroller; W. G. Richardson, director of engineering; R. C. Fraser, director of public relations.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROGRESS OF CURRENT MEETINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): In the absence of the Minister of Finance I wonder whether I may ask the Prime Minister if he has anything to report on the progress of the federal-provincial conference, and if as yet any decision has been made as to whether a formal federal-provincial conference with all the premiers in attendance may be held later this year.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house knows the Minister of Finance is unavoidably absent today attending the meeting that is taking place. I think the answer to this and other similar questions might well await his return.

FIRES

PICTOU, N.S.—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE REPLACEMENT OF FACILITIES DESTROYED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is the minister aware of the disastrous fire which yesterday swept the waterfront at Pictou, Nova Scotia, and destroyed the main piers and freight sheds? If so, would the minister have his officials investigate the matter of replacing the structures and facilities, so important to the life and economy of this historic town, in the shortest possible time?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful to the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. An official of the Department of Public Works is already in Pictou, and we hope to get a report from him shortly.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, notice of which I have given him. Is the minister now prepared to make a statement arising out of the recommendations in the Bracken commission report on box car allocation?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. I hope to make a statement in the house within the next few days, as I promised I would before the commencement of the new crop year, dealing with the recommendations of the Bracken inquiry into the box car situation. The announcement will advise the public generally of the arrangements for the distribution of box cars that will become operative at the commencement of the new crop year. It will indicate some change from the procedure that has been in effect for a number of years, and we will see during the course of the coming crop year how effective the new arrangements may be.

I will be prepared to receive representations from all concerned, if there are any suitable modifications required. The distribution of box cars for the movement of our western grain is a continuing problem, and we are ready and willing to do everything within reason to make it work as effectively as possible.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Since the minister has given us a preview of the formal announcement, I wonder if he could say whether the main basis for the distribution of box cars will be on individual elevator purchases in a recent period at the marketing points, or whether it will be based on some elective form by which farmers themselves can indicate to which elevator or elevators they wish to deliver their grain.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the announcement which I propose to make in the near future will give the answer to the hon. member's question.

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO DEFICIENCY PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether the government proposes to take any action before the end of the session with regard to the recommendations as to a deficiency payment made by the second or supplementary delegation of western farmers who were in Ottawa a few weeks ago.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some ten days ago the hon. gentleman asked me if I would make a statement as to the tenor of the legislation to be introduced, and whether there would be any additional legislation introduced over and above those to which reference has already been made. Before the termination of the session and at the earliest possible date a general indication in that regard will be given which will, of course, include the answer to the question just asked by the hon. gentleman.

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR INCREASED QUOTAS IN PEACE RIVER AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he would inquire to see if it is possible to increase the initial grain quotas in respect of the ensuing crop year at those delivery points in the Peace River area where severe crop losses were sustained during the last two years as a result of adverse weather conditions.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In reply to the hon. member, who drew this matter to my attention yesterday, may I say that I will communicate with the wheat board, draw it to their attention and ask for their sympathetic consideration of what is a problem of particular importance to the Peace River country. I think they will give the same consideration to this request that they gave this year to the request from the northeastern portion of Saskatchewan, where tough and damp grain had to be moved in somewhat of a hurry. This is a point well taken, and I will draw it to the attention of the board.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

STATEMENT ON REPORTED U.S. LEGISLATION RESPECTING STUDY OF DE-ICING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Assiniboia referred to a press report regarding a bill introduced in the United States Senate by Senator Wiley which would provide for a major study of de-icing on the St. Lawrence seaway.

I am advised that the St. Lawrence seaway authority has no information on this matter other than the press report referred to, and has not been approached.

SHIPPING

LAKE HURON—STATEMENT ON INQUIRY AS TO SINKING OF S. S. "MONROVIA"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Port Arthur inquired as to whether the department had a representative at the U.S. coastguard hearing into the collision between the Monrovia and the Royaltor.

I am advised that the department had a representative present at the hearing as an observer, and that in due course we will be receiving a copy of the proceedings.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

LIST OF ORDERS OF THE HOUSE STILL OUTSTANDING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the inquiry of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate concerning outstanding orders for returns, I have had a list prepared showing the outstanding orders. If it is agreeable to the hon. gentleman I shall table it forthwith rather than take the time of the house to read it. These orders will be complied with as soon as the information reaches me from the various departments concerned.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether the minister would be agreeable to having the list made an appendix to today's Hansard for the convenience of members.

Mr. Courtemanche: I agree.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreeable to the proposal that the list be made an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For list referred to above, see appendix].

HEALTH INSURANCE

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO INTENTION TO PARTICIPATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now that the province of Quebec, through its minister of welfare, has signed an agreement under the 1956 federal Unemployment Assistance Act, can the minister inform the house if the Quebec government will soon be willing to share in the hospital insurance plan? If the minister has no information at the moment, is it his intention to take advantage of the presence in Ottawa of the premier of Quebec to work out something toward that end?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's question might well be answered by the proverb that one swallow does not make a summer, but hope springs eternal and one swallow helps.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—INQUIRY AS TO INTENTION TO PARTICIPATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he can give reasons why the federal government did not accept the proposal for participation in the hospital insurance program offered by the province of Prince Edward Island?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member seems to be very ill informed. The agreement has been decided upon between the province of Prince Edward Island and the federal government, and we propose to sign this agreement within a very few days.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the minister not aware of the fact that if I was uninformed, it was because of actions taken by the minister himself during the end of last week?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SUGGESTED BANNING OF USE OF POLYETHYLENE LAUNDRY BAGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to pose a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Unfortunately I did not have the opportunity to send him notice but perhaps he can take this as notice. Will the minister advise the house what steps his department is taking or is able to take with respect to banning the use of polyethylene or thin plastic bags which are used extensively by dry cleaning firms and others, and which have caused the death by suffocation of more than 40 children in the United States and Canada?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will look into the matter but I am not sure that my department has any jurisdiction in this regard. I certainly believe that the risks involved should be publicized as widely as possible. I also noticed in this morning's newspapers that tragedy had struck again in the Toronto area and, as I say, I shall certainly look into the matter.

MONTREAL—STATEMENT ON REPORTED OPENING OF U.S. PUBLIC HEALTH STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay West asked me a question relating to the establishment of an additional quarantine inspection point near Montreal being used jointly by Canadian and U.S. authorities. My department had felt this station was necessary to take care of all vessels bound for the seaway rather than at Montreal, and as a gesture of courtesy the U.S. staff were invited to occupy offices in the same building.

This offer was accepted, with agreement between my officers and those of the U.S. public health service that the anchorage off Longue Pointe would be used as a common inspection point for all vessels. Those vessels bound for United States ports after leaving the seaway would be examined and cleared by the United States staff, while those bound for Canadian ports would be cleared by Canadian staff. Thus all vessels would be assured of further passage through the seaway without delay for this purpose.

Inquiries of the Ministry

The only occasion when a Canadian citizen might receive an examination from a United States official would be if he happened to be a passenger or crew member of a vessel first calling at a U.S. port on leaving the seaway. In this case, of course, he would receive exactly the same treatment as though he were on a vessel proceeding direct to, say, the port of New York.

This practice of close co-operation between Canadian and United States quarantine staffs is an arrangement of long standing that has resulted in vastly increased convenience to all forms of cross-border traffic. It is similar to methods in the immigration and customs services—on cross-border trains, for example—and quite often entails operations of officers from locations in the neighbouring country rather than their own.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADOR TO VATICAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. In view of the promises he made in 1957 and 1958 that an ambassador would be appointed to the Vatican, I wish to ask him if the government intends to appoint one before the end of this session?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, this a matter of general policy which is a responsibility of the cabinet.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

JOE BATTS ARM, NFLD.—REPORTED LIGHTNING DAMAGE TO BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware of the fact that the post office at Joe Batts Arm was struck by lightning. If so, can he advise the house whether any serious damage was done?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that fact but undoubtedly the Minister of Public Works, who is responsible for that building, would be aware of it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the Minister of Public Works any light on the subject?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I can only add that it is a great misfortune that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was not in the post office at the time.

AGRICULTURE

EGGS AND HOGS—INQUIRY AS TO BASIS FOR PRICE SUPPORT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. My question is this. Can the minister say whether, following the policy he has announced to limit the support price of eggs and hogs to certain quantities per farm unit of production, he has determined whether it is necessary to introduce an amendment to the Agricultural Stabilization Act? Does the minister not feel that any limitation is in fact a reduction of the mandatory and legislative guarantees under the act?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): In reply to the latter part of the question, Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. I have had a decision of the justice department that it is within the powers of the stabilization board and the government under the act as it stands to introduce the type of deficiency payment support price which I have indicated would be done in the case of hogs and eggs.

Mr. Argue: I would ask the minister how he can withdraw a part of the mandatory provision of this act, which was passed by parliament, as he intends to do.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It has not been the practice of the house to ask legal opinions at this time, or to engage in argument about legal interpretations.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Did I understand the Minister of Agriculture to say that he had consulted the law officers of the crown with regard to the course he had taken? When I say "law officers of the crown" what I mean is this. Did he consult the Minister of Justice or the deputy minister of justice?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, Mr. Speaker; as I said, I have a written opinion from the deputy minister of justice in regard to this matter.

MARITIME COAL PRODUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING APPLICATION, INCREASING AMOUNTS OF LOANS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, July 6, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-68, to amend the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act and to authorize certain amendments to the agreement made under that act with Dominion Coal Company, Limited—Mr. Comtois—Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—1958, c. 36.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, we favour the amendment to section 6 of Bill C-8 tending to relieve the company of the obligation to make refunds during or in respect of the period commencing on the 1st day of July, 1957 and ending on the 31st day of December, 1962. This means, in fact, that the company will have up to June 30, 1963.

May I simply say that we hope that the companies concerned will realize that parliament is being very generous with them and that they will of their own accord, do whatever is necessary to accelerate their mechanization program.

CROP INSURANCE

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCIAL SCHEMES

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-66, to provide for contributions and loans to the provinces in respect of crop insurance.

He said: When this bill was at the resolution stage, a good deal of the opposition comment on it was to the effect that it should be referred for study to a committee of the house or to a federal-provincial conference. Over a period of many years crop insurance has been studied by various governments, commissions, committees and other bodies of individuals. Nearly all these stressed the need for crop insurance, though few indicated the kind of program which should be implemented. A further study would not produce any greater practical results, in my opinion, and of course would certainly delay passage of this bill and make it impossible for the bill to be put through at this session of parliament.

Some question was raised by the hon. member for Essex East as to whether there was any necessity to put the bill through at this session. This matter of crop insurance has been hanging fire for some 20-odd years, and it is a fact that at least one province has indicated that it wants at the session of the provincial legislature which is now going on to put through a crop insurance bill. Therefore I think there is necessity and urgency to get this bill through this session.

Actually, Mr. Speaker, I think what is needed as far as crop insurance is concerned is some definite experience. There have been, as I have said, numerous studies, but we in Canada have no actual experience as far as crop insurance is concerned. I think what is essential is a certain amount of experience in connection with the matter, and then a further study on the basis of that experience with perhaps subsequent changes in the plan as the result of the experience we obtain. But in the meantime I think it is essential to get the bill passed by the house, and an opportunity will be created to put actual schemes of insurance into effect.

Another criticism which was made by hon. members of the opposition and by some people outside the house is that the dominion government should pay a higher percentage of the premiums, a greater percentage of the cost of crop insurance. In that connection the hon. member for Essex East, according to a newspaper report in the Leader Post of June 30, had this to say:

> On the premium shares, Mr. Martin did not see how the individual farmers could be expected to bear any more than 40 per cent of the premium cost.

Apparently he is taking the position that the dominion government and the provincial government should pay 60 per cent of the cost, I would like to compare that statement with the opinion of the most important Liberal newspaper in western Canada, the Winnipeg Free Press. They wrote an editorial in connection with crop insurance on July 2, and in this editorial they said:

> There can be little quarrel with the idea of the senior government acting as a guarantor against the crop insurance fund of any province being broken by abnormally heavy drains.

They were talking about the loan provision in the bill, of course. The article goes on:

> But the wisdom of the federal government being more involved financially is open to question. Certainly the payment of half of the administration costs and one-fifth of premium costs will be interpreted by many people as another government handout to the farmer.

The Winnipeg Free Press knows a great deal more about agriculture, I think, than the hon. member for Essex East, with all respect to him. In other words they think we are paying too much in the proposal we are putting forward of 50 per cent of the administration costs and 20 per cent of the premiums, rather than paying far too little, as the hon. member for Essex East and other hon. members have indicated.

In connection with the general question of the premium rate, we do not know what the premium rates will be in the various provinces. That is up to them to decide, and of course they will be quite variable from province to province and from one area of a province to another area of a province. The Saskatchewan royal commission which investigated crop insurance did make a considerable number of calculations, and for a coverage of 60 per cent, with indemnities paid on the basis of individual farmers, they indicated that the premium rate would be 7.3 per cent on the average yield in the low risk Regina area, 11 per cent in the medium risk Hanley-Davidson area, and 12.8 per cent in the high risk Swift Current-Shaunavon region.

I should point out that the dominion government will be paying 20 per cent of this premium cost under the provisions of this bill; but when you compare what will be the cost of this all-risk insurance to farmers with what it is presently costing them for hail insurance alone, it gives a very favourable picture. Hail insurance rates, of course, vary considerably from one area to another. As far as my own farming operations are concerned I pay 14 per cent; that is the premium rate as far as hail insurance is concerned. Other areas in Alberta go up, I believe, to as high as 16 per cent and go down, I think, to a low of 8 per cent. In any event, in the whole area around Calgary and quite a considerable area of Alberta the rates range anywhere from 10 to 16 per cent.

This scheme envisages premiums which are considerably less than farmers are paying at this time for hail insurance only, and this is insurance covering all risks. Certainly it is a little difficult for me to understand the complaints that the premiums are going to be too high. A very large number of farmers at the present time are paying hail insurance premiums which are considerably higher than these premiums to get coverage against one risk only, and they are not to my knowledge making too much complaint about it.

Mr. Argue: Might I ask the minister a question at this point? Has he any figures which would show in any given year the percentage of farmers who in fact have hail insurance? Is it not a very small percentage?

Mr. Harkness: I have not those figures, Mr. Speaker. In some areas the number of farmers who take out hail insurance is quite high; in other areas it is quite low. Nevertheless, a considerable number of people do take out hail insurance. The Alberta hail insurance board, which is an emanation of the provincial government there, handles quite a big volume of hail insurance. So much for the matter of the possible size of the premiums, which as I say is only guesswork. Anything in connection with the size of the premiums is very largely guesswork. All we have to go on in that regard are the calculations made on the basis of what long term yields have been in various parts of various provinces.

Another criticism which was made, particularly by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River as well as by the hon. member for Assiniboia, was that no province would be prepared to come into this scheme. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River said it was mere window dressing, that no province would come into it, and so on. Mr. Speaker, all I can say in that connection is that the province of Manitoba has already indicated that it will come into the scheme. In a news item in the Winnipeg Free Press of June 30 the following statement appears:

> The Manitoba government will "definitely go ahead" with its proposed crop insurance program now that the federal government's offer has been made public, Hon. Errick Willis, acting agriculture minister, said Tuesday.
> At the same time Premier Duff Roblin said he had not yet examined the federal legislation and he did not know how the Ottawa proposals would "harmonize" with the provincial plan.
> Mr. Willis said the government has still to examine the federal legislation but "from what I've seen in the paper it would appear to be satisfactory."

Mr. Speaker, that is an immediate refutation of the contention made by hon. members opposite that the provinces would not be prepared to go ahead with this plan.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Manitoba was going ahead with it anyhow.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, they had announced that they would go ahead with the crop insurance plan. But every province has known ever since the start of this session that we were going to introduce a crop insurance plan, and they also knew there would be assistance as far as their own crop insurance plans were concerned from legislation which we would pass. Of course they made those statements that they were going to introduce crop insurance plans because they knew we were going to do so; it had been announced in the speech from the throne.

Mr. Argue: Did the minister have any consultations with Mr. Willis or any other minister of the Manitoba government?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, I have had some discussions with Hon. Errick Willis in connection with the whole matter of crop insurance.

Mr. Argue: And he agreed with your plan?

Mr. Harkness: I did not put the plan up in detail. As I said before, we had several discussions on the cost, the means of implementing it and so on.

Mr. Argue: Did the minister have similar conversations with other ministers of provincial governments, for instance in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Harkness: Not since the last dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. Argue: No discussions on this program at all?

Mr. Harkness: No. So much for that point. As a matter of fact I have a press release here in which the minister of agriculture for Prince Edward Island says he does not believe the island farmers would be interested in a federal crop insurance plan. He goes on to say, however, that if sufficient numbers show an interest in the scheme the provincial department will be willing to develop plans to meet the need.

Mr. Benidickson: Was that within the last week?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, it was in the Charlottetown Guardian of July 2, after this plan had been announced.

There is another point I should like to make. There has been a considerable amount of misrepresentation in connection with this crop insurance plan, and I refer particularly to an article which appeared in the Regina Leader Post of June 30 written by a Mr. Robert Moon, who is in the press gallery here. This article is headed "Prairie Farm Assistance Cancelled" and it begins:

> Ottawa—Cancellation of the prairie farm assistance emerged as the surprise package in the new federal government crop insurance proposals announced Monday afternoon in the Commons.

This is, of course, completely incorrect. I am sure this article must have given a great deal of concern which should not have been given to farmers in western Canada, particularly in Saskatchewan. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act has not been cancelled, there is no intention of it being cancelled, and I made that abundantly clear when we were at the resolution stage. How anybody who listened to or read that debate could have written an article of this kind I find it difficult to understand.

Mr. Argue: You just cancelled the benefits.

Mr. Harkness: I have found in the past that Mr. Moon has had great difficulty in understanding much of this farm legislation, but I find it extraordinarily difficult to comprehend how he could have written an article of that kind in view of the fact that I made it perfectly clear that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was being continued and that any farmer who wished to continue to receive the benefits of that act would be able to do so.

Those are a few points on which I thought I should comment. The need and desirability of crop insurance are indicated by the large number of representations which have been made. Representations for crop insurance have been made by provinces, farm organizations, and associations of rural municipalities. Nearly all of these called for crop insurance schemes involving federal-provincial co-operation.

Proposed Crop Insurance

Many members are familiar with the extreme variations in crop yields throughout the country and with the difficulties that crop failures impose on farmers, on communities and on the nation. Weather hazards including drought, excessive moisture, frost and hail have caused most of the damage. Other factors such as insects and disease have taken their toll. In looking at the yields of various crops across the country it is found that yields are frequently less than one half of the long term average yield. Between 1921 and 1956 in Manitoba, seven of 14 crop districts have had wheat yields below 50 per cent of the average. One crop district had four such years. In Saskatchewan all crop districts have had wheat yields below 50 per cent of the average during this period, and one crop district had 10 such years. In Alberta 11 of the 16 crop districts have had wheat yields below 50 per cent of the long term average. One crop district had seven such years, another six and another five. The variation in oats and barley yields in the prairie provinces has been somewhat similar. In addition, many individual farmers have had crop failures when the average yield for the crop district has been high. Another indication of the frequency of crop failure in the prairie provinces is the number of awards made under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. More than one million awards to farmers have been made since the program was started in 1939.

In British Columbia, although yield records for such a long period were not available, there have also been crop failures. The main crops experiencing failure were apples, cherries and peaches. In eastern Canada the variations in crop yields are less than in the prairie provinces but farmers occasionally experienced failures in crops such as tobacco, soybeans, sugar beets, apples and potatoes.

Crop failures are disastrous to farmers and their families because they find it difficult, if not impossible, to maintain a reasonable level of living until they are able to harvest the next crop. Also, farmers are not able to carry on their farming operations in an efficient manner if they have not the means to do so. Crop failures are felt in the community because business activity declines. Crop failures have their effect on the nation, too, since the demand for farm equipment and supplies declines with the resultant effect upon employment, business and trade. It is therefore considered to be in the interests of the nation as well as in the interests of farmers that crop insurance schemes be implemented.

The present insurance facilities are limited. The main program which provides assistance in the event of crop failures is the Prairie

Farm Assistance Act. Under this program payments of up to $2 per acre—$4 on one-half of the cultivated acreage—are made to farmers in areas of crop failure. The maximum payment to a farmer is $800. About one half of the funds paid to farmers has been collected from farmers in the form of a 1 per cent levy on sales of grain. Although recent amendments have greatly improved the kind of assistance available under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, it does not meet the needs of a national and comprehensive crop insurance program.

The Prairie Farm Assistance Act was designed for the prairie provinces and primarily for grain production. Its provisions would not be applicable to other crops in other parts of the country. Also, the limited amount of assistance available under that scheme, the fact that it does not deal with individual cases of crop failure, and the fact that it has certain other inequities mean that it does not have the advantages of crop insurance schemes even in the prairie provinces.

The other main kind of insurance available to some farmers is hail insurance. Hail insurance is generally available in the prairie provinces and in some other parts of the country. Hail insurance, however, does not cover the crop losses experienced by farmers from many other causes.

There are several reasons why the present bill is a measure to assist provinces in operating crop insurance programs. Most representations have requested that the crop insurance scheme be one involving both the federal and provincial governments. Farmers in all provinces probably do not want crop insurance at this time. This act would permit each province to decide whether or not crop insurance would be offered to farmers in their own province. Provincial governments are in a better position to establish the kind of scheme which is best suited to the particular conditions existing in their own provinces. There is a wide variety of crops grown in the country, a wide variety of farming methods and differences of viewpoint as to the kind of insurance schemes which would be most effective. Provincial governments would be in a better position to assess these and to implement the kind of program best suited to those conditions.

Some people, some organizations, and perhaps some provinces consider that a crop insurance scheme has to be compulsory in order to be most effective. The federal government has not the authority to impose compulsory crop insurance schemes on farmers. For these reasons the bill provides for assistance to provinces which undertake to implement crop insurance programs.

[Mr. Harkness.]

The question of the amount and kind of assistance has received careful consideration. It is considered that some assistance is necessary in order to make a crop insurance program available to farmers. Up to the present time no assistance has been available and no provincial government nor any other agency has offered a comprehensive crop insurance program. In the United States assistance has been available to the extent of administration costs. After 20 years of operation only about 27 per cent of eligible wheat producers carry crop insurance. In order to encourage a more rapid participation, a greater amount of assistance than is offered under the United States program is proposed in this bill.

Mention might be made of the Unemployment Insurance Act which provides incomes to workers whose source of income has been cut off through circumstances beyond their control. It is in the interests of the workers, the community and the nation that workers have this income in periods when their ordinary source of income is cut off. The federal government makes a contribution to this program by way of paying administration costs and part of the premiums. Similarly in farming, when crops are lost through no fault of the farmer, and his income is lost, it is desirable to have some means of providing farmers with a source of income. As in the case of unemployment insurance it is considered appropriate that there should be federal contributions to the program. It is estimated that the contributions for crop insurance outlined in this bill would be about the same proportion of the total expenditure under the program as in the case of the unemployment insurance program.

This bill follows the principle adopted in the case of hospital insurance, where the federal government makes contributions to the cost of hospital services and leaves the administration of the program to the various provinces. The provinces are free to adapt the program to their own circumstances and desires. They are free to make financial contributions to the program or to charge the insured all of the premium and administration costs not paid by the federal government. In the case of the hospital insurance program each of the provinces pays a different amount from its consolidated revenue fund into the program. They are free to do the same in the crop insurance program.

One of the points emphasized in many studies of crop insurance in Canada and in representations on the matter is that provincial governments do not have the financial resources required to back an insurance scheme in case of a severe crop failure or a series of crop failures. This problem is solved in the present bill by the federal government providing loans to provinces to meet indemnity commitments. Provinces would be required to provide all the amounts needed up to $200,000. On any amounts above $200,000 the federal government would loan 75 per cent. It is not unreasonable to consider that provinces could meet these commitments.

This bill calls for an agreement to be signed between the federal government and a provincial government which enters the scheme. The agreement would set out the provisions of the crop insurance scheme to be implemented. Among other things it would limit the insurance coverage to 60 per cent of the average yield in the area. Although the limit of coverage in the United States crop insurance plan is 75 per cent, most insurance coverage is less than this. The Saskatchewan royal commission study on crop insurance stated:

> Coverage at 100 per cent—or even 75 per cent—of the long term average yield was found to require premiums above this level—

Ten per cent of the average yield is the level to which reference is made. I continue:

> —for the majority of farms. It can be concluded, therefore, that crop insurance offering a high level of coverage is too costly to most Saskatchewan farmers.

The agreement provides, too, that any insurance scheme put into effect will, in so far as is possible to determine, be actuarially sound. Nothing could damage the cause of insurance more than to find, after the scheme had been in effect for a number of years, that the premium rates were inadequate.

Regarding the duration of the agreement, as far as the federal government is concerned the agreement stands for at least ten years. After the expiration of five years the federal government could if it wished terminate the agreement with five years' notice. It is not possible to indicate at this time the details of how crop insurance will work, since there are different ways in which various provinces might implement a crop insurance program. It may be helpful to show how a crop insurance scheme might work, and I underline the word "might".

We will take a hypothetical example, that of Mr. John Smith, farmer, at Simpson, Saskatchewan. This is in the central part of the province. If we assume he is an average farmer in rural municipality No. 281, he will have about 265 acres of wheat.

Mr. Benidickson: I am not acquainted with that particular point. The minister will be well aware that the Saskatchewan royal commission indicated that there were three main areas in Saskatchewan, the high risk area, the medium risk area and the moderate or low risk area. In which area is this particular point?

Mr. Harkness: This point would be in the medium to low risk area. It think it is fairly typical.

In the spring Mr. Smith decides to insure his wheat and signs a contract with the provincial crop insurance agency. The long term (1925 to 1956) average yield in the municipality is about 14 bushels per acre. I think the hon. member for Assiniboia will agree that this is fairly typical. He can insure 60 per cent of this, that is 8.4 bushels per acre. If in the past years, 1925-1956, the farmer had the same crop yield experience as the average for the municipality, he would have collected crop insurance payments in 8 out of the 32 years. The range in payments for crop failure would have been from $170 to about $1,750. He would collect the $1,750 in a year like 1937 when there was virtually a complete crop failure. In a year like 1949 he would have collected nearly $1,500. Over the whole period he would have collected $5,600 in payments and would have paid about $4,500 in premiums. The federal government would have paid $1,100 in premiums on his behalf. The total premiums would have amounted to nearly 5 per cent of the average yield.

However, since even in years in which the average yield for the municipality is more than 60 per cent (or 8.4 bushels per acre) of the long term average yield, some farmers would have less than 60 per cent and would therefore collect insurance. The premiums and indemnities will, therefore, greatly exceed any calculation based on the average for the municipality. The Saskatchewan royal commission estimated that the premiums in this area would be about 11 per cent of the average yield.

Mr. Benidickson: What does that represent?

Mr. Harkness: Eleven per cent would be the premium rate.

Mr. Benidickson: But it is 60 per cent of the average yield?

Mr. Harkness: Sixty per cent is the maximum coverage. That is the coverage the Saskatchewan royal commission was talking about in its calculations also. If provincial governments decided to pay part of the premium costs the farmers' share would be reduced accordingly. In this example it was assumed that the administrative costs of the program were shared equally by the provincial and federal governments. Under this bill the provinces may, if they wish, collect from insured farmers an amount sufficient to cover 50 per cent of administration costs; that is, those administration costs not paid by the federal government.

Taking a particular year for example, say 1960, this farmer would be insured up to 8.4 bushels per acre on his wheat. It may turn out that he would harvest a crop of only 3 bushels per acre. He would receive the difference between the insured amount of 8.4 bushels and the actual yield of 3 bushels, in other words 5.4 bushels per acre. That is what he would be paid for. On 265 acres this would amount to 1,431 bushels which, at a price of $1.25 per bushel, would amount to nearly $1,800. This, of course, is higher than the $1,750 mentioned previously for the crop failure year of 1937 because the price of wheat was lower in 1937.

It is evident, therefore, that a crop insurance plan of this kind will provide farmers with a stability of income which they have never had before. Because this stability is there in bad years, their living standards will not suffer so drastically as in the past, and their investment in the farm business will be protected. Also, with this security, credit facilities will be more readily available. All these things will work to the good of the farmer, his community and the nation as a whole.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, as the minister indicated, when he said he would be brief at the resolution stage, he has given some more elucidation and detail as to the possible effects of this legislation. Like the minister, before dealing with some of the remarks I previously had in mind to make this morning, I should like to deal with one or two of the statements the minister made before he picked up his text and gave us his formal statement.

I found that his first remarks were most disappointing. I think it is absolutely necessary that a new principle of federal participation of this kind should receive committee study. I hope that in the course of the debate we shall be able to persuade the minister to alter what seems to be a decision he has made in this respect.

On this point I want to remind the minister that when the present Prime Minister was in opposition, and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was under debate in 1957, he had this to say as reported at page 1473 of Hansard:

> The question of crop insurance is one that requires a great deal of investigation. If one reads the report of the Saskatchewan commission on rural questions and the report of the Manitoba royal commission one has some idea of the immensity of the problem and all the difficulties inherent in introducing in our country legislation analogous to that in the United States. While I realize—

This is appropriate to the situation we are in at the moment. I continue to quote the Prime Minister:

> While I realize that this parliament is now rapidly approaching its end and it is only a matter of a few weeks before it will cease to exist, even now the committee on agriculture might be convened in order to hear representations, consider recommendations and come to a general decision on this very important matter.

I think this is very appropriate to the circumstances that are before us at the present time. I shall have more to say on the matter later on.

I felt also, when in the informal, off the cuff remarks of the minister he referred to hail insurance, with the possibility of premiums related to indemnity of the scale of 10 per cent to 16 per cent, that it was scarcely a proper analogy with respect to what we have before us now, which is an all-risk proposition. Naturally the premiums with respect to an all-risk policy would be considerably different from insuring for hail alone.

Mr. Harkness: They would be much higher.

Mr. Benidickson: We think that on an all-risk basis they certainly would be higher.

Mr. Harkness: My point is that the premiums will be lower than the present hail insurance.

Mr. Argue: That is a wild statement, and it is possible to prove it false.

Mr. Benidickson: In addition to that, the minister was unable to tell us just what proportion of farmers was actually insured against hail. It is very small indeed, and that is the difficulty before us with respect to crop insurance. If crop insurance is to be on a voluntary basis—and the minister indicates that that is his intention—

Mr. Harkness: Excuse me; it is entirely up to the provinces. The provinces can make it compulsory or they can have it voluntary.

Mr. Benidickson: In any event, if this is on a voluntary basis—and the minister did make reference at the resolution stage to this being a voluntary scheme—the number of people who would subscribe, if rates go beyond the 10 per cent that the minister quoted from the Saskatchewan commission, is very few indeed and perhaps nobody. As the Saskatchewan report says on page 98, no one would likely take crop insurance on a voluntary basis if the premium rate in relation to indemnities which might be paid would be something over 10 per cent.

The minister also made reference to the proposal he has before us and compared it with the present crop insurance scheme in the United States. He did not tell the whole story. He indicated that this was a more generous scheme than that. Unlike the United States, this proposal contemplates a federal contribution of 20 per cent to the premium itself, but in the United States 100 per cent of the administrative costs which, in relation to premiums and indemnities is calculated to be 25 per cent, is paid by the United States federal government. They pay it all.

Mr. Harkness: No, they do not.

Mr. Benidickson: Well, I shall certainly be able to quote to the minister from both the Manitoba royal commission and the Saskatchewan royal commission that that is so.

Mr. Harkness: I recommend that the hon. member read the United States act.

Mr. Benidickson: As the minister says, we have had experts study this problem in western Canada on several occasions. The minister says their study was so thorough and adequate he does not think we as a parliamentary group should even have another look at it. These people felt that 100 per cent of the administrative costs were paid by the federal government of the United States.

Mr. Harkness: That may have been the case when some of the studies the hon. member is referring to were made, but it is not the case now.

Mr. Benidickson: Well, the minister may be able to give me details as to what has happened since. As recently as 1956 we had a report of a royal commission. But in addition to that—and this is what I am concerned about in the minister's proposals—the United States government, while it wanted the plan to be self-supporting, as the minister indicates he wants this plan to be—actuarially sound, he says—did something that has not been done here, at least not in the bill, and I think it gives us all grave concern. That is the fact that no reserve fund is being established. Before the scheme was launched in the United States the federal government provided $100 million in capital. Eighty-two per cent of that capital has actually been used. On a long term basis it is quite possible, however sound the scheme may be, that one would have a situation in the early years where the premiums were not adequate to meet the liabilities under the insurance plan. So 82 per cent of $100 million had been contributed by the federal government in the United States up to the time covered in the report of the Saskatchewan royal commission, and nothing of that nature is provided here.

That is one of the things that I think discourage the provinces from embarking on this kind of risk. There is no question in any section of the house, I believe, about the desirability and need for a good, sound crop insurance scheme. I do not think the need has been worded in any better terms than in the opening phrases of the report of the Manitoba commission, made in 1955. With relation to the economic problem the commission said:

> Risk and uncertainty characterize the farm economy. The relationship between farm prices and farm costs varies widely and, at the present time, the trend of these two factors would appear to be placing farmers in an increasingly disadvantageous position. . . . A conjunction of low yields and low prices, such as occurred in the 30's, places an individual farmer in a position in which he is unable to contend with the physical and economic factors affecting his business.

I also think the farmers' union of Manitoba put the problem in excellent form. I quote from a report of their annual meeting in January, 1957, as follows:

> The Manitoba farmers' union said that the cost-price squeeze on the average farmer, combined with the natural hazards of crop production such as frost, hail, drought and insects, make it imperative that a comprehensive crop insurance program be instituted without delay. The brief urged against establishing a preliminary insurance program in a test area—

Although that was the recommendation of the Saskatchewan commission.

> —"because this would only delay for several years the ultimate objective." It said a test area would not be a proper guide unless it were big enough "and we respectfully suggest the whole province would not be too large."

I think that is important, too. The minister has not helped us very much, having regard to the debate we had at the resolution stage on June 29, by reporting to us anything concrete from the provinces. He indicated that there had been general discussion with the provinces at several conferences, but it seemed that this matter was certainly on the sidelines of the agendas of those conferences. He said he felt that it would be an affront to parliament if he had indicated to the provinces the broad terms he had in mind with respect to crop insurance prior to informing the house.

I certainly do not think that is a valid argument when the initiation of the scheme depends entirely upon provincial interest and eagerness, and it seems to me that to bring in a proposal which the minister says has not been discussed with the provinces, even though their backing is of the essence, makes this a very vague, indefinite and worrying proposition indeed.

I also noted quite a difference in the minister's evaluation of this bill as compared with another bill he introduced on the same day having to do with farm credit legislation. He described the latter as one of the most important bills ever to come before the Canadian parliament. He made no such statement with respect to this bill, and that impresses me with the suggestion we have advanced, that perhaps few if any of our provincial governments are likely to find this proposition adequate. When I use the word "adequate" I think that perhaps represents the difference between the policy of the government and that of the Liberal party which was announced at their national convention in January, 1958. The phrase, "adequate financial support from the federal government" was the key part of the Liberal resolution. It was indicated that the Liberal party did support a crop insurance scheme in co-operation with the provinces, and it was also advocated that P.F.A.A. be extended nationally. But the bill means nothing if its terms are not sufficiently attractive to bring in on a national basis not only a comprehensive scheme but most of the provinces of Canada, and I still have very grave doubts that the terms of the bill will be very encouraging to the provinces in this respect.

The minister indicated that there had already been some suggestion that even during this session the province of Manitoba might accept the proposition and introduce a bill. I have very grave doubts about that. I think that was a pretty quick reply. The provincial minister of agriculture actually admitted in the interview that he had not read the bill. But I base my suggestion that they will have a second look at the matter on some of the warnings that were given to the province by the provincial royal commission in 1955. I should like to read a few excerpts which I think will indicate to the house that no government would incur the kind of risks involved in crop insurance without a pretty thorough rather than a casual appreciation of what is involved. On page 76 of the Manitoba commission report I find the following:

> A member of the Manitoba crop insurance commission interviewed the manager and other top executives of the F.C.I.C. in Washington, D.C., during the course of this investigation. It was found that these people were unanimous in the view that an area the size of Manitoba, which grows predominantly small grains, subject to similar hazards, would run grave risks in establishing a crop insurance program. They felt there would be a dangerous geographic and crop variety concentration of risks. "No one area can stand alone"—

Another person interviewed in the United States organization is quoted as saying:

> In my judgment it would be foolhardy for Manitoba to set up a crop insurance program alone.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

> There should, theoretically, be some prospect of making it work if all of Canada was in it, but in a state or province there simply would not be enough spreading of risks.

In addition, in the conclusions of the Manitoba royal commission found on page 83 of their report we find the following:

> It is not realistic to suppose that a crop insurance program started in a period of good crop years, and limited to Manitoba, would build up the needed reserves. Experience with the United States program has demonstrated that even in periods of high average yield, in small grains areas, heavy indemnity demands are made against the assets of a program. The constant drain against premium assets in an all-risk program successfully frustrates the building up of the enormous reserves in good years that would be required to carry a program over a period of low yield years.
> Crop insurance modelled on the F.C.I.C. program (the only operating crop insurance program on the continent) instituted and underwritten by the farmers and government of the province of Manitoba, will not resolve the problem of the instability of farm income. In the event of a series of crop experiences such as have previously occurred in this province, there is no apparently available body of assets or resources substantial enough to maintain a crop insurance program, either voluntary or compulsory, in a solvent state.

I think the minister of agriculture in Manitoba and the provincial treasurer, who is himself the premier, will have a fairly good look at this report. This theme that no one province could go it alone, that it must be on a national basis spreading the risk, is very prominent in all the royal commission reports in the prairie provinces. The Alberta report in 1935 said this:

> The Alberta committee said that financial obligations involved and the difficulties of putting a satisfactory crop insurance scheme into operation were subsequently considered too great for any one province to undertake, and, accordingly, the matter was left in abeyance.

In Saskatchewan we had on June 29 a statement as to the need for federal-provincial responsibility, and that the ultimate risk in their view would have to be on the part of the federal government. Even our federal authorities under Mr. Hanson made a report some time ago. He stressed the fact that crop insurance was not practical without a substantial federal responsibility.

I am greatly disappointed, as I said, that the minister—momentarily, I hope—has fixed his mind against the possibility of having this new and important bill investigated by a committee of this house. I point out to him that this legislation runs contrary to the recommendations that were made to the cabinet when they met the major farm organizations in February of this year. The interprovincial farm union on February 16, 1959 said:

> We hope that farm organizations will be given an opportunity to study and make recommendations on any proposed plan before it reaches the floor of the house.

It has reached the house but I am sure they would still want an opportunity to make their views known. I suggest to the minister that a refusal to hear these farm organizations and get their views after the terms of the bill are made known is inconsistent with the practice we have followed when major matters of this kind are introduced. For instance, I contrast this procedure with what was done with respect to farm credit legislation. The minister will recall that when amendments were made to the Canadian Farm Loan Act in 1956 we had before us representatives of all the major farm organizations. They were before the parliamentary committee. That procedure was followed again even with respect to minor amendments in 1958. In addition to that, in the case of farm credit we have all had extensive and recent briefs from these organizations. However, that is not true with respect to the matter of crop insurance. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture also met the members of the government early this year, on February 12, and this is what they said:

> We heartily approve and endorse the government's intention to introduce a national program of crop insurance. We believe that an all-risk plan should be made available involving federal and provincial government, as well as producer, participation.

But this is the point.

> We further request that in setting up such schemes farm organizations be consulted.

I think it would be an extremely perilous policy to force through this important bill without taking the opportunity of hearing not only these organizations but some of the experts in the provinces, because the provinces are the key to the implementation of anything resulting from this legislation.

I think the Minister of Agriculture has been reasonably fair and modest in outlining the hopes and expectations entertained for this legislation, but I am quite confident that we obtained from the minister of northern affairs on June 29 a fairly good idea of what is going to be said across the land with respect to this untried and unfamiliar legislation. As reported at page 5235 of Hansard the minister of northern affairs said this was another promise made to the people and another promise kept. If this is not something that is going to be accepted by a substantial number of provinces, it is certainly an empty gesture indeed. I think we should know whether or not the terms in the bill are adequate to bring in a substantial number of the people to whom the minister referred.

I want just to read some of the comments that we are going to hear frequently and not only from the minister of northern affairs who is fairly good at making exaggerated statements. This is the kind of comment we are going to hear. I am quoting from page 5235 of Hansard:

> All the way through this report—

He was referring to the Saskatchewan report.

> —you sense a great need of people living in a drought area for help in the form of an insurance scheme to guard against some of the risk due to weather. Those people who know something about farming in the dry land areas of the United States and Canada know the great hardships that were suffered by the people in the 30's when there was no such thing as a crop insurance program to provide some help. As a group of people in Canada we were forced to accept relief from the rest of the people of this country. That relief was given in a very generous and Christian fashion but it did something to many of our people that some of us will never forget. That is why there are many in the house today, not the least of whom is the Prime Minister, who led a group of us who said that if we ever had anything to do with running the affairs of the country we would make a tremendous effort to set up some scheme whereby the farmers of western Canada and any other area that needed help could have it on a self-supporting basis so that men's feelings and integrity would be left whole. Therefore this crop insurance legislation is to some of us the fulfilment of a dream long before us.

He emphasized the need of people in drought areas. Mr. Speaker, all the evidence before the royal commissions indicated that these particular people would be excluded from any crop insurance scheme if it was to be actuarially sound, something which the Minister of Agriculture has been emphasizing. I should just like to establish that point by one or two quotations. Let us look at recommendation No. 28 of the Saskatchewan report. They say that in two out of the three areas in Saskatchewan it is not expected that 60 per cent insurance could be provided at premium rates which the farmers could afford to pay. Therefore they would continue to depend on P.F.A.A., the legislation which, from the remarks of the minister of northern affairs, on a relief basis he says this bill will eliminate.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The P.F.A.A. will still be there.

Mr. Benidickson: Of course the P.F.A.A. will still be there, but my point is this. From reading this eloquence of the minister of northern affairs—which I am sure is typical of the speeches he is making in Saskatchewan—one would judge that a majority of the farmers in Saskatchewan are going to find this legislation more attractive than the P.F.A.A. The report itself says—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That is the actual case. The majority of farmers in Saskatchewan want this.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister made that point. He quoted from the public hearings referred to in the Saskatchewan report. I assume the minister knows that certainly when there were public hearings, farmers said they would like to have a scheme of crop insurance, and both commissions reported that no representations from farmers indicated that they had any appreciation of the ratio of possible premiums to the benefits they would expect to receive to make an act worth while. In both reports it is very clear indeed that while there was wishful thinking, those interviewed in the public hearings certainly confessed that they could not afford the rates which, if this scheme is to be actuarially sound, would have to be favoured.

I was pleased to read that with respect to insuring wheat alone the record and the experience in the United States had been encouraging. In the United States, according to page 94 of the Saskatchewan commission report, from 1948 through the disastrous wheat year of 1954 the wheat insurance program showed a modest deficit of $4.6 million. During this period nearly $82 million was paid to farmers in the form of wheat indemnities. Nearly all of this, $77 million, was contributed by wheat farmers in the form of premiums. In 1952 the average insured wheat farmer was afforded protection of $15.07 per acre at a cost of $1.25 an acre. This was an average premium cost of less than 7 per cent of coverage. But the point is, as the Minister of Agriculture himself said, that only about 27 per cent or 29 per cent of wheat growers in the United States actually are insured. In Saskatchewan one would judge from reading the commission's report that the premiums would likely be so high that certainly in two of the three major districts where they propose to have a pilot scheme they would find they would have to rely on P.F.A.A. rather than pay the rates which would be necessary if we were to have an actuarially sound system.

Page 16 of the Manitoba report makes reference to possible premiums:

> Perhaps one of the most valuable contributions made by those attending the hearings was the indication, that they were able to give, as to how far they, as farmers, would be prepared to go in the payment of premiums to secure what they would consider adequate protection. Although most indicated their desire to have the program self-supporting, with the exception of administrative costs, it soon became evident to the commission that there was little realization of the over-all costs and hazards which would be inextricably bound into any crop insurance program, and that there was a widespread tendency to think in terms of premiums and coverage that would prove, over an extended period of time, to be precariously out of balance in terms of a workable program.

The Saskatchewan commission came to exactly the same conclusion.

I mentioned the other day that it seems from the United States experience that with a voluntary scheme coverage is not very impressive. The Manitoba report at page 41 indicates the scope of effective insurance that has developed down there; and as of 1954, the date indicated in the Manitoba report of 1955, it is said that only one third of a million of producers out of 5.3 million farmers in the United States were insured. In addition they reported that out of a farm crop value of $15 billion, only $400 million was insured. So even there, with a scheme which has been in effect for 20 years, we still have pretty small participation.

I have already made some reference to the claim of the Minister of Agriculture that this is a generous and likely to be an attractive scheme. I do not think that is the case. The commission certainly was very concerned about the ultimate responsibility, notwithstanding that in the end over a long period of time the scheme was supposed to be self-supporting. In the Manitoba report there is the indication that while crop insurance in the United States with respect to wheat was only available from 1939 on, they made a rough calculation, such as the minister did, going back to 1926 and said they had used what they thought a fairly safe premium rate, but when they analysed the likely results over a long period of time from 1926 to 1954 it indicated that in one state alone, the state of North Dakota, the loss would be $100 million. This is the thing which is frightening to the provinces, and I do not think the minister's proposals in this bill are adequate to induce these provinces to get into the scheme, desirable though we all agree it is.

My main point is this. The minister is making a contribution of 50 per cent to administrative expenses. Those are entirely borne by the federal government in the United States. The real contingent liability that he speaks of as being generous and onerous is a loan. If there is disaster the loan eventually has to be paid. In addition, the minister is unilaterally taking upon himself the decision as to what is or what is not actuarially sound. In other words he is in control of the premium rates, and he will not contribute unless he and his advisers are satisfied that over a long period of time it is likely to be actuarially sound.

If he has control of the soundness of the scheme I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that instead of a loan of 75 per cent the federal government, being in the driver's seat on rates, should not make a loan leaving this heavy contingent liability on the provinces to scare them off acceptance of a scheme of this kind, but rather should assume this liability because they actually are the ones who decide the terms of payment by the producers. That is established, of course, in clause 5 of the bill, where the governor in council has full jurisdiction with respect to this matter of actuarial soundness.

If that is so I do not think the scheme will be very workable or very acceptable to the provinces if they are obliged to repay this substantial risk, without any proviso that it will only have to be paid back if there is some failure or some lack of wisdom on their part in setting up the matter. But the real essence is the actuarial soundness. If the minister is satisfied that it is actuarially sound on a long term basis, I say that it should not be a loan, it should be a guarantee. On that basis we might get the kind of national participation for which one would hope if a scheme of this kind is to be worth while.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I think the legislation before the house and the method by which it has been introduced can be very strongly and severely criticized. This legislation has been introduced, in the words of the Minister of Agriculture, without discussion with the provinces, without prior consultation and without agreeing to the request of certain provinces that this whole matter should be considered at a formal federal-provincial conference.

Mr. Harkness: What provinces are those?

Mr. Argue: Saskatchewan asked for it.

Mr. Harkness: That is the only one.

Mr. Argue: That is a very interesting comment from the Minister of Agriculture, because I have had on the order paper since June 1, I believe, a motion asking for the production of correspondence with the provinces with reference to the introduction of a crop insurance plan. The minister has failed to produce that correspondence in more than a month, yet in reference to a statement I have made, namely that at least one province has asked for this, he is giving us this bit by bit information which should have been included in the tabling of that return.

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member will permit, the minister of agriculture for Saskatchewan asked for this at the last dominion-provincial meeting we had, and he has asked for such conferences on every conceivable agricultural subject at every one of those meetings.

Mr. Argue: And, of course, this has been asked by representatives of the farm organizations. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River stated a few moments ago, and read quotations in support of his statement, that such a study and such a meeting had been requested by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and by other farm organizations. I have in my hand an excerpt from the Moose Jaw Times-Herald of July 6, which reads:

> Saskatoon (CP)—The new crop insurance legislation introduced by agriculture minister Harkness should go to the agricultural committee of the commons, says A. P. Gleave, chairman of the interprovincial farm union council.
> "I wrote Mr. Harkness twice asking him to refer the bill to the committee, because farm unions and other organizations should have an opportunity to present their views and any recommendations they may have regarding the new legislation," Mr. Gleave said today in a statement.
> Although he has had no opportunity yet to study the bill, Mr. Gleave said it appears that under the new act the federal government may actually contribute less to the over-all costs of crop insurance than it did under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.
> "It is a mistake to rush so important a piece of legislation through the dying hours of the session of parliament," he added.

The Minister of Agriculture has told us that he has had this matter under study for two years—that officials in his department had been studying it for two years—and although the federal government's contribution by way of premiums constitutes only 20 per cent, and the amount of contributions by the provinces and/or the farmers is 80 per cent, the government fails to discuss its general proposals with the provinces.

I think this is an instance in which the federal government is apparently endeavouring to promote the worst kind of federal-provincial relations. I cannot express too strongly my feeling that the government has made a very serious and very grave mistake in the method by which it has introduced this legislation. The provincial treasurer of the province of Saskatchewan has called it, according to a statement in last night's Citizen, "one of the greatest insults ever inflicted on provincial governments by the federal government within my memory." There have been further comments by the provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan to which I shall make reference after the lunch hour.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that the federal-provincial conference is drawing to a close, that the provincial treasurers are likely to meet this fall, probably in October, and that it is anticipated that from this meeting there will flow a dominion-provincial conference with all the provincial premiers in attendance; a formal conference at an early date, perhaps during the present year. I would suggest that this measure should be stood over, that it should be made part of the agenda of the federal-provincial conference which I understand is slated for October or later this year.

This legislation could then be brought out into the open, the views of the premiers and provincial treasurers could be obtained, and we could have a discussion by the governments concerned which must implement this legislation.

The treasurer of the province of Saskatchewan has called this the greatest insult to the provinces in his memory. That is very strong language, the strongest language I can remember since the Prime Minister was on this side of the house castigating the former administration for failing to take the provinces into consultation before announcing government policy.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, at one o'clock I was criticizing the government for not having a federal-provincial conference to deal with the whole question of crop insurance. To show how ridiculous has been the attitude of the government in failing to call such a conference, one needs only mention that there has been going on in this city for the last two days a federal-provincial conference at the provincial treasurers' level. This conference could easily have been extended to include ministers of agriculture. Those ministers of the various provinces could have come to Ottawa. The present conference could have been continued for some time longer in order to work out an agreed crop insurance scheme that would not have the defects of the present bill and that would have had the active and wholehearted co-operation of, I would think, at least the majority of the provinces because they had been consulted and their ideas sought.

This morning the Minister of Agriculture made some critical statements regarding Mr. Robert Moon of the press gallery. I notice that the minister quoted the Winnipeg Free Press. He said, "This is the best known Liberal newspaper in western Canada and I call it as my witness." He then made critical statements regarding a man in the press gallery who is the correspondent for two other well-known daily newspapers in western Canada that have been in the past and are today in general support of the Liberal party.

If one reads on in the article written by Mr. Robert Moon one finds some definition of how farmers under this bill will in fact become ineligible for prairie farm assistance. Certainly the bombshell in this legislation is that any farmer who wishes to enrol in a crop insurance scheme automatically and by law has his right to obtain benefits under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act taken from him.

Mr. Harkness: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is it not a fact that the Saskatchewan royal commission which dealt with crop insurance recommended that if a crop insurance scheme was put into effect, P.F.A.A. levies not be taken and P.F.A.A. payments not be made?

Mr. Argue: That was based on the key recommendation of the commission, as I understand it, that a crop insurance scheme should in fact be a federal scheme in the main under which the federal government would accept the major responsibility. If the minister had brought in a measure that complied with the report of the royal commission of which he appears to be in such great support, he would have been accepting the major responsibility instead of endeavouring by this bill to unload the main financial responsibility on the provinces. Any argument as to the recommendations of the Saskatchewan royal commission falls to the ground as far as the minister's point of view is concerned because of the central fact that this government is not complying with the principal recommendation contained in that report.

I have referred to Mr. Robert Moon. Although I am not always in agreement with everything that is reported by him, I think in general Mr. Moon of the press gallery is a conscientious and accurate reporter. I have in my hand a report in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix written by this gentleman, in which he makes reference to certain statements made by the provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan, Mr. C. M. Fines. Here is what is said in part:

> During his presentation, Mr. Fines also made direct allusion to the recent federal crop insurance proposals when he said that too often the federal government when dealing with such programs had evolved them without consulting the provinces.
> Mr. Fines' declarations on centralization were the strongest in this field by Saskatchewan in at least several years at federal-provincial fiscal meetings.
> "To do this is to treat the provincial governments as though they were branch offices of the federal government," Mr. Fines said.
> "There is a price which must be paid for effective federal-provincial relations and for the willing co-operation of the provincial governments in solving national problems; that price is to take the provinces into the confidence of the federal government even if to do so is to lose some of the political advantage which comes from unilateral action."

This is an example of the failure of the government to consult with the provinces.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question. From what is he reading and from where did he get it?

Mr. Argue: I notice the great interest of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I am quoting from a press dispatch from the press gallery sent to the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix. While I have not checked with Mr. Fines as to whether or not he made these statements I would think, in spite of the great criticism of the Minister of Agriculture concerning this reporter, that the statements are in fact accurate and represent not only the opinion of Mr. Fines with respect to crop insurance but are an expression of a sound attitude toward federal-provincial relations.

There is another gentleman I should like to quote on the question of federal-provincial relations. I submit that is one of the key questions in the way the crop insurance measure has been handled; because if anything were designed by the federal government to impede federal-provincial relations, to put a gun to the head of the provinces and to act in an arbitrary, unilateral and highhanded manner, then this is indeed a classic example. I should like to quote from the Prime Minister in former days, from a statement he made in this house on July 24, 1956, as reported at page 6370 of Hansard:

> I think it is fair to say that the attitude taken by the government at the last conference was an arbitrary one.

In that case there was a conference. I continue:

> The government simply said, "These are the terms". No opportunity was given for amendment or for amelioration of any terms. The recipe for a division of taxation was as final as the laws of the Medes and Persians; and how similar that attitude was to the attitude of the government in this house, which is that power makes perfect anything they do. There was no opportunity for negotiation—

And how prophetic these words were in relation to this very bill.

> —there was simply the attitude of a feudal lord bringing into being a modern feudalism and laying down the law to the vassals.

Well, this indeed is a very eloquent expression and description of precisely what this government has done and of its attitude in bringing in this legislation. There may have been clandestine discussions with the minister of agriculture of the province of Manitoba; but if the minister of agriculture of Manitoba was brought into some earlier discussions as far as crop insurance is concerned, then apparently he was the only one because there is no evidence that the government discussed these proposals, as it should have discussed them, with the provinces before presenting this detailed measure.

One of the great mistakes that is being made in this legislation is that the federal government has decided to pay only 20 per cent of the premium. In other words the federal government's financial obligation, apart from its share of the administration costs, is 20 per cent of the premium, while under prairie farm assistance legislation, which has been on the statute books of this country since 1939, the federal government's share in practice has been some 50 per cent.

The basis of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is far different from the basis of this legislation. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act applies to three provinces. We in this group have advocated on many occasions that it should be extended to all provinces. It deals with specialized crop areas where crop failure is a hazard. We have advocated that its benefits should be extended to farmers in all provinces; but it is in fact an arrangement between the agricultural producers and the federal government, and without question it has worked for the benefit of the producers who have been allowed to benefit from it.

In the present legislation before the house the federal government, instead of providing for payment of anywhere near 50 per cent, is asking the provinces along with the producers to pay 80 per cent of the cost and the federal government to pay just 20 per cent.

This is not the whole story. Any provincial government coming into this scheme must bear in any given year, according to the legislation, the total losses that occur in that province. Although Saskatchewan is the agricultural province in western Canada, which has experienced the most widespread crop failures and has had paid to its producers the largest amounts, Saskatchewan has not been consulted in any way.

Let us look at the Prairie Farm Assistance Act report for the crop year 1957-58. Let us look back a few years. One finds that in 1954 payments were made to producers in the province of Saskatchewan totalling almost $22 million. If we had a crop insurance program that included the vast majority—which this one does not hope to do—of farmers within that province alone, if the amount of insurance went up to 60 per cent of the average yield then of course the provincial treasury of Saskatchewan could be called upon to pay perhaps $40 million or $50 million in benefits in a single year.

The federal government refuses to share the losses in any way, shape or form. All the federal government proposes to do in this legislation is to provide loans to the provinces, and the loans that will be provided by the federal government would apparently carry an extremely high rate of interest. Therefore the federal government, instead of embarking upon an improved, far-reaching program to provide crop failure protection, or crop failure insurance, is endeavouring to transfer a part of the responsibility it has accepted in the past under prairie farm assistance to the provinces which are unable to accept it without risking their financial solvency, because of the great liability and the great charges that may occur under such a scheme.

This program, Mr. Speaker, is also wanting in that the plan is of little or no benefit to producers who suffer most from crop failure; it is of little or no benefit to producers who live in the high risk areas. As a matter of fact, under this program the government apparently has a desire to divide the farmers of Canada into two classes, namely those who live in high risk areas who cannot afford to come under the proposed scheme, and those who do not face the same type or the same degree of crop failure risks, farmers who operate the more productive land areas which can be covered by such a proposed plan.

How we have heard members opposite during the course of this session say they were interested in the small farmer; they were interested in the farmer with a low income; they were interested in the farmer whose production was not as high as that of some other farmers; they in fact were interested in the farmer who needed the greatest amount of consideration. Well, under this legislation farmers in areas facing the greatest degree of crop failure risk will not be able to obtain in any substantial measure whatever benefit or whatever protection may be provided.

On many occasions the minister has referred to the Saskatchewan royal commission report on crop insurance. If this legislation is designed according to the examples that are set forth in that royal commission report then it is going to create many of the problems that prairie farm assistance has been endeavouring to overcome for many years. For example, in the insurance proposal set forth it says there shall be a premium unit, there shall be crop delivery points, and that farmers within that area will pay the same premium. The Minister of Agriculture is sufficiently well acquainted with western Canada to know that from farm to farm productivity varies very substantially within an area where the farmers market their grain at a central delivery point; and to calculate premiums even on the basis of this type of unit is less fair, I suggest, than the prairie farm assistance method of collecting 1 per cent of deliverable production as it goes to market.

I do not think that is as serious as the further provision in these examples having to do with an indemnity unit. If the minister wishes to correct my interpretation of these examples I will be very pleased if he will do so. But as I interpret the calculations in these examples the indemnity unit is the same area as the premium unit, and in order to ascertain the premium that would be required in this unit it is assumed that the indemnity is paid on the unit. We are all aware of the great criticism in the past when areas for payment under prairie farm assistance were substantially larger than they are now, and farmers complained that although they had a crop failure they were unable to get assistance while some of their neighbours who were in a unit where payment was made and who had a relatively good crop nevertheless obtained prairie farm assistance. If the indemnity unit is to be as it is set forth in these examples then payment will not be made on an individual basis at all.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think the hon. member needs to go any further along that line. I think I made it quite clear that what is envisaged here is individual crop insurance, not on a unit basis nor an area basis.

Mr. Argue: I understand that is the position of the minister, but I am referring to the examples set forth by the Saskatchewan royal commission on which their rates for premiums and indemnity are calculated and which have been used by the minister. What I am pointing out is that in these calculations they have not calculated payment on an individual basis but on an area basis. I accept the minister's statement, and may I say that I did not think differently; but I suggest this means that if in actual practice payments are made on an individual basis, then the premium required to meet such payments will be higher than the premium set forth in the examples given in the Saskatchewan royal commission report.

The legislation before the house is very loosely worded. Under this legislation the government can—indeed, I take it the government intends to do so—make agreements with the provinces that are not in any general standard form at all but probably will differ very much in important aspects. The minister said in the course of the debate that in setting up the unit which would be covered under this legislation the government would require 25 per cent of the farm units within an insured unit to be covered under the legislation. I have looked through the bill and nowhere do I find any reference to the 25 per cent. Although this is a major factor and one which restricts the coverage of the legislation, I find no mention of the 25 per cent in the legislation itself.

Mr. Benidickson: Government by order in council.

Mr. Argue: This is another case of the government bringing in an omnibus, loosely worded, inexact bill under which the cabinet can discriminate, change its mind and if it wishes ignore the very important statement made by the Minister of Agriculture, namely that 25 per cent of the producers in an area must take out crop insurance in order for the area itself to be covered.

There is no question but that for agricultural producers in most parts of Canada some method of crop failure protection, crop failure assistance, crop insurance, if you wish, is required. The minister has quite rightly said that there has been a great deal of interest in the subject over the years and that many royal commissions have studied the problem, but I suggest that under proper government practice it is elementary to discuss with the provincial governments that will be involved in this kind of legislation the type of legislation with respect to which they would like to co-operate with the federal government in order to bring about benefits to the farmers.

Instead, the government has taken an arbitrary, high-handed attitude. It has taken the position that was criticized so many times by the former leader of the opposition, Hon. George Drew, as a take it or leave it attitude. I suggest that by its arbitrary action the government is bringing federal-provincial relations to the lowest state in which they have been in many years.

According to the announcement of the Minister of Agriculture the government is prepared, based on an opinion from the Department of Justice, to ignore the very precise sections of the Agricultural Stabilization Act. I would say that the announcement by the Minister of Agriculture this morning is an open declaration by the government that it is prepared to break its own law, that it is prepared to take away from agricultural producers the support prices that have been guaranteed to them.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member is not discussing crop insurance in any shape or form. He is talking about the price support measure.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I am putting this forward as another example of how the government has changed, how the Conservative party has changed over the years.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): And how ridiculous you are.

Mr. Argue: Just a little over two years ago when they were on this side of the house they were the champions of the rights of parliament, the champions of federal-provincial relations on a consultative and co-operative basis. Now the government has taken an arbitrary, dictatorial attitude which, even if it was not designed to do so, will certainly result in a worsening of federal-provincial relations; and in the statement made by the minister this morning the government has shown a callous disregard of the very law of this country.

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the last two members who have spoken on this subject I have only one observation to make. Perhaps it is not original but I think it is appropriate. Forgive them, Mr. Speaker, for they know not what they say. I should like to deal with the subject of crop insurance for a change, and I am sure that hon. members here today would like to have an opportunity to discuss the bill now before the house rather than to ramble on discussing provincial issues and attempting to lay the foundation for a provincial election.

In order to put the whole matter in its proper perspective I want to read from the report of the dominion-provincial economic conference of 1950, which dealt with the subject and made some recommendations with respect to crop insurance. The report goes on in introducing the subject—and it is the introduction that I want to read—to say this:

> The application of crop insurance as an income-maintenance device introduces many complex implications. It can be made comparable to social security, unemployment insurance or calamity insurance, (flood, fires, etc.) depending on the objectives of particular crop insurance programs. Furthermore, it can be a partial application of each of these types of program (in terms of the proportion of income insured). It may assume, in its various garbs, the status of a self-supporting or subsidized program and participation can be voluntary or compulsory. All of these choices depend on primary objectives adopted and on an over-all conception of the functions and uses of crop insurance.
> In this study the major assumption adopted is that crop insurance is a self-liquidating type of insurance based on sound actuarial data. As such, crop insurance is related directly to production rather than considerations of welfare or security. It should be designed to treat individual operators facing similar risks in a similar fashion without subsidizing inefficiency or penalizing efficiency. Welfare payments, where necessary, should be dealt with outside the scheme of crop insurance and should be treated as a social security scheme rather than related primarily to productivity.
> Crop insurance has been a fairly lively issue in Canada for approximately two decades and particularly so in western Canada. Considerable effort has been spent from time to time in presenting arguments pro and con various proposals. In many cases crop insurance has been overemphasized as a solution to the very fundamental problem of instability in agriculture. It is essential that this too be seen in its proper perspective. Taken by itself, crop insurance is merely a device to take a portion of production which has taken place unevenly over a period of years and to return that part or premium in such a fashion that the producers' annual yields approach a figure which represents a long-term average annual production or some percentage of that production. It is necessary, therefore, that the average production represent a suitable level of income for the individual farmer. Unfortunately, there are many instances throughout Canada where even the guarantee of an annual production approximating a long-term average will not, in all cases, result in a satisfactory return. Paradoxically, these areas need insurance most but are least able to afford the premium rate necessary to pay for a proper level of insurance. Areas other than these have not as great a need for insurance but can, nevertheless, use it to advantage since it offers them cheap protection. These observations seem to indicate that a concerted attack on more fundamental factors will have to be made before crop insurance can be successfully applied in those areas which need stability most.

I might say that this report, as I stated before, was drawn up in 1950. Since this government has come to office it has dealt with those aspects of instability that it has been necessary to deal with in order to complement a crop insurance program and to ensure the success of crop insurance.

One of the main criticisms that have been levelled at the P.F.A.A. over the years has been the fact that some farmers who have made contributions to the scheme since 1939 have been unsuccessful in collecting indemnities or payments when they have suffered crop failures. In suggesting that we should continue with an expanded program of P.F.A.A., as the hon. member for Assiniboia has done, what is he actually contemplating? It seems to me that what he is saying is this, and I am sure he would not make an effort to sell this type of insurance to a householder or to a person interested in life insurance. What it actually means is that it is a type of insurance policy that says you will not collect a nickel's worth of insurance when your house burns down unless 18 of the houses on the same street burn down at the same time; or that your wife will not collect a nickel's worth of insurance when you die unless 18 of your neighbours die the same year. I am sure that he or anyone else would have difficulty in attempting to sell that type of insurance to a home owner or to a person who is interested in life insurance.

I have no criticism of the purpose of P.F.A.A. when it was first brought into being. It was enacted to deal with a situation that existed in the thirties, namely that of drought. In dealing with that particular situation, where invariably you would have a wide area affected, it could conceivably cover most of the farmers in the areas stricken. However, the situation that has existed, particularly in the province of Manitoba, has been one of local failure where there has not been an opportunity for a farmer suffering local crop losses to participate in benefits or to receive payments under P.F.A.A.

Mr. Benidickson: Individual payments.

Mr. Jorgenson: As a result they have been unable to receive any payments under P.F.A.A. These are the people who during the year 1954, when the Manitoba crop insurance commission were travelling throughout the province holding hearings and receiving briefs from farmers and farm organizations, made representations to the commission. I might say that of the 45 briefs that were presented—and not all of them were written—24 favoured a system of crop insurance, 5 were opposed to it and 8 gave qualified support. I think this is an indication of the interest in crop insurance in the province of Manitoba.

I also want to say that at page 14 of the report, in the second paragraph, this is stated:

> It was evident, however, that farmers were anxious to stand on their own feet and to pay for their own protection. They were fearful of extensive indemnity claims in the first few years of any crop insurance program that might be adopted, and the feeling was that if a plan was safely launched and a reserve built up, barring a succession of crop disasters, crop insurance should function successfully in Manitoba.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the hon. member read the third paragraph on that page?

Mr. Jorgenson: The third paragraph deals with the premiums that were suggested. It deals with questions raised by the commission as to what premium rates farmers might be prepared to pay under an insurance program. I do not intend to read it or to do other than to say that the farmers who made representation at that time, as indicated by the report, perhaps were not too fully aware themselves of what the premiums would be.

I think that is uderstandable. I do not think there is any criticism there. I recall that at that time I presented a brief myself and this question was asked me; and I shall state quite frankly that I was unable to say what I thought the premium rate in my own area would be. However, I think this is beside the point. What this bill is doing—and I think this is the important thing and that the point has been missed—or what this government is doing is providing an opportunity for a provincial government to draw up a program of crop insurance suited to the particular needs of that province, and permitting the farmers in the area to make some contribution to the development of that program.

It has been stated by most of the commissions or bodies that have been studying this particular subject that one province attempting to go into a crop insurance program by itself would in all probability find itself in difficulties if it had a succession of failures in the early part of the program. Therefore the recommendations of the Manitoba commission, the Saskatchewan commission and of many of the reports that have been drawn up have been to the effect that the federal government must participate in this program. On no occasion has any of these commissions suggested that the federal government has to be in complete control of the development of the entire program.

What we are doing is simply providing financial assistance to the provinces in the event that they have crop failures in the initial stages of their program. In addition to this the government is paying 50 per cent of the administrative costs. The federal government is doing, in addition, something that has been suggested by no commission in connection with this program, in that the government is going to pay 20 per cent of the premiums of the farmers.

This is quite important. This suggestion has been criticized by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I have not been in this house too long, but those of us who have been here during the last two years know full well that it would not matter if the government paid 250 per cent of the premiums, the hon. member would still find something about which to complain.

I might say that I was in Manitoba just two weeks ago, and my attention has been called to the fact that the press gallery noted my absence on one particular night. At that time, in my particular part of the province, only 10 per cent of the land had been seeded because of flood conditions. The farmers arranged a series of meetings for me to attend, and at each of those meetings there was a considerable amount of interest in crop insurance. Although I was unable to give them details of the program at that time, I told them a crop insurance bill was being introduced and that it would be passed at this session.

They are anxious to have this bill put through this house. They are anxious that the provincial government in Manitoba develop a crop insurance program for that province so that next year, if the same situation exists in my constituency, they can be covered by a comprehensive crop insurance program. I did not find, amongst those farmers the attitude that was expressed by the hon. member for Assiniboia, that they are afraid to pay the premium rates. As indicated in this report of the Manitoba commission, the farmers are anxious to stand on their own feet. All they are looking for is an opportunity to take out a crop insurance policy so they can be protected from the hazards with which they are confronted from time to time.

Although we all know these things are not always perfect, I am satisfied that the bill is acceptable to the province of Manitoba. I am satisfied that as a result of this legislation we will have crop insurance in the province next year. I take a great deal of pleasure in participating, just briefly, in this debate. I should like to congratulate the minister upon bringing this measure forward and upon having the courage, despite all the procrastination that has occurred in connection with crop insurance over the years, to introduce a measure providing an opportunity for the provinces to develop programs suitable to the needs of their farmers.

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, on the introduction of this bill, I feel it is my duty to make certain remarks and ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), certain information which might throw additional light on a governmental project that will have fortunate or unfortunate consequences, both for the farmer and for the taxpayer.

First, I must say that we favour the principle of crop insurance legislation, because the idea originated with the Liberal party, at its convention held in January 1958. The measure is the logical consequence of a farm policy cleverly planned when the fate of Canadian agriculture was in the hands of the Right Hon. James Gardiner. Second, we favour that legislation, which we shall be called upon to approve, because we wish to protect the farmer against certain losses which he might incur on account of floods, hail or any other natural causes which could involve losses for him.

What is the scope of that legislation? It is very difficult to imagine it at this stage, because major changes to it might be introduced. So far, the statements made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) look much more like election promises than statements of policy.

In fact, if we compare the statements made by the Prime Minister last year with the principle of the bill, we note that there is some confusion. The Prime Minister stated in the house on August 30 last, as recorded on page 4346 of Hansard:

—the government is studying the problem in consultation with the provinces, and hopes, as a result of this study of this very complex and difficult problem, to introduce at the next session of parliament, legislation in co-operation with the provinces which are prepared to join, to provide for a comprehensive crop insurance program. It has been one of the demands of farmers in general throughout the years that something be done to protect them within reason against the uncertainties to which agriculture is subjected.

A little later, that is on September 6, 1958, when, naturally, the session was drawing to a close, and the right hon. Prime Minister wanted to leave a good impression on the minds of the farmers, he stated:

When the next session arrives we intend to introduce a measure for which the farmers have asked from the earliest days in western Canada, something which has also been requested by farmers in other parts of Canada, an insurance plan to bring about the assurance of at least a modicum of income, that degree of income which will not cost the farmer too much to assure himself of, and through which during the dark days of drought the farmer may be assured of at least a fair and reasonable rate of return. That is one of the things that came about under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. That met the situation in the western provinces to a degree. That legislation was placed on the statute books as a result of the initiative of the Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner. It has been expanded, it has served a successful purpose and has been beneficial. Farmers generally are today asking for something further in that direction and it is because they are asking for that we intend to provide the opportunity at the next session of parliament of taking this further step.

If we compare the Prime Minister's statement with the contents of this bill, it is easy to infer that government policy with regard to crop insurance is not well defined.

As indicated in the explanatory note:

The purpose of this bill is to authorize contributions and loans out of the consolidated revenue fund in respect of the operation of provincial schemes for crop insurance.

In short, the result of that legislation will be that provinces, and the farmers who will wish to avail themselves of that program, will both share a burden which will be the consequence of a government having but a single purpose, that of shelving its election promises.

In the statement made this morning by the Minister of Agriculture, and in the one made recently by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton), reference was made to western farmers' problems, and examples were given about wheat producers in western Canada. However, no reference was made to problems facing farmers in eastern Canada. Yet, eastern farmers, like those in western Canada, are expecting much from this legislation. They will be disappointed if it is not properly amended. The main points of the bill may be summed up as follows:

1. The federal government will pay half the administration costs of the act.

2. The federal government will pay 20 per cent of premiums paid by farmers.

3. The federal government will pay 75 per cent of the amount required for promised indemnities, minus $200,000.

Another point which it is important to emphasize under the circumstances, is that provinces are free to accept or reject the plan.

According to what the Minister of Agriculture said, quite a few provinces are not expected to share in this plan.

I want to quote the words of the Minister of Agriculture in this house, on July 22, 1958, which can be found on page 2537 of the official record. Answering a question asked by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who, as everybody knows, is very familiar with agriculture, the minister said at the time:

The hon. gentleman will recall that approximately two months ago a meeting was held in Ottawa of all provincial ministers of agriculture. One of the matters discussed at that meeting was the question of crop insurance. I might say that the result of that meeting has been to complicate the situation because a number of provinces expressed no interest whatever in a system of crop insurance. I might point out that some provinces were interested, others were lukewarm and others displayed no interest at all.

But what it means, as I think the hon. member is aware, is that in order to introduce an acceptable system of crop insurance it makes it very difficult to find a scheme which would be applicable in the various provinces to ensure that no province would have a complaint because too much money was being expended in another province, and so on. There is no doubt but that the extreme variability of climatic conditions across Canada makes the matter of a general dominion-wide crop insurance scheme an extraordinarily difficult problem to solve. However, as I say, we are working on it in the department and I hope that in the near future we can introduce legislation in respect of a crop insurance scheme.

We recognize, as does the Minister of Agriculture, that a law in respect of crop insurance will be difficult to apply in the provinces where there is mixed farming and weather conditions are varied. Mr. Speaker, if this principle is good for western wheat producers, it should likewise be so for farmers in eastern Canada.

On previous occasions I have given in this house instances of losses suffered by eastern farmers. I might give fresh examples of losses very recently experienced in the neighbourhood of Quebec and Victoriaville. Two weeks ago, in the counties of Megantic, Compton and Arthabaska there were floods which destroyed part of the farmers' crops.

As some of my fellow members suggested when this legislation was discussed at the resolution stage, the bill implies so many things and contains so many riddles that we seriously doubt whether the provinces will accept it. As a matter of fact, the minister himself realizes the extent of his difficulties. That is why we urged that the matter, which everybody considers very serious, be submitted to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Regardless of the study and recommendations which the committee would have been able to make after having heard the opinions of the various provinces, farmers' unions, or specialists in this field, the Minister of Agriculture chose to draw up the bill privately and to submit it to this house under an ingenious camouflage.

Indeed there are so many reservations in this bill that it might have been planned in such a way as to be unacceptable to the provinces, except the prairie provinces.

How many times did we not point out to the Minister of Agriculture that in several amendments to our agricultural statutes, the eastern provinces were being deliberately disregarded.

For instance, I am thinking of last year's amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

At the time, I pleaded in favour of eastern farmers, I stated that just like farmers in other provinces, they were exposed to losses resulting from "the uncertainties to which agriculture is subjected", to use the very words of the Prime Minister.

Even if the government is able to run the country without the province of Quebec, as was stated by the Minister of Commerce (Mr. Churchill) and by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, Quebec farmers are placing their hopes and their trust on the fairness and understanding of the Minister of Agriculture, if not on his wisdom.

We would have been pleased to hear the minister comment on the opinions expressed by the provinces in connection with this bill. The only thing he saw fit to say is contained in a reply he made to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) who had asked whether or not the provinces had been informed of his proposal.

The Minister of Agriculture's reply was evasive. He did not give the reply we would have expected. We know quite well that the provinces had not been informed of the costs they would have to bear under this scheme.

In view of the minister's attitude, there is little doubt that the federal government proposes to infringe upon the jurisdiction of the provinces by making them carry a burden that is too heavy for some of them.

The Minister of Agriculture also explained that a farmer who avails himself of this legislation will not qualify for help under the P.F.A.A. I cannot say what will be the reaction of western farmers when they are informed of the details of this legislation, but if I were one of them, I would be inclined to believe that the minister is trying to muddle up the situation by having two protection schemes, one more beneficial than the other, in a particular area, or vice versa.

In some cases, it will be in the farmer's interest to avail himself of the protection provided under the P.F.A.A., knowing that the premium will cost him only 1 per cent of the value of his crop, whereas under this act, the cost is much higher. And as the minister indicated this morning, the premium may possibly run from 7 to 16 per cent.

Of course, it is too soon to say—

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member would wish to have on the record something I did not say and which is not correct. I did not say anything about the fact that the premiums might vary between 7 and 16 per cent. Those were the figures I used when talking about hail insurance premiums. Those figures have nothing to do with what the premiums may be under this plan.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: This morning, the minister made comparisons purporting to show that insurance rates paid by western farmers to protect themselves against certain risks could vary from 8 to 16 per cent in the case of damages due to hail.

I presume that the Minister of Agriculture was satisfied to quote those figures, knowing that, by making comparisons, he meant that the crop insurance under study, at the rate of 8 to 16 per cent, would not be exaggerated. That is how we have understood his statement, Mr. Speaker.

Under the plan provided in the bill, the federal government provides for the payment of contributions and the grants of loans to provinces that set up their own crop insurance scheme. It is the same standard formula that is used when it is a question of distributing the economic and social responsibilities between provincial and federal governments. That method—one that is often referred to—is considered a socializing one in certain quarters. Besides, it requires, on the part of the governments, continuous supervision together with considerable expense and, furthermore, it interferes with farmers' freedom.

Would it not be wiser to try to find a new formula which would eliminate all those drawbacks?

Mr. Speaker, having given this matter a great deal of thought, the idea occurred to me of submitting an altogether personal plan that I would ask the minister to kindly take into consideration.

That plan is to have a crop insurance scheme managed by an organization that would represent a majority of the farmers of a province, whenever the province concerned would not feel it would be advantageous to follow that federal policy for reasons of autonomy or other reasons. In the province of Quebec we have important organizations which represent farm people quite well, just as there are such organizations in other provinces. One such organization which has acquired a great experience in the field of insurance and actuarial science, while constantly keeping in touch with farm people, is the "Assurance-Vie Desjardins".

This company has only ten years experience, yet it already has close to half a billion dollars of insurance in force.

Other organizations doing a good job of representing the agricultural class are: La Coopérative Fédérée, in the economic field, and the Union des Cultivateurs Catholiques, in the professional field.

Both organizations have several years of experience in the insurance field, and I have no doubt that if the government came up with a definite proposal, they would consider it.

The administration of a crop insurance scheme could not be more secure than in the hands of those organizations, because, better than any other organization, they are familiar with the needs of their members and they already have a trained staff and experience in various types of risks.

The minister will object that the government cannot invest funds in a service without having control over expenditures. I recognize that. However, would it not be possible, after having the matter thoroughly investigated by economists, trained actuaries and the interested parties, to find a satisfactory formula? I for one am convinced it could be done.

Over the years, successive governments have yielded to popular pressure for the provision of various social and economic security services.

Nowadays, workers, farmers and manufacturers cannot do a thing without looking to the government for guidance or remedial action.

Farmers, in the past, have always been able to look after their own responsibilities, and I see no reason why we should not trust them to do the same in the matter of crop insurance.

We regret, however, that the minister has not seen fit to introduce this legislation earlier, so as to enable members, farm organizations, experts in this field, and also the provinces, to give it a thorough study and put forward some fair and considered suggestions.

We had every tool at our disposal to consider and draft this bill; the minister, however, has not seen fit to use them. As a result of the bitter reaction from western farm organizations particularly, the minister is apparently feeling twinges of remorse. I therefore urge him, before this develops into something chronic, to refer the bill back to the committee on agriculture and colonization.

(Text):

Mr. J. S. Speakman (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on second reading of this bill because of the criticism which has been levelled by members of both the Liberal party and the C.C.F. group. I have looked over this bill very carefully, coming as I do from a constituency which is solely agricultural, and in my opinion this is a good bill. It is not a perfect bill but it is a good one because it gives to the provinces a definite plan around which they may work out what the explanatory notes to the bill describe as "provincial schemes for crop insurance".

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) referred us to the resolution passed at the convention of the Liberal party held in January, 1958. I should like to suggest that not only the farmers of Canada but all Canadians rejected promises after 22 years of complacency and inaction. He also referred to the inability of the farmers to pay the high premiums. How can we tell how high the premiums will be until the provincial schemes are worked out?

Both the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) suggested that this bill should go to a committee for study. I should like to suggest that this bill be put through and then studied because we will certainly be able to give it far more effective study if it is passed and the provinces have an opportunity to work out their own schemes around the bill.

The hon. member for Assiniboia was very critical in his remarks today as he was a year ago when this government amended the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. He said the amendments were totally inadequate. The amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act reduced the size of the plot from 18 to 12 sections in any given township. Once the provinces have adopted it this crop insurance program will make compensation on an individual basis.

The hon. member for Assiniboia made lengthy reference to the fact that the province of Saskatchewan was not prepared to adopt this bill. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jorgenson) told us that the government of Manitoba is prepared to adopt it. I should like to quote from the Edmonton Journal of July 2, an article entitled "Province Prepared for Crop Insurance". It states in part:

> The Alberta government already has legislative authority to participate in the federal-provincial crop insurance scheme outlined earlier this week by federal agriculture minister Douglas Harkness. Earlier this year the legislature passed a bill authorizing the province to enter into any farm insurance scheme introduced by the federal government. At the time agriculture minister L. C. Halmrast said the province wanted to be prepared to take advantage of the promised federal program.
> The bill passed by this year's session of the legislature gives the Alberta minister of agriculture three-fold authority to enter into agreements with the federal government.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the government of the province of Alberta is prepared to accept this scheme, judging by what this article tells us.

Since I am referring to articles in the Edmonton Journal, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to some remarks made by the hon. member for Assiniboia during his visit to Alberta last month. The headline in the Edmonton Journal of June 13 reads:

> Argue Raps Federal Tories; Terms Them "Irresponsible"

The article goes on to say:

> Mr. Argue rapped the 47 western Conservative members in the house. "We always wanted a large block to represent the west, now we have it all right—47 blocks, all in row".

He forgot to mention that there are 48 members. I presume the other member that he forgot to mention was the blockhead.

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like to make a few remarks about the crop insurance plan. This is legislation that has been sought for a long time by farm organizations, by authorities on agriculture and by farmers. It is insurance against the loss of a crop. Here I would like to indicate how it will affect my district. My district of Humboldt-Melfort is one of the districts in which yields are much higher than they are in other districts of my province; consequently, we were never able to get prairie farm assistance, although we had many crop losses from such things as rust, hail, frost and floods. I know the farmers in my district will be very much pleased that finally we have legislation under which they can insure their crops against such hazards. This is not compulsory legislation, and therefore the people who benefit from the Prairie Farm Assistance Act can still receive benefits from the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

This is new legislation, and as time goes on no doubt it may be found that new amendments will have to be introduced, or there may have to be other additions to the legislation. Nevertheless, it is legislation that will be beneficial not only to the ones who live in the southern districts of Saskatchewan where the yields are very low and who can benefit year after year from the Prairie Farm Assistance Act but it will finally give assistance to the people who are in districts where the production on a bushel basis is much higher than it is in other districts. I will endorse this legislation.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I shall be the soul of brevity but I think somebody from British Columbia should speak on behalf of this group. I notice members opposite are beginning to check their watches. They will find that, as usual, I tell the truth.

Before proceeding with my few remarks I do want to compliment the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) on what I thought was a very constructive speech in connection with this bill and to support his plea for every consideration and justice to the farmers of Quebec. It just so happens that I represent a similar type of farmer, farmers who are engaged in a similar type of mixed farming, and the fruit farmers who are carrying on in many cases under similar conditions. Therefore, I can well understand his approach to this question and I support his remarks and his plea to the minister in this respect.

I have read a good deal about crop insurance. I realize that it is a very complicated and difficult problem. This is illustrated by the fact that it has been considered by federal and provincial governments and by farm organizations over a good many years. It is because of the complications of crop insurance and the difficulties that I can well understand that action was delayed from year to year. However, I do want to make five points. I am not going to be repetitious.

First of all, I want to inform the house that crop insurance has been a plank in the C.C.F. agriculture program for many years. As a matter of fact, it is plank No. 3 at the present time. It reads as follows:

> A system of crop insurance to protect farmers against crop failure due to conditions beyond their control.

This is supported by the C.C.F., and on that account we support the principle of crop insurance. I am very sorry that in legislation of this type which for its successful administration requires, in my opinion, the closest co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) has not had consultations with the ministers of agriculture of the provinces or representatives of those provinces. I think that is essential before there can be sucess in the administration of any legislation of this type. In my opinion the whole success of this legislation is founded on successful dominion-provincial co-operation in this very important matter.

I want also to protest the late introduction of the bill. This legislation was mentioned in the throne speech. I believe it would have been far better if this legislation had been introduced earlier in the session. To introduce it in the dying days of the session, in my opinion, is not good enough. I think this is a sound criticism and the minister knows that my criticisms are usually quite sound. If it had been presented earlier in the session and then sent to a committee—we are very sorry that the bill is not being sent to the agriculture committee—the members of the house could have studied the bill and given it further consideration and the representatives of farm organizations could have appeared before the committee and expressed their views of this very complicated and difficult piece of legislation.

Before the bill was finally drafted and presented to this house there should have been the closest consultation between the representatives of the various provinces and the national farm organizations in Canada. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are very sorry that it is not the intention of the minister to have this bill referred to the agriculture committee of the house.

In conclusion, I simply want to ask the minister, to plead with him, in view of the great importance of this legislation and of its peculiar nature which requires co-operation from all those interested in its administration, through governments, through producer organizations to farmers themselves, to refer this bill to the agriculture committee and give the farmers' organizations of Canada an opportunity to appear before the committee and express their views, to make suggestions, and so on.

I think it is only fair to realize that this is experimental legislation. With the best of intentions, with all the consultation among the provinces and the farmers' organizations and the understanding of the farmers themselves, it at best can only be experimental legislation. Experience will no doubt indicate that there must be amendments, adjustments and improvements. On that account, we say that this is one bill that should have been presented to the provinces concerned. It should have been brought to this house at an earlier date; it should have been sent to the agriculture committee so as to ensure as far as humanly possible co-operation from all people interested, with a view to making it a success to the advantage of the farmers of Canada.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, on the second reading of this bill which provides for a very important part of our national agricultural policy for Canada I think I should put before the house some of the behind the scenes issues that are being fought here. I am not going to deal with the details of the particular clauses of the bill and discuss their pros and cons. It has been my hope over the past year or so that when the bill was presented to the house we would consider it soberly and with the idea that we are moving into a field that is brand new to any government in Canada. This has not been the case. We were suddenly confronted with the violent position taken by the leader of the C.C.F. party in the house that the bill was bad for Canada and particularly for western Canada.

The house cannot understand the significance of this speech unless we look at a little of the background of the whole situation respecting crop insurance in so far as it affects us in the province of Saskatchewan. Before I embark on that particular part of my remarks I should like to say that I am not going to talk a great deal about the Liberal position. We recognize their situation in the house in that they do not have many members from the farm areas, particularly from western Canada, who know of the long fight we have had for crop insurance. Their attitude is typical. The suggestion I got from them was that we should be very cautious and should approach this matter very carefully.

We can understand this attitude. Back in 1919 the Liberals proposed a health insurance scheme. We finally put it into effect in 1959. That is a period of 40 years.

Mr. Benidickson: Nonsense.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The Liberals took a very cautious attitude in that regard and now the suggestion is that we are going a little too fast with crop insurance. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) quoted the Winnipeg Free Press today and I should like to quote this comment with regard to the contribution of the federal government which appeared in an editorial in the issue of July 2:

> Certainly the payment of half of the administration costs and one-fifth of premium costs will be interpreted by many people as another government hand-out to the farmer.

So the Liberal position, as I understand it, is that we are going too fast in meeting the problems of agriculture and that we are giving a handout to the farmers of western Canada and farmers generally throughout Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: Nonsense. You just will not disclose what your partners think about it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This attitude of the Liberal party indicates that we are moving too fast. They would like to take 40 years to carry out the job as they have done in the past.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, no.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): On the other hand, by contrast the government has recognized the need of agriculture in all parts of Canada. We have acted immediately because I think to have brought in as much agricultural legislation within two years as we have indicates the urgency that we consider this matter has. We realize that the crop insurance bill is new legislation but, Mr. Speaker, why criticize the legislation until it has been given a chance?

All this legislation involves is permission for the government to make agreements with the provinces whereby they can consider the individual needs of their particular parts of Canada and provide an actuarially sound crop insurance scheme in order to try to remove the effect of the ups and downs of the weather for farmers in every part of Canada. No position of criticism can be taken today that cannot be called irresponsible because not one agreement has been worked out. We want the bill passed so that those provinces that want to institute crop insurance to give some stability of income to their farmers will have a chance to propose their schemes and then we can work out a co-operative agreement between us.

The province of Manitoba has already indicated its willingness to propose a scheme and to enter into an agreement with us on a co-operative crop insurance program. I would suggest, in line with what the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) has said, that there is a need to look at the bill on the basis of the needs of agriculture. I would suggest to him with equal seriousness that such legislation has been looked at, examined and discussed by farm organizations and political parties for at least 25 years to my knowledge. Proposals have been put forward and debated but the fact is that very few organizations have had the facts and figures on which to base a crop insurance scheme.

The only experience we have to go on is that with the spring wheat crop insurance scheme in the United States, the figures in the Manitoba crop insurance report and the figures from P.F.A.A. experience over a period of 20 years. On the basis of this experience we are confident that we can put forward an actuarially sound program that the farmers will support because they do not want relief but simply the chance to help themselves.

In the preliminary periods of the study of crop insurance most of the reports that were issued were pessimistic because they did not have the basic information which we think we now have on which to base a crop insurance plan.

Mr. Benidickson: Where did that come from?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): So you can understand why the early reports took a pessimistic attitude. The latest study we have is volume 9 of the report of the royal commission on agriculture and rural life in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Benidickson: We have all quoted that.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This royal commission was appointed in 1952. It consisted of five people picked from the province of Saskatchewan who the C.C.F. government thought were capable of understanding the complexities of the problem and of issuing a report for the guidance of the province of Saskatchewan which has a C.C.F. government. The royal commission was established because the situation was such particularly in Saskatchewan that there had to be some form of coherent program put before governments on which they could act.

In our membership in this house, just as in the membership of the Saskatchewan legislature, you would not expect to find people with the experience and the time to deal with this complex question and propose constructive programs. The royal commission has published its report in 14 volumes and it has been a matter of considerable interest to me why these reports were never quoted either in the legislature of Saskatchewan, whose taxpayers paid over half a million dollars to get them, or by the C.C.F. members in the House of Commons at Ottawa in the 1957 and 1958 sessions or in the present session. The first time I heard a member of the C.C.F. party quote these reports was in this debate.

As I read the speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) he definitely left the impression in the house that the bill before us now is contrary to the recommendations of this report. That feeling which he left in the house, and which is also noted by any person who reads his first speech, is contrary to the facts. The only way in which we have differed from the recommendations in the report is that, first of all, we have gone further than the report recommends in the sense that we have offered to any province a scheme whereby they can bring their farmers into a crop insurance program and, second, we have not asked that the scheme be compulsory as the report recommends.

As I said in my remarks on the resolution, to those of us who have gone through the galling experience of nine years of drought where 80 per cent to 90 per cent of our people were forced to their knees and compelled to take relief, this is the type of thing we thought was a practical approach to one of the problems facing agriculture in a drought area. We therefore pledged ourselves that if we ever reached the position where we could do something about it we would bring in some form of crop insurance in order to give the farmers some opportunity to pay an insurance premium so they would not be ruined by these years of poor crops or in the case of some other catastrophy.

Therefore when I hear in this house the suggestion that it is wrong for me to speak of these things, my mind goes back to the day when the freight cars pulled up to our small towns in Saskatchewan and brought us tons of dried codfish. At that time the farmers lined up to the doors of those boxcars to take those big flat things we had never seen before. We were told, "This is to feed yourselves with." I well recall that in our district we heard that there was a farmer about 60 miles away who came from New Brunswick and who knew how to cook these things. We thought they were snowshoes. This farmer made a big reputation for himself simply by giving the advice that before you eat the things, you boil them or soak them in water for twenty-four hours. I remember a carload of apples coming in from Ontario and I remember clothing being distributed.

It is bad enough when sometimes a calamity hits a community by way of fire or earthquake and a few thousand people receive help through the generosity of their neighbours and their fellow citizens. But when a whole area of a country feels this not just for one year but year after year for seven or eight years, you can understand the feeling with which we approach this bill. Now what happens? I think I can say with some proof that over the years in Saskatchewan every political party has supported the idea of crop insurance. I can say with complete accuracy that in the debate in the legislature in Regina this February on the speech from the throne C.C.F. speakers supported crop insurance and Liberal speakers supported crop insurance. I have clippings here to demonstrate the truth of what I say. This one is dated February 17 and is from the Moose Jaw Times-Herald. It is a Canadian Press dispatch:

> A.L.S. Brown (CCF—Bengough) told the Saskatchewan legislature Monday this province is willing to take part in a crop insurance policy with the federal government.

And so on right down the line. Later on in another debate there were 16 speakers spoke. This is the whip of the Liberal party speaking and this is a quotation from the Star-Phoenix of February 27, 1959. It reads as follows:

> He favoured crop insurance, to help contend the "natural hazards," and some form of farm credit to aid young farmers get started.

Here is a legislator from Saskatchewan representing a rural riding, the whip of the Liberal party, joining with the C.C.F. speaker, Mr. Brown, one of the most experienced members the C.C.F. have in the legislature, calling for crop insurance and help for young farmers. That is exactly what this government is doing. It is trying to meet the farmers' needs all across Canada, something which is supported by political parties of every stripe in Canada, yet we meet this sort of attack that we get from the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Naturally enough, I was suspicious of what was going on. I wondered about this contradictory position. I knew that all these members of the royal commission supported crop insurance and they still do. I knew that Mr. Nollet, minister of agriculture in Saskatchewan, had expressed support for crop insurance a few months ago. I knew that Mr. Brown, C.C.F. member for Bengough, had been willing to co-operate. I have seen the resolution passed by associations over the years and right up to this very last year. Then all of a sudden we get this doom talk by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I have therefore been putting two and two together. We heard the Minister of Agriculture say today some harsh words about a reporter in the press gallery for having written a story that went all across Saskatchewan in three papers, I understand, dealing with this matter of crop insurance. This report which is dated June 30, 1959 from the Regina Leader-Post on the front page bears the heading "Prairie Farm Assistance Cancelled". Sometimes we blame these headlines on the headline writers who are different people from the men who write the stories. But the opening paragraph clears away that little matter. This is what the opening paragraph says:

> The cancellation of prairie farm assistance emerged as a surprise package in the new federal government crop insurance proposals announced Monday afternoon in the commons.

The Minister of Agriculture has made it absolutely clear that this is completely false. Yet the hon. member for Assiniboia stands up in the house and says that this reporter is not only conscientious but is accurate. Reading on in this story a little further, I read this:

> In the debate C.C.F. house leader Hazen Argue heaped praise on the P.F.A. legislation and on its Commons instigator, former agriculture minister Gardiner.

I have read through that speech twice and I have not been able to find that the hon. member for Assiniboia mentioned Mr. Gardiner. Where did Moon get hold of this doom? There must have been collaboration outside of this house that is not recorded in Hansard. I asked the hon. member today to quote what he is reading from. I saw him reading from the transcript of one of these pieces of paper that roll through the linotype machine that transmits a message across the country and he says, "I obtained this from the press gallery". It is my conviction that if you are reading it at the very moment the thing is not printed yet. But the hon. member for Assiniboia reads these accurate reports to the house.

Why this alliance between gloom and doom? He praises Mr. Gardiner. All you have to do is praise Mr. Gardiner and then you are put on a high pedestal in the Leader-Post in Regina. Mr. Gardiner is a fairly doughty little man and he does not need much protection from the hon. member for Assiniboia. Why this sudden lovemaking between these two people? I will leave that matter to your imagination, Mr. Speaker. I can go on and read through these clippings and point out the inaccuracies. I would suggest to the hon. member for Assiniboia that if Moon is as accurate as he claims, let him print this fact. I say in this house that this royal commission report is repudiated in effect by the hon. member for Assiniboia in his remarks in this house.

Mr. Argue: It is repudiated by this government.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I say flatly that the royal commission report is accepted by this government with these two differences. One is that we did not bring in the compulsory feature and the second is that we went farther than the royal commission report recommended. They wanted just to have three experimental units to start with. There is nothing to stop the Saskatchewan government from making an agreement with regard to these three experimental units. We simply made it possible to do it all over the province all at once. I should like to suggest that if the reporter is conscientious and accurate in reporting what goes on in this house let him tell the people of Saskatchewan why the C.C.F. are really opposed to crop insurance, why they supported it back in February and oppose it in July. I will suggest to you the reason, Mr. Speaker. It is the same reason that gripped them a year ago February. When we brought in the farm stabilization act they saw their death knell being rung. They see the end of the C.C.F. party in the west because this is going to be the first step in removing the causes of friction between the government and the farmers. The C.C.F. would have nothing left about which to howl.

They called the farm price stabilization bill every name of which they could think in this house and get away with. The remarks of the former hon. member for Springfield, Mr. Schulz, still ring in my ears. I took those same remarks made by Mr. Schulz and read them to farm audiences across the prairies during the last election. The result was that Mr. Schulz, and his extreme remarks, are no longer in the house. I am suggesting that the real fear of the C.C.F. at this moment over the very fine start that we have made in this very complex problem of crop insurance is that they see us removing another great fear of the farmer of these sudden catastrophes that hit him. The result is that they have one less thing for which they can hammer the federal government and by which the provincial government of Saskatchewan hopes to avoid its responsibilities.

Let Mr. Moon tell the people of Saskatchewan that is the real reason for the C.C.F. party's change of opinion at this time. It is not because the people of Saskatchewan do not want crop insurance, it is because the C.C.F. are afraid if we put in crop insurance the C.C.F. government will be caught short. They know that if this bill goes into effect before this parliament closes the Saskatchewan legislature will have to act. There is only another year before that provincial government must meet the people and they do not want to have to enact something that will remove grievances the farmer has because they want these grievances with which to pound the head and shoulders of the federal government. I would suggest to the hon. member for Assiniboia, as I have suggested before, that his exaggerations in this house have ruined his effect on the house as a serious member. If he supported crop insurance in the past, he should not turn his back on ten or fifteen years of espousing the thing in order to save a provincial party. He should think of the farmers of this country first. The C.C.F. party knows that the next piece of legislation to come forward is equally potent medicine in helping to cure the ills that beset the farmers.

As I read these clippings that have come into my hands within the last few days, and as I hear the provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan calling this bill an insult to the government of Saskatchewan, I wonder what precipitated this somersault. Mr. Fines' reputation is unassailable. He has been in office 15 years and he has shown a surplus of $12 million or $15 million every year. He has steadily reduced the debt of Saskatchewan until it is now in the neighbourhood of $20 million. Every time the C.C.F. members talk about something to help the people of Saskatchewan he says, "Oh, no; before I leave this office I want Saskatchewan to be absolutely clear of debt." Has this government ever let a few dollars of debt stop it from doing what was necessary, either in the way of old age pensions or something for the workingman or the farmer? We see our duty and we do it. We ask the people of Canada to support us in this type of legislative action which gets at the real problems with which the people of this country are faced. Mr. Fines has a good reputation, and yet he tells the C.C.F. members, you will have to hold off until we get all these debts cleared off before we do anything.

If I were in the provincial government of Saskatchewan and I knew the majority of the people had expressed their desire for crop insurance I would be prepared to let the debt remain for another year in order to give the people some security so that they could sleep at night without worrying what might happen if a disaster from weather hit them. I have said enough here, Mr. Speaker, to make it clear that this opposition to the bill is opposition born of desperation in attempting to enable the C.C.F. government to avoid putting in crop insurance legislation. On that ground, I would suggest that hon. members here should not play any part in delaying this bill in any way just to save a political party some embarrassment. You can have all the committees you like but you cannot do a more thorough job than has been done in all these reports, and particularly this one which represents a four-year study. Every time there has been a meeting before, the lack of adequate figures has always been a pressing problem. This report does make an attempt to give us the figures, and with the figures we have collected from other places I think we have a chance of making this crop insurance plan succeed. If it does succeed, then those who are members of the house at this time may say, we did help the farmers move toward a position of self-help from which they can attain reasonable equality with the rest of Canada. Every one of us should be proud to be here and support such a bill.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, there were some observations in the speech to which we have just listened which I think merit some comment from those of us who sit in the official opposition. Of course, the quarrel between the minister of northern affairs and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) which has obviously taken on heat today, interesting as it is, is one that can only be resolved by those two gentlemen. I would not want in any way to add to the nature of this dispute; I would not want to add to its intensity, although I admit it is a very interesting controversy. I repeat, it is one which can properly be resolved only by these two gentlemen.

But in the course of his remarks the minister did make one or two observations which I think marred his political endeavour today. I think what he has said, and I say this in a kindly way to the minister, was largely in the nature of a political diatribe which did not add very much to the information of this house. It was a rather acrimonious and vigorous defence of the administration, and from that point of view of course the minister's participation is understandable. He said that the attitude of those of us sitting in the official opposition, while not one of opposition to the measure was one that could hardly be regarded as full support. We were suggesting caution; we were suggesting care; and the consequences of our advice were that the measure would be delayed unnecessarily. Of course, the hon. gentleman must accept responsibility, along with his colleagues, for the introduction of this measure at this late stage of the session.

There is an obligation on the part of the opposition to give careful attention to all matters put forward by the government, and we would not be doing our duty if we did not examine this bill with all of the thoroughness we could possibly command. It was for this reason we suggested it would be advisable for the minister to agree to send this bill to a committee so that it could be carefully studied, so that there would be an opportunity given to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, to the interprovincial farm union and to the provincial governments themselves to indicate to the committee their feelings in the matter. The provincial governments could indicate how much participation could be expected by provincial governments. We could learn the view of the various farm organizations. Certainly, this is not an unreasonable proposal. If the government decides that that is not the kind of thorough investigation they want, well then there is of course nothing that we on this side can do.

The government has a huge majority, and if it wishes to take a particular course there is nothing that can be done, but surely the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) does not expect us to fail in the performance of our obligations as we see them. One of these is to point out that one of the weaknesses of this measure is that it is not receiving the kind of hearing that a measure of this sort should receive. This is a measure which depends for its success on the attitude taken by the provinces. Since there is not going to be any feature of compulsion about the measure, it will depend solely for its success on the co-operation and the support which it will receive from farmers from one end of Canada to the other. The minister, when he spoke, spoke only of the prairie provinces; he keeps forgetting that there are farmers in other parts of Canada, too, and they should have the advantage of this or any other similar legislation.

Whatever weaknesses in this measure become apparent later on will probably prompt suggestions that those weaknesses could have been eliminated if a proper study which we propose had been accepted by the government. The minister of northern affairs said it was not necessary to have any further discussions on this matter. I think he said that the federation of agriculture—and if I am wrong in this the hon. gentleman will correct me—had already given an indication of its position with regard to this measure. If that is so, I wish the minister could have given us more particulars. It would be interesting to know whether or not the federation of agriculture has carefully considered the provisions of this bill. It will be interesting to know whether the minister had acquainted the council of the federation, not with all the details but with the broad terms of this legislation. We do know that the interprovincial farm union, in a statement I saw the other day in the newspapers, has expressed some concern over this particular measure. I do not want to call that a condemnation of the bill, but certainly it would be desirable and helpful if, in committee, we were able to interrogate members of the interprovincial farm union not because they would oppose the principle of the bill, and not because we oppose the principle of the bill, but because the principle behind this bill, being sound, deserves to be incorporated in legislation which would be the most effective possible. The answers to the questions we keep putting to the minister—questions about the attitude of the provinces—do not convince us that this bill, good as it is in its present form, will satisfy the expectations which have been raised.

The minister of northern affairs said that this government was not like the Liberal government, it did not wait 22 years to bring in crop insurance, and it did not wait all the time the Liberal government did before bringing in hospital insurance. Of course, that struck a personal note and that is one of the reasons which brought me to my feet. I will tell the minister the differences between Liberal governments and Conservative governments. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that his government would bring in a comprehensive scheme of crop insurance. We do not have before us a bill which represents a comprehensive scheme of crop insurance. The undertaking and assurance given by the Prime Minister in this matter certainly has not been met by this bill. When we proposed a system of hospital insurance, it did take some time. It took some time because we could not possibly proceed with it unless we had the co-operation of the provinces, and we did not propose to put on the statute books of this parliament a measure of that nature unless we knew we would have the support of a sufficient number of provinces who would come into the scheme. Prior to the introduction of that measure, unlike the present administration in regard to the bill now before us, we did have conferences with the provinces, we did talk this question over with them, and we did reconcile our differences. Finally, we were able to bring forward an act which has won the support of eight, and possibly nine, of the provincial governments.

Moreover, the minister of northern affairs was a little confused. He began to say that they had brought in not only crop insurance but hospital insurance, forgetting, of course, that the hospital insurance act, which had been preceded by consultations with provincial and voluntary bodies, was placed on the statute books by a Liberal government at a time when the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent was prime minister of this country. It seems to be necessary to remind some hon. gentlemen of that fact, and apparently it is necessary to remind the minister of northern affairs with regard to what really took place. I suggest to him that if he looks on the hospital insurance measure as one which occasions a comparison between the techniques of the two governments he might well have observed the superior technique employed in the matter of the hospital insurance program.

That bill was, as I say, preceded by conferences with the provinces, conferences with hospital associations, with medical bodies and so on whereas, according to the words of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), this particular bill has been preceded by no consultation whatsoever either with the provinces or with the various farm organizations. It is true that about a year ago the minister had a meeting with the provincial ministers of agriculture to discuss crop insurance, as he said, in a very general way, but the particular proposals embodied in this bill were, according to his own admission, never discussed with any provincial government or farm organization. Despite that, this government persists in denying parliament the normal process of investigation and assessment, namely referring this matter to the committee on agriculture.

The minister of northern affairs in his very interesting discourse this afternoon spoke of the body which was set up in Saskatchewan in 1952, the royal commission on agriculture and rural life. He said that no one had referred at all during the course of the debate to the report made by that body. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), who was the first to speak for us in this group, did refer to that report, and in fairness to the hon. member for Assiniboia I may say that I well remember that he did so as well. Of course, all the way through this debate, this report which I have in my hand was referred to by hon. members, and why the minister of northern affairs who spoke of this as the most monumental study of its kind in Canada should yet have refrained from referring to some of its very definite recommendations is very difficult to understand.

This bill does not come forward in full conformity with the assurances given by the Prime Minister. This bill is not a generous bill. This bill deserves support because it establishes the principle of crop insurance. But I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that if they really want to live up to their election promises, if they really want to do something that is going to have the most efficient results, they should unhesitatingly have taken the provinces into their confidence. I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that when we come back to parliament it will be interesting to find out whether any more than one province will have taken advantage of this measure. I ask the Minister of Agriculture now: will the province of Ontario take advantage of it? Will the three western provinces, other than Manitoba take advantage of it? Will British Columbia, or will the maritime provinces, or will the province of Quebec take advantage of it? I ask the Minister of Agriculture a second time in this debate, is there any indication that he can give us as to the likelihood of their acceding to the proposition embodied in this bill?

We were told this morning that the province of Manitoba is going to come in but the Minister of Agriculture admitted in answer to a question put to him by me that the province of Manitoba had indicated last December its intention of introducing a scheme of crop insurance whether or not the federal government brought in such a scheme. It cannot be argued that the establishment of a crop insurance scheme in the province of Manitoba has been made possible because of the initiative taken by this government. That, to use the words of the Minister of Agriculture himself, is simply not the case.

It is true that Mr. Willis did say the other day that although he had not seen the bill he was happy that it had been introduced. It cannot be argued from those words that the government of which he is a member was in any way influenced by the initiative of this government. I ask the Minister of Agriculture, having in mind the limited character of this measure where the federal government is going to pay only 50 per cent of the cost of the administration unlike the greater financial responsibility assumed by governments in the United States with regard to such a measure and having in mind that the federal government is going to pay only 20 per cent of the premiums, is it unfair to suggest that one of the reasons why this government in the dying days of this session has brought forward this legislation is that it would be embarrassing for the government and for some of its ministers in particular going out to western Canada in the face of their promises for a broad crop insurance scheme to find that the only government in Canada that had brought forward such a measure was the province of Manitoba?

Mr. Speakman: What about Alberta?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says, "What about Alberta?"

Some hon. Members: What about it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend asked the question.

Mr. Speakman: They have already legislated for it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But I am talking about this measure and whether or not this particular bill is responsible for provincial action. I say that whatever evidence we have before us clearly indicates that there are not going to be very many provincial participants and that the province of Manitoba has brought in its scheme entirely without regard to any possible action taken by this government.

There are some features of this measure which the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) overlooked. I think that on reflection he would agree that crop insurance would probably not be feasible in areas of exceptionally high risk, and yet is that not a very important consideration that should be noted? As a matter of fact this observation will be found at page 102 of the very report to which the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources directed our attention. He did not mention that when he spoke of the report as a complete endorsement of this bill.

This report is not a complete endorsement of this bill. This report is a clear indication of the inadequacies of this measure. At page 98 of the report I find this conclusion, No. 49:

> Group indemnity insurance offering relatively low coverage is the only type practical for the majority of farms in intermediate and high risk areas.

The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources did not tell us that. When the commissioners talk of the only type of practical relief in high risk areas, let it not be forgotten that what they undoubtedly had in mind was what the minister of agriculture in the St. Laurent government brought to this country and to western Canada, P.F.A.A. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources complained about the tribute paid by the hon. member for Assiniboia to the former minister of agriculture in the last Liberal government. What about the tribute paid to Mr. Gardiner by the present Prime Minister? That tribute was put on Hansard the other day by the present Prime Minister. In those words the Prime Minister acknowledged that it was due to the initiative taken by Mr. Gardiner that we have P.F.A.A. and that is the very kind of assistance which at page 98 of the report the commissioners said they thought had to be borne in mind.

The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources gave us the impression that what he wants to do is to woo the farmers of Saskatchewan in particular with less federal support as provided for in this bill than is now provided for under P.F.A.A. We must not forget that the minister told us that a farmer could not have the benefits both of this measure and of P.F.A.A. The only conclusion we can draw from the words of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is that this is a very clever political scheme to give to the farmers less than they are now getting under legislation introduced by a Liberal government and characterized by the letters P.F.A.A.

One will find at page 17 of this report, the conclusions of which were made public in 1956, I believe, the commission having been established in 1952, that the commissioners go on to point out:

> Particularly high risk areas present problems beyond the scope of crop insurance as such, and relief for these areas probably requires a separate and distinct government program.

That, of course, is P.F.A.A. At page 90 of the report there is another reference that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources seemingly overlooked and which I feel deserves to be put on Hansard right after his speech. The commissioners go on to point out at page 90:

> Some failed to give sufficient consideration to excluding submarginal farms and those farms in the areas of highest risk from participation in a crop insurance program.

Why did the minister of northern affairs fail to cite this particular reference? Surely a crop insurance scheme to be effective must help not those who do not need it but those who in the light of experience are likely to require that kind of assistance more than any other group. They will be excluded under this bill and they are the people by whom help in this particular is most needed.

And so one could go on referring to other passages in this report which clearly indicate that one can be in support of crop insurance without accepting in every particular a measure that does not satisfy all of the recommendations made in a study so profound as that made by the royal commissioners on agriculture and rural life in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Harkness: It goes beyond that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Agriculture says that it goes beyond. That is argument by assertion. It is nothing else. The minister has not indicated that to be so in anything he has said nor has anyone else on the other side of the chamber indicated that that is the case.

Mr. Harkness: The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources indicated that and quoted the passages.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I listened to the hon. gentleman and I must say the passages he quoted certainly were not the kind of passages which reveal the type of understanding of the problem which I thought he as one coming from the province of Saskatchewan would have. It should not be for a lawyer from Ontario to have to point out to so knowledgeable an hon. gentleman as the minister of northern affairs some of the weaknesses which attended his presentation today.

Mr. Churchill: Why do you presume to speak on it, then?

Mr. Harkness: Everybody will take your representations at their true value, all right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure that is the case, as the Minister of Agriculture is finding out by the criticism which this bill is receiving from one end of Canada to the other, criticism which is now mounting almost as high as the criticism against the government's amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which indicated how unpopular that particular measure was.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, who led off for us in this matter, did not speak with any political design, as the minister for northern affairs suggested. He spoke of the inadequate coverage, the inadequate features of this particular measure. He said that it seemed designed to satisfy in principle, if not in fact, the assurances given by this government during the course of the election. He said that it was not designed, however, by this government to encourage wide provincial acceptance and participation. Now, is that an unfair argument to make once again?

The value of this bill will lie only in the fact that it will be supported by at least a substantial number of the provinces of Canada. We know of only one province which has given any indication of some satisfaction with this measure. What about the province of Ontario, the largest province of Canada? What about the province of Quebec, the second largest province of our country? There are more farmers in these provinces than in all of the other provinces of Canada. While one does not want to deny to a minority group of provinces their rights, one has the right to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether this measure is going to be accepted by governments representing a large proportion of the farming community. There is not a word from the minister. Why? Because he has never consulted the provincial governments.

Today we have in the city six provincial premiers. I do not know whether the Minister of Agriculture enjoyed social intercourse with those gentlemen last night when the government of Canada properly entertained them, but if he did I wonder whether he ascertained from the premier of Quebec his intentions with regard to this measure? It is true that the premier of Ontario was not there but his provincial treasurer was there and I think he knows something about Ontario agriculture. Is it the intention of the province of Ontario to participate in this scheme? The premier of British Columbia was there. Is it the intention of the province of British Columbia to participate in this particular proposal? If the answer to these questions is in the negative; if the answer is that we do not know, that surely is not sufficient. Surely the federal government at this time, with regard to a measure that seeks to provide, in the language of the Prime Minister, a comprehensive scheme of insurance, should have designed it with full knowledge of the attitude of the provinces because theoretically they are going to be called upon to bear a greater burden than the federal government.

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says "no". The federal government is going to pay 20 per cent of the premium. Who is going to pay the other 20 per cent?

An hon. Member: Who repays the loan?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Who repays the loan? Is it the government or is it the people? What percentage of the premium is going to be paid by whom, by the provincial government? Is the province of Manitoba going to pay 40 per cent?

Mr. Bigg: Is the government not the people?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will say this, some governments do not represent the people and I believe that this government increasingly does not represent the people. We should have had from the minister some indication as to how the remaining portion of the premium was going to be borne.

Mr. Harkness: You have had that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In what proportions?

Mr. Harkness: I have told you repeatedly it is up to each individual province.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is no answer. That is the answer the minister gives. He brings this forward and says it is a great measure; it is going to give insurance to the farmers who will have suffered losses of crops because of damage for one reason or another. Yes, we are going to pay 20 per cent and the other 80 per cent, he says in effect, is going to be paid by someone, the province or the farmer. But does my hon. friend think seriously that any farmer is going to participate in a scheme if the provinces do not bear a greater proportion of the cost than 20 per cent? The Minister of Agriculture is in the unfortunate position in piloting this measure of not being able to give to this house one single bit of information as to the share which any province is prepared to bear.

Mr. Harkness: I wonder whether the hon. member would let me answer the question he just posed as to whether I think any single farmer is going to participate in this scheme. As a farmer I would be delighted to enter into a scheme of this kind, as would every one of my neighbours I think in the entire area of western Alberta in which I live.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister for saying that. I would think that what my hon. friend's fellow farmers will do is this. I am sure they will want to participate in this scheme if they can be told whether it is going to be economically possible for them to do so.

Mr. Jorgenson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let me finish this. If the province is going to bear finally, say, not more than 20 per cent, I would be very surprised if my hon. friend himself would participate in such a scheme and it would be very interesting to ascertain next session whether the farmers in the particular unit in the province that my hon. friend mentioned will subscribe as readily to this scheme if the province is not prepared to bear a greater premium burden than is now being assumed by the federal government.

Mr. Jorgenson: Will the hon. member indicate just what percentage of the premiums the hail insurance companies pay for the farmers and what percentage of the premiums the government pays on the life insurance and the fire insurance policies?

Mr. Pearson: That is a fine parallel.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What my hon. friend forgets is that the government in presenting this measure has said that it is something better than the contractual arrangement between the private insurance companies and the insured. The Minister of Agriculture compared this with unemployment insurance. This is what he compared it with. Unemployment insurance is quite different from private insurance. In unemployment insurance there are two contributors and in addition the state.

Mr. Bigg: It is not insurance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says it is not insurance. He is contradicting the Minister of Agriculture who said this scheme would be proceeded with on an actuarial basis. All I can say to my hon. friend from Manitoba is this. He is a farmer. He lives in Manitoba and, as a farmer, he knows full well that no farmer is going to assume the obligation of paying premiums which he cannot afford economically to bear. The only way he can determine that is by knowing what is going to be the contribution made by the federal and the provincial governments. When he ascertains that, then he will be in a position to determine whether or not it is a scheme to which he should become obligated.

Because the minister has not given us this information, because he has refused to set up a committee to which the provinces could come and make representations, because we are denied the opportunity of discussing this measure clause by clause in committee with farm organizations, we are in the position where we will support a bill the full measure of which cannot be properly assessed in the absence of this kind of additional study and those additional representations. The minister is asking for a blank cheque; he is pursuing a policy and a technique characteristic of all Tory governments.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A blank cheque with no indication that this measure will do the job intended. All he can say in support of the measure is that this is a valuable bill because it recognizes the principle of crop insurance. I say to the minister that that is one good argument. The bill is valid for that reason in that it is a recognition of the principle of crop insurance, but when you come to the House of Commons with a bill it ought to be possible to make that bill the best possible measure that can be conceived. That has not been done because the government has brought forward this enabling proposal without consulting the provinces and the farmers concerned, and on that account the minister cannot help but leave with the membership of this house and with the people of this country the impression that the real reason for bringing forward this particular bill at this particular time and in this manner is that the initiative taken by the province of Manitoba has forced the government to do some window dressing.

(Translation):

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, we listened with great attention, a few minutes ago, to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton). He said, among other things, that the Liberals were accusing the government of acting too hastily. I would like him to shed those illusions, for we do not propose to do so. We never accused the government of acting too hastily, but rather of failing to act at all. However, in the present case, we are accusing this government of proceeding somewhat haphazardly.

The minister asked us what was the basis for our criticism of a legislation not yet tried out. On many occasions, during this session, we have realized that the opposition's constructive criticism has made possible certain improvements of the legislation which had been introduced. Moreover, I think it is our responsibility to advance the arguments of those we represent here.

Legislation has now been submitted which tends to establish a crop insurance scheme, and the minister stated that the federal government undertakes to pay 50 per cent of the administration costs, 20 per cent of the amount of premiums asked, and to loan the provinces 75 per cent of the sum required for indemnity exceeding $200,000. Therefore, the provinces will have to bear the burden of 50 per cent of administration costs, or else the farmers bear it.

The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, who rose in support of his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), dealt only with the problems of the west. I presume that he failed to dwell on the issues facing the eastern provinces because a colleague, that is one of the four ministers from the province of Quebec, might speak on behalf of eastern or Quebec farmers.

As can be seen on page 5230 of the official record of this House of Commons for June 29, 1959, the Minister of Agriculture stated:

> As one would expect, the provinces which displayed most interest in it were the three prairie provinces which were all interested in a system of crop insurance and in instituting such a system at the earliest possible time.

We may remember that these provinces have benefited in the past under the P.F.A.A. and that, since 1939, farmers have received, under that legislation, $204 million in the form of deficiency payments half of which had been underwritten by Canadian taxpayers. Therefore, the P.F.A.A. forced all taxpayers to contribute part of the assistance given to the prairie farmers. Now, under this act, which does not apply in a province like Quebec where mixed farming is practised, taxpayers, as I say, will be called upon to subscribe to legislation that will not solve their problems in any way.

I would not like it to be said that I am taking a negative attitude towards western farmers; rather it should be considered a positive one with regard to eastern farmers, and more particularly those of the province of Quebec.

I was pleased a few moments ago, to hear the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), support the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), especially when he said that this act should apply not only to a single area, but throughout the country. I wonder if this act is viewed with favour in the eastern provinces. We have heard members discussing the matter, and there have been many quotations from western papers, but none from eastern papers, as far as I know. Are we to conclude that this bill is not eliciting as much interest in the eastern parts of the country as was expected by the government? Are we to conclude, having heard only from the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), that other members from the province of Quebec feel that this act would be of very little help, and that it requires our farmers to pay contributions to a plan which cannot settle their problem and will be of no help to them.

The opposition has mentioned repeatedly that this bill on crop insurance should have been referred to a committee. That, it seems to me, would have been the logical procedure in the circumstances, because then the government and the minister would have had the opportunity of consulting farm organizations, such as the U.C.C., the Coopérative Fédérée, the Interprovincial Farm Union or the National Federation of Agriculture.

The result is that this bill has been introduced without the provinces having been consulted, as the minister himself admits, though the provinces are expected to bear an additional burden. I recall that, just a few weeks ago, while visiting my constituency, the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) stated that the present government does not favour centralization and that its aim is to hand back to the provinces the rights to which they are entitled.

the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

STATEMENT ON CONCLUSION OF MEETINGS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have leave of the house to revert to motions for the purpose of making a brief statement on the dominion-provincial conference of the Ministers' of Finance and provincial treasurers which has been held in Ottawa yesterday and today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, before the Minister of Finance does that, I presume this will not preclude an opportunity for the Leader of the Opposition to comment if he wishes to do so. I do not know whether or not he wishes to do so. It may depend on what the Minister of Finance says.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the Leader of the Opposition be permitted to make a statement?

Mr. Argue: And a representative of this group, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: I think a very proper point has been raised. I am very much in favour of giving the Minister of Finance unanimous consent to revert to motions but if we revert to motions then we revert to motions within the regular practice of this house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is also quite usual for the leader of the C.C.F. party to be permitted to express his views. Is it the pleasure of the house that the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the C.C.F. party be permitted to comment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the report will be very brief. The meeting assembled yesterday and concluded its meeting this afternoon. The conclusions of the conference have been inscribed in a communiqué that is being issued this afternoon. With the leave of the house I should like to table a copy of the communiqué.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Read it out.

Mr. Argue: Can the Minister of Finance say whether or not a further meeting similar to this one is scheduled for October or some date in the fall and whether it is expected that it will be a meeting preliminary to a full-fledged federal-provincial conference on financial questions?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I cannot imagine that a communiqué from this conference will be very long. Instead of tabling it perhaps the minister might read it so that members can decide whether it is worthy of any comment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the communiqué is a lengthy one. I am sure that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) would like to have the opportunity of perusing it before making any extended comment on it.

In reply to the question I may say that the committee of ministers of finance and provincial treasurers has agreed to hold its next meeting in Ottawa on October 15 and 16.

As to the other questions, it was regarded by the committee of ministers that they were engaged on a work that was a necessary foundation to any plenary dominion-provincial conference that might be held whenever it might be called.

Mr. Argue: May I ask the minister whether he agreed to such a plenary conference at a later date?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. This conference was not called to deal with that question.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether there was not on the part of various provincial representatives a request for a plenary session and is the government not going to accede to that request in any way?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A number of the provincial ministers did request that a plenary dominion-provincial conference should be held before the end of 1959.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask what was the reaction of the government to that request?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a little premature yet to deal with that question. A request was made for a conference before the end of 1959. Naturally that is a matter that will have to receive consideration in the light of this expression of opinion on the part of the representatives of a number of the provinces.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the government's promises?

Mr. Argue: Did the Minister of Finance at this conference express general willingness that such a plenary conference should be held before the end of this year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, the Minister of Finance did not say whether such a conference should be held or should not be held. He simply indicated that this present conference was called for the purpose of discussing subjects to be referred to the federal-provincial continuing committee on fiscal and economic questions. So far as a plenary conference is concerned, it was recognized that that will be a matter for decision by the government.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether the provincial representatives expressed disappointment at this continuation of a study group instead of action by the federal government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. There was on the whole every evidence of full co-operation in the proposal that the committee has endorsed, namely the reference to the continuing committee of a number of important subjects for study and for report back to this committee of ministers.

Mr. Argue: May I ask whether or not the optimistic attitude and the feeling of good will at the conference was not based largely on a belief that a plenary conference would in fact be held in 1959?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There certainly was an atmosphere of great good will at this conference. I think that the harmony which has prevailed is best illustrated in the decisions that were taken in line with the proposal originally made by the federal government that these questions in their full breadth, as will be seen by the communiqué, should be referred to the continuing committee for study and report back to this committee of ministers.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister would agree to having the communiqué, if the house agrees, made an appendix to Hansard so that it would be there for our convenience?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am entirely agreeable to that suggestion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the communiqué referred to shall appear as an appendix to Hansard? Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister if I am not correct in saying that yesterday at least three of the provincial premiers took a strong position and called upon the government to convene what has been popularly referred to as a full-fledged conference at the earliest possible moment and that among those premiers were Premier Roblin of Manitoba, Premier Bennett of British Columbia, the premier of Quebec and the provincial treasurer of the province of Ontario, and that in reply the Minister of Finance is said to have observed that he was not in a position to express any views as he had no authority to commit the government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): When the hon. gentleman used the expression "earliest possible moment" he is quite wrong. Therefore the answer to his question must be no. As to the observations of the Minister of Finance on the occasion in question, I think I have already indicated those in my reply to an earlier question.

Mr. Pearson: Is it a fact that the federal mountain has laboured and brought forth a study?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that a very successful conference has been held; that it has resulted in decisions being taken completely in line with the proposals that the federal government made in inviting the provinces to send representatives to this meeting; and that the conference has proceeded happily and harmoniously and can be regarded, I think, by all who are aware of the facts as a highly successful conference.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker, now that the divorce bills have been disposed of I believe the mood of the house is such that we might revert to the business that was interrupted at five o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that procedure would be agreeable to us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the business under public bills be suspended for this sitting?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The house will now resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

CROP INSURANCE

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCIAL SCHEMES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Harkness for the second reading of Bill No. C-66, to provide for contributions and loans to the provinces in respect of crop insurance.

(Translation):

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted, I was quoting from a statement made by the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley), three weeks ago, in my constituency, as reported in the newspaper L'Éclaireur:

We are not centralizers and our intention is to hand back to the provinces those rights which are theirs.

Now, I wonder whether, under this bill, the government intends to hand back to the provinces their taxation rights, or whether the intention is not merely to have them shoulder a new burden, in view of the proportion of administrative costs for which they will be responsible. It is a very slight proportion, in my opinion, which the federal government is yielding under this bill.

On the other hand, I wonder how the government can introduce such a bill which, to all intents and purposes, commits the provinces without prior consultation with them.

This afternoon, I heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) quote a statement made by the provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan in which, according to the Leader-Post of June 30, 1959, he is reported as having said:

(Text):

"This is one of the greatest insults ever inflicted upon provincial governments by the federal government within my memory," he told the Leader-Post.

Now, if the provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan considers the bill as an insult, we are the more justified in thinking that the Quebec government, after considering it, will describe it as a double affront. I am wondering whether Quebec farmers will benefit from that legislation, as they expect they will, in spite of the inadequate consideration it was given.

On the one hand, supposing the province should not participate in the crop-insurance program, farmers will have no recourse in case of crop failure. On the other hand, western farmers will be able to choose between the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and that new crop insurance legislation, if it is endorsed by the western provinces. Now, as was said by previous speakers, I believe that this crop insurance legislation should have been given closer study, after consultation with provincial representatives and various farm associations. All of them, necessarily would have offered some solutions to the problems which the Minister of Agriculture was bound to face in devising this legislation. In my opinion, if crops are to be protected, the provinces or the taxpayers themselves should not be expected to shoulder the burden of this legislation.

I do hope the minister will give all due consideration to what I said about Quebec farmers in particular, and not only about Quebec farmers, but also about farmers in the maritimes, in Newfoundland and in Ontario.

I ask the minister whether it would not be possible to amend the bill so that those provinces and farmers who are most interested may not have to pay a wholly prohibitive premium.

(Text):

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said by the minister of northern affairs about the situation in Saskatchewan in so far as this bill is concerned. I do not come from that province and therefore I am not going to discuss the particular matters he raises, but it seems odd to me that he should have been so particularly interested in this bill. It would seem odd also that this bill should have been introduced in the last days of this session when the committees have finished their work and there is no opportunity of examining the bill which, in our opinion, is not nearly as important to the people of the west as the minister of northern affairs seems to think it is. However, I think the bill warranted discussion by the various farm organizations and some consideration by the committee on agriculture.

I believe, too, that although this particular report to which he referred came out of the province of Saskatchewan, and may have been a satisfactory survey of the situation in that province, it does not give the national picture. I believe there are many aspects of crop insurance that are not going to receive consideration. This plan was referred to by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) as a crop insurance program that he could accept. I am not familiar with the farming operations in which the minister is engaged, but I am told that he raises hogs. It may be all very well for him to insure the number of hogs that he has on his farm under this crop insurance plan, but I wonder if the minister is not bringing things down to a level to which they probably should not be brought. This reminds me of that story, which I think we heard once before, concerning the time the minister became interested on a personal basis in the planting of potatoes. This was during the time he was an officer in the army.

It appears that the people in the maritimes know how to plant potatoes and grow them because, in discussing the matter the other day, I was told they never have crop failures in the maritimes. However, I understand when the Minister of Agriculture had something to do with the planting of potatoes he did not allow the boys from Nova Scotia or New Brunswick to plant them because he knew how to plant them, and he planted them so deep they never came up. It would appear to me, therefore, although I am told the maritime potato growers would not apply for this type of insurance because they never have a crop failure, the minister could probably arrange it.

A great deal has been said about this measure following the pattern of unemployment insurance. It has been all very well to tell the farmers of western Canada that the workers have been getting something for nothing for a long time under unemployment insurance, but there are a great many differences between this plan for agriculture and the unemployment insurance plan for workers. Let us examine just what both plans do. In the case of unemployment insurance, the fund was established by the federal government. Each time the federal government added new classes to the unemployment insurance scheme they have always put some money into the fund and not made it necessary for the workers who were unemployed to go to their provincial governments to borrow the money, up to a maximum of 75 per cent, as is the case under the crop insurance scheme. The government put in some money which the workers were going to be able to draw against when the payments established an actuarially sound scheme. If crop insurance were going to be operated in the same manner as unemployment insurance then some money from the treasury would have to be put into the crop insurance scheme.

Second, it would not be a provincial scheme, it would be a federal scheme. It would be a scheme which would apply to everybody who was engaged in the production of the particular crops that were brought under the crop insurance scheme. Unemployment insurance is not a voluntary scheme on a regional basis, it is a compulsory scheme. If you work in a particular industry you are brought under the scheme and so if you were a farmer and grew a particular crop then you would automatically have to belong to that scheme.

This brings us again to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. This is a compulsory insurance scheme affecting one or two particular crops. It has been satisfactory to the west. It is not entirely a subsidy because, as the minister of northern affairs has pointed out, some of the provinces have more or less been able to carry the cost of their own schemes. Between 1939 and 1957 in the province of Manitoba the total paid out to farmers was almost $14 million, and they paid in, with their 1 per cent contribution, $16 million, leaving them a credit in the fund. Saskatchewan, on the other hand, paid out more than the contributions which were received. For the $60 million which the farmers paid in, they received almost $140 million in benefits. Now it would be surprising to me if the people of Saskatchewan were to be very interested in changing the form of compulsory crop insurance they have now for one which does not appear to be as advantageous, one which is obviously going to give them 20 per cent, whereas this plan is giving them more than they have put into the scheme. The province of Alberta has received $50 million and paid in $30 million, so it would seem as if the province of Alberta, also, has been getting an advantage.

The minister may argue that this is one of the reasons why there should be a new scheme. If this is the case, why not extend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act on a national basis and apply it to a number of other crops? It has been argued in this house on innumerable occasions in the past that this could be done with very little difficulty, and probably the premium for Canada would not have to be much higher than it is already. As I said before, producers in the maritimes tell us they never have crop failures. Similarly, in the Niagara area there is very seldom a crop failure in more than one or two commodities, and we must bear in mind the wide range of fruits, vegetables and other products which are grown in this region. In my own area, if we have a very dry year and the hay is not too good, it is very likely we will have a bumper crop of grain, because weather conditions never maintain for such a length of time that we have more than a failure or partial failure of more than one crop in a year; it would be unusual to find so much rain that it would result in a crop failure in coarse grain.

As I say, I think this act could be extended. It is a compulsory act, and one which is already in existence. It is a provision which guarantees to farmers that they will have a sum of money in the event of crop failure, and the provinces do not need to borrow in order to meet their liabilities in the event of such a failure. If we look down the list and note the demands which have been made under this scheme we will find that there have been some years when the drain has been tremendous. Let us take, for example, the year 1954, and suppose that the scheme now proposed had been in existence. Payments in Manitoba would have amounted to something over $5 million, and in the province of Saskatchewan, to $21 million. In the province of Saskatchewan, in 1953, it was only $1 million as against $21 million in the following year, and in Manitoba it was $5 million in 1954 as compared with only $619,000 in 1953. So that if we had put this scheme into effect in a year in which there was a large number of people taking it and there happened to be a need for crop insurance, then the province, or the municipalities, or whoever were going to pay the 20 per cent, would be in financial difficulties for a number of years to come.

It does not say in this particular bill whether hogs, chickens, specialized game birds or anything else are to be included. I think that depends entirely on what the provincial governments put into their interpretation of the word "crops". This bill says that a crop is an agricultural crop declared to be a crop for the purpose of the act. I assume this would depend on the regulations enacted by the provinces, and I see no reason why the Minister of Agriculture, if he wished, could not guarantee or insure himself against having less than 12 pigs in a litter, or 15. Thus I see that the bill could offer some particular attraction in the hon. gentleman's own area.

These problems could well be discussed. I am not saying that this is not a good thing. I think that if we are going to extend crop insurance it could probably be worked in a way in which we could also have guaranteed production insurance. This would come in very handy at home, where they would like to be able to guarantee five cans of milk where they only have four cans now, or else to guarantee the four that they are getting at present. I am sure my brother would be very happy to participate in a scheme of this type, though I think he would also want it to be extended so as to guarantee the sale of his milk in case everyone else started to produce the guaranteed amount.

In Ontario we have another problem which I think is quite important. We have experienced a great deal of difficulty in the last two years in southern Ontario with regard to fruits and vegetables, and I am sure that hon. members from all parts of the country have received deputations and letters from various producers, particularly tomato producers, cherry producers, peach producers and other fruit growers in the Niagara peninsula. One of the problems that they will have, and which I can foresee, is that if they insure, say, a crop of tomatoes, and the crop has an estimated value of $100 an acre, then I would assume that the farmer would insure it at that value of $100 an acre. If the farmer gets a bumper crop and he has to meet the payment, and if he finds that his cost of production of that acre of tomatoes runs over $50, and the canners are only offering him $20, I fail to see where he is going to get the money to meet his commitment. Obviously, if he had a bad crop he would be in a better financial position because the amount paid to him consequent upon crop failure would presumably be enough to pay the premium. Many of the producers are not able to market their crops when they have a bumper crop and they tell me that sometimes it is more advantageous for them to leave the products on the trees or on the vines than it is to harvest them. So they are going to be hard pressed about coming into any insurance scheme. The minister is looking at this question from the point of view of eventually eliminating P.F.A.A. The present plan would not offer to Ontario with its many diversified crops the type of crop insurance we had been led to believe this government would implement.

What is being offered under this plan has been suggested by a number of provinces. I was told last fall that this type of insurance was going to be introduced in Manitoba whether or not the federal government participated. I assume they are going to pay their percentage of the cost and have already decided what the premium to the producer is going to be. This plan leaves many questions unanswered and many problems farmers will be faced with unsolved.

The honest way for the government to have handled this would have been to introduce the bill and then refer it either at this session or another session to a committee of this house so that farm organizations and commodity groups insuring under the plan could have had an opportunity to make representations. Failing to do this, the minister is only offering window dressing for political reasons.

I think it is safe to say that some of the provinces will take advantage of the bill if only on an experimental basis. Crop insurance should be applicable to everyone in the country. Rates should be low an easily carried by all farmers. Such a scheme could only be introduced following much more extended study than has been given to the matter. This I suggest could only be done if the government allowed the measure to go to a committee so that interested organizations would have an opportunity to make specific recommendations on crop insurance.

Proposed Crop Insurance

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must tell the house that if the minister speaks at this time he will close the debate.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should comment briefly on some of the statements and criticisms which have been made today with respect to this bill. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) following the same line did a great deal of talking about more study being required before the scheme is put into effect. As I indicated previously, studies of this subject have been conducted for over 20 years. The result of all that study has not been a single, definite, practical plan of crop insurance being brought forward and proposed by anyone prior to the introduction of the present bill.

What hon. gentlemen opposite are saying in effect is that the matter has been studied but now there should be another year of study; it should not be finished up at this session of parliament; the bill should not go through; there should be at least a further year's study in connection with the matter; we should bring in all the farm organizations and conduct a further extensive study in connection with the matter.

All I can say is that for over 20 years the Liberals delayed in bringing a scheme into operation. Now that we have brought in a farm insurance scheme they want to impose a further year's delay or more as far as passage of the bill is concerned.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River brought up the matter of the United States plan. Without definitely saying so I believe he left the impression that the payments made by the federal government in that country were at least as great if not greater than those proposed in this bill. This is simply not the case as I have already indicated when I spoke at the resolution stage. Under the United States crop insurance plan the administration costs are what the federal government pays and if there is any surplus of premiums over the indemnities paid then some of the premium money can be taken in order to pay the administration costs. That has been done in the past few years. As a matter of fact United States law provides a maximum of $1,500,000 a year which can be taken out of the money paid in as premiums in order to pay administration costs. When the plan was first introduced and they suffered considerable losses some of the original capital of the corporation which was used to administer this was used to pay indemnities. At the present time they are getting a surplus and that has been particularly true during the last few years.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River stated that no provision is made in this bill to cover heavy losses if such are experienced under the scheme. As a matter of fact that is what this loan provision is for, so that if heavy losses are experienced in a particular province the financial stability of the province will not be disturbed, due to the fact that we are prepared to loan the province up to 75 per cent of the amount of the losses. That is the whole reason for the loan provision.

The hon. gentleman went on to say that I said that the farm credit bill was one of the most important bills to be introduced in parliament but that I did not say this wih respect to the crop insurance bill. I think it is quite clear that the farm credit bill is a more important bill than the crop insurance one. The farm credit bill goes to the very root of many of our farm problems. It is the type of reform which is necessary if we are to have economic farm units over a large part of this country. Of course, the necessity for improved farm credit exists in every part of the country. The need for farm credit is universal whereas crop insurance needs vary from province to province as I indicated at the resolution stage.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) suggested that the measure should be put over until the next session. I am not surprised at his attitude and in fact I expected him to take that line because he indicated clearly at the resolution stage that he does not really want crop insurance at all. What he wants is a big federal government handout of some kind, but he does not want crop insurance.

Mr. Argue: I never said that at any time.

Mr. Harkness: The whole tenor of the hon. member's speech on the resolution stage was opposition to crop insurance.

Mr. Argue: Nonsense and more nonsense. I even voted for the resolution.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member cited reason after reason and argument after argument as to why crop insurance would not be any good, and why it would not be applicable and so on. He and his friends from Saskatchewan do not want crop insurance now. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources indicated quite clearly in his remarks why they do not want it at this time. They have done a complete about face in regard to the matter.

There was quite a bit of talk on the part of the hon. member for Assiniboia and others concerning the recommendations of the Saskatchewan royal commission. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) said

I was making argument by assertion. I would like to call another witness in support of what is intended in this bill. I would like to call as a witness Mr. E. N. Davis, who is a very strong Liberal, I understand—

Mr. Argue: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: —and who is an editorial writer on the Regina Leader-Post. The hon. member for Assiniboia confirms that that is the case.

It just happens that in today's Globe and Mail there is a guest article by Mr. Davis and it is headed:

C.C.F. Criticism Hits Its Own Commission

This is all in connection with crop insurance, of course. After speaking about the general provisions of the bill, which is now before the house and about the royal commission on crop insurance in Saskatchewan, the article goes on:

The commission boiled down its view on this into 29 recommendations. A study of these shows that one of its basic ideas was that a crop insurance scheme should be "self-liquidating". Elsewhere it defines "self-liquidating", as actuarial soundness in that premiums paid by the farmers are sufficient to pay all claims and administration costs.

I wish the hon. member for Essex East would pay attention to this.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I read it this morning.

Mr. Harkness: I continue:

The body of the report notes a strong advocacy in submissions to the commission for government subsidization. This the commission did not accept in framing its recommendations.

We have heard quite a considerable amount about subsidization. Actually this C.C.F. government-appointed royal commission in Saskatchewan that studied the matter did not recommend any subsidization at all; quite the contrary to what the hon. member for Assiniboia had to say when he said that the commission was recommending a heavily federally subsidized scheme. They did not recommend anything of the kind.

Mr. Argue: Read section 40, page 97 of the report.

Mr. Harkness: You have made your speech. Just try to sit quietly for a few minutes.

Mr. Argue: You should quote the report.

Mr. Harkness: I am quoting this for a purpose because, as you say, this is by a strong Liberal and he works for a strong Liberal paper. I thought the Liberal party should have the advantage of this.

Mr. Argue: It is in the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Harkness: He is certainly not a prejudiced witness for me.

Mr. Argue: What paper?

Mr. Harkness: I think I have already said that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is always good to quote a Liberal.

Mr. Harkness: I continue with the article:

The dominion government's scheme envisages the payment of 20 per cent of the crop insurance premiums out of the treasury. This is being condemned by C.C.F. spokesmen as niggardly.

And it is being condemned by the hon. member for Essex East as niggardly, too.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order,—

Mr. Harkness: This is not in here.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Davis knows me too well to make an assertion that would be so barren of any justification.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member has made his own statement here that this is not nearly enough.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Harkness: And that we should pay a much bigger percentage of the premium; therefore, he is doing exactly the same as Mr. Davis says the C.C.F. is doing, namely saying that it is niggardly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member is wrong. He did not follow my careful argument.

Mr. Harkness: The article goes on:

This is being condemned by C.C.F. spokesmen as niggardly. But it is much more generous than the plan proposed by the C.C.F. Saskatchewan government's own commission. In such criticism of the federal proposal, the C.C.F. is in effect condemning its own royal commission and the soundness of its views—and the value received for the half-million dollars the taxpayers spent on it.

That is what the C.C.F. is doing; that is what the hon. member for Assiniboia and others are doing. As Mr. Davis suggests, they are just condemning their own commission and all the money that was spent on it and the personnel who were on it, of course. The article goes on:

C.C.F. critics also condemn as niggardly the proposed coverage under the federal scheme, 60 per cent of the long-term average yield. This is precisely the recommendation of the Saskatchewan commission. It declared crop insurance offering a higher level of coverage would be too costly to the farmers in premiums.

Critics of the federal plan have raised howls of derision over the proposal that farmers covered by crop insurance no longer would qualify for P.F.A.A. aid. Recommendation No. 20 of the Saskatchewan commission proposes "that areas which qualify for crop insurance be excluded from P.F.A.A. coverage and levies". Again, the proposed federal scheme follows the recommendations of the Saskatchewan commission.

Proposed Crop Insurance

In the proposed payment by Ottawa of 50 per cent of the crop insurance administration costs, Ottawa is being more generous than the commission's plan.

And so on. I think that is sufficient to refute most of what hon. members opposite have said about the administration costs, contributions being made by the federal government not being sufficient, and so on and so forth.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I wish you paid as much attention to your own royal commissions as you do to Saskatchewan's.

Mr. Harkness: If I had made these statements myself the hon. member for Essex East would have said, "These are only allegations on your part", but I know he cannot say that about his friend Mr. Davis.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): These are allegations on Mr. Davis' part.

Mr. Harkness: I think Mr. Davis cites chapter and verse to show that these statements are correct, which the hon. member for Essex East certainly did not do in connection with crop insurance when he was speaking on the matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Davis is an excellent gentleman.

Mr. Harkness: Just as on the resolution stage, the hon. member for Assiniboia devoted a good deal of his time and his remarks to a comparison with prairie farm assistance. Once more I should like to point out to him that prairie farm assistance is not an insurance scheme. Naturally, since it is not an insurance scheme and since payments are not made on an individual basis, the ratio of administration costs to the indemnities paid out is going to be smaller than on a true insurance scheme, and any comparison between prairie farm assistance and a true insurance scheme, such as the one proposed in this bill, is just not a valid comparison, and all that it does is to serve to confuse the issue.

The hon. member for Assiniboia also repeated two or three times that the dominion government is asking the provinces and the farmers to pay 80 per cent of the cost. That is not correct and he knows it is not correct. We are paying 80 per cent of the premium cost—

Mr. Argue: How much?

Mr. Harkness: I am sorry, 20 per cent of the premium cost and the other 80 per cent of the premium cost the provinces can pay any part or all as they wish, or they do not have to pay any if they do not want to. But, in addition, we are also paying 50 per cent of the administration cost. The result is that we shall be paying approximately 25 per cent of the total cost of this scheme and not 20 per cent as the hon. member for Assiniboia kept repeating.

The hon. member for Assiniboia went into considerable detail in talking about arbitrary action on the part of the dominion government. As far as this scheme is concerned, there is nothing arbitrary in the world about this legislation or about the way it is being brought in. As a matter of fact, the legislation is extremely generous, as I think a very large number of people will realize, and it provides for very large contributions of federal funds which will be made available to assist provinces in putting insurance schemes into effect. If anyone can say it is arbitrary on the part of the dominion government to say to all provinces, "if you want to put in an insurance scheme we will contribute 25 per cent of the cost of your putting that scheme into operation" I think the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Essex East will have a very difficult time in trying to sell that contention to the people of this country.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a question?

Mr. Harkness: I would like to get this through before six o'clock and I should like to carry on.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I had a very good question.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jorgenson) made an exceptionally good speech in connection with this matter. He indicated that he was a farmer and that he understood the thing, which most of the people speaking on the bill have not done. They have not had the farm background in order to understand the scheme as the hon. member for Provencher has.

The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) made quite a point that the scheme should apply to the east just as much as to the west. It does. That is one of the purposes of the scheme. Members of the C.C.F. have been arguing that we should extend P.F.A.A. payments to the whole country. That is just not a possibility. P.F.A.A. is based on collecting a levy on grain which is handled through the wheat board. You cannot very well make a levy on apples, cherries, peaches and things of that sort. It just would not work. It is not practical.

Mr. Boulanger: Why not?

Mr. Harkness: Those who say that we should extend P.F.A.A. to the rest of the country indicate that they really have no knowledge of the problems involved and of what an insurance scheme should be.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, these other crops are marketed through important agencies.

Mr. Harkness: One of the basic things in favour of the bill is that it does and can apply to every province.

Mr. Benidickson: But will not.

Mr. Harkness: In each particular province the province itself can lay down the details of the scheme and make them such as will apply to agriculture in that province. That is one of the reasons why it is essential that we have a scheme of this sort with considerable flexibility so that it can meet the widely differing agricultural conditions that we have in different parts of the country.

The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska said that the eastern provinces had been ignored in other agricultural matters. That is quite true but the people who ignored them were the Liberal government who were in power for the previous 22 years.

Mr. Boulanger: Last year they were ignored.

Mr. Harkness: That is a criticism of the party to which he belongs. The measures we have brought in have not ignored the eastern provinces. As a matter of fact, one of the chief complaints I run into from western Canada is that we have given far too much to eastern Canada and not enough to western Canada.

Mr. Boulanger: Under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act you ignored the farmers of the east last year.

Mr. Harkness: This measure is one which applies to all parts of the country in the same way that our other agricultural measures have.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) made quite a temperate speech on which I should like to compliment him. He says that the C.C.F. supports crop insurance. My only comment on that is that he should tell that to the hon. member for Assiniboia because he does not seem to understand it.

Mr. Argue: Wrong again.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Kootenay West said that this was experimental legislation and he took that as a reason why there should be a lot more study of it. However, as I have said, there has been all kinds of study. What is needed now is to get the scheme or schemes into operation so that we can see how the legislation will work out in practice. That is why I think it is essential to get the bill through, thus providing an opportunity for schemes to be put into operation and for the experimental work which is needed to be done.

The hon. member for Essex East delivered himself of many words and much sound but in what he said there was not much relationship to crop insurance and to the problems under discussion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was following the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton).

Mr. Harkness: He stated that the bill is not a generous measure.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I repeat that.

Mr. Harkness: This morning I quoted a Winnipeg Free Press editorial, and the Free Press does not agree with him. They think it is too generous.

Mr. Benidickson: No, they did not say that.

Mr. Harkness: They think it is too generous.

Mr. Benidickson: They did not say that.

Mr. Harkness: The premier of Manitoba does not agree with him, and he will find there will be all kinds of people who will not agree with him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The premier of Manitoba does not agree with this government on a lot of things.

Mr. Harkness: As I said a few moments ago, the great majority of people in the country will say that it is an extremely generous bill, as it is. The hon. member for Essex East made a great point of asking the rhetorical question time after time, "What provinces will enter? We know of only one so far." And so on. I might point out that at the resolution stage he made exactly the same sort of statement but at that time he said that no province would enter. He has conveniently forgotten that now and says that only one will enter because in the meantime Manitoba has said that it will.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They announced that last December.

Mr. Harkness: His judgment on this matter at the resolution stage when he said that no provinces would enter is just as sound as his present judgment when he says that no other provinces will enter. In other words, he just does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a powerful argument.

Mr. Benidickson: If they enter they ignore their royal commission.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think that the hon. member for Essex East understands that this is an insurance scheme, subsidized, it is true. What he apparently is arguing for is much the same thing as the hon. member for Assiniboia is arguing for, that we should give a great big handout of some kind and of a very generalized nature but not an insurance scheme.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When did I say that?

Mr. Harkness: That is the tenor of all your remarks and statements.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Harkness: I think I have the floor and the hon. member is merely trying to interrupt.

Mr. Speaker: If there is a point of order I must hear the hon. member.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In raising my point of order I would simply observe that the minister would not have these interruptions if he would carry out and observe the decencies of debate, but since he is not I would remind him that he cannot point to anything I said that would justify his last statement. The minister is obviously irritated because we insist on eliciting from him facts which he does not want to give the house.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is scarcely a point of order. It is a matter of correction which I think would be more properly made after the minister has finished his speech.

Mr. Harkness: I was just going to point out that this is the same type of alleged or phony point of order that the hon. member constantly gets on his feet to raise, thus interrupting and delaying the proceedings of the house. He is accusing me of not carrying on the debate in the proper form. He interrupts with phony points of order of this sort and destroys proper debate in the house more than anybody else.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Argue: Like two schoolboys.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —the hon. member has said that I raise phony points of order. I suggest to you that the adjective "phony" in this context is unparliamentary, unworthy of the Minister of Agriculture and should be withdrawn.

Mr. Harkness: Well—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let the Speaker decide. You are not the Speaker.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I see that you give the attention to that remark which it deserves, complete silence.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If my hon. friend is going to take this line he will find that others can take it too.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am speaking to a point of order.

Mr. Harkness: Have I not got the floor, Mr. Speaker? I think you ruled that this was not a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Essex East has taken offence at the word "phony", and I leave it to the minister who has the floor to take that into consideration because it has given offence to the hon. member.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

Mr. Argue: You are both out of order. It is past six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has made his point of order and I should like to give the minister the chance to withdraw the statement if he feels so inclined.

Mr. Harkness: I have no idea what should be withdrawn. This is the first time I have heard that the word "phony" is not parliamentary. If you find it is not parliamentary I will withdraw it of course, but to my knowledge it is not unparliamentary. Actually, as somebody sitting to the rear of me has said, it is very appropriate in this case.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I did not say it was unparliamentary. I simply drew attention to the fact that it was offensive to the hon. member. I see it is six o'clock and probably a very good time to adjourn.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I had been replying to some of the comments and criticisms made by some hon. members opposite in their speeches on second reading of the crop insurance bill. I had practically completed that matter and there is just one other thing about which I think I should say something.

I think the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) indicated either that he had not read the bill or, if he had read it, that he did not understand it because he was talking about insurance for pigs, game cocks and various other types of livestock. I think it is understood by probably every other member of the house that the crop insurance bill is designed to apply to crops that are grown from the ground. There has never been any intention of insuring livestock, machinery used on the farm or anything else along that line.

The hon. member for Timiskaming says that the bill might be all right for the minister and others who raise hogs, that it might be satisfactory to them to insure their hogs and so on. I want to correct any impression which anyone may have that there was any intention at any time to insure livestock. This is a crop insurance scheme. In other words, it insures crops which grow from the ground —whether it is barley or any other types of crop of that kind—but does not insure what are ordinarily classed together as livestock and chattels.

I think I should at the same time comment on the story which he told in connection with my alleged potato planting activities during the war in England, a story which has been repeated here at least once or twice previously and in very incorrect form. As hon. members know, in 1941, I think it was, there was an army order to all units in England that they were to grow as much of their own food as they could and were to use any land that was not in use for agricultural purposes adjacent to where they were billeted. In pursuance of that order we were given a little bit of heath which happened to be a bit of a dip and therefore was not covered with bushes and so on, and we were told to put in some garden.

I looked it over and decided that perhaps the only thing that could be planted on it was potatoes. Of course the boys in the battery were not very anxious to go to work planting potatoes so they raised all sorts of complaints such as that we had no equipment, no machinery or anything else and that therefore we could not put in this potato crop. I therefore went out to the nearest farm and borrowed a plow, and in planting these potatoes I followed the system which I had seen employed back in 1910 and 1911 by settlers who were coming into western Canada at that time and moving on to homesteads where there was nothing but sod. In other words, it was a matter of plowing a furrow, dropping the potatoes along it and turning the next furrow over them. You do not get a very good potato crop but you get something. We produced quite a few potatoes in spite of the scoffing or the objections, we will say, of some of the men in the battery who were not at all anxious to go into this type of activity.

To sum up, the criticisms which have been made of this bill really revolve around two contentions which have been made by opposition members. The first of these is that the bill should be referred to a committee of the house or to a dominion-provincial conference for further study. I have pointed out, as hon. members know, that at this stage of the session—and I think everybody here is agreed that we would probably be able to complete this session in some two weeks' time or a little less—what this demand amounts to is a demand or a request that we do not proceed with the bill.

Mr. Benidickson: No. I quoted the Prime Minister as saying in 1957 that should be done.

Mr. Harkness: Hon. members know that there is just not time to refer this bill to either a committee or a conference, to carry on the type of study they have been talking about and to get the bill through at this session. In other words, it is really a demand to drop the bill and that, of course, is something that we are not prepared to do.

I have pointed out also, that further study would not likely accomplish any practical purpose. The matter of crop insurance, as has been said here many times, has been under study for approximately 20 years. What we require at the present time is not further study; what we require is actual experience. That experience can be secured only by the passage of the bill and the consequent setting up of an insurance scheme or schemes in various provinces. On the basis of the experience secured and as a result of it, then I think perhaps a further study of the experience secured would be well worth while; and I would hope that a study might well be carried on at that time along the lines which had been suggested. However, I do not think that any good practical purpose would be served by attempting to make any further study at the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Unlike federal-provincial relations.

An hon. Member: More Liberal procrastination.

Mr. Harkness: The second general criticism which was made was that the bill does not provide enough in the way of dominion government assistance. All I can do is to repeat again that the bill provides more assistance, as far as the dominion treasury is concerned, than does the United States crop insurance bill; it provides more assistance than was recommended by the Saskatchewan royal commission which studied crop insurance.

and it provides more assistance than the Winnipeg Free Press editorialists at least think should be provided.

I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that most people who examine the bill and give any study to it will feel quite certain that the bill is a practical means of dealing with the crop insurance program. It provides assistance on the part of the dominion government on very generous terms indeed. I am quite sure that some of the crop insurance schemes set up under it by the provinces—of which I at least am confident there will be quite a number—will be successful in removing the instability which has been a curse to farmers, particularly in some parts of this country, ever since farming has been carried on in those areas.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, the minister referred to a number of the provinces which he thought would likely subscribe to this bill. Will he indicate his expectations in this respect?

Mr. Harkness: As I have indicated to the hon. member and others previously, I am not one who is given to the art of prophecy. At the resolution stage the hon. member said he was quite sure no province would come into this scheme. Since then Manitoba has indicated that it is coming in. I am quite confident that in the course of time probably every province in this country, with the possible exception of Newfoundland, will have put into effect a scheme of crop insurance.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Argue: I was delighted just a moment ago to be able, in the most effective way possible, to demonstrate once again to the Minister of Agriculture and the minister for northern affairs that they are entirely wrong in their interpretation of the attitude of the members of the C.C.F. group. But so many things which hon. gentlemen opposite have said in recent days have proven to be wrong that this is scarcely any longer an event.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): You certainly scrambled through the brambles.

Mr. Argue: The hon. gentleman, with the fussy mind that he has, would know more about that than anyone else. However, on this clause I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture what further study is being given by the officials in his department to the details of the kind of crop insurance plan which they would hope to be able to work out with the provinces. I should like to know from the minister, with his officials in front of him, whether or not any officials in his department will be carrying out further studies within the next few months and whether there will be further general discussions as to how crop insurance schemes may be worked out with the provinces. I am wondering whether, even at this late date, there will be any general conference with the provinces to discuss the type of insurance agreements which may be signed under this act.

Mr. Harkness: The general provisions as far as any schemes to be put into effect are concerned are to be found in clauses 5 and 6. Within the ambit of those clauses we shall enter into an agreement with any province which wishes to put a scheme of crop insurance into effect. Such agreements will have the details spelled out in them according to the type or types of crops a province may wish to insure.

Mr. Argue: There is no contemplation, I take it, of any general discussion with the provinces as far as working out agreements are concerned. All I really want to know from the minister is whether the kind of federal-provincial conference that we have been advocating to discuss crop insurance will now be held in the light of the principles outlined in the bill as it now stands or as it will be passed by parliament, details only to be worked out.

Mr. Harkness: There is nothing of that kind in contemplation, but if a majority of the provinces were to indicate to me that they would like to have a conference of that kind I would be quite glad to have a conference with them. But I see no great need for that. I think the main thing is to work out particular agreements with particular provinces. However as I say, if there is any demand on the part of the majority of the provinces for a conference such as this I would be glad to hold such a conference. We have received no such requests.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the statement the minister has now made. It represents a substantial retreat from the position he took before, namely to oppose the holding of a federal-provincial conference on this question. It would have been much more satisfactory and more in keeping with good federal-provincial relations to have had the conference before the general division of financial responsibility was set out in this bill but the minister's retreat is at least of some value. He has retreated from his former position. It is an advance in his thinking which has led him to make this strategic retreat. But even at this late date I think such a conference is necessary.

For the past two days in this city a federal-provincial conference has been held. I am not going to endeavour to discuss the general subject of federal-provincial relations on this bill but I believe I would be very much in order in pointing out to the committee an item in the press communiqué issued following the conference which has an important bearing on this type of legislation. I refer to item No. 5 in the subjects listed for further consideration by the continuing committee. This list follows the announcement that a further conference will be held in mid-October. The fifth subject listed for consideration by the continuing committee at that time is as follows:

> Conditional grants and shared-cost programs. Their motivation and place in the scheme of intergovernmental financial relations. Possible means of co-ordination and simplification. Consideration of specific areas of co-operation.

I believe that item is an important one. Even though the government did not have the courtesy to call the provinces into conference before this legislation was handed to them I nevertheless hope that at the forthcoming conference or at a special conference this subject can be pursued and problems can be discussed in relation to the crop insurance legislation which will then be on the statute books.

I do not wish at this juncture to reiterate the criticisms I have made of this legislation but I must say we feel it is not in keeping with the central recommendation of the Saskatchewan royal commission, namely that the cost of crop insurance must be borne in the main by the federal government with that government accepting the major responsibility, and that the cost to farmers should not be excessive.

I thank the minister for leaving open the door for a conference this fall on the question of crop insurance. The conference would have been much more valuable before the government presented this legislation as a fait accompli. The argument advanced by the minister concerning why the bill could not be referred to the standing committee on agriculture at this stage of the session is not at all valid. The legislation could well have been referred to the committee. We could have had witnesses before that committee within 48 hours. We could have given detailed and comprehensive study to the bill. One thing stood in the way, namely the government's fear of the kind of criticism that would be made by some provinces at least and certainly by farm organizations who have been very critical of the legislation and of the fact that it was not sent to a committee.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I feel I should make clear immediately that any so-called retreat about which the hon. member was talking exists only in his imagination. There has been no retreat or change in my position in regard to this matter. This government has always stood ready to meet representatives from the provinces to discuss any matter they wanted to discuss when a majority indicated they wished to have a meeting of that kind. That has been the situation with regard to any matter and it remains the situation. If the majority of the provinces want to hold a meeting to discuss this bill on crop insurance generally I am quite prepared to meet with them but I have received no demands for such a meeting on part of the provinces. The hon. member for Assiniboia is trying to twist what I call our general position of willingness to meet with the provinces into a change in attitude. There has been no change whatever.

Mr. Argue: The change has been that the minister now says that he and the federal government stand ready to meet the provinces if a majority wish such a meeting on the question of crop insurance. That offer was never made, or certainly never made in public, prior to the statement the minister has just now made. As a matter of fact every time there has been a suggestion that this proposed legislation should be placed before a federal-provincial conference the minister has refused by saying: What good can a conference accomplish because we have had all kinds of commissions and studies and we do not need any more conferences; what we need is legislation. This is a changed attitude on the part of the minister.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, we are now in detailed examination of the clauses of the bill. There is not too much difference between any quarter of the committee concerning a desire to have crop insurance if it can be made operative on a feasible basis.

There was some glee on the part of the government as to the previous discussion concerning the fact that the bill passed second reading without dissent. I spoke earlier about this and said that it was a tragedy that an important matter of this kind announced in the speech from the throne on January 15 was not unveiled in detail to the Canadian public until June 29 and I continue to hold that view.

As much as I would like to see encouragement for crop insurance I also continue to hold the view that there would be no additional delay in any practical way if we were able to have committee discussions where we could get the views of the provinces and the farm organizations. I do not want to be repetitive at this late stage of the session but I hold that view very strongly.

If I were a betting man I would say to my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture that I bet he will not get from any of the ten provinces in Canada within the next 12 months a bill that institutes anything. The speech from the throne said that this government was going to institute a program of crop insurance. I suggest that, even with respect to the province of Manitoba it is most unlikely that we shall have anything effective there. It might be different if we had taken more time to examine and improve the bill.

In Saskatchewan, as the minister knows, the commission went only so far as to suggest that they have a pilot scheme. This afternoon I quoted the views of the Manitoba farm union organization saying that that was not adequate and I hope that is not what is in the mind of the minister or in the mind of the minister of agriculture for Manitoba. If anything is to be done on a hasty basis, then it should not be just a token pilot scheme but something with something tangible in it.

The principle of this bill has been approved, as the recent vote showed, by all groups in the house; but those on this side of the house continue to think that I was not very far wrong when I said, after reading the resolution, that this was a rather empty gesture, and the escape hatches were such that it was not likely in the near future to be taken advantage of by very many provincial governments.

Then, on June 29, and all day today we challenged the Minister of Agriculture to indicate to us any element of evidence which would give him confidence that any of the 10 provinces, beyond the one province cited, was likely to do something as a result of this legislation. He admitted provinces were not consulted; they did not know the salient features of the bill, so the provinces start from here. Therefore, under these circumstances there is no reason whatsoever for this parliament to be deprived of an opportunity to investigate all the aspects of this new area of federal participation in a citizens' program.

As I remember it, the last time that we had a parliamentary committee considering crop insurance was in 1939, and much has happened since that time. The minister spoke about Manitoba. He has had a week from June 29 until today to receive from many quarters friendly counsel and opinions about his bill. He has not indicated to us in any way whether anybody other than the minister of agriculture of Manitoba has paid attention to this bill.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I think the people of Canada will be interested to know that now this bill has reached this stage the truth of the matter comes out. The people of Canada are going to be offered the opportunity of making representations on this bill, but they also will be well advised of the fact that they have not been allowed to make their representations when they would have done the most good, namely on the principle of the bill. They are asked to make their representations only on the details of the bill.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I notice in the Canadian Parliamentary Guide that the minister at one time was a school teacher. I also understand that he disagrees with my definition of what could come under this clause, which refers to "crop". His officials may sneer and laugh. This is their right, but I suggest they should have given more consideration to this and then the minister might have had a little better bill. It says in the Oxford dictionary that crop includes quite a number of things. Hon. members may laugh at my reference to the dictionary but in so far as some of them are concerned they could further their education by taking a look at a dictionary. As a matter of fact, in so far as some of them are concerned, there are a lot of things that could be a help to their education, and not only in this regard. There are a number of definitions of the word "crop". I suggest that if hon. members read the definitions they will find that among other things it includes the produce of cultivated plants, especially cereals. Then, it refers to the season's total yield of cereals, and among other things we find "the entire hide of an animal tanned". There are quite a number of other things, Mr. Chairman.

I suggest that this legislation could conceivably cover any conceivable crop that is declared under this act by the regulations to be a crop. I suggest that the minister is wrong and that he should certainly know these things because of his educational background. He should know that crops are made up of quite a number of things and could include quite a number of things. If the regulations were so designed, I am quite sure they could cover any type of agricultural produce, including pigs, chickens and crops of lots of other things that are produced agriculturally. I am suggesting that this may not be a bad thing, Mr. Chairman, that there may be a time when we will want to include all the agricultural crops under this insurance scheme, particularly if it works out as well and as advantageously as the minister has suggested.

I suggest that this definition gives considerable latitude to the minister, and unless he is willing to amend the bill now he is going to have to accept the fact that the regulations could be so designed as to cover almost any agricultural crop. I think there are a number of people in the agricultural field who hope that it will go so far as to cover the products of bees in the production of honey.

Mr. Harkness: I think I should just say that the hon. member is very much out of place in attacking officials of this department and making remarks about them which are in no way justified. I deplore attacks of that kind by the hon. member, as someone said behind me at the time he was making the attack, on people who are in no position to defend themselves.

In addition to this, the hon. member, of course, on speaking on second reading indicated, as I said, that he either had not read the bill or did not understand the bill. He was talking about pigs being insured, and things of that kind. Every other member of the house, I am certain, and every farmer in the country knows and has known that crop insurance was intended for crops which are grown, not for livestock and things of that kind. The hon. member now is just trying to cover up a serious error he made.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder whether the minister has ever heard of the broadcasting committee, where every day we get attacks by Conservative members on officials?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question on "crop". If the peach growers of the Niagara district wanted to insure themselves under this legislation I understand that Ontario would need to be a participating province, and I think the minister said at the resolution stage that 25 per cent of the peach growers would need to enter the scheme. Is that right?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, certainly peaches or any other fruit can be brought under the crop insurance scheme if the province wishes to do so and enters into an agreement with us to cover a crop of that kind. As to the matter of the 25 per cent which I mentioned, we have not written that into the act for the very reason that we want to leave a little flexibility. According to the regulations under which we propose to operate we think that we will place the minimum at 25 per cent. In some cases it may be 25 per cent of the number of producers and in other cases 25 per cent of the acreage covered. I think you can see that you might run into difficulty if you said 25 per cent of the producers or if you said 25 per cent of the acreage. Consequently we want to leave it a bit flexible so that we can vary our agreements with the different provinces to some slight extent in order to make the scheme practical.

Mr. McMillan: Would it be the onus of the province to set the premium risk on each crop or would the federal government do that?

Mr. Harkness: It is provided in the legislation that the premium rate must be established on the basis of what the long term average yield is in the particular area covered for that particular type of crop.

Mr. Benidickson: To be decided by your department.

Mr. Harkness: No, it is provided that this will be arrived at by statistical means. Of course we have statistical information mostly in the bureau of statistics which comes under my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River knows that there are very extensive statistics as far as grain crops are concerned, and it is quite easy to determine what the long term average is for grain crops. For some of the other crops the statistics are not nearly as complete and we would have to come to an agreement with the province as to what period of years would be taken to determine what the long term average was on the basis of the statistics that were available.

Mr. Benidickson: I could ask perhaps ten questions of a similar nature, but when one looks at clause 2, subclause (g) he sees that there is reference to establishing a scheme of insurance with the provinces. I still think it is pertinent to ask the minister to inform his colleagues in the House of Commons from what provinces he expects ready acceptance of the terms of the bill. I think he should also tell us whether he expects acceptance to take place within one year, five years or never.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this is really direct repetition. We have had this same thing time after time at the resolution stage, on second reading and again now in committee of the whole. I have said on every occasion that I am not engaging in prophecy in regard to these matters. We have never had legislation of this type in Canada before and therefore to ask me to say what provinces are going to come in, when they are going to come in and so forth is simply not a reasonable question.

Mr. Benidickson: I would only comment that if the shoe were on the other foot and there were some assurance as a result of past negotiations and intimate contact I am sure the minister would be the first one to come forward and assert in the house that he was sure that so and so and so and so would agree. This emphasizes the fact that here we have a bill without any indication that it will appeal to one, two or a majority of the provinces.

Mr. Peters: Before this clause carries I should like to refer to what the minister has said about my comment with respect to his officials. I know the opinion of the minister in this regard and I can only assume that my comment was considered to be hilarious or it would not have produced the expression it did. I am not the least bit impressed with the ability of ministers who have to depend on advisers to give them information when they should have it themselves if they are top of the department they are handling. That is my personal opinion and I am entitled to it. I understand that in Great Britain there are no advisers on the floor of the house there. A minister there learns about his department and is then able to conduct his own affairs. I resent the idea of officials passing opinions on something that I think is right when I say it. If it is not correct, then it is certainly the right of any member including the minister, to say so. Officials should not presume to pass this type of comment.

Mr. Harkness: May I just say that the hon. member has no business making these remarks. Any remarks he has made in connection with officials passing information which he apparently thought was directed against himself are entirely the product of his own imagination. There were no remarks made of any kind along that line and therefore the hon. member is speaking on the basis of a completely false assumption.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the minister's tirade is completely out of order and completely uncalled for. It is not the prerogative of the minister to say what any member of parliament can utter in this house.

Mr. Churchill: He can object to it.

Mr. Argue: If any minister or any member of the house disagrees with a statement made by any hon. member it is his prerogative to rise on a point of order and to raise the question with the chair. This the minister failed to do and it is the minister himself who is transgressing the rules of the house.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, I should just like to point out that, of course, while there is no point of order to begin with, it is quite evident that the hon. member for Timiskaming made a false assumption and on that basis he attacked the officials here. As I say, he had no right to do so.

Mr. Regier: He has a right.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Contributions.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, the second paragraph of section 4 reads as follows:

The loans that may be made to a province under an agreement shall not exceed in any year 75 per cent of the amount by which the indemnities required to be paid under, etc.—

I wish the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) would tell me what the rate of interest will be on loans granted to the provinces.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Any time it becomes necessary for the dominion government to make a loan to a province to meet indemnities the interest rate would be the cost of money to the federal government plus the usual small service charge. I think it is generally one-eighth of one per cent or something like that.

Mr. Argue: I have a suggestion to make to the minister and I make it with great deference and in the hope that he will consider it. I appreciate that the statement he has now made is an important one and I appreciate that as far as the minister himself is concerned he has every desire and every intention of fulfilling that statement. But I think the bill would be in much better form, and I am certain that the provinces would wish this to be done, if in setting forth that loans may be made to the provinces the interest rate were spelled out or the formula that will be used in establishing the interest rate. I think that kind of general clause is in other legislation and in my opinion it is more businesslike to have it spelled out. At the time that a province may need money under this clause, if such a time comes, the present minister may not be the minister of agriculture. I am not wishing to say that he will not be in the government at that time. He may have what we call a promotion. There may be a new minister, and certainly no statement in Hansard is equal to a provision in the law. I would suggest that the minister have this clause stand, that he seek any advice he wishes about the draftsmanship of it, and that he give consideration to spelling out a formula that will be used in the setting of interest rates on loans that may be made to the provinces to cover conditions set forth in this bill.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Argue: I would appreciate a statement from the minister.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think there is any necessity for doing that. The hon. member knows that there will be no need for any loans for at least well over a year in any event. This is a matter which will be covered also in the agreement with the province. This would constitute part of the agreement with the province, indicating what the rate of interest would be and so on and the question of the rate of interest would be determined.

Mr. Argue: These would be a number of agreements. The minister is now saying it will be spelled out in the agreement and presumably every agreement would have the same interest rate. But that does not necessarily follow. I think this is a rather slipshod method of draftsmanship which leaves such an important provision to decision at some later date when it could be spelled out in the law itself.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Mr. Argue: Clause 4 reads in part as follows:

4. (1) The contribution payable to a province under an agreement shall be paid in respect of each year and shall be the total of

(a) fifty per cent of the expenses incurred by the province in that year in the administration of the insurance scheme; and

(b) if the province has by the agreement undertaken to pay a share of the premiums, the lesser of

(i) the amount required to reimburse the province for the share of the premiums paid by it in that year, or

(ii) twenty per cent of the premiums paid in respect of policies of insurance in that year.

The minister has said many times that a province will not be required to pay any premiums whatsoever. I think I understand what the clause means but it does require, in the initial stages at any rate, the provinces to pay a share of the premiums. On the surface this provision seems very much at variance with the statement the minister made so many times during the debate, namely that a province would not be required —if it did not wish to do so—to make any contribution towards premiums. The minister can now stand up and say, if he thinks it proper to do so, that this is merely a bookkeeping arrangement, that the province will pay initially and that at some later date the federal government will reimburse the province. Then I should like to know what the length of the period will be from the time the province pays this money into the fund until the federal government reimburses the province.

Would it not be much better and would it not be more accurate in the context of the statement by the minister, to provide that the federal contribution shall be paid directly to the fund and directly to the provincial corporation or agency that is operating the crop insurance and not by this law require the province, at least in the initial stages, to pay a share of the premiums?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I must say that when the draft of this bill came back to us and I saw this particular clause about which the hon. member has been talking I was alarmed that the draftsmen had not carried into effect the intention which we had in mind as far as the bill was concerned. But they explained to me that this was the particular drafting device which they found it necessary to employ because each scheme will be a provincially administered scheme; and therefore the proper legal way of handling it was for the province to pay into the fund. In other words, if they are running the fund themselves as a branch of government in the province they would make a proper bookkeeping entry and then call upon us for the cash to meet the 20 per cent of the premiums cost or the 50 per cent of the administration costs. Otherwise if they had a crown corporation running it, they would hypothecate that amount to the corporation and then ask us to put up that amount; and the time which would elapse between the two would be quite short, I understand.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say how long "quite short" would be?

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. Argue: Would it be some months?

Mr. Harkness: No. They tell me the transfer of funds would be quite rapid.

Mr. Argue: I appreciate the explanation the minister has given but I think it would be much better to have in this clause such other words as "or provincial agency or crown corporation or such other authority as may be providing crop insurance within the province". As the matter now stands, it will be possible—and maybe this is the reason it is here and maybe it is not—for members or for other people to say, "Yes; look at the position of the federal government. The province pays something into the fund but we reimburse them".

The intention of the clause was to get a magic contribution out of the provinces. In the light of the minister's statement to the house on second reading I think that he was quite right in being disturbed at the draftsmanship of this clause. I think this kind of draftsmanship is open to misrepresentation and to misunderstanding. Surely the legal people in the Department of Justice, the legal officers who are available to the minister, can do a better job of drafting this clause than to draft it in such a way to offend or to raise questions in the mind of the minister when he initially read it; and I think the minister is perfectly right in his reaction.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I explained how this matter came about. All I can say is that neither the hon. member nor I are lawyers. I think we are obliged to accept the opinion of the justice department and the justice officials, who are experts in this matter of drafting and spend all their time on it, when they say that this is the correct way to have the thing drafted in order to carry this intent into effect.

Mr. Argue: The Minister of Agriculture has much greater faith than I in the wisdom of the officials to whom he refers. Yesterday we had not only an instance of the officials in the Department of Justice drafting certain clauses in a bill but of the Minister of Justice himself piloting the measure through the house, and we will all agree that the Minister of Justice is himself a very eminent lawyer. However, you would hardly recognize some of the clauses after parliament itself had improved on what was very slipshod phraseology when the bill was first introduced in the house. All I do at this time on this clause is to protest what the government is doing to the provinces that come under this legislation.

It is recognized by everyone who knows anything about agricultural conditions in Canada that Saskatchewan is not only a major agricultural province but that it is the province of greatest risk. It is the province where there are the greatest number of crop failures. Under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act experience shows that crop failures in Saskatchewan have resulted in payments being made to producers in one year, namely in 1954, as high as almost $22 million. It is Saskatchewan where the great crop losses can take place.

It is Saskatchewan, the Saskatchewan government, the Saskatchewan treasury that the minister is asking by this measure to underwrite the losses. Let no one be misled into thinking that the 20 per cent that the federal government agrees to pay of the premiums means 20 per cent of the losses, because the losses can pile up initially into tremendous losses running into tens of millions of dollars. It will not bankrupt the provincial treasury, initially at any rate, because the federal government will lend the province the money; but it is the province that under this legislation is required to pay and to take up the losses. This legislation is no gift; it is legislation that individuals in high risk areas in Saskatchewan can comply with and can use only at very high cost.

I think the people of Saskatchewan will resent what is in fact discrimination directed against that province because ours is the high risk province, just in the same way as the legislation under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is directed to help in a substantial way the producers in Saskatchewan who are in a high risk area. This also applies, but not to the same degree, of course, to the province of Alberta. This is one of the clauses in this legislation which will be up for public debate. It is one of the clauses which I think is inadequate and that I shall be glad to debate on any occasion with the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and the Minister of Agriculture.

They can dress up this legislation in any way they wish. They can make far-reaching statements that this is going to take care of the incomes of agricultural producers so that they will not have an experience like they had in the thirties, and they can make other statements which mean very little. But the fact is that the people of Saskatchewan, the farmers through individual payments and/or the provincial treasury have to pay a very high cost to use this legislation, and I hesitate not at all in saying that the principles followed in prairie farm assistance have much more to commend them than the inadequate principles in this bill which we hope in the days ahead, after so much criticism on our part, will be improved.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I regard this particular clause as the key and hub of everything we have been talking about, particularly with respect to our expected partners, the provinces. I think that we have to look at this very carefully indeed, and I am quite satisfied that the minister should look again upon his requirement of the provinces with respect to loans advanced by Canada. The minister says in this bill that the loans shall be repayable upon terms that the cabinet at Ottawa unilaterally decides. I do not think that that is going to encourage any provincial government that has any caution at all to go very far toward doing the kind of thing that on all sides of the house we want to see done, namely to establish crop insurance. I think, as I explained earlier, that inasmuch as the federal cabinet is in charge of the actuarial soundness of any scheme in any province they should under those circumstances agree that when loans are made, if the terms of payment of those loans are in accord with what they laid down, they should continue to be the primary lender and retain the primary responsibility. On the contrary, under this bill they can just demand and ask for payment at any time without adequate appreciation of the provincial final liability in this respect.

That I think is of the essence. I do not oppose the thought that it is desirable in a widespread country like ours to have provincial administration in matters of this kind; but, as I said earlier, in every royal commission report that I have looked at the conclusion is that the long term, ultimate liabilities are beyond what a provincial royal commission would advise a provincial government to assume. The commissions say that there is the desirability of having this kind of insurance, but they also say that the diversification must be wider than within one province. However, I find elsewhere in this bill an arbitrary clause which enables the federal government to dictate the terms of these loans, the clause providing the 75-25 per cent proportion. It is not subject to mutual agreement; the loans are settled by the federal organization. I would say that if I were in the provincial sphere I would be very hesitant indeed to undertake the risks which are explained in some of the royal commission reports on crop insurance which I have read.

I think that the minister should look again at this particular clause. I suggest to him that if at the initial stage he and his advisers are in complete charge of determining what is actuarially sound in so far as crop insurance is concerned, it is not right to present a bill and say, "We will loan the provinces 75 per cent of a loss after a bad year", when the provinces have had nothing to do with respect to the assessment of the rates and have not the resources for taking care of emergencies such as many of us remember. Under these circumstances I think that this clause, probably more than anything else in the bill, is likely to be responsible for the failure on the part of sensible provincial administrators to take advantage of this worthy proposal that we should have a national crop insurance scheme.

Mr. Chairman, I am very serious about this. The minister has emphasized the long term aspect. I think he will agree with me that in examining some of the points which have come to light from experience of the only known crop insurance scheme that we have on this continent, namely in the United States, he will find that they have had some difficulty because their rates and their organization are based on too short a term of experience.

The minister seemed to agree with me when he began to talk about the experience from, say 1926 up to the present time, but in western Canada, fortunately, we have very complete and helpful information about crop records in every category going back as far as that date. So if the minister insists that his scheme must be approved by him as actuarially sound, I say that is not much of an encouragement for the provinces. If he then says: I assume no ultimate contingent liability; I only promise after the end of one crop year to lend you 25 per cent of your indemnities that exceed your premiums received beyond $200,000 and so on, I do not think that is consistent. If the minister is in the driver's seat with respect to actuarial soundness I think he must also, if he wants this to be national in scope, stand behind the scheme as an actuarial scheme which he has approved on a long term basis without profit to the producer, since the producer is averaging over a long period of time. But what is proposed in this bill is that the provinces, with slender resources, must undertake repayment of losses which might occur should the federal government's actuarial calculations prove to be wrong, and I think that will deter a great number of the provinces from entering this scheme.

On clause 5—Contents of agreement.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a question with regard to paragraph (f) (i) of section 5, subsection (1), which says:

> The province will establish a reserve fund for the payment of indemnities.

Could the minister tell me on what basis the provinces will establish the amount, or the percentage of the reserve fund?

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: These two subclauses have to be read together, and if you do that you see that the provinces will agree to establish a reserve fund for the payment of indemnities, and:

> (ii) that all premium receipts will be used only for the payment of indemnities under policies of insurance and not more than 50 per cent of the administration expenses referred to in paragraph (c).

That is to say, the agreement will provide that money received in the form of premiums will be used for only three purposes: to pay not more than half of the administration costs which the dominion government does not pay; for the payment of indemnities; and, third, for the setting up of a reserve fund. This provision will insure that the money collected in the form of premiums cannot be used by a province as a contribution, say, to consolidated revenue or for general purposes. The premium money collected must be used for the payment of indemnities, for administrative expenses that we do not pay, and to set up a reserve fund with what is left over.

Mr. Rapp: On clause 5 may I ask whether, if a farmer lives in an area of a province to which the insurance scheme extends, he can insure only part of his crop if he wishes to do so, or must he insure the crop in its entirety? I should be glad if the minister would explain this.

Mr. Harkness: I think he can insure only part of his crop in the same way as he can with regard to hail at the present time. But, of course, he would only collect on that part of the crop which is insured.

I must make it clear that if he had insured part of this crop he would not be eligible to collect P.F.A.A. benefits, because otherwise you would have the situation where there would be difficulty in deciding on what part he would get P.F.A.A. benefits and what part he would not.

Mr. Argue: If part of his land was in a township which was under crop insurance and he had land in some other township where he could not obtain crop insurance, is he automatically taken out of P.F.A.A. in the township where it is impossible for him to obtain coverage, so that in some instances, in theory at any rate, it would be possible for a farmer to have both, but if all cultivable land was in an insured unit, if he insured one part he could no longer obtain P.F.A.A.

Mr. Harkness: That is correct.

Mr. Benidickson: The Minister of Agriculture and I are fairly good friends and I imagine we have both given about the same measure of attention to the Saskatchewan royal commission. In a debate which took place a week ago there was argument back and forth about the question of eliminating from P.F.A.A. land that would be under a crop insurance scheme. I personally was not sure in reading that report that the recommendation did not apply only to the proposed pilot scheme in Saskatchewan. What is the minister's opinion?

Mr. Harkness: My opinion was that the commission recommended that land which was under a scheme of crop insurance should not also be under P.F.A.A.

Mr. Benidickson: It was so closely related to the recommendation that a start should be made in Saskatchewan on a pilot scheme only that I felt that the admonition that P.F.A.A. should not apply under that section, probably applied only—

Mr. Harkness: That was another recommendation, the recommendation that there should be a pilot scheme and I do not think it had anything to do with the recommendation about P.F.A.A.

Mr. Argue: I had fully expected that the provision to which the minister referred on June 29 as reported on page 5225 of Hansard would have been spelled out in this clause. The minister seemed quite definite on that occasion. He said that what he had in mind at the present time was 25 per cent of the farmers or of the acreage in whatever the insurance unit was. I do not suppose I have to read it. The minister used the figure 25 per cent on two or three other occasions in the same paragraph.

If the minister still has it in mind that 25 per cent of the acreage covered by the plan is necessary before a unit township or municipality may enter the scheme, I am wondering why this has not been spelled out in the bill itself. If the minister had used some range of figures, then I could understand that this might be something which could be worked out with the provinces, but his illustration seemed to be very definite. He said there must be at least 25 per cent willing to enter a crop insurance program, and then that particular unit would come into the scheme.

Mr. Harkness: As I said earlier, we did not want to have anything in the bill which was completely hard and fast, in case it might not prove to be workable. We wanted to have sufficient flexibility so that when we entered into an agreement with the province, if the province was able to demonstrate, say, that an actuarially sound scheme could be worked out with 20 per cent of the producers because, for instance, they might have 50 per cent of the production although they might not have the acreage, we would be in a position to make an agreement on those lines. Whereas if you specifically spell out 25 per cent of the producers then you are completely bound. You might put a province in a difficult spot which there is no need of doing. I mentioned 25 per cent because that is the figure we have in mind on the basis of the studies which have been made as to what is more or less the minimum percentage of the producers or acreage or production, as the case might be, which it is necessary to have in order to have a sufficient spread in the risk to have an actuarially sound scheme.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 8 inclusive, agreed to.

On clause 9—Application of act.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, this is the joker in the bill. This is the clause I termed as a bombshell. This is the clause highlighted in the press report by Mr. Robert Moon. This is the clause that makes the legislation unpalatable for many producers in western Canada. As I said earlier today this divides the people of the prairies into two classes of farmers, as it were. One group consists of farmers in high risk areas whose premiums under a crop insurance scheme will be exorbitant and who will not benefit from this bill. With this clause in effect we feel there has been a retreat by the federal government from the position that has been taken in the past. Under prairie farm assistance the federal government's contribution has been roughly 50 per cent. But under this clause P.F.A.A. will be removed whenever a crop insurance plan comes into effect. I think it would have been much better to have incorporated this provision in any crop insurance scheme that might be entered into. This is something the producers will resent, namely that if they come under a crop insurance plan at all they must forego what in fact has been limited but very valuable protection.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few comments at this stage and am prompted in so doing by having listened to some of the weird statements we have heard today from hon. members opposite. I think that most farmers will agree that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be continued in conjunction with any crop insurance scheme developed on an actuarial basis. It will be necessary to continue the P.F.A.A. for the benefit of those areas subject to prolonged drought or what might better be described as low average yield areas.

However, large sections of the prairies, because of small crop loss areas, seldom if ever are able to qualify for payments under P.F.A.A. In that connection I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia as reported at page 5230 of Hansard for June 29, where he is reported as having said:

> As far as the prairie provinces are concerned, particularly in the light of the clause in the bill which says that if a producer wishes to obtain benefits under this measure he can no longer obtain benefits under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, this bill beyond question is a retrograde step.

At page 5228 of Hansard of the same day the hon. gentleman is reported as having made the following statement:

One of the most important things to recommend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in the three prairie provinces which it covers and in the section of British Columbia which it also covers is that within this area every single producer is protected. It covers everyone in the grain producing area. Everyone who is covered in that area and who sells grain pays a small levy of 1 per cent. This means that not only is everybody covered but that, to make a general statement, there may be a few exceptions, such as people who raise livestock only and feed all their grain—everybody contributes by a 1 per cent levy on the grain that is marketed.

Mr. Argue: Will the hon. member tell me from what page he is now quoting and from what part of the page?

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Page 5228, Mr. Chairman. It is true that all farmers are covered by the 1 per cent levy but it certainly has not been proven to be true that they are are all necessarily protected from crop loss of any kind. The payments made since the inception of the P.F.A.A. program do not give an accurate picture of the crop coverage received.

As an example, Manitoba farmers received roughly $14 million, and paid out $16 million under the 1 per cent levy. At the same time many of them had recurring grievous losses in that period and received nothing. I might add that the people who sustained these losses were still paying the 1 per cent levy. The reason for this inaccurate picture, of course, is that where crop losses did occur in the better farming areas crop damage was spotty and the crop loss areas scattered and small which prevented them from qualifying under the terms of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Conversely, high risk areas such as submarginal and relatively poor crop land were able to qualify year after year. It is necessary that certain areas require crop assistance rather than crop insurance because of the high risk factor but it is certainly not in the best interests of agriculture that the assistance be provided to a large extent by other farmers who have little hope of collecting for their own crop loss out of a fund they have been helping to provide.

Many farmers resent having to pay the 1 per cent levy with very little hope of ever recovering anything. Even though recent amendments to the act did help to correct the situation, to some extent that situation still does exist. Most farmers in large areas in the west will welcome the opportunity to get over-all crop loss coverage and be relieved of the payments under P.F.A.A. and hail insurance. This will assist them in paying for the more complete crop coverage which they will receive under a comprehensive crop insurance scheme.

[Mr. Muir (Lisgar).]

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: I do not know whether the government of the province of Quebec will accept this crop insurance scheme, but we may conclude from the attitude of hon. members from Quebec this afternoon, that it is very doubtful that Quebec farmers will be allowed to benefit by this legislation. I would like to ask the minister—

Mr. Ricard: We are all in favour.

Mr. Boulanger: Has the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot something to say to this?

Mr. Ricard: You try to take credit for everything.

Mr. Pigeon: Don't ask a casket-maker any questions. It isn't worth while.

Mr. Ricard: You spoke against the bill, and you voted for it.

Mr. Boulanger: Will maple syrup producers be able to benefit from this legislation. On several occasions we spoke of wheat producers but nobody mentioned the maple sugar producers in the province of Quebec.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that questions of this kind on this clause are completely out of order. This deals with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act payments; but as to whether maple sugar producers can take advantage of the act or not, that would depend entirely on the scheme set up in a particular province. If a province wishes to bring maple sugar production under the act, it is a crop and I see no particular reason why it should not be covered.

Mr. Benidickson: I understood the minister to make reference to the application of this bill to the prairies. This is a national bill. I think in his concluding words he said that it was up to the province, but there is no thought that this is designed strictly for the prairies.

Mr. Harkness: None whatever. I have pointed out time after time that this scheme was specifically drawn up so that it would be applicable to any part of Canada.

Mr. Nasserden: Would the minister explain this. I am not sure what "insured crop" refers to, whether it refers to a crop that is insured up to 25 per cent by the people who decide to insure their crops or whether it refers to the individual farmer concerned.

Mr. Harkness: This applies to the individual farmer. The insurance will be written on an individual basis, just the same as life insurance is, or any other type of ordinary insurance. What clause 1 states is that a farmer who has entered into an insurance scheme will then not be required to pay into the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and he will not be eligible for payments thereunder.

Mr. Nasserden: It does not appear to read that way. It seems to me that it might be interpreted otherwise if someone wished to interpret it otherwise at some time or other.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I think it is quite clear. It reads:

> The cultivated land of a farmer in any area to which an insurance scheme extends is not eligible for assistance under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act if an insured crop is grown by the farmer on any part thereof.

In other words, when the farmer has entered into the insurance scheme he has his crop insured, and then he is not eligible for assistance under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act on that land.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, could the minister tell us when this act will come into force?

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, it first of all, of course, has to go to the other place to receive approval there. Then it has to receive the approval of the Governor General. How long this will take I do not know. Then, following that, when we have the entire regulations drawn up, the act will be proclaimed; it will go into force at that time. We intend to proclaim it quite rapidly.

Mr. Benidickson: Notwithstanding the fact this federal-provincial partnership proposition has not been preceded by a conference such as we had on hospital insurance, and so on, the minister is going to do his best to make the law effective and then talk to the provinces afterward. Is that so?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, as I said, we will proclaim the act as soon as we find it possible to do so and we will then be in the position to enter into an agreement with any province which wishes to enter into an agreement. As was said here several times, Manitoba has already indicated that it wants to enter into an agreement.

AGRICULTURE

REPEAL OF CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT—PROVISION OF LONG TERM MORTGAGE CREDIT TO FARMERS

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-67, to provide for the extension of long term mortgage credit to farmers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when this bill was at the resolution stage I indicated most of the main provisions in it, and thus I will not delay discussion of the detailed provisions by further extended remarks at this time.

As was stated then, this bill, along with the amendments to other farm credit legislation, gives a basis for a federal farm credit system which can be developed as a service for the benefit of Canadian agriculture in the years to come. In general, the approach of the government has been to enter the field of farm credit to ensure that family farm operations and those who work their own land or operate their own farms may be able to obtain sufficient credit to cope with what might be termed a rapidly moving commercial agricultural development. In 1921, for example, there were 3,500,000 horses on farms in Canada. Today there are fewer than one million. Their place has been taken, and a great deal more power made available, by tractors. Expenditure on machinery and equipment has greatly expanded all along the line, all of which has required much bigger expenditures as far as farmers are concerned. Livestock operations on farms in Canada have also been increased, with the exception of sheep and lambs. Since the 1920's total farm operating expenses, including depreciation, have about doubled.

It is not possible to refer to Canadian agriculture as other than commercial agriculture. However, there are segments of the agricultural economy where there is a lag in developing economic units. Further, this changeover has meant a greatly reduced labour force in farming, accompanied by a very substantial increase in production per man year. In order that the best personnel, that is those who are likely to continue to increase this production per man year, may be retained on farms, it is the aim of the government to make sure that they have this opportunity in so far as capital required is concerned. This bill makes it possible, through the package deal, for younger, energetic farmers, who may qualify, to make quicker progress in establishment than otherwise might be the case and thus will encourage them to take up farming as their permanent occupation.

Proposed Long Term Credit to Farmers

In providing additional farm mortgage credit opportunity there would appear to be little difference between the action proposed in this bill and recommendations made by the two major national agricultural organizations. These organizations have recommended a co-ordinated credit system; they have recommended higher loan values both in dollars and in relation to the equity of the borrower; they have recommended more flexible repayment; they have recommended a system of supervised credit for younger farmers and many other general features, most of which are included within the scope of the proposed farm credit act.

The farm organizations recommended the extension of the total term of loans for a 40-year period from the present 30-year period. As I indicated in the house at the resolution stage, it was felt better to increase the age limit to 45, and that this would give more possibilities of benefit than the extension of the term of the mortgage for an extra 10 years. This is one of the few recommendations of the farm organizations which we have not followed.

While the interprovincial farm union council brief is not specific on interest rate, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture suggests that the government might subsidize the interest rates on loans by the amount of the administration costs. The interprovincial farm union brief in an introductory paragraph states that if the government's attitude toward farm credit would give consideration to the various services that only governments can provide effectively, "most of the farm credit could be provided on as sound and self-supporting a basis as any other commercial credit". Later in their brief they indicate that they wish to have low interest rates for special cases. It may be unfair to suggest that this means that they are asking for subsidized rates.

The government believes, and we hope rightly, that by including the new package deal to provide farmers with the opportunity of operating an economic establishment, this type of farm unit will be able to pay for the full cost of borrowed money. As I stated at the time the resolution was discussed, and I can again assure you, there will be no unnecessary expenditures either for money borrowed or for administration costs.

A calculation by officials of the Veterans Land Act, arising out of a survey which was made among 5,000 veterans on the basis that they would be established on economic farm units, indicates that additional credit would earn 24 per cent after deducting $10 per day for additional labour. This percentage varied by area and by province but the range was from 12 to 30 per cent.

To a limited extent the government does subsidize the corporation by providing up to $8 million of interest free capital. It has also provided that the reserves of the present Canadian farm loan board will be available to the new corporation without interest cost. Any subsidy beyond this would tend to interfere with provincial and private schemes, including those of a great many co-operatives who are now making agricultural loans.

Mr. Benidickson: And provinces.

Mr. Harkness: And provinces too. The fact that all lending agencies, including the federal agency, are operating their service at approximately cost will give the farmer the opportunity to select the agency of his choice, based on the service and the flexibility of such service.

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a certain satisfaction to speak of matters pertaining to agriculture and perhaps more so when we are dealing with a bill regarding farm loans.

We would have thought that, on the thirtieth anniversary of the coming into force of the Canadian Farm Loan Act, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), in one of those flights of oratory we have come to expect from him, would have spoken highly of that legislation and referred to the benefits farmers have received under the act. Instead of this we have seen the minister sign its death warrant.

Mr. Pigeon: Don't drag in the caskets you manufacture.

Mr. Boulanger: Let me tell the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) that I won't need any casket to bury the law your Minister of Agriculture has just killed.

Mr. Tremblay: Have it cremated.

(Text):

Mr. Benidickson: Is Quebec to come into this too? No.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Just the same people in general are firmly convinced that many farmers were saved from bankruptcy by this legislation. Others have been able to improve their farms which later became economic and self-liquidating units.

In the past, the Canadian farm loan program has always reached the objectives it had set for itself. Whenever changing conditions, farming methods and new needs so required, the government never delayed in introducing amendments designed to satisfy the agricultural population.

If any criticism can be directed against that measure, it is perhaps for the fact that we have been too prone to provide loans for the betterment of the marginal and even submarginal farm units instead of limiting the loans to farms likely to improve.

These last few years and particularly nowadays, the development of agriculture has changed so much that we will have to change our ideas as far as farm credit is concerned. It will be necessary to provide credit for the very specific purpose of helping the farmer's family to produce more efficiently and profitably in order to secure an income of at least $3,000 for a family of 4 or 5 people.

The new concept that we must have of a modern farm credit system is indicated by the rapid development that we witnessed as a result of new farm production methods and of new market requirements.

For the past 20 years, farm capital has increased by 30 per cent. In the opinion of nearly two thirds of the "Farm Forums" it is necessary today to invest more than $20,000 in order to make a good start in agriculture.

The nature of capital investment also has changed, thus following the general trend.

According to professor William E. Hallevand, of the department of agricultural economy at Macdonald College, in the province of Quebec, the real estate value, per farm, has increased by 15 per cent, the livestock value by a little more than 30 per cent and the equipment and power value by approximately 94 per cent.

The most noticeable changes have taken place in western Canada as far as equipment is concerned, and in eastern Canada as regards livestock improvement.

As a result, it is getting more and more difficult for anyone who wants to engage in agriculture and especially for the young farmer, to settle down on a farm.

Many other reasons would motivate a change. They are:

The decrease in number of capital farms in agriculture. The decrease of cultivated areas particularly in eastern Canada on the fringe of larger cities. The increase of mechanization and the extension of the farming surface. A reduction of farm labour. The growing importance attached to production credit, as compared to land purchase credit.

All those reasons may lead us to foresee the need of more generous funds for each family unit.

The provinces where agriculture is the main industry recognized that need and recently passed a new legislation, or modified existing legislation in this respect.

(Text):

May I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I had thought that probably hon. members might be willing, by unanimous consent, to continue with this debate for some time and perhaps expedite the passage of the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that perhaps my hon. friend would not mind going on.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, we agree for the purpose of second reading.

Mr. Harkness: I appreciate that very much.

Mr. Benidickson: Not the clauses of the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, second reading.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: In the western provinces, the farm loan act was recently amended. Thus in Manitoba—and I shall be brief—they have modified the act to allow loans up to $25 thousand, repayable on a 30-year term, to be based on up to 65 per cent of the farm's assessed value. The interest rate will be 5½ per cent on regular loans, and 4 per cent on loans to young farmers. Administration will be by an agricultural credit board to be set up by the province. As security for such loans, farmers may use their land and cattle.

On March 31, 1959, a farm loan act was enacted in Saskatchewan to cover family farms. This act provides for maximum loans of $25,000, repayable on a 30-year term, equal to 80 per cent of the assessed value of the farmer's land and assets. Interest will be 6½ per cent, of which one-half of one per cent will be used to insure the life of the farmer. The loans will be supervised by the Co-Operative Trust Company, an organization independent of the government.

Alberta has also passed an act, in 1957, to provide for land purchases and for enlarging farm holdings. Loans are allowed up to a maximum of $10,000, on a 20-year term, with interest at 5 per cent, one-half of one per cent of which is for insurance on the farmer's life. The interest rate is therefore 4½ per cent, plus one-half of one per cent for insurance.

The western provinces have realized the need to amend their farm credit legislation, and the Liberals have also realized, even before the Conservatives, that amendments to Canada's farm loan act were needed. Indeed it might be said that the amendments now being introduced by the government are the result of pressures we have been exerting in the past two years, in conjunction with farm organizations throughout the country.

Thus I had the honour to introduce, early in this session, a resolution calling upon the government to establish an agricultural and fisheries expansion bank. That proposal was supported without reservations by the 16 members who took part in the discussion.

The member for Gaspe (Mr. English) made a number of points, insisting on the need to provide credit for eastern Canada's fishermen. I wonder what he will say about the bill that has just been placed before us, in which there is not even any mention of fishermen.

In my suggestion, I urged that all government services in the fields of farm credit, research, youth establishment, rural construction, etc., be co-ordinated under a single agency.

That farm bank project was worked out by my chief following recommendations made by the farmers themselves in the light of studies carried out by various farm organizations across the country.

Mr. Speaker, the proposed bill in its present wording is designed to achieve the following purposes: first, to raise the maximum loan from $15,000 to $20,000, which amount will be repayable within thirty years; second, to make it possible for a farmer who has reached 21 years of age but has not reached the age of 45 to borrow an amount not exceeding $27,500 upon the security of mortgages on farm lands, buildings and livestock. True, the whole will be subject to supervision at the borrower's expense on the part of the new corporation; but such supervision will cease when the amount of the loan is reduced to 65 per cent of the value of the lands used as a security for the loan, or to $20,000 whichever is the lesser.

That is the aim to be achieved in the attempt to have this bill adopted. No mention is made of the rate of interest except that it will be determined by the corporation. No mention is made of the supervising fee except that it will be fixed annually by the corporation.

All arguments put forward by the minister in support of his bill do not agree with the representations made by farm organizations, or with the requirements of modern agriculture, and particularly of agriculture in the province of Quebec.

If we consider the benefits that the Quebec farmers will derive from it, I can see only slight ones: the increase of the maximum loans from $15,000 to $20,000 and the increase in the amount of maximum loans from 65 to 75 per cent of the appraisal value of the land and farm buildings. Those are the only two advantages—

(Text):

Mr. Benidickson: A subsidized non-commercial interest charge.

Mr. Boulanger: I was talking about a 65 per cent or 75 per cent rate.

(Translation):

Those are, Mr. Speaker, the only two advantages that the farmers of the province of Quebec who will want to come under this act will get from it.

The advantage of obtaining a loan up to $20,000 will be useful only to a small number of farmers, because the average loan in the country is about $6,000; in fact, of the 150 loans approved last year in the province of Quebec, 2 only have been made to the amount of $15,000.

I have here the figures about the loans made in certain fiscal years. In 1956-57, while an amount of $700,000 was provided for 139 loans, 10 of those loans were for $10,000 or over, and 2 for $15,000. In 1957-58, of 122 loans, 13 were to the amount of $10,000 or over, and 4 to the amount of $15,000. In 1958-59, of the 139 loans made, 17 were for amounts of $10,000 or over, and 2 to the amount of $15,000. If we study the figures for the first quarter of 1959, we see that 61 loans had been approved, 13 of them for amounts of $10,000 and 4 for an amount of $15,000.

As for particular or special loans provided for in part 3 of the new act, for farmers in the age group 21 to 45, up to an amount of $27,500, I doubt if the farmers of the province of Quebec could take advantage of that plan, because we have in the civil code of the province of Quebec a section which reads as follows:

> Any farmer may pledge, as security for a loan which he contracts, for a term not exceeding eighteen months, all his livestock and farm produce, present and future while at the same time retaining them in his possession. The borrower shall have, towards the creditor, the obligations of a depository, without having any recourse against him for the cost of custody and conservation.

That means that our farmers cannot offer their livestock as security for a period exceeding eighteen months.

There is also another interesting section in the civil code of the province of Quebec, that is section 1548, which says:

> The right of redemption cannot be stipulated for a term exceeding 10 years. If it be stipulated for a longer term, it is reduced to the term of 10 years.

This means that a farmer can mortgage his property by a redemption contract for a term not exceeding 10 years. Then, as I said earlier, I doubt very much that the farmers of the province of Quebec could take advantage of this legislation. I am not a lawyer, I have no knowledge of the law—

Mr. Asselin: That is quite obvious.

Mr. Boulanger: Those are elementary arguments and I am convinced that the lawyers could take the floor after I sit down and explain the bill.

Will the scholars opposite finally take the floor to explain the provisions of this bill? I would ask Quebec members especially to explain what they understand in this bill.

Mr. Benidickson: Duplication.

Mr. Boulanger: To all intents and purposes, Quebec farmers will derive little benefit from that legislation.

Besides, what could have they expected from a Conservative government, whose agricultural program is made up of mere promises? What can they also expect from fifty Conservative members from the province of Quebec, whose arguments in support of labour are in the form of compliments for ministers, and commendations about bills, even before anything is known about the contents of those bills. That is what happened when a statement was made about loan insurance and farm credit. The minister was lauded, the bill was endorsed without any of those members knowing what was in the bill. That is the attitude of our Conservative members from the province of Quebec, who claim to be saving the farm and labour classes.

Mr. Asselin: Go and tell that to Quebec farmers.

Mr. Boulanger: Does the hon. member want to ask me a question?

Mr. Asselin: I am asking whether the hon. member is in favour of this legislation or whether he is opposed to it. If so, let him explain himself clearly, because nobody has understood anything yet.

Mr. Boulanger: I understand that the hon. member—

Mr. Asselin: You don't understand.

Mr. Boulanger: I know that the member who just rose is not very familiar with agriculture. If we hear cries from the other side of this house, they are cries of distress which come—

Some hon. Members: Ah! Ah!

Mr. Boulanger: —from the cellars of the Union Nationale of the province of Quebec.

In a few moments we shall probably see the member who is the greatest Duplessis enthusiast among the duplessists in this house rise and sing the praises of the Quebec Farm Loan Board and of the Union Nationale. I am not mentioning this to criticize the principle, because I believe that the principle of the Quebec Farm Loan Board is good. I believe this to be good farm legislation. Experts—

Some hon. Members: Hear! Hear!

Mr. Boulanger: I thank hon. members for their applause. I hope they will still applaud when I have finished explaining my views. I think this is good farm legislation. As a matter of fact, experts in the matter recognize it to be good farm legislation though they think it should have been modified some time ago and that it was diverted from the object for which it had been created.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Boulanger: I want to speak about it simply to prove to the Canadian people that it is being used as the most infamous instrument we can imagine in a democratic country—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Boulanger: —namely to serve the political aims of a Union Nationale government.

Some hon. Members: Order!

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. If any hon. member wishes to raise a point of order there is a proper way of doing it, and it is not by interrupting the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Ricard: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was not in order just now. He was speaking of provincial farm loans and we are dealing with federal loans.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order raised by the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, it surely has never been considered that in asking parliament to establish any form of lending agency one should not take account of other ways of securing loans, and that is all my hon. friend is doing. It seems to me that the so-called point of order of the hon. gentleman is an attempt to restrict debate and freedom of speech in this house.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) was saying, he was going to deal with the provincial farm loan. This is not just for establishing his cause; he wants to deal with this matter, so he is out of order.

Proposed Long Term Credit to Farmers

Mr. Benidickson: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member was simply taking a quick—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think it is unnecessary to labour the point of order. I wish the hon. member would continue with his address.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your ruling. I knew I could deal with the matter because, in similar circumstances, at the beginning of a session, I rose on a point of order, and my point of order was not sustained. It is absolutely the same situation today. I am speaking about the Quebec farm loan, but Union nationale members do not want to hear anything about it.

An hon. Member: There is no Union nationale member here.

Mr. Bourget: They have all been elected by the Union nationale.

An hon. Member: No, by the people.

Mr. Bourget: Thanks to Union Nationale funds.

An hon. Member: No, by the people.

Mr. Bourget: We will see about it at the next election.

Mr. Boulanger: The report published by the Quebec Farm Loan Board shows that on March 31 last, 56,803 loans totalling $165,991,695 have been granted since the fall of 1936.

That is more loans than were granted by the government of Canada, from 1929 to March 31, 1959. Out of 575,015 farms in operation in Canada in 1956, 54,624 farmers were granted a loan under the federal farm loan act, that is 10 per cent, whereas in the province of Quebec, loans were granted to 56,803 farmers, out of a total of 120,000, i.e., more than 50 per cent. We can tell about the agricultural and political situation of a province when more than 50 per cent of its farmers are indebted to their government, or rather I should say to the Union nationale.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), during the debate on the motion I introduced at the beginning of the session, asking for the setting up of a fisheries expansion and agricultural bank, made some remarks.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is getting a long way from the bill under discussion. If he wants to discuss his earlier speech on fisheries loans it seems to me he will have a pretty hard time relating it to anything relevant tonight. I allowed him to discuss the credit situation of the farmers in Quebec, but he must keep to this bill.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, when I introduced my motion for the establishment of an agricultural development bank, under the form of a resolution if you prefer, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm gave the history of the provincial farm credit. At that time I raised a point of order and you gave the following ruling:

> It seems to me that it is relevant to a discussion of what steps might be taken here to expand agricultural credit to know what other credit facilities are available to farmers and to draw comparisons between the proposed policy and existing legislation. I would think it was relevant.

Therefore in the circumstances, I suggest that if I establish a comparison between this bill and the farm credit act of the province of Quebec, I am not out of order.

The member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, in his argument, compared the provincial farm loan with the federal loan and said:

> First, the interest rate on farm loans should be lowered within reach of the farmers, because in my estimation, the present rate is too high.

We will study the bill. We are anxious to know the views of the minister about the interest rate that farmers will have to pay under the new act. It is suggested to charge 5 per cent or about 5 per cent—the rate that the government pays for its money —plus the cost of supervision and insurance on the life of the farmer. We suggest that the interest rate will increase to 6½ and even 7 per cent. I have made the calculation, Mr. Chairman, and I can assert that the interest will not be 5 per cent as it is now under the present act. Then, I hope that, at the proper time, the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm will be able to introduce an amendment or, at least, to rise in defence of the farmers of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, for several years now, the largest farm organizations have presented briefs to the government all asking for improvements which are generally identical.

Does the member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) want to ask a question?

Mr. Tremblay: No. He puts questions to responsible people.

Mr. Boulanger: If I am not responsible, at least be content to listen to me or let me make my speech in peace.

That is how the international council of farming unions came to recommend the establishment of a federal agency under the Department of Agriculture instead of under the Department of Finance. I find that this has been done, and I commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for transferring administration of that agency service to the Department of Agriculture. Such an agency would include a loan supervision service, along the same lines as under the Veterans' Land Act. This suggestion has also been put forward by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which favours a farm credit supervision service. This means that the services of an expert on agricultural matters will be available to borrowers so long as their debt has not been refunded in the proportion of 25 per cent of total assets. Only then will supervision stop.

Both organizations call for a reduction in interest rates. The international congress of agricultural unions suggests that interest should be between 3 and 3½ per cent. On the other hand, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture urges that interest rates be equal to government loan costs, plus a fee to provide for a reserve, but suggests that administration be the government's responsibility.

Two other points on which there is general agreement are an increase in maximum amounts to be loaned by the government, and the percentage assessment on property. The maximum amount should be $20,000, and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture recommends an assessment rate of 80 per cent for loans up to $8,000, dropping gradually to 65 per cent for loans between $16,000 and $20,000.

All loans granted based on a 70 to 80 per-cent assessment should be under the supervision of government experts. Such are the main features of the improvements that should be made to this bill.

Mr. Speaker, in rising to state my views on this bill, my purpose was to show the good and particularly the bad features that will be included in this act if it is passed in its present form.

The purposes we are trying to achieve in considering this legislation are serious enough to warrant proper time to consider it.

It would have been wise to introduce this legislation at the beginning of the session, so that we could have considered it more fully and thus have had more time to consult experts and all farm associations across the country.

This most important bill, which may involve serious consequences—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

(Text):

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): We wish to endorse this bill and to give it our support. In doing so we should like to mention not only the good things that are in it but a number of the things which we consider are not satisfactory.

In recent years, in my own area, the old Canadian farm loan board has been reluctant to make loans to farmers. The valuations which they have placed on farm property and the amount they were prepared to lend on cultivated land have been exceedingly low and, in consequence, it was almost impossible for a farmer to borrow sufficient money to enable him to establish himself in the light of present day conditions in agriculture. However, there are, in my opinion complications with regard to extending long term credit, and I think the experience of the work of the officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs in relation to the Veterans' Land Act is something which we cannot overlook. Indeed, we should give close consideration to it when we are considering any type of farm credit.

The Veterans' Land Act, in extending credit, made provision for careful supervision, and it seems to me that when we extend long term credit to farmers we could do those farmers no greater disservice than to supply them with a large amount of money, with the consequent necessity of heavy repayments over a long term at considerable rates of interest, unless we supply also a measure of guidance where necessary. It is evident, of course, that the money can only be paid off if the loan which has been advanced is used advantageously. I believe it is generally agreed among farm organizations that farm loans have not served this end. I was surprised to observe the number of loans made to farmers which have been put in the courts for foreclosure during the last few months. In some instances farmers had borowed $2,500 five or six years ago. Their farms are now being foreclosed upon. Although the farmers made some payments and attempted to pay the interest they are still required to pay amounts of over $3,000.

With respect to supervision, I feel it should not be by agreement but by compulsion. No loan should be given to a farmer unless some supervision can be given so that the loan can be repaid on the terms agreed to by the vendor and the borrower and the farmer can maintain his standard of living on the farm when making these payments. It would not be advantageous for a farmer to obtain a loan that would not directly increase his productivity so that his income would be increased by an amount that would make it possible to repay the loan and maintain if not increase his standard of living.

Several other things should be in the bill. One is the provision of a definite interest rate. Interest rates in Canada have been rapidly increasing. Because of government policy we are now in the position where the government pays interest rates of 5½ per cent on one year borrowings. The interest rate should be set at a reasonable level of 5 per cent or less to be of assistance to the farmer. We should bear in mind the experience we have had under the Veterans' Land Act. If it is left open as it appears to be in the bill it will be found that interest rates of 6 to 6½ per cent on long term borrowings will obtain and these will not be advantageous to the farmer. A farmer would consider himself well off if he were to make a 5 per cent profit on his investment of $30,000 or $40,000.

There is one other major defect in this bill and I refer to insurance. We have just discussed the crop insurance bill which took into consideration crop failures. We must include a clause to make it possible for a mortgagor in borrowing money from the federal government not to have to make any payment on the principal of his loan if the area—not just his farm but the area in which he lives—is declared to be a disaster area or a depressed area or one where the crop fell below a certain percentage. This would not be expensive insurance. There have been requests from many sources for consideration of a similar provision with respect to mortgages on houses. It has been requested that when an area is in a depressed state because of unemployment the people holding mortgages should be exempted from payments on principal. This could also apply to credit for farmers.

Once a farmer falls behind in his payments and the interest begins to compound it is almost impossible for him to catch up on his double payments regardless of how well he may do next year.

We should also extend sickness insurance to this bill. Few farmers are covered by sickness and accident insurance. When a farmer falls ill and cannot do his work the mortgage payments build up. I know of a case where a farmer took ill for two years. The farm ran down during that period and his payments had not been made. Pressure was being exerted on him by the machinery companies and by the Canadian farm loan board. One would not expect the board to have pressed him. When he was finally able to work he reached the conclusion that he could not recoup his losses and so the farm was sold. He simply could not see his way clear to ever catching up on the payments.

If the government can give no consideration to mortgage insurance for sickness and crop failure I urge it to give consideration to assisting the farmer to carry on under a life insurance policy to cover the full extent of the loan, even if this is done at the expense of the mortgagor. This should not be a surprising suggestion and it would not be an expensive type of insurance. If I go to Household Finance Company to borrow money to buy an automobile the company will insure the loan. If I die owing the money even the Household Finance Company with all its faults will arrange it so that the family can own the automobile and not have to make payments on it. I see no reason why this government cannot at least put into the legislation a compulsory feature of having life insurance on the mortgagor so that when the breadwinner of the family dies the mortgage is covered.

This matter is very important Mr. Speaker, because there are hundreds of thousands of farmers in Canada who have had mortgages on their farms all their lives and when they die they will be leaving their families with mortgages that they have been struggling all their lives to pay off. I think we can do no less than assure that when they die, if at no other time, they will leave to their families farms without mortgages.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I realize this is a very improper time to rise but I assure the house that I will not impose upon them. I want to be called if I am longer than about two minutes. This subject is something that I spoke about when the Veterans' Land Act amendments were up. Afterwards, I heard from indirect sources that I had spoken rather wildly when I suggested that the same volume of loans outstanding under the Veterans' Land Act could be taken care of by the same civil service staff as is contemplated would be required by the new program. I just want to give one or two instances to the house. The Veterans' Land Act had 3,000-plus fewer borrowers last year than the year before. They added only 260. Everybody can appreciate that they need a fairly constant staff in the supervisory work that we know they do very well.

The minister has introduced a new feature, in connection with general farm loans, of a supervisory character. I notice that the bill contains a reference to the utilization of the Veterans' Land Act people, but I hope it is not just a form that is put in there, because I am satisfied that while the Veterans' Land Act loans outstanding at the moment come to about $200 million, because of our widespread geography they are, shall we say, under-employed, and I am satisfied that they could take on within a year or two at least an extra amount of new borrowings of $100 million and give the appraisal, the inspection, the counsel and the advice needed. I hope the minister will assure us that co-operation will exist.

In January we were told that we would have a centralized farm credit organization. That, apparently, has not developed but I hope the minister will assure us later that we are not going to have another empire set-up under his department in connection with part III of this bill.

I want to commend the minister on the basic terms of this new legislation. I think they are very appropriate. On the other hand, we must remember that even under the former regime, from 1952 to 1956, the maximum amount of loans went up from $5,000 to $15,000 and the maximum appraisal value went up from 50 per cent to 65 per cent.

In so far as the interest rate is concerned, I agree with the last speaker that it is not very conclusive in the bill as to what the interest rate will be, although the minister indicated this was going to be a self-supporting scheme, as the Canadian farm loan scheme has been in the past. It is to the credit of the former scheme that it has never incurred a loss to the taxpayers of this country. In the banking and commerce committee last year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) paid tribute to that. He indicated that a reduction in interest rates of even one per cent would put the Canadian farm loan board into a deficit position. The profit they showed last year was equivalent to a reduction in the interest rate of only one-tenth of 1 per cent. I objected last year, not to the stabilization of the interest rate under the direction of the Minister of Finance; I simply said it was in contravention of the statutes passed by parliament. I understand that under the new bill the board again is the organization that must decide what the interest rate should be for the foreseeable future.

Mr. Speaker: Before I put the question I want to clear my conscience with the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) by expressing my regrets for cutting him off. I said he had used 40 minutes. I quite overlooked the fact that he was in the important position of a member replying to a minister moving a government order and really had unlimited time.

I understand that the house does not wish to continue into the committee stage. We might go into committee and report immediately.

Motion agreed to, bill read second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Thomas in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the hon. gentleman who is leading the house indicate what business will be taken up tomorrow and, as far as possible, what the estimates will be for the rest of the week.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will start with third reading of the crop insurance bill and then go into consideration of estimates. The estimates which will be considered on Wednesday are in this order: defence production; veterans affairs; and then northern affairs. For Thursday, we will start with the estimates of external affairs; and if any of the ones which have been given for Wednesday are not completed they will then be completed after external affairs estimates have been finished with; and if there are none of those, or when they are completed, we will then go on with trade and commerce. On Friday and Saturday we will continue with those and with mines and technical surveys, followed by fisheries.

At 10.53 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HARVESTING OF SEA PLANTS

Question No. 496—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Is the authority to regulate the harvesting of sea plants, such as Irish moss, rockweed and kelp, vested in the government of Canada or with the provinces?

2. If authority is vested in the federal government are plans being considered to regulate the harvesting of Irish moss?

Answer by: Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries):

1. This is a legal question to which no answer can be given.

2. Answered by No. 1.

COMMONWEALTH FOOD AND DRINKS EXHIBITION, U.K.—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

Question No. 503—Mr. Argue:

1. Was the Canadian government invited to participate in a recent exhibition of commonwealth food and drinks in the United Kingdom sponsored by the Commonwealth Union of Trade?

2. If so, what was the reply of the government?

3. What Canadian products were shown at this exhibition?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1 and 2. No invitation was received in Ottawa. Officials in Canada house, London, were approached about participation, but declined because it is not policy to take part in shows that do not offer hope of trade promotion benefit. In this instance, with import quotas for most Canadian foods already filled, inquiries evoked by a departmental display could not have been satisfied, and might have done more harm than good where relations with potential new buyers were concerned.

3. Some Ontario cheese and B.C. canned salmon was shown privately.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—OFFICIAL COMMUNIQUE

The dominion-provincial committee of ministers of finance and provincial treasurers met in the Railway Committee room of the House of Commons on July 6 and 7, 1959, under the chairmanship of the Minister of Finance of Canada.

The purpose of the meeting was to consider how the outstanding problems of inter-governmental financial and economic relations in Canada should be dealt with through active co-operative study as a basis for future negotiations.

After the presentation of the views of all governments represented at the meeting, the committee reached the following decisions:

1. The committee will meet again on October 15 and 16 at Ottawa to continue its examination of the many complex questions relating to dominion-provincial fiscal relations.

2. It was agreed that certain questions would be discussed by ministers without further detailed preparatory work by officials. (See appendix.)

3. In the case of other questions it was agreed that further detailed study and report by officials would facilitate discussion at the ministerial level and these matters were referred to the federal-provincial continuing committee on fiscal and economic matters for detailed examination and report at as early a date as possible. (See appendix).

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, July 8, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, July 7, 1959

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Wednesday, the 8th July, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
Lionel Massey
Secretary to the Governor General

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES—ANNOUNCEMENT OF VISIT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in announcing to the house that the secretary of state for the United States, Mr. Herter, has made arrangements to stop over in Ottawa en route to the resumed foreign ministers' conference in Geneva. Mr. Herter will arrive on the morning of Saturday, July 11, and will leave for Geneva later the same day.

The occasion will offer the right hon. Prime Minister and myself a welcome opportunity to get better acquainted with our distinguished visitor and to exchange views informally with him on some of the problems in east-west relations which are of common concern at the present juncture.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): The house will welcome the announcement the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just made, particularly in the light of press reports which appeared last evening and this morning to the effect that the secretary of state is coming here for a round of talks during which the Canadian government would make known its own views on the foreign ministers' conference which is to resume next Monday in Geneva.

I think the house would be glad to hear from the minister, when the estimates of his department are considered tomorrow, what the Canadian views are on this very important conference, and perhaps if those views have behind them the backing of all parties in the house and of all members in the house it may be that they will be even more impressive in the talks on Saturday than they might otherwise be.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): The members of this group were very pleased to hear the minister's announcement, and trust that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs will seize with both hands this opportunity to restore the waning prestige of Canada in international affairs.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

STARRED QUESTIONS

C.B.C.—T.V. SATELLITE EXPENDITURES

Question No. 111—Mr. Benidickson:

1. With detail as to location what funds were (a) spent during 1958-59 fiscal year by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on construction of T.V. satellite or relay units; (b) budgeted for the 1959-60 fiscal year for construction of satellite or relay units?

2. Since April 1, 1959: (i) what expenditures have been made? or (ii) financial commitments made respecting each of the said Canadian Broadcasting Corporation T.V. satellite or relay units? (iii) at what date according to present estimates will these satellite or relay units respectively likely be in operation?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is long and involved, and consists principally of figures giving details with respect to certain appropriations of the C.B.C. With the consent of the house I should like to pass it on to Hansard and have it printed rather than read figures which would be unintelligible unless the columns in which they appear were read at the same time.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreed to this being done?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The answer referred to follows]

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises as follows:

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO CALLING OF CONFERENCE ON FISCAL MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the strong desire expressed by a large majority of the provincial ministers that a plenary conference be held on fiscal matters in 1959, is it the intention of the government to meet that request and to convene this fall the meeting which the Prime Minister once said would take place early in 1958?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, this matter was discussed and representations were made at the meeting that has just concluded. The Minister of Finance made it very clear that at the resumed meeting to take place in October, this question would in the light of events at that time and in the interval, then be decided upon and determined.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance if he would explain to the house the statement he made on television last night to the effect that a federal-provincial summit meeting should be called only if it was reasonably sure in advance that such a meeting would be a success and would produce tangible results.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not use the expression "summit conference" at any time, so I am not at all clear to what the hon. gentleman refers. I was asked a question about the conditions under which it would be proposed that a plenary or negotiating dominion-provincial conference might be convened. I pointed out that there was no point in calling these conferences unless there was some reasonable assurance in advance that something was going to be accomplished. At the present time what the provinces which asked for the convening of such a conference before the end of 1959 have in mind is some alteration in the terms of the present agreements applicable for the current five-year period so they would receive more money under those agreements.

I pointed out that a decision in regard to the calling of a conference must depend upon the conditions and those conditions must, in the light of the present facts, be related to the position of the federal treasury.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Now that the minister has indicated that in so far as the present government is concerned the reconvening of such a conference depends on the federal government's judgment as to its capacity to give further moneys to the provinces, may I ask the minister if it is not a fact that the province of Ontario at the conference yesterday and the day before took the strong position that the calling of such a conference should not depend on the attitude of only one but of the two senior levels of government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the provinces which asked for the convening of a plenary conference before the end of 1959 supported their request on the basis of the heavy obligations which the provincial and municipal governments are called upon to bear under existing circumstances, and they asked that these facts be taken into account in relation to the decision to be made. I indicated, of course, that we have those facts in mind at all times. We must still, of course, as a responsible government, take into account the position of the federal treasury as well. These are all matters that must enter into the decision that has been asked for by a majority of the provincial governments.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): A supplementary question, sir. The minister having indicated that it would not be sensible to have a conference unless there could be additional payments made under tax sharing, does this mean that the present government has abandoned the policy of trying to allocate the tax fields which they used to advocate when on this side of the house?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the present government continues to follow a sound and realistic policy in this respect, a policy that takes account of the problems, the difficulties and the responsibilities of all levels of government in this country. It is following a policy which has been more beneficial to the provinces than the policies of our predecessors.

I pointed out in this conference, Mr. Speaker, that as compared with the payments to the provinces two years ago, the fiscal year 1957-58, we are this year paying in the form of conditional payments, unconditional payments and tax rental payments to the provinces, $400 million more. In other words, out of the federal treasury, in one form or another, this fiscal year $400 million more is going to be paid for the benefit of the provinces than was paid two years ago, and that—

Mr. Pearson: Hospital insurance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, that includes the provision of hospital insurance, which has brought substantial benefit to a number of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister is going beyond the scope of the question, and the exchange is taking the nature of a debate, which is not appropriate at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. Pearson: In view of the explanation of the policy of the government just given by the Minister of Finance, will the Prime Minister explain the attitude he took during the election campaigns on this matter?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the attitude taken by the Prime Minister in election campaigns, that the provinces receive additional amounts, has been lived up to.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Will he not agree, in the light of the answer he has just given and the statements made by the Minister of Finance in answer to questions, that the Minister of Finance has completely repudiated the stand that his leader took during two federal elections with regard to the calling of a dominion-provincial conference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is utter nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And this government stands indicted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I say to my hon. friend that however pompous the attitude he may take, it is no answer to the fact that this government has shown the provinces a regard that was not shown by the previous government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Never mind the insults; give us the answer. Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the time has arrived, Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister ought to be told by the Speaker that the way to answer questions is not to insult members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All these catcalls are not going to interfere with my right to ask this question. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister ought to have it indicated very strongly that under the rules of this house, if he cannot give a constructive reply he has no right to throw insults across the floor.

Mr. Speaker: I observe that when an argumentative question is asked it is usually met by an argumentative answer. I endeavoured to indicate that I thought that this exchange had gone far enough when the Minister of Finance was answering. This is not the time to debate the issue, and unless there are supplementary questions seeking additional information—

Mr. Fulton: And not provocative statements by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Speaker: —I think we should drop the matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order, may I say that I know Your Honour seeks to be very fair and is fair in these matters. But I ask you to look at Hansard of this morning and see whether I was not fully justified in suggesting to the Prime Minister that if he cannot give a constructive reply when questions are put to him, he is not allowed under the rules of the house to insult one hon. member or hon. members.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is no question of insult at all.

Mr. McIlraith: Just abuse of the rules.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman, following his usual course, first asked a question and then made an observation to which there could be attributed only that quality which I applied to it.

Mr. McIlraith: Having been permitted that observation under the rules, I presume it is in order for us to attribute to the Prime Minister the qualities which we may feel his actions warrant and which are quite contrary to the rules.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a supplementary question seeking information. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance, who is quoted as having said that the premier of Quebec was more interested in cash than conferences, if he can tell the house how much more cash the province of Quebec is getting from the federal treasury now than it got three years ago.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Ask Lamontagne.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: A very appropriate interjection.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am deeply impressed by the observation of the hon. gentleman—

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Pickersgill: I am asking for factual information.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that he is seeking information. I have not all the details with me in my papers, but I shall be delighted to furnish authentic information to my hon. friend on that subject or on any other subject, because no one in the house needs it more than he does.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether at the same time the minister could give us authentic information about the province of Newfoundland, to correct the erroneous information given by his colleague the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, if that was a supplementary question I can assure the hon. gentleman that any proper information in this respect will be gladly furnished with regard to any of the provinces. As to his concluding remark, I think he should be fair enough to recall that the Minister of Justice rose in the house at the very first opportunity he had to give the house the figures he had intended to give in speaking on the occasion to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. Pickersgill: And which were still erroneous.

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister be kind enough to tell the house if the premier of Quebec has put forward concrete proposals in respect of acceptance of federal grants to universities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what has been stated in the past, and may I say that the discussions that took place at the conference will be made available to the house, provided it is proper to do so, by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think I should say to the hon. gentleman who asked the question that the subject of university grants was not introduced into any of the discussions at the conference.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in view of what the Prime Minister has just said may I ask the Minister of Finance when he is going to make the discussions at this conference available to the house?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I informed the Leader of the Opposition last week that it was not proposed to keep any verbatim record of the proceedings of the conference. It was the decision of the conference itself that there should be no verbatim record kept of the proceedings, and the conference was carried on in camera by decision of the conference itself. There is, therefore, no record to produce, and the decisions of the conference are embodied in the communiqué which was issued yesterday afternoon at the conclusion of the conference and which I tabled in the house at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Pearson: You should get together over there.

TRADE

TEXTILES—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING IMPORTS FROM JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue based on a statement made by Mr. Potofsky, president of amalgamated clothing workers of America and reported in today's Gazette, to the effect that continued imports into Canada of clothing from Japan will have a disastrous effect on the Canadian market and parallel industries, with the prospect of an increase in unemployment in Canada. Will the minister tell the house whether the government has received any representations along these lines and, if so, what replies have been made by the government?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I will not say by the government, except the Minister of National Revenue. I have been meeting delegations from time to time representing various industries who have put their views before me, including representatives of the textile industry. When such matters have been advanced in concrete form I have directed that inquiries be made to ascertain the facts of the situation. The matter of textile imports from Japan has been brought to my attention, and my department is now investigating the matter.

CRIMINAL LAW

OBSCENE LITERATURE—INQUIRY AS TO BOOK BY JACK KEROUAC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice arising out of a news report in today's Globe and Mail to the effect that a police officer in Toronto visited the store of a book dealer and advised him that a certain book by Jack Kerouac was obscene. Would the minister consider checking this case in order to inform the house later what authority has determined or has the right to determine whether or not this specific book is obscene?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes. My attention has not been directed to the particular story, but I shall look into it and find out to what police force the constable belonged, and what if any authority he had for the statement that is alleged to have been made. I will endeavour to give a fuller answer as soon as possible.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING ORIENTAL IMMIGRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the minister had time yet to look into the brief recently submitted by the Chinese benevolent association? If so, is she in a position to announce any amendments to the existing regulations in regard to the immigration of orientals?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The answer to the first part of the question is yes. The answer to the second part is no.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ALBERTA—SALUTE FOR ACHIEVEMENT IN FAMILY SIZE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): May I address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. My question is based on my pride in southern Alberta and its citizens. In view of the fact that Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Hemsing of the hamlet of Rolling Hills in the constituency of Medicine Hat are the parents of 23 splendid Canadians, the 23rd having recently arrived, and in view of the fact that to date a certain other province has been given the honours in Canada for records of this kind, would the minister make inquiries and ascertain if the time is not now ripe for Alberta to receive her proper salute for achievement in this, as in other fields?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for having informed me of his intention to ask this question. I feel that Mr. and Mrs. Hemsing are making a great contribution to the Canadian way of life, and I am glad that through family allowances we are able to contribute to their way of life.

Incidentally, with respect to Alberta's achievements in this field, it may surprise the hon. member to know that his province still has a long way to go before it can match the top provincial averages for the allowance paid per family, which is the only yardstick my department has to go by. It may also surprise him to learn that our latest figures indicate that the most productive province by this standard is Newfoundland.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. As this particular question does not seem to me to involve government policy in any way, will the minister not agree that the family allowances which these 23 children are receiving is the result of Liberal policy?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There is no evidence that 23 members of this family are receiving allowances.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): May I ask a sudatory supplementary question of the minister. In view of the announcement of the former minister of citizenship and immigration when in British Columbia that Canadian born babies make the best immigrants, would the minister kindly extend his investigation to the province of British Columbia to see if there has been a liberal response to the former minister's cradle-rocking pronouncement?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member rose I also rose to ask a supplementary question, and my supplementary question is this. In view of my well known views on this subject, will the minister join my congratulations to his?

CROP INSURANCE

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCIAL SCHEMES

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-66, to provide for contributions and loans to the provinces in respect of crop insurance.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

68. Departmental administration, $7,507,609.

The Chairman: Shall vote 68 carry?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister would make a general statement?

[Mr. Monteith (Perth).]

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Chairman, at the outset I would refer you to the actual content of our estimates for the current fiscal year. It will be noted that more or less substantial increases are shown over the estimates for 1958-59 for five of the items, and a decrease in one. Only vote 71, which provides for payment of grants in lieu of taxes on crown owned defence plants operated by private contractors, remains relatively unchanged. In addition, the main estimates include one new item, vote 72, and another new item of major importance appears as vote 504 in the supplementary estimates.

I would like to explain briefly these changes and innovations. Vote 68, which provides for the costs of departmental administration, shows an increase of roughly $275,000 or 4 per cent over the provision made in 1958-59. The bulk of the increase is accounted for by salaries and is attributable to normal annual increments and some upgrading of positions. Those factors have been offset to some extent by a reduction in the total establishment from 1,527 positions to 1,509 positions. I might add that this will be the seventh successive year in which both the authorized establishment and the actual number employed have been reduced.

It will be noted that a further increase amounting to $41,500 is included in the supplementary estimates under vote 502. This is designed to provide for increased travel which has been made necessary largely by departmental activities relating to Canadian-United States production sharing.

Vote 69, for the care, maintenance and custody of stand-by defence plants, buildings, machine tools and production tooling, has also been increased from $450,000 to $882,000. There will actually be a decrease for the second successive year in the amount budgeted for care and custody of defence plants in stand-by condition. However, the task of preserving and storing or disposing of crown owned machine tools and tooling has assumed much larger proportions as a result of the completion of programs for the production of the CF-100, Sabre and T-33 aircraft, and the termination of the Arrow and Iroquois programs.

Vote 70 provides a total of $2,907,000 for capital assistance, which represents an increase of $807,000 over the provision made last year. In fact the provision for capital works and equipment accounts for only $1,657,000 of the amount requested under this vote. The remaining $1,250,000 represents a new departure, related to our efforts to increase the participation of Canadian industry in United States defence programs under the production sharing plan. In many cases in which Canadian manufacturers might be interested in competing with United States firms for such business, an American firm may enjoy a substantial advantage because most of his preproduction and tooling costs have already been written off under previous contracts. The object of the proposed provision, therefore, is to offset his relative advantage, in part at least, by absorbing a portion of the relevant preproduction and tooling costs in Canada.

I would add that this provision is related, in our minds, to the first year or two of production sharing, when Canadian industry must frequently break into production programs which are relatively well established in the United States. During that period we shall be able to judge the effectiveness of this type of assistance, and determine whether or not it would be appropriate or necessary in subsequent years.

Vote 72 is a new item in the estimates this year and it will be noted that vote 503 in the supplementary estimates provides an additional $450,000, bringing the total requested for the year to $950,000. The purpose of these votes is to make funds available to establish Canadian sources of electronic component parts essential to expected Canadian military requirements. The needs of forthcoming equipment programs can be met in this country only if action is taken in anticipation of these programs to tool up industry for production and obtain production samples which will meet military standards. Limited action has been taken along these lines in past years, using funds available to the Department of National Defence for the development of electronic components; however, it was decided this year to place the development of qualified production sources on a more systematic basis, and to include the necessary funds in the estimates of my department.

This is of necessity a selective program in which we must weigh each case in the light of the quantities of the components likely to be required and existing manufacturing capabilities on which we can build. For approved projects, the funds are intended to cover such costs as production engineering, tooling, the manufacture of sample components, test equipment and testing, evaluation for qualification approval, training and cost studies. It is expected that most of this money will be spent on a fairly wide range of projects, each of them involving only a relatively small amount. I might add that while the purpose of this provision, as originally conceived, is to establish sources of components related to Canadian military requirements, the establishment of such sources also assists Canadian industry in its bidding for United States orders.

Vote 73, which provides for the expenses incurred by Defence Construction (1951) Limited in procuring the construction of defence projects on behalf of the Department of National Defence, shows an increase of about $340,000 or 11 per cent over 1958-59. This reflects the expectation that total defence construction expenditures will be almost double those for last year, taking into account the construction of new Pine Tree stations, Bomarc launching sites and the Sage station. Despite this large increase in the program the expected increase in personnel, which is the chief reason for the additional funds, amounts to only about 15 per cent.

Vote 74, for the administration and operation of Canadian Arsenals Limited, shows an increase of $200,000 over 1958-59. For some years prior to last year the volume of sales achieved by this company was sufficient to cover all its operating costs. Last year, however, sales declined to the point where it became necessary to revert to the practice of the post world war II period and appropriate funds to cover the deficits of the arsenals. A further reduction in the volume of sales is expected in the current year, and the gap between anticipated revenue and costs is therefore widened.

On the other hand vote 75, which provides for the cost of construction, improvements and new equipment for Canadian Arsenals Limited, is further reduced this year by the amount of $226,000. The vote covers only capital costs of a general nature and excludes amounts attributable to specific programs; the latter would be covered by vote 70.

Finally I would direct your attention to vote 504 in the supplementary estimates, which asks for $5 million and commitment authority for an additional $4 million to support selected defence development programs. This item is closely related to the production sharing program and owes its origin to the same circumstances which gave rise to that program. As long as Canada was undertaking the independent development and production of the major equipment requirements of the armed forces, Canadian industry was able to build up and maintain sizeable engineering teams and to develop an advanced technology in a number of fields. As it becomes increasingly difficult for Canada to develop major weapon systems independently, the support previously given to development engineering by the equipment programs of the Canadian services is lessened. We are therefore taking other steps to ensure that existing engineering capacity will be maintained to the greatest extent practical, and that our technological progress will not be impeded.

This is important for many reasons, among them being the serious effect which a decline in Canadian engineering capabilities would have on our production sharing efforts. The weapon systems and equipments which seem to offer the greatest promise for future production sharing are all characterized by a very high degree of engineering content. Canadian industry will be able to share in such production programs only if its engineering capacity can be maintained and its technical competence advanced through the performance of appropriate development tasks. I would emphasize that we are determined that any Canadian role under production sharing should include some of the more demanding work and not be limited to the pouring of concrete or to what is often called "metal bashing".

The choice of projects to be financed from this vote will, of necessity, be restricted to the most promising areas of development, and no attempt will be made to cover the whole field. We must obviously consider the ability of Canadian industry to meet the engineering demands of particular projects. We must also estimate the prospects for future production orders, which will require a forecast of the future requirements of both the United States and Canadian forces. In addition, the development program will be worked out in a long term context to ensure the greatest possible continuity and stability of Canadian industrial engineering. It will also take account of the probable industrial needs of the civilian economy, to which certain lines of technological advantage may be especially relevant.

The method of selecting and administering development projects is being worked out in consultation between my department and the departments of finance and national defence. There will also be continuous consultation with the United States agencies responsible for defence research and development.

I must point out that there is an element of risk in all development projects. Nobody knows for certain in advance whether the expenditures of development funds will produce a piece of hardware acceptable to the armed forces. There are bound to be failures, and this risk will have to be accepted. Even the failures, however, are likely to be offset in part by the technical experience gained by the industrial teams involved. For those projects which are successful, of course, there is every expectation, taking into account the much larger United States requirements, that substantial production orders will result.

Those are the main changes and innovations provided this year in the estimates of this department. The remainder of my introductory remarks will deal with some of the most important aspects of our current activities and with the progress made in respect of the production sharing plan.

During the last fiscal year, expenditures for purchases and construction were hardly lower than in former years. The net value of new contracts and of changes in previous contracts is but only slightly higher than the figure for 1957-58. During the current year, I am not expecting any great difference in the degree of our activities, based on the value of contracts and the amount of expenditures.

However, statistics do not give any indication of the main change which has occurred and which is still being developed in the nature of our work. This change, the setting up of a production sharing scheme between Canada and the United States, follows the important decisions taken during the last year with regard to our defence program. As parliament and the people in general soon recognized, these decisions have shown the growing complexity of modern weapons and the ever more complete integration of Canadian-American continental defence arrangements which make it extremely difficult for our country to undertake alone the development and production of the main weapons.

The government had realized the situation more than a year ago. It was obvious that programs like that of the Bomarc missile and the SAGE system, which were being considered at the time, and also the possibility of other more remote defence programs against ballistic missiles, would require a reorientation of the larger part of our development and of our defence production in Canada. Instead of confining ourselves to the sole requirements of Canadian armed forces, we would have to get more and more together with the United States, and co-operate with them. In theory, these arrangements were provided for in the Hyde Park agreements and the statement of policy of 1950 with regard to economic co-operation. But, this general theory of co-operation had to be put into practice so that it would apply to the new circumstances. This was the origin of the production sharing plan.

Hon. members will remember that on February 23 last, I informed them of the steps we had taken up to that day jointly with the American authorities for the purpose of an actual sharing of production. I may say that we have resorted to every possible means. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) first of all raised the matter during his last summer's talks with president Eisenhower. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) and myself have explained Canada's point of view to the defence secretary of the United States on various occasions, namely at the meeting of the joint Canadian-American defence board last December. We also exchanged correspondence with Mr. McElroy and the late Mr. Quarles, of the American defence department, in which we dealt with general policy but also pointed out Canada's interests with regard to specific equipment requirements in the United States. Officials of both countries, among whom were my deputy minister and the deputy minister of national defence, took part and will again take part in a number of talks in order to direct and accelerate the implementation of the program. Various working groups, consisting of Canadian and United States officials responsible for special aspects of the program, are meeting almost continually.

(Text):

At an early stage in our discussions with the United States authorities we were able to get their agreement to a definition of the objectives of production sharing. As I reported to the house last February 23, we set ourselves an immediate aim of increasing the participation of Canadian industry in the production and support of North American defence weapons; we also adopted a continuing objective which recognizes the long term nature of the problem with which we were faced, and looks to the co-ordination of the defence requirements, development, production and procurement of the two countries in order to achieve the best use of their respective production resources for their common defence.

In pursuit of these objectives two broad courses of action appear to be appropriate for the Department of Defence Production. The first is to obtain United States recognition and acceptance of Canadian sources of supply. This had to begin, of course, at the top, at the secretarial level in the United States and among the assistant secretaries responsible for the procurement programs of the three services.

It is here, of course, to the senior United States authorities that we have had to look for the removal or modification of policies and regulations which would hamper Canadian industry's participation in United States procurement programs. The most important example of action of this kind, which I reported to the house on May 1, was the revision of the "buy American" regulations. The general effect of these changes was, of course, to waive the "buy American" act in respect of purchases in Canada of the main kinds of defence equipment within the capabilities of Canadian industry.

There are other instances of action at the secretarial level to remove impediments. Duty free entry, for example, has always been a problem in the past, but arrangements are being worked out for this privilege to be extended to imports of Canadian defence material. I might explain that the exclusion of duty from a Canadian bid for evaluation purposes, under the waiver of the "buy American" policy, does not in itself provide for duty exemption when the material actually enters the United States, unless a duty free entry certificate has been granted. The problem has, in the past, been felt chiefly at the subcontract level, which will, we hope, be an important area of future Canadian sales. I am now confident that the problem will be remedied.

A further problem related to security restrictions. Most of the important defence programs in the United States carry a security classification, which has often had the effect in the past of excluding Canadian firms from access to these programs. A "need to know" could not be established for Canadian industry chiefly because the Canadian forces had no requirement for the equipment in question. The United States authorities are very strict, and understandably so, in their insistence on a "need to know", and even their own industries are unable to obtain information about projects in which they are not directly involved. Now, however, in most cases the production sharing program has been accepted as sufficient grounds for the removal of this security bar, whenever Canadian firms are interested in projects for which their capabilities may be appropriate. Canadian industry is therefore finding it easier to discuss with the large defence contractors in the United States many of the important programs in which the latter are engaged.

By actions such as these we have obtained a framework of United States policy and regulations which is favourable to Canadian participation. But this is only the first step toward securing acceptance of Canadian sources. Many of the actual procurement decisions in which Canadian industry might be interested are taken at the lower levels of the United States armed service departments, often at procurement centres far removed from Washington, and by the prime contractors or even subcontractors. It has been necessary, therefore, to embark on a broad program of making United States procurement offices and contractors aware both of the implications of the new policies and regulations of their own government and the capabilities of Canadian industry.

In terms of the man-hours of Canadian officials, this has been and will continue to be a major concern of my department in the production sharing program. We have reinforced the staff of our Washington office which, as the Leader of the Opposition observed a short time ago, can play a vital liaison role with the United States authorities. We have stationed officers at key United States project offices. Other officials have been assigned for as long as six months at a time, to work with United States contractors in an effort to discover and bring to their attention opportunities for Canadian participation. The major United States contractors have also been supplied by my department with detailed reports of Canadian production facilities which could be employed on their projects.

I might say that the United States authorities have recognized the need to make their production sharing policy effective at the level of their procurement offices and contractors, and have supported us generously in our efforts.

We have from the outset enlisted Canadian manufacturers to help in this task of education, and representatives of a number of our industries have visited Washington and major United States procurement centres, both to help us in familiarizing United States authorities with Canadian capabilities and to be briefed by those authorities on United States procurement programs and procedures. A growing number of Canadian firms have also acted individually, sending their representatives to visit contractors throughout the United States. I should like to emphasize that this kind of action—the face to face meeting between Canadian and United States industry—is essential to the success of production sharing.

For the same reason, United States contractors have been encouraged to visit Canada and obtain first-hand knowledge of Canadian facilities. I might add that in doing this we have been confident that Canadian industry would make an impressive showing, and this has, in fact, been the experience to date. Our Canadian capabilities are neither as large nor as broad as those of our great neighbour, but within the limits of specialization Canadian defence industry is the equal of any in its physical plant and manufacturing skills.

All this, then, constitutes one of our lines of attack, going after United States acceptance of production sharing, and recognition of the contribution which Canadian industry can make. The other line of approach has been to help Canadian industry to exploit the opportunities which the production sharing program may present.

I might emphasize at this point that we can only try to help. We have consistently taken the view, in our own procurement program, that the interests of both the Canadian taxpayer and the armed forces are best served when manufacturers compete for our contracts. I can assure the committee that the United States authorities are no less insistent on this point in their procurement programs, and that Canadian firms who are seeking United States defence orders are entering a highly competitive field. In some cases the competition will be largely a matter of price; in others the technical aspects of proposals may be of equal or even greater importance. I know, however, that Canadian manufacturers are aware of this. I am confident that they will go after United States orders aggressively, and will bring all their skills and imagination to bear in the framing of their proposals. If they are not prepared to make this effort, nothing my department can do will make the production sharing program work.

On the other hand I realize that there are ways in which government can help, and we are pursuing these courses as energetically as possible. We are anxious, in the first place, to advise Canadian firms on what is involved in doing business with United States defence agencies and contractors, and to help them to identify the programs in which they might take part. We have prepared and distributed a brochure explaining United States procurement regulations and practices, in which we have tried to include all the information which is necessary to a firm seeking United States orders. As I have indicated, we have arranged for many companies to attend briefings in the United States. We have welcomed inquiries from interested Canadian firms, and I might at this point renew our offer of advice and assistance.

Both the department and the Canadian Commercial Corporation are undertaking to keep abreast of United States requirements, in order to draw to the attention of Canadian firms any opportunities which are likely to be of interest to them. As a result of these efforts, and especially as Canadian industry establishes its own direct links with United States procurement offices and contractors, there should be no opportunities missed through lack of knowledge.

In addition to the foregoing, there are other more tangible ways in which we may be able to help. I have already outlined two of these in my explanation of the items in the main and supplementary estimates. Vote 70, in part, offers some assistance to Canadian companies who may find themselves competing with United States companies who have already written off most of the tooling and preproduction expenses on previous orders. Vote 504, as I have explained, represents a far-reaching effort to ensure that Canadian skills are kept abreast of developments in defence technology, so that our industry can play its proper role in future production programs.

In addition, mention might be made of the reserve of crown owned machinery which is held by the department. This has been available to Canadian industry over the years to be used on Canadian defence production programs. In some cases items from the reserve might appropriately be made available to Canadian companies wishing to enter into United States defence contracts or subcontracts, providing, of course, that they already have the basic facilities and skills needed for the job.

In summary, I can say without hesitation that production sharing has overshadowed in importance all other concerns of my department in the past year, and will continue in the current year to have first claim on my own attention and that of my senior officials and a large number of officers of the department.

To this point, I have been reporting on what my department was doing, and what it intended to do, to promote production sharing. I feel that this is information which the committee, and the public at large would want and are entitled to have. I realize, however, that in the last analysis it is the results which count.

Firm figures for United States purchases in Canada during the first half of 1959 are not yet available. I may say, however, that during this period United States government procurement offices have placed prime defence contracts in Canada to the value of approximately $32 million. This figure covers Canadian manufactured military equipment only, and does not include construction, maintenance and service contracts. The comparable figure for the first six months of 1958 was $17 million. There has therefore been an increase of $15 million or 90 per cent in direct United States government orders alone. Moreover, within these totals the proportion representing more complex types of equipment has increased and for the first six months of this year accounted for two-thirds of the total direct orders. Since the end of June we have learned of the award of further contracts, valued at over $3 million, for advanced electronic equipment.

To this must be added the value of subcontracts placed in Canada as a result of the combined efforts of my department and Canadian industry to interest United States prime contractors in Canadian sources of supply. Over 100 such orders have been received, with an aggregate value in excess of $20 million. Many of these orders have a significance far beyond their relatively modest value, since it is a common practice of United States contractors to order small quantities for evaluation with the intention of placing substantial follow-on orders if these initial deliveries are satisfactory.

Too much should not be read into these figures. The idea of production sharing is too new and our experience is too limited to permit any very definite conclusions to be drawn. I am satisfied, however, that the initial results justify optimism on our part.

In the remainder of my statement I propose to review the principal sectors of our current production program and the status of the industries involved. In the field of aircraft production, the major government programs in which the industry is now engaged involve the CP-107 Argus maritime reconnaissance aircraft, the CC-106 transport version of this, the CS2F or tracker anti-submarine aircraft and the CC-109 cosmopolitan transport. The order for the Argus will, however, be completed late this year, and a number of subcontractors have already been affected. The CS2F will be completed in early 1960. The effect will be felt by subcontractors several months earlier, but subcontract orders in connection with the Albatross rescue aircraft will provide a partial replacement.

Work on the two transport aircraft will continue for a longer period, and there are now grounds for hoping for substantial commercial orders for both of these. As the committee will be aware, Canadair have already received orders for 15 of the commercial version of the CC-106, with options for the sale of 10 more. Since then other carriers have shown an interest both in this aircraft and their CL-540, which is the transport known to the air force as the CC-109. Needless to say I welcome the initiative shown by the company in stimulating commercial interest in these aircraft, both of which owe their existence to the support given by the government.

Sales of the Beaver and Otter utility aircraft are also continuing, and the Caribou, which seems likely to satisfy a substantial United States government requirement, is being further developed. The de Havilland Company of Canada has, of course, established a well deserved, world wide reputation as a designer and manufacturer of utility aircraft.

Aero engine production in Canada is now concentrated on supporting the Orenda engines which will continue, for several years, to be employed in large numbers by both the R.C.A.F. and a number of foreign air forces, the manufacture of the 1820-82 piston engine for the CS2F and the Albatross, and the production of Pratt and Whitney piston engines and parts for the world wide market. The repair and overhaul program will, of course, continue to provide steady employment in all sections of the industry, to provide with only a slight falling off as older types of aircraft are replaced.

The sum total of all these programs does not, of course, provide a work load which will support the existing aircraft industry. We therefore attach considerable importance to production sharing in this area and welcome such orders as those which have already been received relative to the Bomarc missile program.

For the same reason, the announcement that the F-104G has been selected as a replacement for the Sabre aircraft in the air division will be of enormous interest to the industry. It is obviously and understandably of great interest to this committee, and although a great deal of hard work remains to be done before contracts are signed I can at least report today on the action we propose to take in the procurement of this aircraft and the kind of program we expect to have.

In view of the fact that we have three major aircraft manufacturers in Canada, each of which is capable of undertaking this program, it has been decided to award the main contract on the basis of competition, in which each of the three will be invited to submit proposals. Whatever may be the outcome of this competition, it is certain that the program will create a substantial volume of work for the Canadian aircraft and associated industries over the next three years. The total cost of the program over this period will run to over $400 million, and at its peak it will create employment for approximately 10,000 people, of whom something over 5,000 will be required by the prime airframe and engine contractors. This work will, of course, be distributed widely throughout industry as a result of subcontracting.

The airframe will be manufactured in Canada with the exception of a small number of parts. Moreover, it is our expectation, based on discussions with Lockheed, that our purchases in the United States of the remainder of the airframe components will be offset by the assignment to Canada of the production of certain airframe sections for the requirements of Germany. For the production of the J-79 engines for these aircraft we are now beginning negotiations with Orenda Engines Limited. It is the opinion of the government that this firm is the most suitable for this work, providing their costs can be kept strictly within reasonable limits, and we are looking to the determination of a firm price.

As in the case of the airframes, these engines will be manufactured in Canada except for a hard core of parts for which tooling costs would be prohibitive in a requirement of this size. Here again our imports of engine parts will be offset by other component purchases in Canada by the United States manufacturers. In other words, both for the airframe and the engine the principle of production sharing has been fully accepted by the United States firms involved.

We are now working toward a similar understanding with the developers and manufacturers of the fire control and flight control equipment required for this aircraft. Until these discussions have proceeded further I would hesitate to forecast the actual production program which the Canadian electronics industry will be called on to undertake. I can say definitely, however, that the greater part of this work will be done in Canada, including a number of tasks which will be of a challenging character and consequently of importance for the preservation of the industry's engineering capabilities.

I might give the committee some idea of the expected impact of this program on future budgets, about which the Leader of the Opposition asked last Saturday. In the current year expenditures will be relatively slight, amounting to only about $6 million. In 1960-61 this will be multiplied almost tenfold, the present estimate being $57 million. In 1961-62 this in turn will be roughly doubled, and the peak will be reached the following year when an estimated $120 million will be spent, assuming current price levels and wage rates. Expenditures will fall slightly in 1963-64, during which year the program will be completed, and thereafter only relatively minor expenditures will be required for final settlements.

A breakdown of costs based on the principal elements of the program may indicate its probable impact on Canadian industry. About 41 per cent of the estimated cost of an F-104G, in fly-away condition, represents the airframe. The engine accounts for about 23 per cent, instruments and flight equipment for 16 per cent and electronic equipment, including the fire control system, for 13 per cent. The remaining 7 per cent represents payments to the original manufacturers for Canada's share of the design and engineering costs associated with the "G" model of the F-104, together with the licence fee and royalties. The engineering charges which I mentioned provide for engineering the airframe to take the fire control system, and strengthening the wings. These costs will be shared equally with Germany, and the Canadian share will be further reduced if the aircraft is adopted by other countries.

I would emphasize that all the cost and expenditure figures and percentages I have given are simply the best estimates we are able to make on the basis of our production studies and preliminary discussions with the Lockheed company. The actual contractual terms remain to be settled by negotiation. I might add that since the decision was announced last week, my officials have met with representatives of Avro, Canadair and de Havilland to explain to them the basis on which proposals are to be submitted, and it is our intention that the prime contractor shall be chosen, on the basis of the proposals received, within six weeks from now.

Interest has also been expressed in the basis on which prices are to be established. This too, of course, remains to be settled by negotiation, but I can assure the committee that we shall not contract on any cost-plus formula. For some items it may be possible to negotiate firm prices from the outset, but in the main the plan is to start on the basis of target prices, with incentive features. Where this is done we shall subsequently negotiate firm prices as soon as our experience with production costs permits.

The Leader of the Opposition asked last Saturday whether provision would be made for alteration of the terms if there were to be a change in our NATO commitments. I can only say that any changes in the requirement, short of cancellation, will be dealt with by the normal procedure for amending contracts, and that each contract will contain the usual provisions relating to cancellation.

As the Minister of National Defence indicated last week, the first of these aircraft will be delivered early in 1961, about 18 months after the contract is awarded. I might add to this, in response to a question by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, that thereafter the delivery rate will build up to a monthly rate of 10 aircraft, reaching this in six or seven months. Deliveries will continue at this rate until completion of the order by mid-1963. Peak employment under this schedule will be reached early in 1961. We are anxious to get on with this program with the least possible delay, and I can assure the committee that my department will undertake the many negotiations involved with the utmost speed consistent with protecting the taxpayers' interests.

I turn now from the aircraft program to the electronics program. The electronics industry differs from the aircraft industry in that it serves three separate major markets with widely divergent requirements. Defence electronics is just one of these, the other two being the large consumer market for radio and television products and the growing market for industrial applications of electronics. Experience has shown, however, that defence electronics has set the pace of engineering in the industry and has produced the developments on which the growth of the other two markets has rested. The future health of the industry rests largely on the degree to which it is able to participate in future defence programs and, in this way, maintain and develop its engineering skills.

The growing integration of our defence forces with those of the United States probably has a greater effect on this industry than on any other, since the electronics content is particularly high in those weapon systems which form the basis of that integration. We are therefore now in a transition period, which is likely to persist for two or three years, during which Canadian defence electronics production must be reoriented, in a very large measure, to serve a North American rather than a Canadian market.

There is no reason to believe that the general level of activity in defence electronics in this country should decline in the foreseeable future, since the equipment plans of our armed forces, as well as those of the United States, continue to place a growing emphasis on electronics applications. There are also encouraging signs that the Canadian industry, as it showed at the recent meeting of its association, is beginning to adjust itself to the new defence environment, and some initial successes have been achieved in the radar, data processing and communications fields in competition with United States firms.

The other sectors of the defence production program, while they reflect the same changes in defence strategy and establishments, offer fewer opportunities for production sharing.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee that the minister be permitted to carry on with his statement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. O'Hurley: The shipbuilding program will continue at approximately its present level, which is substantially below the peak of the Korean and post-Korean period. The one major new project to be started in the current year involves a fleet tanker to support the destroyer escorts. It has been decided to invite tenders from Canadian shipyards for the construction of this ship. The original order for 14 destroyer escorts will be completed during the current year. Work has now started on the first of the six additional destroyer escorts, which will be similar to H.M.C.S. Restigouche in all essential respects, and the second ship will be begun in the very near future.

While there is a continuing need for weapons and ammunition of conventional patterns, production in these categories is expected to decline further during the current year. New types of weapons may offer some opportunities for the industries which were engaged in this kind of work, but these are likely to be limited by the radical differences in the nature of the new equipment and the relatively small numbers in which they are required.

In summary, it might be said that the defence production program and the industrial complex associated with it are now going through a process of adjustment, reflecting the changing character of modern defence and the increasing integration of Canadian and United States continental defence forces which has resulted from this fundamental change. I am satisfied that the nature of this adjustment is now well understood by the civilian and military authorities and the defence industry in both Canada and the United States. We are determined that the resources of this country shall continue to play an effective role in the new circumstances, and with the co-operation which we are receiving both from our own military authorities and from the procurement agencies and contractors in the United States, I am confident that this can be done.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the minister for his very comprehensive statement in introducing his estimates in the house. I do not intend to deal with the technical questions which have been raised in his statement but I presume that some of my colleagues, far more competent than I am, will have a few words to say about this subject.

Mr. Chairman, I found that the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) devoted a considerable part of his speech to what he called the contract sharing scheme or plan between Canada and the United States in the defence field.

I shall naturally have something to say in the matter a little later on in my remarks, but, for the present, I want to deal with some extraordinary powers that are conferred upon the minister. I want to mention those powers, Mr. Chairman, because, before 1957, then hon. members who are occupying today government benches and who were sitting then on this side of the house frequently said that the Minister of Defence Production had extraordinary powers, so extraordinary that they could even shake up this country's whole economy. According to them, it was due, of course, to the manner in which the minister was using his statutory powers.

Mr. Chairman, I only want to give two or three instances of those extraordinary powers. According to paragraph (e) of subsection 1, section 17 of the act:

> A contract may be entered into by the Minister without the approval of the Governor in Council if
> (i) in the opinion of the Minister, the contract must be entered into immediately in the interests of defence,
> (ii) the estimated expenditure, loan or guarantee does not exceed twenty-five thousand dollars, or
> (iii) competitive tenders have been obtained and the lowest tender, involving an estimated expenditure not exceeding fifty thousand dollars, is accepted; but the Minister shall make a report to the Governor in Council in respect of any contract involving an estimated expenditure, loan or guarantee exceeding ten thousand dollars and entered into without the approval of the Governor in Council.

A little further on in the act, Mr. Chairman, we find section 23, and I would like to quote the first subsection:

> Where a person who has been requested to enter into a defence contract on terms and conditions that the Minister considers to be fair and reasonable has refused or failed to enter into the contract, if the Minister is satisfied that such person owns or controls facilities that are suitable for or can be adapted to the work required to carry out such contract and that his refusal or failure was without reasonable excuse, the Minister may direct that person to produce, deliver or store, or to construct, as the case may be, on such terms and conditions and within such period as the Minister considers to be fair and reasonable in the circumstances, the defence supplies or the defence project or projects that would have been the subject-matter of the contract if it had been entered into.

In concluding my remarks with regard to the extraordinary powers conferred upon the minister under the Defence Production Act, I would like to quote subsection 2 of section 27. To my mind, Mr. Chairman, that clause embodies one of the most extensive powers conferred upon the minister under the act. It reads as follows:

> Where a controller has been appointed to carry on a business or a part thereof, he shall be deemed to be the agent of the owner thereof for the purpose of carrying on the business or that part thereof, except that the owner shall not have any right to control the business or that part thereof and the controller may, subject to any instructions of the minister, do all such things as he thinks fit for the purpose of carrying on the business or that part thereof.

Mr. Chairman, nothing would be simpler than to quote other sections of the act and point to the extraordinary character of the powers conferred upon the minister under that act. If I felt I had to deal briefly with the matter it is because, as I pointed out at the beginning of my remarks, some members who were formerly in the opposition and who are now ministers have vigorously denounced those extraordinary powers conferred by the act upon the Minister of Defence Production.

As an example, may I quote the words of the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green). Dealing with those extraordinary powers, including the provision allowing the minister to appoint a controller in an enterprise, the Minister of Public Works, then member for Vancouver Quadra and sitting with the opposition, said, as recorded on page 1964 of Hansard of March 11, 1955:

> There is no freedom left to business in Canada, Mr. Chairman, so long as that particular provision remains on the statute books of our land.

Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that the Minister of Public Works was sincere when he spoke those words in 1955. The minister is very influent with the Prime Minister and all his colleagues. That is why I believe he has now an exceptional opportunity to remove from our statutes a provision which, if it remains there, will deprive Canadian business of all freedom.

A little later, the Minister of Public Works said:

> A later subsection provides that an investigator appointed by the minister may or may not allow any person whose conduct is being investigated to have a lawyer. The subsection goes just that far. In these provisions, we have a potential tyranny in our land.

Mr. Chairman, that is what the present Minister of Public Works thought at the time of certain powers conferred upon the Minister of Defence Production under the act.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett) too, has had some very harsh words to say about those powers conferred upon the minister. I should like to quote but one paragraph of what the hon. member said, as recorded on page 1992 of Hansard of March 14, 1955:

> I have often wondered—

The hon. member was referring to the extraordinary steps which the Minister of Defence Production could take in relation to the powers conferred upon him by the act.

> I have often wondered, and I ask myself today, how many of the members who sit behind the minister who administers the department which this resolution concerns, know exactly the terms that are contained in the act. The hon. member for Eglinton—

As you know, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Eglinton is today Minister of Finance.

> The hon. member for Eglinton outlined some of the terms very carefully. They go the very depths and roots of our system. They take away, on the strength of one man's opinion only, whoever the minister may be who is in charge of the department at the time, every right to which we have pledged ourselves in the past and to which we expect others in the future to pledge themselves.

It was not only the rights that were safeguarded; the sections of an act, too, were safeguarded by those who came after us. And the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett) added:

> I suggest, as have other hon. members before me, that a resolution could easily have been introduced which would continue the life of the department but at the same time give it only the powers necessary for carrying out its work under our system of freedom of the individual and of enterprise.

Those were the statements made so feelingly in 1955 by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), the hon. member for Peel, and the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) concerning the extraordinary powers of the Minister of Defence Production. Now, Mr. Chairman, those gentlemen are members of the government; two of them are cabinet ministers, and not among the least, in the Conservative government cabinet. What is keeping them from acting on the pious statements they made, when sitting on this side, about the rights of parliament and the extraordinary nature of the powers vested in the Mnister of Defence Production under this Act?

Mr. Chairman, we are not surprised. We have become used to quoting statements from former opposition members who now sit on the government side. There have been a number of such statements. We have even quoted definite condemnations of certain actions and certain items of legislation passed by the former Liberal administration in other fields. Then, what did they do when they gained office? What did they do, Mr. Chairman, once they got the power to carry out what they had preached—with apparent sincerity—when they sat on this side of the house? What are they doing now? They just sit there, indeed I might even say they are practically sitting on the statements they made when they sat on this side of the house.

One of the main aspects, or at least one of the aspects which I consider important in the statement made by the minister this morning, is the contract-sharing system, in the field of defence, between Canada and the United States. This is a scheme that already has a background to it.

If, for instance, we refer back to certain newspaper reports giving the background of the minister's and the government's scheme, I think perhaps we may be disappointed with the current turn of events. I must say, however, that the minister and the government are to be commended for taking definite action to obtain, or rather to have Canada obtain, its share of defence contracts, if we are to have an integrated defence with the United States. I commend them on their attitude, but I regret that their efforts, despite all their merits, have not yielded the expected results.

The minister, however, has indicated in his statement that he is very hopeful that current developments and discussions with our United States colleagues will lead to some improvement. I most sincerely hope so.

However, there must be no more of those rather gloomy statements—from our point of view—made to the press by certain officials—I am not referring to Canadian officials. I have here, for instance, an article which appeared in La Presse of Tuesday March 10 under the title:

Canada wants more U.S. arms orders.

This is a dispatch from New York, dated March 10:

The request made by the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, Prime Minister of Canada, that Canada get a larger share of orders for the north American common defence has made pratically no impression in the United States.

Mr. Diefenbaker's remarks in the House of Commons were not even published in Washington; and did not provoke any official answer. In fact, the American people, the American industry, even the majority of American politicians are completely unaware of the serious crisis which has resulted for the Canadian armament industry following the cancellation of the Avro Arrow fighter CF-105.

The article goes on:

The main obstacle to the fulfilment of Mr. Diefenbaker's wish is that, by force of circumstances, Canada's defence is bound to the United States' defence.

I must admit that, since the publication of that article, if we take into account all that it contained, there has been great progress, but I do not think it is satisfactory, and the government will have to work hard and consistently to get our share of defence production contracts.

There was a further article in Le Devoir of March 6, 1959. I need not read it, but I do say that many Canadians have read with deep concern the statements of some high United States officials. The article published in Le Devoir on March 6, 1959, has the following heading:

Our air forces: the U.S. will provide equipment, aircraft, pilots; our job will be to sweep the runways.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that Canada, with its technicians—whose ability, devotion and hard work has been rightly praised by the minister—Canada, with its three major industries in that field and the great number of experts who work there, is not asking for favours from the United States in trying to get the share of contracts it deserves. Canada is running a great risk with the United States, I would not say by abdicating its sovereignty, since it has not done so, I believe, but I think our country is running a great risk in relying on the neighbouring government—I do not think I am going too far in saying this—for the choice of certain weapons with which Canada is equipping itself for the defence of our continent. We find proof of this in what happened only recently regarding the choice of the new plane, a matter most ably dealt with by my colleague for Toronto Trinity (Mr. Hellyer).

Again about contract sharing with the United States, I know that words I am about to quote have been said in this house, Mr. Chairman, but I would like to repeat them to show how hard it is going to be for us to reach the goal which the government has in mind, because I hope—not only do I hope, but I gather from the statement the minister made this morning—that the government has set itself a very high standard in the securing of defence contracts. But if I take, for instance, a statement from the Montreal Gazette, dealing, Mr. Chairman, with the meeting of high Canadian and American officials, and with the recent visit to Washington of our minister of defence; I notice that speaking of Mr. McElroy, the Gazette had this to say:

(Text):

He—

Mr. McElroy.

—added the United States considered "very modest" a Canadian request to place some of the production orders for these systems with Canadian industry.

I am sure that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) and his colleague, the Minister of Defence Production, have succeeded in making Mr. McElroy understand that we intended to make more than modest requests because we were anxious to share in the construction of weapons to be used for the defence of our continent.

The Ottawa Journal of March 23 also published quite sensible remarks which should inspire the government in its dealings with our American colleagues. May I quote part of the item of March 23, 1959 which is headed as follows:

(Text):

What the Canadian government had tried to do, and must continue to do, is to emphasize to the United States that production-sharing is regarded by this country as the very foundation of effective and long-continued defence collaboration. If there is to be no sharing to any substantial degree, then there is bound to be some discouragement of Canadian co-operation in the general association, and more talk, so damaging to our good neighbour (and perhaps to us) about Americans wanting Canadians to be hewers of wood and drawers of water.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, the Toronto Globe and Mail of May 4, also made quite judicious remarks which I shall bring to the attention of the Minister of Defence Production. I quote from an article dated May 4, 1959, entitled: "A long way from partnership".

(Text):

Canada still gets the short end of the stick. As matters stand, the best our defence industries can hope for is to win some U.S. subcontracts, to make some components for U.S. weapons—and even this will require exceptional effort and efficiency on their part. Yet we have the capacity, as the Avro Arrow abundantly testified, to design, develop and produce completely a wide range of modern armaments.

How can this capacity be utilized? Not by the efforts of individual companies. Defence industries produce wholly or mainly for governments, and to the specifications of governments. This being the case, there is little point in telling them to get out and compete, to get out and find business. The business must be given to them.

To produce orders for Canadian defence plants is the function of the Canadian government. If Ottawa has no orders of its own for the Canadian defence industry—and this seems to be one of the consequences of North American defence integration—then Ottawa must get North American orders for it.

The place to get such orders is in Washington; the way to get them is by top-level negotiations between the two countries—negotiations in which Canada will have to be extremely firm and extremely forthright. The Americans seem to think they can keep us happy by throwing us an occasional sop. They must learn we will settle for nothing less than a full sharing.

(Translation):

And I would like to quote a last paragraph from the Financial Post which is very important, I believe, with regard to the story behind our negotiations with the United States for our share of defence contracts. I will read one paragraph only from the Financial Post of May 9, 1959, and it is found in an item headed as follows: Canadian Companies Hold Keys.

(Text):

"Canadian Companies Hold Key to Those U.S. Defence Orders." The next two years will make or break this marriage.

(Translation):

This, Mr. Chairman, has to do with our discussions with the United States to get a fair share of contracts. The Financial Post goes on to say:

(Text):

If within two years Canadian companies have not got a large slice of United States defence orders, the arrangement will have failed.

(Translation):

I could quote further notes on this matter, Mr. Chairman, but I think I have said enough to pass now to other questions. But I would again urge the minister and the government to really play their part in this connection. It is all very well to tell Canadian companies to submit proposals which might be acceptable to the U.S. government but I believe we have to go a step further. The minister had an excellent idea when he gave or sent to the various companies likely to be interested a booklet of information about the specifications or standards of the U.S. government in this field.

At the beginning of his statement, the minister told us that some items of his department's estimates this year, had gone down, compared to last year. But if my sources of information are reliable, the estimates of the Department of Defence Production for the year 1958-1959 totalled $9,877,086, while, for 1959-1960, they will reach $17,388,120. Although there may have been cuts in some of the items, we can see that there has been an increase of nearly $8 million in the estimates of his department this year.

Mr. Chairman, that brings us back again to the years prior to 1957. I wonder whether the minister could tell us, when he will be kind enough to make his remarks at the end of the debate on the first item, if there is much of what some former members of the opposition, now ministers of the crown, used to describe picturesquely as "waste and extravagance". We have here an increase of nearly $8 million, as I have just pointed out to the house. Yet, promises had been made to cut waste and extravagance in several departments. One of the colleagues of the Minister of Defence Production who is sitting beside him at this moment—I refer to the Minister of National Defence—also spoke with great feeling on the extravagant expenditures of the department he is now directing. Suggestions had even been made at that time.

However, before going back to the 1957 campaign, Mr. Chairman, allow me to quote an authority in this house in the matter of suggestions to check waste and stop runaway expenditures in the departments. I should like to refer to page 4330 of Hansard for June 1, 1955, and to quote just part of a speech made that day by the member for Prince Albert who is today Canada's Prime Minister.

This is what he said at the time:

What did the Hoover commission do? Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition referred to some of its activities and some of the results of its work.

Mr. Chairman, I shall spare hon. members the next few paragraphs and come straight to the important part I want to quote.

Let us have an inquiry such as is asked for by the hon. member for Greenwood,—

He too is a minister today.

—in order to bring about savings. If they are even partially commensurate with those achieved by the Hoover commission in the United States they will run into hundreds of millions of dollars in the course of a year from now. But something more is needed than a Hoover commission, as they found in the United States. They set up the Hoover commission and it went to work on its task forces. Then, throughout the length and breadth of the United States, outstanding leaders in finance, in business, in agriculture, in the labour unions and in the fields of national research formed themselves into a non-profit organization in order to assist in the implementation of the Hoover report. In other words, what they said they wanted to do without regard to party or political considerations of any kind was to do away with the pork barrel pressure groups and substitute the cracker barrel pressure groups of thrift in every part of the nation.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I wonder if members of the House of Commons will allow me to carry on for five or six minutes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Brassard (Lapointe).]

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Thank you very much.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, on another occasion—or rather I should say on two or three occasions —during the 1957 election, the extravagant expenditures of the national defence department and of the defence production department have been mentioned. It has been repeated time and time again that those departments were spending money extravagantly and that a commission should be set up to inquire into both departments, and every other department in fact, in order to put a stop to this shameful waste of the Canadian taxpayers' money.

Mr. Chairman, on May 1, 1959—perhaps some of my hon. colleagues do not know the book I am going to quote—

An hon. Member: The Gospel.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): It is what you might call the Conservative bible for 1957.

Mr. Bourget: It has been banned since that time.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, here is a statement made by the Prime Minister at Truro, Nova Scotia, on May 1, 1957, according to a news item appearing in the Toronto Telegram of May 2, 1957. I quote:

(Text):

Mr. Diefenbaker pledged that a Conservative government would set up a commission similar to the Hoover commission in the United States so that "unnecessary and wasteful federal expenditure could be eliminated."

(Translation):

On May 18, 1957, in Calgary, according to another report appearing in the Calgary Herald of May 1, 1957, the Prime Minister said this:

(Text):

A committee similar to the Hoover committee in the United States should be set up to study and make recommendations on government expenditures.

(Translation):

At Woodstock,—and that is the last quotation of the Prime Minister which I will read into the record, because I do not want to take undue advantage of my colleagues' kindness in granting me five or six minutes extra time,—on June 6, 1957, according to a dispatch of the London Free Times, issued on June 7 of the same year, the Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, said:

(Text):

The Conservative party in the house had insisted that the government itself first of all should cut its unnecessary expenditures, should reduce the high cost of big government.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, those who are now ministers but used to sit on this side of the house have often indicated and even charged outright that the former Liberal administration had recklessly wasted Canadian taxpayers' money.

Today, Mr. Chairman, I ask the Prime Minister, or I might ask the Minister of Defence Production to convey my message to the Prime Minister, in order to give him the opportunity to fulfil one of the solemn pledges that he personally made to the people of Canada that he would create a commission or a committee to study the extravagant expenses of the government and the various departments. The government has the exceptional opportunity today of practising what it had preached, if it was sincere. But I do not want to cast any doubt on its sincerity.

Mr. Chairman, I did not have time to touch upon other matters with which I would have liked to deal. However, during the consideration of the estimates, and as the various items are called, we shall be pleased to direct certain questions to the Minister of Defence Production.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, in speaking to these estimates one feels like a tenant raising cain with the charwoman instead of going to see the landlord. Of course in this instance it is difficult to know who the landlord is. Sometimes I think it is the Minister of National Defence, sometimes the Secretary of State for External Affairs and sometimes I suspect that the lord of the manor is somewhere down in Washington. It is difficult to know how far to go in this department. It is rather obvious that the minister has little to do with the policies that determine the expenditures.

The point raised by the speaker who preceded me largely had to do with what the "ins" said when they were out. One point the hon. gentleman did not deal with was the difference in personality between the previous minister of defence production and the present minister. We are all aware of the image that was built up of the former minister of this department. He was made out to be a rather fearsome ogre and perhaps merited all the attacks about the powers given him under certain legislation. The fact that these attacks have led to no consequential change is not so much because the present government is perfidious and is not true to its former stand but because under our form of government power tends to build up around a personality or an individual. I think we should look at other departments of this government and see where that is happening. Fortunately the present minister is not an ogre. I see one minister sitting on the front benches who may be an ogre, but that has nothing to do with these estimates.

In our section of the country we have an example of an industry that is badly in need of defence production orders. This raises a question of the dilemma which confronts the government in its purchasing policy in so far as defence industries are concerned. Over the years defence industries like all others have tended to be concentrated in certain areas of the country and specifically in what might be called the golden triangle from Windsor to Sudbury to Montreal. This concentration has been accelerated in the last 10 years by the fact that most defence industry production is notable for its high capital input and a lessening of its labour input.

This concentration seems to revolve around the fact that in defence purchasing we are getting more and more complicated articles involving more and more engineering skill, as the minister pointed out. This naturally has led to an increased concentration of defence production purchases in the highly industrialized regions. It has meant that the much smaller areas like the lakehead have fallen behind. Perhaps in the natural justice of things these areas should fall behind because they cannot compete in certain terms due to higher transportation costs and the like with the more highly concentrated parts of the country.

In Port Arthur we have an important industry that enjoyed a good reputation for production in the past. In the last few years the company has not been able to obtain substantial orders to make it an important or basic aircraft supplier for the government.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to make a general reference to defence production policy with reference to one very narrow sector and one specific industry, namely the Canadian Car Company plant in Fort William. This plant had a record in the last war of producing aircraft. Since the last war it has had some aircraft contracts and it also produced buses. Recently, it moved into the field of trailer production. In other words, we had an amalgam of commercial production and defence production. Not too long ago the company came under the control of the great industrial—certainly defence production—giant of A. V. Roe. It is another example of the kind of concentration of industry that I was speaking about earlier. Not too long after A. V. Roe took over this company it was announced that the Canadian Car plant would move its commercial operations to Montreal where there was a new, or a newer, plant than they had in Fort William, and that unless there were some defence orders forthcoming the plant at the lakehead would close. The reaction of the community was immediate and to my mind it is the kind of reaction that raises questions about damn fool socialism and damn fool capitalism. Here we have the spectacle of an entire community, labour unions, municipal officials, rotary club and other service clubs, practically every organization in the community, off touting for defence contracts for this particular company.

When the company made the statement that it was uneconomical to go on with commercial operations in this particular plant and that on the grounds of corporate realism they must move to Montreal, they immediately, of course, brought to the fore the question, what about defence production orders in the same plant? Would they not be too high cost? If the same factors are at work in commercial production, surely they are at work in defence production, and so you have the dilemma that the local people were shilling —if you want to use a slang term—with the government for defence production orders to keep this plant going. And yet if the economic justification for the commercial transfer is true, then the adequacy of this plant for defence production orders on the basis of pure efficiency and the cheapest defence products of the best standard at the best price was obviously, or to me obviously, ruled out.

So you had the spectacle of this very large —well, the largest corporate structure perhaps in Canada—A. V. Roe Company, having the community doing its leg work, one might say, and putting pressure on this particular government in order to get a defence contract that would keep the plant open. In fact, in the past the company did indicate that if there were substantial defence orders, it might reconsider their commercial orders. In fact, what has happened is that the commercial production either has been or is in the process of being switched, and so our only hope of keeping that plant open is to have a substantial order.

The minister is aware that the order that the government has—I will not say promised —given every indication of giving to Fort William is the production of the Bobcat, the armoured fighting vehicle of the army, that the Minister of National Defence referred to. This particular vehicle is in the development stage. Ostensibly, or conceivably, if it passes the development test and it fits into government policy, then the government will go ahead and decide to place an order, and if the company puts in any kind of decent bid that order will go to Fort William and so we will keep our plant alive and over a thousand people in employment terms and a much larger number in terms of population of the community will be pleased. But, as I said when I first introduced this topic, there is a question of principle here and a fine opportunity for the government to enunciate a policy.

I pointed out earlier there has been this tremendous concentration in a golden triangle. It is a triangle that happens to fit into the United States concentration and beyond this particular region it is very difficult for secondary industries to get going. In the main they often have to be sustained by some form of government contract. While we can regret this concentration, yet it certainly is a fact that it exists and I think that it is a fact the government has to take into consideration in its purchasing policy. If what I see across the country in all the places outside of this particular triangle, and one or two other isolated major industrial regions in Canada, is true, we have a problem which is much larger than the lakehead problem.

Wherever you go in Canada, outside of the very large areas, you hear this bleat or this call for secondary industries. Every part of the country wants secondary industries. The people realize that the primary industries they may have such as pulp and paper, transportation, and such things, are not substantial enough to give them the kind of development they dream of. Therefore, when you go into northern Ontario, around Timmins or around Sudbury, or when you go into Manitoba and into eastern Quebec, or into any of these regions you hear the talk always, "We want and we need secondary industries". It seems to me that here would be an opportunity for this government in its defence procurement policy to recognize this particular need and to deliberately—that is by deliberate policy—decide to react from the concentration in the highly industrialized regions and deliberately direct their defence procurement policy in giving this type of secondary industry, if it is a type of secondary industry, to the regions and the communities that do not have them at present or are losing out at present.

I could give another example at the lakehead where we are finding that our shipyard cannot pick up orders to compete, and there again we are up against a situation. I certainly hear this, "Oh, would that we had

C. D. Howe around again; C. D. would throw us a ship or two to sort of keep us going". My reference to Mr. Howe is not a derogatory one. I just want to make the point that this sort of thing should not be done from the point of view of largess. An order should not come into Fort William just because we are in desperate need; it should come because there is a government policy to direct this kind of contract and this kind of work to areas that are not taking part and have not taken part in this tremendous concentration of industry. To me, this is one of the ways that this government could indicate by such a policy that it has a long range plan for the economy as a whole. I do not think it has to be ashamed of having a long range plan, if it has one up its sleeve.

The very sobering realization came to me the other day, after looking at a study by an economist on the location of the iron and steel industry in Canada, that most of the dreams of places like Fort William and Port Arthur about eventually having some kind of integrated steel operation are dreams that are never going to come to fruition within the next two or three decades unless there is some completely unusual technical change. This particular thesis argued that the plant of Dosco in Nova Scotia, for example, is uneconomical and that its future can only be guaranteed by different forms of government subsidy.

We have had a number of examples in the house of the kind of subsidy that affects that particular operation. We have had examples in the house countless numbers of times, if you check back over the last few decades, where measures have been brought in that recognize, for example, that the western farming community has problems that require a government policy which will direct and assist them down the line. I suggest to the minister that in the field of defence procurement there is a possibility for a government policy that will really help the smaller communities outside the industrial concentrations to develop or to keep alive secondary industry without the opprobium of being looked upon as inefficient or incapable of competing with the much larger scale organizations that are possible in the Montreal and Toronto areas. It seems to me that this possibility would be an antidote to what the former member for Port Arthur and great cabinet minister, if you wish, in the last government, advocated. It seems to me that his policy of getting things done during the war and in the years immediately after the war, arising from the impetuous nature of the man, was of real worth in terms of war effort but it left out the question of over-all planning and it showed very little consideration of the long term aspects of support for secondary industries or the development of secondary industries in those regions outside the triangle.

It is not within the minister's competence at the present time to enunciate such a policy but I think his department is one area where such a policy can very easily come forward. There are many members of the house who come from communities not unlike the one I represent and who have this very real problem. I imagine that someone who comes from a region embracing some of the smaller cities in the Ottawa valley or some of the smaller communities outside of Montreal or from such places as Halifax and Sydney must be very much aware of this problem and the real possibility of government leadership in this field with the blanket recognition and acceptance by most of the people of Canada, I believe, that here is a situation where straight economic efficiency in terms of the cheapest possible product in the shortest possible time is not necessarily the most important factor.

The final point I want to touch on in relation to the Department of Defence Production is the question of United States orders and the possibilities of Canadian firms getting in on them. Again, in the case of the region from which I come we have the example of rumour and counter-rumour to the effect that the industry involved there has not even been trying to get United States orders. I know that the minister can probably scotch that story and I hope he will do so later during the discussion of his estimates. I think we would appreciate having from him at some stage during his estimates a brief statement about the position of aircraft parts suppliers in this country, with specific names mentioned, and what are the possibilities of the groups in Edmonton, Winnipeg, the lakehead and in other parts of the country aside from the big three to whom he referred who I imagine are Canadair, de Havilland and Avro. I should ask the minister to be frank in his exposition. I think these places would appreciate knowing what is likely to happen rather than to have some golden hope hung in the air which they are not going to be able to reach. If the minister would do that I think it would enable me and the hon. member for Fort William to clear up some misapprehensions that exist in our area, and I would hope he would do the same for the others.

I cannot end my remarks without saying that throughout the past year I have appreciated the pleasant and informative way in which the minister, his deputy and their associates have always come forward with as much information as they possibly could when they were asked, and in that regard I have no complaints at all about this department. That situation is quite in contrast to that in the Department of Transport and the Department of National Defence. Before you rule me out of order, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I have never had a straight answer from the Department of National Defence. I should like to suggest to the Minister of National Defence that with regard to sending out letters if he wants to see in operation a technique of giving straight answers he should drop over and have a chat with the Minister of Defence Production or his deputy. He might then be able to improve one very minor aspect of his public relations.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of specific matters I should like to deal with but before doing so may I commend the minister on the activity of his department in opening the way for Canadian industry to participate in defence production contracts originating in the United States and also with regard to the success the department has had in getting rid of the buy American act from the point of view of defence sharing.

At one time Vancouver was a major airplane manufacturing centre. During the war the Boeing Aircraft Company had large plants on Sea island and produced many planes. It is not a remarkable fact that the majority of the aircraft manufacturing plants in the United States are on the west coast because the physical facilities in regard to airplane manufacturing require rather massive, high structures with very large door openings and such structures are more readily, easily and cheaply built on the west coast where you do not have winters such as occur in the east to contend with. After the war these facilities were absorbed by the overhaul plants of Canadian Pacific Air Lines and Trans-Canada Air Lines.

The previous speaker referred to the decentralization of industry and it seems to me that the major manufacturing complex which is in existence on the west coast is a logical place for an airplane manufacturing industry. It follows the pattern set in the United States, and we have had past experience in that form of manufacturing. We have the skills and the technicians out there to carry it on. We know that Avro, Canadair and de Havilland are the three major manufacturing plants and, to refer only to Avro and Canadair, it would seem to me that they were set up in Toronto and Montreal respectively because the majority of their work was government work and therefore they located in areas that were fairly close to Ottawa so that they would have quick and easy contact with government officials and with the government itself. I believe that we have passed beyond that phase, at least I hope we have, although we do have a saying out on the west coast that we may be 3,000 miles away by air but we are 300,000 miles away as a matter of actual fact.

I would suggest to the minister it is about time that some particular study was given to the problem of spreading out defence contracts across Canada and in particular, so far as I am concerned, to the west coast. I would suggest a team of experts from the department might well visit the west coast and become acquainted with what can be done there. They might have discussions with existing manufacturers on the west coast, including Fairey Aviation and the Bristol Company, who know a fair amount about building airplanes. They could ascertain whether or not a few of these defence contracts in connection with certain phases of airplane building, perhaps also in the electronics field, might be placed with established manufacturers on the west coast.

In general, the procurement of the Department of Defence Production does tend to centre around the manufacturing heartland of Canada in Ontario and Quebec. This is understandable because again the great bulk of manufacturing is concentrated there, and also it is very easy for the representatives of such manufacturers to visit Ottawa and gain information as to what is required. They are in a preferred position so far as being in touch with what is coming up is concerned. Not too long ago I had an instance of this in connection with the construction of radar towers. We have a firm in Vancouver that could build these towers and they were asked by Canadian Commercial Corporation, I believe, to bid on this contract. However, by the time the firm got the information there was not enough time left to prepare a bid. Furthermore, representatives of the firm would have to visit United States defence officials in New York in order to be briefed on the particular requirements. It was just impossible for this firm to compete because of their distance from Ottawa. I think the fact that we happen to be 2,500 or 3,000 miles away from Ottawa should not be an insuperable barrier to our participation in contracts from the Department of Defence Production.

I feel it is up to the department, not the individual manufacturer, to do something to bring the west coast manufacturer into a position where he can complete on an equal basis, so far as information and engineering advice is concerned, with his eastern counterpart. I would suggest, as I said before, that the area around Vancouver is an ideal area for participation in this F-104G project. Instead of limiting participation to Canadair and Avro or de Havilland I suggest we might consider Bristol or Fairey or some other company on the west coast in order to distribute some of the procurement for defence more equitably across the country. We do participate now in the construction of ships for national defence, but that is the only place where we get what I consider to be a fair break.

There is one other point I should like to make, and that is in connection with the calling of tenders for supplies for the armed forces. The air force has three delivery points, Moncton, Edmonton and Weston, Ontario. Moncton is for eastern Canada; Edmonton for western Canada and Weston, Ontario, for central Canada. In regard to navy procurement, the delivery is to various stores depots, but for the army a manufacturer invariably has to quote a price delivered to the central depot at Cobourg. Since freight is sometimes a major item in building up costs, and since you do not quote an f.o.b. factory price but f.o.b. the stores point, this makes it difficult for west coast manufacturers. Even if these stores delivered to Cobourg have to be sent to depots in Calgary or Edmonton, the western manufacturer has to include the cost of freight from Vancouver to Cobourg, and I consider that to be unfair.

I had a specific case where in actual fact, the freight involved was, I would say, something close to 50 per cent of the cost of the product. The product had to be delivered to Ontario, and then it was shipped back to Edmonton for stores there. This practice was changed, and the prices were quoted f.o.b. Edmonton from then on, but up to that time the department would receive the articles in Ontario and then pay the cost of freight back to Edmonton. The two centres which are probably most affected by this are Vancouver and Edmonton, which are the two major manufacturing centres west of Winnipeg. Finally, I suggest the department might well give consideration to strengthening their local offices in so far as local procurement is concerned, to the point where those local offices are able to advise on the procurement of major materials for the department.

Mr. Pearson: In beginning the few remarks which I wish to make on the minister's estimates I should like to thank him, not only for the comprehensive and clear statement which he made this morning but also for his courtesy in sending two copies in advance over here so that we were able to follow him as he went along. We appreciate that very much. The statement was a revealing one. It revealed—though perhaps it was not required for that purpose because the purpose was obvious, once again that the key to defence production policy is defence policy. The key to the latter, as the minister pointed out in his statement, is the growing integration of our defence forces with those of the United States, which confirmed what the minister of defence made pretty clear in the debate on defence which we had the other day.

Defence production policy must obviously reflect that development in defence policy, which I admit has been going on for many years inevitably, perhaps inexorably, but a development which has gone farther now than ever before, as I ventured to say the other day, in our history. In the light of that, it is natural that defence production policy is now geared on the Canadian side, if I may put it this way, to United States defence policy or, if you would prefer to put it another way, to continental defence policy, which as it inevitably must be is under the major control of the United States, especially continental air defence policy. Of course, Mr. Chairman, this development, and the stage which it has now reached, is a far cry from the talk of emancipating our defence policy and defence production from the overpowering influence and control of the United States, the kind of talk we used to hear so often a few years ago.

The previous speakers from Port Arthur and Vancouver have urged on the minister that he or the government should lay down, as far as possible, a policy of direction in defence production so that procurement may be concentrated in those areas of underemployment, if you like, and surplus facilities. I have no particular argument to make to the minister in respect of my own area in that regard. As long as our defence relies to the extent it does now on nuclear deterrence, perhaps the most important defence production operation in the country is the production of uranium for the nuclear deterrent.

Having served in a government myself, I know of course, because this argument was used so often against us in earlier years, of the difficulties which exist in anything approaching a free economy in the direction by government of industrial and economic activity. Perhaps these is more opportunity, however, to do that in respect of an industrial activity which is so closely associated with government. In view of the minister's statement perhaps it will now be more closely associated than ever with government in peacetime, and probably there is more opportunity for this in defence production than any other form of industrial production. But while that may be the case, here again the integration, if I can use that word, of our defence and defence production activities with the United States will make it more difficult to direct those activities in Canada to areas where the government might wish to direct them.

The burden of the minister's statement this morning was on the importance of defence sharing with the United States as perhaps the only basis now on which we can maintain and develop a defence production industry in this country. I agree with him, in view of developments over the years, that that is probably the most important aspect of defence industry at the present time; but defence sharing must surely be more than getting orders from the United States for equipment for Canadian use. If it means anything, and if it really is a genuine reflection of the interdependence we talk so much about, it means sharing in Canada production for United States use, or certainly for joint use.

Our experience in this country in the last few years has not given us too much cause to believe that that kind of production sharing is going to develop as it should develop in joint or collective defence. Our experience, for instance, with the CF-105, the Arrow, has been a very unhappy one in that connection. If there ever was an opportunity for the United States to carry out in deed as well as in words recognition of the continental and collective concept of defence, it would have been to have shown at least a greater awareness of the desirability of using that Canadian airplane for general collective continental defence. We know what happened. Perhaps this is not the best example in the world to choose, because after the plane itself had been tested it must have been pretty difficult for the representatives of the Canadian government at that time to sell the idea of its use to the United States when the Canadian government itself was making up its mind that it was not going to be used in Canada. Indeed, in the words of the Prime Minister, it would be obsolete before it would come into squadron operation.

It would be hard enough even without that kind of qualification to persuade the United States to accept Canadian production for United States or for joint use, because it means we have to come up against all the pressures of United States industry. Perhaps they will be even greater than less in the days ahead. There is no place where those pressures are stronger, as I am sure my hon. friend knows better than I, than in the aircraft industry. As the defence industry in the United States sees a reduction of orders, as it is seeing now, in some aspects of defence—I think of the Bomarc, for example, which is having its orders cut $900 million in the next five years—United States industry will be even more careful about permitting, if that is not too strong a word to use, its government to share with Canadian industry.

The minister's statement this morning seems to me to make perfectly clear that if we cannot somehow get Canadian industry into this kind of defence production sharing it will be awfully hard to maintain it, let alone develop it, in this country. I think the statement also makes clear, perhaps more by omission than in any other way, that at the present time the only real outlet for our defence industry outside Canada is the United States of America. Here the prospects, as I have just said, are at least uncertain. The minister points that out himself in his statement, and I would like to quote from the copy which he was good enough to let me have at the point where he says:

> By actions such as these—

And he was talking about the steps which had been taken by the government.

> —we have obtained a framework of United States policy and regulations which is favourable to Canadian participation.

Then he goes on:

> But this is only the first step toward securing acceptance of Canadian sources.

Perhaps I do not need to suggest to the minister that the second step may be more difficult to take than the first. Perhaps he was not unduly pessimistic when he said earlier in this session, as reported on page 1269 of Hansard for February 23, 1959:

> The real success of production sharing endeavours depends, to a large degree, upon the determination of Canadian industry vigorously to seek defence business in the United States either as prime or as subcontractors. In assuming this responsibility, Canadian industry must bear in mind that it will have to be competitive with United States industry in terms of technical competence, delivery and price.

That is quite true, of course, but it will have to be more than that. With all the support that the government can give it it will have to overcome the forces in Washington which will be very much on the alert to make sure, even if these obstacles can be overcome, that Canadian industry does not share to any extent in United States production which would constitute what they would call dangerous competition for their own producers.

So there are many difficulties ahead even though some of them perhaps have been overcome, and I am glad of course, as all hon. members of the house are, at the success which was achieved in eliminating those aspects of the buy American law which remained. That was one step forward, but there are others, and I have mentioned some of the difficulties.

The minister also mentioned another one in his own statement, and that was the difficulty of tariff protection. On that point he has this to say:

> I might explain that the exclusion of duty from a Canadian bid for evaluation purposes, under the waiver of the buy American policy, does not, in itself, provide for duty exemption when the material actually enters the United States, unless a duty-free entry certificate has been granted.

I think it is accurate to say that the importance of this possible obstacle in the way of the development of our defence production through production sharing is shown by the fact that United States duties on defence equipment can be as high as 17 per cent, which would mean that Canadian industry, to get an order on business grounds alone, leaving out all these other things, would have to be 17 per cent more efficient.

The minister also mentioned the security difficulties, and he explained why he thought that most of these had been removed. I hope that is true, because I know what that could mean and, what is perhaps even more important, how it could be exploited by people in other countries. The minister said in his statement that it is the policy of the government to remove these difficulties. In his statement this morning, he said:

> As I reported to the house last February 23, we set ourselves an immediate aim of increasing the participation of Canadian industry in the production and support of North American defence weapons; we also adopted a continuing objective which recognizes the long term nature of the problem with which we were faced, and looks to the co-ordination of the defence requirements, development, production and procurement of the two countries in order to achieve the best use of their respective production resources for their common defence.

That is, of course, the proper long range objective of Canadian policy in this important field, and unless that objective is shared by the United States—and we hope it will be shared—then the progress which the minister has mentioned as being desirable will not be achieved.

The minister mentioned this morning the steps which were being taken by the government to assist Canadian development, and a good deal of money is going to be spent on that. But as I followed his statement this morning, that assistance, and I am certainly not quarreling with him about it, will be for Canadian development not so much for Canadian use as to get a share of United States orders.

Then the hon. gentleman said that one of the ways in which progress had been made was by getting the United States to recognize Canadian sources of supply. It seems to me that ever since the beginning of the second world war the United States has at least recognized Canadian sources of supply for defence equipment, but it is not this recognition that matters, as the minister himself indicated this morning in another part of his statement, so much as the use made by the United States of those sources of supply. He said that certain action had been taken for that purpose, and he thought certain progress had been made, and that in that action and in that progress the government had begun its contact with the United States authorities at the top—at the secretarial level in the United States and among the assistant secretaries responsible for the procurement programs of the three services. Then he went on to say that while it was necessary to begin at the top—and that is certainly true —nevertheless, any progress made at the top level will not be effective in terms of action unless it is followed up at lower levels, so I was glad to learn that the staff in Washington has been strengthened for this purpose.

It will also not be effective unless the same kind of impact can be made on congress as was made on the administration, and that is going to be more difficult. Not long ago I was reading reports of the hearings which took place in Washington on this subject of defence production, and in those hearings the secretary of defence showed an awareness of the joint role which must be played in the defence of the North American continent and of the importance of the United States recognizing the real necessity of co-operation in this matter, and he tried to explain this to the committee. But I read very shortly afterward that, perhaps alarmed by the reaction to his words in certain circles in the United States, he had attempted to remove what might have been a political risk by saying that certain people who had been concerned by his statement need not worry too much because, naturally, the position of the United States producer would always be considered as paramount. So there are going to be difficulties about carrying out this essential principle of defence sharing.

The minister said some time ago in the house in an earlier discussion, and I could quote from Hansard, that it is in the United States subcontract field that the greatest results can be achieved through the production sharing arrangements which the government had set up in conjunction with the United States. Today, he said with regard to that matter, and his words were, I think, very important:

> I would emphasize that we are determined that any Canadian role in production sharing should include some of the more demanding work and not be limited to the pouring of concrete or to what is often called "metal bashing".

I agree with him that if the major portion of Canada's defence production in respect to this sharing arrangement takes the form of subcontracts or minor contracts we shall not get very far. It seems to me that it would be intolerable, if Canadian producers wish to get this kind of defence business that they must accept the position of becoming marginal suppliers and subcontractors for United States industry, with all the instability and uncertainty that such a provision implies. How we could ever maintain and develop a defence production industry on any such basis as that I do not see, and I hope we will not have that experience. We could surely never expect the Canadian defence industry to expand or even, perhaps, to survive in conditions where it would become a mere adjunct of United States industry completely dependent on the generosity of United States producers and on the comprehension of the United States government.

That secondary position is certainly not acceptable. It would have the further great disadvantage of eliminating Canadian industry from major development work in this field, and I take it that the purpose of the expenditure which the minister talked about this morning to assist in Canadian development is not to develop Canadian industry so as to occupy such a subordinate continental role but to develop the Canadian defence industry on its own so that it could play its proper Canadian part.

As we all know, not very much scientific and technological research is done at the present time in Canada, at least in comparison with what is done across the line in the United States. We know that development work in air defence projects up to a year ago has partially filled and, I think on the whole, successfully filled this important gap. It was that development work which enabled Canadian industry to keep together large teams of scientific and highly qualified personnel working on defence technology.

According to the figures I received there were a year or so ago 7,100 scientific and engineering personnel in the aircraft industry or the associated electrical and electronic industries. If we in this country are eliminated from major development work in this field we will surely suffer a major blow because obviously we will gradually lose our teams of qualified engineers and technicians and those who are at present teaching in Canadian institutions will not find the same employment opportunities in Canada in this field. That in its turn means we will become more and more dependent on United States technology not only for defence production but for our industrial development.

In this field of defence production there is a real danger that our industry will more and more give up development work for all practical purposes and even to a large extent the production of equipment and weapons, and our aircraft and allied industries, if they survive at all, will survive in a subsidiary role to far too great an extent as subcontractors for United States industry.

We have been told that if the western world is to survive we must accept interdependence. I think Canada in the past and at present is showing its willingness to work within that new system of relationships. We have participated very actively in all aspects of the NATO alliance through financial contributions and industrial contributions as well as through armed forces stationed in Europe. How can we go on doing this if the financial and other burdens involved in those commitments not only put us in a position where our territory itself has to be protected largely by the United States but where our own defence industries depend largely on the United States for their survival?

In the field of defence procurement and production we in this country in the past have accepted, and we must accept, the implications of interdependence with the United States and our other NATO allies, but if interdependence is to mean anything except as a word used in a speech, it has to be a two-way system of relationship. We in this country cannot be asked to make all the sacrifices in the name of interdependence. More specifically, I believe we cannot accept for the sake of an apparent interdependence the dislocation of our defence industries because of their too-close association with United States industry and because that association may lead to a dominant position over Canadian industry by those United States industries.

That is why I suggest that Canadian policy not only in the field of defence but in the field of defence production must be completly re-appraised in consultation with our allies to see how our own interests can best be served and what can be our best contribution in a truly interdependent community.

Before I sit down I should like to mention three points which I feel should guide that kind of reassessment. First, I believe that free trade should be established as soon as possible between all NATO countries with respect to defence production. Surely if we are going to recognize and be asked to implement interdependence effectively in this field we have to abolish tariff protection and all other obstacles to a free and easy movement of defence products within the North Atlantic alliance and certainly across the Canada-United States border. There is no difficulty in that respect in the other great defence area which is so much a threat to our security now that we have to spend these hundreds of millions of dollars, and if we are to be effective, economically and industrially, as we face this other great area, surely the time has come when we can remove these obstacles at least as they concern defence products.

When I say that I have a realization based on experience of the difficulties which will be advanced against a proposal of that kind and I know we have not made very much progress over the last ten years in the NATO alliance in removing these difficulties but I think we have to keep at it. After all, it is the test of the reality of our interdependence.

Second, I believe that sharing arrangements should not be restricted to the possible participation by one country in another nation's defence production program. At present I think that is Canada's position to far too great an extent. Perhaps the minister will be able to reassure me on that point by telling me how often and to what extent the United States has used Canadian production for its own purposes.

Defence sharing arrangements, as I understand them, must involve the assignment by the whole alliance of specific production sectors to individual countries so that those countries can really specialize in those fields and be sure to have sufficient details to develop manufacturing facilities under optimum conditions of efficiency without fear that other countries will enter into those production fields and dislocate existing facilities.

There again I know the problems involved. There is no better illustration than that found in the case of the CF-105. At the time that the CF-105 was first under consideration, I think I am fair in saying it was admitted in Washington that there was no plane in the United States that had been developed which was comparable to the CF-105 up to that time. I am talking about this plane two or three years ago. But that did not prevent the United States aircraft industry from going to work and developing planes which would be competitive with the CF-105 and which they eventually decided to use themselves. That is not the way to work out defence production sharing in the North Atlantic alliance.

Third, we should make sure that the specific programs assigned to a given country would be carried out effectively and that other countries could safely rely on the quality of the work being done by that country. We should do that by making arrangements to staff the development teams with the most qualified personnel available for this purpose in NATO, and to provide continuing information in consultation with all other interested countries in the alliance.

Almost ten years ago when those very principles which I have just mentioned were debated and discussed in the NATO council and in all the NATO agencies, they were agreed on in principle and there were defence production committees set up to see if they could be implemented in practice. I confess there was not very much progress made but that does not mean we should give up the search for that objective which is perhaps more important now than it was even in those days.

The three proposals I have outlined have, I know, far-reaching implications and results. This is the reason why they would be so difficult to achieve. Their achievement, however, would benefit all the countries inside the alliance and strengthen NATO which is so vital to the defence of the western world and provide a far better basis for the defence industry in Canada than that which we are likely to achieve if we have to depend almost entirely on the United States for the maintenance and development of that industry.

Surely it would be a wise thing for the Canadian government to take the initiative in this field and put forward proposals of this kind and pursue them at every possible opportunity, both in Paris at the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and—perhaps even more important—in Washington and in the Canadian-United States committees which have been set up in recent years.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister going to reply to the questions which have been asked?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, my first remarks will be to reply to some of the suggestions made by the Leader of the Opposition. In my statement this morning I took great pains to make our position quite clear, as the Leader of the Opposition admitted, on this production sharing program that we have embarked on so extensively. I fully realize the difficulties we are going to meet and are meeting, but I also wish to be frank with the people and with the members of this committee. I say that we have obtained certain results. I am not over-optimistic because, as the Leader of the Opposition said, there is a powerful lobby in Washington and they have an aircraft industry of their own in the United States that needs to be sustained. On the other hand, since we have embarked on this program and really worked hard at it, we have obtained results and I am optimistic enough though to say that my hope is that in the months ahead, we shall have extensive orders and shall keep those good relations which exist at the present, not only with the superior officers in the defence department in Washington but also with all levels mentioned and officers down the line.

To come back to interdependence; as the Leader of the Opposition said, it is a two-way road. I want to make it perfectly clear, and I want to emphasize it here today, that on different occasions the Prime Minister has taken exactly the same position, and he did not pull his punches when he said that interdependence of the United States and Canada has to work both ways. This afternoon I want to make my position perfectly clear, as I have in the past, by saying that our strong and good neighbours to the south have to come across to the Canadian people in this production sharing. That is what I am out to achieve and that is what my department is working for. When I present my estimates another year I hope to be able to report that I have obtained some results.

The Leader of the Opposition talked about some figures. I have a list of contracts in front of me which amounts to $31 million of prime contracts and the $20 million that I mentioned this morning in my statement. I tell the Leader of the Opposition that it is practically all for the United States army. This is an example: Radome panels, $19,000; calibration and repair of test equipment, $391,000; components for communication systems, $3,558,000; engine spares for the United States, $2,873,000; equipment and spare parts for radomes, $252,000; engine spares, again for the United States, $4,197,000; electronic spares, $443,000; and so on.

I have here a long list of subcontracts also which are in great part for the armed forces of the United States. I appreciate very much the kind remarks of the Leader of the Opposition about the statement I made this morning and about my sending him a copy, which was a pleasure. I also extend to him my appreciation of the remarks he made this afternoon. I have taken note of them and I shall be pleased to peruse and study them in Hansard.

I should just like to answer my good friend from Lapointe who spoke extensively this morning with a lot of charity because we know each other pretty well. He spoke about the dictatorial powers given to the Minister of Defence Production by certain sections of the Defence Production Act. In reply I wish to state that by statute sections 23 to 31, inclusive, terminate on July 31 of this year, and the government is not renewing these sections which give dictatorial powers to the Minister of Defence Production. Therefore, I hope that my hon. friend from Lapointe will not be worried over the fact that I shall be a dictator by desire.

He also mentioned that there was a substantial increase in the budget. I explained in my statement this morning that the increase in the budget is primarily due to this $5 million increase for the new program of technological work that we intend to do and to continue with this production sharing, where we have an amount of $7 million in different items to help Canadian contractors compete in the United States field.

The hon. member for Port Arthur expressed his interest in the Canadian Car and Foundry plant at Fort William, but some of its employees are from Port Arthur. As the hon. member knows, a delegation came here to meet us on two different occasions to try to have work placed in this plant. To the delegation consisting of all the social clubs and the authorities of these two cities we expressed our sincere hope that we could do something for this area. To be perfectly frank, I want to tell the people what the Canadian Car and Foundry Company are doing at the present time. I want this to go on record. The main activity of the Canadian Car and Foundry Company Limited, Fort William, has been the fabrication of centre sections, wings, and surface controls for the CS2F on a subcontract basis from de Havilland. In addition, they are fabricating Otter wings, also on a subcontract basis for de Havilland. At present, Canadian Car and Foundry have approximately 10 CS2F components to complete at an approximate value of $1,211,478. Canadian Car and Foundry are working on 25 sets of Otter wings at an approximate value of $250,000. They also have some small contracts for Harvard components.

The Fort William facility has also been actively soliciting business in the United States under production sharing arrangements but as of the present time they have not yet been successful in obtaining any contracts. The development of the Bobcat vehicle, to which the hon. member referred, is continuing very well at the Montreal facilities of this company but it will be some months before any decision can be made about its production. I have said, and I have expressed the same view to the personnel of my department, that in this production sharing we hope to have the chance to bring some production work into the plant at Fort William.

In reply to the hon. member for Vancouver South who spoke of spreading defence contracts across the country and especially encouraging the west coast,—and I should like this reply to apply to the hon. member for Port Arthur as well—we are striving as much as possible in our purchasing in the different spheres of this department to purchase in the areas affected. For the information of the members of the committee I may say I have received very strong reproaches at different times from hon. members who have said that they used to sell to defence production in certain areas and today they are losing the chance to make those sales. Well, this is because we are trying to buy in areas where the articles are needed and where the food is needed across the country. This is why in the maritimes, for example, this year, although our purchases across the country were down 6 per cent, we had an increase of 20 per cent. We have tried to purchase more in the areas affected, the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario, the three prairie provinces and the Pacific coast. The Pacific coast is an area where there are certain problems. Of course we have to think cost-wise and we have to think of quality but I can assure the committee that as much as possible we strive to do our utmost to buy locally in the areas I have just mentioned.

In my statement I tried to give hon. members a clear picture of what we are doing in defence production and our hopes of improving Canadian industry by production sharing. But I want to admit very frankly that I know the troubles and the work that lie ahead for the officials we have appointed in the United States, the officials of the department here and the government itself in getting substantial orders from United States industry. I want to emphasize that I wish it to be clearly understood by the United States authorities that if we enter into production sharing for the defence of the North American continent it is a two-way road and that there has to be a give and take attitude. That is my position and, as I said a while ago, I hope we will get results in the months ahead.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like the minister to clarify one point in the remarks he has just made. It has to do with the distribution of contracts within the country. Does he not realize that at a time when the total value of contracts awarded throughout the country is declining and the number of those in the armed forces is not materially decreasing the percentage spent on food supplies and the like for the forces, involving mostly local expenditures, would be a relatively larger proportion, and that when he gives statistics, as he did a moment ago, for the increase in purchases in the maritimes they can be quite misleading on this somewhat difficult subject, although I am not questioning their accuracy? Does he have that in mind and does he not also realize that the completion of camp Gagetown and the movement of more troops into that camp would have some bearing on the quantity of local purchases in the area? I want to make that observation because I think that if the statement of the minister on the point is left as he made it it is capable of creating a wrong impression. While the statistics are accurate enough, the statement is not quite adequate in doing justice to the subject.

Mr. O'Hurley: In reply to the hon. member for Ottawa West, he will realize that the maritime provinces have an economic council which is very active in encouraging industry and selling merchandise in the martimes. The figures I just gave were given offhand but we found that a lot of the purchases for the maritimes were made through the city of Montreal. For the last year we have been concentrating more buying in the maritimes. For example, potatoes used to be purchased in Montreal. They were produced in the maritimes, shipped to Montreal and then sent back to the maritimes. That is just one example of better results by following the policy of buying locally. I gave a figure indicating an increase of 20 per cent over the amount bought in the maritimes the previous year, but if the quantity was very small the previous year it has to be increased by one-fifth to get the increase of 20 per cent for the year I am talking about.

Mr. McIlraith: I wish the minister well in his effort to increase purchases in that area but the point I want to make is that the statistics by themselves are capable of being very misleading. I have been fairly familiar with them in the past. If he will look at some of the places where purchases are indicated as having been made he will find, for instance, that meat purchases from the Burns Company used to be listed as having taken place in Ottawa, which was completely misleading. Perhaps I do not need to pursue the subject beyond indicating that I hope he is making some progress and I trust he will not assume that statistics such as he has given are proof of his success in that field.

There is another point I want to raise having to do with a matter that arose during the discussion of the Department of National Defence estimates the other day. We were dealing with item No. 222 which is listed as being for the construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment for the Royal Canadian Air Force. When we look at the particulars of that item as found on page 314 we see one major item under major procurement of equipment namely aircraft and engines.

When I asked questions about that item I discovered from the Minister of National Defence that there was included in that procurement item an expenditure of $45 million for the termination of the Arrow contract. The point I wish to raise is this. I had assumed that the termination of contracts was something that was still treated under a separate item as was the case during the last war and subsequent thereto and that the item to which I have referred provided the Department of National Defence with the authorization and the money to procure equipment and supplies and to take care of military pay and civil staff salaries. I had thought that these other items for termination of contracts were items that came properly under the Department of Defence Production as they did in earlier years and under predecessor departments.

Since I understand that the termination of this contract is being carried out under the minister's jurisdiction, I want to pursue this point. How does the minister derive authority from the wording of item No. 222 which I have just quoted, for the expenditure of this very large sum of money on the termination of a contract with respect to which equipment is not being procured this year but whose purpose is to carry out the liquidation and termination of a contract which was concluded in the last fiscal year? For the life of me I cannot find anything in the language used in that estimate that would warrant the expenditure of moneys for the purpose of terminating a contract. It seems to me that there is no authority whatever to spend this $45 million under that item. I have no doubt that the treasury officials have looked at this point and that there is some answer. Whatever the answer is I should like to have it, and if there is no answer I should like to have the matter corrected because it seems to me that in this way the house is not being given information to which it is entitled.

So that the minister will have some references to the practice on this subject, if he will look at the estimates for the year ending March 31, 1953, item 81, page 11, he will find there an item in the estimates of the Department of Defence Production to provide for the liquidation of contracts and so on. He will find the same thing in the estimates of a year earlier, and so on back through the years. The last year for which there was any estimate comparable to this $45 million for the termination of a contract is in the year ending March 31, 1948. He will find an item No. 569 in the estimates of that year for his predecessor department, reconstruction and supply.

I could go back through the years, but in that year the item was $2.5 million and the previous year the item had been $36 million. Now, this year the expenditure for such an item is $45 million for this one contract alone, yet we have no special item for it at all. Unless there is some adequate explanation, I think the matter should be rectified. I wonder if the minister could give an explanation?

Mr. O'Hurley: In reply to the hon. member for Ottawa West I would say I am advised by my officials that the Department of Defence Production, since its inception in 1951, has never had a separate vote for the termination of contracts. These costs are created by the Department of National Defence and cannot be separated from production costs. We are really acting for the Department of National Defence. The items referred to by the hon. member for Ottawa West related to the termination of disputed world war II contracts, and that is why they were the subject of a separate vote. Since the inception of the Department of Defence Production in 1951 there has never been a separate vote for cancellation charges under a current contract. Does that satisfy the hon. member?

Mr. McIlraith: It is not quite as full an explanation as I would wish, but I thank the minister for it. There have never been termination problems in connection with contracts of this size or scope since world war II; that is quite elementary.

The point here is that that item and the amount to be paid for the termination of those contracts, some of which were disputed, was always provided through the Department of Defence Production and its predecessor department and passed upon by this committee. The point I wish to raise now has two facets. The first question I have sought to raise is as to the explanation of what appears to be a misapplication of funds voted for procurement of specific equipment, and not being used for that at all but being used for the settlement of claims arising out of the termination of a contract. This is the No. 1 point with which the minister has dealt.

The other point I want to raise is as to the policy of the government in not providing a separate item to come before the committee because it seems to me to be quite misleading to have an item in one year which provides several hundreds of millions of dollars for procurement of a particular type of aircraft and then find, in the next year, when you go to compare the figures, there is nothing in the printed record anywhere to indicate any lesser amount being spent. However, when we start asking questions about it we find the item is not to procure that kind of equipment at all but is to settle termination charges of a contract.

I think the minister will follow my point there. There is no way by which one doing research on the estimates produced to the house can find that the figure is not as it appears at all, and this must be found out by questions. It seems to me this is a practice which should be looked at for future action because while it may be true that, in a large procurement item, there may be small incidental items in connection with termination of contracts they are only a tiny percentage of the total. However, here we have $45 million out of $146 million being spent on termination charges, yet all of it being shown as if the whole $146 million were being spent for procurement This is likely to be misleading to hon. members, and I am sure that is not what the minister wants to do at all. I would ask him to look at this again to see that if the question ever arises in the future, and I hope it will not, the item will be shown in different form and one that will be clear to all hon. members.

Mr. O'Hurley: I wish to thank the hon. member for Ottawa West for asking these questions, and I can assure him we will study his remarks very attentively. My officials tell me there was a major cancellation in 1954, which was taken out of the national defence budget and there was no vote in defence production. I feel this is a very good point, and I shall be glad to look at it and give the information to the hon. member.

Mr. McIlraith: What is the authority for spending the money in that way? I cannot, for the life of me, follow that.

Mr. O'Hurley: I should like to tell the hon. member that we do not spend the money; we are the agents for national defence.

Mr. McIlraith: What is the authority for it? You have to handle the mechanics of spending it, and you do not spend money without proper legal authority—at least, the department did not use to do so. It seems to me there is no authority granted for spending the money for that purpose.

Mr. O'Hurley: I think, by the charter of defence production, when we get orders from national defence for a certain work, it is a question for national defence and the Department of Finance. We execute the orders when we receive them, and it is those two departments that are interested in this problem. I think there is a good point there, and it should be looked into, as the hon. member suggests.

Mr. McIlraith: There is just one other thing. I take it the item would not permit such expenditures as keeping a small number of these men at work, as was suggested at the time of the Arrow cancellation. These funds were for procurement or legal termination of the contract, but the language would not be wide enough for that, would it?

Mr. O'Hurley: I am afraid I have not the answer to that question with me this afternoon. I admit we are handling the termination charges under this vote. However, so far as changing from procurement to cancellation is concerned, I am afraid I have not got the information available just now.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested that the money which was available for termination of the contract could have been used by the company to keep the employees at work for a time until they got other work. The question my hon. friend is asking is whether this money could have been used under the vote for that purpose.

Mr. O'Hurley: As far as defence production is concerned, I think the Leader of the Opposition will agree with me that it was the government's decision to terminate. We are executing the orders we receive from national defence, and that is as far as our department concerns itself. As long as the work is paid for by national defence, through us if you will, it is not for defence production to find out under what vote this money is provided.

Mr. McIlraith: There is a second point there, Mr. Chairman. Once the contract is cancelled, I take it the defence production department would not pay for keeping the men at work after termination? There would be no authority for that. Surely the accounts of the company are audited and checked?

Mr. O'Hurley: In the cancellation charges it must be admitted that we have paid a substantial amount to the men for their vacation pay, their severance pay and so on. We have paid all these amounts out of that and have completely complied with the full labour contracts and paid out everything that the labour contracts demanded. It comes back to the same question, that it was an order from national defence and we are executing the order we received from national defence.

Mr. McIlraith: But my point is that in executing the order received from national defence you paid only those charges you were obligated to pay under the contract. You paid the labour charges, for example, that you were obligated to pay under that contract, and you did not or could not go beyond that and give money to the company merely to pay men in addition to what was provided under the labour and other contracts?

Mr. O'Hurley: Certainly not, Mr. Chairman. We consented absolutely to paying all charges that were demanded by the labour contract for all the employees. That we accepted; but we could not keep on paying afterwards the men sitting around the plant not doing anything, and we were not justified in making any other payments.

Mr. Pearson: So it is now clear, Mr. Chairman, that this money could not have been used by the company to keep people at work after the contract had been terminated.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, first of all I would like to congratulate the minister for the progress he has made in negotiations with the United States, particularly with respect to the buy American act and the long list of items which he and his officials have negotiated and made exempt from the buy American act, and also the progress they have made with respect to tariff waivers. I think the minister has an excellent staff who have done an outstanding job of negotiating these concessions with the United States. As a matter of fact, I think the minister has staff which he could not excel if he had taken a long time in putting them together. The minister told us quite frankly, Mr. Chairman, that he has problems. We feel that these problems are not particularly of his making, but that most of them are grief caused by other departments of government and the Minister of Defence Production and his staff have to make the best of such bad jobs as are passed to them.

For example, the minister told us this morning that the progress made in the first six months of this year had demonstrated approximately $32 million in prime contracts for military equipment for branches of the United States armed forces. This sounds like a significant achievement and undoubtedly it represents a great deal of hard work and laborious effort on the part of the minister and his staff. Yet it seems he has been fighting a rearguard action, because I have here a press clipping from the Toronto Star of July 6, 1959, entitled "Aircraft Parts Exports Show Sharp Decline" and it is based on a Canadian Press dispatch from Ottawa which says:

> Canada's domestic exports in May fell $51,500,000 from the same month last year due mainly to a sharp reduction in sales of aircraft and parts, the bureau of statistics said.

In other words, the reduction in export of aircraft and parts in the first six months of this year was more substantial than the total number of small prime contracts obtained for Canadian producers to produce military equipment for various branches of the United States government. This indicates the magnitude of the problem which we face. The minister, as I have said, is fighting a rearguard action, and this has been the case ever since the cancellation of the Avro Arrow, when we lost our great leverage with the United States. We have to be realistic in our dealings with them.

Certainly they want to co-operate with us, and certainly the high level official talks taking place between the minister and his staff and their opposite numbers in Washington are productive. There is the greatest amount of co-operation and a real desire on the part of our United States friends to try to work out satisfactory solutions. But they have to operate within the context of the political situation existing in the United States of America, and they have problems in putting into effect their good intentions. We are just babes in the wood if we do not realize that if business is bad in the United States of America the pressure of the aircraft and other defence industries down there on their government is going to be very great indeed. If business is good in the United States and they have full employment, then probably it would not be too difficult to get a few prime contracts for Canadian producers. But in times when business is not good in the United States and there is a great deal of unemployment in various parts of the country, it is unrealistic for us to think that we are going to go down there and negotiate large prime contracts for Canadian producers unless we use the leverage we have in negotiation with them.

We have a number of things we can use as leverage. We have a number of geographical requirements which they have to ask for from time to time, and there are a number of concessions which the United States asks us for, and we do have some bargaining power. It is very difficult within the context of the political situation within the United States of America, without using such leverage as we have available to us, to negotiate any sizable prime contracts, and particularly defence production contracts.

Mr. Chairman, with those introductory remarks I would like to ask the minister a few questions. I would like to commence with reference to the Avro Arrow CF-105 and continue a question asked by the hon. member for Ottawa West and the Leader of the Opposition. I would like to ask the minister if any study was made of the cost of continuing to completion the 37 aircraft which were under construction at the time the cancellation order was issued?

Mr. O'Hurley: At the request of the hon. member for Trinity I am asking for the file of the study made of the CF-105 to be brought down. If he will continue I will get that information.

Mr. Hellyer: I have a further question, Mr. Chairman. Of the completed five aircraft, Nos. 1 to 5, were they turned over to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for disposal?

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hellyer: And are they still in the custody of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation?

Mr. O'Hurley: They are being dismantled at the present time and arrangements are being made with the United States government for the return of the engines and the fireheads and the classified materials which are in these planes. They will be dismantled.

Mr. Hellyer: Upon what terms and conditions were the planes offered for sale by the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation?

Mr. O'Hurley: The fact is that the ministry of national defence gave orders to my department, and my department to crown assets that all equipment should be taken out of these aircraft and that they should be reduced to scrap. Those were the orders received from national defence.

Mr. Hellyer: Did the Minister of National Defence turn them over to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as surplus equipment? Did he declare them surplus?

Mr. O'Hurley: They were declared surplus, yes, and the instruction was given that all equipment should be taken out of the aircraft and they should be reduced to scrap.

Mr. Hellyer: What was the statutory authority by which the Minister of National Defence determined the method of disposal by the crown assets corporation?

Mr. O'Hurley: This was an aircraft constructed not only by Canadian engineers and the Canadian air force but also by the United States. It was classified. It could not have been sold on an open market. I do not see any other solution available to the Minister of National Defence but to turn it to scrap. That is the way the situation was.

Mr. Hellyer: That does not answer my question. I assume there could not have been very much classified material about the plane, because we were told in this house it was obsolescent and that it would not have been useful by the time it was put into squadron service. If the minister of defence had declared it surplus it could perhaps have been sold by the crown assets corporation in the normal way, and I am wondering what statutory authority the Minister of National Defence has for deciding it should be disposed of in some other manner.

Mr. O'Hurley: After the contract had been cancelled, any classified material was taken out, and I think the only solution was to have these aircraft reduced to scrap. I wish to say to the hon. member for Trinity that to my knowledge—and I can be corrected by the Minister of National Defence if I am not right—the department tried on different occasions to make a research bid of this plane in the United Kingdom, without success. Terms were not discussed, and they were not interested in the least. So I am still of the opinion that there was no alternative but to take out all the equipment from these planes and then have them disposed of in the only way possible.

Mr. Hellyer: What parts of the plane were classified?

Mr. O'Hurley: One would practically have to go over the whole plane—hydraulics, fire control, engine, electronic equipment. With the experience which the hon. member has with regard to planes he will certainly know that there are hundreds of parts in that plane which were classified. I am certainly not versed enough to give him a complete list of the classified materials in the CF-105 this afternoon.

Mr. Hellyer: It must have been a good aircraft if there were hundreds of classified parts in it.

There was a request that plane No. 6 and subsequent aircraft be photographed in the factory during the process of destruction, and the minister, in answer to a question in the House of Commons, said the reason photographs were not allowed was because classified fire control apparatus had been installed in the planes. Is that correct?

Mr. O'Hurley: That is correct.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us on how many of these planes fire control apparatus had been installed?

Mr. O'Hurley: There is perhaps a difference of opinion there. The fire control system for several of the planes was in manufacture; I cannot say definitely if it was installed in some of the planes, but it was definitely there in the plant with other classified material when the cancellation started. It was not only on my part that I took the decision, but I had the concurrence of the Avro people not to have photographs taken at that time in the plant.

Mr. Hellyer: The reply the minister gave to the house earlier was that it was because of the Hughes fire control system that photographers were not allowed to be present at the time of the destruction. However, it is my understanding that there was no fire control installed on aircraft No. 6 and subsequent aircraft. Can the minister advise the committee whether or not that information is correct?

Mr. O'Hurley: I am told that the fire control system was not installed in these planes.

Mr. Hellyer: Was, or was not?

Mr. O'Hurley: Was not.

Mr. Hellyer: A final question on the subject. Does the minister not think that this very important chapter in Canadian history should have been recorded and filmed for posterity?

Mr. O'Hurley: I do not think it was a very important chapter in the pages of Canadian history—in the pages of aviation history—to see the work of years being scrapped. I do not think it would have been of advantage to Canada.

Mr. Hellyer: I cannot let that comment ride without replying that I think it was an important chapter in Canadian history. I think it represented the greatest single achievement in Canadian aviation history, and the greatest combined effort of design and development ever undertaken in this country. Not only that, I regret, and I want to put this on record again, that this government did not have the courage to finish No. 6 and let it take the world's speed record away from the Lockheed 104. I think this is a matter which will cause regret to Canadians for decades to come—that when we had reached a stage where, in a few weeks of additional development and testing, this plane could have captured the world's speed record for this country, the decision should have been made not only to stop work on the plane but to cut up the corpse and put it underground as soon as possible.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I can ask a question about the cancellation of this contract? Hon. members will, no doubt, recall that the Prime Minister had some very severe things to say about the Avro company because they discharged their staff as soon as they received an order from the minister's department to do so.

Mr. Richard Jackson in the Sudbury Star of June 20 had this to say:

> What evidence have the members of parliament of there being something less than the loyalty of political impartiality normally expected of a civil service?
> That shocking telegram that ordered the immediate firing "at once" of the 14,000 Avro workers was sent by some bureaucratic brass hat in defence production.

Would the minister say whether this telegram was sent without his concurrence or with his concurrence.

Mr. O'Hurley: We sent the telegram to cancel all work on the Arrow and the Iroquois engine. This telegram was sent with my concurrence. I will admit frankly I was under the impression that the idea of sending the telegram at that time was to prevent further buying of expensive material for the plane or for the engine, but that the men would continue for their ordinary period of time on notice, which was two weeks or three weeks. I was most surprised myself to hear the same evening the men were let out that afternoon. The telegram was sent with my concurrence.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister read the telegram for the committee now?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, I have not got it with me; the telegram has been tabled and is on Hansard.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it might be convenient to have it in Hansard at this point.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is a very serious charge made by a responsible journalist against the honesty and integrity of senior civil servants of this country.

An hon. Member: Read it yourself.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman is finished mumbling perhaps I could be allowed to continue. The minister has said this telegram was sent with his concurrence. I accept his word at once. I am sure it was. However, in order to remove all doubt about this serious and shocking reflection I believe the whole story should appear all together in one place.

It will be recalled, of course, that my friend the hon. member for Laurier had the telegram put on the record after the Prime Minister said he expected the company to go on employing these people on work that was not going to be accepted and for which the company could not be paid—a very odd attitude it seemed to me for the Prime Minister to take—but there is no doubt whatever that the telegram did say specifically that the work was to cease immediately. I believe that the record should be straight.

Mr. O'Hurley: Does the hon. member want to put on the record again a copy of the telegram? I do not have a copy in my files today.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister get it and put it in the record a little later on?

The Chairman: Is it correct that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would like the minister to read into the record a document that has already been tabled?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I did not hear you.

The Chairman: Do I understand that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is demanding that the minister put into the record something that has already been put into it?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would not like to use the word "demand". I am not making a demand. I was asking the minister if he would be good enough to do it so that the record of this transaction would be complete in one place. The reason I am asking that is because, although it is on the record, it does not seem to be easy to find. My friend the hon. member for Ottawa West appears to have it and perhaps he could read it.

Mr. Bigg: Just say "yes".

The Chairman: For the sake of good order, it is generally admitted by all that this telegram has actually been tabled and is in the records of the house. It would be a repetitious occurrence if we continued the debate concerning the tabling of a document that has already been tabled. I appreciate the hon. member's explanation that he is not demanding that it be tabled because it would be out of order for him to demand that the minister table a document. It is the opinion of the Chair that since this telegram is already on the record and should be quite easily located it is really repetitious to request that we continue the debate regarding the matter.

Mr. McIlraith: I still think we are entitled to debate this item under the administration of the Department of Defence Production and ask all the questions we wish about the termination of the contract and other related matters.

Mr. Charlton: It is out of order.

Mr. McIlraith: I know that my friend the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand—

The Chairman: Order. I must point out to the hon. member for Ottawa West that the Chair has not indicated that hon. members of the opposition would be prevented from asking questions they wish to ask. I am simply referring to the unnecessary tabling of a document which has already been tabled. This has nothing to do with questions that might be put by hon. members of the opposition.

Mr. McIlraith: I wish to say something about the telegrams. The reason they were not presented to the house when the Prime Minister spoke as recorded at page 1306 of Hansard is quite obvious. He made certain statements there about the ceasing of the work and the fact that the A. V. Roe company should not have let their employees go immediately. After considerable hounding and questioning of the government the opposition was able to have the telegrams presented to the house. They are printed in an appendix to Hansard of February 27, 1959, at page 1487.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): By agreement.

Mr. McIlraith: When they were tabled and printed in Hansard it became immediately obvious that the Prime Minister's whole point on this aspect of the subject had been completely wrong. If hon. members will check the page references I have given they will see that the telegram to the A. V. Roe company, marked attention Mr. J. L. Plant, Malton, TCO via CN telegraph from Mr. D. L. Thompson, of the Department of Defence Production, Ottawa, contains in it a direct instruction in this language, "You shall cease all work immediately." Then the corresponding telegram sent about 12.30 p.m. on the same Friday was directed to Orenda Engine, attention Mr. E. K. Brownridge, from Mr. D. L. Thompson of the Department of Defence Production. It used precisely the same language, "You shall cease all work immediately." The minister has today admitted that he approved of those telegrams.

Mr. O'Hurley: I never denied it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is quite right.

Mr. McIlraith: Precisely.

Mr. Nesbitt: More innuendo.

Mr. Montgomery: You are leaving the impression that he did deny it which is wrong.

Mr. McIlraith: I never suggested that the minister denied it. Indeed, I never discussed his relationship up to this moment. I was just coming to it. I was saying and I will repeat again that the minister now admits these telegrams were sent with his concurrence and knowledge. His position is quite clear on that. It become abundantly clear from the contents of the telegrams and from what the minister said earlier in answer to the discussion we had a few moments ago about the items he could allow by way of salary to the employees of the A. V. Roe company,—allowance for severance pay, holiday pay, and so on—that he allowed those under agreements that were outstanding with the men. That was quite proper and I have no criticism of that. It becomes clear that the statement made to the house by the Prime Minister on February 23, four days before the telegrams were presented to us but three days after the contracts were terminated, that the Prime Minister's remarks as they appear at the bottom of the first column of page 1306 are not in accordance with what was done or in accordance with what could be done under the contracts. That is where the situation stands now. It is a good thing that this matter has at long last been cleared up so that everyone interested in this subject can know exactly where the responsibility for the immediate dismissal of these men lay, why it was done and what allowance has been made in respect of it.

Mr. Pearson: Yes; it seems to me it is now perfectly clear that the Prime Minister did not know what he was talking about when he said this termination of contract money could have been used to keep people at work in the A. V. Roe Company after that telegram had been sent. It seems to me that the journalist in question did not know what he was writing about when he made the reflection on the integrity of senior officials of the department for sending the telegram which we know was sent with the knowledge and under the authority of the minister.

Mr. Denis: Do I understand from the minister that the taking of a picture of the CF-105 before it was destroyed was not allowed? If this is so, how is it that the Postmaster General got a picture of it and was so proud of it that he put it on a stamp? I would like to get an explanation because he said that this event was not so important after all. There seems to be a difference of opinion or a misunderstanding between the Postmaster General and the Minister of Defence Production.

Mr. O'Hurley: In reply to the hon. member for St. Denis, I wish to tell him that the CF-105 has been filmed and photographed. They are all over the country and he can get many copies of pictures of the CF-105.

Mr. Denis: Will the stamp be declared surplus?

Mr. O'Hurley: If the hon. member has any money left over he can buy the stamps and put the surplus stamps in his pocket.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us whether the five completed Arrows were ever offered to the royal aeronautical establishment in Great Britain for testing purposes?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, the CF-105's were offered to the aeronautical research establishment in the United Kingdom and they were turned down.

Mr. Hellyer: What were the terms and conditions of the offer?

Mr. O'Hurley: They were offered; there were no terms or conditions. They were offered and they were turned down. No terms were discussed.

Mr. Hellyer: Were they offered free?

Mr. O'Hurley: I cannot say they were offered free. No terms were discussed. They were not interested; they did not want them.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, there seems to be an awful lot of confusion and buck-passing between the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production on this whole matter of the disposal of these things. I have asked the Minister of National Defence in the house who was responsible for the disposal of the aircraft, and he said it was a matter for defence production. Today the Minister of Defence Production says it was done under orders from the Minister of National Defence; similarly, with the Iroquois engine. I submit that these two ministers should get together in the future and agree on responsibility.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I have gone over the statements and the questions put by the hon. member for Eglinton when he was sitting on this side of the house. I have gone over the debates for 1953, 1954 and 1955. Since he is not in his seat today, I am sure the Minister of Defence Production will be very glad to answer a question in which his colleague is most interested. What is the breakdown of our purchases in the United States with regard to defence procurement compared with those in the United Kingdom?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate remarked the other day, this is the black book. Mutual defence procurement between Canada and the United States is carried on under the joint statement of principles for economic co-operation which was signed by the two countries in 1950. When the present defence program was initiated, it was necessary to place fairly substantial contracts in the United States for equipment urgently required and not at the time produced in Canada. With respect to the Canadian defence contracts placed in the United States, the figure for 1958-59 is $23.1 million to our credit. The net value of Canadian defence contracts placed in the United Kingdom was $10,590,000. We have a credit with the United States because we cancelled more than we placed. We got a credit of $23.1 million, and we placed orders to the amount of $10,590,000 with the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us whether in the $32 million prime contracts which he mentioned in his statement this morning were included the turbines being installed at Grand Bend?

Mr. O'Hurley: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I have another question for the minister. I am sure this will be a pleasant recollection for him and I am sure it will be of great interest to my hon. friend from Montmagny-L'Islet. Sometime during last fall the minister paid a visit to an establishment called La Fonderie de l'Islet in the county of Montmagny-L'Islet, and we read in the paper a few days later that he paid a visit to these people in the hope that he could offer them some work from his department. Since his talk with the officials of the company, I wonder whether anything has materialized in concrete form?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Lapointe has got things twisted up a little bit. They really invited me to see the facilities of their plant.

Mr. Pearson: Is any production going on at the present time in this country of F-86's or CF-100's?

Mr. O'Hurley: Just the production of spares, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pearson: In view of the fact that the CF-100 will be in use for some years, presumably, and the F-86 will not be replaced by the F-104 completely until 1963, according to the minister's own figures this morning, how are those squadrons to be maintained at strength if only spares are being produced?

Mr. O'Hurley: The spares are to maintain the aircraft. The Leader of the Opposition will admit with me that, as far as defence production is concerned, all I can do is act when I get an order from the Minister of National Defence. I am just the agent to purchase; I have no more authority than that.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps this is irregular, but I wonder whether I could ask the Minister of National Defence what happens when a CF-100 or the F-86 crashes and he asks the Minister of Defence Production for a replacement for that plane and the minister says, "we are not making any more"?

Mr. Pearkes: We have a reserve of CF-100's which are capable of replacing any of those which happen to crash.

Mr. Pearson: Then, it is considered that there is a sufficient reserve of F-86's and CF-100's to maintain those squadrons at full strength until some years from now when they will be replaced by other planes?

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct, utilizing spares to replace any spare parts which may be destroyed, where practicable.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I have another question for the minister. I must apologize if I implied in my question that he visited the plant in Montmagny-L'Islet on his own initiative, and I quite accept his correction. I wonder whether after his visit he has been able to give some word to La Fonderie de L'Islet either by way of tender or by negotiation?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, I recollect that they tendered on some contract but as far as I can remember they have received no contracts from the government. I know they tendered several times on different contracts.

Mr. Denis: Is the minister aware that they had a contract from the government and that that contract has been cancelled? Not only did they get no contract but the one they had was cancelled.

Mr. O'Hurley: How many years ago?

Mr. Denis: I mean lately.

Mr. O'Hurley: Well, it is pretty hard to cancel a contract if you do not have any.

Mr. Denis: They had a contract to make some postal boxes for the Post Office Department and now they are out of work.

Mr. O'Hurley: If the hon. member for St. Denis wants to get information about postal boxes he will have to ask the Postmaster General.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I wonder whether it would be imposing too much on the minister to ask him to give us a breakdown of defence procurement for the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. O'Hurley: The net value of head office contracts placed with firms in Quebec in 1958-59 was $218,408,000, and in Ontario $264,040,000.

Mr. Forgie: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister whether the construction work for the air force at Foymount in the county of Renfrew is under his jurisdiction?

Mr. O'Hurley: It is under a crown company, defence construction.

Mr. Forgie: May I ask the minister these questions? I do not expect that he can answer them at the moment but I hope he will. Were tenders called for all federal government contracts in connection with the expansion of the Foymount air station? If so, can the minister give us the names and head office addresses of the firms to whom these contracts were awarded, together with the names and addresses of unsuccessful bidders for these contracts? Lastly, were the contracts awarded to the lowest tenderer in each case? I should like to have that information very much.

Mr. O'Hurley: The contracts were all awarded on the basis of tenders and generally were awarded to the lowest tenderers, but it is practically impossible for me to give the names of the tenderers and the amounts this afternoon. If the hon. member would like to have the information I would be pleased to procure it for him. I am sorry I have not got it with me this afternoon.

Mr. Forgie: I did not expect the minister would have the information this afternoon but I thought I would ask him these questions so that possibly we could have the information tomorrow.

Mr. O'Hurley: I will be pleased to get that information for the hon. member.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, at this stage of his estimates I wonder whether the minister would care to comment briefly on the report and recommendations of the estimates committee of last year under the general headings of destroyer escort program, performance bonds, general comments and recommendations and, in particular, general conclusion of the report, No. 5.

Mr. O'Hurley: No. 1 is the destroyer escort program. The observations and recommendations of the standing committee on estimates with respect to the destroyer escort program were dealt with in considerable detail when the estimates of my department were last presented—Hansard, August 9, 1958, pages 3238 to 3240. At this time, however, I should like to say that in the very near future tenders will be invited covering the construction of a naval fleet supply tanker. We are going to call for tenders for the naval fleet supply tanker.

No. 2 is performance bonds. Last year I reported that considerable thought had been given to the questions of accepting performance bonds and/or pay-and-performance bonds. Since that time the cabinet has agreed that for a trial period commencing January 1, 1959 contractors should be given the option of submitting either surety bonds or security deposits to ensure due performance of work on government contracts. Treasury board has approved three types of surety bonds which are to be regarded as the standard, acceptable bonds for government contracts, namely a bid bond, a performance bond, and a labour and material payment bond.

With regard to the question of improving liaison between my department and the Department of National Defence, I should like to point out that while there has been very close liaison in the past between the two departments there is now an even closer liaison. The procedures which have been established to carry out our production sharing program with the United States involve a senior policy committee comprised of senior officials of not only the departments of defence production and national defence but also external affairs, finance and the United States department of defence, a steering group to handle the co-ordination of all activities and a number of working groups consisting of technical personnel to work out the detailed arrangements on specific projects of mutual interest. The officials of the departments of defence production and national defence are intimately associated in all these activities.

I am also very pleased that the Minister of National Defence has appointed the deputy minister of defence production as a member of the defence research board. The other specific recommendations, and my comments on them, are as follows:

> That the department encourage, assist and co-ordinate the growth of technical skills and knowledge in the Canadian industry as a program of industrial preparedness.

As members may be aware, the Defence Production Act requires the minister to organize, mobilize and conserve Canadian industrial resources to meet the current and prospective needs of defence. I would assure the house that I am anxious to discharge fully this statutory obligation, with which this recommendation of the committee is in keeping.

For the benefit of those who are unfamiliar with the department's operations, particularly those who were not members of the standing committee, I might explain briefly some of the ways in which we attempt to accomplish this task. First, in purchasing the supplies requisitioned by the armed services we recognize the services cannot always depend in an emergency on the production resources of other countries or the maintenance of normal ocean shipping. Consequently, since the organization of the department it has been concerned with the development and maintenance of defence production resources in Canada which can keep abreast of the changing needs of the armed forces and can also be expanded quickly on short notice.

This has meant, in many cases where military equipment of a specialized nature was involved, that Canadian industry has been asked to create important new facilities, both large and small, and to acquire the technical skills needed for the production of highly complex equipment. It has also meant that for the more commonplace type of supply we either limit our invitations to tender to Canadian suppliers or grant a reasonable preference to goods of Canadian manufacture over any competing goods of foreign manufacture.

Where the development or expansion of Canadian industrial capacity has been necessary we encourage industry to undertake this job of expansion through private investment as far as possible, since the equipment demands of the services affect almost every part of industry and the total cost of providing all the equipment needed for defence production would be prohibitive. However, we are continuing in appropriate cases to encourage defence industries to organize and expand their capacities through the granting of accelerated depreciation allowances. Where industry is unwilling or financially unable to provide the necessary facilities, because of the likelihood that there would be little, if any, residual value on completion of a defence project, direct capital assistance is available.

It is my general policy, therefore, to develop and protect Canadian defence production capabilities to the greatest extent possible. I might point out that the need for development of new capacity is much less now than it was seven years ago. However, we are conscious that the continuous change in defence equipment requires that the existing industrial base be maintained in up to date condition and adapted from time to time to new requirements.

Then, there is the recommendation that the department distribute purchases as broadly as possible in Canada. I have dealt with this before. The next recommendation was that the department use the maximum Canadian equipment and parts where possible. I dealt with this point in my statement this morning.

Then, there is the recommendation that technical assistance presently offered to larger corporations should also be made available to smaller Canadian companies. I understand that this refers to the capital assistance program of the department, and I would assure members that we do not differentiate between large and small companies in considering requests for assistance of this sort. I might explain that the purpose of such assistance is to provide machine tools and other production facilities needed for the production of defence equipment where there is no commercial application for the plant and equipment involved. It so happens that the greatest need for capital assistance is experienced in the aircraft program and as a result has affected the major aircraft manufacturers more than any other company. This, however, is not because they are large but because of the nature of the work in which they are engaged. All possible requirements are given equal consideration regardless of the size of the contractor.

Then, there is a recommendation that Canadian plants should be provided every opportunity to tender on defence contracts. I have dealt with that in my statement this morning. The next recommendation is that development contracts should be available for tooling and product development. I have not heard any questions on this point.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether there is any defence production in Canada, apart from mutual aid, for NATO countries other than the United States?

Mr. O'Hurley: One example I would give the Leader of the Opposition is the manufacture of torpedoes for the United Kingdom. This is one example which comes to my mind.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us if there are other examples, other commonwealth countries, for example?

Mr. O'Hurley: There are other firms in Canada which have contracts for other countries, but I am sorry to tell the hon. member for Trinity that I do not have these figures or names of the countries available here.

Mr. Hellyer: I understood the minister to say we were manufacturing torpedoes for the United Kingdom.

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: What contract does Britain now have under which they are manufacturing military equipment for us?

Mr. O'Hurley: There is some in the shipbuilding industry; tank-automotives; weapons; ammunition and explosives; electronics and communication equipment and some aircraft equipment.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the minister have any idea of the dollar volume on an annual basis?

Mr. O'Hurley: Here I have the net value of Canadian government defence contracts placed in the United Kingdom by defence production on behalf of the Department of National Defence. The contracts placed amounted to $6,093,000, of which $1,921,000 was for aircraft; $147,000 for ships; $1,091,000 for tank-automotive; ammunition and explosives, $237,000; electronics and communication equipment, $2,143,000; other equipment, $857,000. The value of expenditures on Canadian government defence contracts placed in the United Kingdom by the Department of Defence Production and Defence Construction Limited on behalf of the Department of National Defence amounted in 1958 to $13,157,000.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister say there had been any diversion of purchases from the United States to the United Kingdom?

Mr. O'Hurley: I understand the hon. member for Trinity is quite serious, but I think he is fishing. I am sure that defence contracts were executed on behalf of the Department of National Defence, and it is rather difficult for this department to say we really diverted some of the trade. I would not want to make a statement to that effect because we fill any orders requested by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Hellyer: I am really surprised that the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production have not made a little more effort in this regard, especially after checking back in Hansard and reading the words of the Minister of Finance as recorded on page 5523 of Hansard for June 29, 1956, where he says:

> —express again regret that the department did not find it possible to make in the United Kingdom more of the purchases that it was unable to make in Canada and in that way assist the United Kingdom with its dollar problem in order that it might in turn purchase more of our products in this country.

With reference to the F-104 Lockheed Starfighter, could the minister say he recommended the purchase of that aircraft to the cabinet defence committee?

Mr. O'Hurley: It certainly is not the role of the Minister of Defence Production to recommend any aircraft to any department.

Mr. Hellyer: I am glad to hear that, Mr. Chairman, although from the words of the Minister of National Defence the other day we gathered the views of the Department of Defence Production had carried a considerable amount of weight, perhaps even an overwhelming proportion.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, the member is putting words in my mouth. I never said at any time that the opinions of defence production carried overwhelming influence.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister is quite right, he did not. He certainly led us to believe that they had been consulted and from that, and from the context in which he put it, we gathered that their views had been given overwhelming consideration.

Mr. Pearkes: Well, you were quite wrong.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the Minister of Defence Production could tell us what the cost of tooling for the F-104 will be?

Mr. O'Hurley: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I have not the figures on tooling available here.

Mr. Hellyer: Perhaps the minister could get those figures for us. In the meantime, would he tell us where the tooling will be done?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, all I can say is that all the tooling which is needed will be done in Canada, except as I mentioned, I think, in my statement this morning when I spoke about the engine, that there might be some very intricate parts too expensive to make tooling for. As I said before, 85 per cent of the parts of the engine will be made in Canada and the airframe will be practically all made in Canada. But the tooling will certainly all be done in Canada.

Mr. Hellyer: The tooling will be done in Canada. I wonder if the minister could tell us whether the West German government plans to do its own tooling at the same time for production in its own country?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, as for what the Germans are doing with their own manufacture I am at a loss to say. I am sure it is not expected that we should know what the German contract is with Lockheed. All we know is that there is a definite contract signed for the 66, and we will be making some parts here in Canada for these 66 F-104G's which have been bought from Lockheed by the German government.

Mr. McGee: I wonder if the minister will continue with his comments on the estimates committee report of last year with reference to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and the contents of the committee report concerning the organization and management of that corporation, and also the final recommendation which dealt with the advisability of employing an independent business consultant to examine one or more of the crown companies. The report says that on completion of this review the government should then decide whether a further examination of the remaining crown companies is desired. I wonder what progress has been made in that direction?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member for York-Scarborough would mind if we continued with the balance of the questions with regard to the F-104 and then he can pursue this other point if he wishes.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, was that question directed at me? It is a question of who is interrupting whom. I had a question going here which was interrupted by somebody on that side before I had an opportunity to continue it.

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member may as well go ahead now he is awake.

Mr. O'Hurley: In reply to the hon. member for York-Scarborough, consideration was given to the recommendation of the committee and we are preparing plans for a management consultant with regard to crown assets which is before the government at this time. The reason it was not done before was because of the excess amount of work in front of crown assets through the disposal of a lot of property during the late fall and winter months; but the plan, as I say, for a management consultant is before the government and the president of crown assets is perfectly in agreement with the suggestion which has been made.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister would tell us if any arrangements have been made, or what attempt has been made to work out a production sharing arrangement with the West German government?

Mr. O'Hurley: There is no arrangement worked out with the West German government as yet, none whatsoever.

Mr. Hellyer: Is there any intention on the part of the minister to work out a production sharing arrangement with the Germans?

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes. I think it will be a difficult situation, and I do not know what prospects there are of any success; but if there is any chance I am sure we will see what can be done.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I gathered from the minister's statement this morning that arrangements have already been made to share the payment to the manufacturers in the United States of the design and engineering costs with the German government. As the minister said this morning, the design and engineering costs associated with the alteration to the F-104G model which Canada must pay will be up to 7 per cent, plus a licence fee and royalties. That means there will be an additional charge of $28 million. Could the minister say how much of that $28 million is Canada's share of the design and engineering costs of the remodelling, and how much is the licence fee and the royalties to be paid to this United States company for the privilege of manufacturing in Canada an airplane for Atlantic defence?

Mr. O'Hurley: The licence, Mr. Chairman, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, is the straight, ordinary fee of $3 million for all the aircraft. The royalty is $20,000 per aircraft; and the development of the F-104G is $14 million for the production and the alteration.

Mr. Pearson: Is the minister saying that it will cost Canada $14 million for her share in altering this plane to make the F-104G suitable for the use it is intended for?

Mr. O'Hurley: We each pay the same amount, both West Germany and Canada.

Mr. Hellyer: Is it true that the West German government is using the same mark of this aircraft, the G model, which is proposed to be used by the Canadian government?

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes, West Germany is using the F-104G.

Mr. Pearson: Could the minister say what share the United States manufacturer is paying of the cost of development and design? I gather we are paying a certain percentage of the cost of the redesigning and redeveloping; what share does the United States company pay?

Mr. O'Hurley: I do not want to be exact, Mr. Chairman, about this, but my understanding is that it is $28 million. Germany is paying $14 million and we are paying $14 million to make the F-104G. If other planes are sold there will be a reduction in those costs. This is what I understand is the fact.

Mr. Pearson: Is it the case that if the United States air force should use this redeveloped and redesigned plane, the F-104G, our share of the cost of the redevelopment and redesigning goes down?

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: As far as the minister's first statement is concerned that the 7 per cent is to be shared by Germany, he said, and I am quoting from his statement, a copy of which he gave me this morning:

> The remaining 7 per cent—

That is, 7 per cent of the total cost of the contract for Canada, which is $400 million.

> —represents payments to the original manufacturers for Canada's share of the design and engineering costs—

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes. You have the licence, and then our share of the production. You have the royalties and licence of the engine, which comes to roughly 7 per cent of the contract.

Mr. Pearson: When the minister said that the Canadian share will be further reduced if the aircraft is adopted by other countries, he included in "other countries" the United States?

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: Because the redesigning and redevelopment is now purely for Canada and West Germany?

Mr. O'Hurley: That is right.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the engineering for the F-104G complete?

Mr. O'Hurley: The engineering is complete.

Mr. Hellyer: Is a model being made of the F-104G and, if so, does tooling exist for it or is it being made by hand as a prototype?

Mr. O'Hurley: The tooling is ready. Only parts of these planes are being developed. The whole plane is not being redeveloped. The tooling is there. Under the contract they have to have 66 planes for West Germany. Parts of the tooling are going to be sent to the manufacturer in Canada for the manufacture of certain parts of the aircraft.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister says only parts of it are being redeveloped, and that is true but the Minister of National Defence has told us that the airframe is being altered, the wings are being altered, and the fire control and electronic equipment are being altered. These are very serious and comprehensive changes. They may be compared to the process of making a light truck into a heavy truck. You start out by putting on heavier tires and wheels, and then you find you need a heavier axle. Then, if you drive across a ploughed field you find that your frame twists like a pretzel. Then you have to have a new frame, which leads to a new drive shaft and, perhaps, a new engine. Sometimes these minor modifications can become substantial operations.

If I may, I will refer to the Minister of National Defence and pose a question based on information given to us by him. We should like to know what makes these planes easier to modify by way of comparison than Canadian interceptors, because the Minister of National Defence told us the other day that the F-104G was selected as the most suitable after more than 20 types of British, United States and European aircraft, including our own interceptors had been evaluated by the R.C.A.F. As reported in Hansard at page 5352, he told the committee:

> Such aircraft were developed essentially as fighter or interceptor aircraft, and were designed to engage hostile bombers at great heights. The requirements for a strike reconnaissance aircraft do not demand long range and great height, but do call for the ability to fly fast at low altitudes. The two requirements are not compatible.

[Mr. Pearson.]

What the minister is telling us today is that he is taking the very type of plane which the Minister of National Defence told us could not be reworked into a low altitude strike reconnaissance aircraft, and proposing to modify it, and do that cheaply because there will not be many modifications involved

Mr. O'Hurley: Surely the hon. member realizes that in defence production work we talk about production, the awarding of these contracts and their execution, but I am unable to enter into details now regarding the technical side of the manufacture of these aircraft.

Mr. Hellyer: I thought the Minister of Defence Production might have had that information since the Minister of National Defence did not. Perhaps the minister would be able to tell us how long his officials have been working with Lockheed in working out the terms of this proposed contract.

Mr. O'Hurley: The officials of my department have had several meetings with the Lockheed company, as with other aircraft manufacturers. The date of the first meetings goes back, I think, to November. But the real negotiations are going on now in California. One of my officials has just returned, having been down there for over a week. But there have been several conversations and meetings with Lockheed company officials during the winter months, as with other companies.

Mr. Hellyer: I am glad to hear that negotiations go back that far. There seems to be some confusion on this point, because on March 5, 1959 when the Minister of National Defence was speaking about the Messerschmidt contract he said he had no detailed information on the subject—it was a matter between the government of West Germany and the government of the United States. That was in March. Last week, in the debate on the estimates of the Department of National Defence, he gave us a different impression, namely that the question had been under serious consideration at least as far back as January. There seems to be something inconsistent about those statements.

Mr. Pearkes: Nothing inconsistent.

Mr. Hellyer: Perhaps the Minister of Defence Production would tell us if he thinks it is efficient for both the governments of West Germany and of Canada to build up completely from scratch to manufacture limited numbers of these planes?

Mr. O'Hurley: I cannot give an answer to that question. It is a technical question.

Mr. Hellyer: The Prime Minister told us on March 3 of this year, and I quote from page 1553, that we would work with the United States in the same way as the United States and Canada work with all the other countries of NATO on the continent of Europe——to the end that in the spirit of unity and a common dedication of purpose we shall be able to assure to this and future generations the freedom which we inherited.

We have heard a great many speeches about production sharing and working together in the western world within the NATO alliance to find the most efficient and cheapest means of producing defence requirements, yet here is a perfect example of two NATO countries, both presumably embarking on the production of very limited quantities of the F-104G completely failing to carry out in practice the high-sounding declarations which were made in those speeches. I understand, of course, that these aircraft are not for the same purpose; that in the case of West Germany they are getting the plane as an interceptor and plan to use the Fiat as a strike reconnaissance plane, whereas we are presumably intending to use the F-104G as a strike reconnaissance plane. Notwithstanding this difference, this would seem to be an excellent opportunity for the governments of Canada and West Germany to get together to work out a system of cooperative defence sharing in order to reduce the cost to the taxpayers of both countries. I am surprised and disappointed to learn from the Minister of Defence Production that no effort has been made in this direction. Now perhaps the minister would explain to the committee what is meant by a competition for the production of this plane in Canada.

Mr. O'Hurley: We are asking for proposals —tenders if you will. As the hon. member for Trinity knows, we have here three major manufacturers. We want to see that this work is distributed in the centres where there are possibilities; I think it is important that no new industry should arise for the manufacture of new components, but that we should offer encouragement to the companies which have worked in this field in past years.

Mr. Hellyer: I am a little confused. The minister said "tenders, if you will" and yet he referred in the same sentence to "proposals". Are these proposals to be made in a form designated by the Department of Defence Production so that they may be evaluated properly, and so that there will be no question whatever as to the relative merits of these proposals?

Mr. O'Hurley: The three companies have already had a meeting with officials of my department, and the same instructions have been given to the three companies. The same instructions were given and will continue to be given by my department, and they will be the same for three of them.

Mr. Hellyer: Do the three companies have complete sets of engineering drawings of the aircraft and its component parts and do they know precisely what tooling they will have to do and to what extent assistance will be available from the Department of Defence Production and the Lockheed corporation?

Mr. O'Hurley: I should inform the hon. member for Trinity of the fact that officials of the three companies are today in Burbank, California, obtaining the information they require from the corporation.

Mr. Hellyer: I hope they have a nice trip and that the weather is good down there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: I know that hon. gentlemen opposite want to get home as soon as they can and so do we but we are not going to be bullied by a big government majority.

An hon. Member: We will go on shifts and keep you here until December.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister assure us that the competition will be so arranged that upon examination the committee would be satisfied that the submissions have been made on the basis of quality with no room for interpretation or interpolation in assessing the merits or evaluating the proposal?

Mr. O'Hurley: I hope that the hon. member for Trinity is not interested only in quality and that he is interested also in price. Price and quality are two important factors.

Mr. Hellyer: I thought that was implied in my question.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, would the minister be kind enough to let us know what is the proportion of contracts which have been awarded without tenders being called? I appreciate that he would not have that information at his fingertips but I am agreeable to receiving it when he has it available either in writing or verbally at the conclusion of his estimates.

Mr. Peters: I was interested in the question asked by the hon. member for York-Scarborough. When the committee examined the estimates of the Department of Defence Production last year I believe we were unsatisfied with the methods used for procurement and with many other phases of the department. I was pleased about the questions he asked and not at all satisfied with the answers.

The need for implementing the recommendations of the committee are highlighted by an article entitled "A Story of Waste on the Mid-Canada Line", which appeared in Saturday Night, issue of March 14, which article was written by Arnold Edinborough. He explains that the magazine made an investigation into the cost of the mid-Canada line. It cost the Canadian taxpayer something over one-quarter of a billion dollars. The author points out that this project consisted of building 102 separate sites across northern Canada and involved the handling of over 200,000 tons of material. A project of this magnitude would assume the drawing up of a contract document with a managing director. In this instance it was the Bell Telephone company. The contract was not drawn up until nearly the end of the construction phase. As a result of this there was no clearly defined authority for responsibility as between the Department of National Defence, which was the actual customer for the line, the Department of Defence Production, which was the procurement agency, Defence Construction Limited, responsible for the actual construction, and the management contractor who should have had over-all authority. The article sets out the following as being required for this project:

(1) The signal and radio equipment cost approximately $34,500,000.

(2) Transportation to get this equipment into the line cost $42 million.

(3) Cost of housing and servicing that equipment was $107 million.

The author points out that the simple conclusion from these figures is that the cost of construction and transportation as opposed to the cost of equipment was in a ratio of 4 to 1. This indicates that this was not necessarily the type of company that should have been the management director of this job. The article cites many instances of outright waste simply because the company was qualified in the fields of construction and transportation. The article continues:

From Winisk on March 17, 1956, an inspection report informed the engineer in charge that "the piles (for the harbour) received since the beginning of February form a good part of the last purchase by the prime contractor. They are eastern pine and of a very poor quality. There is evidence that they may be poles rejected by the Ontario Hydro company in that they bear the Ontario Hydro stamp and are dated 1953. Many have spiral checks, are badly distorted, and show signs of having been cut from a burnt timber stand. Breakage is between 30 and 40 per cent, tending toward the latter".

[Mr. Peters.]

There are many other instances which if the article is accurate reveal that the company was unqualified, or if qualified, botched the job which would not have happened if the recommendations of the committee had been implemented. I continue:

The most dramatic example of this waste of money both to feed and lodge skilled men (as well as to pay their wages for doing nothing) is contained in a memo to the R.C.A.F. from the cost inspection and audit division, querying the claim of a construction company, whose contract was for the antennae and transmission lines.

Says the CIAD: "We would like to draw your attention to the considerable number of charges for room and board supplied to the contractor's employees in Montreal in varying periods which are described as "waiting time pending transit to site". Some of these periods are two and three weeks in length and total to a considerable sum of money. These waiting periods occur not only at the time of hire but are charged as well for periods in between engagement at sites".

The CIAD might well question this particular account in which 22 men were listed as putting in waiting time to a total of $3,490.41. One man alone had hotel bills of $1,066.98—this apart from his normal pay. In this particular instance, in fact, waiting time accounted for 6 per cent of the total contractor's claim for that area.

The author mentions other projects that were mishandled and points out the need for managerial service to put the contracts on a sound basis. A section of the article entitled "How the Money was Wasted" reads as follows:

A gravel crusher was shipped into Hudson's bay from Toronto. It stayed on Bear island all summer and was freighted back from Halifax after the St. Lawrence freeze-up. It never turned a wheel in all this time.

Two landing craft were bought from the British navy so that stores could be unloaded from their bow doors on the beach at Winisk. When they arrived in Canada, these LCT's had their bow doors welded up. As a result a small harbour had to be constructed at cost of well over a quarter of a million dollars.

One technician had hotel bills for over $1,000 while waiting to go from Montreal into the construction area.

Thousands of small wooden slabs to be used as mounts for switches were individually wrapped and sealed before being freighted in.

The article goes on to point out what this waste amounted to, and what it could have bought. The article goes on:

The over-run on the mid-Canada line was in the neighbourhood of $30 million.

This could buy 2,500 medium-cost three-bedroom homes. Pay the total salaries for all members of parliament and the cabinet for over 10 years. Pay the total fees and maintenance costs of all four years for 5,000 young Canadians going through university. Buy six Arrow aircraft. Mean a charge of over $5 out of the taxes of every member of Canada's labour force.

I think this reporter in doing a survey of some of the waste that took place under procurement methods by this and previous governments has given an indication that something is wrong with the system that is being used by defence production.

I think it is well understood that the members of the committee last year were not at all satisfied that the department had done the job that they should have done in removing some of these loopholes that the committee recommended be removed. I think the type of waste that is taking place under one contract of $30 million is so important that we would be well advised to hire outside managerial consultants. No matter how busy the department appears to be, the questions and recommendations which were raised by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo warrant immediate consideration, and the waste of $30 million should be looked into and no excuse should be accepted.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to ask the minister one or two questions about the answer he gave to a question of mine which appeared in Hansard of June 3 with regard to procurement in the Atlantic provinces. I understand the minister made some statement about that this afternoon when I was at the broadcasting committee, and if he has answered any particular question I raised I apologize to him because I am not trying to hold up the committee at all. The minister did give the impression at the end of that statement, although I do not think he exactly said it, that there had been a very substantial increase in last year—that is to say, since March 31, 1958—in the amount of procurement in the Atlantic provinces. The minister will perhaps recall that in the famous Atlantic resolutions of 1957, which were endorsed unanimously by all the Tory candidates in the Atlantic provinces and which were published under the name of the Conservative party, the first part of the second of those resolutions reads—this was one of the things they pledged themselves to:

> Decentralization by placing a more equitable share of defence contract expenditures within the Atlantic provinces.

What I want to find out from the minister is, first of all, what was the dollar increase in 1958-59 over 1957-58, in the total defence purchases in the Atlantic provinces? I will give the questions all at once. Second, what proportion of that increase was on construction; what proportion was on shipbuilding or ship repairing for both years, and what proportion of it was on the procurement of an industrial character; that is to say, things that were bought from industrial plants because that is what it was promised would be increased. Of course, I have the minister's answer. Although I do not question the factual accuracy of the answer, I think it was very misleading indeed because obviously, of course, expenditures on construction are not contributing to the decentralization, as was promised by the government. Neither, of course, are expenditures on shipbuilding and ship repairing unless indeed the government is deliberately diverting that work from some other part of the country to the Atlantic provinces. Of course, if that is done deliberately at a higher cost I wish the minister would answer that question also. Perhaps the minister would like to answer those questions; then, I may not have any others.

Mr. O'Hurley: I certainly cannot answer all of the questions that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked me just now; I have not this breakdown. I have a prepared statement on the defence work in the Atlantic provinces. I shall be pleased to give him this report. I have not got at hand a breakdown of the question asked.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister should not bother giving that statement now. What I am interested in is answers to the specific questions.

Mr. O'Hurley: I have no objection.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps it can be given at a later stage.

Mr. O'Hurley: I will get the answers for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pickersgill: The other thing I would like to ask the minister is that if at the same time he would indicate which of the contracts let in the year 1958-59 were for entirely new projects initiated by the present government and which were merely a continuation of projects that had been started by the previous administration. That is very important, because if any attempt is made to show that there has been any progress in bringing about this industrial decentralization, which we were promised would be the result of the change of government, we have to know whether it is something new or merely, as I suspect most of it is, a continuation of the projects that were started by the previous government.

Mr. O'Hurley: I will obtain this information for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Peters: The matter which has been raised by the Saturday Night reporter, pointing out this vast waste of money, warrants some consideration by the department and some answer. Certainly this must have been investigated. These charges have been made publicly and there must have been some investigation. The committee is owed an explanation of how it occurred and what steps have been taken to prevent it from occurring again. The sum of $30 million is a lot of money on such an order and I think we should be assured that this type of procedure has been corrected and that a different system of supplying managerial contractors has been obtained. I do not know whether the department's general auditor has been able to find out the difficulty or where the department's cost inspection and audit division comes in; but they did make a number of reports to the air force section and I presume they must be under defence production or the treasury department and their recommendations and their memos on this matter should receive some attention from the minister.

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, when this article appeared in Saturday Night I asked my officials to look into it. There was an inquiry. I have a statement on the history of the construction of this line, when it was constructed and so on. It is quite lengthy. I shall be pleased to give to the committee the results of the investigation made by my department. If need be I will be pleased to read to the committee the results of the investigation made by my department. The mid-Canada early warning line is basically a detection system, which is supported by a transcontinental communication network.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I might make a suggestion to the minister. Would it not serve all our purposes, in view of the fact that we are going to be interrupted, if the minister had permission to put the statement on Hansard so that we would have it there to see tomorrow. It would save reading it.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee agreeable to having this report placed on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Editor's note: The report above referred to follows.)

The mid-Canada early warning line is basically a detection system, which is supported by a transcontinental communication network. The whole line is constructed over terrain which, from the accessibility and climatic point of view, is the most difficult in Canada. The problems of construction, transportation, communications and manning were of such magnitude as to require an unprecedented degree of effort and team work by the Department of National Defence, the Department of Defence Production, Defence Construction Limited, and Canadian industry.

It was decided to proceed with the project in two phases. Phase I was to include a technical study and report including an estimated cost for the complete project. Phase II known as the implementation phase, involved the complete engineering, procurement, transportation, construction and installation of the entire system.

It was realized that the construction of a communication system of this magnitude demanded that the basic planning and systems engineering be of the highest order and excellence. As it was to be built across all provinces of Canada, it was obvious that advantage should be taken of the local knowledge in the various provinces.

After a great deal of study and consultation with the armed forces, industry and experts in the communications field, it was established to the satisfaction of the Department of Defence Production that the employment of one company in the commercial communications field to manage the contract was the most efficient way to carry out a project of this magnitude and complexity. The techniques used to operate the system are almost entirely those of communications theory and practice. The major contribution to reliability rests with the ability of the communication system to carry the necessary warning data from each detection station to its appropriate sector station where after screening the combined information it is passed to air defence command.

The organization in Canada which most satisfactorily filled the requirement was the trans-Canada telephone system. This system comprises all the major provincial and commercial telephone operating companies and was set up primarily to allow a smooth and efficiently reliable transcontinental system to be achieved. It is because of this that the Department of Defence Production considered the trans-Canada telephone system the best organization to fulfill the requirement for co-ordinated systems engineering, planning, provincial know-how and the means to bring a large body of experienced and proven communication people together.

The exact relatonship between the contractor and the crown took some time to define because the original plan envisaged delegating almost complete control to the management contractor. This was dropped in favour of one where the Department of Defence Production performed its normal procurement functions, Defence Construction Limited was responsible for construction contracts and the RCAF acted as design authority. Under this plan the management contractor would co-ordinate all aspects of the engineering, construction and installation of the system.

Every contract placed by the Department of Defence Production or Defence Construction Limited, contained a clause stating that the requirement was a portion of an over-all project which was being co-ordinated by the trans-Canada telephone system (represented by the Bell Telephone Co. of Canada as management contractor) and stating that the management contractor would act under the control and direction of the Minister of Defence Production as agent of Her Majesty in the supervision of the contract.

An executive committee to speak for the deputy ministers of the departments of government directly concerned with the building of the mid-Canada line and to act as a "clearing house" for complex problems was formed in November 1954. The management contractor was a member of this committee. The committee met monthly for 17 regular meetings in Ottawa and for many special meetings in Ottawa and at mid-Canada line sites. Most problems were settled at these meetings despite the varied opinions and convictions of individual committee members concerning technical and managerial matters.

Although the tentative program developed by the systems engineering group (RCAF) in June 1954 envisaged the completion of the line by the end of 1957, there was an urgent necessity for rapid and continuous improvement in the North American air defence system which accelerated the project so that the line could be in essentially full operation by January 1, 1957. Portions of the mid-Canada line were in operation as early as September 1956. The line came into operation sector by sector progressively, proceeding from west to east along the line. A report, dated January 8, 1957, indicated the detection equipment working from Winisk on the west side of James bay to Dawson creek with some sections of the balance of the line also in operation. Provisional acceptance tests and interim operational tests continued through the spring and late summer of 1957. Some deficiencies such as tower clean up, antennae alignment and modifications to the north-south Doppler detection equipment were carried over into the maintenance contracts.

Under the terms of his contract, the management contractor submitted "Forecasts of Expenditures" quarterly. The first was submitted in May of 1955 with an overall estimate of approximately 169 million. This figure included approximately 16.7 million for management function. This estimate remained unchanged in the management contractor's quarterly forecasts until August 1956 when the management contractor revised the estimate upwards by 10 million to 179 million. At the insistence of the R.C.A.F. and the executive committee, the management contractor immediately undertook a complete review of the mid-Canada line costs and submitted early in October an estimate of approximately $206 million. This estimate was discussed at the executive committee meeting of October 15, 1956 and additional breakdowns of cost estimates and reasons for change were requested. It was also agreed that an estimate should be made to provide for interim maintenance costs prior to the effective date of the maintenance contract. This further review was undertaken by the management contractor and completed by the end of October, part of which was made with the assistance of the systems engineering group personnel. This study established a figure of 203.4 million for the construction phase with 6.4 million for interim maintenance.

Cost estimates were under constant review from this point on, with the highest estimate of $230 million for construction and $9.8 million for interim maintenance appearing in March 1957 quarterly review. The present estimate of cost inclusive of interim maintenance is $228 million.

Only a few of the reasons for upward revision in the over-all costs are outlined here for your information. Construction costs increased as a result of additional buildings (185 in place of 120); the size of the buildings increased by 31 per cent in cubic content; two additional rearward scatter sites and three additional DDSs were added; special harbour work at Winisk had to be undertaken; additional airstrips had to be constructed; there was a fire loss at Knob Lake; and extra foundations as well as access roads had to be built. The increase in sites resulted in an increase in the number of main towers, as well as an increase in electronic equipment, diesels, domestic furnishings and transportation costs. The original estimates did not provide for the purchase of helicopters or the procurement of scows, barges, and other lightering equipment for use in Hudson Bay. The original estimate for transportation did not provide funds for rental of civilian helicopters as it was anticipated that RCAF could supply all helicopter support. The early target completion date necessitated airfreight of urgently required equipment including the Dorman diesels airlifted from England. Later estimates included equipment to be left on site for RCAF use during the maintenance of the line and was estimated to provide two years' maintenance of spares. This also included fire-fighting equipment, heavy construction equipment, laundry equipment, furniture, kitchen and mess equipment as well as spares and tools to be put into stock for replacement and repair.

Shipping conditions in the Hudson bay were far from ideal. Cargo returned to Montreal by ship urgently required for winter construction had to be airlifted. A record cold winter on the eastern half of the line caused extremely high consumption of fuel for heating and construction operations and required airlift of fuel not previously planned.

The stress of this project from the first was one of urgency as to time and this unquestionably contributed to higher costs. It was generally recognized that this approach would result in heavier costs than would be the case in a normally spaced program. To meet the date, it was necessary to work during the extremely difficult annual freeze-up and break-up periods when efficiency of operation drops markedly.

It must be accepted that a project of this magnitude undertaken, as it was, on a "crash" basis would be fraught with differences of opinions, both technical and administrative, and problems of an almost insurmountable nature. The decision to hire a contractor to take over completely the detailed responsibilities, perform the management function including over-all co-ordination, technical assistance and detailed design as required was intended to relieve the RCAF design authority, Defence Construction Limited and the Department of Defence Production of details for which no staff was available. The hopes of the government agencies, that the detailed responsibilities would be taken over by the management contractor, were not entirely fulfilled. It should be pointed out, however, that the work was carried out at a time when the entire construction and shipping industries were struggling to cope with some of the heaviest demands in their history. It is reasonable, therefore, to conclude that the project could not always progress in the most efficient and desired manner.

While those who were close to the project may remember it chiefly for the difficulties which had to be overcome collectively, it is generally agreed by the members of the executive committee that the construction of the mid-Canada line was a truly remarkable achievement, and it accomplished its objectives in spite of an unavoidable but nevertheless complicated administrative control. These controls are of course essential in all projects involving large expenditures of public funds.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) a question. Is the Frobisher Bay project the responsibility, entirely or in part, of the Department of Defence Production? I may have other questions to ask, depending on the answer.

Mr. O'Hurley: I am sorry, but I did not understand the question.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Roberge: Is the Frobisher bay development the responsibility, either entirely or in part, of the Department of Defence Production? Depending on the answer I will receive to that, I may have other questions to ask.

Mr. O'Hurley: You want to know if it is under the jurisdiction of my department?

Mr. Roberge: Yes, that is right.

Mr. O'Hurley: No, there are contracts being carried out on behalf of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. The Department of Transport is also concerned.

Mr. Roberge: Is the Department of Defence Production interested in that development?

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes, because we have awarded contracts on behalf of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Roberge: In that case, I should like to ask the following question: What are the companies that now have contracts with regard to the development of Frobisher bay, and what are the contracts for?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I do not have this information before me, but I may tell the hon. member that contracts have been awarded for the construction of wharves, buildings and for their installation. I might obtain that information for the hon. member but I am sorry I do not have it here with me.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I should like the minister to give us that information later, so that it will not delay the passing of his estimates.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): This is my last question on item 68, Mr. Chairman. May I ask the minister if he can tell the committee whether it happened that public tenders for some clothing items, which had been received, were recalled, and new ones asked for, mentioning the same quantities, but different specifications with regard to quality. I realize that the minister may not be able to give me an immediate answer, and I do not want to delay the passing of these estimates.

Mr. O'Hurley: I might say to the hon. member that the answer is yes, because sometimes, tenders are called, and then returned after having been examined. In that case, others are called for.

Mr. Bourget: This morning, the Minister informed the committee that there were six more escort vessels to build. Could he tell us whether contracts have been awarded for the construction of those vessels, and if so, to what companies, and on what dates?

Mr. O'Hurley: First, I must tell the hon. member that this information was given when the estimates of my department were under consideration last year. The contract for the first vessel was awarded to the Canadian Vickers, in September 1958. As for the construction of the other five, work will begin in July 1959, and new starts will proceed from then on at three month intervals, until July 1960. One of the destroyers will be constructed by the Canadian Vickers, as I have already told you; another one by the Burrard Dry Dock, of Vancouver; a third one by the Davie Shipbuilding, of Lauzon; the fourth by the Halifax Shipyards, of Halifax; another one by the Marine Industries, of Sorel; and the last one by the Victoria Machinery Depot and Yarrows Limited, of Victoria.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, could the minister indicate whether contracts for the construction of those ships have definitely been awarded to each of the companies whose names he has mentioned?

Mr. O'Hurley: Absolutely.

Mr. Bourget: Could the minister give the exact dates, because that is the very point I want to clear up. I was aware that the government intended to have these ships built by certain companies, but the dates were not definite.

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, the Burrard Dry Dock Company will start building one of these ships in July 1959. In October, the Davie Shipbuilding Company will start work on the third.

Mr. Bourget: In October 1959?

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes. They have been awarded the contract for the third destroyer. From then on, construction will start at intervals of three months, until the sixth ship is under construction, so as to complete the order by 1962-63.

Mr. Bourget: Then, it is in October 1959?

Mr. O'Hurley: The contract for the second destroyer has been awarded and the work is to start in July. I know the Davie Shipbuilding Company is to start construction of the third destroyer in October, and the work on the other ships will start at intervals of three months.

Mr. Bourget: Could the minister indicate how the contracts for these ships were allocated to each of these companies? On what basis?

Royal Assent

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, I cannot recall the exact French expression but it is called in English "target incentive price". This is the prevailing method in all shipbuilding companies. I regret being unable to give you a translation of the expression "target incentive price".

(Text):

Mr. Bourget: Can the minister give us the target price for each?

Mr. O'Hurley: The target incentive—

Mr. Bourget: What is the target price? Is there a fixed target price?

(Translation):

Mr. O'Hurley: The contract prices are based on the number of working hours, according to the shipyards experience. That is why each shipyard may have a different target incentive price. Anyway, I can get further information and I will be glad to give it to the hon. member.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I could ask the minister when the vessel to be built in the Halifax shipyards is to be started?

Mr. O'Hurley: The fourth destroyer will be built in the Halifax shipyard and work will commence somewhere around the holidays.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 68 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

Progress reported.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the acting house leader can give us the business for the remainder of the week?

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, the business for tomorrow and the next day was indicated last evening by the house leader, and there will be no change as far as I know.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the acting house leader give us any indication of what will be taken up on Monday?

Mr. Brooks: I am sorry, but I have no information on that.

It being eight minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

ROAD TRAFFIC CONVENTION, 1949

Question No. 470—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Was Canada a party to the 1949 road traffic convention?
2. If so, what negotiations have been conducted with the provinces concerning the possibility of Canada ratifying this convention?
3. By what means have such negotiations been conducted?
4. What attitude has each of the provinces expressed to the ratification of this convention?
5. Does it appear likely that Canada will be able in the near future to ratify this convention?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. No.

2. In 1949 provinces were informed of the forthcoming UN conference on road and motor transport and of its possible implications for Canada. After the conference, their views were requested on the possibility of ratification by Canada of the convention on road traffic. In 1956 they were asked whether they would be willing to bring their legislation into line with the provisions of the convention. They were also consulted in 1953 and in 1957 concerning detailed questions of implementation in the matter of the licensing of drivers.

3. By correspondence, in most cases between the lieutenant governor of the province concerned and the secretary or the under secretary of state.

4. Not all the provinces have replied to the government's inquiries. One province has suggested that provinces should not be asked to comment on this problem separately, as decisions of this nature should be arrived at at a conference of all the provinces. Two provinces have expressed their lack of interest, and two provinces have stated that they are working to achieve uniformity of provincial legislation by other means. Two provinces have suggested that ratification of the convention, or discussion of this possibility, would be of little value. Two provinces have replied without commenting on the desirability of ratification.

No province has expressed interest in the possibility of Canadian ratification. One province has said that none of the provisions of the convention conflict with its own legislation, but no other province has given a substantive reply to our enquiry of 1956.

5. After completing a review of the inconvenience caused to motorists abroad by failure to ratify the convention, the government will decide whether a further approach should be made to the provinces.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING REPRESENTATIONS ON PRICES, ETC.—APPLICATION TO FISHING AGREEMENTS

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-70, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING WITH PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he had a meeting with the premier of Quebec earlier this week and, if so, were university grants and hospital insurance questions discussed? If not, what questions were discussed?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is the custom when provincial premiers come to Ottawa to call on the Prime Minister. Yesterday the premier of Quebec as well as the premier of Manitoba and the premier of Nova Scotia called on me. As to the nature of the discussions, may I say that these were informal, in respect of which I have no report to make.

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENTS BY FEDERAL TREASURY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he is now in a position to answer the question I asked him yesterday about the payments made by the federal treasury to the treasury of Quebec.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): That answer will be provided in due course, Mr. Speaker.

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether as a result of discussions among members of the cabinet, the Prime Minister and the premier of Nova Scotia it has been decided to have a royal commission make an inquiry into the coal industry? If so, will it be a federal royal commission or a provincial royal commission?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, after the discussions have taken place, when government policy has been determined it will be brought to the attention of the house. I know the hon. gentleman will realize that until a decision is made the discussions in respect of possible decisions would not be revealed.

Mr. Argue: May I ask a supplementary question arising out of the forecast by the Minister of National Revenue that such a widespread inquiry would be undertaken. Can the Prime Minister give the house and the people of Nova Scotia some idea as to when a decision will be made, and whether or not the government intends to follow the statement of the Minister of National Revenue that such an inquiry will be held?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I have already said. When a decision is made it will be communicated to the house if the house is in session. If the house is not in session it will be announced in the usual way. No final decision in this regard has been made as yet; therefore any reply I might give to the question would be speculative and anticipative.

Mr. Argue: Is the Prime Minister saying that no decision has been made as to whether an inquiry into this important but lagging industry is going to be made?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I thought I made perfectly clear the situation in which the government is at this time with regard to this matter. In so far as the coal situation in Nova Scotia is concerned, this government has shown unusual interest and action.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO CHOICE OF SITE FOR ATOMIC POWER STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, arising out of an announcement he made to the house on June 18, 1959, to the effect that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited was to begin immediately the final design and to plan for the early construction of a large scale atomic power station. The announcement was somewhat lengthy, but my question this morning concerns the choice of a site. Can the minister advise the house as to whether the site has been chosen for the location of the power plant?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, the site has not yet been chosen. This is not a matter which can be settled just in a day or two. The party chiefly concerned with the location of the site, I imagine, would be the Ontario hydro commission, because the power produced would be introduced into the Ontario grid; but as I mentioned on June 18, when I made the announcement, the federal government is concerned, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is concerned, the Ontario government is concerned, but the choice of a site would be made chiefly, I imagine, on the recommendation of the Ontario hydro electric power commission. They are making an examination of suitable sites, and in course of time we shall be hearing from them.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question. Does the minister not realize that the perfect site for this power reactor would be the Blind River area, where there is lots of water, lots of rock and lots of uranium?

Mr. Churchill: Some time ago Mr. Speaker rejected advertisements of that nature from one of our members who similarly had a very suitable site to recommend.

Mr. Pearson: When did you reject that?

CRIMINAL LAW

OBSCENE LITERATURE—STATEMENT AS TO BOOK BY JACK KEROUAC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Port Arthur asked me a question arising out of an article in the Globe and Mail of July 8, 1959, referring to a judgment in connection with the alleged sale of an obscene book. The member asked me to inform the house what authority has determined or has the right to determine whether the book connected with that judgment is obscene.

I should point out that I have not seen a copy of the judgment. I have however had the opportunity to look at the press report, and it appears from the report that the magistrate in effect found the book to be obscene, but the accused was acquitted on other grounds in connection with the provisions of section 150 of the Criminal Code.

The answer to the inquiry as to the authority having the right to determine whether a book is obscene is to be found in the Criminal Code and in the provisions of the Customs Act. Only the courts of Canada have the right under the Criminal Code to determine whether or not a book is obscene. Under the Customs Act, customs officers and the tariff board have the same right with respect to books being imported into the country, subject to an appeal now, which was provided last year, to the county or district court. So if there were an appeal the situation would then be that it is the courts of Canada that have final authority to determine whether or not a publication is obscene.

SHIPPING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROVISION OF SERVICE TO UP-COAST COMMUNITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he tell the house what action his department is taking to provide shipping facilities to up-coast British Columbia communities which, because of an industrial dispute, do not have such service now?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are not contemplating any action at the moment because we have great hopes that this strike will be over in the near future.

Mr. Howard: May I ask a supplementary question. What does the minister intend to do? Is he making any plans in case the strike is not over in the near future?

Mr. Hees: We will face that eventuality when it arises.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO SALARY INCREASES THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the government received a report from the civil service commission regarding increases in the salaries of civil servants?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have received a report from the civil service commission in this respect. However, the matter is not final as between the civil service commission and the government, because further discussions must be held with the commission on it before I would be prepared to regard it as a final submission on the part of the commission to the government.

Mr. Caron: Does the government intend to act upon the said report before the end of the session, inasmuch as a supplementary estimate will be required?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, if a decision can be made on this matter in time it will be communicated to the house in the usual way. At the present time the matter requires extensive inquiry and consideration.

Mr. McIlraith: That means no.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—CONSULTATION ON U.S. DECISION TO WITHDRAW PLANES FROM FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether the decision taken by the NATO commander, General Norstad, to withdraw United States squadrons from NATO bases in France, was taken after consultation with all members of NATO, and if there was such consultation what was the attitude of the Canadian government in respect to this matter?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I imagine that the decision was taken after consultation with the members of the permanent council. There has been no consultation as far as my department is concerned with respect to whether that decision should be taken.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs what attitude was taken by our representative on the permanent council in respect to this very important matter?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): This, of course, is a matter of vital concern to all NATO countries. Certainly discussions have taken place, but I do not think it would be very helpful if I were to make any further comment on the question at this time.

CIVIL AVIATION

INQUIRY RESPECTING ELEMENTARY FLYING TRAINING GRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position to inform the house whether, in the interests of the future of civil aviation, the subsidy or grant of $100 currently paid to graduating students, flying schools and flying clubs will be continued beyond 1960? Has there been any indication that the government will withdraw such support?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. Both industry and government have for some time recognized that the federal grants for elementary flying training need to be reviewed because of changing technical conditions and requirements in aviation. The military portion of this grant was withdrawn some time ago, and the civil portion is under study. While no decisions have been reached, I feel that assistance in some form is likely to continue, though its nature and objectives may differ from the present scheme.

WATER RESOURCES

LAKE MANITOBA—INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES TO CONTROL LEVEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources if he or his department has had any discussion with the government of Manitoba or any of the Manitoba authorities with regard to control of the level of lake Manitoba which, as the minister undoubtedly knows, has reached an alarmingly high figure.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The matter of the water levels of lake Winnipeg and lake Manitoba—

Mr. Pickersgill: This is lake Manitoba.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —is under constant watch by the department of northern affairs. There have been no discussions at my level but I have been informed of the high levels of the lakes.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

CHIPPEWA INDIAN RESERVE, SARNIA—LAND DISPOSAL—SALE OF LAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I wonder if the hon. lady could tell us when the orders respecting the Chippewa Indian reserve at Sarnia will be brought down.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The staff has been working on the copying of these records, and I expected to have them some time this week. I will inquire as to the progress that is being made.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED PROPOSAL BY GOVERNOR OF LOUISIANA TO VISIT CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the hon. lady a question. In view of the immigration regulations as they now stand, is the hon. lady's department looking forward to welcoming the governor of Louisiana, who has announced a proposed visit to Canada?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that is a hypothetical question.

HOUSING

MOSS PARK, TORONTO—REPRESENTATIONS ON LOW RENTAL PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Could the minister confirm that his request to the city of Toronto to consider alternatives in Moss park other than a low rental development resulted, as alleged in yesterday's Toronto Telegram, from representations made to him by the hon. member for Rosedale?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Well, now, Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure how many fishhooks there are in that question. The fact is that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation considers all redevelopment schemes with great care. They require a great deal of study. As the hon. member knows, some days ago a decision was made to go ahead with the clearance part of the project. In so far as the type of housing which is to be erected on the land is concerned, we have suggested to all parties concerned that they give further thought to the best use that could be made of the land under all the circumstances.

This is a matter upon which there have been various discussions and various representations made by all those who are interested. including the various members from the city of Toronto. My understanding is that at the present time these studies are under way, and eventually I hope it will be possible for the three levels of government to reach an agreement as to the type of housing that should be erected on this property. It is downtown property and, I understand, between two main highways. It is not in a desirable location for bringing up small children.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mr. Fisher: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister realizes that the purport of the question was to estimate just how influential representations are from certain members of parliament?

Mr. Speaker: That is not the type of question the hon. member should expect to be answered.

TRANSPORTATION

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO SECRETARIAT AND HEARINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister regarding the royal commission on freight rates. Would the Prime Minister give the house some idea of the progress the commission has made in obtaining a secretariat? Could the Prime Minister also say whether the royal commission intends to hold public hearings across the country and when, in view of the restriction as to time, the royal commission will get these hearings under way?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I shall answer this question. I was talking to the chairman of the commission a short time ago and he advised me he has got together a secretariat. He expects to be having an organization meeting of the commission the middle of this month and has been advised by many of the interested parties, the railways and other groups, that it will take them about two months to prepare their submissions. They requested that the hearings should not start until early September, and he has advised me that he plans to commence the hearings in early September.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether it is the intention of the royal commission to hold public hearings at various points across the nation, in western Canada, the maritime provinces and so on?

Mr. Hees: I have not discussed that particular aspect with the chairman. I assumed that probably would be his idea. I can assure the hon. member that this will be a very thorough inquiry.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the minister would again inquire of the commission whether it is their intention to have such public hearings across the country, and report to parliament with as much information on this matter as he can get?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Now that royal assent has been given to the measure, may I ask the Prime Minister whether it is his intention to appoint parliamentary secretaries before the conclusion of this session?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Two or three weeks ago the hon. gentleman was advocating that the appointments be not made until next session, as I recall it. However, I think his zeal to have this answer will receive as early attention as possible.

Mr. Pearson: Does the Prime Minister not realize that my zeal or interest in this matter is nothing to that of 24 of his friends opposite?

Mr. Diefenbaker: There again, Mr. Speaker, their interest is more impersonal than his.

HEALTH INSURANCE

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—INQUIRY AS TO SIGNING OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether all differences have now been resolved between the province of Prince Edward Island and the government in the matter of the health insurance program, and when it is expected that the agreement will be signed, if that has not already been done within the past few hours?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I think I informed the hon. member just the other day—yesterday or the day before—that this agreement would be signed in a very few days and that naturally negotiations had come to a successful conclusion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My question was when would the agreement be signed.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I cannot say the exact date, but it will be in the near future.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Department and missions abroad—

76. Departmental administration, $6,319,803.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Chairman, in opening my remarks today on the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: I am afraid I have done so much talking in this house on veterans affairs in the last 24 years that I have become accustomed to referring to that department. However, my very old friend the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks) objects strenuously to my interfering with his department. He is always annoyed when my old speeches when in opposition are quoted at him when he is putting his estimates through, so probably it is because of a guilty conscience that I spoke of the Department of Veterans Affairs. In any event, I will try another start.

In opening the discussion on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs I am deeply conscious of the sadness of the fact that the late Hon. Sidney Smith is not here to carry on with these estimates for which he had been responsible and in the presentation of which, some months ago, he had done so well. During the time I have been the minister of this department I have had confirmation of my opinion that Sidney Smith was making a great contribution to public life and was about to become one of the great foreign ministers in the world.

We all realize what a tragedy it was that he was taken from us so suddenly and perhaps the best way in which we can show our feelings in this regard is to keep in mind the unselfish contribution he made to the welfare of his fellow Canadians when he left such an important post in university life to enter the hurly-burly of political life. And he did so, I know, in the hope that he would be able to do something to further the cause of world peace. I shall be trying at all times to keep in mind the example he set in this department.

Before I go on to deal with foreign affairs I should like to thank the members of the House of Commons once again for the very kind reception they have given me today and for the encouragement they have given in the last few weeks. This is most helpful, and there has been similar encouragement from many other sources; for example, from Canadians in all walks of life and in all parts of the country. And it has been somewhat of a surprise to me to realize how deeply Canadians today are interested in what goes on beyond the borders of our nation, though I suppose one should have realized that that would be the case because of the terrific issues at stake in external affairs in a nuclear age. Certainly I have no doubt that Canadians today are very much concerned over the part their nation is going to play in world affairs and, in particular, over the part their nation will play in furthering co-operation among all the nations of the world.

I have also had understanding and encouragement from the representatives in Canada of other nations. Members of this house—and I include myself in that group—sometimes do not realize that we have here leading men from all over the world, men who have made a success in their own country and who have come here to represent their nations. Each and every one of them is a friend of Canada, and each and every one of them has a great contribution to bring to the public men of Canada with whom they come into contact.

There has not yet been time for me to have a long talk with each of the ambassadors and high commissioners, but I have been able to talk to quite a few and in every case I have learned a great deal and have been greatly helped as I approach the problems confronting a minister of foreign affairs in Canada. I hope that from time to time it will be possible to meet these representatives in other places, perhaps at the United Nations or at NATO conferences or in their own homelands, and I would suggest to members of this house that they should lose no opportunity to get acquainted with the ambassadors and high commissioners, and the staffs of the various missions in Ottawa, in order not only to show that we are friendly to other nations of the world but also to learn, as leaders of the Canadian people, more of what is being done and more of the aims and ideals of those nations which are so ably represented in Ottawa.

Also, Mr. Chairman, as I expected, I have received very great help from the officials of the Department of External Affairs. They have had the difficult task of beginning the education of a new minister. There have been many memoranda prepared. Perhaps most of them would not have been necessary if I had been doing my homework during the last 24 years.

Mr. Pearson: You were doing your home work.

Mr. Green: In any event, the relationship between us has been very happy, and here again I doubt whether many members of the house have a clear idea of just what these Canadians are doing for their country. Two days ago I attended the annual picnic of the Department of External Affairs, and yesterday I attended the annual picnic of the Department of Public Works. In fact I am getting to be quite good at picnics. But at that picnic the families and particularly the children of these men who have represented Canada in places all over the world gave me a much clearer picture of what they are doing. One little girl, seven or eight years of age, speaks four languages and I expect that before very long she will be learning a fifth.

Then there was a foot race on snowshoes for the heads of divisions; that is to say, for the men who are giving the leadership here in Ottawa in the Department of External Affairs. After seeing them in action I am convinced of their great vitality and vast speed, and I think the winner and the runner-up are very well qualified to be appointed ambassadors in Antarctica. These men and their families are great Canadians, probably more so from the fact that abroad, in these various countries, they have spoken for the people of Canada. I have the utmost confidence not only in the work they are doing now but in the work they will do in the years ahead.

In the external affairs debates I hope it will be possible to have frank discussion. The department would be very glad to have the suggestions and criticism of hon. members, provided there are not too many bricks in the criticism. There are a great many members of the House of Commons who are now well qualified to express opinions on external affairs. I think of those hon. members who have served on the standing committee on external affairs, which I believe is the topnotch committee of the commons. Many hon. members have been taking part in these committee meetings for a great many years and some have learned a great deal about external affairs. They are therefore in a position to make worth-while contributions in the debates in this house.

I think also of those hon. members who have participated in various conferences, for example, at the United Nations. Quite a large number of hon. members have taken part as delegates, alternates or observers, and there will be more going to New York in September. We plan to have observers, for example, from the two opposition parties in the usual way. There have been others taking part in NATO conferences. In fact, whenever I notice an empty desk in this chamber on the government side I wonder if the occupant who should be there is not in Paris, London, Ankara or somewhere else abroad attending a NATO conference.

I am sure these conferences are very enjoyable, but in addition to that they are beneficial to Canada and qualify the members who attend to give worth-while opinions here on the floor of the house. Just a week or two ago we had the interparliamentary conference attended by representatives from the United States congress and from our own parliament.

The hon. members who took part in that conference are also in a position to make a contribution here today, and I hope some will do so.

I would prefer to be able to speak today without notes or with very scanty notes. However—and I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will confirm my findings in this regard—this seems to be a heinous offence from the point of view of the officials of the department, and they are most insistent that one's remarks should be very carefully weighed and that extensive notes should be used. I must admit that I have lost out in this battle and appear here today with a few notes from which I propose to read. I hope hon. members will bear with me, because I know just as well as they do that it is extremely difficult to read remarks and keep people awake. Perhaps, however, we will be able to do a little better in that regard this morning.

The first subject I plan to discuss is the Geneva conference. I am aware, as you are, Mr. Chairman, that Canadians have been following with close attention the course of the foreign ministers' discussions in Geneva. As hon. members know, the foreign ministers' conference adjourned on June 20 and will resume its sittings next Monday, July 13. It is disappointing that no agreement was reached during the six weeks of negotiations, but at the same time one should not underrate the benefits of the discussions which took place. The attitudes of both sides have been clarified, and there are some common elements in the proposals advanced on the Berlin issue which might possibly lead to progress.

This has been a period of re-examination for the west, both with respect to the attitude to be adopted in further discussions and with respect to the question as to whether the present discussions might usefully lead to a summit meeting. The United Kingdom, the United States and France, as the western negotiating powers, together with the Federal Republic of Germany, are examining the records of the discussion and are consulting to determine how best to proceed in the hope of making some progress. In addition—and this is important to Canada—to participation in consultations with the negotiating powers which are taking place in the NATO council, in which consultations, of course, Canada is at all times represented, the Canadian government will shortly have the opportunity of discussing these matters with the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Christian Herter. As I announced in the house yesterday, Mr. Herter will be here on Saturday.

It is to be hoped that during the period of recess of the foreign ministers' conference the Soviet leaders will come to realize that nothing is to be gained by an attitude of challenge and impatience. If progress is to be made it will be necessary for the east-west talks to be conducted in an atmosphere free of implied threats or peremptory demands.

As hon. members are aware, the Canadian government has consistently supported proposals for negotiation with the Soviet union on the question of Berlin, and on other issues. Since in this thermonuclear age war is unthinkable, there is no alternative to negotiation for the solution of these problems. In our view negotiation implies a preparedness on both sides to do more than exchange views across the conference table. Each side must go some way to meet the basic interests of the other. If it is possible to arrive at some settlement on the Berlin question, the way should be opened for the solution of broader problems.

For these reasons we have watched with satisfaction the patient and determined efforts of the three western negotiating powers at Geneva to find some basis for reaching agreement. We commend the willingness shown by the western powers to make modifications concerning the terms of their presence in Berlin, which take account of expressed Soviet concerns. At the same time we support the principle, on which the western powers have been united, that no agreement would be acceptable which placed in jeopardy the security of Berlin or the freedom of its citizens, or which could have the effect of foreclosing the prospect of the reunification of Germany. Unfortunately, circumstances do not seem propitious for great or sudden progress on the basic problem of reunification. This should not, however, preclude us from attempting to create an atmosphere in which reunification can more easily be brought about.

Where the resumed foreign ministers' conference will lead us cannot now be predicted. The Canadian government has held to the view that progress toward settlement of some international issues might be achieved by discussions amongst heads of government, in other words at a summit conference. It is the hope of the Canadian government that such a meeting can be arranged. Then there may prove to be subjects other than those relating to Germany and Berlin—I mention the suspension of nuclear tests and the peaceful use of outer space as examples—on which progress could be made by high level discussions. At this stage, I think as few preconditions and prior stipulations as possible should be placed in the way of a summit meeting. For example, there have been signs of some difference of opinion on the question of who should participate in a summit conference, and there are indications of a trend to increase participation. In the judgment of the Canadian government this is not likely to be a helpful development.

The suicidal prospect of global war must be apparent to all nations, and the need of finding some alternative for the settlement of differences must recommend itself to all statesmen. For a middle power such as Canada, with brilliant prospects of development, the international tensions which keep alive the threat of a nuclear holocaust are in themselves especially significant. The speed with which our hopes and prospects can be realized, however, will depend to an important degree upon the international atmosphere. We must work, within the western alliance of which we are a member, toward a reduction of tension if we are to be free to devote a greater part of our national talents and energies to constructive Canadian development.

Through NATO Canada is able to work intimately with the United Kingdom, the United States and the 12 European member states in the formulation of policies and attitudes which are designed to facilitate progress toward a settlement of some of the highly complicated issues dividing east and west.

Today NATO takes stock of the past decade and the plans for the years ahead. Nothing that can be seen on the horizon suggests or permits the luxury of a slackening in the preparedness of free nations. The need for vigilance and unity is as imperative now as at any time during the past decade. It is imperative not only for reasons of our security but also in the context of our never-ending search through diplomacy for peaceful solutions to the problems dividing the world today.

The presence of Canadian forces alongside their friends from the United Kingdom, the United States and Europe is both an earnest of Canadian intentions and an important cause of the respect accorded Canada in the daily conduct of international affairs. I might mention, in connection with the stationing of Canadian forces in Germany, that the negotiations concerning supplementary arrangements governing their status in that country have recently been concluded, and that signature is expected to take place next month. I regret that as the house will, I hope, have risen by that time, it will not be possible to table the documents, but this will be done early in the next session of parliament.

Even though the initial emphasis in NATO was on military requirements, the members of the alliance have recognized the fundamental community of interests and aspirations shared by all parties to the treaty, and have fostered through the years the development of an Atlantic community of like-minded nations and peoples. Today, when the threat to the free world is not only military but economic, political and psychological, Canada is playing its part in stressing the need for consultations between member governments in the development of both the military and non-military aspects of the alliance. Support for NATO remains an essential cornerstone of Canada's foreign policy.

It is natural enough, Mr. Chairman, that with Her Majesty, by happy circumstance, in Canada when this debate takes place, the commonwealth and Canada's place in it should be foremost in our minds at this time. I recall with satisfaction the useful exchanges of views which have taken place here in Ottawa in recent months with a number of commonwealth leaders. In March we had the pleasure of welcoming the United Kingdom Prime Minister, Mr. Macmillan, and foreign secretary Selwyn Lloyd, and I would like to take this opportunity of paying tribute to the important part they have since played in preserving the unity of approach of the western powers in the difficult negotiations that have been carried on at Geneva. We have, in addition, had the privilege of welcoming here the Prime Minister of Australia and cabinet ministers or other distinguished representatives of India, the West Indies Federation, Pakistan and, only last month, Nigeria.

One has only to recite the far-flung territories from which these visitors came to be reminded of the vast compass of this friendly association of nations which continues to exercise a beneficent influence on the affairs of all mankind. It is an association, moreover, which is never static but constantly expanding and evolving as former dependent territories take their place in orderly progress as free and independent members of the commonwealth. As a member of the commonwealth we are justly proud of its record in facilitating the constitutional development of its members. For example, very recently we had the opportunity of welcoming a further step in this direction and yet another member, Singapore.

Similar developments are taking place today in another most important area of the world, Africa. In the welter of news reports about problems and stresses in various parts of that continent I am afraid there has been a tendency to overlook a significant and happy commonwealth event in Africa. I am referring, of course, to the fact that recently powers of self-government passed to the populous northern region of the federation of Nigeria, thus completing the internal political evolution which is to culminate on October 1, 1960, when the large and important nation of Nigeria is scheduled to obtain independence.

I am happy to say that both the Prime Minister of the federation and the premiers of the regions have expressed the intention to remain in the commonwealth. I am sure all hon. members will wish to join with me in expressing to the Nigerian leaders and to the United Kingdom government congratulations for their respective parts in this welcome event. The Canadian government hopes to be in a position to establish suitable diplomatic representation in Nigeria and to take similar action with respect to the federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland as soon as circumstances permit.

It will be appropriate, I think, if I should say a word or two here about the assistance which Canada has been giving in recent months to the less developed countries under the various programs which have been established for this purpose, especially since most of Canada's assistance has gone to our partners in the commonwealth family. I refer, of course, to the Colombo plan. If the commonwealth association is to continue to have the meaning it now has, it is important that the less developed countries of the commonwealth should continue to be able to count on the active sympathy and support of those of us who are in a more fortunate position.

Since my predecessor last reviewed the position we have been able to carry to a successful conclusion our discussions with Pakistan and Ceylon with respect to their share of the Colombo plan appropriation voted by parliament for the fiscal year 1958-59. As a result of these discussions we have now agreed that $13 million in the form of Canadian commodities and equipment will be made available to Pakistan and $2 million to Ceylon.

Under the Pakistan program we have agreed to provide a further $2 million worth of wheat in addition to the $2 million of which the house was informed last November. The amount of $2,800,000 will be devoted to the provision of industrial metals which are urgently required for the industrial sector of the economy to help maintain reasonable levels of industrial activity and employment. Some $650,000 will be made available in the form of wood pulp which is required for a new newsprint mill being constructed by a Canadian engineering firm. Then $120,000 will be provided for the purchase of pesticide spraying equipment and $200,000 for the purchase of three Beaver aircraft to help with the eradication of crop pests. The sum of $500,000 has been set aside to provide spare parts and to finance the cost of overhauling the equipment which has been used in the construction of the Warsak dam, and which will be turned over to the government of Pakistan as and when it ceases to be required on the project. An amount of $1,100,000 has been allocated to the construction of a transmission line from Karnaphuli to the port of Chittagong in east Pakistan. The balance of $3,630,000 available from the $13 million set aside for Pakistan is being allocated tentatively to two new projects, one in the construction field and the other aimed at creating additional electrical generating capacity in Pakistan.

Turning to the Canadian aid program in Ceylon, the government has approved an allocation of $710,000 to finance the continuation of the aerial photographic and resources survey which a Canadian firm has been carrying out in Ceylon under the Colombo plan. A second project, which has been tentatively selected, covers the construction of transmission lines in an area in the development of which Canada has already had an opportunity to participate.

We have also completed discussions with a number of non-commonwealth countries, notably Indonesia, Burma and Viet Nam, out of which has emerged a program that will absorb about $2 million of the Colombo plan appropriation voted by parliament for 1958-59, the last fiscal year. This program comprises the provision of Canadian foodstuffs, Canadian participation in a highway survey and a bridge building project in Burma and the supply of prospecting equipment to Burma and of three Otter aircraft to Indonesia to assist that country in the development of its widely scattered island economy.

We hope shortly to be able to commence discussions with our Colombo plan partners about the program to be financed out of our contribution for the present fiscal year, 1959-60, which as the house is aware will be increased from $35 million to $50 million. There are, however, two projects to which I might refer briefly today because they are projects of a regional nature which, because of their importance and the very substantial benefits that are likely to flow from them, have attracted wide interest and support from countries other than Canada.

The first of these is the Mekong river project, about whcih my colleague the Minister of Finance provided information to the house on March 12. I am glad to be able to say that the arrangements for Canadian participation in this project are moving ahead rapidly and that we expect the photographic surveying of the Mekong river basin, which as hon. members know affects several different nations, to get under way before the end of the year. In working out these arrangements we have had the benefit of the full and enthusiastic co-operation of the riparian states and the executive agent whom the United Nations has placed at their disposal to help with the administration of the project.

The second project about which I think the house would wish me to say something at this stage relates to the development of the Indus waters system. As the house is aware, the apportionment of the waters of the Indus system is one of the residual problems that has been left over from the partition of the Indian subcontinent in 1947. This problem has been a source of continuing difficulty between India and Pakistan, and efforts to solve it had proved to no avail. Some years ago, therefore, India and Pakistan agreed to refer this problem to the international bank to see whether the officials of the bank could devise a solution which would be at once economically feasible and politically acceptable to them.

As a result of the negotiations that have been conducted under the bank's auspices, the elements of a solution have now emerged in terms of an engineering program that would safeguard the interests of both countries. The bank has asked the governments of Canada, Australia, the United Kingdom and the United States whether they would be prepared to co-operate in the implementation of this program, which is expected to extend over a 10-year period. The Canadian government agreed in principle to participate in the program that has been drawn up by the bank, on the understanding that the funds required for this purpose would be provided as part of our increased Colombo plan contribution. I am confident that the house will endorse the government's view that it is in Canada's interest to help in the solution of a problem which has stood in the way of better relations between two of our commonwealth partners in Asia.

One final commonwealth development certainly deserves mention here. At the commonwealth trade and economic conference held in Montreal last year a commonwealth scholarship scheme was agreed to by the governments there represented. It was envisaged that in time there might be as many as 1,000 commonwealth students studying under the auspices of the scheme in commonwealth countries. At Montreal, Canada undertook to be responsible for one quarter of this total, or about 250 places at any one time. The cost of this commitment to Canada is estimated at about $1 million annually.

As I informed hon. members last week, detailed discussions about the implementation of the proposed scholarship scheme will take place at a commonwealth education conference to be held from July 15 to July 29 at Oxford; in other words, it starts next Wednesday. The purpose of this conference is to work out the scope and detailed arrangements of a commonwealth scholarship scheme. In addition, however, the conference will have a wider mandate:

> —to review existing arrangements for commonwealth co-operation in the field of education and to make recommendations for any improvement or expansion that may be possible, particularly in regard to the supply and training of teachers.

On July 3 I announced to the house the composition of the Canadian delegation to the commonwealth education conference. I indicated at the time that members of the delegation would be required to leave for the United Kingdom over the week end and that accordingly I foresaw some difficulty in adding representatives to the delegation at that stage. However, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam suggested that there should be a representative from a teachers' federation, and I am glad to tell the house today, as I have already been able to tell the hon. member, that through the good offices of the Canadian teachers' federation it has been possible to add Mr. G. A. Mosher to the delegation as a teachers' representative from the province of Nova Scotia.

Turning to our relations with our neighbour and good friend, the United States, I shall endeavour to confine my remarks to certain matters which are of current interest. Within the past two weeks a signal event occurred when the President of the United States joined with Her Majesty the Queen at the opening ceremonies of the St. Lawrence seaway. It was a happy occasion, and the importance of good relations between the two countries was underlined by the realization of what could be done to the advantage of both in co-operation. The personal and friendly relations which existed among Her Majesty, the President, the Prime Minister and the ministers of the two governments—and I might add the Leader of the Opposition and other very responsible citizens of Canada and the United States—were evident as together we took part in the opening ceremonies and other events of that day. It seemed to me that in many ways we were paralleling the experiences of numerous families, business firms, service clubs and other organizations in our friendly approach to matters of common concern.

A particular parallel is, of course, present in my mind. The opening of the St. Lawrence seaway was chosen as a convenient occasion for a meeting of the legislators of the two countries, to which I made some reference in opening my remarks. May I take this occasion to pay tribute to the members of the interparliamentary group who examined together many of the facets of the relations between the United States and Canada, and whose serious and constructive approach will, I am sure, be reflected in discussions of matters affecting the two countries as these are dealt with from time to time in our respective legislative bodies. A sound basis of understanding one another's points of view together with an objective attempt to determine what is the real national and international interest in each question will, I am sure, pay untold benefits.

The boundary water problems between the two nations are receiving urgent attention, especially that concerning the development of the waters of the Columbia river basin, a problem to which the international joint commission has been devoting active consideration for some years. In January of this year, 1959, the two governments requested that the commission should report specifically and quickly with respect to the principles which might be applied by governments to two matters; first, the calculation of the benefits accruing in the downstream country in consequence of the storage and regulated release of water in the upstream country; second, the allocation between the two countries of these benefits.

Although no formal report has so far been made to governments by the commission, the chairmen are keeping their respective governments informed of the course of their deliberations. As hon. members are aware, the commission does not maintain an independent staff. Accordingly the facilities and the personnel of government departments and agencies of the United States, Canada and also of the province of British Columbia have been placed at the disposal of the commissioners. I am confident that it will be possible for the commission to report soon recommending principles which will be acceptable to the governments concerned. Such principles, with respect to the determination and division of benefits, should reduce materially the period required for completion of an international agreement.

The immense volume and complexity of Canada-United States economic and commercial relations inevitably create many difficulties and problems. These receive a great deal of publicity which sometimes tends to obscure the fundamental fact that our mutual economic relations are on the whole extremely profitable and advantageous to both sides. This is the starting point from which we must examine the particular, and often very important, difficulties which turn up from time to time, such as questions arising from the operation of Canadian subsidiaries of United States companies and, related to this, the problems sometimes encountered in the attempted extraterritorial application of United States legislation and policy.

I have in mind such matters as United States anti-trust proceedings and the effect of United States commercial or strategic policy on Canadian subsidiary companies. We have also had problems in our various agricultural sales and disposal policies and in connection with restrictions or limitations by one country on imports from the other. Such problems are a continuing and natural consequence of our closely interlocked economies. They are not problems which are susceptible of any general or final solution, and genuine differences in our interests must be faced frankly; but I believe most of these problems can be met to the mutual satisfaction of the two countries if we continue to tackle them in a spirit of good will and friendly co-operation, always bearing in mind the great mutual gain arising from our commercial and economic dealings with each other.

I am particularly pleased to be able to say that in recent months there have been a number of very important developments or decisions in the United States which have favourably affected Canadian interests and have reflected a responsible and co-operative attitude in the United States toward relations with Canada and other friendly countries. I have in mind, for example, the modification of the United States oil import provisions, as they affected Canadian oil transported by land; the removal of obstacles to transit shipment of certain goods—including, I think, canned shrimp—and the favourable modification of "buy American" requirements on United States defence orders.

Another recent example which was of particular significance to Canada was a ruling of the office of civil and defence mobilization that imports of large hydroelectric turbines and other related electrical generating equipment would not endanger the national security. As a consequence of this ruling a Canadian company will share in a very substantial contract for turbines to be installed at the Big Bend dam on the Missouri river in South Dakota. These are all matters on which we have had direct and friendly discussions with the United States authorities, and the outcome indicates what can be achieved by this means.

Similarly, our defence relationships with the United States continue to be close. These relationships stem from an identity of interest in the face of the possibility which exists, by reason of technological advances in modern weaponry, of a devastating attack on our two countries. Neither country can defend itself effectively in the face of such a threat without the co-operation of the other. This collective approach to the problem of continental defence is but one segment of a much wider collectivity of effort through the NATO alliance.

The military planning of joint defence activities and the implementation of specific projects in this field are of primary concern to the Minister of National Defence, who reported fully to the house during last week's defence debate. I shall not, therefore, comment on these strictly military aspects of our defence co-operation with the United States. I would, however, like to speak briefly on the other important factors which influence that co-operation. Our identity of interest with the United States in the defence field does not preclude our differences of emphasis on policies designed to serve our common objective. It is for this reason that the Canadian government insists that we be consulted regularly and fully by the United States government on a wide range of developments throughout the world which might bring with them the possibility of armed conflict.

In our bilateral dealings on defence matters with the United States the Canadian government does not hesitate to assert the requirements of Canadian sovereignty. Canadians are convinced, I am certain, that the best physical protection of our sovereignty lies in co-operative continental defence arrangements. Canada must insist, however, that such co-operation shall not jeopardize the political and economic objectives of our own nation.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the minister, but I must inform him that his time has expired. Is it the pleasure of the committee that the minister be allowed to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Green: Once again, Mr. Chairman, may I express appreciation for the kindness of hon. members in giving me further time.

Most of us are inclined to overlook the fact that we have another great neighbouring state, the Soviet union. As has been mentioned on more than one occasion in this house, Canada has a special interest in its relations with the Soviet union. Together our northern boundaries account for the major part of the coast line of the Arctic ocean. We share a deep interest in problems of northern development, transportation and communication across a large land mass, the exploitation of basically similar timber, mineral, agricultural and other resources. As a consequence, each has much to gain from drawing upon the other's experience.

In recent years interchanges between our two countries, particularly in the scientific, cultural and technical fields, have increased in a limited but encouraging way. The appearance in Toronto and Montreal only a few weeks ago of the famed Bolshoi ballet is a pleasant manifestation of this development. Exchanges of delegations and information are continuing in a variety of other fields.

The developments which have been taking place in Canadian-Soviet relations are in large part a reflection of the Soviet union's emergence into more active participation in the affairs of the world community. It has been in only comparatively recent times that the Soviet union has begun to take an active part in many of the agencies of the United Nations, at world conferences in various fields of science and technology and in such international co-operative ventures as the international geophysical year. Canada has welcomed this evidence of the Soviet union's desire to take up some of the heavy obligations which fall to a great world power.

Turning to a more remote corner of the world, I should like to say something about Indochina, where Canadian civilian and military officers continue to serve on two of the three international commissions which were set up by the Geneva agreements in order to maintain those agreements. I shall begin with Laos where, the committee will recall, the international commission adjourned sine die in July, 1958, following the conclusion of political and military agreements between the Laotian government and the dissident Pathet Lao.

Since the beginning of this year, when it was reported that north Viet Namese troops had crossed into Laotian territory as a result of border disputes, the situation in Laos has attracted some degree of public attention. There have been more recent troubles in Laos caused by the refusal of two battalions of the ex-Pathet Lao—I am not sure of my pronunciation, Mr. Chairman —to accept terms for integration into the Laotian army, which was provided for by the military agreement reached between the Laotian government and the former Pathet Lao in November, 1957. One of the battalions later accepted integration. The other refused to do so and is now dispersed at the border of north Viet Nam. However, the situation has improved recently and the Laotian government issued a communiqué stating that this affair can now be regarded as closed.

The difficulties in Laos prompted numerous requests for reconvening the international commission for Laos, of which, as hon. members know, Canada is a member. The Canadian position, as stated by the right hon. Prime Minister in the house on May 8, is that Canada cannot agree to any commission action which would infringe upon Laotian sovereignty. The Laotian government is understood to be opposed to the reconvening of the commission, but has pledged itself to uphold the Geneva cease-fire agreement. We are in continuous touch with the Indian and United Kingdom governments on this question—India being another member of the commission, with Poland the third member—and we are watching Laotian developments closely.

As to Cambodia, it was stated in the house on July 25, 1958 that an adjournment formula similar to that used in Laos might be applied to the Cambodian commission. This has not proved possible, although efforts in this direction are continuing and the strength of the Cambodian commission has been reduced to a minimum.

In Viet Nam, the tension between south and north has not abated, unfortunately, and the Viet Nam commission—on which Canada is also represented, as she is on the Cambodian commission—continues to perform a valuable task in maintaining stability in the area. However, we hope that it might be possible to effect a reduction of the strength of the Viet Nam commission which would not impair its effectiveness.

I take this opportunity to pay tribute to the way in which India has fulfilled the difficult role of chairman of the three international commissions. Our work together in Indochina has been and will, I am sure, continue to be one of beneficial co-operation.

The policy of the Canadian government toward relations with communist China was examined at some length by the late Hon. Sidney Smith last February, and I do not intend to restate it here. Hon. members will find that statement commencing at page 1405 of this year's Hansard. The Peking authorities, however, do not make things any easier for us. Last year, for instance, when the Chinese question was being discussed in the United Nations, it had to be done against a background of communist attack on the nationalist-held islands of Quemoy and Matsu. More recently there has been the repression of Tibet, the attempt to tamper with its way of life, extinguish its religious values and destroy its autonomy. These actions are not conducive to the peaceful relations which we should like to have with the Chinese people. Let us hope that the situation in that respect will improve.

Finally, Mr. Chairman—last but by no means least—I have a few comments to make with regard to Canada and the United Nations. This is the season of the year at which foreign offices throughout the world begin to turn their attention to the annual general assembly of the United Nations. It is an opportune moment at which to give hon. members an account of some of the accomplishments of the agencies of that organization during the period since it last met in plenary session, and to give some thought to matters to which its attention will be devoted at the forthcoming fourteenth session.

First there is the matter of disarmament. Hon. members will be aware that during the past several months discussion of the substantive problems of disarmament has been limited to the negotiations at Geneva on the discontinuance of nuclear tests. These negotiations were begun among the United Kingdom, the United States and the Soviet union on October 31 last. The central problem separating the two sides became clear at quite an early stage. It concerns the procedures to be used for the dispatch of teams to make on-site inspections of unidentified events which could be suspected of being nuclear explosions. The United Kingdom and the United States position has been that inspection should be initiated automatically, on the basis of agreed technical criteria, by the administrator of the control system unless a contrary decision were taken by a two thirds majority of the control commission. The Soviet union has argued that such arrangements would enable the western powers to use the control machinery for purposes of espionage. The Soviet union therefore has demanded that the dispatch of inspection teams should require the concurrence of the three nuclear powers.

With a view to finding a way out of this deadlock Prime Minister Macmillan, during his visit to Moscow, suggested to Premier Khrushchev that each side should have the right to demand that an agreed annual quota of inspections be made which would not require votes in the control commission. Some weeks later the Soviet representative at Geneva introduced a proposal based upon this concept. I may say that the Canadian government considers that Prime Minister Macmillan's idea seems more likely than any other suggestion we have seen to provide the basis for a solution to this most difficult problem.

Following a short recess when the foreign ministers' meeting started, negotiations were resumed on June 8, and shortly thereafter the three representatives agreed to the formation of a working group of experts to study methods for detection of nuclear explosions carried out at high altitudes; that is, from thirty kilometres to fifty kilometres above the earth. The expert group met beginning June 22 and their report has just been received. I trust that its technical findings will facilitate political agreement.

Also during the past month the United States representative introduced papers relating to the problem of detecting underground nuclear tests. The Soviet representative has not as yet agreed to take these new data under consideration or to remit them to a group of experts.

While difficult problems remain to be resolved, it is encouraging to note that to date a total of 17 articles have been approved for a draft treaty on the discontinuance of nuclear tests. We are confident that with continued good will on both sides the conference will result in a workable agreement. Such agreement could hardly fail to give impetus to the renewal of negotiations on other aspects of disarmament.

In order to facilitate such other negotiations it would be desirable to reactivate the former subcommittee of the disarmament commission of which Canada was a member, or to provide in some other manner acceptable to the powers principally involved for a group of manageable size within the present 82-member disarmament commission. Hon. members will, of course, realize the difficulties involved in reaching any agreement in a commission composed of 82 members. I venture to express the hope that when the conference of foreign ministers of the four powers reconvenes next week it may give some consideration to the question of negotiating machinery within the United Nations.

And now a word about outer space. During May and June the United Nations ad hoc committee on the peaceful uses of outer space held a useful session. The committee was created at the last session of the general assembly in recognition, as the assembly resolution phrased it, of "the common interest of mankind in outer space", and "the common aim that outer space should be used for peaceful purposes only".

Canada was one of 18 members elected to the committee. Unfortunately the Soviet union, in order to demonstrate its disapproval of the composition of the committee, has refused to participate. In this policy it has been followed by Czechoslovakia and Poland. India and the United Arab Republic have also felt unable to attend the sessions of the committee. The Canadian representative expressed this country's hope that at some time in the not too distant future all these countries would feel able to co-operate.

The committee nevertheless proceeded with detailed studies in accordance with its terms of reference. Technical and legal committees were formed to draft components of the report eventually to be made to the general assembly and, as hon. members are no doubt aware, Canada provided the chairman of the technical committee, Dr. Donald Rose of the national research council. The final report of the committee was approved on June 25. In addition to a number of conclusions relating to specific matters, it suggests that the United Nations might establish a committee suitably composed to carry further the investigations which have been begun. I trust that the general assembly will agree that such action is appropriate and that in the future Soviet co-operation will be forthcoming.

Here I should say a few words on the United Nations and radiation. I have already indicated one reason for our concern that the negotiations on nuclear tests should be fruitful; it is that their success might provide a turning point in the armaments race. A further reason is that a definitive agreement would avoid any increase in whatever hazard may be involved in radioactive fall-out. Hon. members will recall that last year the United Nations scientific committee on the effects of atomic radiation produced a valuable report, based upon the data made available to it by governments. Because the methods of collecting data vary from country to country, and because not all governments have instituted programs for the collection, analysis and reporting of appropriate samples, the data available to the committee necessarily was not as comprehensive as it might have been. In the Canadian government's view it is desirable that support be given to the efforts of the committee to enlarge and improve these data.

The next subject to which I should like to refer is the stand-by force. A further issue which received considerable attention at the last session of the general assembly and which may be up for consideration again relates to the many and varied United Nations activities as a peace-keeping organization and the possibilities that these will in turn evolve into more permanent United Nations stand-by arrangements. Canada's strong support for efforts undertaken under United Nations auspices to secure peace and stability in troubled areas of the world is evidenced by Canadian contributions to, and active participation in, such bodies as the United Nations truce supervisory organization in Palestine, the United Nations military observers group in India and Pakistan, the United Nations emergency force, known as UNEF, and until its disbandment in November, 1958, the United Nations observer group in Lebanon.

UNEF represents the largest and most recent of these operations, and within its terms of reference has achieved notable success. I should like here to pay tribute to those young Canadians who have served in this UNEF force in the faraway deserts. They have been making a great contribution, and they have kept the name of Canada high. Naturally a good deal of attention has been given to the possibility of extending or transforming UNEF into a permanent United Nations police force. Last year's session of the United Nations general assembly requested the United Nations secretary general to study the experience of UNEF for any lessons which might be derived for future United Nations policy.

It is the Canadian government's view that experience has shown that United Nations requirements can involve a wide variety of types of service, designed to meet particular situations in particular areas, none of which may offer an exact precedent for a more permanent type of stand-by force. The Canadian government has emphasized the need for flexibility in our approach to breaches of the peace in view of the complexity and delicacy of the issues presented. During a recent press conference in New York, when the United Nations secretary general was asked whether he visualized a permanent United Nations force along the lines of UNEF, he replied in the negative and used the analogy of a tailor and his cloth in explanation of his position. Mr. Hammarskjöld said:

> We need really to cut the suit to the body . . . more carefully in these various cases of which UNEF is an example than any other cases which are of concern to the United Nations . . . We cannot afford or usefully have a wardrobe sufficiently rich and varied to be able to pick out just the right suit as the situation arises. It is much better to have the cloth and go into action as a good tailor quickly when the need arises.

It would no doubt be agreed that in a world which is far from perfect we should not be dissatisfied if progress is made by a series of small steps. Nevertheless, these various United Nations operations in the interests of restoring and maintaining peace have provided a very useful body of experience out of which it is hoped to evolve more comprehensive machinery for strengthening the forces of peace. I can assure you that all proposals to this end are given the most careful study by the Canadian government.

I would be remiss if I were to omit from this account of United Nations activities reference to a most admirable humanitarian project which members of the United Nations are undertaking this year as a common endeavour. Recently I informed the house of the opening of world refugee year, which formally began in Canada on June 28 with statements on radio and on television by the right hon. Prime Minister. I must say that I have been gratified by the extent of public response to the statement I made at that time, and in particular by the numerous newspaper editorials which have expressed approval of the fact that the government plans to admit a number of tubercular refugee cases into Canada and provide for their treatment.

Arrangements for such a scheme are now under discussion. I am sure the warm hearts of the Canadian people from coast to coast will see that support is given to this plan and any other plans of a similar nature. Not only is the government interested, but there is also a Canadian committee for world refugee year which has already been doing excellent work. World refugee year began as an idea put forward by a group of private British citizens. Since then it has been given international approval by the general assembly as a means of facilitating its own task of permanently solving refugee problems. The government has been participating actively in United Nations refugee programs, and we shall continue to do so.

I have already occupied the time of hon. members too long with this statement, especially when it is my earnest hope that spontaneous and frank discussions on international problems will increasingly become the rule in this house. I really should have been setting an example in that regard this morning. I might mention before I close that I felt free to devote my attention entirely to international affairs rather than to details of the estimates in view of the thorough scrutiny given to the estimates of the department by the standing committee on external affairs earlier in the year.

Once again I invite hon. members to make their suggestions with regard to Canada's foreign policy and I am sure the result will be very beneficial not only to the government but also to parliament and the nation as a whole. My own belief is that Canadian foreign policy should be one that will reflect at all times the common sense and the courage, and above all the character, of the Canadian people. It will be my aim as Secretary of State for External Affairs to do everything I can to see that Canadian foreign policy will fit that pattern, and I am sure that in this task I shall have great help from all hon. members.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I wish to assure the Secretary of State for External Affairs at once in answer to his last observation that he will have at all times the co-operation and continuing interest of those of us sitting in this section of the committee with regard to a matter which, as he said at the outset of his remarks, involves questions that are of the greatest concern not only to the people of Canada but to the people of the world.

The minister will not now need to be convinced of the good will which attends his initial statement and the demonstration of that good will that attended the announcement of his appointment by the Prime Minister. The Secretary of State for External Affairs of this country and indeed the foreign minister of any country in the world today occupies certainly one of the most important assignments in government administration. At a time when not only the peace of the world is involved but possibly the preservation of civilization itself, there can be no other assessment made of the responsibility extended to the person charged with the formulation of foreign policy. So the minister may be assured that in a matter of this sort, where fortunately the area of controversy is much more limited than in domestic questions, he will receive from us in full measure co-operation, understanding and collaboration, consistent only with our right of judgment and criticism.

I do not know if it is intended in the course of these estimates for the Prime Minister to give an account of the important exchanges that he had with heads of government and foreign ministers on his tour of Europe and Asia last fall. We had been assured by the Prime Minister that at some juncture in our deliberations this would be done, but we do appreciate the circumstances that have attended the minister's initial statement on foreign affairs in this committee. He asked us for frank discussion and he has extended that invitation with a modesty of his own position in this matter which I may say to him was attractive and only makes one feel all the more kindly disposed toward the minister himself. In a sense he has disarmed us, but because he cautioned us at the end that it was desirable that we should have frank discussions I know he would expect that we would accede at once to this invitation.

I want to suggest to the minister that so important is the portfolio that he occupies that the country and this house will expect —and I know he himself wishes it—the minister to be free of all responsibilities which in any way preclude his giving the fullest time possible to the problems which confront the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Canada at this time. Important as the leadership of the house, the administration of the Department of Public Works and his deputizing for the Prime Minister may be, I am sure the minister will recognize the desirability of his being in a position to devote his full time to the administration of this department and to the consideration of the very grave problems that concern Canada and other nations in the world at this time.

There was a story in a Canadian newspaper the other day which disturbed me. I do not believe for one moment that the minister would in any way subscribe to this story; in fact I may say unhesitatingly that I know he would not. This story appeared in the Sudbury Daily Star of June 18, written by the the special correspondent in the Ottawa bureau of the Sudbury Daily Star. In this article is attributed to the Prime Minister an opinion expressed in the following language:

> It has been his opinion—and he has made no secret of it—that in external affairs they didn't, as he put it, "do enough to keep themselves warm."
> He found he could handle the job on the side atop all his other responsibilities as Prime Minister, head of the government and leader of his party.
> And his appointment of Howard Green was made in the nature of arranging for the introduction of a little hard-headed common sense and above all, economy, in the operation of the department.

If there are occasions for economy, of course, they will be warmly supported by those sitting in the opposition, but the suggestion that this particular assignment to external affairs can be performed on top of other heavy obligations, including the task of directing the affairs of the government of Canada, is one with which I must express full disagreement. I am sure the minister in the light of his experience to date will fully concur with me.

This is a department in which the Canadian point of view is desirable as a contributing factor in the easing of international tensions, for the taking of important initiatives which might greatly contribute, as they have done in the past, to the solution of problems which are certainly first in our consideration and on which the resolution of all our domestic problems depends. The Secretary of State for External Affairs must be so disengaged from other responsibilities as to spend all his available working hours in the consideration of the important matters which affect our country and the peace of the world.

It is because I have noticed other indications of this estimate of the work of the Department of External Affairs and the place of foreign policy in a country like Canada that I venture to linger even a little longer on the point I am seeking to make. I have before me a copy of the London Times of June 26, 1959 in which, among other things, this is written, talking about the Canadian scene:

> The greatest of the difficulties confronting the new administration has been in the conduct of external affairs. It was no light responsibility for an untried man to take on the work of statesmen of the international reputation of Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Lester Pearson. It was a heavy blow therefore when the Prime Minister's first choice, Mr. Smith, died in March. The Prime Minister's choice has fallen on one of his closest political friends, Mr. Howard Green. It is widely believed in Canada that his appointment means that the final control of external policy will continue to be vested mainly in the Prime Minister, and that that control has hitherto been procrastinating and indecisive.

I have for the Secretary of State for External Affairs the greatest respect. I believe that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as he now begins his important functions will, if allowed to, make a contribution that will be in the tradition of his great predecessors. It is because of my earnest desire that this be the case that I feel that at the outset of what I have to say I should mention these things that are being talked about in the corridors, and sometimes being written about in the newspapers, of which I have already given some indication, and urge the minister at this, in the initial proceeding almost of his ministry, to take into account what could flow from the strength of his personality and his well-known talents, complimented by his industry, devotion, and integrity, second to no other man in this house.

Now, we will all readily agree that in these days when world peace is still but an earnest desire and hope, when we realize that in spite of all the efforts made to achieve peace there still exists in Europe, in the Middle East and in Asia the potential spark of a final world war, our foreign policy and the work of the Department of External Affairs must continue to play an important part in the administration of government.

Perhaps the Department of External Affairs more than any other department of government must be centred around the minister in charge of our foreign policy. All the divisions of the department working as a team must channel to the Secretary of State for External Affairs the information for him to study, to analyse, to weigh and to judge world political trends. Only then is he in the best position to recommend to his cabinet colleagues possible solutions to international problems of concern to our country.

But in order to be able to act efficiently in this exacting task his hands must not be tied by parliamentary obligations and duties that could be handed over to others, other than those, of course, that arise from his own department and understandingly his own constituency obligations as a member of parliament. He must be relatively free, of course within the limits of government policy, always sensitive to public opinion and desire, and given the necessary authority to speak on behalf of the government. He must be made to feel that the government has the fullest confidence in his ability, as I want clearly to indicate that I have; not only confidence in his ability but in his judgment, in his wisdom and that his role is not to be merely that of a messenger boy, something which I know the minister would find extremely distasteful.

It is only under those conditions, as I see it, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs can effectively discharge the difficult and delicate task which the Prime Minister has assigned to him. I believe that the present incumbent, my hon. friend, has these necessary qualities which I believe are required of a good secretary of state for external affairs.

Sir Robert Borden and Mr. Mackenzie King, in the tradition of their predecessors, made important contributions in the development of Canadian foreign policy at a time when great changes were being made in Canadian constitutional development. Mr. St. Laurent, as Canada's first full-time secretary of state for external affairs, left an imprint that flowed in part from his alertness and capacity to seize the initiative in needed and worthy situations; and he will long be remembered, of course, for his early suggestions which led to the creation of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

All of us in this house and all of our fellow Canadians are only too well aware of the tremendous contribution made by the present Leader of the Opposition in the field of international relations. His contributions, I can say as one who was closely associated with him in much of this work, reflected the freedom, always subject to government policy, which was given to him in his operations, in his consultations with commonwealth governments, with members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and particularly at the United Nations.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, before the adjournment I had mentioned the initiative taken by the present Leader of the Opposition in international affairs. I am sure that his participation in those important events revealed that the boldness and the constructive quality of those initiatives, for which he continues to receive the gratitude of his fellow countrymen and the statesmen and peoples of the world, were the consequence of the freedom of operation accorded him by the prime minister of the day, Mr. St. Laurent; a freedom, of course, that was, as I noted earlier, always subject to the limitations and the requisitions of government policy.

To the present Secretary of State for External Affairs it seems to me that at this critical time in the history of the world there is given an important, delicate and difficult task. It is one, however, not without great opportunity, and that he will want to seize it I have no doubt. He no less than his predecessors is given the opportunity of bringing into play the force of his personality, his qualities of initiative and ingenuity. The absence in his case of undue interference and his freedom from domination could yield, I believe, constructive results in the development of constructive attitudes in Canadian foreign policy. By this I do not mean that he will not want to confer with his colleagues, that he will not want to have a special relationship, understandably, with the Queen's first minister. This goes without saying. But the very nature of diplomatic conversations and negotiations at NATO, in commonwealth matters and at the United Nations in particular demand a freedom of operation within the limits I have described.

My hon. friend takes over these heavy responsibilities at a time when, rightly or wrongly, many feel that the prestige of this country in the field of international diplomacy is not as great as it was two years ago. Whether or not that is the case, one can refer to many expressions of opinion in the newspapers and elsewhere to this effect. I shall refer only to one. I have before me the issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail of Saturday, June 27, containing an article written by its United Kingdom correspondent, Mr. George Bain, commenting on an editorial in the New York Times to which I have already made reference. The heading of the article, which appears on the first page, is "Canadian Influence Diminishing". The minister will, I know, wish to recover any loss of prestige if that is the case. He will want to make sure that the Canadian government is so constituted at present that it will be able to maintain the high level of contribution made by preceding administrations and particularly during the last decade.

I have, of course, had only a relatively minor role and experience in the conduct of international affairs, certainly not even second to that of my leader. But my experience as a member of the house, as one who attended the league of nations and who has been at many assemblies of the United Nations, is that in the United Nations Canada is afforded a very special opportunity of making useful and constructive suggestions and offering desirable solutions to many complicated problems; and not only in the United Nations but in the commonwealth and at NATO as we well know.

But because we enjoy a reputation for objective assessment in foreign affairs, because we have been looked upon by so many of the smaller powers as well as by most of the big powers as a country with an excellent permanent foreign service, and because we have less occasion for personal aggrandizement than almost any other nation, we have been given a special opportunity sometimes to act as an intermediary taking initiatives that have led to satisfactory solutions in many matters of the greatest import.

I am going to suggest to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in the light of my limited experience, that one of the things I hope he will be able to do at the outset is not only head the Canadian delegation at the next assembly of the United Nations, but spend as much time at the assembly as possible. I hope there will be no occasion for him to return to Canada simply because of the absence of the Prime Minister or of some other member of the government.

Mr. Pallett: Do you want to get him out of the house?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I believe that if the former secretary of state for external affairs, now Leader of the Opposition, was able to play such a significant role as leader of the Canadian delegation on so many occasions, it was because he had become known as a great personality at the United Nations; and when the occasion was offered for a special participation by Canada it was possible to entrust to him responsibilities which might not have been entrusted by other nations if he had not been known so well and if his country had not enjoyed, in this particular area of action, such a high reputation.

Canada at the United Nations is, of course, freer than countries like the United States and Great Britain. Even though we have the closest ties with these two nations, we do not have their other responsibilities, in the one case because of colonial possessions and colonial interests, and in the other case because of the pre-eminent place that the United States, because of her strength, occupies at this critical time in the history of the world. This very freedom gives us a unique opportunity to make the United Nations a more effective instrument, and to use that body for the discussion of problems the full settlement of which sometimes ultimately resides elsewhere.

I hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs will make the United Nations one of his main theatres of activity and use the general assembly, particularly at a time when Canada is a member of the security council and when her responsibilities are even greater than they normally would be. There will be opportunities for Canada to play the role she has played in the past in the evolution of the commonwealth.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs will more and more realize, as I am sure he realizes now, the place the Asian members take in the commonwealth. The important contributions which have been made by Mr. St. Laurent and the present Leader of the Opposition in helping maintain the unity of the commonwealth with the special understanding which they acquired of the problems, purposes and objectives of the Asian commonwealth members must stand as one of the notable contributions during the past decade.

We have taken from time to time through our permanent delegations and our permanent officials, as well as officials at the ministerial level, particularly in the case of the former secretary of state for external affairs, initiatives which have undoubtedly greatly affected the course of events during the past decade. One could mention the circumstances attending the setting up of Israel as a sovereign state under the United Nations, and the part played by Canada in the Korean discussions which led, first of all, to the setting up of the commission on the reconstruction and rehabilitation of Korea, and second the part we played in the terms of armistice which still prevail in that troubled sector.

I suggest further that the contribution made by Canada in connection with the economic and political aspects of NATO gives demonstration of the part smaller and middle powers can play. Mr. Dag Hammarskjold, the secretary general of the United Nations, said prior to his visit to Moscow about two months ago that his experience as secretary general had led him to the conclusion that the contribution made by a member state of that organization was not determined by its position in terms of power, military or financial. He thought a small nation, given proper dedication and wise policy, could play a notable and worthy part in the United Nations. I have a suspicion that when he made that observation he may have been thinking of a country like Canada.

In an earlier debate this session I suggested to my hon. friend's predecessor, before his regrettable death, that there was one area in which I thought Canada could play a useful role, at least of assessment and report. I refer to the Middle East. I acknowledge with satisfaction the setting up of a further mission in the Middle East, the raising of one of our missions to the status of an embassy, and the appointment of a new ambassador to the United Arab Republic. But it seemed to me then, and it seems to me now, that in the face of the developments which have taken place in the Middle East useful consideration could be given by the government to the establishment of a diplomatic mission in Iraq, where British and United States influence is at the present time not what we would like it to be, and where it is certainly not as strong as it was formerly.

I believe if we had a diplomatic mission in Iraq, through a personality capable of assessing developments there, we could make a useful contribution towards greater tranquillity in that turbulent area. It might even be that that kind of venture, associated with our other diplomatic efforts in the Middle East, complementary to the work being carried on particularly by the secretary general, would enable us once again, notwithstanding what are currently great controversies, between Israel and the United Arab Republic, to do what we did in 1952. Then along with some other countries at the United Nations, we took the initiative and called upon the disputants, the United Arab Republic, then Egypt, and Israel to resume discussions pursuant to security council decisions previously arrived at.

In any event, I am sure that if the minister takes advantage of the general assembly to make himself known and to get to know other personalities well, he will find that theatre of activity will give him a special opportunity of playing an increasingly useful role in the discharge of the functions which have now come to him.

I was reading the other day the evaluation of Canada's position among the nations of the world by Donald C. Masters, who, writing of the 1953-55 Canadian diplomatic period, said:

> In evaluating Canada's part in world affairs one must always bear in mind the limited role which circumstances force upon us. Owing to limitations in power Canada cannot be an originator of basic policies in the same sense as are the great powers. Our role has frequently been to act as the executor of basic policies worked out by the great powers as in the cases of Korea, Indo-China and the Paris pacts of 1954 in regard to Germany and NATO. As an executor of predetermined policies Canada has a good record.

I think that, on the whole, is a fair statement of our position. It is a statement that recognizes that while there are limitations in the formulation of basic policy, there are no limitations in the way those policies, notwithstanding their authorship, are carried out in the interests of the preservation of world peace.

One of those problems now confronts us. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has told us that we are to have in Canada a visit from Mr. Herter, the Secretary of State of the United States. The minister did not expand at length this morning on the position Canada takes with regard to that matter. I assume from what he did say that the position continues to be, in principle, what his predecessor had already indicated in this house was the policy of the government. In any event, it seems to me that we have, with regard to the German and the Berlin problem, not only an opportunity but a responsibility to make our point of view known. While we are not participants in the four power meeting of foreign ministers, we are not denied the opportunity—and certainly this impending visit confirms this statement—of placing our point of view before those who will be more directly concerned.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Green: Go ahead.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the committee give unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin: I thank the committee for giving me the opportunity of making a few further observations.

This situation in Berlin, which is the immediate problem confronting the nations of the world, is characteristic of the times in which we live. No sooner had the trouble in the Middle East been dampened last year than this was followed by fires in the Far East. Then when the conflagration in the Formosa straits was dying out the problem of Berlin and Germany arose.

This, of course, is the pattern of our times. Soviet union dexterity brings us from one crisis to another in rapid fire succession. However, we have an interest in this problem altogether apart from the fact that, as a nation among the nations of the world, we are interested in the preservation of good relations among states.

[Mr Martin (Essex East).]

Our interest in the Berlin situation has not only this wide political interest. It has as well a juridical or legal basis. First of all, we will all recall that it was in November last that the premier of the Soviet union indicated that the time had come for the western powers to leave Berlin; and on November 27 last he proposed the western withdrawal from West Berlin and the creation of a demilitarized free city. It will also be recalled that he had indicated that a settlement must be reached by May 27. That position was later modified, perhaps as a result of the intervention of Mr. Macmillan who, we all agree, took a wise course in going to Moscow, as he did, in order to make a fact-finding assessment of the Russian position.

But I say that our interest in this problem has a juridical basis as well as arising out of our existence as a sovereign state. It will be recalled that the three powers met in London on October 2, 1954, when they conferred to lay plans for the termination of the occupation of the Federal Republic of Germany and for the incorporation of that state into NATO. It was at this conference that they made this declaration:

> The security and welfare of Berlin and the maintenance of the position of the three powers there are regarded by the three powers as essential elements to the peace of the free world in the present international situation. Accordingly, they will maintain armed forces within the territory of Berlin as long as their responsibilities require it. They therefore reaffirm that they will treat any attack against Berlin from any quarter as an attack upon their forces and themselves.

Canada along with other NATO powers on October 23, 1954 associated itself with this declaration. That Canada as well as the United States and other NATO powers have a stake in the problem of Germany and Berlin flows from this association with this declaration, and also from the obligation incurred under article 6 of the North Atlantic treaty under which an armed attack on the occupation forces in Europe of any party to the treaty constitutes an attack on all parties.

As I indicated a while ago, we approved the decision of the British Prime Minister to go to Moscow, and in so doing I take it that we wanted to assert that initiative of that kind could not be looked upon as an appeasing act. It was doing something which British leaders have done from the time of William Pitt when they have sought to deal with hostile foreign powers. This visit of Mr. Macmillan and further interventions of this sort need not be regarded as appeasement. They mean no more than what they have meant in the past. Certainly this visit on the part of the British Prime Minister did not mean that the United Kingdom likes Mr. Khrushchev's communist imperialism any more than Englishmen liked Napoleon Bonaparte's revolutionary imperialism. I believe that association or intercourse with those who do not share our ideological objectives is all to the good, and that it is only by conference leading ultimately to adjudication and, let us hope, even conciliation that we can find, in the absence of war, a solution to these vital issues which affect us more than anything else either on the international or the domestic front.

We must not overlook the dangers in the situation. It must not be forgotten that Mr. Khrushchev in his note—I think some time in the month of February—to this government said that any attempt by the western powers to maintain access to West Berlin by force will be opposed by force and will lead to war. These statements must be assessed in the full context of the situation that confront us and in which they have been made. But I think all of us in this chamber will support the attitude taken by the government, certainly in the statement made by my hon. friend's predecessor, that we believe that negotiation even in this extremely difficult matter can lead to settlement.

I for one welcomed the statement made by the Minister of National Defence, when, speaking at the anniversary meeting of NATO, he indicated a possible ultimate role in this situation for the United Nations. This suggestion of a potential role for the United Nations had been referred to in this house in an earlier speech by my leader. It had been referred to, as my hon. friend will recall, much earlier by Mr. Khrushchev and by Mr. Macmillan. The Minister of National Defence, if I properly read his words as delivered in Washington, had suggested a method by which the United Nations might provide a framework for any four power agreement on Berlin. He saw that the basic role of the United Nations might be to verify that all parties were abiding by the terms of the agreement, the essential part of which would be a Soviet pledge by binding itself and its associates to permit full freedom of access to West Berlin and the acceptance of the United Nations presence on the lines of communication.

There are good precedents for the suggestion made by Canada, a suggestion that I hope will be followed up by the Canadian government if whatever kind of settlement is reached lends itself to such further persistency of suggestion. As I say, there are precedents for the use of the United Nations in this kind of role. There is, of course, no complete parallel between many other instrumentalities of the United Nations in this particular situation, but there are similar features of principle that I think serve as a precedent.

The para-military body, the United Nations emergency force with which the Leader of the Opposition, to the everlasting gratitude of the people of the world, had so much to do, is in itself in principle an indication at least of the potential role which in a situation such as that in West Berlin the United Nations might ultimately play. The work of the United Nations observation group in Lebanon is another example of the use of the United Nations in matters that have to do with conflicts either between groups within the same nation or between one nation and another. Certainly the work of the international supervisory organization under General Van Horne operating between Jordan, the United Arab Republic and Israel is an indication of the growing awareness of the usefulness of the United Nations in these situations. Perhaps the most effective and the closest parallel, however, was the formula devised by the secretary general of the United Nations last year when he suggested the idea of a United Nations presence located in the capital of Jordan, as a means to maintain tranquility, which has lasted even longer than its most ardent sponsors at the time thought possible.

So I trust the Canadian government in its studies of the Berlin situation and in the recommendations it will make during the discussions it will have with the Secretary of State of the United States will bear in mind the successful previous usages of the United Nations instrumentality, and will seek to impress upon freedom-loving nations the desirability of noting that in the charter of the United Nations are to be found many of the methods by which some solutions can be made easier and more lasting. I hope that in the matter of Berlin, Canada is using her best offices to make her concern felt and to indicate the result of her consideration as to ways and means by which solutions can be found which will lead to an easing of international tensions and not add to the turbulence which prevails in the world at the present time.

The hon. gentleman covered a wide area, and I naturally do not propose to attempt to do the same, except to say that he will find in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization the same opportunity for constructive statesmanship as I believe he will find at the United Nations. Canada has, of course, the greatest interest in this organization. It was one of our former prime ministers who first in the United Nations gave expression, in 1947, to the desirability of a defensive alliance of freedom-loving states within the terms of article 51 of the United Nations charter. It was a Canadian government backed by public opinion in Canada that caused demands to be made to expand the purposes and the functions of this organization.

But the hon. gentleman will perhaps want to remember carefully the words which were uttered by the Leader of the Opposition when he spoke on April 14, 1959 taking as his subject "Ten years of NATO", and concluded what he had to say with these words:

> The Atlantic nations are now facing a supreme test of their capacity to unite. If they fail in this, they may find it difficult to prosper and even survive as free nations. This test is the inescapable result of the tragic experiences of the recent past. Success in meeting it is made the more essential by the awful necessities of a thermonuclear future. Can we combine our national strengths, merge our national policies, and submerge our national prejudices to meet this test? If we cannot—or do not—then far more than NATO may be lost in the next ten years.

He was thinking not only of the failure to live up to the terms of article 2; he was thinking not only of the fact that the studies of three foreign ministers in the NATO group had not been implemented. He was thinking too of the stresses and strains that are being placed on this defensive alliance by the unfolding events of our time. Canada is not only a member of NATO; she is a member of that important triangular group of western nations which includes the United States and Great Britain. She is also a member of the commonwealth and as well, a member of the United Nations; and while she will wish in the interests of her own security to preserve the unity of NATO and to preserve the unity of this group of three nations, she will want at the same time to make a contribution to a wider unity, the unity of the world; and the opportunity for doing that will arise at the United Nations.

Not only is our external policy reflected in policy itself, but it is reflected in the permanent personnel of the Department of External Affairs. We can accept the judgment of those outside this country who speak of our public servants in this department in the highest praise. It is, of course, necessary to do everything possible to maintain the morale of those who are employed in this department and, of course, the organization within the department is a matter which the minister may want to look into carefully from time to time. He may want to examine, for example, whether or not the process of rotation of personnel is too rapid, particularly in the light of the loss of certain personnel in recent months. He may want to examine whether or not this acceleration in the process of rotation has resulted in giving to personalities involved less opportunity for acquiring specialized knowledge in certain divisions of the department than they would otherwise have had.

I simply ask the minister to give consideration as to whether or not recent developments do not suggest that quicker rotation of personnel in the department may have resulted in less opportunity for the acquisition of specialized knowledge in certain divisions than we should like to see for instance in the trade division, the Middle East division, the United States-Canada division and, I should think too, the legal division. In any event the minister will find many things to do as he now takes on, free from other obligations, these responsibilities as the spokesman and chief formulator of government foreign policy.

The minister may be convinced, as I said at the beginning, of one thing. He will have the good will of every member of this house, as he has the good will, I am sure, of the great majority of the people of Canada. In this field of international affairs our differences are limited. This does not mean to say that there will not be occasions when we shall find it necessary to take strong issue with him; but as the Prime Minister indicated in his speech before the general assembly in September of 1957, the basic lines of Canadian foreign policy are observed by this as by previous governments.

We are living at a very difficult time. We have not the answer to many of the problems which confront us. We want to see our society remain free; we want to see the democratic way of life persist. We have to take into account the exigencies and the problems which confront us. We have a responsibility, regardless of power and position, to play a full and continuing role in the solution of the great issues which divide mankind.

There is a Canadian point of view. That point of view has been ably and vigorously expressed in the past. The minister's success in this portfolio will depend on his seizing the opportunity that is now his in the face of difficult situations, putting forward the considered judgment of the government of which he is a member, in the hope that an objective approach in these matters will be capable of preserving existing desirable unities and at the same time laying the foundations for a world that will be ruled by law and not by brute force.

In this connection the minister, I hope, will give consideration to what may be done about making the international court of justice a more effective instrument than I believe it is at the present time. In my judgment it is not the effective instrument it was intended to be. It is certainly not as strong as the international court of justice created under the covenant. The United States now has taken an initiative in this matter. The vice president of the United States, and the President have said that the government of the United States is prepared to give consideration to the elimination of the optional clause and to recognizing the compulsory jurisdiction of the court. I would think that Canada, in spite of the difficulties arising because of the constitution of the court and because of the difficulties involved in matters of domestic jurisdiction under article 2(7) of the charter of the United Nations could, like the United States, give a lead in this matter.

The peace of the world is the most important consideration before all of us. That being the case the policy of the government of Canada in its relations with other states is the most important of any of the responsibilities of government. It is because of the tremendous responsibility involved that I sincerely trust that the minister will understand the spirit in which I have expressed some criticism and given some indication of my confidence that he approaches his task only with the desire to continue seeing to it that Canada makes worthy contributions to the preservation of peace.

Our contributions are not made for the purpose of increasing our prestige, but prestige and worthy contributions can go side by side. The result will be enhancement for this nation as well as the realization of a contribution made toward the solution of the great problem of our time, the preservation of peace among the nations.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I listened this morning very attentively to the comprehensive speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I intend to comment upon it later at various points in my remarks. I must explain, however, that I am going to do something this afternoon that I very much dislike doing, and that is rely on extensive notes. The reason I do this is that I want to have the opportunity in the time permitted me to deal with a number of subjects in this very important and wide field, and at the same time present the policy of this group on several aspects of external affairs.

The minister has assumed office, as was stated by the previous speaker, with the good will and best wishes of all hon. members of this committee, at a most critical and interesting time in international and Canadian affairs. I say that because we are on a balanced wheel where so little could mean so much in either direction. I would term this the period of the hush before the dawn or, if we fail to act with common sense, before the gloom.

Let me assure the minister before I proceed with my remarks that in this debate and on this question we seek no party advantage in this group but advance our policies, ideas, suggestions and opinions as a contribution to the common pool of our thought in an effort to do our part in establishing and maintaining world peace and stability.

I was very interested to note that the minister observed that Canadians are interested in foreign affairs and in the part that Canada will play toward developing world co-operation, or words to that effect. How true. I think Canadians generally are becoming more and more interested in foreign affairs because of their realization of the vital importance of the decisions that have to be made in certain fields in the near future by the major nations.

I noticed that shortly after that the minister invited suggestions and opinions. I was pleased to hear him do that, because as I said previously the minister enters office with the good will and best wishes of all hon. members of this committee. But as the hon. member who has just taken his seat said, when speaking for the official opposition—I always have to be so careful when I deal with them. You know, they are a little jealous of this little group at this end; they want to re-emphasize their importance. But I think I got it right that time. We will no doubt differ with respect to policies put forward in certain fields, but whether we agree or differ we are giving our honest opinions and putting forward honest suggestions and ideas as the result of thought on both sides of the committee, to the end that we seek a common objective and common goal.

During recent months Canada in our opinion has lost some of its former and close contacts in the field of international affairs, and unfortunately, to some extent, because of the death of the minister's predecessor which we all regret. We all miss him at this time. But this lapse in having an active secretary of state for external affairs has caused some loss of contact with the United Nations and with other capitals of the world. This will give the minister a somewhat strenuous time in the months ahead in his attempts to overcome the handicap in this regard under which he starts his new duties.

In supporting that point of view I want to quote an editorial from the Globe and Mail of Thursday, May 14, 1959 entitled "Defence and Sovereignty" to indicate the need for Canada to speak with a stronger voice and resume its former close contacts with the United Nations and with various countries and capitals of the world. This is what this editorial has to say:

> Today, as never before, the world's eyes are upon Canada. In part, this is because of her progress and prosperity; in part, because of the reputation she has gained as a free and fair-minded middle power, respected by most nations, feared by none.

I want to pause at this stage to pay a tribute to the present Leader of the Opposition, who was for a long time secretary of state for external affairs. There is no question but that hon. gentleman made a great contribution toward the maintenance of world peace and recognition of Canada's status abroad. I continue:

> From this, Canadians may take satisfaction. But there is another, more subtle reason why the world watches Canada; it judges us in order to judge the United States.
> The world sees Canada working very closely with the United States. It measures the integrity of the United States by the extent to which Canada, in this situation, retains her own integrity. Assuming the United States wishes to keep and strengthen its position as leader of the western nations, it must govern its relationship with Canada so that Canada not only is, but gives every evidence of being, independent.
> This is essential to Canada's world status, as well. If we wish to keep and strengthen our own unique position among the nations, we must constantly demonstrate our political sovereignty, our economic sovereignty—

This is the task that faces the new minister at the present time. This has been the spearhead, as it were, of this most important department for some months.

Then the Globe and Mail again, of Saturday, May 16 of this year:

> It is just as essential to Ottawa's international status as it is to Washington's that Canada should not only be, but in all matters should appear to be, fully autonomous. To become a much respected middle power, this country had to gain its independence from Britain. To stay a much respected middle power, we must regain our independence from the United States.

This is an editorial in a paper that generally supports the party in power.

In our opinion the minister will require to spend considerable time at the United Nations, in the various capitals of the world and in other places in order to restore the personal contact which is so important for a person in his office. I might say, Mr. Chairman, he has to take advantage of every opportunity to win and influence friends. I will say this before leaving the subject. If the minister is as successful in the international field in winning and influencing friends as he has been in this house in the last 22 years, then our foreign policy will proceed with great success.

There is no necessity to speak at length with respect to the meetings of the standing committee on external affairs, Mr. Chairman

The committee held 10 meetings and dealt very thoroughly in detail with the estimates of the department. I must say at this time that the meetings of the committee and its proceedings were necessarily restricted and pervaded with a great sense of loss by the untimely death of the former secretary of state for external affairs, Dr. Sidney E. Smith. I should also say at this time how much the committee regretted the passing of Mr. W. D. Matthews, the assistant under secretary of state for external affairs, both of whom the committee in its deliberations found of great assistance.

I might say a word or two about the personnel of the department. You get a good idea of the quality of the staff of a department, Mr. Chairman, when you have had experience on a committee over a number of years, when the members of that staff representing its various branches come before the committee to give their explanations with respect to expenditures and forms of administration, give the reasons for this and that. I might say in passing that the minister himself has not been at all backward in digging into these matters during years past as a member of the standing committee on external affairs. As I said before, we get a good idea of the quality of the staff. There is no question about it, in my opinion after a number of years' experience on this committee, but that Canada is very fortunate in the quality of the staff who are administering the Department of External Affairs.

I will have some reference to make to the minister's remarks later, but I wish to take this opportunity to advance the views of this group on this important subject in several aspects. From this point on I shall be dealing with the C.C.F. policy with respect to certain aspects of foreign affairs. Naturally I can only cover the major points in which we are interested. No doubt there will be some other aspects of foreign affairs on which our point of view will be covered by other members of this group later on in this debate.

First we believe that Canada should maintain an independent, co-operative and constructive foreign policy of her own. We ought not, as has been too often the case in the past, simply to reflect the views of our southern neighbour, the United States. Certainly we in the C.C.F. are prepared, as I believe all Canadians are prepared, to work in close co-operation with the United States. We ought to make it perfectly clear that we have a mind of our own and certain ideas of our own which we think can be constructive international councils. We believe that the Canadian representatives at the United Nations ought to speak up more vigorously than often has been the case in the past for constructive approaches to all these problems, even though those approaches may not always be appreciated by our United States friends.

Second, the fundamental tenet of our approach to international affairs is that we must expand and encourage the development of the United Nations. We know that the United Nations has had many failures, but we believe, too, that there are undreamed of possibilities for promoting international peace through the agencies of the United Nations, the constructive work of which is not recognized in many quarters. We hope, for example, that if the specific tensions can be eased the United Nations can eventually develop a world police force which will be responsible for maintaining the peace in critical areas. We have given a good lead in that direction with respect to the Middle East in the way of observer corps and things of that sort. We of this group hope that will be the development with respect to military forces of the future, used finally, we hope, purely to police the unruly people of the world.

We believe that the United Nations offers tremendous possibilities as a focus in channelling economic aid. Indeed, we dare to hope that one day the United Nations may become an effective world government, although we recognize that is some distance in the future. Perhaps these things seem visionary in a world of conflict such as ours. If we are to have a permanent and lasting peace, we in this group firmly believe that we must move consciously in those directions.

A third and an important point in our basic policy is that at all times we must be prepared to sit down and negotiate outstanding issues. Sabre rattling solves nothing; still less will atomic war solve anything. I was very pleased, in listening to the minister's remarks this morning, to hear his comments with respect to the need for patience and continued negotiations. I like his mood, his attitude and his frame of mind in that respect. It was interesting to hear the minister say that war is unthinkable. Apparently all of us in this house agree on these basic points at this time. What is required is a convinced determination to negotiate specific issues, such as Germany, in the hope that by solving one aspect of the problem trust will be engendered for tackling other aspects. The minister in talking about this problem of patience and negotiation, mentioned the hope that the summit meeting would be resumed and that all those meetings tend to work for a reduction of world tensions. I liked that very much indeed in his approach to these negotiations.

My fourth basic point, and undoubtedly the most important of all, is this. We in this group believe that the future of the western world as we know it, and indeed the future of the world itself, will hinge not so much on military might but on what we do to promote the economic and democratic development of those nations in the world which have come to be known as underdeveloped. Not only must we develop trade policies which will enable the western nations to compete with the Soviet union, but we must develop a much bolder and more imaginative policy with respect to promoting economic development in other areas of the world.

Now here is perhaps the most crucial point in the whole approach of the C.C.F. to the question of international affairs. We in the C.C.F. are democratic socialists, and if this party ever fails to be socialist I say right now that I shall be out of it, and quickly. We reject communism and the theories of communism. But we know too that our system of economics, known as capitalism, is also incompetent to deal with basic world problems.

Look at some of the contradictions that we have in the world today. You cannot blame them on individuals. They are the result of world revolution, historical development and so on. How can we expect the development of oil in the Middle East in the interests of the Arab people when we tolerate its exploitation by a few giant monopolies? How can we promote economic development throughout the world if we are prepared to tolerate an economy at home which operates away below capacity and during certain periods tolerates large scale unemployment? How can we expect people in other parts of the world to understand and believe in our democracy if we have great surpluses of food while there are people starving in other parts of the world? I am confident that by accepting our responsibilities in all these fields we will not only be helping these people of whom I have been speaking but we will be helping ourselves.

In that respect the committee on external affairs studied some aspects of international aid, particularly the Colombo plan, technical assistance and the refugee problem. I was very glad to hear the minister mention increased assistance to commonwealth countries under the Colombo plan and technical and similar assistance to the other countries he mentioned. These are continued steps in the right direction and I judge that the government, before making this decision, read the final report of the committee on external affairs because in that report the interest of the committee in this most important question is clearly indicated. We in this group simply say: Take every advantage of, shall I say, our favoured position in the world today to do more and more to assist these underdeveloped countries and in doing so assist ourselves.

We in the C.C.F. group urge the government to take advantage of every opportunity to strengthen the ties within the commonwealth and in doing so strengthen the spokes of this great balance wheel in international affairs. When the minister was speaking on the question of the commonwealth this morning I noticed that he said: "The commonwealth is foremost in our minds; it is a beneficial influence on the affairs of mankind." If that is the minister's opinion, and I know it is, we in this group stand together with the minister on his approach to developing closer ties within the commonwealth and strengthening the commonwealth because of its influence on the affairs of mankind. We wish him well in all he does in that respect.

I want to say a few words about European affairs, and I refer to western Europe. You know, Mr. Chairman, I have had the feeling at times when I glance up to the right that there are some pained expressions on some of the gentlemen's faces but I hope they will bear with me a little longer. In our opinion, first consideration should be given to a plan whereby troops would be withdrawn from an area in central Europe. This area should include not only East and West Germany but Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary as well. In brief, we believe there are great possibilities in what is known as the Rapacki plan and that its possibilities should be explored more and more in the days ahead. We believe there should be a belt through the centre of Europe which could be neutralized and demilitarized. We believe that this sort of neutral belt running through what we term the crisis area of Europe would make a real contribution toward the easing of tension in that important part of the world.

Our second proposal is that the western powers should be prepared to consider the creation of a loose federation of the governments of East and West Germany as a first step toward the holding of free elections throughout all Germany. In our opinion this could be a step toward breaking the deadlock which has been created by the west's insistence on free elections as a first step and the Russian determination to resist free elections. We offer these suggestions, Mr. Chairman, after much consideration of this very serious and delicate problem.

As I have said, we welcome the indications of a more flexible attitude on the part of both the west and the Soviet union. Regardless of, shall I say, the hubbub that has gone on, I think we must welcome the fact that the talks have continued and that there has been even a minor degree of give and take on both sides, which I think is a hopeful state of affairs from which to view the future. We believe that the western powers could be still more vigorous in making specific proposals. It is through our grasping the initiative that there is the best possibility of our being in a strong position when we come to the negotiating table.

Here I wish to refer to the tribute the minister paid to the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Right Hon. Mr. Macmillan. We want to join in that tribute. I think that in the recent negotiations and developments with respect to East and West Germany and western Europe he has given a most stable and commendable lead and has shown exceptional balance which has had a tremendous influence on the discussions at Geneva concerning this difficult problem. This is indicated, I think by the difference in attitude toward this conference between the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the secretary of state of the United States in their published comments with respect to the success or lack of success, whichever viewpoint they took, in connection with this most important conference of foreign ministers in Geneva. In that connection I want to read briefly from an editorial in the Globe and Mail of Friday, July 3. It is entitled, "Fruits of Negotiation", and quotes Mr. Macmillan as follows:

> I feel this prize is worth waiting and working for, because it is the biggest of all.

I think these are very wise words indeed. It is easy enough to show impatience and have quick cuts to success and quick remedies for the disease of world instability, but I think those are very wise words indeed. "I feel this prize is worth waiting and working for, because it is the biggest of all."

I want to say a few words with respect to China. I have listened with interest to what the minister had to say. I understand that there is no change in the government's policy with respect to China since the statement made earlier this session by Dr. Sidney Smith. We fully appreciate the difficulties mentioned by the minister. I must say that the government of China does not make it any easier for the government to consider recognition. We quite understand that, particularly in view of the recent happenings in Tibet. But we who come from British Columbia realize that we now have a minister who comes from British Columbia and no doubt on that account he fully appreciates the opinion of a great number of important people in that province in industry, labour and agriculture with respect to the need for recognition of China.

Our policy in favour of the recognition of the communist government of China has always been very clear. We believe now that the soundness of our position in this regard is all the more obvious. Many prominent Canadians, including industrial leaders and bankers, have visited China and all have come back with the conviction that the recognition of China and her admittance into the United Nations would be in the interests of world peace.

To us the case for recognizing Red China has always seemed an obvious one. No one, to our knowledge, has ever argued that recognition implies agreement with a government's policy. It simply means recognition of the existence of the effective government of that country and willingness to live together in the same world.

We must all realize that China is a developing industrial power—we are getting more evidence of that day after day—and that she is going to be a force in future world politics whether or not we like it. Surely it makes sense for us to recognize her and extend our trade with her, and to be prepared to discuss with her, through the United Nations, the issues over which she will have increasing influence. There is no doubt that that influence is going to increase.

Before leaving this topic we do urge the minister to give further consideration to this problem of the recognition of China, in the interests of world peace as a whole, in the interests of Canadians generally, and particularly in the interest of the province from which the minister comes.

I want now to refer to another vitally important area of the world, the Middle East. I am hurrying along because of the time and the vastness of this subject. During the last century the policies of the western nations in the Middle East cannot have been said to have been very honourable, and I think that is an understatement. We have dealt with the whole area in typical imperialist fashion. We cannot blame certain individuals for a particular period in history. We have allowed giant private oil monopolies to exploit the region and make tremendous profits at the expense of the local inhabitants. They continue to do this and to control and dominate their governments. This control by oil companies is the seed of all the unrest in the Middle East, and any form of democratic expression is virtually impossible. The policies of the Soviet union in the area in recent years have been no better. They have looked upon the countries of the Middle East as pawns in their game of international power politics. The unfortunate thing is that we in the west have responded on a number of occasions in much the same fashion.

This is a question beyond the capacity of Canada to solve. It is a very wide question which will only be solved as the result of the development of the lessening of tensions and a more constructive view of international problems on the part of a good many nations in the world. We in the C.C.F. advance the suggestion I am going to make as one end to which we could work, and we are convinced that as long as oil reserves and the vast natural resources of the Middle East remain in the hands of a few giant monopolies in western countries we will not have settled peace in the Middle East, and the people of those countries will not have the standard of living they are entitled to with the resources they enjoy. We believe that it is time to take a bold and courageously new approach to the Middle Eastern situation.

The key to our proposal is this, that the Arab people should be assisted, through the United Nations, to take over for themselves the ownership and control of their oil resources. I realize that the minister will say that that is a big order and cannot be done overnight. But it can be done little by little, giving these people a larger share of the wealth which is being exported from their country at the present time. We believe that through the good offices of the United Nations this could be done in a peaceful and orderly way over a period of time. The best method might be the establishment of an international Middle East development commission, which would be responsible not only for transferring the oil rights but which would also assist in the whole economic development of the area. What we have to work for is to give these people in the Middle East countries increasing control over their own natural resources, which in the first instance is oil.

If the western powers would take this type of imaginative approach we believe that many benefits could ensue. For one thing, it would wrest the initiative from the Soviet government and would reduce tension between east and west in so doing. It would help to offset the deep-rooted anti-western and anti-imperialist attitude which has made every past move on the part of western nations suspect among large sections of the Arab people. It would encourage Middle Eastern nations to develop along democratic lines and give them heart to throw out some of their despotic totalitarian rulers. We have countries in the Middle East where the great majority of the people live in poverty still, and a very small ruling class live in the lap of luxury, or I will say super luxury. Most important of all, it would raise the living standards of the Arab people and could lead to the transformation of Arab nationalism into a constructive world force for peace.

We are urging the government to give consideration to these proposals. As the last speaker on behalf of the opposition said, Canada can continue to play the role it is playing at the present time in the provision of UNEF, supplying the services of its countrymen to preserve peace in that area, and to act as an observer corps. It can also act in the assessment and the reporting of the situation in the Middle East, in counselling, advising and using its influence toward peace in the area.

Before concluding, I want to say a few words with respect to the use of nuclear weapons and nuclear warfare. The minister said in his speech this morning that the Canadian people are interested in foreign affairs, and I think that increased numbers of the people are very concerned about developing a policy which will work toward building world peace. As far as Canada is concerned, I think that most of the religious bodies have made strong representations in this respect. I know the Anglican church, of which I am a member, and the United church have passed resolutions, both at the national level and the diocesan or regional level. I have a cutting from the Ottawa Journal of Thursday, July 2 last where the pope warns "Peace or Destruction; first encyclical appeals to leaders 'Try every approach' ". Then I have another clipping from the Globe and Mail of May 16 last where Rabbi Abraham Feinberg suggests that a congress of all faiths could help prevent the drift toward war. In the report of his speech, I read this statement by the Rabbi, Abraham Feinberg:

> I believe that religion has a call to leadership, to make science the servant of man rather than of homicide—

I think they are very forceful and well expressed words. I mention these statements made on behalf of churches and religious leaders to show the tremendous support the government has for all it does in working toward the maintenance of world peace. It has support not only from our religious leaders but also from our scientists. I want to quote briefly from an article in the Gazette of Wednesday, June 3, 1959 reporting some remarks of Dr. O. M. Solandt, who I think at one time was chief of our defence research board. The article is headed, "Mankind Must Alter Behaviour", and it goes on:

> Dr. O. M. Solandt, vice president in charge of research and development of the Canadian National Railways, said yesterday that a global nuclear war "would certainly be the end of our present civilization and could conceivably wipe out the human race as we know it."
> Dr. Solandt, former head of Canada's defence research board, told a meeting of the Quebec Heart Foundation at the Queen Elizabeth hotel that "both sides could deliver crippling blows in spite of the advantage of surprise that would go to the aggressor."
> In a strong plea for more emphasis on changing mankind's behaviour than on improving his knowledge of the physical sciences, Dr. Solandt said: "This generation is faced with a problem unique in human history. If we are to ensure the survival of our civilization we must try to ensure that our children do not behave the way we behaved."

Then he goes on to stress the need for every effort to be made to develop world peace. I am certain that the government, in view of public opinion generally in the country, has the opportunity to provide leadership of the most fruitful kind, and to speak up for Canada in this respect. I refer particularly, of course, to the field of disarmament and nuclear weapons and weapon testing. It should not be necessary for me to tell the house more of the dreadful effects that a nuclear war would have on the whole of mankind; we are all well aware of the physical devastation which would result. We are slowly coming to realize more clearly the horrible dangers from radiation which would profoundly affect all life everywhere on this planet of ours, following upon such a holocaust. The very thought should be sufficient to cause all nations to cease this hideous arms race as regards nuclear weapons.

As we informed the house at this time last week, we shall do everything in our power to convince the government of the utter futility, the horrible folly, of allowing ourselves to contribute toward this mad race —I refer to the nuclear arms race—which, in the end can only culminate in suicidal destruction for all living creatures. I shall not pursue this particular point further. However, I should like to draw the attention of the minister and of the committee to an article entitled "A Primer on Fallout", which appears in the latest copy—July 9—of the Reporter magazine, and which I feel strongly all hon. members should read. It is written by people who know. It seems to be a most objective and factual account of nuclear fallout and of the dangers from nuclear radiation.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the minister's comments on the disarmament subcommittee. I hope that the committee will be reconvened and will continue to function. We wish him well in everything he does in his high office to prod that committee into meeting and to prod it into action. As long as the committees are meeting and people are talking and negotiating, I think this indicates that we are getting somewhere.

I understand the disarmament subcommittee of the United Nations, on which Canada is one of five members, has not met since September, 1957. From the minister's comments of this morning with respect to this committee I know he will do all he can and will use his influence to get the committee meeting again and discussing this most important question in the hope of making some progress in the near future. It must be remembered that much has happened during the intervening period since the committee met. For one thing the meeting of experts held in Geneva last year issued a promising report on the technical aspects of nuclear detection and control. There has been some technical advance since the committee last met. Mr. Chairman, you must excuse me, but I lost my teeth owing to war disabilities and have false teeth which bobble around, and I am having a great deal of trouble this afternoon. I hope you will forgive me for that fact.

As I was saying, for one thing the meeting of experts held in Geneva last year issued a promising report on the technical aspects of nuclear detection and control which may be of some assistance to the subcommittee should they decide to meet. But they must meet and talk and discuss. This is what we feel the minister should initiate, promote and continue to work for, in view of the privileged position Canada still has as a member of that subcommittee. Fortunately we are a member of that subcommittee. Perhaps as the minister becomes better acquainted with the problems of disarmament —and there is no doubt that the minister will be learning from day to day—he will be in a stronger position to bring influence to bear on the cabinet in order that they review what must be, from our point of view, a panic decision to introduce nuclear weapons into Canada. He should do this from the conviction that it will have adverse affects on Canada's ability to assume a leading role which should be hers on the disarmament subcommittee in particular, generally in the United Nations and thus in the world at large. We urge the minister to use his good offices in that respect to the limit.

The government must act and be sustained on the basis of humanitarian principles, particularly in this most important and serious matter. Only then will the government be able to surmount the hurdles which these intricate and complex problems erect on the course toward action to peace.

Mr. MacRae: Mr. Chairman, the Atlantic congress of the NATO parliamentary association was held in London, England from June 5 to 10 of this year. I had the privilege of acting as the honorary general secretary of the Canadian delegation, and I am very happy to report to the committee at this time on Canada's part at this important gathering.

As early as 1957 plans were proposed that in 1959, the tenth anniversary year of the treaty, there should be a general congress composed of parliamentarians and distinguished citizens from the nations of NATO. The whole purpose and theme of the congress was to bring together the most distinguished and able citizens representative of the principal aspects of the NATO countries—politics, industry, commerce, finance, labour, education, mass media et cetera—to consider ways and means of developing closer co-operation between North American and European members of NATO in the fields of political, economic and cultural as well as military affairs.

In brief, the congress was to provide an opportunity of examining, on the one hand, the record of the NATO countries as members of an alliance and the prospects of their development into partners in a community and, on the other hand, the problems of relations between the NATO countries and the free and uncommitted world, and relations between the NATO countries and the communist bloc. The congress brought together 650 delegates from 15 nations of the alliance, the delegations ranging in numbers from 130 from the United States to 10 from Luxembourg.

I should like to take a few moments of the time of the committee to discuss Canada's delegation. Headed by the hon. member for Saskatoon, Canada's delegation totalled 56 and included 18 members from the 3 parties in the House of Commons; 3 members from the other place, namely the hon. senator from Ottawa West and the hon. senator from Lumsden, plus the hon. senator from Lunenburg who was one of the co-founders of the NATO parliamentary association and is now the honorary life president of that body. Then we had 36 distinguished Canadian citizens from all walks of life:—from the church, industry, the universities, the professions, the arts and sciences, labour and so on.

It was unfortunate that the secretary-treasurer of the Canadian NATO parliamentary association, who is also the second clerk assistant of this House of Commons, was not able to accompany us. This gentleman had rendered yeoman service in the organization of the Canadian delegation and his knowledge and experience would have been of inestimable value to us. Naturally, he could not leave while the house was in session. For six months prior to our going to England, the head of the delegation and other officers of the Canadian association worked to complete the organization which was so necessary if we were to do the job as we should.

I should like to say a word at this point about the international officers of the congress supplied by Canada. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris was chairman of the very important political committee, one of the five major committees of the congress; the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency was rapporteur of sub-committee D-3—common economic policies of the west; Mr. L. Dana Wilgress was chairman of the subcommittee A-3—Atlantic institute; and Dr. Northrop Frye, the principal of Victoria College, was general rapporteur of the declarations committee.

The writing of papers on the subjects to be discussed at the congress was one activity in which Canada also played its full part. No less than eight papers were written by Canadians. Especially fine ones were contributed by the head of our delegation, the hon. member for Saskatoon; by the senator from Ottawa West; by Mr. Edward Nelson, the president of the united farmers of Alberta and others.

The work of the congress was divided into five major committees. These committees were as follows. The spiritual and cultural committee which was divided into 3 subcommittees; 1. moral and spiritual values of the Atlantic community; 2. information and education program; and 3. Atlantic institute. The political committee chaired, as I said earlier, by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris having as its subcommittees: 1. co-ordination of policies and settlement of disputes; 2. Atlantic institutions; and 3. military questions. The economic committee with its sub-committees: 1. resources and underdeveloped areas in the Atlantic countries; 2. scientific and technical co-operation; 3. implications of western European economic integration; 4. freedom of trade and problems of exchange and stability. The free world committee with its sub-committees: 1. conflict and community of interests; 2. common political policies of the west; 3. common economic policies of the west. The communist bloc committee with its sub-committees; 1. political policies; 2. economic policies; 3. soviet and western propaganda techniques. There was also, of course, the declarations committee whose report I plan later to read into the minutes of this session.

The congress was officially opened by Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II in the Great Westminster Hall beside the abbey. Plenary sessions were held, as I have mentioned, in Church House. I feel that hon. members of this house would be interested in knowing that it was the policy of the head of our delegation, and encouraged by the parliamentary members, that the non-parliamentarians be given every opportunity to express their opinions and to make the greatest contribution possible. While, of course, our delegation had no official status and we were not speaking for our government, there seemed to be a high degree of unanimity in the Canadian delegation.

The final result of the deliberation of all the subcommittees and the five major committees was brought together in the declaration of aims. Here our own Dr. Northrop Frye played a vital role as the general rapporteur of that committee, and I would like to read his report as it was prepared and accepted by the congress:

Principles

Six major principles have guided this congress.

1. The NATO military alliance has, in its first ten years, preserved the peace of Europe, although the threat of aggression is still present.

2. Great changes have taken place in this decade that make essential increased co-operation among Atlantic nations in all fields.

3. No military alliance can endure unless supported by close political and economic co-operation.

4. The time is ripe for these nations to build an Atlantic community with responsibilities extending to military, political, economic, social and scientific fields.

5. The Atlantic nations are interdependent with the other nations of the free world. All these nations want peace and the preservation of their own conception of life. All have a common interest in the development of economic activity and social improvement throughout the world; all people have a common stake and status in a free world.

6. The Atlantic community has a duty to help less developed countries to help themselves.

Proposals

In order to apply these principles, the congress has passed a number of important resolutions, attention being drawn particularly to the following:

Political

1. That there should be increased consultation and co-operation among member states. Consultation should become a habit, not an occasional exercise.

2. That there should be broader and more frequent consultation among parliamentarians of the Atlantic countries, and that the governments should convene a special conference of leading citizens to examine exhaustively means of attaining greater unity, as recommended by the third NATO parliamentarians' conference.

3. That national governments should not take major decisions affecting NATO unity without previous consultation.

4. That the report of the "Three Wise Men" should be more fully implemented.

Military

1. That the forces forming the European shield should be brought as soon as possible up to the minimum strength laid down in the agreed strategic concept of NATO.

2. That the governments should give continual attention to improving the military structure of NATO, and in particular should foster increasing interdependence throughout the military field.

Economic

1. That governments should promote the maximum economic growth in production, employment and living standards and should avoid restrictive economic measures, take all feasible actions to reduce tariff barriers and maintain monetary stability; and, in view of the services rendered by OEEC and EEC and those one might expect from any other form of effective multilateral association, they should work especially for an increase of the benefits of closer economic integration.

2. That consideration be given to the possibility of transforming OEEC into an OAEC in which all Atlantic countries would hold full membership.

3. That the Atlantic countries should undertake a massive and sustained effort to help the peoples of the less developed countries to achieve a rising standard of living together with individual freedom, human dignity and democratic institutions; in this effort we must act not as outside patrons but as equal partners with them in a joint enterprise of freedom.

Cultural

1. That effective counter measures be taken by NATO countries to combat Soviet ideological warfare and that there be set up an international unofficial free nations organization for the dissemination of information to this end.

2. That a "Studies Centre for the Atlantic Community" be set up, to serve as a clearing house and intellectual focus.

3. That there should be further integration of scientific research and in particular of pure research.

4. That informational and educational activities should be strengthened and broadened in order to bring the significance of the Atlantic community with its spiritual and moral content more deeply into the hearts and minds of the peoples of the world.

A number of very fine articles and reports have been written about the congress. I would commend to those who are interested the Senate Hansard of July 2, page 948, in which the hon. senator from Ottawa West reports to his colleagues, and an article in the July issue of the United Church Observer written by its editor, the Rev. A. C. Forrest. Mr. Forrest was one of the five Canadian churchmen in the Canadian group. I would like to quote a paragraph from Mr. Forrest's article:

We were impressed—and grateful, too—that four of the positive proposals adopted by the congress had been initiated by Canadians. Prime Minister Diefenbaker's 1957 suggestion for a NATO food bank was helped through congress by Walter Dinsdale chairman of the political committee. Much of what the Prime Minister has been asking for in a "Freedom Creed" was included in Principal Frye's Declaration.

The creation of an Atlantic Studies Centre had been proposed by Mr. Dana Wilgress. And delegation chairman, Henry Frank Jones saw his proposal that the flow of private capital from Atlantic nations to less developed countries be encouraged in several ways, including tax concessions, adopted enthusiastically.

I would like to say a few words about the hospitality which was shown to us by the people of Britain. Those of us who had been there during the war knew how kind, how generous the people of the British isles can be. Official receptions were given by the Lord Mayor of London, by the Speaker of the House of Commons and by others. The people of Britain opened their homes and their hearts to us.

I feel sure I am expressing the feelings of the whole delegation when I refer to the kindness that was shown to us and the service rendered to us by the Hon. George Drew and his staff at Canada House. Also the staffs at the various provincial houses in London were most helpful, especially Mr. Jamer and his staff at the Canadian Atlantic provinces office, Mr. Spry at Saskatchewan House, and others.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs on his appointment to that most important portfolio. The announcement of this appointment was made, incidentally, while the Atlantic congress was in session. His long record of service to this house, his sound judgment, his common sense and his proven ability to master difficult tasks have so equipped him that he will undoubtedly fill this important portfolio with distinction and will further enhance the position of Canada in the eyes of the world.

Canada enjoys a unique position in world affairs. Perhaps unique is not the word. A high and a respected position would be a better way of expressing it. This has come about because of our contribution to the cause of freedom in the world wars of this century and because of the contribution of able, dedicated Canadians who have done so much to maintain peace in our world.

I believe too, Mr. Chairman, that in the years ahead, under the distinguished leadership of our Prime Minister and his able colleagues in this government, Canada will continue her phenomenal development. She will take and hold her place as one of the greatest of the nations of our world.

(Translation):

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Chairman, recently I too had the privilege of attending the NATO congress in London, on June 3 last, and I would like to take a few minutes to tell the house the few personal impressions that I have kept from that meeting.

That congress of the nations which are grouped in the Atlantic community was held for the purpose, in my opinion, of reviewing the whole concept of NATO since its creation in 1949.

To achieve that purpose, the congress acted on six basic principles which, while summing up the action of NATO since its foundation, could also provide the organization with the necessary leadership to fulfil the objectives arising out of present requirements and in this way, adequately meet the views of member nations in the military, economic, political, social and scientific fields.

It is impossible for me, in the short time I have at my disposal, to comment on all the resolutions adopted by the congress, following the discussion of the principles I have mentioned. However, I would like to indicate the work and the important findings of the committee whose duty it was to make recommendations to the general assembly on matters of spiritual and cultural concern.

Following the committee's suggestions, the congress adopted the four following points:

1. That the member states of NATO take efficient counter measures in order to fight against the Soviet ideological war, and that a formal international organization of free nations be established for the distribution of information towards that end.

2. That it would be advisable to create a study centre of the Atlantic community to serve as information bureau and intellectual centre.

3. That there should be greater integration of scientific research and particularly, of pure research.

4. That it is advisable to strengthen and to expand the forms of action in the field of information and education, in order to impress more deeply in the minds and the hearts of the nations the meaning of the Atlantic community and its spiritual and moral principles.

Those resolutions clearly show that NATO must not limit itself to military considerations, but that the Atlantic community must also create organizations that would be able to think and to spread among free nations the ideas and the moral and intellectual concepts of member nations that want to work within the spirit and the framework of NATO.

What the Atlantic community wants to defend—said Mr. Jean Danielou, the French delegate, —is not a particular civilization against another particular civilization; it is civilization period, of which the Atlantic community is the expression.

The Atlantic community, Mr. Chairman, should therefore be organized so as to be able to stand up to communist propaganda whose purpose is to attack and destroy the principle of liberty of nations that still believe in the peaceful co-existence of the peoples of mankind.

The great danger which the free nations of the world have to face today is communist propaganda in all its forms. At present the Soviets have 500,000 individuals at their service to make this propaganda system work, and they are spending 2 billion dollars a year to try and subvert a billion free men. Moscow is therefore spending $2 a year for each free human being it wants to subjugate. A U.S. senate commission recently informed us, as a matter of fact, that the United States allow 1¼ cent a year per capita for their world propaganda.

Those figures clearly indicate that it is high time for the free nations to get together to meet the Soviet menace and fight the ideological warfare of the U.S.S.R.

During the congress, we heard pressing appeals made by several delegates, on the urgency of the situation. I remember, among others, the appeal of Mrs. Suzanne Lahin, who said:

I urge the delegates to open their eyes. The danger is a pressing and acute one, and it is dramatically urgent that the West should wake up, pull itself together, put all its intellectual and material resources to work and, rousing itself on the very fringe of the abyss it should not only avoid losing the cold war, but try to win it as well. It is just as fatal to die of cold as it is to die of burns. Our defeat would be particularly tragic in that the democratic West would die from a paralysis of the very things that once made its greatness.

In view of those facts so frequently expressed at the meeting, NATO decided to proceed with the creation of the Atlantic institute, or more accurately of an Atlantic community study centre which would serve as an information service and intellectual centre.

The Atlantic institute would exercise a certain number of duties, it would undertake certain projects on its own and co-operate with existing organizations in respect of certain others.

It would favour and support human exchange between the western nations, in order to contribute to greater mutual understanding. It would supply the machinery for the meeting not only of academic and intellectual people, but of leaders in every walk of life in order to stimulate a new knowledge with regard to problems of common concern.

The institute would serve as a clearing house and, on request, as co-ordinating centre for operations and projects connected with its basic interests. It would also initiate and support educational activities designed to promote understanding and to apply the concept of the Atlantic community.

It is in that spirit that the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty, in 1949, indicated the wider concept they had in mind when they referred, in article 2 of the charter, to the need for a better understanding of the underlying principles of the free institutions of the community.

Canada has played an important part in that congress and, in that connection, I should like to quote from a report published in La Presse of July 4, 1959, and written by Mr. Roger Champoux, a newspaperman and Canadian delegate to the Congress:

> People will ask what part Canada has played in this meeting of the free world, this soul-searching by 14 countries integrated into the most powerful alliance in the present world.
> It was an outstanding part, because Canada is no longer a dependent country. Thanks to its highly informed and active delegates, Canada ranked high, and contributions by Canadian delegates drew attention; the same applies to the suggestions made by a number of delegates.
> Speeches were made by several delegates, and the tasks assigned to a number of us were done quickly, efficiently and with a degree of integrity that was commended in the highest terms.

Mr. Chairman, Canada is no longer and will never be a silent partner in world meetings. It is realized in Europe that our country, whose stature always causes amazement, has become the pivot of a disturbed world, anxiously in search of a firm basis, a solid support and a reliable ally.

I can therefore fairly say, in closing, that this congress has deepened my understanding of international problems and has provided me with an opportunity of acquiring experience that will long stand me in good stead. (Text):

Mr. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Chairman, before I venture upon the few observations I wish to make at this time I should like to express the gratification I felt when the announcement was made of the appointment of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to his present position. Hon. members will realize that the minister is held in respect and affection in his native province, and those feelings were mingled with pride at the knowledge that he would be guiding the foreign policy of the people of this country in the councils of the world.

When the announcement was made two and a half weeks ago that Canada was undertaking a special program with respect to the clearance of the refugee camps in Europe during this world refugee year, was considering new lines of approach to some of the problems that have been outstanding throughout the 14 years since the war, there was unanimous approval of the announcement in this house and I believe a general acceptance and approval across the country.

Hon. members will recognize, and I trust the people of Canada are persuaded, that the circumstances that have brought about the existence in Europe, in the Middle East and in the Far East of large numbers of homeless people, refugees, are a condemnation of the nations from which they have fled; but as long as they continue to exist in camps, or in other accommodations, unsettled, unaccepted, and, indeed, in many cases, unacceptable, then their existence under those circumstances is a reproach to the western nations to whom they have turned for haven. Therefore, I feel certain that there cannot be other than reason for congratulations to the government that it has decided to take certain steps to try to meet the problems of at least some of these people.

We know that among the hundreds of thousands of refugees there are those who at least still have their health; that given time, given favourable opportunities, they may find countries in the world that will accept them, where they can be assimilated, where they can once more stand on their own feet and find their own places in the world; but there are also many, far too many, unfortunately, who suffer from disability, or from illness, that makes it impossible for them to escape the conditions under which they now live because the illness or the disability makes them unacceptable in so many countries.

We in Canada have one of the best records in the world in so far as assistance in providing new homes for refugees is concerned, but we have not perhaps done as much as we might have done for those who are classified in United Nations parlance as difficult cases. In the minister's announcement there was reference specifically to tubercular cases. Those people face the most difficult situation of all; for there are relatively few places in the world where they are provided for, or where they are now accepted. Here in Canada there is, as all hon. members realize, a special difficulty in that the government of Canada itself has no hospital in which it can take care of such people, even if they came here; that any such hospitals as exist in the country come under provincial jurisdiction, and we can only introduce tubercular refugees into these hospitals if the provinces will agree to accept them. Therefore, I hope that in this year, when so much attention has been focused on the problems of refugees, the provincial authorities can be persuaded and will be willing to consider the possibility of accepting in each province where available space can be provided at least a number of the tubercular cases among the refugees in Europe today.

In solving the problems of any one tubercular refugee it often happens that the problem of a whole family is solved; for if any single member of a family unit is suffering from the disease they are not now acceptable to us. But if we accept the one, then it may be automatically supposed we will accept the rest of the family; the united family group can come into the country and that problem is solved for a deserving group of people who at the present time have very little hope. However, there have been indications during this year that this problem is receiving wider recognition than it has received in the past. In February the government of New Zealand accepted 20 handicapped refugees with their families, and in May the government of Sweden, which has done so much to pioneer the acceptance of tubercular refugees, accepted a further group of 54.

It may be pointed out that over the years that Sweden has been providing a haven for tubercular refugees, 649 cases altogether have been provided for in that country, and, with their dependants, a solution has been found for the problems of 1,500 people. Of that number only 649 were actually tubercular. It was reported at the 13th session of the United Nations last fall that in one particular group of 200 which was taken from the camps by Sweden and Denmark in conjunction, a group that included as well as tubercular cases some mental cases, there had been complete recovery and assimilation of that total number of 200.

It is not as though in undertaking such a program Canada would be embarking upon unknown ground. There is the example of Sweden, Denmark, New Zealand and the other countries which are dealing in difficult cases which we may follow, and from which we can gain experience and perhaps learn to avoid any pitfalls that may be inherent in such a plan. Therefore, the principle of the thing has been accepted by the government. I only hope now that every effort will be made to give it practical realization. I hope that the people of Canada will support this program; that the provincial governments will provide the necessary facilities, the facilities that only they can provide, and that perhaps in this way, at a time when considerations of compassion and humanity are so important in an unsettled world, this program will prove successful and provide the solution of the problems of people who now live with very little hope.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief in my remarks, but before I deal with the matter I wish to raise, I should like to congratulate the new Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green), and wish him to keep earning for Canada the reputation which she has always enjoyed.

Mr. Chairman, if I rise on the first item of the Department of External Affairs, it is to ask the hon. minister whether it would not be appropriate to consider the possibility of establishing diplomatic relations with the government of Ethiopia. It is not because I went to Ethiopia myself that I ask the government to consider that matter, but Ethiopia, like many other Eastern and African countries, is a country which is friendly to us, and where a great number of Canadians, both French-speaking and English-speaking, have taken up residence. Among the many Canadians who went to Ethiopia in 1945 at the request of Emperor Haile Selassie, there was Rev. Father Matte, s.j., doctor of science, who established the Tafari Mackonnen High School. Since then, University College has been founded, of which Rev. Father Matte is also president.

The part played by French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians in Ethiopia, in the field of education since 1945, has been enormous. Canadians who live in Ethiopia, and the Ethiopian government too, I am sure, would be very pleased indeed if diplomatic relations were established between our two countries.

I would not like to take more of the time of the house, but I ask the hon. minister to be so kind as to consider the possibility of establishing diplomatic relations between those two countries.

(Text):

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take a few minutes to mention certain matters. Along with other members who have preceded me I also want to wish the minister well in his new responsibility. His new department possibly involves more responsibility than any other department. Canadians will long remember his remarks of this morning when he said, if I have his words right, that in this nuclear age war is unthinkable and there simply is no alternative to continued negotiation. I hope I have his words right. I believe they will obtain for the minister the best wishes of 17½ million Canadians. We have every confidence that the minister is going to continue to pursue that philosophy as long as he holds his present high office.

I wish to refer to a couple of matters which the minister may consider as relatively minor but which to me are of rather important significance. I should like to compliment the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke on the great interest he has exhibited over the past year or more in the question of the refugees of the world. Most Canadians recognize that we are either refugees or the sons, grandsons or greatgrandsons of refugees. Most of our forefathers left European shores because they found life and conditions unbearable there and they were political, religious or some other type of refugees.

I believe that we may have been following a wrong policy with respect to refugees in that in our openheartedness we have only been willing to supply money for the maintenance of refugees in other parts of the world. I know that money can salve our consciences at times but in my opinion the move that was made a number of weeks ago when the government announced its willingness to accept a certain number of these refugees into Canada was a welcome one. However, I believe it was a very limited move indeed and I hope that in the months ahead the government will give serious consideration to ending once and for all the refugee camp problem existing in Europe and that we will not only be willing to accept into Canada cases involving tuberculosis merely because we happen to have empty sanitaria space but will also be willing to accept our fair share of the refugees still in camps in Europe 14 years after the end of the second world war. I hope that we will take our share and have an end to this continuing problem in Europe.

I also fail to appreciate Canada's continued willingness to pay money toward the maintenance of the refugee camp in the Middle East because the problem there is not being resolved by our continuing to feed, clothe and supply education, housing and medical care to these people. Even today there are several hundred thousand more refugees in the Middle East than there were after the formation of Israel. I believe that Canada should follow an aggressive policy in the United Nations toward the re-establishment of these refugees. I regret to have to inform the minister that I have spoken to a number of Canadians who have actually visited the refugee camps and who say that the state of demoralization that has now come about is simply deplorable. These people have been nursed, fed and supplied with all their basic needs, even though at a very minimum level, but some of them have now become so lazy that they are even unwilling to lift their hands to swipe away the flies that are feeding on their eyes.

I believe that if Canadians continue to endorse this refugee camp and the existing arrangements we will not be making our maximum contribution. In my opinion Canada should not only be willing to accept a number of these people into our country but Canada should follow a policy at the United Nations that will lead to the re-establishment of these refugees possibly in some of the arid regions of the Middle East which can be made into useful areas.

Another refugee problem exists, as the minister well knows, on the island of Hong Kong. I feel that the minister might use his good offices with the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration so that Canadians of Chinese origin with near relatives in Hong Kong would have a little less tortuous path to pursue in obtaining the right to bring these people, who are refugees from the mainland of China, into Canada. The Canadian people, as the minister knows, are an open and kindhearted people and with respect to the whole question of refugees the minister will always find that the people of Canada will support him in any progressive move he can make.

Another policy about which I feel I have to complain a little is that involving the urging of Canadians to adopt an orphan overseas and to send $15, $20 or $30 a month to maintain an orphan in some other area of the world. I feel that orphans are the best possible kind of immigrant we can have in Canada, and once again I would like to appeal to the minister to use his influence with his colleague, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, to pursue a policy whereby all these orphans might benefit by encouraging the foster father, the foster mother or foster parents not to supply money to maintain the orphan overseas but rather to bring the orphan into Canada and to look after the orphan in their own home.

I would also like to appeal to the minister to do a little bit of investigating as to what happened to what the newspapers reported about a year ago was the Prime Minister's plan for a possible agreement between Canada and the U.S.S.R. whereby Canada and the Soviet union might agree upon an Arctic inspection plan and thereby eliminate the need for the vast armament expenditures within the Arctic areas. We have never had a report in the House of Commons as to why that plan suddenly disappeared. We have never had a report on the plan at all. I believed at the time I first read of it that the plan was an excellent idea, enough to be explored to the full, and I hope that the minister at some time will pay some attention to that and see whether or not it was the United States government that completely vetoed the plan and caused the Canadian government immediately to forget it, and also investigate whether or not it should be revived.

I would also like to appeal to the minister to pay some little attention to the quality of Canadians parliamentary representation abroad. I have been at a number of international gatherings, and I have always been very impressed with the quality of representatives at these international gatherings who came from either Washington or Westminster. I have always had the feeling that when Canada is asked to send 15 members of parliament here, five members of parliament there, and eight members of parliament somewhere else to international meetings, far too often what happens in effect is that the least able members of the House of Commons, the ones who are not needed at home, are available as our representatives overseas. I do not believe that this helps to enhance Canadian prestige at international gatherings. I do not want to pinpoint any one meeting or any individual or any group of individuals, but I have been amazed at the quality of the United States and British representatives at international meetings and have often had the feeling that we were not sending our best representatives abroad.

Mr. Pallett: The hon. member was at two of them himself.

Mr. Regier: Yes, I was one of them, and I have been one of the worst I agree. However, I was with the hon. member for Leeds, I think it was, and I must say that he acquitted himself very well indeed when he headed our NATO delegation in Europe in the fall of 1957, even though he may have felt that I was not of much use to him.

I should like to express my appreciation to the minister at this time for going to considerable trouble in arranging for a representative of Canadian teachers to attend the meeting now taking place in London in connection with the establishment of a commonwealth scholarship program. I noted the minister said this morning that the Canadian government expected that it would have to spend about $1 million a year on this type of proposal, and that out of a thousand scholarships we would be expected to look after roughly 250 of them. I do not want to be too inquisitive, but it looks like a rather openhearted amount, $4,000 per year for each of them. Unless the overhead is unduly large, I feel that this is an amount which can hardly be compared with even a Rhodes scholarship or an I.O.D.E. scholarship. They certainly do not amount to $4,000 a year, yet the minister indicated there would be 250 scholarships at a cost of roughly $1 million.

I was a little disappointed at the amount which was announced. I had hoped that Canada would be prepared to spend at least $10 million or $20 million on this type of enterprise, and that Canadian universities and other institutions of learning might expect to receive not 250 but more in the neighbourhood of 2,500 commonwealth students who would be obtaining their education here. However, I heartily endorse the program. Our whole group heartily endorse this program. We only regret that it is not more extensive. However, we realize it is only the beginning and that it may be expanded in the years ahead. We feel that it is very important that the commonwealth nations help each other in this manner and thereby help to spread some of the traditions that we hope will become firmly rooted in all areas of the British commonwealth of nations.

I have never expressed this sentiment in the house before. However, I would like to inform the minister that my great grandfather and my grandfather, upon the ascension of Mr. Bismarck in Europe, left European shores and chose liberty under the traditions which were established and recognized as the basic liberties of the individual in areas where the Union Jack was known. I personally would like to see a spread of this liberty, but not by imposition. We must realize that we have to live in a world with many others who have different attitudes and approaches to many of our main problems in life. However, we should by example help in every way we can to spread the basic traditions that have made the commonwealth, and especially the heart of the commonwealth, the United Kingdom, even though it may not be militarily powerful any more, into the most respected nation today in the world. I believe that the establishment of a commonwealth scholarship program will help very much toward the accomplishment of this aim that I am sure all members of this house endorse.

(Translation):

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, if I venture to take part in this debate, it is not so much that I am aware of the scope and difficulty of the subject-matter, but I consider it important for us members to discuss external affairs, certainly not as experts, but as representatives of the people. Indeed, it is our responsibility to inform those we represent of what is happening in diplomatic circles and on the international scene. Moreover, it is our duty to keep the government aware of the popular reaction to the international situation and to its own policy.

Hon. members must recall what is ultimately at stake in the secret struggle taking place at the diplomatic level. What is at stake is indeed the very survival of civilization and freedom for the preservation of peace. It is also our responsibility as members to remind the public that every single individual will ultimately reap the sweet or bitter fruit of official high level policy.

My intentions are of modest scope. I simply want to reaffirm what seems to me fundamental in the matter. But before dealing with the subject, I would like, if I may, Mr. Chairman, to tender my warmest congratulations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green). The way in which the announcement of his appointment to his present post was received told him, better than I can, the very great esteem in which he is regarded by his colleagues. I want to tell him, perhaps on behalf of the younger members in this house, that we admire him very sincerely and that since our arrival in this House of Commons, he has been to us a model and an example. Because of his great kindness, his simplicity and sincerity, we would be inclined to consider him as a father if, on the other hand, his very great cordiality, did not make us consider him, instead, as an older brother. At all events, Mr. Chairman, together with all my fellow members, I welcome this appointment which, I am sure, will have happiest results for Canada. Mr. Chairman, last autumn, I had the honour to be invited to attend the 13th general assembly of the United Nations as Canadian delegate. I must say that my stay in New York has taught me a very great lesson. I was able to realize, on the spot, the importance of diplomatic debate and the efficient part played there by Canada. I listened, day by day to debates on the most vital principles. And, when I was a member of the fifth commission —the administrative and budgetary commission—I could see all the underlying factors of international policy coming up in the discussions, in the form of estimates introduced for approval. I was thus able to familiarize myself with external affairs and to understand the extreme difficulty of some situations and the importance of those discussions.

Today—and even more so today than before —the international situation cannot but cause the gravest misgivings, Mr. Chairman. If we remember the Middle East crisis in the summer of 1958, as well as the Quemoy and Matsu islands issue we realize that the events which troubled the world at that time made us fear the worse conflicts. Since then, there has been a settlement. It nevertheless remains that this settlement has a precarious character because of the very strategic withdrawals which made it possible, but which leave the positions with regard to principle absolutely unchanged in the two camps.

The recent Berlin crisis proved that the international situation is not yet settled and that security and world peace are still threatened at this time. As a matter of fact, the Berlin crisis is a menace which, according to experts, might very well be the final test of strength. Its character is tragic mainly because of the fact that it again brings a major issue to the fore. It throws new light on events that seemed already old, but which are again emerging as a stark reality. These events were those that marked the end of the 1939-45 war, and they are the consequences of the negotiations held at the time.

Mr. Chairman, what impresses me and what I want to stress when I consider those international events, is the meaning and the interpretation we are forced to give them.

Indeed, we are actually in a position of perpetual conflict opposing—one might as well admit it—communists and non-communists. That masked, underhand conflict has degenerated into what is now called the cold war. It is none the less extremely important and dangerous; as witness the various international developments to which I referred a moment ago. All those developments are increasing international tension and threatening the world with a menace of which our young men will perhaps suffer the dire consequences one of these days.

Those facts, which in reality constitute the international crisis, are an indication of Russia's and her satellites' intentions, and they reveal the character of the philosophy behind their diplomatic approach.

The heart of the problem lies in that opposition commonly called: East-West opposition. It lies in this fact that a fight, a fight to the finish, so it seems, is being waged between communist and non-communist countries. That opposition is one of principles, because it involves two opposite philosophies, two opposite civilizations, and because it is based on contradictory principles. It opposes an atheistic civilization to a civilization of faith, a deistic civilization; it sets a materialistic civilization against one based on the principle of priority of spiritual matters; a form of communism against a normal form of individualism; social planning against private enterprise, arbitrary state control against divine right, natural right. Also, if we care to take a closer and more realistic look at the matter, we realize that we are faced with opposition between tyranny and freedom.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the major objective that we must pursue, is the defence of our civilization, western and Christian civilization. The result will be a struggle not for geographical possessions, not for military supremacy, not for economic domination, nor for political hegemony, but a struggle for the survival of a civilization, its development and perfection. That struggle must be considered by us as of capital importance, since our civilization, which we seek to defend, must be rooted in fundamental principles which are like the mainstays of our lives; those principles are based on divine right, natural right, on freedom of the individual, and on individual and social ethics. It is a civilization which has historic achievements to its credit: its philosophy, its culture, its letters and its arts, its technology and science in all its forms. Consequently, it is that objective we must defend. We are defending acknowledged values, values which have been historically established and, in my opinion, that is an approach we should never lose sight of in any consideration of external affairs.

The defence of western civilization is not therefore based on sentimental reasons but on historic realities. I was saying a moment ago that this civilization we are defending is opposed by a materialistic civilization that can certainly produce astonishing technological achievements, and may even bring about a certain amount of well-being, but at an extremely heavy cost, the loss of individual freedom in exchange for purely material progress.

Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, our attitude must be a practical and realistic one, in view of the threat of war and particularly of a nuclear war that would dwarf any catastrophe ever recorded. Our attitude must be one of strength, and must prompt us to look for the facts behind the threats from Russia and the satellite countries, but it must above all be one of caution so that we may exhaust every diplomatic means at our disposal. In that regard, our membership in the United Nations and in NATO should always be viewed as a way of cooperating in the maintenance of world peace and security.

There are people today who favour cooperation in every field with those whom we must rightfully consider as enemies of our civilization. Such a policy might be largely a matter of political and diplomatic strategy; it might in some ways, yield excellent results, but it should not cause us to lose sight of the major principles involved. Fear of war must not make us lose sight of our goal, which is the defence of the values underlying our way of life and our community.

The Canadian government, through its membership in the UN and in NATO, must maintain a defence system and must, in cooperation with its neighbours and with the major countries of NATO, keep up a highly efficient protection system. That, of course, involves considerable expense, and it is our duty, as representatives of the people, to explain to the people that Canada's defence system involves a measure of sacrifice on the part of the nation and its citizens.

Quite often, we hear complaints, we hear all kinds of criticism on the efforts Canada has to make to expand its defence system. It is our job to explain the meaning of that protection, which inevitably costs money.

However, it seems to me that there is one area where Canada's effort should be greater, and I refer to the help Canada must or has agreed to provide to underdeveloped countries. In countries of Africa and Asia, and in some countries nearer to us, there are people today who are yearning for social improvement and for greater personal and political freedom. To reach those goals, however, they need technical, financial and cultural help. Such is the context for our contribution to the various schemes aimed at helping underdeveloped countries.

I, for my part, know that this undertaking of the Canadian government has often been harshly criticized; but this criticism, which might in some cases be justified, is easily refuted—and this again is a responsibility of those who represent the people—provided we take the trouble of making the public understand that they are part of the family of man, of pointing out the interdependence of Canadian citizens and of all the citizens of the world who sincerely want to promote the cause of peace.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that just about everywhere in Canada there may be agents of disorder, agents who may be propagandists of subversive ideas. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) stressed today, some of these agents try to undermine our social and political institutions in Canada and are therefore, in fact, distributors of subversive political propaganda.

Those agents are preventing the creation and the implementation of defence and diplomatic policy which would be really efficient and produce all the results we expect of it.

We, in Canada, have a particular role to play; we must show the way we must set for other nations—more so perhaps because we are a young nation—the example of a true to life civilization which, to all practical intents, proves the historical and intrinsic value of the principles that we consider as the basis of Christian and western civilization. (Text):

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this has been for me, and I am sure for the officials of the department, a very helpful discussion. Before the vote is passed I should like to deal very briefly with some of the points which have been made by the various hon. members who have taken part in this debate. There have been a great many useful suggestions made and they will all be given careful consideration because under the conditions which exist around the world today no idea can be overlooked or bypassed in case it might be of great value in helping to bring about world peace.

The hon. member for Essex East mentioned the importance of the forthcoming session of the United Nations which will be opening in September. I can assure him that I intend to lead the Canadian delegation at this session and will stay in New York as long as possible. However, there are various duties which come up from time to time in Canada or perhaps in some other part of the world and as the hon. member knows it is impossible for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to be there for the whole of the duration of the session.

The hon. member mentioned the need for increased representation for Canada in the Middle East, referring particularly to Iraq. This is under consideration by the department. As the hon. gentleman said, there has been a mission set up in Iran. I believe the intention had been to have a charge d'affaires in Iraq. Then there was trouble in that country about a year ago. I am not yet in a position to announce just what steps the government can take. Our ambassador to the United Arab Republic will be going to Baghdad in a few days to attend the anniversary of the revolution of last year which was on July 14 and while there no doubt he will be able to look into the whole situation. I should like the hon. member for Essex East to realize that we are interested in the possibilities of establishing a further mission in this area which has been and is of such great importance in world affairs.

I shall not comment on the hon. member's quotations from the London Times. That, of course, is a great newspaper. I remember reading it with great confidence 45 years ago. But like all other newspapers it is not always right and perhaps the article from which he quoted was not as praiseworthy as he seemed to suggest.

He also mentioned the possibility of arrangements being made for what he called the United Nations presence in Berlin. There have been suggestions made that if the four negotiating powers could reach agreement then there might be a role for the United Nations in Berlin based on that agreement. This I believe is an idea which certainly merits careful consideration. It may be that the solution of the Berlin problem will be along that line. At the moment, however, I am not in a position to take any stand one way or the other.

The hon. member for Kootenay West advanced many suggestions and outlined the policy of his party on various questions having to do with foreign policy. I know he will not expect me to comment on these policies. He said he felt that Canada had lost her contacts in world affairs and hoped that we would now resume these lost contacts. I can assure the hon. member that the losses have not been as great as he thinks. I should be very much surprised if any contacts whatever had been lost. Perhaps he was reading speculative articles in some of the newspapers as well when he formed that opinion.

The foreign service of Canada has an excellent standing all over the world. He would be surprised at the number and the quality of the dispatches which come in to the minister of the department every day from all over the world although I do not think that perhaps more than 10 per cent of the total volume would be passed on to me. I can assure the hon. gentleman that Canada is very well represented in all parts of the world and I believe her standing in world affairs is as high as that of any other nation.

There are reasons for that, of course, beyond our own good qualities as Canadians. We are not in the position of having any past to explain nor do we have a record of wanting anybody's territory or of having designs on anybody. Our main ambition is to be friendly with all other nations and I believe that is characteristic of the Canadian outlook. This has been one reason why we have enjoyed such a high standing, as well, of course, as the fact that Canada has been very well served abroad not only on an official level but also in the public men who have represented this nation.

The hon. member need not be afraid that Canadian foreign policy will be merely a reflection of United States policy. We have great friendship and vast admiration for our cousins but we intend to stand on our own feet in foreign policy and try to take the approach which the average Canadian would take on these questions.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury and the hon. member for Charlevoix made very interesting reports on the Atlantic congress which took place a short time ago. In this connection I find it exceedingly difficult to believe that the remarks made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam about the rather inferior calibre of the Canadian representatives at conferences were made seriously. It may be that the Canadian representatives are not expert on protocol. I find it quite a problem myself and I think any Canadian would until he had been in the diplomatic service for a lifetime. But I have no doubt that when it comes to good, plain, hard-headed common sense the Canadian members of parliament who attend those conferences are just as good as the representatives of any other parliament in the world.

The hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke made a very thoughtful and appealing speech on the refugee problem. This was also dealt with by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. We are very interested to see just what the reaction of the Canadian people will be to the suggestion that a real attempt be made to get at the hard core of this refugee problem. If this is to be done it will mean bringing people to Canada who are not in good physical condition; it will cost money and it will require understanding on the part of our own Canadian people.

When I suggested a week or two ago that we were prepared to embark on a program that would help to meet this refugee problem I was not just sure what the reaction would be. So far it has been excellent, very gratifying, and the remarks made by these two gentlemen today will help a great deal to make it possible for Canada to adopt a worthwhile policy to deal with this situation.

The hon. member for Lapointe made a suggestion that Canada should have diplomatic representation in Ethiopia and others have come forward with the same proposal. We have always enjoyed the friendliest of relations with Ethiopia. Hon. members will recall, for instance, the welcome visit to Canada of His Majesty, the Emperor of Ethiopia, in 1954. The question of establishing diplomatic relations with this country is, of course, kept under review in the light of the requirements of Canadian citizens in Ethiopia and of the various demands on our financial and personnel resources.

As hon. members know, this department operates on cold, hard cash, and we always have to consider whether we can get the money to establish those missions. It is not simply a case of deciding that we would like a mission here and a mission there, and establishing them. We have to do business with the treasury board, just as do the other departments, and in my experience treasury board is sometimes quite a high hurdle to get over.

[Mr. Green.]

To get back to Ethiopia, I might say that the registration of such Canadians with the United Kingdom embassy in Addis Ababa is a normal practice in countries where Canada has no diplomatic mission, and this practice has proved to be generally satisfactory.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam referred to the plan proposed by our own Prime Minister for inspection of Arctic regions, both of Canada and of the Soviet union, and he seemed to think that that plan had been put away in a filing cabinet and forgotten; but such is not the case. Canada was associated with the original proposal of a regional disarmament inspection zone in Arctic areas. No agreement has been reached with the Soviet union on such an area, but the Canadian government remains today ready to co-operate fully in any such plan that may be worked out between the nations.

That hon. member also mentioned the cost per student under the commonwealth education plan. The meetings to discuss the details of such a plan will not be held until next week. The figure of $1 million is an estimate. However, I point out that these students will be graduates taking post-graduate courses, and that the cost will include travel, maintenance and contributions to the universities. Also, of course, Canada will have to pay her share of the administrative expenses in connection with the plan. But the hon. member can be quite sure that there will be no money thrown away. In my experience this seldom happens under any scholarship plan.

Finally, the hon. member for Roberval made a very thought-provoking speech, as he always does, and his comments, too, will be given very careful consideration by myself and by the officials of the department.

I think that covers many of the points which were raised by the different members, and I shall be very glad to try to answer any other questions as we go through the estimates.

77. Representation abroad—operational—including authority, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, for the appointment and fixing of salaries of high commissioners, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, consuls, secretaries and staff by the governor in council, $9,606,439.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I did not burden the minister or the committee with a speech when we were discussing the estimates in a general way, but I should like to say a few things about some of the individual items, including this particular one. However, before I do that, perhaps the minister would permit me to add my congratulations and good wishes to him which were given to him on behalf of our party by my colleague, the hon. member for Essex East.

Those good wishes are as sincere as they are in a sense repetitive because he has already heard them. I lament, of course, as we all do, the tragedy which required the minister to take on this portfolio; but he can, as my colleague from Essex East has already said, count on our good wishes and support for every move that he makes that we feel is in the interest of our country and of peace. That will not, as has already been stated, prevent us from speaking frankly, as he used to speak when he was in opposition, on some foreign affairs questions.

He mentioned that he has already been at a picnic of the Department of External Affairs. I assume he has already also found out that external affairs is not a picnic, and I can only underline the thought, which has already been expressed, that perhaps he will soon be relieved of some of his other important activities so that he can devote all of his time to this important portfolio which he now has and which I know he will honour.

The item that we are now considering has to do with representation abroad. I was very happy indeed to hear the minister pay his sincere and generous tribute to the work of the officers of the department, both at home and abroad, and I join with him in that tribute.

He mentioned that they were a great band of Canadians, perhaps even better Canadians because they have had the privilege and the responsibility of living, working and speaking for Canada abroad. Sometimes it makes you a better Canadian than if you have to spend all your time at home. I prefer, incidentally, the minister's reference to the departmental officials to that which was quoted by the hon. member for Essex East from a press column. The item shows an increase of $859,000, and I should like to ask the minister whether this increase is in part at least to take care of new posts abroad and, if so, what these new posts are.

The other day the minister indicated in reply to a question that there were eight missions, I believe, where the headships were now vacant. I should also like to ask him whether the government contemplates filling those posts in the near future because I think it is important, particularly in these days, that these vacancies should be reduced to a minimum within a short time. I know that the minister will agree with me there. Perhaps there is less reason for vacancies now than there may have been at one stage of the development of the external affairs department because the department has now grown to the point where it has in its senior officers men of experience and capacity who are quite capable, I am sure, of filling any diplomatic vacancy that may exist. In the earlier days of the service, of course, before there had been time and opportunity for the development of officers with seniority and experience, it was often necessary to go outside the service to fill these vacancies. I agree that from time to time it will always be necessary in an efficient foreign service to bring into the ranks of that service in top posts men of special capacity and experience for a particular job. But I would hope that these vacancies, eight in number, will soon be filled because it is difficult for a diplomatic mission to function as effectively as the minister I know wishes it to function if the headship remains vacant too long.

Mr. Green: The increase in $859,034 in this vote is chiefly caused by the added requirements of $440,590 for salaries, $371,669 in allowances, $24,655 in freight charges, $35,999 in telephone and communication services and $30,885 for office stationery and supplies. While I think the return to which the Leader of the Opposition referred showed that there were eight offices of heads of missions vacant, in some cases one representative is to be accredited to more than one country so that there are not actually eight vacancies. One example is the case of Cuba. I understand that there are only five vacancies and I hope to have appointments made at least to some of them in the very near future. They are in the course of going through the necessary procedures.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister say whether or not the appointments he has just mentioned will be made from the service itself?

Mr. Green: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

78. Representation abroad—construction, acquisition or improvement of buildings, works land equipment and furnishings and to the extent that, blocked funds are available for these expenditures, to provide for payment from these foreign currencies owned by Canada and provided only for governmental or other limited purposes, $1,565,405.

Mr. Pearson: I do not want to detain the committee but may I ask the minister whether the increase represents the construction of some new embassies abroad and, if so, where are they?

Mr. Green: This vote shows an increase of $152,717 over 1958-59. The dominant factor in the increase is the requirement of an additional $76,950 for the acquisition, construction and improvement of properties. This item makes provision for the following principle projects: A chancery at Canberra, $100,000; official residence, Brussels, $150,000; chancery, New Delhi, initial cost, $60,000; staff quarters and service building, Tokyo, $70,000; chancery, Ankara, intial cost $60,000; official residence, New York, $60,000, for a total of $500,000.

Then, as to procurement of motor vehicles and other equipment, the increase of $31,900 reflects normal replacement mainly of automobiles, of which 34 are to be replaced in 1959 and 1960 and eight added to the establishment.

Item agreed to.

79. Official hospitality, $40,000.

Mr. Forgie: I should like to ask the minister if he is sure that the amount of $40,000 for hospitality is adequate?

Mr. Green: The purpose of this vote is to provide for the payment of accounts for dinners, luncheons, local transportation, miscellaneous expenses, etc., in connection with the entertainment of distinguished visitors, most of whom are from abroad. It also provides for the cost of gifts to distinguished visitors from abroad who may decide to confer gifts on the Prime Minister or other members of the cabinet. That is also chargeable to this vote up to a maximum of $3,000 per year. In the year 1938-39 the expenditure was $2,825; in 1943-44, $12,810; in 1950-51, $19,667; in 1951-52, $39,620; in 1952-53, $9,965; in 1953-54, $23,955; in 1954-55, $31,315; in 1955-56, $41,988; in 1956-57, $46,679; in 1957-58, $37,087; and for 1958-59 the forecast is $40,000. We will try to keep these expenditures down well below $40,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the minister repeat the expenditure for 1957-58?

Mr. Green: The 1957-58 expenditure was $37,087, almost $10,000 less than the year before.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister indicated that the expenditure for 1958-59 was an estimate but the fiscal year ended on March 31.

Item agreed to.

81. Canadian representation at international conferences, $243,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister tell us with respect to delegations to the international labour office as well as delegations to the world health organization, in other words delegations that represent functionally other departments of government, whether it has been the practice during the past two years—I hope this is not an unfair question to ask a new minister—to have the appointments made on the nomination of the Secretary of State for External Affairs or are the appointments made on the nomination of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Green: The ordinary practice is for the recommendations to come from the department or departments concerned to the Department of External Affairs. Then formal approval is obtained by the Department of External Affairs and usually an announcement is made by our department.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister tell me whether this vote is for the expenses of delegations to the United Nations assembly?

Mr. Green: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pearson: Could the minister give the committee the figures of expenses for the assembly delegation for last fall, September, and the September before that?

Mr. Green: The cost for the session of last fall was $125,320.23. With regard to the fall of 1957, my officials do not have the figure available at the moment but I will be glad to get it.

Mr. Crestohl: I wonder whether the minister could tell the committee whether the expenditures of the conference recently held in London of the NATO parliamentary association, and also of the prominent Canadians who attended, came out of this fund.

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

82. Grant to the United Nations association in Canada, $11,000.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, could the minister tell us when was the last increase given to the Canadian United Nations organization, and what was the amount of that increase?

Mr. Green: The last increase was in the fiscal year 1954-55, when the figure was raised from $10,000 to $11,000.

Mr. Crestohl: May I say a word on that. I think the position of the United Nations is becoming much more important, and Canadians are becoming much more conscious of the existence and effectiveness of the United Nations. I think we should encourage that, and perhaps a more substantial grant should be given to the organization in Canada in order that it may continue to spread the gospel amongst Canadians of the usefulness and importance of the United Nations. I do not think that $11,000 is a large enough contribution for the government of Canada to make to this all important organization in Canada.

Mr. Green: There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that the United Nations association in Canada has been and is doing very good work, and I will be very glad to have a look at the question of whether or not the grant should be increased. The hon. member, of course, will appreciate the fact that here again we have to do business with the treasury board.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might engage the attention of the committee for a few minutes in connection with this item. Up to a few months ago I had very little knowledge of the extensive work that the United Nations association in Canada does, but last week I had the privilege of attending as a guest a seminar that is held by this association in Canada. This was a new seminar started at Geneva park on lake Couchiching, about 20 miles from my own home town. At this seminar there were approximately 70 high school students from grades 11 and 12. They were picked from among the most intelligent members of the schools in their grades to come down to this conference and study work undertaken by the United Nations. There were actually six from Powassan high school in my own riding. This conference lasted six days, and these young people were brought together for the six days and they were taught one particular subject. This year they spent six days on the subject of the emergence of Africa, and even the minister's departmental officials admitted that this was a terrific undertaking.

I was asked to attend this conference and speak because of the fact that I had been with the Canadian delegation at the United Nations last fall and had spent six weeks with the committee dealing with trusteeships and mostly with African problems. The association now holds seven other seminars across Canada each summer and they bring together some of the best students in Canada to be taught about the problems of the United Nations. There is one held at Sackville, New Brunswick, one at Kingston, and at London, Ontario, one at Winnipeg, Manitoba, one at Fort Qu'Appelle, Saskatchewan, one at Banff, Alberta, and another at Vancouver, British Columbia. I concur that the association is doing an excellent job of making our young Canadians aware of world problems.

Mr. Crestohl: I think the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat can really serve as an object lesson, and if the minister is having difficulty with treasury board perhaps they might attend a seminar like that and realize the importance of the United Nations in Canada.

Mr. Green: It might do them a lot of good.

Item agreed to.

85. Canadian government's assessment for membership in the international (including commonwealth) organizations that are detailed in the estimates including authority to pay such estimates in the amounts and in the currencies in which they are levied; amount required in Canadian dollars, estimated as of December, 1958, $3,838,519.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I thought perhaps I might have made my remarks with regard to this item on item 1, but I find that perhaps they will be more appropriate under this heading. I think that our country should be a little more concerned than is manifest about the Suez canal difficulty which is interfering with world shipping. Canada is gradually becoming more of a chartering country than ever before. Our merchant marine is not as effective or as new as it was. We have pretty nearly disposed of our entire merchant marine and shipping companies I imagine are resorting more and more to the use of chartered bottoms for the shipping of Canadian goods throughout the world. I think it is an undue interference by any one country to dictate to other countries in the world who they can and cannot deal with, and I think the government should perhaps express itself on this question.

I think there is no necessity for anyone to discuss the importance of freedom of the seas, which is an important part of shipping rights. If this is interfered with, certainly our shipping capacity or our trade is interfered with; and because our trade is interfered with I think Canada should take some stand, either through the United Nations or otherwise. It is true that the secretary general is over there now attempting to iron out these things but I think the hand of the secretary general would be much strengthened if countries requiring the freedom of the seas and the use of the seas for their trade would express themselves. Perhaps some form of protest is being transmitted to which publicity is not given. But I feel that a country like Canada which has always championed the rights of free trade and the right of using the high seas should most certainly now take some stand. We depend upon the right to use the sea. We depend not only on Canadian vessels but upon foreign vessels and chartered vessels. I think we shall be seriously prejudiced if we do not speak up for them.

I have the feeling that our representative at the United Nations should be especially briefed on this subject. When there was difficulty in the Middle East it will be recalled that troops were withdrawn, peace was adjusted, and armistice was created, one condition which was that the Suez Canal and the gulf of Tiran would be kept free for shipping. There has been an invasion of that condition. I think that Egypt has not lived up to her obligation as to which she gave a pledge to the United Nations. I am drawing this matter to the attention of the minister who, I realize, will be facing this problem now himself and urging him to take the stand, on the lofty level that our country has always taken, to see that right should prevail; that the freedom of the seas, above all, should be maintained; and that Canada's foreign trade should not be interrupted by the intransigence of any one country.

Mr. Green: The hon. member is quite right. We place great importance on freedom of the seas. Of course this applies in the case of the Suez canal. Canada has always taken the position that there should be free transit of that canal. At the moment the secretary general of the United Nations is in the Middle East and is endeavouring to get this difficulty ironed out. We are hopeful that he will have some success in this endeavour.

Mr. Crestohl: Has the government made its opinion known in this matter? Has it transmitted any protest to Egypt that it is in contravention of this undertaking to the United Nations?

Mr. Green: We have made it clear throughout all this diffculty that we place great importance on the right of free transit through the canal.

Mr. Pearson: As the minister has said, the secretary general of the United Nations is, I think in Egypt at the moment—Cairo, to be specific—doing his best to help to solve this problem. He is a man with great experience and great capacity in these matters and he has a very detailed knowledge of this particular problem, I am sure. As my hon. friend has pointed out, it is a very important problem, that one member of the United Nations should interfere with shipping through the Suez canal because that ship is carrying goods from another member of the United Nations, even though it may not be in a ship of that particular country. I am, of course, talking about Egypt and Israel. The grounds that have been given for that interference are, I believe that a state of belligerency still exists between those two states and has existed for many years.

I know as well as does the minister of the delicacy and difficulty and, indeed, the danger in this position. But I am impressed by the fact that if this interference continues these dangers will grow. I can only express the hope that the secretary general will find some way of solving this difficulty which, if it is not solved, may cause a good deal of trouble before the next assembly meets. Anything that the Canadian government can do to strengthen his hand in the efforts he is making I am sure would be well done.

Mr. Green: As the Leader of the Opposition has said, this is an extremely difficult position. It involves the steamship Inge Toft. We have been doing everything we could to help the secretary general arrive at a settlement of the difficulty.

The Chairman: Shall vote 85 carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. When I was speaking earlier, Mr. Chairman, I had casually mentioned the international court of justice and I had indicated that the president of the United States and the vice president, Mr. Nixon, had in the past few months made rather important statements with regard to the compulsory jurisdiction of the court and the position of the government of the United States in connection with this particular matter.

Since the end of the second world war, as compared with the situation that attended the court under the covenant, I think there has been a tendency—in which our country has participated—for countries to avoid opportunities of recourse to the international court of justice for the settlement of their disputes. I think that Canada ought to join with the United States in seeking to give this matter of compulsory jurisdiction at least further consideration, notwithstanding the attending difficulties.

Part of this problem, of course, is expressed in the reservations to the optional clause of the statute of the court as stated in article 36 of the statute, where states are permitted to submit to the jurisdiction of the court subject to certain reservations. In the case of Canada, in 1929 we made a declaration containing a number of reservations that perhaps have less relevance today than they had at that time. The situation under which we are prepared to accept the jurisdiction of the court is attended by certain reservations and certain conditions. We will accept the jurisdiction of the court where there is reciprocity, where there is ratification and where there is reservation as to a time limit. Then we also have made reservations as to other possible methods of settlement to which the parties have agreed to have recourse. Of course there is the reservation as to domestic jurisdiction and the reservation excluding disputes arising before the making of a declaration.

I suggest to the minister that I think the time has come to look at our position with regard to this situation, and to try and give the court increased status by giving it more to do. I think we might perhaps meet the problem involved in the domestic jurisdiction clause by realizing that many matters of domestic jurisdiction now have become of serious international concern. In any event, I think that Canada ought not to be behind the United States in a matter of this sort. It does not mean that we have to make a final decision but we ought to make at least a pronouncement as strong as that made by the vice president of the United States, one which I think would give much encouragement to those who believe in the gradual building up of the processes of law and adjudication in international affairs.

Mr. Green: It is the first time that this question has come to my attention. It is under study in the department. I am not in a position to make any statement on it at the moment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps at eight o'clock the minister might be able to do so.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: At six o'clock my colleague from Essex East brought up what I consider to be an important question in connection with the use of the world court. I should like to support what he said and express the hope in doing so that this would perhaps be a suitable initiative for the Canadian government or a delegation of the Canadian government to pursue at an appropriate place, and I think the appropriate place might well be the forthcoming assembly of the United Nations.

Last April the vice president of the United States, I think at the Academy of Sciences at Princeton university made a speech which in my opinion was of considerable significance and in which he put forward this idea. It was a speech which obviously had the support of the United States administration because it had been referred to in approving terms by the attorney general and, indeed, the president himself has mentioned it. I should like to quote one paragraph from this speech:

We—

Meaning the United States.

—should take the initiative in urging that in any future agreements provision be included to effect, one, that disputes which may arise as to the interpretation of the agreement should be submitted to the international court of justice at The Hague and, two, that the nations signing the agreement should be bound by the decision of the court in such cases.

This means that in any international agreements which may be made in the future there should be a clause to the effect that the signatories of the agreement would be bound by the decision of the international court of justice with respect to any dispute which might arise with regard to its interpretation. That would be one step in putting international law behind international policy.

I know that if the United States puts forward a proposal of this kind at the United Nations it would be suspect in the sense that it might become mixed up in the cold war and power politics and all sorts of things like that. But if a middle power, a power with a reputation such as Canada has, felt that this was a good proposal and felt that it should be followed up and put forward formally at a United Nations Assembly, that might be a very useful thing to do.

Possibly there are arguments against this proposal of which I am not aware, and the minister may wish to say a word about that. I am not asking him, naturally, to make any statement of government policy at this time, but I am asking him to give consideration to this question.

Mr. Green: The points raised by the Leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for Essex East, while they both deal with the international court of Justice, are quite different in context. I have the answer now to the questions asked this afternoon by the hon. member for Essex East.

There appears to be a rather widespread feeling that the international court has fallen somewhat short of expectations. This is not due to any lack of high qualifications among the 15 judges of the court, who represent the main forms of civilization and the principal legal systems of the world. Rather, this feeling seems to stem from the fact that in the past 13 years there have been only 30 contentious cases submitted to the court and many of these have been stricken from the list due to objections made to the court's jurisdiction. We should, of course, remember that during this same period the international court delivered 10 advisory opinions. It is none the less difficult to dispute the fact that the machinery of the court has not been sufficiently employed either by the United Nations or by the member states themselves.

Recently, there have been signs of a resurgence of interest in the court's work. In the United States there have been suggestions by the United States attorney general, the vice president and by President Eisenhower himself that the United States should re-examine its relationship to the international court, particularly as regards the domestic jurisdiction reservation attached to its declaration accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the international court. This reservation excludes disputes with regard to matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States as determined by the United States. Now, that is a very big reservation which was made by the United States.

Canada does not have a reservation of this kind. The Canadian declaration accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the international court excludes disputes with regard to questions which by international law fall exclusively within the jurisdiction of the dominion of Canada. In other words, we leave it to the international court to decide whether it has jurisdiction in any particular case and we do not reserve to ourselves the determination of whether the matter falls within domestic jurisdiction. It is to be hoped that in the future more and more states will come to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the court with a minimum of reservation.

With regard to the aspect raised by the Leader of the Opposition, this proposal is being studied in the department at the present time. It brings up a number of different considerations, and the officials are not yet in a position to make any recommendation as to what the attitude of Canada should be. But it is a very hopeful sign, as the Leader of the Opposition points out, that the United States is apparenly planning to move for the strengthening of the jurisdiction of the international court and we shall certainly go into the whole question very carefully. If there is some change that can be made which will strengthen the court and help dispose of some of these disputes, the Canadian government would certainly be in favour of such a change.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not rise again to provoke further comment by the minister. It is apparent that the administration is giving consideration to this matter which has been further emphasized by the observations of the Leader of the Opposition. But I do feel so keenly about this particular question and the court generally that I beg leave to say one or two words more.

I am sure that in the processes which are evolving toward the building of international organization it will be recognized that the judicial process is an important one. But if the court has fallen short of expectations, as the minister has just indicated, I think there are reasons other than those he has enumerated. I regret, as one who has followed the procedure of the court both as presently constituted and as it was under the covenant, that I must say that while Canada has been careful in the nominations she has made to the court, that cannot be said for all other countries. Canada, of course, had a nominee of her own on that court for nine years in the person of Mr. Justice John Reid, formerly head of the legal division in the Department of External Affairs. There have been some great jurists on the court, men such as Sir Arnold McNair and Professor Basdevant. Obviously I am not going to name individuals but anyone who has followed these matters knows perfectly well what I am talking about.

If the court has not been seized with more cases—the minister has mentioned 30 in all and 10 advisory opinions—the reason for it is that a number of decisions of the court —and this is certainly not an overstatement —have had more of a political than a judicial character. The fact that there have been only 10 advisory opinions in a period of 10 years compared with the number of advisory opinions of the older court is an indication that what I am saying is apparently at least worthy of examination.

It may be that at first glance the argument I am now putting forward is an argument against too active consideration at this time of the removal of the compulsory jurisdiction clause. I do not believe that is the case because the removal will not take place forthwith. If we could give some leadership along the lines we have suggested, that together with further emphasis on the desirability of a high calibre of members on the court, will I think strengthen that body. It is noteworthy that students of international law complain bitterly along the lines I have indicated in these few words.

There is one further observation I should like to make on another matter altogether which comes under this item and that is that in the likelihood of a summit meeting or a series of summit meetings, meetings which possibly will be outside the United Nations as such, there is a strong argument for these meetings possibly taking place at the United Nations. Anything that gives additional authority and prestige to the United Nations is, I think, desirable. The meetings in 1954 arising out of the Geneva conference did take place in Geneva at the United Nations building. I simply express the hope, that now that Canada must become reconciled to the fact that the Prime Minister's invitation for the holding of the summit meeting in Canada will not bear fruit, it might be desirable for the minister to give consideration as to what steps Canada could take toward clothing the United Nations with this additional prestige. "Prestige" is hardly the word because the United Nations itself has acquired prestige by its great accomplishments. While all matters having to do with threats to the peace or with the maintenance of the peace need not necessarily be dealt with under the direct aegis of the United Nations, it seems to me that as much as possible matters of international concern should find a place for discussion within the precincts of the United Nations either in Europe or New York.

Mr. Green: The situation is not quite as the hon. member has suggested in that there have been no decisions made as to where a summit meeting would be held.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know.

Mr. Green: The holding of such a meeting in Canada has not been ruled out at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sorry, I did not know that.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I have a few observations I should like to make on the United Nations aspect of this vote. Perhaps I might add to what my colleague the hon. member for Essex East has just said in support of bringing the United Nations into the summit conference to the maximum possible extent. I know the difficulties on that score but I hope they can be overcome and I hope that the secretary general of the United Nations himself could be associated in some way with a summit conference of that kind.

As the minister said in his statement this afternoon this kind of conference is desirable. Perhaps it would have been a good thing if we could have held it a year ago. We would not have had so much talk about it now. I believe it was Earl Atlee who said the other day that he was all for conferences —on the summit, on the slopes, or even on the level—and perhaps they are not always any easier on the level than they are at the summit.

Mention was also made this afternoon of the possible relationship of the United Nations to the Berlin difficulty. That difficulty will again be on the agenda next week at Geneva. The minister said this afternoon there are western rights in Berlin which must be protected. We all agree with that, but the problem is how are these rights going to be protected without causing trouble? How are they going to be maintained in the circumstances in which we find ourselves provided that those who are anxious to weaken or destroy them take steps to that end? And while the United Nations has no direct relationship to this particular problem, and while the secretary general as one would expect has been extremely cautious in any observations he has made—I think confining those observations to the willingness of the United Nations to take any action that is required of it as a result of a four-power agreement—it may well be that in some form or other, if a deadlock is reached the United Nations will have to be brought in, perhaps through the secretary general again who is a great international trouble shooter, in a form which will make it possible to resolve that dilemma.

There are one or two other United Nations matters which the minister talked about this afternoon. He mentioned the progress that had been made at the Geneva conference in regard to nuclear tests. I confess that that progress has not really been very encouraging though perhaps if there is any progress at all we should take some encouragement from it. The minister expressed the hope that the technical findings which had been agreed upon there might facilitate political agreement. It is not perhaps a matter now for technical findings but for political agreement. I am not sure whether technical agreement, important as it may be, will facilitate political agreement unless there is a will to agree and if there is not a will to agree on this particular problem of nuclear tests, how can we take much hope out of other negotiations for broader progress in disarmament?

The minister mentioned, I think, that 17 articles of a draft treaty had been agreed upon. He knows what the 17 articles are. Most of them, I should think, are the articles that matter least. That would be the normal course of things. There are articles you agree on first and you reserve the difficult ones for later discussion.

This leads me to the subject of disarmament generally which is also in a rather discouraging situation at the United Nations because as a result of all the talk and all the negotiations and all the efforts of the last 10 years we have now reached the position where the agency for further progress is a committee of 83 members of the United Nations. One would have to be very optimistic indeed to get much comfort out of that alteration from a small committee to one of 83 members.

It seems to me that the situation which has resulted in the constitution of this committee of the whole—because that of course is what it is—is one that we should do our best to avoid in the future. The minister knows that the difficulty has been over the kind of balanced representation which the communist bloc at the United Nations will accept and which will also be acceptable to the United States and the western delegations.

There has been a strong effort made by certain of the delegations on the western side in the United Nations to make sure that all the representations should be on a kind of proportionate mathematical basis as a result of which there would always be a predominant majority of non-communist powers. That, of course, is perfectly reasonable in terms of mathematical representation at the United Nations. But it has resulted in a disarmament committee of 83, and it has also resulted in an outer space committee on which the Russians and their friends will not sit—and indeed where the Indians, as the minister pointed out, will not sit—because the communist delegations have felt they were not given adequate representation. Surely, it is more important at this stage to get general participation in this effort than to worry too much about the exact mathematical proportions of representation on all sides. I throw out the idea to the minister for consideration, whether in the future it might not be a reasonable position for a delegation to adopt, including the Canadian delegation, in order to avoid this kind of deadlock.

The reasonable position is that in principle representations on these United Nations committees, which have a definite political significance, as so many of them have, should be divided, one-third, one-third, one-third—one-third from the western side, one-third from the communist side and one-third from the uncommitted side. There will be very strong objection levelled at that kind of proposal from certain delegations at the United Nations and it does not reflect, I realize, the feelings of the membership of the assembly at the present time, but it is a very reasonable reflection of the division of the world into three camps, the uncommitted camp, the communist camp and what we call occasionally a little loosely the free world. Perhaps the time has come when it is more important to accept that kind of agreed representation in numbers than to set up a committee, one so important as a committee on outer space, which is now working and working very effectively within the limits imposed on it by non-participation of the Indian and the communist states. Perhaps it is more important to get those states participating than to insist on that absolute mathematical proportion of membership which we found so desirable in the past to insist upon. I do not know whether the minister would like to say something about these points before I go on to another matter.

Mr. Green: I think I dealt with most of them in my remarks this morning.

Mr. Pearson: The minister also mentioned this morning something about a permanent stand-by force at the United Nations, a matter which was on the agenda of the United Nations assembly last year, as he pointed out, because of a report of the secretary general. This is a matter on which no progress was possible then for reasons which I think were mentioned in some detail last April when we discussed this matter.

The minister has pointed out an objection to pursuing this question at the present time. In that connection he mentioned that the secretary general himself, who has had a great deal to do with this, of course, has expressed some doubt as to the practicability and the desirability of pushing this issue of a permanent United Nations police or peace force, or stand-by force, whatever you want to call it, at this particular time. The argument that has been advanced not only by the secretary general but by others is that the circumstances which might arise might be of such a character that it would not be possible to organize and constitute a permanent force which would be suitable for all those different situations.

I do not think myself, Mr. Chairman, that that is a very impressive argument. I am not thinking of a United Nations permanent stand-by force which would be trained to meet every emergency which might arise but I am thinking of a United Nations permanent stand-by force which would be on the job ready to go into action if a situation arose which would require that kind of intervention. I have often asked myself in the last year or so what might have happened if we had had that kind of permanently organized and trained and equipped United Nations peace force at the time of the Hungarian uprising. If action could have been taken at the United Nations assembly at that time by a two-thirds majority of the assembly—and I think it would have been possible to get that two-thirds majority—which would have resulted in sending to Hungary a couple of thousand or 1,500 men who would have represented the United Nations as an international force which had been dropped there, if they had gone there, it would have been infinitely more difficult, I think, for any invader or aggressor from the outside to ride roughshod over the freedom fighters in Budapest.

I hope it will be possible in the future to organize and have ready that kind of contingent, ready for action in the various nations which subscribe to the force which could be called upon because they would have made their contingent available in advance. I hope it will soon be possible to have that kind of contingent in being.

When the secretary general put forward the objections which he did, as I understand them—there is a far greater objection, of course, which he has not mentioned because he is a servant of the United Nations and the United Nations consists of 83 members—perhaps the basic objection is that from the communist powers, who insist that this kind of thing would become the agency of what they call the imperialist powers. That is the reason why when this proposal was made at the last assembly and put forward by the United States it got such a very cold reception in certain quarters and that is why a country like Canada, middle powers like Canada, can take the initiatives in this field which are not open to the big powers. I have already made the suggestion that if it is not practical at the present time to make progress of this kind at the assembly, and it may not be because I know of the difficulties—no one wants to break up the United Nations because of division over this kind of thing—if it is not possible in this way perhaps it would be possible for certain middle powers, six, seven, eight, nine or ten of the status and stature and reputation of Canada to get together and see whether they could not work out some agreement by which they would themselves, through an international agreement binding only on themselves, equip and train certain contingents for international service which would be available to the United Nations if a United Nations assembly resolution was ever passed to call on them for that service. That is the kind of initiative, perhaps, that Canada could take, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Churchill: Would this be an armed force?

Mr. Pearson: It would be a para-military force, I think, a police force which would not have heavy equipment, or anything like that, because this kind of force would be of no use whatever if any country wishes to declare war, or go to war openly against any other country. It would only be of value, —but I think it would be of great value— in policing armistice arrangements, in patrolling disturbed areas such as they are doing now in the Middle East. They could symbolize the United Nations presence when a government of the United Nations wishes to have some kind of United Nations presence on its territory. For instance, when the king of Trans-Jordan thought himself in great danger a year or so ago he considered it a help to have a United Nations presence there on the spot, and they are still there; and it might well be that some one country finding itself threatened could ask for this kind of United Nations intervention. Whether the men would be armed or not perhaps is not so important. They certainly would have side arms; they are not likely to have anything else but they would be there available on the spot. They would be serving under the blue flag of the United Nations. They would represent the international conscience and by their very presence in a disturbed area they might hinder an aggressor's intention. If however an aggressor did decide to move, well, the die would be cast and the United Nations could not do very much about it. But that other would be the main purpose for a contingent of this kind.

While it may be difficult to make much progress in this matter at the present time, I think this is an objective which is worth pursuing and I think it is one that perhaps the Canadian government can pursue as effectively as any other member of the United Nations.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, very briefly I want to say that the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition are constructive remarks to which the new Secretary of State for External Affairs should give very serious consideration. I think Canada's position in international affairs has been growing in prestige over the years and, with the exception of some recent temporary setbacks, Canada's influence has been growing. If I can judge the mood of the Canadian people they are far more inclined to support action by the United Nations and by a police force than they are action even by such a group of powers as the NATO alliance. Therefore I think this is an opportunity for Canada to give leadership to the world.

We should not only say to the United Nations and campaign in the United Nations for the creation of a permanent police force to which Canada would make a substantial contribution but I think we should go even further. Although this further step might be considered only a gesture, although it might be considered rather impractical at this time, I think it would create a real impact in the world if a middle power such as Canada, a power that is identified with the west, a power that shares the northern regions with the Soviet union, were to announce by way of a national policy that Canada was prepared to place all of her troops and armed forces at the disposal of the United Nations for such a police force.

I am hopeful that the day will arrive when national armaments can be cut back, indeed that the day will arrive when nothing more than a national police force will be necessary and that national armed forces and national defence as we now know it may become a thing of the past. As the Leader of the Opposition has said, such an Atlantic Nations police force could not withstand a nuclear attack or attack by a major power. It seems to me that in this day and age defence against nuclear attack is becoming more and more difficult. That being the case, an international police force comprising defence forces having at their disposal in the main or perhaps exclusively conventional weapons is an important need to protect the world against brush fire attacks, as they are called, and is also important as a gesture to all the nations of the world that collectively the United Nations is prepared to defend the peace.

I view with great misgiving any decision by the Canadian government to permit nuclear and thermonuclear weapons within Canada, and I think this kind of gesture by Canada, this kind of idea advanced by the new Secretary of State for External Affairs would be the type of bold and imaginative action that might receive far more support at this time than we might expect. Canada would be taking a leading and forthright position by saying to the world that we are prepared to forgo national unilateral defence if our armed services and defence budget can be used by the United Nations to constitute part of an international police force.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in other days, whenever there was a statement made by me on external affairs, the present minister always began his observations by reproaching the minister of that day for not saying anything about Pacific security. He used to say that we had a phobia about Atlantic security but when it came to the Pacific we were cold and silent. I used to spend a good deal of time defending the policy of the government then in respect of Pacific security, and the present minister used to say, "Well, why does Canada not join the southeast Asia treaty organization or ANZUS?" I was somewhat surprised this afternoon that the minister spent little time on Pacific security. I wonder whether he would like to say a word about the two organizations and whether our policy in this regard is likely to be changed in the near future.

Mr. Green: This is another example of one's sins finding one out. However, one of the great attractions to me in being Secretary of State for External Affairs is that at long last I am able to do something to look after the Pacific.

Mr. Pearson: Inasmuch as the minister has had years to think this out he must know exactly what he wants to do, and I wonder whether he would tell us at long last what he is going to do.

Item agreed to.

88. Canadian government's contribution to the United Nations special fund in an amount of ;$2,000,000 U.S., notwithstanding the payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of December, 1958, which is, $1,931,250.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister say something about vote 88 because it is a contribution of nearly $2 million to a new and very important development, the United Nations special fund?

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the United Nations special fund, the establishment of which was decided by the twelfth general assembly, will begin operations in 1959. The new fund is designed to assist projects in the fields of resource surveys, technical training, demonstrations, education, public administration, etc. The fund will concentrate on relatively large projects so as to avoid undue dispersion of its resources. It will be controlled by a governing council which will consist of 18 states elected from members of the United Nations and its specialized agencies and will provide for equal representation of economically more developed countries and underdeveloped countries. Provision has been made for a close working association with the international bank.

The United States is prepared to give up to $38 million to ETAP and the special fund taken together, on condition that the United States contribution is not more than 40 per cent of the total pledged to both programs. United Kingdom authorities have in mind a contribution to the fund equal to approximately 7 per cent of the fund's total resources, that is, $2.24 million if total contributions amount to $30 million. The Netherlands are pledged to make a contribution of $2.4 million, while the contributions of France and the Soviet union will be of the order of $1 million each. Italy has pledged $1 million to be divided between ETAP and the special fund. Japan has pledged $480,000 to the special fund. Some of the pledges contain matching provisions. Cabinet decided on September 30 that, subject to the approval of parliament, Canada will contribute $2 million U.S. to the special fund in 1959-60.

Mr. Pearson: How is the fund to be organized? Is there to be a special agency or special organization set up by the United Nations? Is there a director of the fund appointed yet? How is it to be administered?

Mr. Green: Apparently this is a separate entity, but not a separate agency. It works very closely with the international bank under the guidance of the general assembly, and there has been an administrator appointed, Mr. Paul Hoffman, who was director of Marshall aid. Actual operations under the fund commenced a week ago.

Item agreed to.

89. Contribution to the United Nations children's fund, $650,000.

Mr. Pearson: All I want to say about vote 89 is that I cannot think of a better way of spending $650,000 in the discharge of our international obligations.

Item agreed to.

North Atlantic Treaty Organization—

90. Special administrative expense including payments of remuneration, subject to the approval of the governor in council and notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, in connection with the assignment by the Canadian government of Canadians to the international staff of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (part recoverable from the North Atlantic Treaty Organization), $60,245.

Mr. Pearson: Vote 90 deals with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and perhaps this provides an opportunity for me to say a word about the organization and perhaps ask the minister a question or two. There is no need for anyone in this committee to elaborate on the importance of this organization, both in a military and nonmilitary way. The minister told us about that this afternoon. But I think that anyone who appreciates, as we all do, the importance of NATO and who reflects on what might have happened to the western world if NATO had not been founded 10 years ago, must worry about some of the developments that are now taking place which, on the face of them, and with the information that is available to those who have not other sources of information, seem to threaten the vitality and development of the organization.

There is bound to be, of course, difficulty in the development of an organization of this kind. Perhaps we get a little too impatient and we think that in 10 years we should do that which has not been done in hundreds or thousands of years before, the building up of a collective organization not only for security but for nonmilitary purposes. In the context of history, we have undoubtedly made progress but I worry, as I am sure other hon. members worry, that we may lose some of that progress. If we do not move forward in NATO, we are not going to stand still and undoubtedly we will move backward.

Some of these things that worry us have come to a head, for instance, as illustrated in the decision made yesterday and which was announced in the house today, of the withdrawal of United States NATO squadrons, on orders of the NATO commander, from the NATO airfields in France to airfields out of France because of a dispute between France and the United States over the control and possession of nuclear weapons to be used in an emergency by those squadrons or to be used perhaps from those air bases in the form of missiles. I think the minister referred to this matter as one of vital concern when I asked him this morning in the house whether or not there had been discussions about it in the NATO council, as I expect there had been, and he said there had been.

It certainly is a matter of vital concern. I wonder whether it would be appropriate for him to say anything about the Canadian view in regard to this decision of the NATO commander, and in regard to the questions which made that decision imperative in the eyes of General Norstad. We cannot forget that as these United States squadrons move out of France, I think it is nine Canadian squadrons that remain on French NATO air bases. If this dispute is not settled in a way which is satisfactory to France, the possibilities of further damage to the solidarity of the alliance are considerable. Surely, therefore, it is of the greatest possible importance that this kind of dispute should not arise again, and that some arrangement be made for the care, control and supervision of nuclear tactical weapons if they are to be used by the NATO powers.

Then, there is another matter, not so immediate and not so dramatic a danger, in what I think is the growing pressure on the collective system of considerations of national prestige. I sense a departure from the collective attitude of 10 years ago and an emphasis on returning to national control, national sovereignty over national forces. If that kind of thing continues, in the long run it will be an even greater threat to NATO than any particular dispute of the kind which I have just mentioned.

There is, too, the development of political consultation. Perhaps it is not fair to ask the minister too many questions on this because I realize he has just taken over this portfolio and it takes a little time to get into these things. If he feels these questions are not quite fair, he will naturally avoid them.

Mr. Green: No, go ahead.

Mr. Pearson: I should like, if he has the information, to give me his impression of the development of political consultation inside the NATO council. I think progress has been made in that regard in the last year. I hope it has. I hope that all these questions of Berlin, nuclear warfare, and all the rest of it, a summit conference and everything else that concerns the NATO countries, are discussed in a NATO conference before the United States and the United Kingdom make up their mind. Because consultation, if it means anything at all, does not mean the United Kingdom and the United States going into the council and telling other members what they have decided. It means the representatives of these countries going into the NATO council and saying, this is the problem; how do you think we should deal with it?

I should like to think of that kind of consultation developing in NATO, because if it does not, then as a political agency NATO will weaken and as the atmosphere of crisis disappears, NATO will disappear with it.

Finally, there is the question of economic co-operation, not inside NATO itself because NATO perhaps is not the right agency to act for its members in respect of economic questions. However, if economic matters develop in Europe in such a way that we have two European economic groups and a North American economic group, and economic conflict develops between those groups, or if nonco-operation develops between those groups, then NATO as a political and military agency is going to feel the effect of that development. It will weaken the organization.

Those are the three main dangers, as I see them, which confront this essential collective security organization at the present time. There is the military threat because of the tendency now to split apart rather than to come together, and look after our own defences. This tendency was also illustrated a few months ago when the French government felt it necessary to take part of its Mediterranean fleet out of NATO control. I do not criticize the French for that because the major part of the British fleet and the major part of the United States fleet are not under NATO control.

If we criticize the French for that, we should remember that the whole question of our continental defence was taken out of NATO control or, indeed, was never under NATO control. The French probably thought of that when they began to make their own adjustments in the Mediterranean. So there is this military danger to collective action, there is the political danger of nonco-operation and then there is the economic danger of conflict between the two European economic areas which may be developing and a North American economic area which may be separating from Europe. I do not know whether it is asking too much to ask the minister at this time to say something about this matter but I will do so just the same.

Mr. Green: I think the Leader of the Opposition is unduly pessimistic with regard to NATO and the activities under that alliance. I have, of course, only been in a position to read the dispatches for about the last five weeks but I can say there is close political consultation in the permanent council of NATO on which our Canadian representative is very active. For example, the council has been following closely the activities of the conference at Geneva so that it may be in a position to give assistance or give advice and also to keep the respective governments aware of the trends.

I see no sign of the disintegration of NATO. We all understand that if there were to be such a disintegration it would be disastrous not only for Canada but for all the other nations which are in the alliance. It is true that from time to time difficult problems arise, and the one raised by the Leader of the Opposition on the orders of the day this morning is a difficult one. However, I do not consider that it would be of much help in the solution of this difficult problem for me as the foreign minister of Canada or, for that matter, for the other foreign ministers to start placing blame or being critical. In these questions I have found that there are always two sides, and sometimes more. Of course, that statement applies to domestic issues as well as to issues in the foreign field. However, I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that this government has done and will continue to do everything possible to assist in getting these problems ironed out. As hon. members know, we even have problems in Canada between ten provinces. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is an expert on problems of this sort. Wherever there are human beings trying to work along together, I suppose there are bound to be problems.

With regard also to co-operation in the economic field, I think there is no reason for discouragement. Two or three weeks ago we had a visit from the presidents of the three European communities. To me it was quite startling to realize to what extent these six European nations had been able to work out methods of co-operation, especially the French and the Germans. I found it almost beyond comprehension when I learned of the extent to which they have gone in working out methods for co-operation. We have had reports here this afternoon from two of the members of the house who attended the Atlantic congress. They have reported that the meetings of this conference were highly successful and that is the opinion of the government. The whole trend is toward more co-operation.

I realize that the Leader of the Opposition is wise in drawing these dangers to the attention of the government. I can assure him that we have them very much in mind. I do not think there is any difference between our objectives and the objectives which the Leader of the Opposition has in mind. I should not like to have the impression go abroad in Canada that the NATO alliance is faltering or that it is in danger of breaking up. I do not believe such to be the case. I think that this second ten years of the alliance will see even greater strides made than was the case in the first ten.

Mr. Pearson: I should merely like to say that I am glad to get the minister's reassuring statement. I would not wish him or the committee to think that I myself have felt that the alliance was disintegrating or breaking up. I hope I did not give that impression. I said that there were pressures against the alliance that were becoming noticeable, as was inevitable in the development of any alliance. Indeed, one of the reasons why some of us have been worrying about this matter is the speech made by the secretary general himself. I refer to the one which he made in London in which he pointed out that there were these problems, difficulties and pressures. It is just as well to recognize them so that we can do something about them and make the alliance stronger by meeting these difficulties before they become dangers.

I am glad the minister feels the way he does. I am sure there is no difference between the government and us on this side in our general determination to make this North Atlantic Treaty Organization work not only for defence but for the development of the Atlantic community.

Item agreed to.

92. Further contribution by the Canadian government towards the cost of constructing the North Atlantic Treaty Organization permanent headquarters in an amount of 54,072,000 French francs, notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of December 1958, which is, $124,420.

Mr. Pearson: Can the minister tell us when these headquarters will be completed? I know their construction has been a long and difficult operation. Is this the last vote we shall need for this purpose?

Mr. Green: Yes. It is hoped that these headquarters will be completed in October.

Item agreed to.

International joint commission—

96. Salaries and expenses of the commission including, subject to the approval of the governor in council and notwithstanding the International Boundary Waters Treaty Act, as amended, payment of salary of the chairman at $17,500 per annum, $112,124.

Mr. Pearson: The minister I think mentioned the work of the commission in respect of the Chicago diversion and the Columbia river references. Is there anything more he can add to what he said? It is one of the most important matters before the country now. Can he elaborate on what he said about the Columbia river reference?

Mr. Green: As the Leader of the Opposition knows, the government in January or, as a matter of fact, early in December decided that the practical thing to do in order to reach some agreement with the United States about the development of the Columbia river was to have a reference made to the international joint commission for the working out of the problem of downstream benefits or, in other words, what compensation should be paid to Canada for storing water in the Columbia river north of the boundary. We suggested this procedure to the United States government and they agreed and, as I outlined in my remarks this morning, a reference was made to the international joint commission. Since that time they have been holding meetings to deal with this subject. We have been able to bring about the close co-operation of the province of British Columbia which is directly involved because it has control of the water, the dominion having control over the projects that are put on the river because the Columbia is an international river and there was an act put through the house some years ago giving the dominion a licensing control over such projects.

Considerable progress has been made in the course of those discussions, and as a matter of fact I believe that today General McNaughton and other members of the commission are meeting to study reports which have come in from their technical advisers and to further work out terms for an agreement in respect of the downstream benefits. In addition to that, the Department of External Affairs has been working with the state department of the United States on the terms of an overriding agreement which will have to be signed once the downstream benefit problem has been settled.

This is a great project. I believe that the power possibilities of this co-operative development are a great deal larger even than those of the St. Lawrence seaway. So we are not dealing with a small question at all. This is of vital importance to Canadians who live in the province of British Columbia and also to Americans living in the northwest states. I am confident that we shall reach agreement and that eventually these projects can be undertaken. It is the policy of the government to assist the province of British Columbia in the construction of projects on the Columbia river in Canada. Not only does it mean a tremendous development in Canada but it will be another example, like the seaway project, of co-operation between the two nations resulting in great benefit to the peoples of both. It looks as though it will be possible to reach a satisfactory solution in respect of this question.

Mr. Herridge: As one who comes from the district of the Columbia I listened with great interest to the minister's résumé and report of happenings in connection with the discussions on the Columbia since the end of last year. I want to congratulate the government on taking the course of action they have in resuming the discussions. The report of the discussions and of the developments to date is one which is of great interest. I assume it is true to say that the discussions have been proceeding satisfactorily.

Mr. Green: That is right.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has given us an encouraging report on this very important matter, and if these negotiations work out satisfactorily, as we all hope they will, no doubt a great deal of the credit will be due to the persistence, determination and energy of General McNaughton who has worked so hard and so efficiently in connection with this operation. It is true that an agreement has been reached on a 50-50 division of downstream benefits, or is that matter as yet undecided?

Mr. Green: There has been no questioning a division along those lines. The problems arise in connection with the cost of installations and the cost of additions to existing power plants below the border, and who is to pay for transmission lines carrying the power which is given in the form of downstream benefits, back to the Canadian border. There are various other questions of this kind which get too deep for politicians and have to be digested by the engineers.

I am very glad that the Leader of the Opposition mentioned General McNaughton. He is in charge of these negotiations for Canada, and has been doing a splendid job.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister if he could tell us with regard to the Chicago water diversion what is the situation in the United States regarding the suggestion, or the steps which have been taken, for the judicial determination of the rights which the corporation of Chicago has sought to exercise as to the waters of lake Michigan? What is the status of the proposed judicial proceedings at this moment?

Mr. Green: I have not the answer to that question available at the moment. I will be very glad to get it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I can very well understand the minister's immediate problem. I heard him say, when talking to his officials: "Was that not a matter of legislation?" It is true that there have been bills before congress with regard to this matter, some involving presidenial veto, but as the legislative process is not likely to yield results for Chicago there was a suggestion made that the matter might be referred to the supreme court of the United States for an advisory opinion. What I wanted to indicate to the minister was this. If that does eventually come about—if it has not already done so—I take it the Canadian government would object to a procedure of this kind because we could not possibly be bound in a matter of this sort by a decision handed down by a court in the United States. The only effect such a decision could have would be on the nationals of the country in which the court resides and it would, I think, be an occasion of international discourtesy if any attempt were made by the United States to have the problem resolved in that manner.

Mr. Green: The hon. gentleman can rest assured that the government will be watching any movement of this kind. I have received the answer to his question. There are two issues before the United States courts in connection with this Chicago diversion, but they are comparatively minor matters and they do not affect Canadian interests at all.

Item agreed to.

Special—

98. Colombo plan, $50,000,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks with regard to item 98 which deals with the amounts of money to be voted for the Colombo plan.

I find that this year the government is suggesting an increase of $15 million in the sum voted last year, that is a sum of $50 million in all, when last year there had also been an increase as compared to the year before.

This item, Mr. Chairman, is extremely important, not only for the underdeveloped countries concerned, but also for the western nations. Those amounts are as important to us as any expenditure with regard to national defence, for this is an aspect of national defence and I should, for my part, welcome this item being transferred to national defence estimates, because Canadian citizens would more readily understand why we are asked to vote so large an amount.

Let us not forget that communist designs, at least for the present, operate at the social, economic and political levels more than on the military level. When we help out underdeveloped countries living under a democratic system, we are fighting communism in the most significant field and by the most efficient means. As far as the needs of underdeveloped countries are concerned, it would, I think, be pointless to speak lengthily on the subject. Yet, I believe it might be valuable to read a few lines from a speech on the needs of underdeveloped countries, by a member of the legislature of West Pakistan who on December 7, 1958, in New Delhi, expressed the following opinion:

(Text):

But as things stand, the inequality in economic development in the countries forming the commonwealth is so glaring that, in the present day context, it can by no means be viewed with equanimity. The population of the five old commonwealth countries—United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa—numbers about 75 millions and the population of the five new commonwealth countries—India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Ghana and Malaya—plus British dependencies numbers about 490 millions. This latter figure comprises mostly peoples of Asiatic and African origin. The average income in the five new Asiatic and African countries is less than £25 sterling per annum and the average income in the older countries is not less than £250 sterling per annum. The diet in poor countries is deficient in quality as well as quantity. People live at a subhuman level of squalor and poverty—undernourished, underclad and living in the most unhygienic conditions. The result of undernourishment is that health in poor countries is undermined by disease and capacity for hard work is lost, minds are stunted and lives are shortened. A baby girl can expect to live for 32 years if born in Calcutta or Karachi and 71 years if born in London.

(Translation):

However, Mr. Chairman, we must understand that, if the needs of underdeveloped countries are unlimited, our ability to pay is unfortunately not so. As a matter of fact, I think it seems that those needs will only continue to increase until those countries manage to become industrialized. I therefore wonder if the help we are now supplying them under the Colombo plan— I wonder whether it would not be possible—

(Text):

I wish to direct a question to the minister. Would it not be possible within the organization of the Colombo plan to establish a committee that would examine the possibility of encouraging foreign investment which would be a means of extending governmental help? I do not know if this has been done but the need is great and if it were possible to bring private investment to these countries it would be of vast assistance to everybody concerned.

Mr. Chairman, I have a final question. Would it be possible for the minister to give us a breakdown of figures representing the contributions of various countries participating in the Colombo plan, for last year, for example? I do not want to say anything more at present and I would be happy if the minister could answer my two questions.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the question of helping provide funds for the development of these countries would really be a matter of private investment. The Colombo plan is a government plan and is not designed for actually putting up the money for private construction in these countries. It is an arrangement between governments.

The second question as I understood it was for the amounts that had been expended by each country contributing under the Colombo plan. I find that those figures are not available at the moment, one reason being that some of the countries contribute in sterling while Canada contributes in dollars. Apparently there has been no table worked out to show how each country is contributing. Canada's total expenditures to March 31 of this year have been $231 million. The contribution of the United States amounted to $2,676 million.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word about this vote for the Colombo plan which represents an increase of $15 million bringing our contributions next year up to $50 million. I can assure the minister there is no objection on this side to that. I believe it is a good move. As the minister knows, the Colombo plan is a plan for technical and capital assistance to the countries receiving help under the plan. It has been a great success and one reason for this is that there has been co-operation between the receiving and the giving countries. There is no feeling of give on the one hand and take on the other. As far as I know, everyone has worked together, and I hope we can keep it that way.

Another reason for the success of the plan surely has been that it has been a capital and technical assistance program. But it seems to me—and perhaps the minister will have something to say about this—that the plan is becoming increasingly, as far as Canada is concerned, one for the donor country to give consumer goods to the receiving country. I would like to know what the figures are in that respect for the current year. I think the minister mentioned some of the figures in his statement this morning. If this program becomes one for surplus disposal of agricultural products it will not be fulfilling the objectives of the plan as it was conceived in the agreement in the first place.

I frankly realize that in other years consumer goods have gone to Asian countries under the Colombo plan; but in the cases where that happened there was a real need in the sense that there was a famine or something of that kind, or there was a strong request made by the receiving countries for the assistance given to take that form, and which resulted in every case in counterpart funds being set up in the receiving countries. But if we as a donor country take the initiative in persuading—perhaps the minister will tell me this is not being done—but if we take the initiative in that regard in persuading the receiving countries to take surplus wheat, surplus flour, skim milk or even dried codfish, then we are not, I suggest, carrying out the original purposes of the plan.

I am not opposing the gift of those consumer goods to countries in Asia that need them. That is quite a different question. Perhaps we can do this in some other way, but I am questioning the use of the Colombo plan as a mechanism for surplus disposal of agricultural products unless that is a real need in the receiving countries, unless it is as the result of a strong demand from those receiving countries that the assistance should take that form. The minister knows that it is a capital assistance and technical assistance program and I hope it will be kept that way. In connection with the Colombo plan, will the minister tell me how it is being administered at the present time in Ottawa? Have there been any changes? Who now lays down the policy which governs what form the Canadian contribution will take?

Mr. Green: In Ottawa the policy is worked out by an interdepartmental committee on which the main departments represented are trade and commerce, finance and external affairs.

The Leader of the Opposition has been somewhat critical about the fact that a portion of the contributions to the Colombo plan has been in foodstuffs. Apparently this has always been the practice. For example, wheat has been given often in times when wheat was scarce in Canada, and we have given wheat both within and outside the Colombo plan. Furthermore, there is a real need in at least some of those countries for meeting the pressure of expanding population on the food supplies. Always the goods supplied are to be provided and worked out by agreement. I think the receiving countries appreciate the situation in which Canada finds herself, just as we appreciate the situation in their countries, and in each case it has been possible to work out amicably an agreement as to just what would be supplied under the Colombo plan. Further, when wheat is supplied, I believe the usual practice is that it is sold domestically by the country which receives it, and then the proceeds are invested in furthering some development project.

Mr. Pearson: I hope I did not leave the minister under a misunderstanding. I was not complaining that consumer goods, especially wheat, had been given to Colombo plan countries by Canada. I was expressing concern that the proportion of consumer goods was increasing, and I asked for some information on that score, and also that, whereas to my best recollection in earlier days the consumer goods were requested by the receiving country, now perhaps the initiative in respect of the consumer goods of the plan was coming from the donor countries. That was the only concern I had because, as the minister knows, the initial purpose of the plan was one of capital and technical assistance. While it is at times absolutely necessary to send wheat and flour to those countries, in the long run perhaps it is more important to give them help in the form of capital assistance which will increase agricultural production in those countries in the future and then this kind of consumer help will not be necessary.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It seems to me there is a very important principle involved in the matter raised by the Leader of the Opposition. We do not hold the Secretary of State for External Affairs accountable for what may be the situation which however, deserves careful consideration by him.

As the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, the Colombo plan owes much of its success from the initial period to the fact that the assistance given to the receiving countries has been on the basis of bilateral arrangements following the council meetings where the general principles of policy are laid down. Each donor country—Canada being among the major donor countries—makes its arrangements on a bilateral basis with the receiving country. Now, it seems to me the question that is important in this particular discussion is, was a request made by any receiving country, for instance, for dry skim milk, or did the Canadian government feel that because of the particular situation basically conceived that dry skim milk should be disposed of through a surplus disposal policy such as we have complained of in the case of some other countries.

Any country in Asia that needs dry skim milk ought to receive it from a country such as Canada if we are in a position to supply it. The first question is, was there a request from the receiving country, because I was told by the Minister of Agriculture when I discussed the representations made by the Ontario dairy producers who had suggested a disposal program for dry skim milk that there was no demand on the part of those receiving countries. Within a short time the government announced a policy in which a certain percentage of dry skim milk was going to be given to certain countries that are the beneficiaries of Colombo plan aid.

Is the minister in a position to tell us whether or not there was a request made? What prompted the government to reverse its policy and to announce that it was going to place in storage an available quantity of dry skim milk for countries in Asia? I do not quarrel with the practice but I think it is important to observe the principle carefully followed in the Colombo plan operations. If the minister cannot give us the answer right now I will understand, but I do think that the matter is one of importance.

Mr. Green: I believe that no dried skim milk has been given under the Colombo plan at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Agriculture announced it.

Mr. Green: The hon. member need have no worries on that score. Any dried skim milk has been given under different schemes, for example, through UNICEF. I also understand that the requests for other foodstuffs have come from the recipients under the Colombo plan.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, on this item and dealing with the question that has been raised, I want to say as I have said on previous occasions that I think the government would not be following the purpose of the Colombo plan and the intention of the people who initiated it if capital assistance under the plan were withdrawn and the moneys were used extensively for the provision of foodstuffs. On the other hand, it is perfectly correct, as the minister has said, that under this vote in previous years certain sums have been used for the purchase of foodstuffs.

There is no question but that the nations within the Colombo plan area need great quantities of capital equipment. It is also just as obviously correct that these people are undernourished and have need of food. I would be very much opposed if Canada did anything to restrict the kind of action we have had in the past in either direction, either by restricting the capital contribution or restricting the quantity of food that is sent.

The fact that there is a substantial increase in the item is very encouraging and as long as the increase in the item rather than the former original vote is being used for additional foodstuffs I cannot see that there should be any objection either by Canada or by India. We are a very prosperous nation in relation to the Indian economy. I believe we can certainly spare capital equipment from this country in the amount set forth in this estimate, and it is a perfectly obvious fact that Canada has excessive surpluses of certain agricultural commodities. What under the sun can be wrong with the Canadian nation, by way of a vote in the estimates, spending Canadian money to pay our agricultural producers for valuable foodstuffs in order to improve the nutritional standards of the people of the Colombo plan countries?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is nothing wrong when you state it that way.

Mr. Argue: That is the only way I have stated it, and I want to state it in this positive way in order to remove any feeling of a negative approach that might have been generated by the comments that have already been made. As the Prime Minister has said about me on former occasions, I want more and more and more, and that is exactly the point I am making to the minister now. If the moneys that are made available for foodstuffs are in addition to the normal amount that Canada has provided by way of capital equipment, then I believe it is a very excellent move and will be supported by the Canadian people. Certainly a contribution of $50 million from a nation with a gross national product of $30,000 million cannot be considered overly generous.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, when this item was before the external affairs committee I recall that it was indicated in the discussion there by a witness whose name escapes me that a public relations program was to be started with respect to this item in order to familiarize the Canadian public with the various ramifications of the plan. On the surface it seemed to me to be a rather unnecessary expenditure. Would the minister care to comment on whether any progress has been made?

Mr. Green: There was a recommendation from the standing committee in connection with giving more publicity to the work being done under the Colombo plan, and apparently the matter is being studied at present by the interdepartmental committee.

Mr. Garland: Has any amount of money been set aside for this promotion?

Mr. Green: No, it would be done within the normal information activities of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Garland: Can the minister say what media would be used to inform the public?

Mr. Green: All available means would be used, including the facilities of the missions abroad and, of course, the press and the C.B.C. and also through exhibitions. I understand that there will be an exhibit at the finest exihibition in Canada, the Pacific national exhibition, which is to open next month.

Mr. Pearson: Does the Canadian share of the cost of the nuclear reactor being built in India come out of this vote and, if so, how much is involved? Can the minister also tell us how the project is getting along?

Mr. Green: The Canada-India reactor which is being installed at Bombay will be completed next year and the cost is to be met out of the Colombo plan. To date about $8 million has been expended and it is expected that a further $1 million will be necessary.

Mr. Pearson: With relation to India and the Canadian companies concerned, is the project working very smoothly or has there been trouble?

Mr. Green: Apparently there were some initial difficulties. Some of the Canadian companies had some problems in meeting the local situation in India but all of these difficulties have now been overcome.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, the last year the Liberal party was in power the amount of the vote was $25 million. At that time Quebec Conservatives criticized the amount, stating that the federal government was giving to strangers. In two years the amount of the vote was doubled. Can the minister tell me if those Quebec Conservatives who are now members of parliament approved the increase?

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be spoiling a lovely day to drag in a political note of that kind at this particular time.

Mr. Caron: It was dragged in by the Conservatives when we were in power and the minister at that time did oppose the idea. I should like to know if he is still opposing the idea that we help those in need.

Item agreed to.

100. Grant by the Canadian government to the United Nations refugee fund, $290,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say just one word about this. I understand that the minister said something this afternoon, and I came into the house just as he was in the midst of saying it. He mentioned the efforts the government was proposing to make to do more to assist refugees coming to this country in order to help clean up the refugee problem in Europe. I do not think there is anyone in the house who is more interested in this problem than I am.

I noticed also the minister said something at an earlier stage, if I remember correctly when he made an announcement the other day on orders of the day, about sounding out provincial governments concerning the possibility of taking some of these refugees who could not satisfy immigration regulations on the grounds of health, particularly those people who were tubercular. The minister may or may not know, but the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration certainly would know, that in the case of the Hungarian refugees whom we took in in considerable numbers who could not satisfy immigration health regulations, the federal government undertook, and I believe is still carrying out the undertaking, to look after whatever medical care was necessary. I should like to express the view that if you expect the provincial governments to undertake this as a provincial charge, we will get absolutely nowhere. It is not unreasonable that the provinces should take that view, and for this reason: We want people who come to live in Canada to be mobile and able to move freely from one province to another. It is, therefore, not reasonable to expect the provincial governments to provide these facilities free. I am sure most provinces would provide them at cost, or at a very reasonable rate.

I think if we are serious about doing something about this problem, and I hope we are, the federal government will have to undertake to reimburse the provinces for their out-of-pocket costs in connection with the matter.

102. Contribution to the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees in the Near East, $500,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I regard this as an important vote. We have, under vote 100, talked about assistance for some two million refugees, other than those who come under the operations of the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees in the Near East. It is about the latter that I wish to say something. There are some one million of these refugees, and as I had the opportunity last September of visiting three of the camps where hundreds of thousands of these refugees are to be found in the Gaza strip and in Jordan, I believe we ought to have this matter projected for the consideration of the government in terms of a definitive solution.

This problem of one million people is now almost 10 years old. It is one of the most difficult problems of its kind in the field of current international responsibilities. The matter is one now that has risen beyond the capacity of the country from which most of these refugees have come. Whatever may be the moral obligation of Israel, the problem now has assumed proportions that give it a true international character. I would say that the work of this agency, in terms of providing maintenance, shelter and food is not wanting, but there remains bitterness and dissatisfaction on the part of these refugees whose numbers are increasing by natural growth. Unless the problem is met with some resoluteness, not by one nation or by two nations in the Middle East but by all of the nations, we are allowing to evolve a problem that may increasingly add to the troubles of that turbulent area.

Now, as I understand it, the work of this agency is to be reviewed or terminated in 1960. I would be interested in knowing what the view of the government is with regard to the continued operations of this organization. What steps are being taken by Canada as a member of the United Nations to seek to resolve the problem in some way. It cannot be allowed to continue in its present state without creating complicated problems for the future. I wonder if the minister could tell us if he has had an opportunity yet of reviewing this situation, and what he thinks government policy in Canada should be? How long should we continue to provide financial assistance, and to what extent are we prepared to play our part in bringing some solution to this very difficult problem, one that is involving day by day great human tragedy. This is a question to which a country like Canada should address itself with forthrightness and with a resolution to seek a solution of the problem. I ask the minister if he would care to comment on what I have said.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this of course is a world problem and not a problem which Canada alone must solve.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course not; it is a collective responsibility.

Mr. Green: As the hon. member knows, there have been very substantial amounts of money paid to help meet this situation, and there is no intention of withdrawing. I would point out that in addition this year to the $500,000 covered under the vote now under review, there has been a total of $1.5 million worth of wheat flour provided as a special contribution.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the minister feels he cannot tonight deal with this, I hope he appreciates what I am saying. Of course, that is not what I wanted to ask. Canada has made a great contribution, but there will be no contribution to this problem if all we do is continue to give money. We decided in 1958 to give $500,000. Other nations have taken a similar generous course, but that is not resolving this problem.

In 1960 the matter is to be reviewed. Surely, at this time we are now consulting with the other donor protecting countries, along with the United Arab Republic, Israel, the government of Jordan and others, to see how this problem can be resolved? It cannot be allowed to fester. Anyone who has been there and seen the tremendous human tragedy, as I have, would join with me tonight in a filibuster, because no one could see this problem in its physical form without feeling keenly, as I do tonight. If it is possible for these few words to cause us to realize the situation that attends this problem, and what will have to be done not later than 1960, I am sure that the minister will see why I feel that merely giving money, merely giving assistance of one kind or another, is certainly not contributing basically to a solution that cries for settlement as few problems that have faced this world since the end of the second world war.

Mr. Green: The hon. member will be glad to learn that the secretary general of the United Nations has recently brought down a report on this question and that report is now being studied by the department. He can rest assured that we shall do whatever we can to help to work out a permanent solution to the problem.

103. Canada's civilian participation as a member of the international commissions for supervision and control in Indo-China including authority, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, for the appointment and fixing of salaries of commissioners, secretaries and staff by the governor in council, $270,984.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have just one question on this item. In the report of the department at page 37 I notice the following paragraph:

> In the Cambodian commission the Canadian delegation, which was sharply reduced in strength, continued to maintain the position that Cambodia also had fulfilled its obligations under the cease-fire agreement and that the international commission in that country should wind up its activities. It was not possible, however, to effect withdrawal of the Cambodian commission.

Today the minister told us that the commission in Laos continued to function in principle but that it had adjourned sine die. But he will note that both the Indian and Polish representatives on that commission a few weeks ago sought to have the commission in Laos convened. This commission is not, I believe, in residence in Laos but the commission in Cambodia has practically ceased its operations. It is not only a question of adjourning sine die; it is about to be liquidated. I do not understand the sentence in the report which suggests that notwithstanding that situation it has not been possible to effect withdrawal of the Cambodian commission.

I have this one further observation to make with regard to the commission in Viet Nam. That commission continues, I take it, to function precisely as it did when first set up. What are the prospects of that commission discontinuing its operations or have we decided to withdraw until such time as relations between north and south Viet Nam have so developed as to permit the holding of elections? Is that the situation in Viet Nam?

Finally, I am sure the minister will agree that this is a further example of the effectiveness of collective action. It is not a United Nations operation. These three commissions were set up under the Geneva accord of 1954. But these commissions took their place alongside of the various United Nations organizations in the Middle East. They take their place alongside the suggestion made for the establishment of United Nations personnel in Berlin. I think these commissions reflect the contribution that Canada, as a member of one of these commissions, has made; and I think it also indicates clearly the effectiveness and value of international action.

Mr. Green: That is very true. The position in Cambodia and in Viet Nam is not yet such that the work of the commissions can be wound up. As a matter of fact, I believe that within the last 24 or 48 hours two lives were lost in Viet Nam, although evidently they were not members of the commission.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In Viet Nam that is the situation. I can understand why there is continued reason for operation there. But as to Cambodia, certainly when I was there there was little apparent need for the continuation of the commission at that time. I do not understand this statement in the report that, notwithstanding this situation, it is not possible to effect withdrawal of the Cambodian commission.

Mr. Green: In Laos the government no longer wanted the commission to function.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know that.

Mr. Green: But in Cambodia the government is anxious for the commission there to continue functioning. India and Poland are both of the opinion that it should continue. Canada, being the third member and wishing to co-operate with these two other nations, is agreeing with that position, but with the commission at a greatly reduced strength.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope we are not going to agree to the use of a commission for the purpose of settling boundary disputes. That procedure certainly would be an unconstructive contribution by the commission.

Mr. Green: There is no prospect of that.

Item agreed to.

105. West Indies assistance program, $2,100,000.

Mr. Forgie: Will the minister give us an explanation of this item?

Mr. Green: As the hon. member will recall, the Canadian government agreed to give the West Indies federation a total of $10 million which is to be spread over a period of five years. This vote of $2,100,000 is the amount that will be required during the current fiscal year.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Green: Before the committee rises, Mr. Chairman, may I express thanks to hon. members for the extremely co-operative day, one in which so many splendid suggestions have been put forward.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the minister rises may I ask whether hon. members on the other side of the chamber would consider sitting for a while in order to deal with the estimates of the Minister of Defence Production. We want to show co-operation.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: I hear an hon. member call "ten o'clock". I am in the hands of the committee. Shall I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I proceed?

Some hon. Members: Proceed.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that we proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

68. Departmental administration, $7,507,609.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 68 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman. The minister was going to give me a few answers about the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, I want to make a correction in an answer I gave to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I want to thank him very kindly for his suggestion. He is very popular tonight. I made a mistake when I said that this destroyer that is being built in Halifax was commenced at the beginning of January. It will commence at the beginning of April. It is the fifth, not the fourth. I want to make that correction. It will commence in April, 1960.

Mr. Pickersgill: It will not be any part of any winter works program in Halifax next winter?

Mr. O'Hurley: No. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate raised a number of questions concerning our procurements in the Atlantic provinces. First, he asked for the dollar increase in 1958-59 for all defence purchases in the Atlantic provinces. As I reported on June 3, head office purchases from Atlantic province firms last year amounted to $21.8 million, and district office purchases for this area—the vast majority of which were from local firms—were over $15 million. These give a combined total of $37 million as against $30 million in the previous year.

I must qualify this—as I did before—in several ways. First, as I have indicated, the district office purchases include a small percentage of orders placed with firms outside the area, but our records do not give precise information on this point. Second, the figures do not include defence subcontracts within the area—which excludes, for example, the work being done by Enamel and Heating Products on the CS2F program. Third, as the hon. member for Ottawa West observed on Wednesday, the addresses on contracts—which provide the basis of our regional breakdown—often do not show the actual site of production. For example, many of our purchases of Nova Scotia coal are made from firms with a Quebec or Ontario address and are not, for this reason, included in the figures I have given.

Second, the member asked what proportion of the increase was on construction, what on ship building and ship repairing, and what on procurement of an industrial character. Construction figures, of course, have been excluded from the amounts I reported for purchasing. In 1958-1959 construction orders, including a small amount of maintenance, amounted to $20 million. In the previous year, the corresponding figure was only $6 million, and it is because I did not feel that this offered a fair comparison that I did not include these figures in my June 3 statement.

Ship building and ship repairing orders in the Atlantic provinces last year were $12.5 million, and in the previous year $8.5 million. The increase is therefore $4 million, which represents 57 per cent of the total increase in purchases.

Unfortunately, I am unable to say anything about procurement of an industrial character. However, it may be of assistance to the hon. member if I give as much of a breakdown as our records permit.

One category, aircraft components and overhaul, which is readily shown by our records, accounted for $5.1 million last year and $3.8 million the year before; giving an increase of $1.3 million which is 18 per cent of the total increase. Coal purchases directly from Atlantic provinces dealers actually show a decline from $2.4 million to $2.2 million, although there was, in fact, a substantial increase in our total purchases of maritime coal over the period, which does not show up because the actual contracts were, in many cases, placed with firms in central Canada.

This, then, leaves only a residual amount of $2 million for 1958-59 and $1.7 million for the previous year, excluding district office purchases. Presumably the figures wanted by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate representing purchases of an industrial character, lie within these totals, together with a portion of the amounts I reported for aircraft parts and overhaul.

The last part of the hon. member's question had to do with a distinction between projects initiated by the present government and those started by the previous administration. I regret that I have no figures to answer this, and I would point out to the hon. member that he has, in fact, directed his question to the wrong source. As he knows, my department and Defence Construction Limited do not initiate any projects—we simply contract for the supply or construction of the goods, services and defence works which are requisitioned by the Department of National Defence. I might repeat, however, what I said on June 3, that within my own sphere of responsibility, as the minister charged with procurement, I have sought to improve the Atlantic provinces' share of defence contract expenditures. I believe that the figures show that we have made progress in this direction, and I would assure the hon. member that we shall continue our efforts.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have one observation to make, and a couple of questions to ask. First, I may say I think it is very commendable that there were slightly higher expenditures, but these are obviously, as the minister has quite honestly said, of precisely the same character as they were in the past. He said that in his answer on June 3, and he was very honest about that when he said: "My department continues to rely wherever possible on country-wide competition." The minister is, of course, not responsible for this, because he was not here in those days, but we were for years continually given advice by hon. gentlemen who sat over here who said they would establish munition plants and procurement programs in the maritime provinces when a Conservative government came to power. I just wanted to draw attention to the fact that more than two years later there has been no change in the situation whatsoever.

One question I wanted to ask the minister is this—and I am not pressing for an answer at this moment; the minister can give me an answer at some later time if he wishes—has the minister any estimate of the increased expenditures on general procurement resulting from the establishment of camp Gagetown? That is to say, here is a very large body of men now established in New Brunswick who were not there before this camp was established. Everybody who has visited Fredericton or Saint John knows that it has had a very stimulating effect on the economy of that area. It will be interesting to know the purchases made in that area for housekeeping, maintaining the camp, and looking after the troops.

The other question is this: what proportion of the expenditures for the Atlantic provinces in the last fiscal year was spent in the province of Newfoundland?

Mr. O'Hurley: As the hon. member has said I can give this information later and I will give this information later.

Mr. Forgie: Mr. Chairman, I asked some questions regarding airport contracts at Foymount, and I asked that the information be given to me today. I understand, however, that the minister does not have the information. On this subject I should like to read to him a report which appeared in the Renfrew Advance of February 12, 1959 and ask him whether this represents the policy of the present administration.

Renfrew and Arnprior contractors are assured of federal government contracts amounting to $880,000.

The contracts are in connection with a $1,500,000 expansion project at the Foymount airport.

The general contract for the erection of 41 permanent living quarters has been let to M. Sullivan and Son of Arnprior. Roy Goodfellow of Renfrew has the sub-contract for the plumbing.

Another contract for $58,000 for a new school had been given to Adam Laird of Renfrew.

A third contract is certain to go—

And I emphasize the word "certain".

—to M. J. Sulpher and Sons of Renfrew. It is for a tower. The Sulpher bid was in the neighbourhood of $125,000 and it is said to be the lowest received.

Other contractors for radar equipment, a school extension and a church are still to be let. They will amount to about $800,000 and are expected to go to South Renfrew contractors.

James W. Baskin, member of parliament for South Renfrew announced Wednesday afternoon the contracts had been let.

Mr. Baskin announced several weeks ago that an expansion was planned for Foymount and that the contracts would be confined to South Renfrew firms.

I should just like the minister to explain whether that is the policy of the present administration, to prevent firms outside the districts from making tenders for these contracts.

Mr. O'Hurley: The procurement policy remains unchanged. We have no specified area for contractors. Of course, we cannot control any information which may be given out by certain members. We cannot control any information that they may want to give out to their ridings. But no contracts are given out on the basis of ridings only. It is true that work is given to certain areas, when we want the best work at the best prices, but it is not done by ridings.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister now has the result of the study he made with reference to the cost of continuing to completion the 37 Arrow CF-105's which were on the production line?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Trinity raised several questions relating to the CF-105. He asked, first, what would be the cost of continuing to completion the 37 aircraft for which orders had been placed. Our estimate of the additional cost of doing this is $257.8 million. The airframe represents $173.2 million of this and the Iroquois engine, $69 million. The remaining $15.6 million would be required for the electronic systems and some lesser miscellaneous items. No allowance is made here for any armament. I might point out that the first 20 aircraft were required for the development program and that, at most, only 17 would have been classed as operational.

The member for Trinity also had several questions about the tooling requirements for the F-104G. I might elaborate slightly on the answers which I gave at the time, and perhaps clarify certain points. First, however, I would remind the committee that I did try in my opening statement to give all the information I possibly could about the production program which we expect to achieve. I would emphasize that detailed questions of cost are central to the negotiations in which we are now engaged, and it would be unwise for me to speculate too much on the results which we expect these negotiations to produce. I can only say that we expect total tooling costs for the airframe, engine and electronics to amount to something over $20 million. I would prefer not to disclose the way in which we have arrived at this figure. This does not include certain tooling for the fuselage, horizontal stabilizer, vertical stabilizer, rudder and wings, which is being provided free of charge in order that we may produce 66 sets of these components for the German requirement. This tooling will also meet Canadian requirements for these parts and any subsequent requirements that may develop. The value of this tooling is estimated at approximately $2.25 million.

Mr. Hellyer: With respect to the tooling that is being supplied free by the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation, could the minister tell us if this is being done because that corporation has no further use for it?

Mr. O'Hurley: The reason is that it is part of the deal that was negotiated with my officials.

Mr. Hellyer: I appreciate that, but I am wondering if the reason we were able to get the tooling free of charge is because the corporation has no further use for it. I have another question the minister perhaps could answer. How close to completion is the Lockheed corporation in its existing U.S.A.F. orders for the same aircraft?

Mr. O'Hurley: I do not have the answer to the last question. As to the first question, as to whether the order is completed, they gave us only part of the tooling under the production sharing deal.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister tell us how he is getting along in obtaining the picket plane order for Canadair, Montreal, or if this order has been awarded to a United States aircraft company?

Mr. O'Hurley: The negotiations have been going on in the United States for some time. The latest information I have is that negotiations are still continuing. They are asking for new tenders on the various equipment different from what they asked for the first time.

Mr. Hellyer: Are the minister and his staff working assiduously to try and obtain the prime contract for Canadair? Canadair already has equipment particularly well suited for this particular role.

Mr. O'Hurley: I cannot give to the committee the assurance that they will obtain this order but I can say that Canadair is certainly in the running and we are certainly optimistic about it.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the minister for the explanation he gave concerning questions about the mid-Canada line. In his answer there is an indication that some consideration may be given by his department to some of the failings his answer indicates he and his department know about. This of course was a large contract of $200 million. It is charged that $30 million was wasted. Some investigation should be carried on in view of recent developments that have taken place in that area. I am thinking of my own experience. I was in James bay and Hudson bay last summer and in the Moosonee area. The Bell Telephone company now owns several large housing units which it has up for sale. They have a small plant there and a number of buildings. I suggest to the minister this property should belong to some government department such as national defence or defence production.

Construction will be required with respect to Bomarc sites. If this property were put in the hands of a crown corporation it could be turned over for use in that connection.

There were a number of things in the report everybody knows about. It is true as the minister said in his answer that when you are working against time, cost is not always a major factor. An investigation should be made into the method of allocating the prime contract although not necessarily with a view to attaching blame to anyone.

There are other projects of this type and magnitude taking place in the area. I suggest that the committee on public accounts or some other government agency take a look at the situation next year and make recommendations for more suitable methods of keeping the control of the administration in a tight unit so the left hand will know what the right hand is doing and probably save time and money.

I can think of one instance in connection with the mid-Canada line. At considerable cost equipment for harnessing boilers was moved into the site. Someone else ordered boilers from another place and the type of fittings supplied were of no use. This could have been avoided if the recommendations made by the committee last year had been implemented.

Mr. O'Hurley: I want to thank the hon. member for his suggestion. I have given the committee the report prepared by my officials concerning the mid-Canada line. I am looking further into this matter and wish to assure the hon. gentleman that other reports will be made on this important matter.

69. Care, maintenance and custody of standby defence plants, buildings, machine tools and production tooling, $882,011.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us where these storage barns are and what type of equipment is stored there?

Mr. O'Hurley: Here we have the ammunition branch contracts for preservation, storage rental and incidental expenses, $65,000; general purchasing branch, $8,511; Longueuil plant, $84,000; machine tools and tooling, preservation and storage: aircraft branch, guided missile program, tooling and test equipment, $50,000; engine program, machine tools and tooling equipment for R1820, R1340, and Orenda engines, $189,550; Avro, CF-100 tooling $200,000; instrument manufacturers, Ferranti Electric Company Limited, tooling, $25,000; De Havilland Aircraft, Chipmunk tooling, $10,000.

Then, we come to the ammunition branch, transfer to storage of production $22,500; electronics branch, tooling and test equipment for Sparrow II program, V.T. fuse production, 3/s Mortars, $130,000; gun branch, 105 milimeter and 155 milimetre howitzer production tooling at Sorel Industries Limited, $147,000; machine tool branch, warehouse and transportation charges, $40,000; inspection and reinhibiting new machine tools at Long Branch, $25,000; rebuilding machine tools, $60,000.

B—Crown companies—

73. Expenses incurred by defence construction (1951) limited in procuring the construction of defence projects on behalf of the Department of National Defence and procuring the construction of such other projects as are approved by treasury board, $3,349,237.

Mr. Garland: I wonder whether I might direct a question to the minister in connection with the work that is being undertaken by his department in the North Bay area? I recognize the difficulty in making a statement on this subject because of the nature of the installation, but it is a matter of real concern to the people in our area. I recognize the minister is perhaps limited in the information he can give, but within the framework of this limitation can he give us anything that would be of interest to the people in the area?

Mr. O'Hurley: In reply to the hon. member may I say I cannot give him very much information. This is a new project and I cannot give the details of it. Much care has been taken in the selection of contractors by defence construction. They have been people who have experience in this type of work. There has been an amalgamation of different companies with different experience to do this work. We have asked several companies to tender. Because of the amalgamation, perhaps, there will be 20 companies, including the company recommended by the hon. member, from whom tenders will be coming. The greatest care will be given in considering these tenders to the quality of the contractors and the experience they have in this type of work.

Mr. Garland: Can the minister give us assurance that wherever possible northern Ontario firms will be given an opportunity to tender on any part or portion of this particular work?

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes, they are certainly given the chance to tender on all possible work that can be done by the contractors in northern Ontario. As I said before, tenders were requested from other contractors because there will be very large contracts for this job. Other contractors in the area will be invited to tender.

Canadian Arsenals Limited—

74. Administration and operation, $2,000,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, I find that the report from Canadian Arsenals Limited mentions no successor to Brigadier Theriault. Is it the minister's intention to appoint a successor to Brigadier Theriault, who was on the board of directors? If I recall correctly, he was vice chairman of the board.

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, I must say to the hon. member that the job of Brigadier Theriault has been abolished by Canadian Arsenals Limited. Therefore, no appointment has been made to that post.

Mr. Bourget: Does the minister intend to appoint a successor for him on the board of directors? In my recollection, the 13th annual report of the board listed no French-speaking Canadian among the board members. Again if I remember correctly, Brigadier Theriault was one of the directors a few years ago. That is the reason why I ask the minister whether he intends to appoint a French-speaking Canadian to the board of directors of Canadian Arsenals.

Mr. O'Hurley: I am pleased to inform the hon. member that a French-speaking director is to be appointed shortly.

Mr. Bourget: With regard to the federal arsenal at Quebec, could the minister say how many workers are now employed in the three plants, namely those at Cote du Palais, at Bassin-Louise and at Val Rose?

Mr. O'Hurley: I am sorry, but the only figures I have here concern the total number of employees of Canadian Arsenals Limited. However, I could obtain this information for the hon. member. The total number of employees is 3,547.

Mr. Bourget: Does the minister not have the figures for the Quebec division?

Mr. O'Hurley: Does the hon. member wish to know how many workers are employed by Canadian Arsenals Limited in the Quebec division?

Mr. Bourget: Yes.

Mr. O'Hurley: My officials inform me there were 863 employees on April 1, 1959. They did not think they had the figures in their records.

Mr. Bourget: Does the minister expect any increase in activity at the Quebec arsenal?

Mr. O'Hurley: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bourget: Might it not be possible to obtain contracts from abroad for the arsenal? That plant used to have such contracts in the past. However, I understand conditions have changed.

Mr. O'Hurley: That is quite possible. We may occasionally pick up a contract from a foreign country. We are trying to get such contracts, so as to provide employment for the workers now employed at the arsenal. It is a possibility, but I do not expect it. According to one of the directors of Canadian Arsenals, no additional work is anticipated for the time being.

Mr. Bourget: Is there no possibility of getting a few contracts from the United States, in the circumstances, in view of all the negotiations going on between the two countries?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be very difficult to obtain contracts from the United States in this field, because they are just loaded up with unemployed over there.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the permission of the committee to go back to item 71 for one very short question.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to go back to item 71?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

71. Grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on crown-owned defence plants operated by private contractors, $100,000.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Would the minister be good enough to tell the committee why this item of $100,000 for grants to municipalities does not come under the special division of the Department of Finance?

Mr. O'Hurley: This item deals with grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on crown owned defence plants operated by private contractors. I understand the hon. member would like to know what municipalities receive these grants.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): No. Would the minister tell us why this does not come under the jurisdiction of the special division of the Department of Finance which deals with grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes.

Mr. O'Hurley: The Municipal Grants Act does not specifically cover these plants but provides for taxes on federal property to be paid in full subject to adjustment with respect to services rendered. It is intended that the grants with respect to the said plants be in conformity with this legislation. It is legislation that exists. The plants covered by this provision have been acquired under the department's capital assistance program and title in each case is vested in the crown. The plants are operated by private contractors on the same basis as industrial plants.

Mr. Bourget: Are the grants paid on the same basis as for other buildings of the federal government?

Mr. O'Hurley: I am talking about my department. I cannot explain what the arrangements are in other departments. This is a grant in lieu of taxes and it comes under my department. There is legislation covering it and I do not know if the legislation applies elsewhere. We pay the same amount as we would pay if we were paying taxes.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just before you rise, Mr. Chairman, I should like to have assurance from the minister that the answers to my two questions will be given in the house.

Mr. O'Hurley: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has been so co-operative tonight that I certainly am not able to refuse him. I should like to give one more answer. I was asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South whether it would be possible to send some of the senior officials of my department to the west coast to make known the production sharing program and to meet industry. I wish to inform the house and the British Columbia members in particular that in October I will be on the west coast with some of my officials, and at that time we hope to get in touch with the board of trade and meet the industrialists of the area.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister would do the same thing in Newfoundland.

Mr. Pearkes: They have no industries in Newfoundland.

Mr. O'Hurley: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has got me in a good mood tonight so I think I will have to accept also.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman who is leading the house in what order estimates will be taken tomorrow and Saturday?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes. The house leader asked me to announce that the estimates of veterans affairs, northern affairs and national resources, trade and commerce, mines and technical surveys and fisheries would be taken in that order.

At 10.38 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, July 10, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FLEMING, EGLINTON—CORRECTION OF STATEMENT IN REPORT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I find that one of the committees of the house, the standing committee on veterans affairs, in submitting its report to the house on July 1 ascribed to me a statement which is not in accord with the information which I communicated to the committee in question. The report of the committee, which is to be found on page 639 of Votes and Proceedings of that day, in paragraph 14 refers to information which is ascribed to me on the present state of the war claims fund, and states that I had told the committee that the sum of $6 million remains in the fund.

That is not a correct statement at all, Mr. Speaker, of the information I communicated to the committee. The information was contained in a letter dated April 10, 1959, which I wrote to the chairman of the committee and which I believe became part of the records of the committee. There I indicated that the combined cash and market value of the bonds held to the credit of the fund at that date was about $4.6 million. I may say further, Mr. Speaker, that since that time there have been, of course, substantial disbursements out of the fund and the balance today is approximately $4 million.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

WELLAND CANAL—STUDY OF EXPANSION OF FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister say whether, as a result of congestion in the Welland canal and congestion along the seaway, any study is contemplated to see whether or not the seaway facilities should be expanded or duplicated under certain circumstances?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, my department is carrying on some studies in that regard.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister give any further explanation and tell us when the study may be completed?

Mr. Hees: No; I do not know, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORTATION

ROYAL COMMISSION—STATEMENT ON HEARINGS AND REPORTS TO PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a question was asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia in regard to the royal commission on transportation, first with respect to the question of hearings and also with respect to the presentation of reports to parliament.

In so far as sittings are concerned, the Minister of Transport communicated with the chairman of the commission, Mr. McTague, who advised that the intention was to hold sittings across the country, generally in the capitals of the various provinces, and as well to consult fully with the government of each of the provinces relative to the matters submitted to the commission.

In so far as reports are concerned, the regular procedure will of course be followed, namely that in due course a report will be made to the governor in council. That report will be tabled in parliament.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I thank the Prime Minister for his answer. Can he give the house some indication when the series of regional meetings will take place; October or November?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as the commencement date is concerned, there has been no determination yet as to that. The desire of the commission is to proceed with the greatest of dispatch and I can say, knowing what Mr. McTague has done to date, that his time has been taken up by the organizational questions that necessarily arise to the end that the commission will be able to report at the earliest possible date consistent with the great responsibilities that rest upon it.

Mr. Argue: Within the 12-month target period, I take it, set for the commission?

Indian Affairs

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MACKENZIE DISTRICT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF INQUIRY INTO TREATIES RESPECTING RESERVES

Mr. Speaker: Has the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the governor in council has appointed a commission under the Inquiries Act to inquire into the implementation of treaties 8 and 11 respecting the 15 Indian bands of the Mackenzie district, and to report its recommendations after full consultation with the Indians concerned. Under the terms of the treaties these 15 Indian bands, numbering approximately 4,500 people, have a total land settlement of some 576,000 acres. The rapid development of the Northwest Territories makes it imperative that the land provided for the establishment of reserves be set aside for that purpose now or, alternatively, that the treaties be renegotiated with the consent of the Indians. The commission will consider the present and future economic and social welfare of the Indians and will obtain the views of each band on all aspects of the matter.

The commission consists of five members: Chairman, Mr. Walter H. Nelson, barrister, Prince Albert, Saskatchewan; Mr. V. F. Valentine, Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, Ottawa; Mr. L. L. Brown, Indian affairs branch, Department of Citizenship and Immigration, Ottawa; Mr. James Koe, Fort McPherson band, Fort McPherson, Northwest Territories and Mr. Baptiste Cazon, Fort Simpson band, Fort Simpson, Northwest Territories.

The commission began its meetings in Aklavik on July 6, 1959.

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the native Indian people of the Mackenzie district will be very happy to hear of the appointment of this commission to deal with land rights, a matter that has not been looked into for many years. I should like to ask the minister whether the government gave the Indians any opportunity to vote on those who would represent them on the commission.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, the commission is composed of two Indians, one member from the northern affairs branch, one member from the Indian affairs branch and the chairman. In so far as the selection of the two Indians is concerned, consultations were held with those in the territories. I do not believe there was a formal vote, but consultations were held to determine who would be suitable people to represent the Indians on the commission.

Mr. Hardie: May I ask the minister a further question?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member might defer his question until we get to orders of the day. I think the hon. member for Skeena wishes to comment on behalf of the C.C.F.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I want to express appreciation that the commission has been established. I am sure that the Indians affected will look upon it with favour and will hope that it will be able to deal with their problems effectively. I hope that as a result of the decision reached by the commission and subsequent action taken the Indians affected will be treated in a fair and more equitable manner than has been the case with Indians in other parts of Canada with respect to land and treaty questions.

[Later:]

Mr. Hardie: May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration a question in connection with the statement made a moment ago to the effect that there were two Indians appointed to this commission. I should like to point out to the minister that both these Indians are from the area of the Mackenzie river. I wonder if she would be good enough to appoint an Indian from the Great Slave lake area, where the problems are entirely different from those in the Mackenzie river area.

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to point out that Indians from whatever area they may come, will be given ample opportunity to make their wishes known to the commission. It is always extremely difficult, as the hon. member knows, to select people who have the necessary qualifications to serve on a commission of this sort.

NORTHLAND NAVIGATION COMPANY

INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can he say if the chief executive officer of the labour relations board advised that a ballot would be permitted in connection with the bargaining agent of the Northland Navigation Company engineers, and was that commitment later reversed?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have no information to that effect.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the representations that are being made, I know, to many members of parliament including those from British Columbia, in connection with this matter, will the minister kindly look into it and perhaps give us a reply tomorrow?

Mr. Starr: Yes, I certainly will.

Mr. H. C. McQuillan (Comox-Alberni): Would the Minister of Labour give the house a report concerning the strike situation in connection with the Northland Navigation Company?

Mr. Starr: In answer to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and also because of the concern that has been expressed by all members from the province of British Columbia, I should like to inform the house what has happened in this situation.

On July 7 the Canada labour relations board rejected an application made by an officer of the S.I.U. on behalf of a number of marine engineers for the decertification of the national association of marine engineers as bargaining agent for the engineering officers employed by the company. At the same time the board granted a request of the S.I.U. that its own application for certification as bargaining agent be withdrawn.

Pending release of the board's decision on the proceedings before it, the N.A.M.E. had been enjoined by court order from picketing the company's operations. When the N.A.M.E. resumed its picketing the S.I.U. withdrew men who had been supplied to replace the longshoremen members of the international longshoremen and warehousemen's union who usually performed such work. As a result the company was unable to load its facilities.

The deck officers and masters employed by the company who are members of the Canadian merchant service guild, are reported to have left their employment on July 7. While there is still a confused situation affecting this coastal shipping operation, with court actions and proceedings involving the B.C. federation of labour, the I.L.W.U. and other labour organizations and individuals, the situation should become clearer since the application for decertification has been disposed of and the employer should now feel free to negotiate a settlement with the certified bargaining agent. My officer on the west coast is now attempting to arrange a meeting between the company and the N.A.M.E.

Just a few moments ago I received a telegram from Mr. Currie, the representative of the labour department, which reads as follows:

> Further our telephone conversation Thursday afternoon Captain Terry had agreed to meet NAME committee solely while unions wanted all interested groups represented. Unions later agreed to committee of Greaves and Berry. Captain Terry is giving this consideration and promised me answer Friday morning. In meantime all parties have stated they will withhold public statements.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration a supplementary question. Has the minister anything further to report with respect to reports of San Francisco goons coming to Vancouver to take part in these operations? Has she done anything to get rid of these blighters?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The information I have is that if they were in the country, they are not here now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Labour a further question arising out of the statement he has just made in answer to a question put by one other hon. member of this house, an answer which I thought might well have followed the questions I put to him earlier. The minister, in this statement has just indicated that he is now endeavouring to arrange for a meeting. I note that in Hansard of July 6 for this session he said:

> However, I did dispatch a telegram during the latter part of last week asking both parties to meet with the labour department representative in Vancouver, and they are meeting this morning.

Did such a meeting take place and is the meeting to which my hon. friend now draws our attention another meeting altogether?

Mr. Starr: The statement read by the hon. member for Essex East is entirely correct. Such a meeting was held. This is an entirely different meeting.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—INQUIRY AS TO DIRECT LOANS TO BUILDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, who seems to be in a generous mood this morning. With the number of housing starts substantially below those of last year, can the minister now tell the house when direct loans to builders will be commenced this year?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I am not yet in a position to make an announcement on that question.

Mr. Garland: If I might be permitted to do so I should like to ask a supplementary question. With the number of starts down almost 20 per cent this year, and with the $250,000,000 that parliament approved earlier this year still intact, what possible justification is there for delaying this particular action?

Mr. Green: As I told the hon. member previously, government policy will be announced in due course. He should not be discouraged about the number of housing starts. I am going to take a chance today and prophesy that they will be between 135,000 and 140,000 in 1959. That will be the second highest figure, the record having been achieved last year.

Mr. Garland: With this forecast which the minister is now prepared to make and which he was not prepared to make some time ago, he apparently knows when he is going to implement direct loans to builders. That is an extremely important factor in the total number of starts. If he knows, and if this decision has been made, why can the country not know?

Mr. Green: I really am surprised that the hon. member is so impatient, because that is not his nature.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF NEW MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I have a supplementary question that I should like to put to the Prime Minister. Is the present Minister of Public Works going to make that announcement, or in view of the way in which the house facilitated the completion of the work of the present Minister of Public Works, can we expect the announcement from his successor before the end of the session?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am glad to see the interest of the hon. gentlemen in the appointment of a successor to the Minister of Public Works. I seem to remember that the same type of question was asked in 1941 and 1942, when for a period of many months no representative was appointed from the province of Quebec. We used to ask questions in that regard and the answer we received was that an announcement would be made in due course.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a supplementary question. The Prime Minister will perhaps recall that we were asked to assist in getting through the estimates of public works so that a successor could be appointed, and that we facilitated that procedure.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ARCTIC ISLANDS—APPROVAL OF NEW OIL AND GAS REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Can the minister tell the house whether new oil regulations for the Arctic islands have been approved by the cabinet as yet?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No, Mr. Speaker.

PRICE SPREADS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether we might have an explanation for the long delay in the work of the royal commission on price spreads. Is it reasonable to assume that we may expect a report on the findings of this commission in a reasonably short time?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): In reply to that question may I say this. The length of time that has elapsed since the appointment of the commission on price spreads and the time that has been taken in the sittings are indicative of the importance of the subject. There has been a complete and thorough examination of a problem which for so many years has been the subject of requests on the part of agricultural and other organizations across this country. The result has been that the commission has gone extensively into the problem. I have no immediate indication from the chairman as to when the report will be made available, but I am sure it will not be very long delayed.

BRIDGES

INTERPROVINCIAL BRIDGE, OTTAWA—COLLAPSE OF PART OF APPROACH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. This morning while demolishing the bridge approach between Nepean point and Major Hill park part of the structure fell on the approach to the bridge, and on that account thousands of civil servants were late for work. Is it the intention of the government to do something about that bridge?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of the accident this morning and I am sorry to hear of it. However, I think this matter comes under the jurisdiction of the national capital commission.

(Translation):

PUBLIC SERVICE

PAYMENT FOR TIME LOST BECAUSE OF BRIDGE ACCIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Could he intervene with the civil service commission so that employees who were late for work on account of the state of disrepair of the interprovincial bridge may not lose any pay?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I feel there is no need for me to intervene, members of the civil service commission will surely understand the circumstances.

Mr. Caron: May I ask a supplementary question? In case the civil service commission is unaware of the situation, might it not be of the utmost importance that the minister take a hand in the matter?

(Text):

INQUIRY AS TO SALARY INCREASES THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it a fact that the Prime Minister promised the officers of the civil service organizations that the recommendations of the civil service commission regarding salary increases would be acted upon as soon as the recommendations were received by the government?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that question is an indefinite one. It gives no indication of when the promise was made, and I will have to look into the question and ascertain the basis for the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Hellyer: I appreciate the Prime Minister's consideration and the fact that he will look into the facts and report to the house, but I wonder if he would indicate to the house whether he does not feel that the faithful and loyal employees of his government are deserving of some immediate consideration?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, of course, was a member of the last cabinet from April 26 or 27 until June 21, during which time the civil servants were asking for their proper increases. It remained, however, for this government, as one of its first acts, to implement what could have been done long before that.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Is it not true—and I put this question to the Prime Minister—that what the present government did was to implement a decision of treasury board under the previous administration?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, what the present government did was what the government of which the hon. member was a distinguished member failed to do for a long while. We acted as soon as we had the opportunity.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, now that the Prime Minister has made his speech, I wonder if he could find time to answer my question.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Hellyer: —created a wrong impression. My question is this. Is it not true that the order in council authorizing the last increase in salaries of federal civil servants was passed by the government of which I was a member?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think a question relating to an event in history is scarcely a matter or urgency for this house; furthermore, it is a matter of public record.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO PERFORMANCE OF EXECUTIVE FUNCTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could put a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Could the minister tell us who at the present time is performing the statutory functions of the president of the C.B.C. as chairman of the board of directors?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Colonel Landry is, as I said, chairman of the management committee, and Mr. Dunsmore is chairman of the executive committee of the board of directors and in the absence of the vice president is acting as chairman of the board.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO CALLING OF CONFERENCE ON FISCAL MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance if we may expect from him today a statement about the study group that is now in session on the matter of dominion-provincial fiscal relations; or is it not proposed to give to the country or the house any information as to what conclusions they have reached, if they have reached any or if they are allowed to reach any?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would think the hon. member would add to the respect in which he is held by the house if he would refer to the federal-provincial continuing committee on economic and fiscal questions by its proper name instead of talking about a study group.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Seminar?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This happens to be a committee for financial planning composed of the most competent officials in this country at both the dominion and provincial levels of government on economic and fiscal questions. The committee has been in existence for some years but was never used by the previous government to the extent of its full potentialities and usefulness.

What is being done now is to refer to that very competent committee the questions of extremely wide import in this field upon which they are highly competent to investigate and report. I am very happy to report to the house that in accordance with the direction given by the conference of ministers of finance and provincial treasurers which met in Ottawa on Monday and Tuesday, the continuing committee embarked upon its work immediately. They assembled on Wednesday morning, and after a day and a half of intensive work completed the allotment of the subjects which were assigned to them by the conference of ministers. They adjourned yesterday afternoon, and I think it fair to say that most of those officials are going to be spending this summer hard at work on these subjects. It is planned to hold the next meeting of the continuing committee around September 1.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I ask the minister if the federal-provincial continuing committee on fiscal and economic matters, otherwise known as the minister's study group or seminar, has reached as yet any conclusions which would enable the government to decide if it would be possible to hold before the end of this calendar year a full-fledged dominion-provincial conference on fiscal relations, arising out of recommendations made by the federal-provincial continuing committee on fiscal and economic matters.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have always attached some degree of respect to the intelligence of my hon. friend. What his question means is that although the continuing committee was in session yesterday and had referred to them an extremely formidable list of subjects of far-reaching importance, he thinks they should have reached decisions before they even started to sit. That is about the size of it. He should not expect others to follow his example of speaking and deciding before thinking.

This competent committee was asked to carry out the tasks assigned to them by the conference of ministers. I have already dealt with the subject of the calling of a plenary conference. I dealt with that in reply to questions asked by the amiable hon. gentleman on Tuesday. I dealt with questions on the same subject asked by the same amiable hon. gentleman on Wednesday and asked by the Leader of the Opposition, I think, on both occasions.

Mr. McIlraith: You did not answer any of the questions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it is quite clear that this is a matter for decision at the governmental level. It is not a matter for decision by the officials.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In response to the rather involved reply given by my genial and hon. friend the Minister of Finance, may I say I think it is clear now that the government does not intend to call such a conference.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman does love to assert his own conclusions.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There was no question asked. The hon. member for Essex East was improperly making a statement and I do not wish to see the minister improperly answering a question that was not asked.

[Later:]

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the minister this question. In so far as this continuing tax study group is concerned, has the minister considered that our smallest province has adequate professional advice?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, as the federal government we do not attempt to prescribe for the provinces what advice they should seek or from whom they shall choose to obtain their advice. Those are sovereign governments; they run their own affairs and we do not attempt to interfere with them, as was clearly demonstrated in Monday's conference.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question. Will the minister be kind enough to convey those views to the Minister of Justice?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall be very pleased to convey them to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, Mr. Speaker, who needs them.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC—STATEMENT AS TO PAYMENTS BY FEDERAL TREASURY

On the orders of the day:

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a factual question. Is he in a position today to answer the questions I asked him the day before yesterday about payments to the governments of Quebec, and about which I asked for an answer yesterday?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I take pleasure in furnishing the hon. gentleman with this information. He asked about payments. I presume he is referring to payments made in pursuance of the provisions of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should correct that right away. I asked about payments from the federal treasury to the treasury of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I believe I can supply the hon. gentleman with the information he wishes. In tabulated form it is as follows:

CASH PAYMENTS TO QUEBEC
(In thousands of dollars)

Quebec	1956-57	1957-58	Preliminary 1958-59	Estimated 1959-60
Unconditional Payments
1. Statutory subsidies	3,301	3,301	3,301	3,301
2. Tax rental
3. Equalization		43,060	55,004	61,581
4. Stabilization
5. Power corporation tax	1,186	1,675	2,281	2,364
	4,487	48,036	60,586	67,246
Conditional grants	23,544	24,801	39,785	49,405
Total	28,031	72,837	100,371	116,651

So the information may be complete I might comment that under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, of the three types of payments that are available to provinces under certain conditions prescribed by the legislation, the province of Quebec receives only the equalization grants. By reason of having no agreement with the federal government the province, of course, receives nothing on account of the tax rentals or the stabilization payments. For information, however, I might say that the payments that would have accrued on account of tax rental and stabilization payments for these past two fiscal years are $181 million in 1957-58, $186 million (estimated) in 1958-59, and $214 million (estimated) in 1959-60.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the minister very much. I should like to ask one supplementary question. Was the estimate of equalization payments for the current fiscal year the same as the minister gave in his budget papers, or has he made a revision of it? I do not want to detain the house; perhaps the minister would prefer to answer it tomorrow.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the budget speech, it will be recalled, I gave those figures in the aggregate for all provinces. I did not break them down for individual provinces. I think—and here I speak subject to correction—the estimate I have given this morning is based upon the same estimate that entered into the composite table which I place on Hansard in the budget speech, but I will verify that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister at the same time indicate to the house whether a new estimate has been made? The minister has told us that he estimates higher revenues than he gave in the budget speech and I should like to know whether a new estimate has been made. Perhaps on his departmental estimates he may be able to give that to the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

WHEAT—EQUALIZATION OF QUOTAS IN WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, arising out of the widespread discrimination in quotas in Manitoba and Saskatchewan where, on July 6, 90 per cent and 80 per cent respectively were below 7 bushels. Can the minister say what extraordinary action will be taken to equalize those quotas with the end of the crop year just three weeks away?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend with his use of "widespread discrimination" is attempting to convey the impression that something is being done which should not be done, and he is creating his usual state of alarm. The situation with regard to quotas out west is vastly improved over what it was last year, and I regret that the hon. member does not draw attention to that fact on some of the occasions that arise here in the house. Last year, on July 6, all the stations were on 5 and 6 bushel quotas. On July 6 of this year 775 stations were already on the 7 and 8 bushel quotas and 1,246 were on 5 and 6 bushel quotas, and there are only seven stations remaining on the 4 bushel quota. No attempt is being made at discrimination; an attempt is being made at enlarging the delivery of grain out west and there is still a chance, as expressed by the wheat board, of bringing all the stations out west up to a 7 and 8 bushel quota this year.

The situation does not differ materially from what it was in July a year ago when the quota was raised to 7 for half the stations. Then, I think, my hon. friend complained because some were still on 6, but generally the picture is quite good. There has been a slowing down in some areas out west for reasons which are well known to the house. The lake shipping season is not as good for grain this year as it was last year; consequently some millions of bushels have not been moved from the lakehead, opening terminal capacity for shipments from the southern parts of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. But the month of July is usually a month of large shipments from the lakehead, and we still have some time before the end of the crop year. I repeat that everything is being done not to create discrimination at the many delivery points but to bring them all up to the same level.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, how does the minister claim that there is less discrimination this year, or that the situation is better this year, when last year there was a spread between delivery quotas of only 1 bushel, whereas the spread this year is very wide? Does the minister say now that within a three week period all quotas on the prairies will be 7 or 8 bushels? If this is his answer, I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. Churchill: That was the estimate given by the members of the wheat board when they were here before the agriculture committee of the house two weeks ago. I am quite free to admit that there is a gap between those now on 5, 6 and 8. Last year none was on the 8 bushel quota, but the board think they will all be on 7 or 8 this year, which is an improvement over last year.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether he expects any acceleration of shipments through the lakehead now 60 million bushels under last year.

Mr. Churchill: Quite a large proportion of lake shipping has been utilized this season for the shipment of iron ore, in view of the anticipated steel strike, and not so many ships were made available for the movement of wheat; but within the last few days there has been an increase in the movement of wheat from the lakehead. Care is being taken—I spoke to the Minister of Transport about this—to see that those grain ships are not delayed in their passage through the Welland canal.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

LIST OF ORDERS OF THE HOUSE STILL OUTSTANDING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a question of privilege which affects all hon. members. On Monday the Secretary of State was good enough to table a list of the unfilled orders of the house. There are over 30 of those orders which were passed before May 1, and there are about 10 more which were passed in May. A surprisingly large number of them are orders which were directed primarily to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, whose estimates are to come before the house today. I wonder, sir, whether the leader of the house would urge not only that minister but all his colleagues to try to comply with those orders as quickly as possible, as I feel it would facilitate the completion of the business of the house.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, since my name was mentioned on this matter of privilege I should like to make it clear that I have arranged with the hon. member for Assiniboia to get three of those orders for returns to be brought down next Wednesday. Three of the questions will be answered and are being brought forward today. I should also like to make it clear that many thousands of hours go into the preparation of these answers.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

448. Departmental administration, $2,437,352.

The Deputy Chairman: This item will be found on page 81 of the blue book and the details on page 549.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Chairman, it is customary at this time for the minister responsible for this department to review the progress made and to deal with the various aspects of the work of the department, and I propose to do so briefly. I am particularly pleased to have the opportunity to do so this year because since the end of last session I have been able to visit most of the district offices of the department, as well as our treatment institutions across the country.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that I have found this a most interesting and enlightening experience, and it has given me a much more accurate perspective of the work carried out by the department in looking after veterans problems in the field. In the light of my own experience I am convinced that very few hon. members are fully aware of what is actually involved in the administration of the so-called veterans charter. I believe, therefore, that it would be useful to the committee to get a first-hand report of what I have been privileged to see.

While it is true that the estimates of the department have already been before the standing committee on veterans affairs and that some of this information was given to that committee, I think other members will be interested in it as well. Incidentally, I should like to express my appreciation to the chairman and the members of the standing committee for the excellent work which they are again doing in the interest of our veterans. Previous committees have set a high standard of good will and co-operation in this respect, and the present committee has more than upheld this tradition.

I should like to deal first with the administration of the Pension Act. In my travels across the country and in my personal contacts I have been greatly heartened by the expressions of confidence which I have received both as to the provisions of the legislation itself and its administration. I have said that in these matters there is no finality, no closed door. It is my hope that in the not too distant future, next session in fact, we shall again bring this legislation before the parliamentary committee on veterans affairs with a view to being assured that our legislation shall not fall short of our intent.

All of us who have been close to this national undertaking are aware that its object is to seek to assure that no Canadian who has suffered a disability in mind or body arising out of his military service or, in the case of combat service, incurred during such service, shall be denied such measure of assistance as may be possible under the act. Parliament in its wisdom having enacted legislation, has deliberately removed its administration from the sphere of personal or political influence. The pension commission has been given the dual responsibility of interpreting and administering the act. By statute there is no appeal from its decision; that is to say, in so far as the Pension Act is concerned an appeal board of the commission is the court of last resort.

The administration of the Pension Act is big business even in this era of large expenditures. The committee will be interested to know that the current budget of the Canadian pension commission is $151,474,000. There are currently 187,015 pensions in payment, including awards to dependants. You will not be surprised to learn that there is a constantly growing rate of decline in the number of pensions payable for service in world war I. The years are taking their toll of both pensioners and their wives. The number of children currently of age for additional pension is declining sharply at the same time.

For this reason mainly the current liability for world war I is shrinking each year and at an accelerated rate. At the same time the world war II liability continues to increase and presumably will continue to do so for some years to come. However, despite the most recent increases in the rate of pension awards and the current increases on world war II account, there has been a slight overall reduction in the total liability in the last two years. This must not be attributed to any lessening of benefits or narrowing of the qualifications for entitlement. On the contrary, the actual benefits to the individual pensioner have been materially increased during this period.

I should like to say a few words, Mr. Chairman, with reference to war veterans allowances. The general administration of the War Veterans Allowance Act is under the jurisdiction of the minister except as to the authority to deal with and adjudicate upon applications made under the act. This authority is vested in a board located in Ottawa and in the district authorities which are established in each district of the department across Canada. The district authorities and the veterans welfare services in the districts constitute a field force which handles the processing of applications and reviews, arranges for medical examinations when indicated and performs all other duties pertinent to the adjudication of applications for war veterans allowances.

It might be of interest to mention that from the inception of the legislation in 1930 until 1950 inclusive, a period of 20 years, the total number of recipients had reached 33,877. Since 1950 the recipient strength has increased to 64,904, or almost doubled. The expenditures for the year 1950-51, inclusive of the assistance fund, amounted to $23,655,155, and in the fiscal year 1958-59, seven years later, these expenditures totalled $56,966,263. It will be seen that the work load of war veterans allowances in the districts has considerably increased. The number of approved applications at present averages 800 per month.

I might point out that this act was amended at the first session of the 23rd parliament in 1957. The basic rate of allowances payable to a single recipient was increased from $720 to $840 a year and the permissible ceiling of income for a single recipient was increased from $960 to $1,080 a year. The ceiling for a recipient at the married rate was increased from $1,620 to $1,740, and for a recipient with a blind spouse from $1,740 to $1,860 a year. All these increases were effective from November 1, 1957.

There are approximately 3,000 recipients who have become eligible for allowance because of these increases. In addition, the eligibility for war veterans allowance was at the same time extended to Canadian veterans who saw at last 365 days of service in the United Kingdom during world war I, and eligibility was also granted to the widows of deceased veterans who would have qualified on this basis. Some 967 additional recipients have been granted allowances because of this extension of eligibility. Also, the period of residence in Canada required of imperial and allied veterans of world war I and earlier conflicts, and their widows, in order to qualify for the allowance was reduced from 20 to 10 years, and a great many recipients have qualified as a result of this reduced residence requirement. The additional annual allowance payable because of these various amendments to the act is estimated at $10 million.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Two further amendments improved the position of a number of recipients because of the increased length of permissible absence from Canada from three to six months in a year, and an increase in the permissible equity in a home occupied by a recipient from $6,000 to $8,000.

I should like to say a few words now with reference to the Veterans' Land Act. As hon. members know, the Veterans' Land Act was amended this year, and the amendments were very thoroughly discussed at the time the resolution and bill were before the house and also in the veterans affairs committee. I will make a brief summary of the activities and achievements of the Veterans' Land Act administration.

Up until the end of March, 1959, 77,187 veterans had been settled under the act, 33,395 as full-time farmers, 42,680 as small holder and 1,112 as commercial fishermen. This had involved a total public expenditure of $389,738,861 for land, livestock and equipment. Of this amount $191,760,874 was still outstanding and annual collections amount to $21,244,736. Including prepayments on account, 105.8 per cent of all principal and interest due and owing had been collected by March 31, 1959.

Of the 77,187 settled, 16,297 had already repaid their indebtedness and received title to their properties; 5,210 had transferred their equity in their properties to other veterans who became established under the act; 2,038 had quitclaimed their properties back to the director, some due to failure to find a satisfactory way of life in farming and some for strictly administrative or other reasons; 638 had vacated provincial land on which they had been settled by their provinces and toward whose settlement the Veterans' Land Act had made a contribution. Of the 77,187 settled only 186, or less than three out of every thousand, had to be put off their property for failure to live up to their contracts.

Under the home construction program a total of 26,423 homes had been built, or were under construction, at March, 1959. A large majority of these homes have been built by the veterans themselves acting as their own contractors under supervision by Veterans' Land Act construction supervisors, and after attending a Veterans' Land Act construction school. A total of over 700 construction schools have been held since the first one organized in 1949. Under this plan veterans have built, or are building, their own homes at a very considerable saving to themselves, and now have homes of their own which in many cases would otherwise have been impossible.

The measure of success achieved by this branch of the department should not be considered only in terms of collections, but in the rehabilitation service extended in helping former comrades meet and solve their problems and in the contribution being made to the agricultural industry as a whole. The advice given to settlers has not been restricted to line fences but, from reports I have from all over the country as well as from my own observations, I know that valuable information is being passed along to many others engaged in agriculture.

Canada is justifiably proud of its record in successfully rehabilitating in civil life several hundred thousands of its sons and daughters who served the nation so well during world war II. The great majority of these have put to excellent use the opportunities and resources provided by our legislation. They are now making a solid contribution to the Canadian way of life and are not asking for further help. However, there is a significant number of veterans and their dependents not only from world war II but also from world war I and earlier military efforts, for whom we carry a continuing and, in some areas, an increasing responsibility. It is with these that our welfare services branch is especially concerned.

The continuing work of rehabilitating the casualties of war is a primary responsibility. Battle disabilities and service diseases may be medically repaired or cured but the physical impairment remains, and may at any time give way under the excessive stress and pressures of modern life. The department knows from experience that the vast majority of disabled veterans can be efficient and reliable workers when trained and placed in jobs within their intellectual and physical abilities. But experience also discloses that disabilities may be aggravated by many post-war causes, and the appropriate job of today is not necessarily suitable tomorrow.

The need for maintaining casualty rehabilitation service is borne out by the steady volume of new and reopened cases. Over the past five years the average number of active casualty cases under service at all times has been approximately 4,600. Departmental activity reports clearly indicate that in the foreseeable future there will be little or no reduction in this figure, and it therefore follows that services for Canada's war disabled will be required on a continuous basis.

In the district office the administrative and field work related to war veterans allowance and the supplementary benefits provided by the assistance fund constitute the largest single item of veterans welfare services branch work load. Each case, on application or review, requires detailed information and careful appraisal, which is often quite time-consuming. The magnitude of this task is illustrated by the fact that during the past fiscal year 15,489 investigations and visits were made on behalf of new applicants for war veterans allowance, 44,627 for rechecks and 9,158 for assistance fund purposes.

This growing work load is consistent with the increase in recipients and expenditures of both the war veterans allowance and the assistance fund. In the past fiscal year a total of 14,055 recipients of war veterans allowance were helped by the assistance fund at a total cost of $2,095,521. In the previous fiscal year 11,819 were assisted at a cost of $1,448,278.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on the education assistance act. This is one aspect of our training program which continues to grow and is under the provisions of the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act. By March 31, 1959 the total approved for training had grown to 1,406 from 1,106 reported at March 31 of 1958. Total expenditures under this program from July 1, 1953 to March 31, 1959 were $1,156,340. Each case approved represents careful work in counselling the child concerned regarding the choice of career and follow-up on academic progress. The peak years of this program are still ahead of us, and it is impossible at this time to estimate exactly how long it will last.

This act was amended during the first session of the 24th parliament to provide that certain small classes of children previously unable to benefit from the provisions of this act should be eligible for assistance. The effect so far of the enlargement of the eligible classes has been small and only a dozen or so have been affected. However, the future should show an increasing effect from this amendment, although the total number of children who will eventually gain benefits is difficult to predict.

A further amendment provided for the increase in the permissible allowance from $25 to $60 a month for a number of eligible students between the ages of 21 and 25. So far 156 students have benefited from this increase, and the annual rate of allowance to them for the fiscal year just ended is about $33,000.

The Veterans Insurance Act was amended at the first session of the 24th parliament to extend the eligibility to contract for insurance for world war II veterans and those of the action in Korea to September 30, 1962. World war II veterans had lost eligibility to take out this insurance unless they had unused re-establishment credit available for premiums. Since the amendment some 2,727 policies have been issued for $10.3 million of insurance, of which we estimate nearly 2,000 gained their eligibility from the amendment, and the face amount of their policies is about $9 million.

The Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act and the Veterans Insurance Act were each amended to eliminate a restriction which had limited the face amount of insurance payable where a pension under the Pension Act was awarded to the dependant of a deceased pensioned policyholder. The effect of this amendment under the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act was slight because of the long period which has elapsed since the last of these policies was issued, in 1933. However, under the Veterans Insurance Act there have been some 223 death claims which have occurred since the amendment, representing a face value of about $643,800 which, on the basis of experience, would previously have been settled for approximately $450,600 but because of the amendment have become payable in full.

For the many years that I have been a member of this house I have known that the hospitals operated by our treatment services were generally held in high regard and that the work done in them was good. It was not, however, until I had the opportunity to visit them and see them with my own eyes that I realized just how good this work is.

It is on the clinical care of patients that the greatest public interest is focused. In this regard it is, of course, essential that proper drugs, equipment and buildings be available. I am happy to report that I have found our treatment services to be second to none in the supply of such adjuncts. Our equipment is in the main of the most modern type and is everywhere well maintained. An orderly program for the replacement of out-dated equipment ensures the continuance of this situation. Similarly, an orderly program for the replacement of outworn hospital buildings has been under way for some time and is still continuing. Another five or six years should see the disappearance of the old so-called "temporary" hospital accommodation and its replacement by modern fireproof buildings which should be worthy of the high quality of work carried out in them.

Construction work on the new wing at Shaughnessy hospital, Vancouver, B.C., with a bed capacity of 314, has now reached approximately 40 per cent completion. It is expected to be ready for occupancy by April, 1960 and will replace beds and facilities in the old frame military hospital annex and in the Hycroft veterans home at Vancouver.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Planning is almost completed for the proposed new 300 bed wing at Westminster hospital, London, Ontario. It is expected that construction work will begin in the near future and will be completed in about two and a half years. Occupancy will permit the demolition of some of the older parts of the hospital dating from the first world war.

Planning is now under way for the addition of a veterans wing to the General hospital at St. John's, Newfoundland. This addition will provide for 35 active treatment beds and 30 beds for domiciliary care. It will also include an auditorium and offices as well as facilities for recreation and an arts and crafts program. It is hoped to start work on the project before the end of the present fiscal year and construction is expected to take about one year altogether.

The department has deliberately embarked upon a program to keep the practice of medicine in departmental hospitals a living, vital, progressive thing. We have allied ourselves as closely as we can to the teaching programs of universities, and we have been active in a program of clinical research in those fields of medicine which we are best suited, in view of the nature of our patient population, to investigate.

The members of this committee will want to know the extent to which this service can be extended to the veterans of Canada. It was never intended that everyone who had ever served in the armed forces of Canada in wartime would be provided with a free medical plan for the balance of his life. Such a concept would be an approach to state medicine, attended by whatever evils may be inherent in such a scheme, and would I fear alienate the good will of those of the medical profession to whom we are indebted. In any event, the department provides in its hospitals a grand total of 8,945 beds. When it is realized that there are now about 1,200,000 living Canadians who were once members of the armed forces, it will be obvious that the number of available beds is insufficient to serve all this large population.

It is the function of treatment services to make good the ravages of war. Thus the veterans who receive a pension for a service-connected disability are entitled to be admitted to one of our hospitals at any time for the necessary treatment of that disability. Similarly, the veteran who is a recipient of war veterans allowance may be admitted to a departmental hospital for any necessary treatment. Since he is dependent upon the department for food, clothing and shelter, it would be unreasonable not to provide him also with medical care.

In conclusion, with respect to the estimates which are before the committee, may I point out that in the administrative votes there is a substantial decrease of over $3 million. The group of expenditures which can be classified as payments under legislation or regulations and which total nearly $220 million of the department's total requirements of $307,285,000 is expected to show an increase in 1959-1960 of approximately $1,620,000. In the group of expenditures classed as "terminable services" the substantial increase in provision for the education of children of war dead is more than offset by the termination of unemployment insurance contributions by the department on behalf of discharged regular force personnel.

Mr. Chairman, we shall be going over my estimates item by item, and I shall be very pleased to answer any questions which hon. members may wish to ask.

Mr. Forgie: We have just listened to an historically factual and comprehensive report by the Minister of Veterans Affairs with regard to the situation prevailing in his department as of this time. I suggest that the report which he has made to parliament be published in printed form and distributed throughout the country. It is something which is really worth having, and it has brought up to date the entire veterans charter.

I do not intend to waste the time of the committee by any lengthy dissertation on this matter. The main items of the estimates have been before the standing committee. The committee has been unanimous in its report. I do not think it is necessary to repeat today what was said there. However, observations will be made on each item, of course, as it is reached.

We all in the committee appreciate the value of the services of the officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs, particularly those of the officials of the Veterans' Land Act administration and the Canadian pension commission. I think it may be truthfully said that at all times the committee has had at heart the interests of the veteran and his dependants.

A great many improvements have been made during the past few years in the legislation affecting veterans. There is one matter, however, which I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and which was not mentioned either in the committee or by him this morning. I refer to the question of small holdings under the Veterans' Land Act. In 1958, I think it was, the minister stated that he would make a careful investigation into this question of whether or not part-time holdings should not be reduced from 3 acres—or from 1.6 acres which the figure actually is—to the original one half acre as it was in the beginning in 1945 or 1946. As far as my knowledge goes I am satisfied that the one half acre holding was a successful proposition in the section of the country from which I come. I would therefore ask the minister to review this situation, and possibly next year we shall be able to discuss the matter in committee.

I think that is all I have to say. As I say, we will discuss the estimates item by item as they come up.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, like the previous speaker I shall be quite brief, because we had a very thorough discussion of these estimates in the committee. I listened with interest to the historical review of the development of veterans affairs legislation and its present status. However, I do want to make a complaint. Everywhere I go I find that people pick on me. During the discussion of certain aspects of these estimates in the committee one of the officials, I think it was the deputy minister, was standing there reading over a document indicating that it was estimated that the first world war veteran would last until year so and so, and as soon as he told the committee that he looked at me. This morning the minister gave some information to the house with respect to the number of world war I veterans shrinking each year, and just at that point he looked at me. I want to protest about this, Mr. Chairman, and ask him in future to glance at someone else besides me. I am a bit sensitive in that respect.

I do want to take this opportunity briefly to express my appreciation for the courtesies the minister has extended and the prompt attention he has paid to any matter I have brought to his notice. I have no hesitation in saying of the minister that whether we get all we want from him we do know his heart is in the right place; what he has to do is persuade the rest of his colleagues that what he is asking for is justified. I would also like to express my appreciation to the deputy minister, the Canadian pension commission and the war veterans allowances board, as well as the senior officials in Ottawa, including the ladies, the district officials and the local officials. For a good number of years I have had a lot to do with the Department of Veterans Affairs, both as a member of the house and as one particularly interested in veterans questions. This is a department which has a devoted staff from top to bottom, working on behalf of the veterans and their dependants in Canada administering legislation passed by this house.

I might mention in passing that I received a telegram from the secretary of the civil service branch representing the veterans employed in Shaughnessy hospital in Vancouver urging us to do all we could to prompt the government to grant the civil service increases which have been expected for some time. I want to take this opportunity to bring that to the minister's attention, because I think one of the best ways we can show our appreciation, particularly to the lower paid staff, is to urge the government to give the civil service increases which have been in mind and expected for so long.

The committee, I think, held ten meetings, made a thorough examination of the estimates and questioned the officials on all matters which required attention. There is no doubt that they have the information to give, or if they have not got it at the time they get it for you. We had representations from the Legion and a good number of veterans organizations on matters which are of particular concern to those groups. I might say that we heard representations with respect to the increase in pensions and war veterans allowances. The minister has no doubt noticed in the report the committee's reference to this, and we understand that consideration is being given to this matter at the present time and that legislation will be examined next year. I think a very good job was done in amending the Veterans' Land Act this year, and I believe it is a systematic way in approaching this legislation to deal with each particular act each year so we have it up to date for at least some time to come.

Then the committee heard some very interesting representations from the Hong Kong veterans and also some evidence from the officials concerned with that branch of veterans' affairs. I just want to read paragraph 18 on page 639 of the report in this connection:

> The committee appreciates the difficulties of assuring an equitable distribution of the fund. At the same time it is aware of the special problems of veterans who were prisoners of war. It suggests that, in view of the obvious impossibility of settling all claims, the problem might be partially resolved by using a portion of the remaining balance to set up a prisoner of war benevolent fund to meet the human needs of prisoners of war and their dependants. This special fund could be administered after the fashion of similar benevolent funds already operating on behalf of veterans and their dependants.

The committee gave a lot of consideration to that and they have every sympathy with the recommendation that the Hong Kong veterans receive an increase in their allowance. We also had evidence with respect to the total of the fund and the claims against it, and we came to the unanimous conclusion that this recommendation was possibly the best way to do the most for those who needed it the worst.

Then we had representations from the corps of Canadian fire fighters. I have always felt very sympathetic to their representations and their proposals, because I think the failure to recognize them is the result of some serious misunderstanding some years ago. In my opinion, from the evidence I listened to in the committee from time to time, there is some breach of faith on somebody's part. The committee suggested that as these measures are reviewed and amended from time to time consideration might be given to providing wider coverage to members of the corps as circumstances warrant. This applies particularly to the war veterans allowance as the corps members reach age eligibility.

I do urge the minister to give consideration to that recommendation of the committee. There again, they are few in numbers to commence with. Age is, of course, taking its toll, and possibly we can do something to the best advantage along the lines recommended by the committee.

Then the committee heard some representations with respect to the veterans preference regarding employment in the civil service. There has been some uncertainty in certain quarters, and to clear up any uncertainty there might be on this point the committee heartily endorsed the principle of the veterans principle in the Civil Service Act, and recommended that in any contemplated amendment of the act this principle remain unchanged.

I think it is safe to say from experience that the work of the standing committee is justified. I think we can look upon the standing committee on veterans affairs as a clearing house through which representatives of veterans organizations can advance their complaints, make their suggestions and express their opinions, and discuss things generally of interest to veterans and their dependants with the members of the committee.

I have just two other matters to mention before I resume my seat, Mr. Chairman. First of all, I do want to support the representations made by the hon. member for Renfrew North with respect to further consideration being given to the reduction of the required acreage with regard to small holdings to half an acre. If only we could get that acreage reduced to half an acre I am sure there would be thousands of veterans in Canada who would take advantage of that splendid legislation. As I have said on a number of occasions, in my constituency I am quite positive that there would be between 200 and 300 applications from veterans who are employed by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, the lumber industry, or in the mining industry in the district who would like an opportunity to obtain half an acre of land under the small holdings section of the Veterans' Land Act in order to build a home.

We do urge further consideration of that matter. In a mountainous country like ours it is most difficult even to get the 1.6 acres on occasion, and anywhere near our cities and towns it is almost impossible to get 3 acres. Naturally our town and villages are on the side of streams and face the large mountains. That leaves little room for this purpose.

I listened carefully to what the minister said about the admission of veterans to hospital for treatment, and I agree that it was not intended that this should develop into a state medical scheme for all veterans. At the recent convention of the British Columbia command of the Canadian Legion this was discussed, and I received letters from a number of branches. We raise more hell in British Columbia than in any other province. Even the Canadian Legion feels that way about us. We are that way in all respects. We are possibly the most progressive province in Canada.

Before registering my complaint in mild language, because I do not wish to be nasty, I want to read a letter I received from an old sergeant in my company which indicates that the vast majority of veterans appreciate what is being done for them by the Department of Veterans Affairs:

Nakusp, May 1, 1959

Friend Bert:

Just a line to thank you for all your favors. It is very interesting to know what goes on down there, although I am unable to read a great deal owing to defective eyes.

I have just written the D.V.A. at Vancouver. I felt that I must let them know that I appreciated what they have done for me.

After my wife died last April with eight years of medical and surgical expenses, it had left me broke and when the $90 per month came in so unexpectedly, it was such a surprise that I have not really recovered from it yet.

And I have to also thank you people down there. I fully realize that thanks sounds very weak and inadequate, but it is all I can think of at the present time. And so again I say thank you all for a very wonderful lift.

Very sincerely,

J. S. Crowell

Trust your health continues good.

Anyone who says anything against the D.V.A. will have to fight me.

I receive many letters of that type. I put this one on the record because it may give a feeling of satisfaction to the officials and everyone connected with the administration of veterans affairs. On one occasion when I was admitted to Shaughnessy hospital for treatment a neighbouring bed patient asked if I had spent five years in the New Westminster penitentiary. When I replied that up to that point I had not, he told me I resembled the chap in the cell next to him. He had been in trouble and told me all his difficulties.

I have had a number of cases referred to me of destitute veterans who were not eligible, according to law, to be admitted to hospital. I received a letter from a member of the provincial executive of the Canadian Legion in British Columbia who informed me that there were 52 empty beds when they went through the hospital. These cases arise particularly in respect of world war I veterans. With that equipment and plant available I urge that we do not fail to admit to hospital any veteran who has worn the uniform of this country in world war I or world war II. I urge that consideration be given particularly to these older men who seek admission to our departmental hospitals.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I wish to endorse the last statement made by the previous speaker, and also a couple of the other statements he made during the course of his remarks. In rising at this time I assure the committee that I do not wish to take up too much time. I shall briefly present my three points and express the hope that by one o'clock the minister's responsibilities here will be completed.

None of us in any way suggests that our veterans legislation is not among the best, but as is the case in all legislation there are inequities, and I wish to refer to some existing inequities in our pension legislation. Although these points were discussed at length in the standing committee I wish to bring them to the attention of this committee for an express purpose.

The previous speaker referred to the fund that exists in the department of the Secretary of State due to the fact that assets of enemy countries were seized by the Canadian government at the beginning of world war II. He suggested, as did the veterans affairs committee, that this money be used to establish a fund to take care of certain contingencies that arise and for which no provision is made under any existing legislation.

I mention this point because of a number of cases that have been brought to my personal attention. Having been a prisoner during world war II and being now a member of this committee, no doubt certain cases are brought to my attention which may not have come to the notice of other hon. members.

Cases have been referred to me of comrades of mine who passed away at an early age leaving young wives and very young families. As was my own experience, these men were invariably discharged from the services with a small medical pension. In their particular cases they did not follow up with any great degree of enthusiasm the infirmity they had at the time of discharge. Suddenly one day these men did not return to their homes and families; in each case they died suddenly. Because of their desire to be good citizens and achieve independence there was no means by which their families could be supported following their death.

A couple of these cases were in the Toronto area and I was able to acquaint myself intimately with the circumstances. I told the standing committee of a case involving a young widow who upon the death of her husband applied to the department and was rejected under the terms of the act because her veteran husband was not in receipt of a 50 per cent medical pension. She then applied to the provincial welfare authorities. Because the veteran had been industrious, had worked hard and built up a small estate which under the terms of his will provided her with a small monthly return, she was refused support by the provincial authorities.

Here we have the case of this young widow—as a matter of fact it applies to all the cases I know of—these young widows, having a small income on a reduced basis per year for a short time, possibly 10 years, with young families and existing—and I say "existing"—on less than the mothers' allowances in the province of Ontario. I consider this a very poor situation in regard to the widows and families of those veterans.

Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the Pension Act is to be reviewed next year, these situations should be taken into serious consideration. When the act is amended I shall certainly be active in the standing committee to see that these situations are rectified. I feel very badly about them myself as a member of parliament, and I feel considerably worse because of the fact that these men were comrades of mine. If it were brought to the attention of the country I am sure the country would also feel as I do about these cases.

The previous speaker referred to the sum of money that is under the control of the Secretary of State as the result of confiscating enemy assets in Canada. This morning we heard the Minister of Finance say that sum is not as large as the amount quoted in the standing committee, which was something over $6 million; in actual fact it is $4 milion. I do not think the Minister of Finance informed us that the claims against this fund are in excess of $100 million, but some of those claims are by large corporations which were warned in plenty of time to get out of those countries at the beginning of the second world war, and they had the opportunity to save their assets but did not pay heed. I do not suggest for a moment that this money be taken as is or that the whole amount be used, because I suppose there are many just cases that must be considered. But if there is a residual amount, then I think the action suggested by the hon. member for Kootenay West should be considered and taken under advisement by the minister and his department in the future.

Finally I should like to say a word about Sunnybrook hospital in Toronto. I suppose these conditions may exist in other veterans hospitals as well. There is a terrific increase in the number of aged veterans being taken into the hospital under domiciliary care. Since they have been taken into Sunnybrook the strain has been on active treatment beds. I believe the minister should consider the need for active treatment beds in relation, of course, to the demand; and we know and the members of the standing committee know that it is quite considerable.

I think all the members felt as I felt on viewing the situation. Because of the fact that these aged veterans are being properly cared for—and the treatment they receive is commendable—we feel that the administrative areas are being sacrificed. Certain office space, and certainly the admitting and other facilities, are being taxed to supply this domiciliary care. We also noted that the area which is used at Sunnybrook for ambulance cases is very poor, very inadequate and certainly in the cold winter months presents many difficulties. It is because of this situation that I mention Sunnybrook at this time. I hope the minister will use his influence to see that next year there will be an item in the estimates to take care of this situation and see that it is rectified for the veterans using that particular institution.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with others who have spoken in thanking the minister for the comprehensive review of his department which he gave us this morning. In particular I should like to thank him for the information he gave us on the treatment facilities and the new hospital facilities which are being provided for Newfoundland veterans, and the good news that they should be completed in about a year from now.

When the main estimates were first presented I was surprised to find a decrease of about $1,727,000, but I note that when the supplementary estimates are added, if my arithmetic is correct, the over-all total shows a slight increase of about $70,000. I draw attention to this fact because I think hon. members and the committee should not conclude from these figures that the estimates of this department are being stabilized or that they can be stabilized in the near future. There are several forces at work which directly affect the estimates of this department. One of the factors is the rates and scales of allowances and pensions. As the purchasing power of our dollar continues to decline these rates and scales will have to be revised upward from time to time to enable the veteran to keep abreast of the increase in the cost of living.

The other main factor has to do with the number of veterans for whom benefits must be provided. The minister informed us this morning that the number of veterans of world war I has passed its peak and that the payments to veterans of world war II can be expected to increase; but as the years advance and more and more of the old sweats answer the last roll call, payments to this group will continue to decline and eventually disappear.

In addition to the two factors I have already mentioned there are three others which, though less spectacular in their effect on the budget, are nevertheless very important. As time goes on the effect of advancing years must tend to aggravate the war disabilities of the veterans of world war II and render them eligible for increased pensions and disability grants. The inexorable march of time will inevitably render more and more of world war II veterans eligible for war veterans allowances. These payments are now limited by a means test; but, due to inflation, the ceiling has been raised from time to time and it must be expected that this will happen again in the future.

Another factor, and a more important one, is that benefits should be extended to certain groups of veterans who are not eligible at present. In addition, as Canada advances in prosperity we shall have to raise these ceilings to enable the veteran to share in the improved standard of living enjoyed by Canadians generally. For all these reasons, then, it is reasonable to expect an increase in the estimates of this department for many years to come. In fact the only way these increases can be held in check is by the stabilization of the purchasing power of our dollar and by continued prosperity which will enable the means test to come into effect even when the ceiling is raised to provide for improvement in living standards.

In spite of all that has been done under the veterans charter there is still need for further machinery to take care of those veterans under 60 whose earning capacity has been destroyed by ill health for long periods of time, and who cannot qualify for benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act because their disabilities are not attributable to war service or because even when their disabilities are attributable to war service they cannot be certified by a medical doctor as being permanently unemployable. These veterans have no recourse but to apply for public relief.

Mr. Brooks: May I correct the hon. member there. I know he does not wish to make an incorrect statement. Under the War Veterans Allowance Act, if a man is physically unable to earn a living and is in a position economically where he cannot support himself, his disability does not have to be attributable to his war service in order for him to come under the War Veterans Allowance Act. There is provision made for that.

Mr. Carter: I thank the minister for that correction. I was aware of that, but the group I have in mind are those under 60 whose disabilities are not attributable to war service and who lose their earning capacity for long periods of time. These veterans have no recourse but to apply for public relief, and to me it seems a national disgrace that any person who offered his life for his country should have to rely on public charity in a time of personal misfortune.

We have a duty to keep before the public the fact that the prosperity and privileges we enjoy every day have been made possible by the sacrifices of our comrades who gave their all, and also by the services of those who offered their lives but were fortunate enough to survive. It is easy even for veterans to forget this fact. This was vividly brought home to me personally when along with other members of the committee I visited Sunnybrook hospital at Toronto. We were impressed not only with the multitude of activities carried on in that institution, which can almost be described as a self-contained community, but once more we were reminded anew of the horrors of war, which had become dimmed by the passage of time. There we saw living reminders of the human cost of war and living testimony to the price some of our comrades have continued to pay throughout the years.

This experience of being confronted with the grim reality of the price some of our comrades are still paying came to me as a bit of a shock, though I knew from experience what to expect. In my opinion it is an experience that should be made available to every member of the house, to high school and university students and to as many of the adult public as can be conveniently accommodated. I hope the minister will consider this suggestion, because to me it is essential lest we forget.

When the committee was considering the first item of these estimates representations were received from several veterans organizations which in my opinion are worthy of serious study. As most of these representations involved the expenditure of public funds the committee could not make specific recommendations. However, I hope the minister and his colleagues will find it possible to give them the sympathetic and favourable consideration which in my opinion they deserve.

The corps of Canadian fire fighters in particular requested greater recognition of their valuable war service. Their request appears to me to be fully justified, and I hope the minister will find some way of overcoming the technicalities which now cause them to be classed as civilians instead of veterans. Such a change will not result in any significant expenditure of public funds.

Finally, as a representative from Newfoundland I was happy to have the minister's assurance that the Pension Act will be revised at the next session of parliament. I know I am voicing the sentiments of all Newfoundlanders when I say we hope that at that time the necessary changes will be made to put Newfoundland veterans completely on a par with those who served in the Canadian forces, in accordance with the commitment contained in the terms of union.

As other hon. members have pointed out, these estimates were thoroughly examined in the standing committee on veterans affairs. Every item was gone over with a fine-tooth comb and there was also an inquiry into the operation of the various branches. I am sure all members of the committee were impressed, as I was, with the competence of the officials in charge of the administration of the veterans charter and were thoroughly satisfied that all these funds are being administered with competence and efficiency.

All members in all parties are one in their desire to give the best possible treatment to our war veterans, and I am sure there is nothing controversial on that score either with respect to policy or the individual items in the estimates. Therefore I agree with hon. members that it should not be necessary for the committee to take very much time in passing these estimates.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

[Mr. Carter.]

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Macdonald (Kings): Mr. Chairman, at this time I should like to make a few brief comments on "veterans preference." I know that one or two previous speakers have also referred to this subject, but I should like to take this opportunity to refer to the matter because at this time there is some suggestion that in the revamping of the civil service commission there might be a change in the handling of applications through that body. This matter is of concern, in my humble opinion, to a large number of veterans and, I might say, to many Canadian citizens who realize and appreciate the great sacrifices that have been made by veterans for their country, who feel that no change should be made at the present time.

In that connection, I should like to refer to the brief I have here, a copy of which was presented to the standing committee on veterans affairs by the Canadian Legion in March of this year. Under the heading "Civil Service" and the subheading, "Maintenance of Preference", I quote the following:

> The federal Civil Service Act is presently under review and it is anticipated that amendments to the act may result. We believe Canada has benefited by the veterans preference in that it tends to ensure that a high percentage of civil servants will be veterans who have already demonstrated their loyalty by their willingness to make great sacrifices in defence of this country. The Canadian Legion is strongly opposed to any amendment to this act which would take away any benefit presently accruing to Canadian veterans.
> The Canadian Legion therefore recommends—that the existing veterans preference in employment in the civil service be maintained and applied to all government departments and crown corporations.

I think it is generally known, Mr. Chairman, that the veterans preference has been in effect since world war I. This principle was firmly recognized when it was made statutory and included in the early stages of planning for the rehabilitation of veterans of world war II. I might say that within three months of the beginning of world war II a special committee of the cabinet was set up to deal with the rehabilitation of veterans, under which there was set up a general advisory committee of deputy ministers which spelled out a program of rehabilitation in answer to this question: "What does the state owe to those whose peaceful lives were disrupted by service to this country." Mr. Walter S. Woods, C.M.G., Ll.D., former deputy minister of veterans affairs, had a great deal to do with drawing up the veterans charter. I should mention also the role played by the Canadian Legion in formulating that charter. It was a most important and substantial one.

Mr. Woods, in his splendid book "The Men Who Came Back", refers to the general principles on pages 128 and 129, and I should like to read the 12th principle of the program. No. 12 reads:

> They should be given preference in the civil service similar to that extended to veterans of world war I.

This principle, of course, Mr. Chairman, only applies when the veteran concerned has passed the regular civil service examinations, so I think what is being asked is certainly not unfair or unreasonable. This system, since it has been in effect, I submit has worked out very well, and many of our best civil servants are veterans. It is natural, perhaps, to expect that those who have shown the highest form of unselfish service to their country should prove later to be the highest type of civil servant the government could hire.

I might point out that one of our veterans affairs subdepartments, the Veterans' Land Act branch, has been held up on many occasions as a model of good organization and efficient administration. The system of veterans preference has proven fair, and I think there is no justification at the present time for changing it. There are, of course, not many veterans who apply in a number of the competitions, and in quite a large number of competitions there are none who apply. There are still some however who are entitled to the privilege of veterans preference due to their service, and especially some veterans of the Korean war, who must be given consideration.

I might say that most private companies, municipalities and provincial governments recognize the principle of veterans preference in their hiring. Certainly the federal civil service should lead the way and continue the good example that has been set. The legislation in this regard has been on the books for a good many years, and I repeat that I do not see any reason for changing it at the present time.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that this subject is not particularly the responsibility of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I only raise it at the present time because the department has a vital interest in everything connected with the veterans, so I think it is not inopportune. I might close by saying that this subject is causing a great deal of concern amongst veterans, the organizations to which they belong, and many citizens throughout the country who are interested in veterans. I hope no changes will be made.

Mr. Speakman: I should like to add my voice to that of the hon. member who has just spoken concerning the retention of the veterans preference. Since the standing committee has completed its work I have received many letters from members of the 14 Legion branches in my constituency with regard to this subject, and I am glad it has been raised by several other members.

I have one other point I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, Mr. Chairman. I believe this is the proper place to mention it because the minister is the advocate for veterans in Canada, although probably the matter I wish to mention would not come directly under his jurisdiction. I refer, Mr. Chairman, to the matter of having November 11 declared a statutory holiday in Canada. The veterans of Canada should be remembered. They should first be remembered by the government and the parliament of Canada.

I should like to put on the record some figures with respect to the Canadians who in four wars, in the 60 years of this century, have laid down their lives for their country. In the South African war 224 Canadians gave their lives. In world war I 60,969 Canadians gave their lives. In world war II 42,042 Canadians gave their lives. In the Korean war 312 Canadians laid down their lives in far lands but in the defence of the world and of Canada particularly.

I think it is the responsibility of the parliament of Canada to mark the day of remembrance of our war dead so that future generations will remember that 103,547 Canadians have given their lives for their country in the defence and maintenance of the freedom we enjoy. I strongly urge that the minister use his good offices with his colleagues in the cabinet to have Remembrance day made a statutory holiday and that the government —and the Department of Veterans Affairs particularly—make it a point that this day of remembrance of our war dead be honoured as much as possible all over Canada.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to take more than a few minutes, but since the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, who was the chairman of the veterans affairs committee, is unavoidably absent on official business I felt that I as vice chairman, on his behalf as well as on my own, should like to thank all hon. members who sat on the veterans affairs committee for their co-operation and their serious consideration of all matters that came before the committee. It was plain that each hon. member of that committee demonstrated his sincere interest in all matters which affected veterans, their families and their dependants, and that all were ready at all times to strongly recommend and support any legislation for the betterment of the veteran's status.

During the recess the hon. member for Kootenay West and some others suggested to me that a word of thanks and appreciation from the hon. members of the committee to our chairman should be placed on the record. Therefore at this time it is a pleasant task for me, on behalf of the members of the committee, to convey to the chairman our thanks and appreciation for his good work as presiding officer and for the manner in which he conducted all hearings and deliberations.

I also wish to say something else, and in doing so I am sure I have the full concurrence of all hon. members of the committee. To the deputy minister of veterans affairs and all members of his staff, and to the chairman and vice chairman of the pension board I want to express our thanks and appreciation for their splendid assistance and co-operation at all times, and for the efficiency they displayed in making the explanations in connection with many problems raised by hon. members.

While I am on my feet I should also like to say a word in connection with the D.V.A. staff in my own district in New Brunswick and to tell the minister and his deputy minister that their officials in my district at least—and I suspect the same thing applies generally—are carrying out their duties in the interests of veterans and veterans legislation in an efficient and courteous manner. I personally have no hesitation in saying that I could not expect better co-operation.

I also feel that the committee would wish me to say that we appreciated the attendance of the minister at all meetings of the committee when it was possible for him to be there. We have confidence in his sincere efforts to improve the status of the veterans, consistent with that of others in our society, and their standards of living.

As the time is short and I know we want to get through, I do not propose to discuss any issues. These matters have been fairly well covered in the committee and have been well covered by those who have preceded me.

Mr. Martel: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take just a few minutes of the time of the committe since I did not have the opportunity to be a member of the standing committee which studied the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I have just a few remarks to make which concern the veterans in my area in northwestern Quebec. I want to stress one point which has already been brought to the attention of the minister and the officials of his department, but since I have received an additional representation from the Canadian Legion, at Amos and Senneterre in my riding and other legions in the district, I feel it is my duty to bring this question to the attention of the minister.

The matter concerns the veterans in our area. We have an area covering practically 100,000 square miles and taking in the northern part of Pontiac-Temiscamingue riding, the riding of Villeneuve next to mine and my riding of Chapleau. Throughout this large territory there are some 6,000 veterans. We have at Amos an office to look after the Veterans' Land Act administration. A representative has been in charge there for a number of years, although last year there was a change; a new officer was appointed, but the office was maintained. However, this man is alone and he is expected to do the whole job and cover this large area. He also has to look after the welfare of the different veterans in this territory.

This is almost an impossible job for one man to do. I believe we require a welfare officer as well as the representative of the department who looks after the administration of the Veterans' Land Act. Hence with your permission, Mr. Chairman, I should just like to read into the record a resolution that was adopted last year by all the Canadian Legion branches in northwestern Quebec at the meeting held in Amos. Since this resolution is in French I will read it in French.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, as I have just explained, in northwestern Quebec there is a vast area to cover. It is almost 100,000 square miles and the population includes 6,000 veterans who do not get all the attention they would have a right to expect from the Department of Veterans Affairs, not because of the department's unwillingness to give them attention but because those veterans are scattered over such a vast area that it is impossible for the department to do so with only one representative. It might seem like a small number of veterans compared with the number of those around Montreal or Toronto, who do get more attention paid to them. However, there surely can be no doubt as to their patriotism, and even if they are spread out on a vast area, they are just as entitled to the attention of the department as are veterans who live in towns and cities.

I should like to read into the record the text of a resolution on this matter adopted last year on the occasion of the annual rally of northwestern Quebec Canadian Legion branches held in Amos on August 3, 1958:

From the veterans of northwestern Quebec to the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Whereas the northwest area of the province of Quebec, comprising the federal ridings of Chapleau, Villeneuve and part of Pontiac, includes over six thousand (6,000) veterans, nearly half of whom have to do with the Department of Veterans Affairs; Whereas the only federal agency in the area is the Veterans Land Act Board, represented by a single member who also has to perform the duties of a welfare officer; Whereas the official holding both the above-mentioned offices without any help whatsoever, at the present time, in the form of an assistant, a secretary, or other persons, is finding it impossible to perform the administrative work required of him, to the satisfaction of the department and of the veterans concerned; Whereas the Val d'Or, Senneterre, Malartic and Amos branches of the Canadian Legion, after considering the matter, have come to the conclusion that this situation is mainly due to the overburdensome cumulation of two administrative offices each of which should be assigned to a separate official, to wit, an official for the Veterans' Land Act Administration and an official for the Veterans Welfare Services, with due regard for and appreciation of the work done in the cities of Val d'Or and Rouyn-Noranda by two officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission who are allowed by the Department of Labour to give over to this work ten per cent of their office time by virtue of an agreement with the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Be it therefore proposed, resolved and unanimously carried: That it be recommended to federal authorities to improve the administration of the affairs of northwest Quebec veterans by the establishment of two administrative positions with administrative jurisdiction over our area:

(a) one representative from the Department of Veterans Affairs, Welfare Services Division;

(b) one representative from the Veterans' Land Act Administration.

And the document is signed by:

W. A. Abbott, District commanding officer.
P. H. Poitras, District secretary.
Canadian Legion, North-West district of the province of Quebec.

As I said, a representative of the veterans land act board, a new man, has been put in charge of the office in Amos, and has now taken up his duties. But the man cannot handle all the work by himself, and that is why I thought I should bring this matter to the attention of the minister when the estimates of the veterans affairs department are before the house.

(Text):

Mr. Hardie: Before the item carries, Mr. Chairman, I would like to inform the house that this morning I received a letter from the executive officers of the Vincent Massey branch of the Canadian Legion in Yellowknife, Northwest Territories, complaining that the veterans preference has not, according to the traditions of the government, been adhered to by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources in Yellowknife. Rather than read the whole of the letter, if the minister agrees I will give him this information provided he will investigate this grievance. I might say that the letter was written by the president to other executive officers of the Legion at Yellowknife, and these are substantial men in the community.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, speaking generally I have found that the veterans preference has been very well observed in all departments. Of course I do receive letters of complaint, and from listening to other hon. members this afternoon there undoubtedly are such complaints. But in an organization as large as the civil service and as large as the veterans organization, there is bound to be complaint. The hon. member's particular reference appears to concern the department of northern affairs. The northern affairs estimates will be up shortly, and I am sure the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources will be able to answer the hon member's question.

Mr. Hardie: Am I to take it, then, that the minister is not interested in investigating this complaint?

Mr. Brooks: If my hon. friend takes it that way he is absolutely wrong. The minister has been investigating complaints of this kind ever since he has been minister. I might say to the hon. member that as a veteran myself I have always been very much interested in this question.

Mr. Hardie: I understand the interest of the minister, but in his original answer he did not give me any idea whether or not he would investigate the complaint. He laid the responsibility on the minister of northern affairs, with whom I do not think this complaint should be registred.

Mr. Brooks: Then I will take it up with the minister of northern affairs. However, I might say to the hon. member that I do not interfere with the affairs of other departments, and I do not appreciate it if they interfere with mine.

Item agreed to.

War veterans allowance and other benefits—
457. War veterans allowances, $59,785,000.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, this morning I made a statement which the minister was good enough to correct, but on checking back in my files I have come across cases of veterans under 40 who, through illness of one kind or another, have not been able to earn a living for a long period of time. I have found that these people have applied for war veterans allowance and have been refused initially because they were told that their condition was temporary, that they were not permanently unemployable.

If there is some misunderstanding on that score in the minds of officials who deal with these cases I would like to have it clarified, but I know from personal experience of a number of young veterans who have had to exist on public charity for as long as one or two years. Eventually they were awarded the war veterans allowance, but that happened only after existing for two or three years on public charity. That was the point I was trying to emphasize this morning. If there was any misunderstanding about that and the minister can give us further clarification, I would be glad to have it.

Mr. Brooks: That is not what the hon. member said this morning, as a matter of fact. He did not speak about their being temporarily unemployable; he used the words, permanently unemployable.

Mr. Carter: Excuse me, Mr. Chairman, but I said men who had their earning power destroyed for long periods of time. These were the words I used. Long periods of time to my mind would be a year or even two years or even longer. Even six months is a long period of time.

Mr. Brooks: Under the act, as the hon. member knows, any veteran or widow who in the opinion of the district authority is permanently unemployable because of physical or mental disability, or because of physical or mental disability or insufficiency, combined with economic handicaps, is incapable and unlikely to become capable of maintaining himself or herself, is eligible for war veterans allowance.

Mr. Carter: Yes. I thank the minister for that statement. When the minister corrected me this morning I thought I had confused that term "permanently unemployable" with the terms of the civil disability pension under the Disabled Persons Act administered by the national health and welfare. What I was trying to get at was that there is a need for something to be done because it takes such a long time to decide whether the veteran's condition is going to be permanent, and although the decision is eventually made it may be delayed for two or three years. During that time the veteran is forced to exist on public charity, and I for one do not think that is good enough. I think we should be able to provide some means of taking care of such cases.

Mr. Brooks: I assure the hon. member that if he would bring any particular case to my attention I will deal with it and try to work out some solution.

Item agreed to.

Canadian pension commission—

463. Administration expenses, $2,593,195.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, on this item I just want to renew the plea which the minister receives annually, I think, from veterans. There is need for greater care in granting the veteran the benefit of the doubt. In recent years more and more cases have come to my attention in which the veteran has not received the benefit of the doubt. I should like to take a moment or two to cite a few examples.

I know of the case of a veteran who was accepted into the navy with a lame leg. After a number of years of service he was discharged. He did not apply for pension, but after having been in civilian life for a number of years the leg became worse. Being a veteran he applied for a pension. The board decided that it was a pre-enlistment disability not aggravated by his service in the navy, so he did not receive any pension. This man cannot now earn a living to support his family and has to live on public charity.

With all due respect to medical opinion I find it difficult to believe—and I regard myself as a reasonable person—that a lame person could go into the navy and serve for two or three years without aggravating his infirmity but the minute he engages in a civilian occupation his condition immediately begins to get worse. This does not seem to me a reasonable stand.

I have another case of a veteran who was taken into the service with defective sight. In North Africa it got worse and he had to be discharged. He applied for a pension and was told his disability was pre-enlistment, not aggravated by his service, and he was denied a pension. It seems to me there is something wrong somewhere. Perhaps the doctors who assess these cases are not aware of the need to give the veteran the benefit of the doubt. It appears that if they can find a loophole at all they use it to give the benefit of doubt to the department. A veteran may have a nervous breakdown or some nervous disorder five, six or even ten years after discharge. Who can say that his service did not contribute to the breakdown? I believe there is a need for greater care to be taken in giving the benefit of the doubt to veterans who apply for pensions.

Mr. Brooks: In reply to the hon. member let me say this. In the case of the veteran who came into the navy with a disability, which case the hon. member cited, I take it that the medical history during the man's service indicated that his condition was not aggravated by his service. Some years after he left the service it did become aggravated. The hon. member can appreciate that these cases are very difficult. I was a member of the standing committee on veterans affairs for a number of years, and I recall that the question of benefit of doubt was considered by many committees. We attempted to introduce a section in the legislation which we thought would cover all this problem.

I have looked through many files on such cases. If hon. members could see these files and appreciate how these matters are studied and restudied they would agree, as I had to agree myself, that the benefit of the doubt was given to the veteran in 99 cases out of 100. It is a question sometimes of whose doubt it is. As far as the act is concerned it must be the doubt of the board and the experienced and competent men who serve on it.

I frankly do not see how the act could be improved very much, but we would appreciate it if the hon. member and any other hon. members in this committee would refer to us individual cases which come to their attention. If we can assist in any way we will.

Item agreed to.

Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Act—

466. Administration of Veterans' Land Act; soldier settlement and British family settlement, $5,152,331.

Mr. Forgie: Mr. Chairman, I assume that the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of Agriculture have their heads together on the question of the farm credit act we have been putting through. I would like to know what department will be responsible for the appraisers and inspectors who will be borrowed from the Veterans' Land Act administration and called upon to make evaluations, appraisals and inspections of the farms of those who borrow under the farm credit act.

Mr. Brooks: These men will be retained by the administration of the Veterans' Land Act. They will be loaned to the farm credit corporation, but as far as we are concerned they will come under us.

Mr. Forgie: Will they be loaned for a fee or will it be gratuitous?

Mr. Brooks: The Department of Agriculture will pay the fee to the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Forgie: I understand that the Canadian farm loan board has 10 provincial offices and a head office. This board is about to be disbanded. The Veterans' Land Act administration has 8 divisional offices and a head office. There is only one office in the Atlantic provinces for the V.L.A., which I understand is located at Saint John, New Brunswick. What is the policy of the department in connection with these offices? Could the V.L.A. and farm credit corporation credit offices be merged? If this were done the operation would be more economical. Is that in contemplation?

Mr. Brooks: As far as my department is concerned we are responsible only for our V.L.A. officials. I do not know what details are under contemplation in the Department of Agriculture, but I will inquire about it. The act has just been passed and the principle decided on. As far as its application is concerned, the details have not been worked out.

Mr. Forgie: Would the minister not agree that it would be an economical proposition from the point of view of administration if the offices in the various sections of the country were merged?

Mr. Brooks: I can assure the hon. member that the economics of the suggestion will be carefully considered by my department and the Department of Agriculture as well.

Mr. Herridge: For years we have been urging a reduction in the size of holdings to one half an acre. What is the objection to this? I see no common sense reason for it.

Mr. Brooks: That is a very good question but not an original one, as the hon. member knows, because it has been considered for many years. Originally the three acre small holding was granted as a rehabilitation measure to a veteran who was a pensioner or who had retired. It was felt that to supplement his pension, retirement allowance or whatever it might have a veteran might want to do some farming on a small holding. That was the original intention. That is why small holdings were introduced.

Later on it was suggested that it might be better to reduce the holdings to one half an acre. The suggestion was then made that we should make it a housing proposition. This was never adopted by any veterans affairs committee. As a matter of fact my hon. friend will remember, as I do, that the question was debated and the proposition turned down on every occasion when it came up for discussion because it was felt it did not comply with the original intention.

I have no great objection to it myself. I assure the hon. member that I will study his suggestions with my officials and if it is found practical to do so, a plan will be worked out. I would have been pleased if the hon. member had raised this question under the V.L.A. when it was before the committee a few weeks ago. That would have been an appropriate occasion on which to discuss it.

Mr. Herridge: I did, but I appreciate your telling us you will look into the matter, because it is of importance to many.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs. We shall now take up the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

261. Departmental administration, $866,273.

The Deputy Chairman: This item will be found on page 54 of the blue book, with the details on page 362. Shall item 261 carry?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity to make a report on the progress of the national development program. Up to this time there has been no coherent account of the program on Hansard, and I should like to do what I can to try to get it in perspective.

In the first place, the national development program covers several departments. Under the act that serves as a guide to the operation of my department there is a clear directive to formulate resource development and conservation plans in co-operation with other departments, provincial and municipal governments and private interests. Therefore I will take the liberty of mentioning aspects of the development plan which come under other departments as well as my own.

The departments of agriculture and trade and commerce have made a good start on the basic cornerstone of the development policy by embarking on the implementation of a national agricultural policy. Cash advances, the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act, the crop insurance legislation, the farm credit legislation, are important items in the field of statute law to start a fundamental revision of agricultural policies in Canada. Increasing sales of wheat, box car allotment, grain demurrage charges, an investigation into the spread of prices between producer and consumer and import controls on farm products are examples of the aggressive attitude of this government toward problems that have faced agriculture for some time. We recognize that without a sound agricultural industry there is no foundation on which to build a larger and more prosperous nation.

The national development program has as its ultimate aim the increased processing of our tremendous natural resources, using the increasing reserves of various forms of energy available in Canada. It was no accident that the first move of the new government when it met parliament in October, 1957 was to announce a royal commission on energy. I am proud to sit in the present parliament which passed the national energy board act and put into effect the main recommendations of the royal commission. It gives to us responsibility for planning the first ingredient for a national energy policy, namely a board that will keep a rolling inventory of our energy resources and advise the government on the best use of all our energy resources in the national interest.

The development program falls into three main divisions in so far as the first stages of the plan are concerned. These are first, delineation of resources; second, power; and third, conservation. The delineation part of the program is going well. The purpose of this part of the plan is to open up Canada for exploration and development. We must find out what we have, where it is and how much we have of each type of renewable and non-renewable resources. Good work has been done over the years on the forest inventory program, water power, fish resources and wild life, while very little is known of a great proportion of our country horizontally, and even less vertically. Obviously the first need in a development plan is to have ready access to this information. The means used to achieve this are roads, air fields, water and sea transport, railroads where economic, and the concomitant necessities of research of all kinds, radio, radar, weather stations, and so forth.

The roads to resources program has aroused a good deal of interest. The Prime Minister announced on February 12, 1958 that there would be approximately a $100 million road program in the Territories and Yukon in the next seven years. I have made it clear that economics would play a large part in setting the priorities of the proposed parts of this grid system through the potentially wealthy parts of northern Canada. For instance, the level of activity of oil and gas exploration in the northern Yukon and the lower Mackenzie valley makes it mandatory that we push forward the road from Flat Creek to a terminal on the Arctic coast or Mackenzie estuary as rapidly as engineering and efficient operation allow us to move.

On the other hand, the balance of interest along the planned route to Great Bear lake from Great Slave lake seems to be less than the interest in the mineral resources around Great Slave lake. Therefore we are now considering shifting our survey crews to the Yellowknife-Fort Reliance road. The same sort of economic criteria are applied to each road. Within the over-all framework of the government's development policy an inter-departmental committee advises me on the choice of routes and sets the priorities for construction. The engineers of public works advise me on the standards, call for tenders and supervise construction.

There is little value in having a grid system of roads in the new territories, Mr. Chairman, to open up new petroleum and mineral areas in the territories unless there are roads or railroads or waterways to tie up to the settled areas to the south. Therefore the second aspect of the roads to resources program is a series of co-operative agreements with the provinces. We have offered to pay one half the cost of roads in the provinces that will open up new resource areas. At the present time nine provinces are working on such roads. One provincial agreement has been signed with the province of British Columbia, and I hope the final polishing up of the terms will permit the working agreements to be put into written form at an early date. The federal government has agreed to pay one half the cost up to $1,500,000 per year to a total of one half of a total of $15 million for each province over a period of years that is mutually satisfactory.

Under the roads to resources program some 2,000 miles of road are planned for the Territories and Yukon, and over 4,000 miles in the provinces. I believe the people of Canada will agree with me when I say that this program is imaginative and has been carefully planned. It gives to Canadians the satisfaction that the government is actively carrying out the people's expressed wish to open up their country for exploration and development.

In addition to roads, other means of access must be improved. The committee has already heard of the plans to take over the air fields in northern Canada associated with the D.E.W. line. This will be a two or three year operation and will make it much easier for private exploration teams to move freely in our far northern regions. This operation is being carried out mainly by the Department of Transport. In addition to these air fields, other air strips are being considered, weather reporting services are being improved and navigational aids are being provided and improved.

The Department of Transport is engaged in getting know-how on large scale resupply operations in the Arctic. Last year the western portion of the D.E.W. line was supplied by the Department of Transport. This year they will resupply all D.E.W. line stations. Increased tonnages generally are being moved with greater confidence. My personal compliments go to the men of the marine division of the Department of Transport, the men who plan the operations, those who operate the icebreakers and the supply ships. In addition, one private enterprise company with tug and barges moved from Vancouver to Spence bay and back last summer. If this deed had been done five years ago it would have been called an international saga of the northern seas, but now it is becoming just a routine operation.

Another part of the department's operations that deals with delineation of resources is the winter work program of co-operation with the provinces in building forest access roads. Under this eight months a year program the federal government pays 50 per cent of the cost. Provincial officials tell me that this is one of the most appreciated programs of the government.

The total estimated cost to the federal government of the road program to open up resources during this first stage of development is about $200 million. I cannot accurately estimate at this time the cost of the other parts of the delineation program. In view of the tremendous activity already generated in oil and gas exploration and the even greater activity that I expect in the mineral field, I suggest that this part of the program will be regarded in years to come as having been responsible for one of the major surges forward in the opening up of our country. Possibly it will be comparable to the building of the C.P.R.

The second part of the development program deals with power. Any person who examines the resources of Canada soon becomes aware of the importance of power. Power is not just obtained from water resources. The best thinking now is clear that the largest amount of power at the lowest price comes from a combination of thermal power and hydro power. The thermal power to provide the base load can be produced from coal, uranium, natural gas, oil, butane or propane, depending on the presence of these energy fuels. The power from water can best be used for peaking purposes.

Therefore in planning for the best use of our energy resources we will have to assess the ability of a region to supply the necessary power. Applying that reasoning to the Atlantic provinces, the house can appreciate why I asked the premiers of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to allow me to include Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland in the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act. It explains why the federal government offered to build transmission lines in Newfoundland emanating from Bay d'Espoir. To us it seems elementary that we should encourage transmission lines in those eastern provinces in the expectation that eventually there will be a grid system covering the whole Atlantic area. In that way the coal of the Atlantic provinces can be tied in with the hydro power of the Saint John, the Passamaquoddy and the Hamilton rivers.

There are those who scoff, Mr. Chairman, at thinking ahead like this, but my answer is that not only is this the only course to follow, but when I see these older provinces by the sea trying so hard to help themselves I know that this government will not fail them by being frightened of a little ridicule by making known its long range plans.

The provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan are also showing a laudable desire to work together by joining their transmission lines. The whole Nelson-Saskatchewan-Churchill system will have to be examined to plan for the eventual full utilization of the hydro power in this area. Fortunately the prairies have large quantities of fossil fuels to integrate with their hydro. Ontario and Manitoba co-operate closely, as do Quebec and Ontario, in the interchanging of power.

Probably of most interest to the committee is present progress on the Columbia river. A year ago we were still awaiting relevant engineering reports. Last fall, after a full study of both the engineering and economic aspects of the Columbia river system, we decided to enter into a co-operative effort with the United States to use fully this great water resource on condition that the United States government agreed to a fair division of the downstream benefits. A great forward step was taken when the government of the United States agreed to negotiate with us on this basis. Once these two key decisions were taken we immediately set up a joint policy committee of the dominion government and the government of British Columbia. This liaison committee is composed of two dominion ministers, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself, two British Columbia ministers and technical staffs from both governments.

Meanwhile the international joint commission is working out the complex problem of deciding what the downstream power benefits and flood control benefits amount to and what system of division should be adopted. The international joint commission meets almost every month. A close liaison is maintained between the joint policy committee and the international joint commission.

It is my opinion that success will attend all these efforts. In the first place, both countries know that by co-operation both nations can receive more units of power at a lower price. Second, all parties know there has to be a fair deal for both countries. Because of our common democratic procedures, any decision will have to be ratified by the United States Senate, and it must be satisfied that their country benefits from the arrangement. In Canada the decision will have to be approved by the legislature of British Columbia and the parliament of Canada. We certainly will want to assure ourselves that a full share of the downstream benefits created by Canadian storage will be paid to British Columbia in the form of power.

I detect a great desire on both sides of the border to push this great project to a conclusion. When one realizes that the power at stake is several times the amount produced at the new St. Lawrence seaway dam at Cornwall, one can appreciate the tremendous importance of this deal to the northwestern United States and British Columbia.

Once again, with respect to development on the Columbia river we visualize the multiple use of resources. The strategic coal reserves of British Columbia and Alberta will fit in very nicely with these vast hydro resources to provide more and more of the base load power for the eastern end of the transmission grids. It is no accident that the new energy bill contained a clause allowing for 25-year export licences for electricity. I have every expectation that the present small boom in the coal mining industry of the Crowsnest region will spread to other parts of the coal areas.

In addition to the above developments, we are continuing studies of the Saint John river, the Fraser river, the Yukon river and the Fort Smith area, and soon I should like to organize a study of the Nelson and Churchill river systems.

Thus it can be seen that our development policy is moving steadily forward on building up the basic regional ingredients of a national power policy. This policy will include all forms of energy, and explains how urgent a national energy board is to our plans. To be able to proceed economically with regional power grids we have called in provincial power commissions, private power companies, electrical equipment companies, to join with our research agencies in a co-ordinated attack on the problem of long-range transmission of electric power.

By increasing our knowledge of raw materials and our energy resources we will be better able to reach the ultimate goal of greater processing in Canada to provide for a bigger and better Canada. The vision of a nation on the northern half of this continent moving toward its destiny is not just a dream. It is a realistic effort of many dedicated people who have been brought out of backwaters to help implement a new, positive conception of the role of government.

In this whole program there are no more dedicated people than those in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. This department is the eyes and ears of my department. It is no fault of theirs that 55 per cent of Canada remained unmapped, nor that it would have taken 250 years more to complete the necessary hydrographic surveys of our coastal waters. It gives me great pleasure to say how happy I am that this government has agreed to plan to double the hydrographic service and the geological service in the next five years. All Canadians will be proud that a Canadian scientific expedition is now operating, and will operate every year in our Arctic islands to give us basic information so desperately needed for our development program. The metallurgical division of that department has been examined and found equal to the tasks that are before them. I fully believe that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is completely aware of the part they must play in the development program. I feel that they will meet the challenge. I want to express my personal appreciation of the efforts their members have made to give my department the information we require.

The third part of the development program deals with conservation. In my personal opinion, and I hope of others, this is perhaps the most important part of the national development program. This is a concept of the multiple use of resources. This is a concept of co-operation with the provinces, with conservation boards, with private organizations and with individuals and universities. A start has been made. All the provinces met with the dominion government last November. The decision was made to hold a full scale conference in 1960 to deal with renewable resources. In the meantime the provinces have submitted reports on what they are doing and what gaps exist. We are providing the secretariat to work under a joint dominion-provincial steering committee. A great deal has to be done this summer and fall in the preparation of the basic material for the conference.

The needs of various regions differ, but I am sure that we can decide on the principles under which the various governments and agencies can operate. We must succeed in getting all groups to commit themselves to a positive program of using our resources to the best advantage for the future of the people of Canada. There are many things such as northern research, the national parks, historic sites, wildlife, in my department that play an important part in the over-all development plan. There is the atomic energy program which plays a key role in that program. I could, if I had more time, give you some idea of my plans as to how the national development program will bear upon our centennial celebrations. But I believe I have said enough to indicate that there is a coherent working out of the blueprints and that the vision is shining brighter every month.

I should like to add a few sentences on human resources. A few months ago Maclean's magazine published one of the most moving accounts of human thought and endurance that I have ever read. It was written by Farley Mowat. I recommend to every member of the house and every Canadian the readings of this story. Here, in clear and powerful prose, an attempt is made to look into the minds of people thousands of years removed from us in civilization. Read that story and you will understand why my department, and this government, is not going to overlook the tremendous assets and personal needs of these old and long-overlooked Canadian citizens. We cannot take unto ourselves the smugness that we will always be right in our dealings with these first Canadians. We know that they are human beings who have a great need and a great potential. This government, to the limit of its knowledge will not fail our Eskimo people.

Last year, for the first time in over a quarter of a century, my department appeared before the standing committee on mines, forests and waters. It appeared before that committee again this year and, as hon. members know, a very forthright report was tabled in this house a few days ago. Officials in my department who appeared before that committee were told to express themselves freely and without reservation. The members of the committee recognized this, I believe, and were very searching and forthright in their questioning. Their report makes many worthwhile observations and recommendations which deserve, and are now receiving, full consideration by my department. I can assure hon. members that I welcome the vigorous approach the standing committee took in its examination of my department. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that my officials are now taking an equally vigorous approach in their examination of the observations and recommendations.

I believe that Canadians generally support northern development, and that they understand that costs in the north must inevitably be greater than costs in the more populated southern areas. This, of course, does not excuse or justify lavishness, waste, or inefficiency, and since I have taken over the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources I have taken steps to ensure that the standards and scale of northern administration do not exceed those that are absolutely necessary, and that full advantage is taken of new techniques and new materials to achieve every possible economy, both in construction and operation. To do this, of course, involved securing the best available engineering advice. During the past two years, therefore, I have strengthened the engineering division of the department by securing a new chief of the division whose qualifications and northern experience are well known to some members of this house.

In the north one of the greatest factors in construction is the high cost of freight to the site. In order to minimize this, the bulk of our smaller buildings is now designed for prefabricated construction. This type of construction will reflect a considerable saving in freight costs, and in addition will greatly reduce erection costs. For the average size 2-bedroom house it is estimated that the initial construction will be 10 per cent lower than by normal construction methods. By using an advanced lightweight aluminum-clad prefabricated panel, maintenance and operation costs are being greatly reduced. Wherever possible buildings will be grouped to permit central heating, plumbing, and electrical services for further savings. In all—savings in construction, maintenance and fuel—there should be a reduction of at least 25 per cent, and I hope as high as 33 per cent. We are hopeful that this percentage reduction will be even greater in the more remote locations.

Due to severe climatic conditions the cost of heating our buildings is a major factor. Our new prefabricated designs specify materials with a high insulation value and an airtight seal between all panels. Further studies are being made of new materials and construction methods in order to achieve even greater economies and maximum space-to-weight ratio.

Bulk oil storage facilities are being introduced to a number of smaller settlements. In addition to reducing the cost of freight, the losses inherent in the use of fuel drums are eliminated. This alone should cut fuel costs at communities where bulk delivery is possible by at least 33 per cent. In the utilities field, the branch has arranged with Atomic Energy of Canada Limited to carry out studies of small atomic reactors capable of providing economical heat and light. The method of calling for construction tenders has been reviewed and significantly improved. At remote locations we have worked toward the objective of having the design and supply of materials one year, and construction the following year in order to take full advantage of climatic conditions.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

We are working toward the earliest possible dates for tender calls. This will afford a greater opportunity for the interested contractors to visit the sites, to submit more realistic bids, and to get on the job early in the short construction season. New tendering procedures worked out by the Department of Public Works have greatly increased the number of contractors who are interested or actively engaged in northern construction.

I can assure the committee, Mr. Chairman, that my officials are more cost conscious than they have ever been. In closing, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I am also fully conscious of my responsibilities in this regard.

Mr. Hardie: The minister dealt very lightly with the estimates which we are considering at the present time, namely those of his own Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. However, he covered a wide field, all the way from wheat in the Department of Agriculture to the Department of External Affairs. In his usual manner he spoke vaguely and in general terms of the vision. Of course Mr. Chairman, I should say that his statement is certainly in keeping with the very little he has done about implementing this vision. Of course, there are reasons for this. The Oxford dictionary says that a visionary is a person able or accustomed to seeing visions; capable of receiving impressions by means of vision; given to fanciful and impractical views; speculative; dreamy, of schemes, plans, incapable of being carried out or realized; fantastic—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Were you referring to Mr. King there?

Mr. Hardie: I am speaking of you, sir. The definition continues: impractical; characterized by fancy or imagination without corresponding reality. This definition suits the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to a "T". I am sure the people of Canada will remember the many promises made during the last election campaign with regard to opening up the north. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to spend too much time on these promises. However, I should like to outline briefly what this program meant in terms of roads and cost of those roads and to show the committee just how impractical this sort of policy is at this particular time.

Thousands of miles of road were promised. The total figure that I estimate it would cost this government to implement the roads they promised in the Northwest Territories is $200 million. The minister earlier said that the amount was $100 million. But his estimate now is as absurd as was the estimate he gave last year before the committee on mines, forests and waters of constructing a road from Flat Creek in the Yukon to some place along the Arctic. At that time he told the committee that the cost of that road—with a good surface, at least according to him—would cost in the vicinity of $5 million to $8 million. This year, before the same committee discussing his estimates, the estimate is now doubled. I told the minister a year ago and I tell him today that the $100 million he suggests would not build all the roads that he promised during the election campaign. It will come closer to $200 million.

In any event, hon. members will recall that when the minister was before the committee on mines, forests and waters a year ago he told us that he had extended the roads program of the former administration by many more miles of roads than was suggested by the former administration to the Gordon commission in 1955. He said that the only difference between his government's program and that of the former government—in addition to that extra mileage of road—was that he intented to speed up and accelerate the road building. I should like to quote from page 16 of the evidence of that committee of Thursday, June 5, 1958. This is what the minister said in this regard at that time:

> About the only thing that I did as minister was to bring these programs for 25 years down into a five-year program, that is as far as they affected the territories.

In other words he was going to speed up the former administration's program which included many miles of road and which I would say would have cost $100 million to $150 million. He is going to do this in five years.

In order to give the committee an idea of the areas those roads would serve, I will just refer to one particular proposal made by the minister, that of the road from Fort Reliance on the east arm of Great Slave lake to Eskimo Point on the west shore of Hudson bay. A road connecting these two points would be somewhere between 500 miles and 600 miles in length through rough, uninhabited and costly road building country. At the present time there are six persons living at Fort Reliance, four employed by the government and two trappers. At the other end of this road at Eskimo Point there are approximately 100 Eskimos and in the area in between a handful of people.

An hon. Member: Any igloos?

Mr. Hardie: That could be. The area between these two communities has had little if anything done in the way of geological surveys. Hence we know little of its mineral potential. In speaking of this road to the northern Saskatchewan development conference in Saskatoon in November, 1957 the Saskatchewan Star-Phoenix, in reporting the minister's speech said this. This is referring to this particular road I have just mentioned. This is apparently an argument he advanced to justify the building of this road. This is what the newspaper says:

> Though Mr. Hamilton would not name the area, he said that northwest of Eskimo Point there were fabulous from ore deposits, greater in extent than the Mesabi range that started and helped the United States to achieve its present great industrial development.

Mr. Chairman, the fabulous iron ore deposits of which the minister was apparently speaking were those at Rankin inlet where North Rankin Inlet Nickel Mines are now operating, and where, from what I know of the situation, they have been having their difficulties in extending their ore body to keep the mine producing at its present rate. The area in which that mine is operating was used by the minister, as I said before, to justify the building of this road.

Last fall, in a television program that I myself saw, a Mr. Webber, an official of North Rankin Inlet Nickel Mines appeared with the minister and a Dr. Byrd of McGill University and discussed this development program. During that television discussion Mr. Webber pointed out to the minister that a road program would not assist his company at Rankin inlet because of the fact that they are using, and will continue to use, the sea lanes which provide the cheapest means of transportation. But not too long after this program was carried by the C.B.C. the minister, speaking, in Saskatoon in September of 1958, apparently changed his tune. I should like to quote now from an article appearing in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of September 23, 1958 and headed "Mr. Hamilton's Northern Vision". A portion of this report reads as follows:

> Mr. Hamilton described the U.S. atomic submarines Nautilus and Skate, as a new breed of ship which "in our lifetime", may revolutionize intercontinental maritime transport to an extent almost comparable to the changes brought about on land and in the air by the automobile and the aeroplane. He visualized submarine cargo ships coursing the world's oceans within 10 or 20 years and said Britain—

And this is the part I want the committee to take into consideration.

> —already had submarine tankers and ore carriers on engineering drawing boards, the latter planned as carriers of Hudson bay iron.

That is the same iron ore that we are speaking of at Rankin inlet, the Hudson bay ore.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member knows that is not right.

Mr. Hardie: I am reading what the minister said.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I am sure he would not want to put on the record inaccurate statements. When I was referring to the iron of the Hudson bay area, the reserves are very large. Everyone knows that the Rankin inlet mine is a zinc and copper mine, and nickel as well.

Mr. Hardie: Low grade iron. I think if the hon. members of the committee took a look at a map of the area it would be clear to them that the building of a road such as the one I have mentioned within the next few years certainly is visionary, and any person with such an idea could be considered impractical, fantastic and utterly devoid of corresponding realities. It also points out that the reference to the igloo to igloo road program of the government, made by my leader during the last election campaign, and which was related solely to the employment aspects of road building, may not be as far-fetched as a lot of people would like us to believe, even in other respects.

Let us now consider what has been done since this government took office, and what will be done this year according to the estimates now before us. First of all let us deal with what has been done and will be done this year in the Northwest Territories. The major project is the extension of the Mackenzie highway to Yellowknife. This road was started in 1956-57 by the former administration, and when this government took office approximately 90 miles had been built. The plan of the former administration was to complete this road by 1960, and I must say that the present government plans to do this according to the estimated figure for this year. In addition to this project they have carried on with the program of providing short access roads in the Wood Buffalo park to assist not only in their own work in the park but also for the benefit of the lumber and forest products industry in the same area. A road planned by the department some years ago between Fort Fitzgerald and Bell Rock, a distance of 28 miles, will also be built this year. In the Northwest Territories we find that for the first two years this government has been in office they will complete roads which were started by the former administration but not one single mile of the minister's so-called new road program has been started.

In fairness I must say that of benefit to the Northwest Territories the federal government and provincial government are now sharing on a 50-50 basis the rebuilding of certain stretches of the Mackenzie highway within the province of Alberta, and for this I am sure the people of the Northwest Territories are very happy. In any event, the total to be spent this year in the Mackenzie district on roads will amount to $6,895,600. In addition to this I presume $1,500,000 will be the federal share of the rebuilding of the Mackenzie highway, making a total for all roads of $8,395,600.

In the Yukon last year, and planned for this year, bridges are being built on the highway between Whitehorse and Dawson city to give that area all year round transportation. The government has also carried on the plan of the former administration to improve the road from Johnsons Crossing to Ross river.

In addition to these are improvements on other minor access roads such as was done in the Northwest Territories in the Wood Buffalo park. Also included in this year's estimates is an amount to start construction of the only new road, and I am calling it a new road although it was included in the brief submitted to the Gordon economic commission by the former administration; but it is a new road in so far as this government will start its construction this year. This proposed road from Flat Creek in the Yukon, according to the answers received from the minister a year ago, in its first stages would run to Fort McPherson in the Northwest Territories, and from there eventually to the Arctic by way of Inuvik and the reindeer station.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I would like an assurance from the hon. member that he is not reading his speech.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, I am reading from very extensive notes, as did the minister, and I do not want to get off on a tangent and be called visionary. I want to be constructive today and to put up what I think is a good proposal to the minister.

During the past year since the preliminary surveys have been carried on we find the minister hedging and suggesting that the road may never get into the Fort McPherson area, at least according to the evidence he gave to the standing committee which dealt with these estimates a few weeks ago. According to the minister this road will do a great deal to open up the Peel plateau and Eagle plain areas for oil exploration and development purposes.

I would like to point out to the committee that exploration has been going on in this area since 1952 or thereabouts, and the companies operating in the area have previously built their own winter road over which they have carried the bulk of their exploration equipment by tractor train. I am quite confident that any freight required by the oil companies in this area can in the future, as in the past, be taken over a winter road and any moneys spent should be spent to improve the present winter road so that trucks can do the transporting rather than tractor trains, and to build other winter roads that may be necessary. Some of these could originate from points along the Mackenzie river into areas that are considered potential oil producing areas.

To support this point of view I should like to quote from a speech given by Mr. Franc R. Jobouin, global consultant engineer with the Rio Tinto Company, and president of Bralorne Mines Limited to the northern development conference held in Edmonton last fall. Here is what Mr. Jobouin says in this regard:

> All access and communication facilities should be improved. This calls as much for planning and co-ordination as it does for the spending of dollars. For example, why is our north, and particularly the geologically favourable areas, not laced with a network of "winter roads"? To the uninformed this simply means a 20-foot wide route, cut through the bush. Untrained labourers with axes and saws can do the job under supervision. No other improvement of the route is required, yet for the several winter months of each year that route can become an excellent highway over which tractor sled trains can haul freight as effectively as a railroad.

Of course a winter road such as Mr. Jobouin suggests would not be suitable for truck transport, but for very little money improvements could be made on such a road to allow for this type of transportation. If the area is finally found to be oil producing, and when the companies are in a position to market their oil, further improvements could be made to assist them in getting their development equipment into the area. Surely the minister does not suggest that when this time arrives the oil will be carried over this road in tank trucks rather than the modern method of pipe lines.

The total amount to be spent this coming year on roads and bridges in the Yukon will amount to $4,129,300. In addition to this there is the amount of $1,500,000 as the federal government's portion of the cost of the road from Stewart, British Columbia, to Cassiar. So, in both the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, including the federal share of the roads to resources program, a total of approximately $14 million will be spent. The greater portion of this amount will be spent to service and provide year round transportation to people in the already settled areas and in areas that are already producing and contributing to the national wealth of Canada; roads, I repeat, that with the exception of the Flat Creek to Peel plateau road, were started by the former administration.

I now return for a moment to the promises made during the 1958 election campaign. Thousands of miles of roads were promised for both the Yukon and Northwest Territories. According to the minister a large part of this program would be completed in five years. Two years will have passed and nothing particularly new will have happened.

The estimate for the Flat Creek to Peel plateau road is approximately $40,000 per mile, and some stretches of the road between Yellowknife and Hay River will run as high as $62,000 per mile. On the basis of this information I have estimated the cost of roads promised by this government at $200 million which is considerably in excess of what the minister stated. I simply give this information for the benefit of the committee. I suggest that this is a fair chunk of money and an amount that cannot be spent properly by this government without some advance planning as to where the roads should go.

The Canadian taxpayer including the taxpayer in northern Canada has the right to expect from this government that when roads are being built they will be built in areas that will assist industry to go into production for the benefit of the whole of the Canadian economy. Over a year ago I pointed out to the minister that before he went ahead spending the taxpayer's dollar on building roads, except in the already settled and producing areas, he should first find out by magnetic, electromagnetic and other scientific surveys the location of potential mineral wealth. This information should be published as soon as possible. Information of this kind should be made available to people who are interested in prospecting or in investing money in this field of resource development. This information should be given to people who, I am sure, if it can be pointed out to them that possibilities of oil and mineral deposits exist in a particular area will move into that area and do the necessary ground surveying, prospecting and drilling to determine whether or not the ore body is of commercial value.

Since I mentioned this a year ago the government have had representations from different organizations asking for an increase and an acceleration of the work done by the geological surveys branch of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. One of these representations was from the Royal Society of Canada and the Geological Association of Canada in the form of a brief submitted to cabinet urging an acceleration in this type of work. I might also quote again from the speech of Mr. Jobouin to the northern development conference in Edmonton last year in which he stated:

> The excellent northern mapping work of the surveys branch and geological survey of Canada should be further accelerated, despite the marked improvement in recent years. Their results provide the very foundation on which all other development hinges.
> I feel that airborne magnetic, electromagnetic, radiometric, and possibly the new airborne gravimetric surveying, on a reconnaissance scale, is a quite proper field for the federal and provincial governments to enter.

And again, just recently the report of the committee dealing with the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys recommended to the government an acceleration in this field. An immediate start on this type of survey could begin with areas adjacent to Mayo and Keno in the Yukon, and in the area between Yellowknife and the east arm of Great Slave lake and the area northeast of Fort Smith in the Northwest Territories. I will not attempt to point out all the areas where this type of work should be carried on but in general the whole of the Northwest Territories and Yukon should be covered and the work done should be in areas of volcanic and sedimentary structure, ignoring the granite or so-called tombstone areas that have little or no possibilities. The results of such surveys would make it possible for the government or for anyone else, for that matter, to then outline a practical plan for development.

The second step, as I suggested a year ago, is to provide flight strips in the areas where prospectors or companies who wish to invest capital for exploration indicate they wish to explore. These people will then do the ground surveys and the necessary drilling that will indicate the size and value of the ore bodies.

The third step is to provide an incentive for the development companies to open up and bring the mines into production.

These incentives, I suggest, should be by way of increased income tax exemptions during the early years of the mines development. In this regard I wish to quote from a report in the Edmonton Journal reporting on a speech made by Mr. J. M. Botsford, general manager of Gunnar Mines Limited, to the northern development conference, and I quote:

> Revised federal and provincial taxation rates, graduated according to latitude, would provide one of the greatest incentives for private enterprise to enter into this national project of developing the north and establishing northern communities," Mr. Botsford declared.

In addition to what Mr. Botsford said the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, and others, have submitted proposals to the government to extend the present three-year tax free period in the case of new mines to five years for those mines operating above the 60th parallel.

I would also suggest to encourage prospecting of potential areas that prospectors be given some assistance to cover their transportation costs. An amount of $100,000 per year set aside in the estimates for this kind of assistance would encourage a great deal more prospecting and would be of great assistance to those people who have pioneered every major mineral discovery up to the present time.

Another point I might mention here that would be of assistance would be a relaxation in the regulations of the Department of Transport to speed up procedures for licensing of radio transmission stations for all mining exploration and development jobs.

In areas where there is potential the government should set out to survey the power potential, and the requirements for new mines. Also—and this matter I brought to the attention of the department some years ago—there should be an immediate review of the mining regulations in the Northwest Territories.

It seems that the practice has been that when a difficulty arises between an individual or company and the government in regard to the regulations the government passes an order in council to cover the particular situation without passing along the same advantages to everyone in the north by amending the regulations. These suggestions if implemented, will encourage capital to come into the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, will give the government a start on its inventory of resources, and will encourage the general development of the Northwest Territories and Yukon for the ultimate good of the whole of the Canadian nation.

The people presently living in the Northwest Territories, the pioneers of that vast country, also require some encouragement, and this I suggest can be done in a number of ways. For instance, along the Mackenzie and Liard rivers and in some of the communities around Great Slave lake, a large portion of the people are still attempting to derive their living from the fur industry. I do not think that members of this committee have to be told that these people cannot live on prices they receive for fur today. I would therefore suggest, as I have done on numerous other occasions, that the government make a serious study of what can be done about putting a floor price on fur, and in particular on muskrats, beaver and white fox. I see no reason why something along this line should not be done, in view of the fact that so many products today are similarly covered under the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

I submit it is only fair that the natives and trappers of the north should be given the same treatment. I do not know whether members of the committee realize the difficulties the people in those communities have in their day to day living. For instance, in the large majority of communities, the women, in order to do their washing and cooking, and so forth, are required to carry their water from the river up steep banks for great distances. To members of the committee this may seem to be a very minor detail, but it would certainly assist the large number of people in the country if pumping stations could be erected so that water could be pumped from the source of supply, the rivers or lakes, to the centres of those communities.

In many communities the people are isolated from the rest of the world at break-up and at freeze-up periods during the year. Transportation between those settlements is by float-equipped aircraft or by boat and canoe during the summer and by ski-equipped aircraft and dog team during the winter. During those periods of freeze-up and break-up, as in any community, emergencies can happen and many have happened over the years. For instance, what happens in a community at this time of the year when a person may have a ruptured appendix, a broken leg or some other sickness or accident and the closest doctor is possibly 200 or 300 miles away? The community may not have a nurse, but if there was one available what could she do in a serious case? I suggest that to remedy this sort of situation suitable air strips for the landing of aircraft such as the Cessna 180, the Beaver or Otter type be built at communities such as Fort McPherson, Fort Good Hope, Fort Norman, Fort Franklin, South Nahanni, Fort Liard, Jean Marie river, Rocher river, Snowdrift and Coppermine. These strips, I submit, would not be costly. They would run somewhere in the neighbourhood of $30,000 to $60,000 each, depending on the availability of a suitable site; in other words, for the same amount as, if not much more—

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I do not think so, because he is speaking for the official opposition.

The Deputy Chairman: We are in committee.

Mr. Pearson: He has to get permission to continue.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hardie: —in other words, for the same amount as, if not much more than, the cost of building a mile of road. More frequent air service should also be given to places such as Fort Liard, South Nahanni, Fort Franklin, Rocher river and Snowdrift. The government could also build small floating wharves in each of these communities to assist in making it easier and safer for pontoon-equipped aircraft to dock during rough weather in the summer months. The government could also provide gas caches in communities where these services are not provided by the oil and gas dealers.

In the more settled areas such as Fort Smith, Hay River and Yellowknife, something should be done to give the industry and the people located there telephone communication with the outside world, something similar to the microwave plan that would also provide television for the area.

The government should also give serious consideration to the recommendation of the committee on mines, forests and waters suggesting amendments to the National Housing Act which would provide people living in northern Canada with a greater opportunity to enjoy the benefits of this act than is now the case.

While work on the suggestions I have outlined for surveys and other improvements is going on, the government could go forward with a roads program which would serve the present settled and producing areas of the north. In this regard I suggest that in the Northwest Territories the rebuilding of the Mackenzie highway should include hard surfacing the road from Grimshaw to Yellowknife. The proposed road connecting the Mackenzie highway with Fort Smith in the Northwest Territories should be proceeded with immediately, and any agreement with the provincial government of Alberta on this road should also include a program of hard surfacing. This road will serve not only the mixed farming area around Fort Vermilion, Alberta, but will also open up new forest areas and help considerably the sawmills and forest products industry operating in the Wood Buffalo park.

Construction should be undertaken of a winter road from the Mackenzie highway to the Fort Simpson area where a number of oil companies are operating at the present time and have been for the past five years engaged in extensive exploration programs. In other words, do for them what is being done for the companies operating in the Peel plateau and Eagle plain areas. Do something about the crossing of the Mackenzie highway at Hay River. Continue the road program as needed in the Wood Buffalo park and in the other communities in the territories. Bridge the Mackenzie river to make the road into Yellowknife an all year round proposition.

In the Yukon I suggest first that we should rebuild and hard-surface the road from Whitehorse to Keno; continue the program of co-operation with the province of British Columbia on the Stewart-Cassiar road; continue the present improvement to secondary roads such as the one from Johnsons Crossing to Ross river; make the road from Flat creek to Peel plateau and Eagle plain a winter road suitable for trucks, which would cut to present costs of $40,000 per mile to something around $20,000 per mile, and at the same time provide an adequate road for the people there who want to use it.

I might add that hard surfacing of the roads into Yellowknife, Fort Smith and Keno will give not only a better service to those areas but will result, I am sure, in reductions in truck freight rates, and a very considerable increase in the tourist industry. The high cost of living for people in these areas, and the high production costs of the various industries, will necessarily be reduced.

Mr. Chairman, after outlining the things that should be done, it would be natural to expect that members of this committee would ask, how is this proposal to be financed and that information I intend to give the committee now. The program I have outlined could be based on a six-year period. The program could be started next year and completed before March 31, 1966. First of all, I will give the estimated costs for the roads program in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. The amounts estimated for the Northwest Territories are as follows. I wonder whether it would be possible for this statement to be put in Hansard in tabular form so that it would be easier for persons to read? I have a table here which I could place in Hansard if the committee will permit it.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member the consent of the committee to place this in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert: What is the source?

Mr. Hardie: The member for Mackenzie River.

[Mr. Hardie.]

The table is as follows:

Estimated costs to cover proposals—major road program in Northwest Territories.

1. Rebuilding sections of and hardsurfacing Mackenzie highway through to Yellowknife, including federal government's share of portion in Alberta, $20,000,000.

2. Federal contribution to construction and hardsurfacing of road from Mackenzie highway to Fort Smith, $7,000,000.

That is half of the total cost. The provincial government would pay the other half.

3. Winter road to Fort Simpson area, $3,000,000.

4. Bridge over the Mackenzie river, $6,000,000.

Yukon.

1. Rebuild sections and hardsurface road from Whitehorse to Keno, $21,000,000.

2. Winter road from Flat Creek to Peel plateau, $5,000,000.

3. Federal share of Stewart to Cassiar road, $6,000,000.

That is a total for major roads in both territories of $68 million. Then I come to the other projects I have suggested.

1. Estimated cost of other community and park roads, $2,600,000.

2. Wharves and pumps, $100,000.

3. Air strips, $500,000.

4. Bridge or spillway over Hay river, $300,000.

5. Aid to prospectors for transportation, $600,000.

6. Floor price on fur, $900,000.

7. Microwave and telephone communication, $5,000,000.

8. Department of Mines and Technical Surveys for geological mapping, magnatometer tests, etc. $6,000,000.

Total over-all costs, $84,000,000.

That is the cash part of my proposal. That is what it would cost the national treasury in six years. The other proposals, such as amendments to the National Housing Act, mining regulations and radio regulations, cost nothing. Nothing is taken from the national treasury by extending the present three-year tax free period for new mines to five years. If the mines are not opened, the treasury gets nothing. The gas caches as proposed would be handled on the same basis as an oil dealer would handle them, costing nothing to the national treasury.

To sum up, over a period of six years a total of $84 million would be spent, or $14 million per year. This amount of $14 million is equal, if members of the committee will recall, to the total to be spent on roads in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon this year. The figure I have given of $14 million a year will not increase the estimates for this branch one nickel to carry out the suggestions I have made, and with no increase in the annual expenditures of the department we can help the people living in the country at the present time to enjoy some of the amenities enjoyed by people in the rest of Canada which I am sure they justly deserve. Complete a six-year program of surveying and mapping and that should give the department some idea of where future roads should go. I propose that $6 million be spent on this over and above what the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is now spending.

This program, as I said before, will accelerate the inventory of our resources. It will encourage investment capital to come into the area. It will help prospectors and bring the roads that are built in this period up to a standard that will encourage freight rate reductions and further encourage investment in the area. It will help to give a real boost to the tourist industry, which I know is close to the minister's heart.

And do not forget this. It will leave the government with $116 million of the $200 million it would have required to fulfil its election promises for the rebuilding of roads and air strips as they are needed. I ask members of the house if this is not a sound policy. Would not the government be better off to announce a policy such as this and admit the mistakes they made in their promises of 1958 rather than try to cover up these phony visions by putting up smokescreens such as the minister has in the past few months by his attempts to take the eyes of the Canadian people away from that great area of our northern mainland, that area where the vision was born, lying between the northern boundaries of the four western provinces and the Arctic?

Why, I ask, put up smokescreens to direct the attention of the people of Canada to the Arctic islands and to a so-called oil boom which, in fact, is just a real estate play where a large number of the individuals and companies have been given millions of acres in the Arctic islands without putting up a plugged nickel? Nor have any large number of these individuals and companies shown the government that they have the financial wherewithal to do any amount of exploration work as required by the regulations. Why the excitement in this area when we cannot get rid of the oil we are producing in Alberta at the present time?

The minister's stories of submarines carrying oil and iron ore that we have not explored as yet under the polar ice cap are visions that may be accomplished some time in the distant future. If he wants to get excited about something let him get excited about doing something now. Do something in the immediate future rather than getting steamed up over what may happen 40 or 50 years from now. While I am on the subject of visions and the Arctic islands, I should like to make a suggestion to the minister. He should not let these visions run away with him or he may find that his next vision will put him right in the middle of Siberia. I would not want to wish him anything like that but if he goes any farther north with the vision that is where he will be. The $50 million skyscraper city at Frobisher bay, where the minister says the people will be employed refuelling aircraft and the Eskimos will be busy selling their carvings to European and American tourists while the planes are being refuelled, comes far short of being a practical idea. That is particularly so when we consider that long-range jet aircraft are now being flown non-stop from London to New York and in a very short space of time we can expect they will be flying non-stop from London and Amsterdam to Edmonton and Winnipeg. I submit that by the time this townsite is built this could happen and the $50 million spent might just as well have been thrown into the middle of Great Slave lake. I am confident that the $50 million could be spent on other practical northern projects or to help the economy of the Atlantic provinces or other parts of Canada.

The government continues to deal with the roads program by now focusing attention on the Arctic islands and deals with the promise made not only in the election but also in the speech from the throne a year ago concerning the building of the railroad to Pine Point by setting up a commission. If the minister really wants to settle this problem of a railroad to the satisfaction of everyone concerned I would suggest to him that the government start immediately to build the railway from Grimshaw to Fort Vermilion and then to Fort Smith, which would tap the agricultural lands between Grimshaw and Vermilion and open up a large area for lumber and forest products. Then, if and when the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company want to open up their mine at Pine Point, extend the railway to Pine Point either from Fort Smith or from Fort Vermilion. The railway would serve the immediate needs of the agricultural and forest industries and would cost approximately the same amount as a railway from Waterways or Grimshaw to Pine Point.

The cost of the additional rail, if and when the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company want to open their mine, would be between $12 million and $16 million, based on the figures given by the minister at various times on the cost per mile of rail in that part of the country. It is reasonable to believe that if we delay the building of this railroad the cost will be a great deal higher than the estimated cost today. My point, therefore, Mr. Chairman, is that if the railroad were started immediately, rather than 10, 15 or 20 years from now, the extra mileage costs suggested in the route I have now proposed would be saved.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have taken considerable time of this committee in putting forward a development plan which I think is practical. I hope the minister will give serious consideration to these suggestions. I do not intend to take any more time at this stage, but will make further comments when we proceed to discussion of the various items before the committee.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, we have a phrase to the effect that without vision the people perish. Now, we have a double vision and I am sure it is going to be a "Hardie" one and that both aspects of the duplicity are going to be around for a long time. I must compliment the hon. member upon preparing such a serious and weighty speech. I have been wondering where he has been lately, since he has been missing from our meetings of the mines, forests and waters committee. Now I know he was getting ready for this great effort. I must say that the tone of the address was most surprising and very pleasing.

The hon. member concentrated on northern administration. I must confess that when the report of our committee came into the house I was bitterly disappointed at the way it was picked up and carried across the country. I believe most of the people in the committee, certainly most of the people from British Columbia and Ontario anyway, thought that by far the most important recommendation of that committee had to do with forestry and the forestry branch, and that there was a disproportionate amount of attention given to the other aspects of the committee report. I certainly hope that the minister, at least, will recognize that this was the order of importance in the minds of the committee, and will take his closest and hardest look at those recommendations dealing with forestry and not with northern administration.

I did not have any opportunity to take part in preparing that section of the report, but I would not deny that as a member of the committee I went along with the rest of them in unanimously adopting the report.

Mr. Hardie: No.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member did not vote for the report, and that is fine, but I would have gone along with it, I believe. I am much perturbed about the effect one particular section of this report may have. I think it may leave members of parliament open to criticism for perhaps shooting before they can see their target. I have reference to the fact that a subcommittee was supposed to make a visit into the north in order to see the installations, since we had no outside witnesses, that is outside the government administration on this particular phase, in contrast to the large number of witnesses we had on other aspects of departmental activities. I think we would have been in a much more solid position if we had actually seen the area.

Now, this question of a subcommittee of the House of Commons going to visit regions that are important to a department is something to which we have to give immediate, serious consideration. It is all very well for us to sit down in a smoky room and examine or cross-examine people from the department. However, I believe unless we can get out onto the ground and see many of the problems, the institutions, the type of construction that is being done, the type of people who are involved in it, we are really not in a prime position to make any lucid or intelligent comments or recommendations. I hope, for that reason, the minister will give urgent consideration to seeing that a subcommittee of this committee is given the power, under the Inquiries Act, to visit the area this fall before the weather closes in, and have a look at those installations which the committee did, to a degree, criticize, and have a look at this administration that, to a degree, the committee has criticized.

I could welcome some kind of investigation or committee excursion to the various forest experiment places, and visits to competitive areas such as the lake states and the southern states. However, in that particular field at least some of the members of the committee have had experience and they do have intimate knowledge of the problems of the pulp and paper industry and the lumbering industry. In so far as the north is concerned, with the exception of the two hon. members of parliament who come from there we are—I was going to say an ignorant lot—an uninformed group relatively at the present time. I believe this is one of the best things the minister could do or that the government could do, and one of the best things I think that could happen for northern administration, would be to have a small subcommittee given the opportunity to go as soon as possible to these places and have an opportunity of examining witnesses, looking into things closely. I certainly hope the minister will express himself in this particular regard.

In so far as the vision is concerned, I think the vision helped to win an election. I do not know, but I believe it is going to lose the next election that is coming up in a few years. It has always been my feeling that this vision was oversold. I can give you an example of the reaction of the part of the country I represent, and the reason I say I think it was oversold. I am reading from an editorial in our local newspaper at Port Arthur, the News-Chronicle, which includes a quotation from a gentleman who is the manager of the northwestern Ontario development association, and who has been called the William Jennings Bryan of the north. When you hear this quotation, I think you will see why. He says:

> Parliament, awake! Open up central Canada with a railway and highway to connect your new fresh water seacoast of lake Superior and the salty bays of Hudson and James, tapping natural wealth for nearly 1,000 miles between them.
> Build access roads into areas of favourable geological formations, conifer forests and power sites.
>
> Extend the network of roadlinks to lakes, rivers and granite hills of spectacular scenic value to attract an ever increasing flow of vacationing travellers from south of the border into our unique hinterland.
>
> Encourage and assist a new wave of settlement and venture capital to populate and develop the glittering potential of the region.
> Under such a dynamic policy, this central section of the nation—populated and productive—will stand a generation hence a magnificent monument to the far-reaching vision of its chosen leaders and a reservoir of economic strength and security in the hazardous era stretching into the foreseeable future of the world.

This gentleman is talking about that vast region lying north of lake Superior, running 600 to 800 miles north to Hudson bay, and the fact it is not developed yet, is largely untapped. It has one advantage over the area about which the minister's department is excited and interested, it has fairly substantial coniferous forests. When you examine the reasons why our government should take an interest in the north, I think primarily one comes down to the question of defence and national sovereignty as interrelated things, and the sheer fact we are in competition with the Russians. I do not believe that the competition and defence end should blind us to the fact that our Arctic is different from the Russians' Arctic.

The next thing in which we need to be interested, I think, is looking after our native people. The third thing in which we are interested in so far as the north is concerned is the possibility of some economic return from the region. The only economic return one can see from the north is in the mineral resources. The great problem there, and the minister in effect admitted it before the committee hearings, is the cost factor.

In the north costs are very high, especially in connection with any kind of mineral and in the oil and gas field. In fact, the oil and gas field in the Arctic, as the hon. member for Mackenzie River pointed out, is highly speculative. It really does not apply in great substance. When you consider that we have in the southern part of Canada forest resources that are still unused and all sorts of mineral deposits that are unused to get overly excited and to project a vision, as this particular government did in order to win an election or associated with winning an election, you are carrying out in effect a bit of tomfoolery.

Look after the native people as well, make sure that our defence and our sovereignty are established. But to give the impression that the thing for the young men of Canada to do today is to go north and that going north means away north, I think you are doing a disservice to the country. The majority of people who I have encountered who have come back from the north say that with the exception of the odd mounted policeman and the odd Hudson Bay man these people who live up there look upon themselves as temporary visitors. I think the turnover in the various northern departments that have anything to do with the north indicate that this is so.

I know the minister, with his vision to the future and to planning, may insist that I am being pessimistic and destructive. That is fair enough. But I just feel that in this whole area the minister and his department may have become completely out of focus as to what should be a more prime responsibility. I think of that prime responsibility as being reflected in this report of the mines, forests and waters committee. I refer to the report on forestry. I certainly hope that there will not become a disbalance in his department of northern affairs through forgetting that there are immense responsibilities open to the forestry side. I think one of the steps the minister should take as soon as possible is to appoint an associate deputy minister for the forestry operations.

The forestry recommendations were supported by a fair volume of evidence. I just wanted to deal with one of the points or one of the recommendations suggesting that we need a forest taxation study. That is something I believe we have needed for a long time. With all due respect to the very resourceful and capable industrial people who appeared before the committee, my sympathies with them in their position or in their appeals for tax relief are not going to be consolidated until we have such a study because I do not know whether we can really believe them. I do not mean that they are lying but I think that they may be taking a sort of over gloomy position in the face of a competition to which they are not accustomed. I would not make this as a charge but I think this may be possible and it points up all the more reason why we should have this taxation study and in my opinion have it in a hurry. I certainly hope that the minister will see that it goes beyond something which is in his department and that is it is a responsibility of the Minister of Finance.

One of the aspects of the department upon which I should like to touch is a rather delicate one. It is a question of the national museum and the fact that an appointee of the previous administration or a man who was appointed by the previous administration has left at the minister's request. I think it is fair to say that that man, whatever his actions in the department, whatever may have been his competence and his duties, is now as a result of the minister's action under a great cloud in so far as his ability and his whole attitude toward work and administration are concerned. In other words I am suggesting to the minister he has in effect ruined the career of a man who ostensibly or apparently had achieved something in the scientific field. When one reads all the correspondence and all the answers to questions that have been given by the department in relation to this whole problem and they would fill pages of the order paper, and when one reads the statement of Mr. Rousseau involved in this matter it quickly becomes apparent that there are a number of sides to this question. I would not want to come in here and lay down the line and say that Dr. Rousseau has been completely vicitimized by anyone. However, the thing that bothers me —and I will say it to the minister—is that there seems to be something very tawdry in the whole set-up of the way this man was appointed.

I do not like the background and the information that is revealed with regard to the part played by one of the former officials, namely Mr. Lamontagne. I do not like the part that seems to have been played by Mr. Lesage, the former minister in getting this man into the department, getting him a job and leading him to believe that he had certain responsibilities and a certain future. Then we get this quick about-face; a remarkable about-face for a civil servant. I think the minister will agree that within a remarkably short period of time here was a man who was wooed into a job and then he was in trouble very quickly and within a relatively short time he got the boot.

It is a confused situation and I am certainly not ever going to be in a position to get to the roots of it, nor do I think are any other hon. members. I should just like to suggest to the minister that if his actions in this particular affair were based on complete justice or an attitude or wish to have complete justice for this particular man, the events could have gone along in a different path. As the situation is now, I understand the gentleman is going to have great difficulty in getting any kind of employment. To my way of thinking, if he is to be condemned, the departmental administration before the present minister's time is to be condemned. I almost have the hunch that somehow the minister in order to protect some of his civil servants, has been masking over what I think are mistakes made by the previous minister and the previous administration in this particular field.

I do not know where one can go along this particular line but I certainly think that the recommendations of the committee, in so far as the national museum is concerned should be taken up. I think it is a very sad situation when, whatever the capacities a man may have had, he is encouraged or asked to resign and it appears that one of the main factors in the resignation is that we have in the department some foreign nationals who disagreed with him. This may not be the whole story. Those foreign nationals may not have much responsibility for the matter. But the fact remains that they are foreign nationals or a couple of them were. To me this is a sad situation. That is one of the reasons why I should like to see the minister do something about the recommendation so that we can get to the stage where we have Canadian anthropologists and experts whom we can have running our museum instead of having this dependence on Americans.

The only reiteration I should like to make in my remarks, Mr. Chairman, is this. I should like the minister to consider seriously this question of a committee visit to the north. I should like him to express his opinion on the recommendations the committee made in connection with the northern mines administration. If the committee does not get an opportunity of visiting the north this session, I certainly hope he will do what he can to see that it gets that opportunity in the next session. In the next year I think we shall all be greatly interested in seeing what comes of what the minister has referred to as a frank report.

If the minister does follow up the recommendations, especially of the forests department, I think he will find an even more enthusiastic committee than he has had this year. I have been a member of five committees in this house and this committee has been the best of all of them in the sense of attendance and interest of the members, and their willingness to work on their own to bone up on things, I think has been exemplary. I would hope that the minister would give this kind of good, solid committee, with a chairman who to me has had a very open mind with a fair lack of the more serious kind of partisanship, a real boost for its future by carrying out as many as possible of its recommendations in the coming months.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, at this point I would like to take a few minutes of the committee's time to speak about the Canadian government travel bureau and tourist spending. I prefer to make my remarks at this stage rather than on the individual items because the remarks I will make are of general interest and refer to the responsibilities of the department generally concerning the tourist industry.

The minute we start talking about tourism, I realize that the Minister of Finance clutches at his purse strings and starts worrying about our request for loans to tourist operators. I am sorry that such an idea has got across to the Minister of Finance because there are many more problems in the tourist industry than tourist loans. That may be a means to an end, but I want to refer to the larger field. I think the tourist industry can bring this country out of the red financially if properly handled and can give us a big boost in our foreign dollar receipts. We can make the Minister of Finance happy, I believe, rather than sad if we carry out some of the ideas concerning tourism which have been put forward by the mines, forests and waters committee when they dealt with this particular subject. We can bring in firstly hundreds of millions of dollars, foreign money, which is new or found money, in addition to circulating more quickly Canadian funds by people travelling within Canada. So I want to talk about money matters in connection with the tourist industry rather than dealing in detail with what has been discussed before.

The tourist industry is the third largest producer of foreign dollars in Canada. At the top of the list is newsprint, and for 1957, which was the latest poll, the figure for a comparative basis for newsprint was $715 million, which was foreign money. The second was wheat, which brought in $380 million, and the third was travel, which produced $363 million. Below those three items came pulp, lumber, aluminum, iron ore, petroleum and uranium. Each of those latter mentioned articles bring in less foreign dollars than does the tourist industry. One source of concern is that our travel income declined in 1958 to $352 million, which is down $11 million, or approximately 3 per cent.

In this connection I would like to make some comparisons. I know that comparisons are odious in a lot of cases, but I think we must consider this matter in the light of financial return. I would like to compare for a moment the subject of wheat, which brings in approximately the same number of foreign dollars, a little more, than travel. I would like to ask the committee how many millions of dollars we lay out on wheat each year. For prairie farm assistance, $500,000; under the farmers' rehabilitation act, $5 million. Then there is the new crop insurance, farm loans, a large portion of the expenditures of the Department of Agriculture amounting to $106 million, and a large chunk of the expenditures of the Department of Trade and Commerce at $64 million. I am not going to total those figures up because the figure would rather astound us, but the return is about the same as for the tourist industry. And we spend for the tourist industry just a little more than $2 million to bring back an almost equivalent return as wheat.

I do not want to dwell on wheat because it is only one of a number, but I am appalled at the large number of non-productive spending items which we find in our estimates; money for which we have no return, money which is merely spread around, received from one source and put to another. The tourist industry is a producer of money. The government is not in business to make money. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, I submit that we are not in business to lose money any faster than necessary, either.

I see that it is nearly five o'clock and I want to go on to another portion of my address at this point. However, I just want to remind the committee that tourist spending has declined and also tourist income has declined, and I think it is most essential that we bear the comparisons I have just made in mind when we consider estimates in the future. May I call it five o'clock.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. S-28, to incorporate Standard Trust Company.—Mr. Thompson.

DESJARDINS MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. S-29, to incorporate Desjardins Mutual Life Assurance Company—Mr. Dorion—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could put a question to the sponsor of this bill and ask him if he could explain to the committee what jurisdiction he thinks this parliament has in the field of insurance?

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to answer the hon. gentleman's question. I know that this question of insurance has been discussed for a long time and there have been some judgments by the privy council the last of which I believe was in 1932 and was to the effect that it is within the jurisdiction of the provinces to occupy the field of insurance, but after that the federal law was changed. If you look at the statutes you can see that there is no obligation for an insurance company to be constituted in virtue of the federal law.

I do not know about the other provinces but in Alberta it is absolutely necessary for an insurance company to have a federal licence to carry on business in that province. That is the only purpose of this bill.

No doubt the hon. gentleman is familiar with that patriotic movement Caisse Populaire Desjardins which has many clients and customers in Alberta. They cannot operate with their provincial company because that province requires a federal licence. That is the only purpose of this bill. I do not believe we can deprive that important organization of the right to carry on business in Alberta or in the other provinces.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the hon. member quite satisfied that parliament in enacting this measure—if indeed parliament does enact it as I suppose it will—is not in any way infringing upon provincial autonomy?

Mr. Dorion: I would not like to argue that point. If the hon. member refers to the last judgment of the privy council, which was the case of the Citizens' Insurance Company, I believe he will find that the wording leaves the question open. The sense of that judgment is only that the federal authorities cannot oblige any provincial insurance company to operate without a federal licence. I believe that is the general meaning of that judgment, but I would not like to assure the hon. member that the privy council by that judgment has completely shut the door to federal jurisdiction.

Mr. Pickersgill: But the hon. gentleman is satisfied, then, that we are not doing anything that is in any way an attack upon provincial autonomy?

Mr. Dorion: I am satisfied that from a practical point of view it is absolutely necessary to have a federal statute.

Mr. Peters: As this will be a federal corporation if the legislation passes, is the hon. member in a position to inform us whether the company will be willing to submit its annual reports to the federal authorities?

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member examines clause 12 he will see that the company is subject to the provisions of the British and Canadian Insurance Companies Acts and consequently will comply with the obligations imposed on the company under clause 12.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 12, inclusive, agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO ABOLISH IMPOSITION OF CORPORAL PUNISHMENT

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. McGee for the second reading of Bill No. C-19, to amend the Criminal Code (corporal punishment).

(Translation):

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity of making a few remarks about the act to amend the Criminal Code (corporal punishment).

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read into the record of the house one of the explanatory notes which reads as follows:

> The Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on capital punishment, corporal punishment and lotteries, which reported in June and July 1956, recommended, inter alia, that corporal punishment be abolished for any of the offences for which it is presently described in the Criminal Code.

Mr. Speaker, we have to realize that this bill proposes to amend only sections 136, 138, 141, 142, 148, 218, 289, 292, 586 and 641 of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Speaker, I would like all the hon. members to understand that when we discuss a matter such as corporal punishment, the government must have the co-operation of everyone, in the circumstances.

(Text):

In discussing this legislation before the house this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say first of all that very generally I tend to think of corporal punishment under three different headings. We see, first of all, where a person could be sentenced for various crimes under the Criminal Code and the sentence could include corporal punishment. This should be distinguished from the corporal punishment that can be administered under the Penitentiary Act, for example. Also, in a more general way, we can consider that aspect of corporal punishment which can be administered, for example, to a young offender without actually sending him to prison.

The first thing that I should like to touch upon at the present time is something that has been notably impressed upon me. I have read the House of Commons and Senate committee report which was brought out in 1956, and many comparisons have been made by statistics with conditions in the United Kingdom. We all know that in 1948 the United Kingdom abolished corporal punishment, but I feel it is perhaps false for us to make statistical comparisons in the field of penology, notably with the United Kingdom experience in corporal punishment. I regret to say it, but the United Kingdom has been able to make many sweeping reforms such as this one with regard to corporal punishment which we have not been able to make. Again, I regret to say that after 22 years of Liberal rule we were away behind in the field of prison reform.

It was stated in this house not so long ago—

Mr. Winch: We have had two years of Conservative rule.

Mr. Grafftey: It was stated in this house by many members not so long ago that when the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) took over his portfolio he found, both as regards the physical plant of our prisons and as regards many specific reforms, that we were lagging far behind as a nation.

While I seem to be straying very far into the general field of criminology and penology, I feel that corporal punishment must be discussed with this general background knowledge. Many people have mentioned to me —and I am sure to many other hon. members of this House of Commons—that the discussion of capital punishment, corporal punishment and prison reform in general is a time-worn and time-beaten subject; but still, that does not mean that much has been done; that also does not mean that much more does not remain to be done before we as Canadians can be at all satisfied with the state of criminal reform in general.

In discussing such subjects as corporal and capital punishment, I think too many of us tend to be on extreme sides of the subject. A lot of people feel that the public looks upon corporal punishment as retribution. I have a little more faith in human nature than that. I do not think that any hon. member of this House of Commons, or any citizen of Canada wants to see a man whipped. I know I do not and I am absolutely sure that everybody in this House of Commons shares the same opinion.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I believe in the collective theory of guilt. Whenever I see a man sentenced, no matter for what crime, I always feel that although man is a little lower than the angels but yet a little higher than the rest of the animal kingdom, we must realize that there is such a thing as individual responsibility in this day and age. At the same time, when I see a man sentenced to prison I do believe in the collective theory of guilt. While he is individually responsible I believe, ofttimes, general social and economic conditions brought about the state of affairs which have sent him along the road to crime. I know in my own case, in the little prison work that I have had the opportunity to do, I have often looked at some of the young men I have worked with and said to myself, "There but for the grace of God go I".

At the same time, I turn back to the point that I do not think we should over-emphasize the fact that the public at large, even though these things are given a lot of publicity and so forth, are at any time taking a retributive look at this problem.

In discussing corporal punishment at this time, I ask myself one basic question. Does corporal punishment act as a deterrent to other individuals in society? Does it help to cure the prisoner himself? In other words, does it help to abolish recidivism? In the light of these questions which I ask myself and in the light of the House of Commons and the Senate committee report which was brought down in 1956, I do feel that I should like very sincerely to support the legislation which has been brought before us today.

I should point out that in 1931 corporal punishment was meted out in only 12.1 per cent of the cases in which it might have been used under the Criminal Code. In 1954 it was used in only .6 per cent of the cases. If those in authority feel that this legislation should not be passed at the present time, I would like to emphasize right here and now that corporal punishment should be used only after a thorough background investigation of the man charged has been undertaken. I should like to point out, as the committee said, that if it is to be used at all, either under or outside of the terms of the Criminal Code, it should be applied early in the sentence. At the same time I think it should be made quite clear to the public that it is used only on very rare occasions under the present set-up. I think a lot of us have known of the picture of a man being struck down by a cat-o-nine-tails until he is knocked unconscious, and all that sort of thing.

Such is not the case. Today a medical examination is involved. The punishment is administered with a proper strap or certainly should be and it is done in the presence of a doctor.

Realizing that at the present time we are only discussing corporal punishment as it relates to the Criminal Code, I am very happy to support the legislation now before us. At the same time I should like to say that under the Penitentiary Act and similar legislation for provincial prisons there is undoubtedly a good argument for retaining corporal punishment for misbehaviour in the case of those confined to a prison, but it should be realized that is not what we are discussing this afternoon.

After many chats with various individuals, and I know that my remarks are not entirely in agreement with the report of the Senate and House of Commons committee in 1956, I think there is a good argument to be put forward today, because even since 1956 we have seen a tremendous increase in juvenile delinquency from one end of the country to the other. I am not too sure, for example, that it would not be helpful if magistrates were to hand out as a punishment a good birching in the case of many young people who do not seem to want to conform to normal social behavior. But at the same time, going back to the specific terms of the legislation before us, realizing that in later years much progress has been made in psychiatric development, realizing that the public also realizes that while a man is individually responsible we are not proving anything unless we cure him while he is in prison, I believe, having that point of view before me, that this legislation should be supported.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I also am glad to add my voice to those who support this legislation. I fully realize that it was originally introduced in the house by a neighbour of mine, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), and I should like to quote from Hansard for June 6, 1958, page 935, when he made his opening statement on the bill. At that time he called attention to the fact that article 5 of the universal declaration of human rights adopted by the United Nations and supported by Canada reads as follows:

> No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

The hon. member went on to say:

> In view of this provision in the universal declaration of human rights of the United Nations which has been accepted by Canada it is difficult to understand how Canadians could give formal approval to that provision and yet retain corporal punishment under our criminal law.

He pointed out that in the western world the only countries he knew of which retained corporal punishment as part of their criminal law were South Africa and Canada. For further information I went, as other members have done, to the proceeding of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons which sat during 1954 and 1955. The total amount of evidence is over 1,600 pages, and although the evidence deals not only with corporal punishment but also with capital punishment and lotteries, by far the greater amount of the evidence had to do with capital and corporal punishment. I should like to read a few excerpts from some of the evidence given to the committee. I was interested in the submission of the United Church of Canada presented by the Rev. J. R. Mutchmor, secretary of the board of evangelism and social service. It is found on page 531 of the evidence taken in 1954. He said:

> We believe it is both the right and duty of the United Church of Canada as a branch of the Christian church to co-operate with the state in a common effort to determine the best methods to deal with crime including those redemptive processes essential to the restoration of the criminal. We believe also in stressing the need for and value of preventive work and the importance of all character building methods and programs as the best way to reduce crime. We believe, in short, that only the good way of life can effectively overcome the evil ways. We would accentuate not the prohibitive and penalizing methods, some of which are necessary, but the positive and character building ones.

As found on page 533 he went on to say:

> We regret that at the present level of progress in correctional work the use of corporal punishment as a last resort may be a necessity. We believe that the state should look forward to its abolition. If the state cannot see its way to do this at the present juncture in correctional work, it should continue its inquiries and research, making a project of the task of the gradual elimination of this form of punishment which is most degrading to human dignity, both for those who inflict it and those upon whom it is inflicted.

Warden Christie, warden of the Oakalla prison, British Columbia, who is an outstanding penologist and formerly a social worker, and who has made a tremendous contribution to penology in British Columbia, was a witness before the committee, and I believe that because of his background what he had to say should be of interest to the house. As found on page 573 he said with respect to corporal punishment:

> There are better and less dangerous means of control, but it would be a mistake to take corporal punishment as a means of control away from an institution if it had no other means of control at its disposal.

In this case he was talking of corporal punishment as a means of control of inmates in an institution and he agreed that this was necessary in certain instances, as the previous speaker has also indicated. He did say, however, that institutions which have rooms provided for complete segregation or disassociation such as are used in a mental institution have no need of corporal punishment. He pointed out that corporal punishment in penitentiaries and other corrective institutions was diminishing. However, with regard to corporal punishment as a form of punishment inflicted under the Criminal Code he was very forthright in his condemnation. He said as found on page 570:

> I believe further that it will soon be impossible for a people who have our present scientific knowledge at their disposal to retain either corporal or capital punishment as methods of control. It will, however, in my estimation, take some time for our present knowledge to extend to the point where we realize how illogical, unnecessary and socially damaging it is to continue their use.

The point that Warden Christie made was that corporal punishment was ineffective, that it actually prevented the redemption of the criminal. It embittered him against society and made the corrective work of the institution that much harder to accomplish. I was interested also in a statement made by Mr. Kirkpatrick of the John Howard society of Ontario. This is found on page 596, where he pointed out that the severity of punishment as a deterrent is a fallacy. He went back into the history of Anglo-Saxon society to show that the very severe punishment given for relatively trivial offences had no result whatever in the reduction of crime. He said:

> It is commonly said that punishment has three principle purposes—retribution, deterrence and reformation. Of these it is generally conceded that retribution should no longer assume a place in modern penology. But any system of penology must maintain, as its fundamental basis, the protection of society.

He pointed out in regard to the published statistics, in the same way as the previous speaker pointed out, that judges are very loath to add whipping to imprisonment sentences. He was speaking of the period 1949-1950-1951, when the total number of convictions for robbery in Canada was between 700 and 900 and the number of whippings ordered by the courts amounted to something less than one per cent of those cases. He said that the common objective of all concerned in this whole process should be the protection of society by the rehabilitation of the offender. He went on to state that whippings did not help in this regard but actually hindered this rehabilitation work.

Finally, I should like to point out the evidence as given by Major General R. B. Gibson before this committee in 1955. The evidence will be found on page 292. Major General Gibson was commissioner of penitentiaries, and he had this to say:

> The infliction of corporal punishment is a most distasteful task for all who are responsible for it, both those who have the responsibility of deciding whether it should be authorized, and those who have the duty of carrying it out. Happily, in recent years its award by the courts and its use as a disciplinary measure in the penitentiaries has been decreasing.

Continuing his statement, he said:

> My own view, and I am expressing only my personal feelings in the matter, is that corporal punishment should not be awarded as part of the sentence of the court. The court has the opportunity of awarding a sentence of more or less imprisonment when a person has been convicted, and in my view the fear of imprisonment for a lengthy period is a sufficient deterrent for those who contemplate the commission of a crime without adding to it the fear of corporal punishment—I do not consider that an award of corporal punishment as part of the sentence is a really effective method of preventing the commission of criminal offences because when such an award is made as part of the sentence a considerable period of time must elapse before the penalty can be inflicted. There must be time for an appeal, and whether there is an appeal or not, the time allowed for such appeal must elapse before the punishment can be inflicted. There is therefore a considerable period before the penalty is carried out, and it cannot be directly related to the offence. Corporal punishment, to be effective as a deterrent, must follow closely after the commission of the offence for which it is inflicted.

Then, he goes on to state:

> If in addition to the sentence of imprisonment which involves loss of liberty and separation from his family and home ties, corporal punishment as part of his sentence has to be inflicted by the persons who are seeking to help him to readjust himself and his thinking to prepare for his release, it is evident that it will be difficult to convince him that these efforts are sincere.

It is a rather strange fact that corporal punishment is still left in our code in the face of the evidence contained in these two volumes which represents the evidence given to the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. This idea of revenge is something that should be, and I believe is, foreign to most Canadians. Prison sentences are set up for punishment, and whipping is something extra that is added. As the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) has pointed out, in something less than 1 per cent of the cases where a judge could order a whipping, were such sentences given. This means that court officers themselves are unwilling to use the provision in the code. It is, therefore, a law which is not being applied because those who are empowered to apply it, in the great majority of instances, do not wish to apply it. They do have the right to either order a whipping or not order it.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this bill should receive general support from all quarters in this house. I suggest the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) should take note of the remarks that have been made in this debate and at as early a time as possible something should be done toward bringing our Criminal Code more in line with that of the nations with whom we feel we are on an equal plane.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time I have spoken in this house on corporal punishment. I have seen no reason for changing my attitude to this inhuman treatment of a fellow human being. If we go back to the early days of history, there may have been some justification for the use of force in trying to deter crime or in punishing criminals once they were caught. However, in a civilized society this is clearly out of date. We have to make up our minds, I think once and for all, just where justice is going. I think there is no longer a need for revenge in our system of justice. Revenge is negative, and although an individual who has been wronged, whether personally or through his loved ones or through his property, has a natural jungle instinct for revenge, most civilized men and certainly civilized society has no such aim.

As lawmakers surely we want to be practical. Anything which has no positive results is a waste of time. If we have statutes which are outmoded it is our clear duty to get rid of them. If our statutes need remodelling, we are the only people who have the opportunity or, indeed, the duty to do it. Perhaps people might wonder why a law enforcement officer should take such a peculiar attitude because the general attitude of policemen, I think, is not imaginative.

Policemen are often thought to be the strong arm of the law and punitive but I do not think this is any longer the case. Certainly I can speak for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in which body I served. Their general attitude is not one of punishment or revenge, but rather one of prevention. People will respect the mounted police and the other police forces only in so far as they are humane and fair. I suggest that the reputation of that force was made on their kindness and their humanity rather than on the well-known cliche that "they always get their man". About 80 per cent of a good policeman's work consists in the prevention of crime. This is done to a great extent by example and by a humane attitude to the public and especially juveniles.

I can quote one example from my own experience. The police of Ontario, the mounted police and the local police combined at the industrial school at Alfred, Ontario to set up a hobby club and a policemen's day and they went to that institution to show friendship to those boys. Within a year the authorities there asserted that juvenile delinquency, bad manners and bad attitudes to discipline in the school had improved 50 per cent. As soon as these boys began to respect the law enforcement officers their whole attitude to the breaking of the law changed. As I said before, the authorities of that school asserted that there was a 50 per cent improvement in those children in the short space of one year.

I can give another example. In the city of Hamilton some ten years ago a very forward-looking police officer started backyard baseball. This officer was hired at the rate of $7,000 a year by the city of Hamilton. In one year after he started this backyard baseball club the city of Hamilton saved $7,000 in broken glass alone or I should say in the non-breaking of glass alone.

I assert that this is a positive attitude to punishment. I think it can be carried right down through our Criminal Code. There is nothing to be gained by corporal punishment. It is revolting to him who administers it, it is debasing to him who receives it and, wherever it is used, it justifies to the criminal his attitude toward a society in which he feels he has no real part. Unless we can show this criminal—who is after all not greatly different from most of us—that he has a proper place in society; that he is welcome in society; nay, that he is loved by his fellow man, the job of rehabilitating him, once he has been in trouble, is hopeless.

Here is one simple way of showing that we have come out of the jungle, that we no longer look upon him as a wild animal or as an enemy but as a man who has not lived up to the high calling of a dignified human being. I cannot see any argument in favour of using these cruel, outmoded physical tortures in order to try to teach him something different. I should just like to close my few remarks by reminding you, Mr. Speaker, of that great piece in Shakespeare from "The Merchant of Venice" where Portia says:

> The quality of mercy is not strain'd,
> It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven,
> Upon the place beneath. It is twice bless'd:
> It blesseth him that gives and him that takes.

If you just draw the parallel and put in the word "punishment" there I think you will see what I mean. Corporal punishment debases him that gives and it certainly debases him that takes.

Once again I should like to add what small weight I can to this argument for doing away with something which is unworthy of Canadians.

(Translation):

Mr. Laurier Regnier (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in supporting the bill moved by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee). I must also commend him for the work he has put in for some time now, for the purpose of having corporal punishment abolished.

I also would like to commend the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) who has also worked hard and long to obtain abolition of corporal punishment. In a speech he made in this house last April he reported that he had visited penitentiaries and had put questions to prisoners who had been subjected to the lash. I should like to quote his own words so that hon. members may realize what cruelty is wrought upon those who are condemned to corporal punishment. The hon. member said—and I quote from page 2317 of the official record of this house for April 7, 1959:

> —the warden of the penitentiary has to carry out that order. . . . the inmate is taken into a small room. If it is the lash, there is a table sloping at a 30 degree angle up against the wall. At the end of that table embedded in the concrete are steel plates. The feet of the inmate are fastened by leather straps to the steel plates in the concrete so that he cannot move. He is then stretched along the inclined board, with arms extended, and his arms are strapped to the board so as to be completely immovable. He is stripped to the waist. . . . may I tell you that a leather belt is put around the kidneys because a blow on the kidneys can kill. Then the man who is strapped there, his feet on the floor, his arms extended, with protection so that he cannot be killed, with a leather belt over the kidneys, gets in Canada what is known as the lash.

The hon. member for Vancouver East personally visited, in the hospital, one of the men who had undergone this punishment, and reported that the victim's back was still sore from the lash seven days later.

To my mind, the practice of so barbarous a chastisement, in a civilized country, is a disgrace. The imposition of such punishment is also degrading for the person who has to carry it out. In my view, that type of punishment serves no purpose but that of revenge.

If we look up the various sections of the Criminal Code dealing with offences for which the lash is to be applied, we note, for instance, section 289 which deals with robbery. Now, as an hon. member said this afternoon, out of a total of 700 to 900 cases, the lash was applied in only 1 per cent of those cases. We are forced to the conclusion that the judges were too humane to condemn the others under that section.

Under certain sections of the Criminal Code, the penalty may call for both life imprisonment and the lash.

If the purpose of such a sentence was indeed to reform the guilty, he would not be condemned to the lash, for how can one expect to reform a criminal who is under a life sentence? That goes to prove, in my opinion, that it is primarily for purposes of revenge that the lash is made part of the sentence.

In my opinion, if the object sought is to reform a criminal, he should be condemned either to prison, or to the lash, but not to both. If it is considered proper to order the lash, the culprit should then be freed immediately after. If the lash was likely to reform a culprit, it could be applied; but it will be seen in several sections of the Criminal Code that the punishment provides up to 14 years of imprisonment, in addition to the lash.

I believe it is a disgrace too for those who have to apply the lash, because their humane feelings are aroused. If the man who carries out the sentence is very humane, he will not use much force; he will try to apply it as humanely as possible, and it is all to his credit. However, in doing so, he might not abide strictly by the requirements of the law. On the other hand, if the man wielding the lash is an inhuman wretch, he will use all his might and apply the lash with cruelty, which would certainly not be a civilized way of applying the punishment.

Especially because the lash can be administered with cruelty, I believe we should react against those methods, we who sit in this parliament and have the authority necessary to amend the sections of the Criminal Code. We should therefore neglect no opportunity to have the corporal punishment abolished.

Once again, I congratulate the mover of the bill and, having done so, I resume my seat, knowing that others are anxious to express their views on the matter.

(Text):

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes left at my disposal I would like to endorse what was previously said by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg). Certainly it is refreshing to hear him state in the house the principles by which the police act in dealing with offenders against the law. As has been said, many people have the feeling that when the mounted police went out to get their men, not only did they catch them and bring them to justice but they prosecuted them to the fullest extent. I think a good many people do have that feeling. It may never have been felt that was the case with the mounted police, but I know at times the public does have the feeling that the police generally are prosecutors rather than concerning themselves with simply bringing people to justice.

As has been said, the most important part of the rehabilitation of a person who has got himself into difficulty concerns his self-respect. I was privileged for five years to do some work in connection with the juvenile court, and during that time I think that was the main lesson I learned. In most cases I found that people who broke the law, people who went out to do malicious damage, were trying to draw attention to themselves for some wrong that they felt had been done to them. It is oversimplification to refer to the sort of person who throws a brick through a window for the sole purpose of being noticed and being brought to justice; but nevertheless such is the case. It is especially noticeable in juveniles, yet I feel that a lot of people who get into difficulty in adulthood are to a large extent just overgrown juveniles and have never got out of that state.

However, the question remains, Mr. Speaker, whether corporal punishment can be dispensed with in all cases. There are those who appear to be hopeless and there are those who are hopeless, and I think that no person who deals in social work or criminology will say everybody can be put back into society as a good member. There are those who time and again are brought before the courts, are sentenced, serve their time, get out and go right back to the same thing. In some cases it is weakness, and I think that in a case like that we should not inflict corporal punishment.

But what about the person who inflicts what we call a heinous crime or inflicts brutal punishment upon another and who does it not only once but several times? I think that we have to consider very seriously how far we may go in connection with a person like that. It has certainly been established that the purpose of punishment is not primarily revenge; it is rehabilitation.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the hon. member who established that principle? It is the first time I have ever heard that established as a principle.

Mr. Aiken: Perhaps I should have been more specific, Mr. Speaker, and stated that it is becoming more and more recognized that that is the case rather than having been stated as a principle. In years gone by, as far as I can learn from books I have read, the main purpose of punishment was revenge; but I think as we advance sociologically the revenge motive has diminished and has now become to a large extent a question of rehabilitation. What I am trying to say is that I do not believe that the question of severe punishment or revenge has entirely disappeared from the crime world of today.

May I call it six o'clock?

[Mr. Aiken.]

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock the house will resume consideration of the business interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

261. Departmental administration, $866,273.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at five o'clock I was pointing out the large returns that we received for money spent in tourist advertising and publicity. I want to put just one more figure on the record before coming to the matter that is of primary concern to me. For every dollar spent on advertising in the United States by this country, $130 in United States currency comes back to Canada in tourist revenue. I do not hesitate to say that for every future dollar that we spend in the same way, a similar return will come back to this country.

I am now through with figures and should like to indicate to the committee why I am so particularly interested and concerned about the tourist business this year. There are three specific reasons. First, even with a general increase in revenues across the board in 1958 in most departments, the income from tourist spending declined about 3 per cent of $11 million. The second reason is that many other countries of the world have concentrated on their tourist business and as a result have reaped great benefits in their garnering of United States dollars. Unfortunately this represents a loss for us in revenue from our traditional market, the United States. People who formerly travelled here are being invited by very high pressure advertising, publicity and travel offices in the United States to travel elsewhere than in Canada.

The third and most serious reason is that next year, 1960, has been declared "Visit U.S.A. 1960" year. This is an undertaking that has been in the course of preparation for several years. It has the personal backing of the President of the United States. It is a concentrated effort by the tourist industry and by the people of the United States to persuade their people first, to travel at home; that is in their own state; second, to bring people to the United States from other countries as extensively as they can; and, third, to encourage inter-state travel within the United States. This can have a devastating effect on Canada's 1960 tourist industry if we do not immediately take steps to counteract it.

"Visit U.S.A. 1960" has an eight-point program. I do not want to give it any more publicity than it should have but I do wish to point out what we in Canada are going to have to meet next year. The reason I am doing so is that 1959 is our last chance to persuade the visitors to Canada this year to return next year. Already some of the large 1960 conventions arranged for major cities in Canada, particularly Montreal, have been cancelled. Certain people in the United States will consider it their patriotic duty to hold their conventions at home next year. That is only a start in early 1959, and other results will be forthcoming. For that reason I believe we must be very concerned about this United States undertaking. The greater part of our travel industry originates from the United States and we do not want to lose a large percentage of our market through United States people being persuaded to travel at home in 1960 and in the future.

I wish to set out six of the eight points of the United States program as being illustrative of what we will have to meet. They are contained in a newsletter published by the Curtis Publishing Company of Washington, D.C., publishers of Holiday magazine. The letter is dated July 2, 1959. The following will give us an idea of the lines along which their program is being conducted:

1. Urge each state and territory to encourage travel within its borders both by visitors from abroad and from other parts of the United States.

2. Urge cities to attract visitors during the period, set up suitable municipal travel information centres, and encourage foreign nationality groups within their confines to assist with the program.

3. Urge corporations and trade and service organizations with operations abroad to use the "Visit U.S.A. 1960" theme in their advertising and promotional activities, as well as to encourage their representatives in foreign countries to visit the United States in 1960.

4. Support legislation to repeal the 10 per cent excise tax on the transportation of foreign persons within the United States.

5. Urge continued negotiations by the United States government with other governments to ease currency restrictions which deter pleasure travel to the United States.

6. Urge government agencies with jurisdiction over recreational areas, national shrines and points of interest to visitors to make available before and during 1960 more adequate supplies of informational material.

A good many of those points could very well be applied to Canada, but it is too late now for us to counter this move except by immediate action. I am not saying that this is entirely the responsibility of government. At this late stage in 1959 I doubt if there is much the government could do except encourage and support our own industry. It is the responsibility of tourist operators themselves and of the public in Canada generally to welcome their visitors this year, to give them good service, good meals and good accommodations, and to extend such courtesy that these visitors will want to return to Canada in 1960 and bring guests, or send their friends.

In the committee on mines, forests and waters we learned that 40 per cent of the people who come to Canada as visitors come here because of something they have heard from someone else. Word-of-mouth advertising is the most immediate and important medium. We must embark upon a program of this nature. Our visitors must have some reason to come back. As I say, this summer season is our last chance to undertake this program.

We in Canada this year must bend our efforts to making our tourist season the most significant one we have had. I am very happy to say that in the area I represent, Parry Sound-Muskoka, which to a large extent is a tourist area, the picture is very bright this year. Summer came early and hot weather always drives people out of the city and into the country. The visit of Her Majesty and Prince Philip created much interest and brought many visitors to Canada early. We are off to a good start this year. I wish to appeal to all the people in Canada who are coming in contact with tourists to make it their special job this year to extend courtesy to their guests.

It may be asked what the government can do. I am not going to deal with that now because this subject was well covered in the last report of the committee on mines, forests and waters under the vote relating to the Canadian government travel bureau. In that report there are some excellent suggestions which if carried out would be of vast assistance. I leave it at that. Many answers to our problems are contained in that report.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, we heard this afternoon when the minister introduced his estimates what he called the first coherent account of the national development plan that had been given to the house this session. We are glad to get that account from the minister. It was certainly, as was pointed out by my hon. friend from Mackenzie, a very general statement. Perhaps that is the way a statement in these circumstances should be. It was also, I believe, misleading in one or two respects, in that it gave, as I understood it, the impression that Canadian national development began in June 1957.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Churchill: On June 21.

Mr. Pearson: One of the least amiable characteristics of the minister is that he seems to believe that Canadian history stopped with the death of Sir John A. Macdonald and did not start again until the advent of the Prime Minister in June, 1957. But, as of course any objective or impartial student of Canadian history must know, the period in between those important events—and of course they were important events—is the period of greatest development in Canada's history, especially the period from 1945 to 1957.

Mr. McGee: In spite of the Liberal party.

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friend said "in spite of the Liberal party". It is a great tribute to the people of Canada, of course, that they could have had this amazing period of development, according to my hon. friend, in spite of the Liberal party. The truth is that the Liberal government of those days provided the framework of policy within which —and this is all we ever claimed—this amazing period of development occurred.

The minister, of course, sometimes in the exuberance of his vision, mistakes propaganda for performance. For instance, this afternoon he talked about the Columbia river development as if that was something that began in June, 1957; whereas he knows the present government is carrying on—I hope to successful completion—the important plans for this development which were initiated several years ago.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, we all know that the planning and development of a nation like Canada, especially perhaps of a nation like Canada, require vision. Had there not been vision since 1867 in this country, and not merely since 1957, Canada would not have reached the position she has reached today, and therefore vision is required, but planning and development require more than vision. It requires a realistic and sober appreciation of resources and means. It must not become a development where those who are responsible for government become so dazzled by the distant scene that they stumble or ignore the steps to be taken immediately ahead. That is our criticism of so much that the government has done and is doing. For instance, the minister may remember the great vision of a third transcontinental railway. The effort to realize that vision prematurely did not help in Canada's development; it hindered Canada's development and we are paying for that premature vision at the present time.

The realization of our national development through planning has to be brought about step by step without timidity, of course, but also without rashness; with common sense as well as with dazzling optimism and within our economic resources; with regard, of course, to a particular area of the country which is going to benefit by any particular scheme, naturally, but also with regard to the effect on the nation as a whole of any plan for any particular area.

Of course, the minister pays special attention to the north and no one has any right to complain about that. It is well in this country that we should pay special attention not only to what is perhaps Canada's last frontier but in a sense perhaps the world's most important frontier. Considerations that make this last frontier important are not only commercial, not only economic, but are considerations of defence and strategy, considerations of our relations with the United States of America and considerations of our relations with the Soviet union. Sometimes we get impatient in this country and sometimes there is complaint because we have not been able to develop our Arctic areas as speedily and as sensationally as they have in the Soviet union. We forget that we are 17½ millions of people; the Russians are 200 millions of people. We forget sometimes that we are a free society and that we have to persuade, induce through incentives, people to go north while the Russians can order any number of people to go north to do anything they want them to do.

There is something else about national development that we occasionally forget, and I ventured to mention this in the last session, namely that national development is not merely the opening up of new areas in our country. It can also take the form of assistance in the re-development of older areas. There is a great deal to do in this country in that respect in some of those areas which have not shared to the full, as they have the right to expect, in the economic development of our country. Perhaps that kind of national development is not as glamorous as looking ahead to arrange for submarines to sail with oil under the Arctic ice, or building glass palaces at Frobisher; but it can be even more important to the country as a whole. However, as I have said, I have no complaint with the minister's concentration on the north, with his vision of development in the north, but I do, complain, Mr. Chairman, about exaggerations and distortions and indeed the falsification of that particular vision.

I am thinking particularly of a subject which has occupied this house for a good deal of time this session already, and concerning which there has been discussion both in the house and before the appropriate committee, namely the question of permit rights and applications for gas and oil licences in northern Canada, and in particular an attempt by the Prime Minister, the minister and at least one of his colleagues, to associate that development with claims for the protection of our sovereignty in the area against the encroachment of the United States; in contrast with the situation which existed before 1957. In particular there is the contention of the Prime Minister that the granting of those rights has been a major means of preserving the sovereignty of Canada by the present government in those northern areas. I would like to begin by quoting again what I put on the record of the house on March 9, namely a television broadcast of the Prime Minister on the nation's business, one paragraph of which reads:

> It was because I knew Canadians felt so strongly about the necessity of preserving Canada's destiny that I have advocated and the government has launched its national development policy to push back our northern frontiers. The result of our action has been that in the last several weeks—

This was in March, 1959.

> —over 75 million acres in northern Canada have been taken up for oil and mineral development, and I want to underline this that this is a major means to preserve our sovereignty.

The expressions used by the Prime Minister that I would emphasize are, first, "in northern Canada" and, second, "taken up for oil and mineral development". We also noticed at the time that he used the figure of 75 million acres. It was perfectly natural to connect that figure of 75 million acres used by the Prime Minister in that particular broadcast with the statement made earlier in the house by the minister on February 13 when the minister said, and I quote from page 995 of Hansard:

> I should like to emphasize to the house that this is in addition to the 76 million acres—

The Prime Minister had said "over 75 million".

> —now under permit in the mainland of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

The minister was referring to 76 million acres on the mainland of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon which presumably was the area which the Prime Minister was referring to when he talked about almost 76 million acres. Then, on March 10 of this year the minister on his own initiative made a statement in the House of Commons in connection with the public sale of oil and gas permits in northern Canada for 3,546,829 acres. The minister had this to say on March 10 as found on page 1774 of Hansard:

> All the acreage, except for some 250,000 acres, lies in the southwestern Northwest Territories and southeastern Yukon in the general vicinity of Fort Liard.

That reference was to the sale of oil and gas permits in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon territory, not, I point out, to the Arctic islands at all. The minister also made the following statement on that occasion:

> I should emphasize that this sale is for exploratory privileges only, though if the permittee complies with the regulations he may acquire up to 50 percent of each area as an oil and gas lease. He must apply for such a lease if he discovers oil and gas and wishes to commence production.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the issue of a permit has certain obligations and gives certain privileges. In view of the Prime Minister's statement made the preceding evening on a national network I asked the minister when he finished that statement how many of the bids he mentioned were made by United States corporations or Canadian subsidiaries of such corporations because the Prime Minister had made such a point about the preservation of Canadian sovereignty in this way. Later in answer to a question by the hon. member for Mackenzie River the minister provided the percentage acreage which showed that for that particular sale of something over three million acres on March 9 Canadian corporations held only 4 per cent and United States corporations and Canadian subsidiaries of United States corporations held 93 per cent of the acreage under permit in that particular sale of something over three million acres.

It was certainly clear that in so far as this particular sale was concerned there was very little done to enhance or protect Canadian sovereignty because of the fact that 93 per cent of these permits went to United States corporations or Canadian subsidiaries. I made reference to this fact in my speech in the house on April 21 and the minister and some of his colleagues took violent exception to the way I put it. They said I was misrepresenting the situation because I was giving the impression that these percentages applied to the 75 million acres. I admit that certainly was an impression that could have been taken and so when they made their complaints, as found on page 2911 of Hansard, I corrected myself and I mentioned that this particular sale applied only to the parcel of land in question of something over three million acres.

However, in the light of the minister's violent, and it was violent, intervention on that occasion we on this side decided to seek from him information with respect to the whole of the northern area of which the minister had provided us with information for only one sale, that on March 9. For that reason the hon. member for Ottawa West asked a further question, the answer to which will be found in Hansard for April 29, page 3148. The question read as follows:

1. Were 75 million acres recently taken up in northern Canada for oil and mineral development?
2. If so, by whom?
3. What percentage has been assigned to (a) Canadian corporations; (b) United States corporations and Canadian subsidiaries of United States companies; (c) British corporations; (d) others?

The minister replied to that question in a most peculiar manner. He threw up quite a smokecreen to conceal the actual facts. In fact, he shifted the discussion. Whether he threw up this smokescreen for that purpose I do not know. Perhaps I should not say he did it for that purpose but that certainly was the effect of the answer he gave because he shifted the discussion from the subject which had been under discussion up to that point, namely permit rights on the mainland—that is what we were talking about—to applications for exploratory licences in the Arctic islands. On the basis of such applications for exploratory licences in the Arctic islands, which had nothing to do with the question at all, and not on the basis of permits granted, which was the question, not even on the basis of applications granted, the minister was able to show to the house and to the country that 68 per cent of the 86 million acres for which applications had been made consisted of Canadian applications.

The minister is pretty naive if he thinks he can get away with such an obvious effort to confuse the discussion and to mislead the opposition in that way in a matter which is of such importance in view of what the Prime Minister and the minister himself had been saying about it outside the house. So, in awareness of this particular technique and after a very strange speech indeed by the Prime Minister in Montreal which I will deal with a little later, the hon. member for Mackenzie River put a further question on the order paper which was answered on May 20, 1959, page 3836 of Hansard.

In that question the opposition made a further attempt to get information covering all the northern areas on the mainland which the minister accused me of failing to provide in my speech on April 21. So we asked what was the total acreage for which exploratory oil and gas permits were issued, not applications for licences, between July 1, 1957, and March 31, 1959, on the mainland of northern Canada. The Prime Minister had said that there were over 75 million acres for which permits had been granted in his television broadcast in February. The answer given by the minister was that in 21 months, not in recent weeks as the Prime Minister had said, permits had been issued for 60 million acres on the mainland of northern Canada.

So we now ask the minister how Canadian sovereignty, in the words of the Prime Minister, was preserved by issuing under his jurisdiction in that period permits for 60 million acres on the mainland of Canada.

The answer to that question is quite clear because according to the minister's own figures more than 70 per cent of this total acreage of 60 million acres was granted to non-Canadian companies, a total of 63 per cent to United States corporations or Canadian subsidiaries of United States corporations and less than 30 per cent of the total acreage was granted to Canadian corporations. Now I ask the minister, based on the information given for all the northern areas, all the mainland, based on the figures that were given and not just on the sale of March 9 about which he complained earlier, was he justified in saying that this is a major means of preserving our sovereignty? If it is, then it is less than 30 per cent sovereignty.

In this same answer, which will be found on page 3836 of Hansard if the minister is looking for it, the minister did something else. He tried to produce a figure for both the mainland and the Arctic islands by adding together the permits granted on the mainland and the applications for licences on the islands. He produced, in that strange way, a figure for the whole of the north, the islands and the mainland. Mr. Chairman, that figure was nonsensical and misleading, I would say, because by adding applications to permits—two very different things—he made a total which was just about as sensible as if he had added oranges to apples and got 50 of the former. It is quite true that applications made for the Arctic islands by Canadian individuals and corporations covered 68.74 per cent of the total acreage. As we know, some of these applications were from very unusual sources indeed. However, of the 60 million acres for which permits were granted, less than 30 per cent went to Canadian corporations or Canadian individuals.

The conclusion to be drawn from the additional information provided by the minister is even more damning than the information provided for the sale of March 9 covering only three million acres. The information now shows that while Canadian individuals and Canadian corporations made most of the applications, United States corporations got most of the permits in the Canadian north. The minister, in explaining to the committee how these applications are received and how the permits are granted, has said that there are three categories or stages, as follows: First, there is the application; second, there is the exploratory licence which is valid for one year and which allows geological reconnaissance; then, third, there is the exploratory permit which imposes obligations, which allows drilling, and later can give rights for leases if the permittee fulfils certain undertakings.

The minister has now given us the acreages for the Arctic islands and the continental shelf covering applications and nothing else. He has given us the acreages on the mainland relating to exploratory permits. Now, let me talk about the exploratory permits, and we are getting down to business. With all this information before him, with all this information having been made public, it is amazing that the Prime Minister in May would repeat the kind of statement he made over TV. I have his statement here. This was, I think, on May 8. I am quoting from page 10 of the text of the Prime Minister's speech, where he had this to say:

> In the far north, as a direct result of action taken by this government 85.9 million acres on the Canadian mainland in the Mackenzie district and the Yukon have been taken up by firms and individuals for oil and gas development.

A few weeks before he had restricted it to 75 million acres, and the minister said the figure was 60 million acres. Now, before this great Conservative dinner in Montreal on May 8 the Prime Minister has a figure of 85.9 million acres as the acreage which he said had been taken up by firms and individuals for oil and gas development and which was apparently meant, if the Prime Minister's words meant anything, to cover exploratory permits whereas, as I have said, the minister in his official figures said only 60 million acres had been given out since July 1, 1957, and of these 60 million acres less than 30 per cent had been given to Canadian companies. Then, the Prime Minister in the next paragraph of his speech had this to say:

> Another 86.5 million acres on the continental shelf in the Arctic islands are now being developed under exploratory permits. These are stupendous figures.

They certainly are stupendous, in more ways than one. I continue to quote:

> The potential of expansion which they imply for the Canadian economy is almost beyond imagination.

These figures are almost beyond imagination, too, because the Prime Minister said 86.5 million acres were under exploratory permits in the Arctic islands. Not so, says the minister, there are no permits on the Arctic islands, only applications, as I shall be able to prove later by quoting the minister's own words. Then, the Prime Minister went on:

> What is equally important in this connection is that Canadians are taking the lead in this development of Canadian resources. 68.7 per cent of the applications covering these 86.5 million acres are from Canadian corporations and individuals;—

Yet we know that that is true only in respect of applications and is quite wrong in respect of permits granted because 60 per cent or more of those went to the United States. Then, the Prime Minister finished by saying that it is apparent Canadian sovereignty has not been neglected; that Canadians are taking the lead in this matter and Canadian sovereignty this time has not been neglected.

Canadians are taking the lead all right in making the applications because the figures given refer to applications, not to permits. Making applications is hardly the development of Canadian resources. We claim, and the figures given by the minister himself prove it, that the United States is taking the lead in getting exploratory permits and Canadians are taking the lead in making the applications. The Canadians apply and the United States citizens receive. As a result of this, the Prime Minister said that Canadian sovereignty in the Arctic is being protected in this particular way.

In his earlier speech the Prime Minister had said that 75 million acres were taken up recently, and now he gets this figure of 75 million raised by May to 85.9 million acres. What did he mean by "recently" in the earlier speech? We do know, I repeat, that this particular government gave permits for 60 million acres, of which more than 70 per cent went to non-Canadian corporations.

When I stated, as I did a few moments ago, that when the Prime Minister talked about permits being given in the Arctic islands he was contradicted by his own minister, perhaps I had better prove that particular statement. Not only did the minister contradict the Prime Minister, but he has contradicted himself in this matter. Here is what he said to the committee, and I am reading from report No. 14, page 351 of the committee evidence, and this is in respect of the issuing of permits:

> A question was asked yesterday in the house by another hon. member which allowed me to state what was happening in the area of the Arctic islands—

Then he went on to say this:

> —where there are now 86 million acres under permit.

That is what the minister told the committee. Perhaps that was the basis upon which the Prime Minister made his statement in public. But what did the minister say in the House of Commons? I quote from Hansard of February 13, page 995 as follows:

> In the Arctic islands the oil and gas regulations are being revised, and until such time as the revision is complete no permits are being issued.

Then later, just a day before the statement he made to the committee which I have quoted and in which he said there were no permits being issued in the Arctic islands the minister had this to say on April 29, as reported at page 3149 of Hansard:

> Very recently, however, interest has been shown in the Arctic islands and in the sea bed and subsoil of the continental shelf off Canada's northern coast. If the hon. member refers to this more recent activity the strict answer to his first question is no, since up to the present no permits have been granted in the Arctic islands or the continental shelf.

Which are we to believe? Are we to believe the minister in the committee, or the minister in the House of Commons? Later, on May 6, just before the Prime Minister spoke in Montreal—in fact two days before the Prime Minister spoke in Montreal—the minister had this to say as reported at page 3377 of Hansard:

> These companies simply requested priority to obtain oil and gas permits when the revised oil and gas regulations are promulgated—
> The licences issued do not cover a specific acreage but are designed for general geological exploration anywhere in the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory, including the Arctic islands.

In other words, they were not permits at all. Then again on May 11, just after the Prime Minister spoke, the minister as reported at page 3514 of Hansard had this to say. This was after the Prime Minister had made his statement in Montreal.

> First of all I would like to make it clear that we have not issued any exploratory permits . . . with regard to the Arctic islands and the continental shelf.

Perhaps the minister, before these discussions end, would try to explain some of these contradictions. If we on this side of the chamber have some doubts as to the reality of the minister's statement with regard to the vision, perhaps contradictory statements of this kind in the house and in public, perhaps this kind of statement of the Prime Minister made about the protection of Canadian sovereignty in the Arctic, give us some justification for having those doubts.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In view of the obvious sensitivity of the Leader of the Opposition with regard to the terrible fluff that he made in the house some weeks ago on this matter of describing the sovereignty of the north on the basis of one sale of three and a half million acres, I think I should like to clear that record up but fast. I am going to say frankly to the Leader of the Opposition that if he wants to make use of dialectics in quarrelling over the words "exploratory licences" and permits that are waiting servicing, let him go ahead.

Mr. Pearson: Just tell the truth.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): However, the thing be remembered is this. At no time did the Prime Minister ever make a false statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Read his speech.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If the Leader of the Opposition wants to stand up in this house and say that he made a false statement, let him stand up and say so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Those are dialectics.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): All the hon. member does is to comfort himself by saying that at one time the Prime Minister spoke of 75 million acres, another time I spoke of 60 million acres, another time the Prime Minister spoke of 85 million acres or 85.9 million acres, to be accurate, and another time he spoke of 86.5 million acres. Let me explain this to the Leader of the Opposition. Right tonight, July 10, the number of acres that are out under application for permits in the Arctic island is 95.4 million acres.

Mr. Pearson: How many permits have been issued?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): When I make this statement I expect the Leader of the Opposition to go up and down the country and to say that I have contradicted myself. The only thing he cannot stomach is the fact that business people from all countries are taking an interest in our resources and these applications for permits are coming in every day. That is the thing that he cannot stomach.

Mr. Pearson: Why don't you tell the truth?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): His advisers told him in 1958 that all this program was a program from igloo to igloo, and he has lived to regret it.

Mr. Pearson: Why don't you answer with facts?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That facts are as I have given them here now. Up to the period of 1957 there were in the Yukon two reservations of roughly 6 million acres. A recent figure is 6,133,760 acres. This was by reservation. In addition, up to July 1, 1957 there were 18,794,504 acres given out before this government changed.

This was over a long period of time and some of these permits for exploration are now running out. After the change of government there was an obvious increase in interest which was shown particularly in the fall of 1957; and during that period on the mainland and to the present time—up to roughly about three weeks ago when these figures were compiled—the figure had risen to the figure quoted by the Leader of the Opposition. On the mainland in addition to the reservation of permits before July, 1957, an additional 60,942,006 acres were given out. Then starting last February there was a rush on the islands off the shores of our mainland covering some continental shelf and covering these islands and this figure in this tabulation I have here, is shown at 89,018,364 acres. The most recent figure to date, the total in the Arctic islands now under application for permits is now 95,451,508 acres. The total in the Arctic islands under application for permits is now 95,451,508 acres. Those figures will change day by day. Therefore every time I give up to date figures I suppose I contradict myself.

Mr. Hardie: Give the exploration permits.

Mr. Pearson: Does the minister not know the difference between an application and a permit?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The Leader of the Opposition made a great play over this difference between applications for permits and permits. I want to assure this committee that as far as the development of resources is concerned—and his own words were that applications are hardly the development of Canadian resources—at this very moment there are—and I am just trying to check the figures—either 10 companies or 12 companies actively engaged in work in these northern islands under these applications for permits and such work is just as useful for the development of resources whether it is done under application for permit or under actual permit.

What was the reason why we let them have these exploratory licences or to work, as I call it, under application for a permit? The reason was simple. To any person knowing the difficulties in the northern islands it was obvious that there had to be promulgated a set of regulations that would meet the conditions there; first of all to encourage companes to go into this area and, second, to make sure that the resources there were effectively administered and used in the best interest of this country. We were therefore working on these regulations last fall with no expectation that this rush would suddenly break out in February. When the rush actually did break out we drafted quickly a series of regulations and intended to put them into effect. The government has been studying these regulations with the idea of seeing that everything is done not only to protect the utilization of these resources in the best interests of the people of Canada, but to make sure, as far as we can go, that there is effective administration by the Canadian people of these resources.

Mr. Chairman, a great deal of play has been made over these percentage figures. I have been quite candid with the percentage going to Canadian companies, the percentage going to Canadian subsidiaries, to United States companies, British companies, Dutch companies, French companies, to other foreign companies, and the percentage going to United States or Canadian individuals. These percentages do not mean anything in the long run.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why give them then?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): What does mean something is who has the oil and gas when it is found? I heard from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate the expression, "Why give them?" The answer is is that I was not the person who asked for these percentages; they were asked for by the Leader of the Opposition, and all across this country went a headline that 93 per cent of our northern oil and gas lands had got into the hands of United States companies.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who said that?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That was a statement of the press.

Mr. Pearson: Quote a headline.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In the Canadian Press. I stood up on a point of order that night and tried to correct the Leader of the Opposition, and my correction was not allowed. He kept going on and on, and finally Mr. Speaker had to let me have two minutes before the vote was taken to try to correct the Leader of the Opposition. Now he comes along tonight, on July 10, several months after this occasion, and admits he is wrong.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I would like to call the minister's attention to page 2911 of Hansard for April 21, where I said:

> —we get specific information covering about three million acres, we find that 95 per cent of these leases were granted to United States corporations—

I made that statement after the minister corrected me.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is not a point of order.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I understand how sensitive the Leader of the Opposition is, because when a person has made a horrible blunder of the calibre the Leader of the Opposition made I can understand him trying to get out of it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): But it is apparent to the people of Canada that the hon. member has a great deal to learn about domestic problems in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It is also apparent, too, to this house that we have been very patient while the Leader of the Opposition tries to learn something about what goes on in Canada. I can see from the annoyance of the hon. members across the way that they are not too happy about the fact that with regard to the oil and gas development in the north there is, or rather was up until a few weeks ago because the figures are higher now, a total of 168,754,876 acres out under permits for exploration and exploratory licences, or, if you want to be more accurate, applications for permits.

Mr. Pearson: Yes; be accurate, that is all.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am accurate.

Mr. Hardie: Be honest.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In addition there is this reservation of six million acres, and to be even more accurate, Mr. Chairman, with regard to waters under territorial lands there is the additional seven million acres out under permits or applications for permits at the present time. I think the Canadian people will be satisfied with this work which is going on, and I want to conclude my remarks with what the Leader of the Opposition has said on this salient point of sovereignty. If the Leader of the Opposition goes back—

Mr. Pickersgill: It was the Prime Minister who talked about sovereignty.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—

Mr. Pickersgill: Let us be accurate.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —knows that he can make a speech any time he likes on my estimates.

Mr. Pearson: And he will.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I wish he would let me finish this topic, because I know he will wish he had not interjected.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Coming back to this salient question of sovereignty, in my opinion there is no question of sovereignty on any part of the mainland of Canada; but there is a small question of doubt in the minds of some who are unaware of the facts about our sovereignty on the Arctic islands and the areas around them. Therefore this is, if I may use the word "sensitive" in the correct way, a sensitive area for Canada, and if the Leader of the Opposition goes back to the discussion of the estimates last year he will find out that he agreed that the only way we could maintain sovereignty in our far northern areas was by effective occupation. That is not my phrase. It is not his phrase. But we both agreed that this was the effective way, and I think that he would be fair enough to admit that the most effective occupation that Canada can provide is effective, tangible administration. Whether it be the operation of airfields or D.E.W. line stations or weather stations or the new airfields we are constructing in the islands or the research teams we have there or the company activities looking for oil and gas, so long as that is done under our effective administration, that is the most tangible evidence to any person in any part of the world that this is Canada and that this is the land we will fight for.

I hope I have said enough to answer the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, and I think that he should join with us and be proud that this development has taken place. I know that the development of these northern areas will take a long time, but I believe, not only in theory but in fact, that the most realistic way to do it is to approach our undeveloped territories from the south up through the provinces and through the east and north at the same time in a vast pincer movement. It is very important to us as a nation to make certain that with submarines going around the Arctic seas this area is beyond question the sovereign area of Canada, and this oil and gas exploration in the northern areas has come as a great boon to us. We are rather happy that in the figures I have quoted in answer to one of the questions the percentage in the Arctic islands at that date, of Canadian companies or Canadian individuals who held licences was 68 per cent. At the present time the percentage is a little higher. I know, as I said earlier, that percentages do not mean anything. It is who has the oil in the end that counts, after all. But as far as sovereignty is concerned, as long as that company is working under our direction, then by effective administration of that resource in that area we are giving the best evidence of sovereignty that we can give. If more Canadian individuals and more Canadian companies and more Canadian subsidiaries of foreign companies get this acreage than outside companies, it will make us all a little more nationally conscious that Canadians are getting up there and getting their share.

As a matter of fact, I think the committee would like to know what the percentages are over this whole area. I will be very careful here. I am now quoting from the document I have before me which goes back two or three weeks to the time of the committee. These are the percentages on the mainland and on the islands, and they include permits and applications for permits, because in our minds, and in the mind of any person who is sensible, when these applications go in the permits are taken out and it is in effect the same thing. If one or two dropped out it would not seriously affect the figures. At the present time, over the whole north—

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the minister starts on that, would he permit one question?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Surely.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say whether every one of these applicants is going to be given a permit?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Each one of these applicants has established a priority and will be given a permit provided he shows that his operations are sufficient to carry out the requirements necessary.

Mr. Pearson: Ah, there is a proviso.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I see the Leader of the Opposition smiling at that. I heard one suggestion in committee that one of these men was a bartender. I happen to know this fellow is a bartender, but he was once, and still is, a prospector who has gone out and found resources in this country, and prospectors' fortunes go up and go down. I never met this man but he wrote me a letter and thanked me for coming to his defence in the committee.

Mr. Hardie: Was he ever in the Arctic islands?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I never asked him. However, I do not like this kind of ridicule.

Mr. Hardie: How would he know what acreage to take up there?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Just cool off and you will be all right. I was just about to give these figures. As I say, the criteria is not who has the highest percentage. Who ends up with the oil is what counts. I refuse to get involved in a fight about these percentages.

Mr. Pickersgill: If they do not mean anything why waste our time?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The figures are as follows. These totals are for all permits issued to date from the very beginning.

Mr. Pearson: And applications?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, and applications for permits, from as far back as 1952 and 1953 up to three or four weeks ago. The tabulation is as follows:

Total Permits and Applications for Permits to Date (Excluding Reservations and Areas under Territorial Waters)

	Per cent
United States companies	20.02
Canadian subsidiaries	14.25
Canadian companies	31.28
United States citizens	9.68
Canadian citizens	21.65
Joint holdings	1.47
British companies	1.65

This does not include the reservations nor does it include the areas under territorial waters which total another 13 million acres. I hope that what I have just said makes it very clear to the committee that there is no intention to conceal. We are so proud of these figures we want the whole country to know about them. We are proud that this development has come with such a rush within the last two years. We are happy that an interest has been aroused in Canada's northland, both in Canada and all over the world. Surely the opposition cannot blame us if we take just a little credit for being an active government instead of a passive government.

While I am on my feet I should like to say a word or two about the remarks of the hon. member for Mackenzie River this afternoon. I want to compliment him for taking the time to work out a constructive program as he did. I think he can say with some accuracy that he too has a vision. I was examining his remarks over the dinner hour and they represent a practical approach.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): These winter roads in these areas may very well be the answer to the problem of these areas. I will not quarrel with the accuracy of his estimated figures because I have no way of knowing what is right. I would suggest, however, that the figure of $20 million for hard surfacing the Mackenzie highway right to Yellowknife is a little low. The Alberta government asked us to hard surface up to the territorial boundary. Whereas the hon. member estimated $20 million for the whole highway the estimate of the province for that small part of it was $70 million. But that is not the main thing and I do not seek to quarrel. The main thing is that the hon. member came forward with a constructive approach.

The hon. member referred to flight strips. These would be of benefit to some of the mining operations. They are not so important to some of the oil and gas companies because I inquired about it and they suggested that their areas are so large that a helicopter would serve them better.

The hon. gentleman's suggestion about electromagnetic surveys is absolutely sound. It will interest him to know that this is the type of survey we have requested the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to undertake in south Yukon and Great Slave lake.

I could go through the hon. gentleman's remarks and comment on each point but I will content myself with saying that these suggestions will not only be considered but will be considered favourably and realistically. The hon. gentleman is to be congratulated for the constructive speech he made.

As for the political stuff at the beginning of his remarks about how this road program in the territories was all taken from royal commissions, let me say that the hon. member knows as well as I do that it is one thing for a civil servant, knowing what is necessary, to make recommendations to a royal commission and it is another for a government to accept recommendations from that civil servant. The fact is that the previous government did not accept those recommendations and those programs. If the hon. gentleman wants to call this a Liberal program, let him go ahead but the chief difference, I might point out, is that—

Mr. Hardie: One was practical and one was impractical.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —we simply squeezed it into a smaller period so that a person living in the north could see some sort of development going on there before his death.

There was a question raised about Frobisher Bay. An investigation is now being conducted and a group of architects and engineers are looking at the plans. I want to tell the committee there will be no plastic cities at Frobisher Bay unless they are a lot cheaper than those about which we have heard to date.

Mr. Pearson: Why talk about them, then?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Because that happened to be the first sketch that was produced for us. I was not the one who talked about them. The sketch appeared in an architectural magazine; how, I do not know. I am not going to quarrel about that either because I do know from examining these costs of construction of housing and the building of sewers and water facilities in the north that the north cannot be developed as we feel it should be developed on the basis of these high costs. I believe that the ingenuity of our scientists and engineers will find answers to these problems in the very near future.

The hon. member for Port Arthur rose and made what I thought was a quiet and sensible speech. He was not too impressed with the committee's findings with respect to the forestry branch. I would think that any person who reads that committee report could reach one of a variety of opinions concerning it. I said this afternoon that I thought it was a pretty hard-hitting report and that we were going to examine it carefully. If I were a strong forestry man I perhaps would not support the setting up of a forestry department but perhaps it would be a wise thing. The whole report will give the department something to get its teeth into for the next year or two.

I should like to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Port Arthur that hon. members of the committee should take a trip to the north, particularly along the Mackenzie valley and see for themselves some of the things they have taken the liberty of criticizing. I for one have not seen some of the things that were criticized by the committee and I have held back my criticism until I can see them and make up my own mind.

The hon. member also spoke of the development of northwestern Ontario. He knows that I am right with him on that because I believe that is one of the most promising areas of our country. I should like to remind him that the resources are in the hands of the province and we will do everything we can to co-operate with Ontario. I understand that this province has now agreed to the roads to resources agreement. I expect that will be up before the government soon for approval here.

I thank the hon. member for handling the discussion of the museum as he did. As a school teacher he knows that when difficulties arise on a staff where personalities are involved it is very difficult for the principal of the school or the school board to take a position without hurting someone. I attempted to act in a manner that I thought would protect the museum. I thought no good purpose would be served by bringing personality clashes out in the open. I examined the evidence and found I had no choice in this matter. If there has been any personal frustration for anyone I can only say I am sorry. I do think the museum is settling down. I know the great work that it can do will go forward. We are going to be pretty busy for the next year or two as the geological survey and the art gallery move out and the museum commences to make adjustments in their new surroundings. We are rebuilding the staff. I hope all hon. members of the committee will support me in attempting to assist the museum to proceed in its important work under pleasant and happier circumstances.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, made a thoughtful speech about the tourist industry in Canada. I do not think there is a person who will disagree with him in saying that we should all do a little more advertising and should win more tourist friends for Canada. We must discriminate in our advertising but only in the sense of going after those markets that bring us the highest returns. We have met with more success than the amount for which the committee gave us credit. With respect to camp grounds and picnic sites, over the last few years—I am trying to think of the figures; if I may I will just use round figures —over the last two winters over 500 camp grounds and picnic sites have been built along the highways in the provinces of Canada thanks to the 50 per cent contribution by the federal government, and the 50 per cent contribution by the provinces. In addition to this, there are over 100 camp grounds planned along the trans-Canada highway, and I think that the two of them at the end of the next two or three years will provide in dollar value at least roughly about $10 million worth of places where people can stop and rest themselves and enjoy the scenery that is about them.

I should like to suggest that in addition to advertising for the tourist industry we have to provide plants. I have given one example of how we as a federal government can help the provinces provide the type of plant that private enterprise does not as a rule provide. I can mention in addition to that the forest access roads which have opened up many miles of forest and I hope over the next few years will open up a good many more miles of forest in Canada which will make accessible places for people who like fishing and hunting and the scenery of our back roads.

Finally, our roads to resources program has proven successful already in taking tourists into areas where they could not get into before. As the years come along I think hon. members will see that the tourist industry in Canada can be made even better than it is today. We all regret the drop in income last year. We have not any figures that are final for this year yet, but we must make an effort to maintain this great dollar earning industry at the level that it could be.

Mr. Herridge: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I must say I was very pleased to hear the minister's response to the very constructive proposals made by the unassuming but hard-working hon. member for Mackenzie. I know the member has long thought of those questions that he brought before the committee this afternoon and indeed, in listening to his speech, I thought he made a very comprehensive and constructive approach to the questions with which he dealt.

As a backwoodsman who has had an interest in forest conservation for 50 years, and who happened to be a forest farmer during that whole period, I am going to confine my remarks entirely to the forestry section of the report of the committee on mines, forests and waters. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that during my whole life I have had four major affections and interests: the first, the ladies; the second, trees; the third, horses; and the fourth, ships; but this evening I am going to deal with the question of trees—

An hon. Member: Why not women?

Mr. Herridge: —first of all, because of my particular interest in this question over practically my whole life time, and because of the fact that 40 per cent of the production of the province from which I come, British Columbia, results from the forest industry.

We have made considerable progress since the second world war. I remember before the Canada Forestry Act was passed there were representations, in the first instance I am very proud to say, from the representatives of the forest industry in British Columbia urging that such an act be passed by the federal government, and representations from the Canadian Forestry Association and the Canadian Institute of Forestry. That was the first, shall I say, great step so far as the federal government was concerned with respect to legislation which provided for co-operation between the federal and the various provincial governments. Since that act was passed there has been a great deal of good accomplished. Forest inventories have been undertaken in the various provinces as a result of the agreements, and I understand that most of those are practically completed. There has been work undertaken with respect to reforestation as a result of agreements between the federal and provincial governments and some very effective work undertaken as a result of agreements with respect to forest fire protection and some limited work undertaken as a result of agreements with respect to aerial spraying projects.

Also, since the passing of the Canada Forestry Act, there has been considerable extension of the research work undertaken by the forestry branch of the minister's department and also quite an advance in education. But, as the minister mentioned previously this afternoon, for 25 years the committee on mines, forests and waters had not met. I had the honour of being a member of this committee from 1945 to 1957, a committee which never met during that whole period. However, I must say that the question of the necessity for the committee meeting and the other questions related to further interest required on the part of the federal government in forestry projects were kept alive by the Canadian Forestry Association, the Canadian Institute of Foresters and various conservation organizations across this country.

I cannot pass by this aspect of the question without referring to the excellent work done by the British Columbia natural resources conference which was established in the first instance, I think in 1949, under the coalition government of British Columbia at that time. There is no other province in Canada that has undertaken a series of annual conferences of this type which have contributed a great deal toward an understanding of the problems with respect to the innumerable natural resources in the province of British Columbia.

I notice while I am speaking that my colleague from Port Arthur is mumbling and growling because I am making some complimentary references with respect to what we do in British Columbia, but I shall not take any notice of him. I want to tell hon. members on behalf of the C.C.F. group that we discuss these questions in our caucus. We have urged a number of things. I might say I am very delighted with the report that the committee on mines, forests and waters had presented to this house, and in particular with respect to the forestry section of the minister's department.

For years I urged that the committee on mines, forests and waters meet and that the estimates of the minister's department be referred to that committee, without result. My pleas fell on deaf ears. I am very glad to know that since the minister has taken office the committee on mines, forests and waters met in 1958 and again this year. I just want to mention that because it indicates that there is an influence from the C.C.F. group in this house throughout the years. It is the eroding of the hard stone, but we do find that we accomplish our objectives.

For some 12 years I have urged the necessity of a dominion-provincial conference to deal with the question of a national policy for the conservation of land, forests, water and other renewable natural resources. Year after year this question has been discussed in the house on a private member's resolution introduced by the hon. member for Kootenay West on behalf of the C.C.F. group. I was very pleased at that time, when I introduced the resolution and there was an opportunity to debate it, that it was supported by the Progressive Conservative members on the opposition side of the house during those years. I am very glad to note that our efforts in that respect have brought some results. In that connection I want to put an editorial from the Lethbridge Herald of December 1, 1958, on the record because I was very pleased indeed to read this. The heading is, "Conservation Study", and it reads as follows:

> A meeting of federal and provincial representatives held in Ottawa in mid-November has gone almost unnoticed, though it may turn out to have been one of the most important in a decade. For it reached agreement on the holding, no later than the summer of 1960, of a national conference on conservation "to discuss the multiple use of such renewable natural resources as soil, forests, wildlife, fish, water and recreational facilities".
> Conservation has had but half-hearted treatment in this country to date. Organizations like the Canadian forestry association and fish and game associations have long been active within their respective fields, and in recent years governments have taken preliminary steps to ensure the wise use of our renewable resources. But in no province, so far as we know, have conservation measures been either co-ordinated or adequately planned, and interprovincial and federal-provincial co-operation have been negligible.
> There is no guarantee, to be sure, that the national conference on conservation will utter the last words on the subject. But judging by its aims, it should bring some worthwhile improvements. Those aims are: (1) Assembling information on the present status of resource management and research in Canada. (A steering committee to be set up shortly to compile material from provincial governments and other agencies on resource activities.)
>
> (2) Discussing weaknesses and gaps in the field of resource management and research.
> (3) Indicating areas where further efforts are required.
> (4) Creating a better understanding on the part of the public at large, governments and industrial and other special groups of the meaning of conservation, its present status in Canada and its implications for the future.
> The very fact that conservation is to be examined at the federal-provincial level is a happy augury. We congratulate the Diefenbaker government for initiating this development; and we think praise is also due to Mr. H. W. Herridge, M.P. for Kootenay West, who over many years has been a persistent advocate of just such a move as this.

I could not resist reading that editorial, Mr. Chairman, because although my pleas fell on deaf ears in the case of the former Liberal government I am delighted that finally the present government has taken action in that respect because I think it is a most important subject and I look forward to some very excellent results from this conference.

Another thing that I want to urge on behalf of the C.C.F. group is the necessity for the establishment of a department of forestry separate from the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I am delighted, Mr. Chairman, to know that the committee has recommended exactly that, following right in our trail. Once again the C.C.F. has indicated that it thinks well in advance and that its policies are sound.

Then I have urged for years on behalf of this group the necessity of an increase in the money appropriated for research, the necessity of the expansion of research with respect to our forest products laboratories and research in the field. I am therefore pleased to note that in the committee's report it recommends that very thing, the expansion of research so far as the forestry branch is concerned.

Then again, for some 12 years I have urged on behalf of this group the point of view that there should be a review of taxation policies with respect to federal government and provincial government taxation. I have urged for years that there should be similar consideration given to the forest industry, the lumber industry and the pulp and paper industry, with respect to exemptions for roads, firefighting equipment, trails, telephones and all these extra costs associated with development, as is given at the present time to the mining, gas and oil industries.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is there anything you have not asked for?

Mr. Herridge: Very little. Then again, on behalf of this group I have urged the necessity for expansion of access trails and roads to make possible the more efficient fighting of fires in the forests of Canada, and I am very pleased to notice that the committee has recommended exactly that. Speaking always on behalf of the group I am associated with, the democratic socialist group in this house, I have also urged consideration of the development of our oriental markets and in recent years recognition of China because of the great possibilities of markets for the products of the forests of British Columbia in that country. In that connection, as the evidence before the committee will show, we have the heads of the great firm of MacMillan, Bloedel and Stewart, other representatives of the forest industry of British Columbia, the Vancouver board of trade, all the trade unions of British Columbia, in fact, all the sensible people of British Columbia, supporting this policy at this time. I am very pleased to note that the committee makes exactly this recommendation in its report.

These things that I have advocated on behalf of this group have not been advocated out of thin air. They are the result of discussion and consideration. Every one of these policies that have been advocated over a period of 13 years by the member for Kootenay West on behalf of this group has received the support of the entire forest industry of British Columbia and the trade union organizations associated with it.

I do want to say Mr. Chairman, that this excellent report of the committee clearly indicates a lack of action on the part of the government of Canada, action that should have been taken before now. I must say that I was very pleased to hear the minister say that he gave his officials carte blanche to answer freely the questions asked by the committee. It is quite evident from the report that the committee has made to the house that the committee has not been under any duress or pressure whatever from the minister or the government to restrict or modify its report. I am very pleased to note that. Mind you, it is a very forward looking report and possibly contains some things that will give the minister headaches in future months or years, but I think it is a genuinely democratic report that expresses the opinions of the members of the committee.

I may say that I was not a member of the committee but I was allowed to sit in when forestry was under consideration and have my little say from time to time. I appreciate very much the kindness of the committee in that respect. This report is a democratic report from a committee without any strings attached which offers a great opportunity to the minister and the government in the days ahead.

Before concluding I do want to urge on the basis of this report that the minister give consideration to further amendments to the Canada Forestry Act which are required if the act is going to function satisfactorily under present conditions. I think that the report offers a sound basis for amendments to that act. The national conference proposed by the minister not later than 1960 offers a very sound basis for the government to take the lead to write the first dominion-provincial charter for dominion-provincial co-operation with respect to the conservation, utilization and development of our natural resources.

Before I sit down I want to say a few words with respect to the staff. We are most fortunate in the staff at present employed in the minister's department and the high standard of their academic qualifications and experience. Anyone who knows anything about the forest industry will know that they are not receiving the salaries they should. In a company with which I am acquainted there is one forest engineer who gets almost as much salary as the deputy minister of the department. Private industry is offering much larger salaries to this type of official than is being offered by the federal government. Provincial governments are offering much larger salaries than are being offered by the federal government.

As an illustration, I may say that the premier of British Columbia went out and, unrestricted by a civil service act or other regulations which are some restriction upon the minister and other members of his government, simply offered Mr. Keenleyside $25,000 a year to come and take over a position with the British Columbia power commission. That sounds like a lot of money. However, the premier of British Columbia was smart in doing that. He picked up a first class man with great capacity, academic qualifications and great experience and secured his services for the British Columbia power commission. Unfortunately, our federal ministers cannot do the same sort of thing. They are restricted by the Civil Service Act, the treasury board, regulations and so on. I do suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if we are going to maintain the services of this type of qualified people, some of whom have given long and devoted service to this and other departments of government, and if we are going to get the best of the younger people who are coming along, then the government should give consideration to changing its salary schedules in the very near future.

It is not fair to expect men with high qualifications and experience to continue serving the government of Canada and the people of Canada for salaries which, in some cases, are about 50 per cent of what these same people could obtain with provincial governments or in private industry. I do urge, Mr. Chairman, that the government give consideration to this problem so that we can retain the excellent staff we have at the present time, and can recruit the services of the brighter young men who are coming forward to take their part in the government service of the future.

Mr. Baldwin: I should like to make a few brief comments here with regard to the statement made by the Prime Minister on June 4 regarding the appointment of the personnel of a board to inquire into and report upon the respective merits of the alternative routes which might be followed by a railway line to be built from northern Alberta, and so on. I am just reciting part of the terms of reference. I was most happy to hear of this announcement because it seems to me that it was the only thing to do under all the complicated circumstances which surround the program. It also carried into effect suggestions which had been made by various organizations in the Peace river country.

I think I should make it crystal clear that this is not a case of an argument between two towns as to which should have a post office constructed or as to which one should get an airfield. There is a very great and considerable measure of principle involved. Are we going to open up the development of northern Canada for the benefit of a few large privileged companies, or is this development to be for the advantage of the people of Canada? This is not the time or place to argue the pros and cons of the respective alternative routes, but there is no doubt that the Canadian Pacific and Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company and two large lumber companies have come out very strongly in favour of one route, as has also the Social Credit government in Alberta, if we are to judge from the report of the provincially appointed MacGregor commission. However, the Alberta government did become alarmed at the public outcry and ultimately reversed its stand in a somewhat weak and tepid fashion. But up until slightly more than a year ago it did appear as if these people were going to have their way and cause the breach of a solemn covenant and undertaking made over 25 years ago and which led, in a large measure, to the settlement of the northern part of the lands drained by the Peace river.

Now, all this has been said before, and I am not going to labour the point. I want to make it clear that northern development must not be thought of as a one-way street down which is to flow the spoils of the north country. If we take out the capital goods of our natural resources we must replace them with something of equal value which can and should include people, settlement and industrialization, all of a permanent nature. It seems to me this would be a good place to refer to an issue which relates to my remarks and which I think is also pertinent to the item under discussion. When I was making inquiries over a year ago on this particular issue I was, to some extent, puzzled because the proponents of the eastern route seemed to feel that from the viewpoint of revenue there would be a great deal more to be expected from the McMurray route from lumber and lumber products than from the western route. My belief had been different, but I had not taken into calculation the timber from the great Wood Buffalo national park, which is one of the largest parks in the world and lies partly in the province of Alberta and partly in the Northwest Territories.

I subsequently discovered that it was in this park that the timber resources were alleged to be. At a meeting of the mines, forests and waters committee during the last session, I asked one of the officials of the department a question—I think this was reported in the proceedings of July 7, 1958—and I received the information that there were approximately 1,200 million board feet of commercial timber and pulp along the Peace river estuary in this park. This session I put question No. 245 on the order paper to find out just what formed the legal basis for the commercial exploitation of lumber resources in this park because I always had been of the impression that the lumber and timber resources in a national park were not susceptible to commercial development on such a large scale. The answer to my question was given on April 28, and a synopsis of the answer indicates that the legal authority for the granting of the timber rights in the park lay in five orders in council made between August 1, 1955 and March 12, 1957.

My view, and I am not going to argue this here ad nauseam, is that each of these orders in council is, under the interpretation in the National Parks Act, quite invalid, and that licences should not have been granted in that way. If they were granted at all, it should have been done by means of a proper amendment to the act. The answers also show that the licences were granted to two companies named the Denney Logging Company Limited and the Swanson Lumber Company Limited. They secured timber berths for 1½ billion board feet which constitutes most of the merchantable timber in the park.

Now, very briefly, Mr. Chairman, the National Parks Act, of which I believe the pertinent section is section 4, charter 189 of the Revised Statutes of 1952, says this:

> The parks are hereby dedicated to the people of Canada for their benefit, education and enjoyment, subject to the provisions of this act and the regulations, and such parks shall be maintained and made use of so as to leave them unimpaired for the enjoyment of future generations.

Section 6 provides that the governor in council may authorize the sale, lease or other disposition of public lands within a park, for certain reasons, such as the requirement for the right of way or station grounds of any railway or the right of way of an oil or gas pipe line or any similar facilities.

The only means by which these orders in council could have been made for the purpose of granting these timber rights would be under section 7 which makes provision for the governor in council to make regulations for, and then in subsection (i), paragraph (iii) it states:

> (iii) the cutting and removal of dead or diseased timber and such green timber as may be necessary for the protection and management of forests in a park,—

My submission here is that these are limiting words "forest protection management" and there cannot be encompassed into this small space the rights which were here given to exploit commercially timber resources amounting to one and a half billion board feet purely under the limiting subsection of forest protection and management.

I am not taking exception to the proper development of that area. If and when it is necessary and is essential I think it should be done. I think it should be done but should have been done properly. I think that was a time when there should have probably have been an amendment to the act. I have here one of the orders in council. I am not going to go into all of them. They are all of a kind. This one is dated May 24, 1956 and refers to the fact that the committee of the privy council have had before them a report from the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources:

> That application has been made by Mr. R. B. Denney, Jr., of Healdsburg, California, U.S.A., for permission to cut timber on two parcels on both sides of the Peace river, including certain timbered islands lying between 112 degrees 00 minutes and 114 degrees 00 minutes west longitude;—

By the way I may say that I looked that up on the map and it covers an area of approximately 102 miles on both sides of the Peace river. The paragraph continues:

> —one parcel contains approximately 192 square miles and the other approximately 24 square miles, containing approximately 700 million feet board measure of mature white spruce and approximately 150 million feet board measure of mature poplar;—

Those are miniature principalities. I think there should have been an amendment to the act in order to have amputated areas to that extent from one of our national parks. I think there is further complexity to this issue because by what is known as the Alberta Natural Resources Act of 1930 the natural resources which had until then been held by Canada or by the crown in the right of Canada were transferred to the provincial government of Alberta but there was retained all the natural resources within the limits of any national park which included Wood Buffalo national park. There was appended to that statute an agreement which was ultimately signed by both Canada and Alberta and became enacted by statutes in both jurisdictions. Section 14 of that agreement says, —I will just give a digest of it—that the parks mentioned in the schedule will remain the property of Canada and include the natural resources, which of course includes the timber. Then it goes on to say this:

—but in the event of the parliament of Canada at any time declaring that the said lands or any part thereof are no longer required for park purposes, the land, mines, minerals . . . specified in any such declaration, shall forthwith upon the making thereof belong to the province—

Very simply and briefly I may say that I think it is quite anomalous and was quite anomalous at the time, for a federal government to be concerned in the administration of the natural resources of a large area within the limits of any provincial jurisdiction. This is a problem which of course the minister inherited and it is a difficult one having in mind that there are vested interests. I think it is possibly a question where some examination might be made of this particular section and negotiations arranged with the provincial government so that if there is to be commercial development not only of timber resources but of mineral resources in that park, then it might well be in the hands of the provincial government. I do not subscribe to the beliefs of the provincial government of Alberta but I think that is a point which I am compelled to take up.

Finally, it is because of facts like these that I think it is most essential that there should be a fair, impartial, unbiased examination of the issues involved in connection with the construction of this railroad. Others have looked at the problem but I feel that none of them have been entirely free from prejudice. Fortunately at this time the composition of the present government and the known respect of the Prime Minister for the rights of the ordinary man have been factors which have led to the appointment of the Manning inquiry. I am confident that from this inquiry will come a proper appreciation of the problems which are involved in the construction of this particular development program.

May I here make some mention of the fact that the hon. member for Mackenzie River did suggest that the railroad should be commenced and should run from Grimshaw. It is, of course, a fact that is appreciated by the people in my particular constituency. But I would make this point clear. We have never asked for anything to which we are not entitled. We think that the construction of this railroad was promised many years ago. We think that it is necessary and essential for the proper development of the Canadian north. I am quite confident that the reports and briefs which will be submitted to this commission will justify my expectations.

Finally, I think that our whole scheme of northern development is in issue here and I think as a suggested theme I can do no better than quote what appeared on the frontispiece of the MacGregor report to which I have already referred. I do not need to apologize for plagiarism here; there is no copyright on this quotation. I will just put it on record:

And Moses sent them to spy out the land of Canaan, and said unto them,—

See the land, what it is; and the people that dwelleth therein, whether they be strong or weak, few or many;

And what the land is that they dwell in, whether it be good or bad; and what cities they be that they dwell in, whether in tents, or in strongholds;

And what the land is, whether it be fat or lean, whether there be wood therein, or not.

Mr. Hardie: Earlier this evening the minister, in referring to a figure I had given earlier this afternoon with regard to the rebuilding and part surfacing of sections of the Mackenzie highway to Yellowknife mentioned that the cost of hard surfacing the road on the Alberta side would be $70 million. I am sure the minister would want to correct that statement. I am sure he realized that this means over a quarter of a million dollars a mile.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Chairman. This was a formal application from the government of Alberta and included the route from Grimshaw to the northwest territories which is nearly 400 miles and the figure they quoted for rebuilding and resurfacing was $70 million.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, like any other member, when I wanted to enquire whether the federal government was participating in the building of a bridge in a city I thought the question was to be asked of the Minister of Public Works. Hence on March 4 I asked if he could tell me whether the bridge at Prince Albert is to be paid for entirely by the federal government or whether the provincial government is paying part of the cost. At that time, as reported at page 1595 of Hansard, Mr. Speaker said this:

If the minister is able to answer without notice he may do so, but this is a question which should more properly be put on the order paper, as it asks for statistical information.

I therefore came along later and put on the order paper a starred question. On March 11, as found at page 1829 of Hansard, I was astonished to hear the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources tell me this in answer to my question. The question was this:

1. Has the federal government built, agreed to build or made any contribution to the cost of building a bridge across the Saskatchewan river in the city of Prince Albert?

2. If so, what proportion of the cost of the said bridge will be paid or has been paid for by the federal government?

Then the minister of northern affairs answered and this is where I was astounded. Instead of having the answer from the Minister of Public Works I received the answer from the minister of northern affairs. He said:

1. Yes; under the roads to resources program.
2. Fifty per cent up to a maximum of $1,250,000.

At that time I was so surprised I could not go any further with my question. But on March 12, 1959, at page 1864 and page 1865 of Hansard, I came back to the question. I said:

Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In answer to a question of mine yesterday with regard to the Prince Albert bridge over the Saskatchewan river, the minister said it was built under the roads to resources program. Does that mean what are generally called access roads?

Then the minister answered:

The roads to resources program, Mr. Speaker, has been explained in the house on several occasions. It covers the roads we are building in agreement with nine of the provinces—

That excepts Quebec.

—to open to new resource areas in these various provinces.

Then I came back:

A supplementary question. Are there any roads within or immediately outside Prince Albert in that program? What I mean is, in the program of roads are there any within the city of Prince Albert or in the immediate vicinity?

Then the minister answered:

Mr. Speaker, the main project in the agreement in the province of Saskatchewan is a road to Uranium City, of which the southern terminus is Prince Albert.

Then I came back with another question:

Does that road at the present time go any further than Lac la Ronge, which is 150 miles from the city of Prince Albert?

Then the minister answered:

I cannot give the house the exact mileage that the road has gone beyond Lac la Ronge, but I would say 30 or 40 miles at least. When the road is finished it will go 550 miles beyond.

Then the member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked a question:

Might I ask the minister a further supplementary question? Is it not a fact that the only new road being built is from Lac la Ronge northward and that Lac la Ronge is some 150 miles away from the city of Prince Albert? Therefore the bridge is not anywhere near this road the minister mentioned?

The minister answered:

I can inform the hon. member that there are several roads in this program in the province of Saskatchewan.

As the minister answered that, I was wondering if I was making a great mistake in speaking of access roads or the roads to resources program. I find that in the estimates the explanation is given like this. When we speak of access roads we mean establishing forest access roads and trails for the attainment of adequate fire protection as well as other aspects of forest management. I have looked at the description given to roads to resources in accordance with the agreement, and it says:

Contributions to the provinces to assist in the development of roads leading to resources in accordance with agreements entered into by Canada and the provinces.

As you can see, Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the federal government participating in building a bridge in a city, or between two cities or between two provinces. This has been done before and it will be done in the future. What I am opposed to is the fact that when members of parliament think of a bridge in a city or around a city or between two provinces we never think for a moment that we will have to go and look in the estimates of the minister of northern affairs, except if the bridge is built under a roads to resources program or under access roads.

We find now that this bridge being built in the city of Prince Albert has been contributed to 50 per cent by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and we can find on the map that Lac la Ronge is at least 150 miles away from the city of Prince Albert. The road which goes straight to Lac la Ronge is one of the main roads of the province of Saskatchewan. It starts in the United States and goes straight to La Ronge on the border of Lac la Ronge, and then goes northwards to Uranium City. They are roads to resources started both by the federal government and the government of Saskatchewan. How is it possible, then, that the federal government should take the money from the department of northern affairs to build a bridge in a city? Was it a case of an apple for the teacher so that the good graces of the Prime Minister should fall upon the head and shoulders of the minister of northern affairs, or was it a case of an order given by the Prime Minister who wanted a contribution to the bridge in the city of Prince Albert? In the two cases I think the way it was presented is a case of false representation. It should have come from the Department of Public Works if it was within a city, particularly as the bridge was 150 miles away from the nearest road to resources.

If we went on in that way every member in this house could come and ask the minister of northern affairs to build bridges in their constituencies. I have a mine two miles away from Hull, so I could ask the minister to build an interprovincial bridge contributed one-quarter by the provincial government of Ontario, one-quarter by the provincial government of Quebec, and then it will be the very same principle. The only difference would be the cost of the bridge. I do not understand why the minister should try to hide this thing from the members of the house.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Would the chairman call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to make this request this evening, but I would point out that we are still very hopeful that it will be possible to end the session a week from tomorrow, and it helps a great deal if we can spend the extra hour in the evenings. Of course we are in the hands of the hon. members in the house, but I put this forward as a suggestion and it might make all the difference if we go on for another hour this evening. We are hoping to get through the estimates of one or two other departments tomorrow, but if we only get the estimates of northern affairs and national resources through this week and the others pile up, then it would be extremely difficult, probably, to finish the session by the end of next week, and then once we break into a new week that probably means a second full week. Therefore I make this appeal to hon. members that nobody is going to be very seriously prejudiced if we should consider and discuss these estimates for, say, another hour this evening.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the minister that there are still eight departments to be studied, and there are still a few speakers who want to speak on this matter, and even if we wanted to we could not finish the first item tonight. Even if we wanted to close on July 18, it would be impossible with eight departments to go—especially when one considers that there are still outstanding the estimates of the Minister of Finance who has a marked talent for extending discussions—and in view of the legislation.

Mr. Winch: We have regulations governing the hours of the sitting of the House of Commons. Last night we broke those rules and we are doing it again now. We would like to know what is the target of the government. What is the procedure to be? What is the government working toward? We have been here for six or seven months. Most of us in this group are from western Canada and would like to go home but, like the house leader, we will stay here as long as there is business of parliament requiring attention. Is there any understanding about the closing date? What is the target? We will co-operate right down the line but we want some understanding.

Mr. Green: As the hon. member knows, the government is not in a position to say when the house will be prorogued. This is almost entirely in the hands of the opposition, as I know myself from long experience on the other side. The rules of the house say that the sittings should end at ten o'clock. Mind you, it would always be possible for the government to bring in a motion changing the hours of sitting but we have no intention of doing that.

As I pointed out last week, we had hoped that the session would end by a week from tomorrow. It is with this thought in mind that I took the liberty this evening of asking the committee to carry on until, let us say, eleven o'clock, with these estimates. There is no agreement to be enforced. This is entirely in the judgment of hon. members themselves. That has been the case each evening when the house has sat beyond the normal closing hour of ten o'clock. If hon. members of the C.C.F. do not want to stay beyond ten o'clock, certainly there is no intention of forcing them to do so. If we wished to force them it would be quite impossible to do so.

Mr. Herridge: How would it be if we agreed to adjourn now and the whips could come to some arrangement tomorrow? I think we could reach a mutually satisfactory agreement concerning the best use of our time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I agree that the suggestion made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat is a sensible one. There does not appear to be a disposition to continue this evening. I think if those who usually work out the business would try to get together and achieve an understanding for next week that would be an understanding that would be adhered to, that would be the best thing. We should abide by the rules today.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day, reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I presume the business that was indicated last evening will be the business for tomorrow but could the leader of the house give us some indication for at least Monday and Tuesday of next week.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the intention is to commence on Monday with item No. 12, the resolution concerning additional grants to Newfoundland; then item No. 1, further consideration of the farm loan credit bill; then item No. 11, the international wheat agreement; then item No. 9, the convention on the nationality of married women. I have been under some pressure from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration during the last few minutes. We then propose taking item No. 4, dealing with an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of New Brunswick concerning Indians; then item No. 7, a similar agreement with the province of Nova Scotia, then item No. 6, an amendment to the Public Lands Grant Act.

We will continue with this program on Tuesday. I would hope that the bill concerning Newfoundland grants could be considered on Tuesday. There is also a bill coming on the order paper dealing with humane slaughter which I think is based on the recommendations of the agriculture committee. We will probably take that on Tuesday. I do not think it could be taken on Monday except by consent. There are other odds and ends but we are hopeful of finishing this legislation by Tuesday night.

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it that the combines legislation will not be proceeded with on Monday or Tuesday?

Mr. Green: No, it would have to be taken later in the week because the Minister of Justice is away in connection with the royal visit.

Mr. Winch: Is the target for prorogation the 18th or the 27th of this month? Quite honestly, what do you think we can do if everybody is honest, does not talk too much, and if there is not too much repetition?

Mr. Green: I think we could finish tomorrow night under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winch: In view of the estimates and legislation outstanding, what is the minister's considered opinion as to the target date for prorogation if he has the co-operation of the opposition?

Mr. Green: The target would be a week from tomorrow; that would be July 18.

Mr. Badanai: May I ask the house leader whether he can tell the house if it is the intention of the government to bring in amendments to the board of grain commissioners act?

Mr. Green: No, I have heard of no such amendments.

At 10.12 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, July 11, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

WELLAND CANAL—REPORTED INTENTION TO DUPLICATE LOCKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will he be good enough to comment on the statement made in a news broadcast last night to the effect that according to plans in his department the locks of the Welland canal will be duplicated at a cost of $150 million?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing at all in the statement. I was asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia yesterday if we had started studies regarding the need in the future for twinning the Welland canal locks, and I said that such a study had been started some time ago. I think the hon. member, having been the minister of this department, will agree that long range studies well in advance of any possibility are the sensible thing to do for a person in my position.

NORTHLAND NAVIGATION COMPANY

USE OF SUBVENTION PAYMENTS—STATEMENT ON BARGAINING AGENT BALLOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister able to assure the house that no portion of the $294,500 subvention which is payable to the Northland Navigation Company is being used to finance the activities of gangsters and racketeers in their attempt to destroy a legitimate and responsible union which is the certified bargaining agent for certain employees of that company?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yesterday the hon. member for Essex East directed a question to me. He asked whether the chief executive officer of the labour relations board advised that a ballot would be permitted in connection with the bargaining agents of the Northland Navigation Company engineers, and whether that commitment was later reversed.

I have checked this matter with the department and the answer is no.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CELEBRATION PLANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the Prime Minister can bring the house up to date on the plans of the government for the celebration of the Canadian centennial, and whether any consideration is being given to the recommendation of the Canada Council that a national theatre should be constructed. I am certain that Canadians are interested in the very important plans that the government no doubt has under consideration.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all sure that this is a proper question for the orders of the day. However, I realize the great importance of preparations being made for the celebration of Canada's centennial. Some months ago I referred to the question at length, for I believe that Canadians as a whole will expect that on the occasion of the celebration of the 100th anniversary of Canada's nationhood, the necessary plans in keeping with the importance of that occasion should be made far in advance. In so far as detailed consideration is concerned, there has been none as yet. There have been preliminary discussions and also a general review of the problems that must necessarily be considered in making those preparations which will assure that proper celebrations will be achieved.

In so far as the national theatre is concerned there have been suggestions in the past, and those suggestions have met with general approbation in the house, that artistic considerations and our national destiny demand that the fullest comprehension of Canada's artistic past as well as assurances for the future should be a matter of serious deliberation on the part of every level of government. I realize that there has been a suggestion—the hon. gentleman called it a recommendation—from the Canada Council, and that would be one of those matters which would be deserving of the most serious consideration on the part of the committees to be set up and those whose responsibility it will be to assure that the centenary celebration shall be in keeping with Canada's destiny.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the fact that these preparations will not likely become active for about three years or so, may I assure the Prime Minister that at that time we will be glad to associate the opposition with the full preparations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I must say that I think Canadians as a whole would want to be so associated, and I know the hon. gentleman would not want to be left out.

HARBOURS

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—REPORTED WRECKAGE OF PILOT BOAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I must apologize for not having given him notice of my intention to ask the question, but he may take this as notice. My question arises out of a telegram which was handed to me yesterday, and with your permission I should like to quote two sentences:

> The Evening Times-Globe, Saint John, N.B., July 4, 1959, reports: "Word from Ottawa was still being awaited here this morning as to what action will be taken regarding a harbour bump which might be the wreckage of the pilot boat sunk with all seven hands in the harbour approaches in 1957".
> Since none of the bodies have been recovered there is strong possibility they were trapped inside the boat which lies only 18 feet below water mark on the land side of the fairway buoy as reported by the survey team from the federal department of lands and mines.
> My brother pilot William J. Murray lost his life in that ship—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is laying a very long factual background. Can he come to the point? I understand he is referring to a matter that happened in 1957.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Yes. My question is this. Will the Minister of Transport tell the house if any action is planned in this connection?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The hon. member spoke to me about this matter yesterday. I can assure him that we will investigate this matter and see what information we can obtain.

SHIPPING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROVISION OF SERVICE TO UP-COAST COMMUNITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Can my hon. friend the Minister of Labour tell us what steps have been taken, if any, by the government to provide supplies for people in the up-coast communities, in view of the situation which is very serious at the moment, I understand.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): This matter does not come under my department.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, but since the Minister of Labour is concerned with it and since, as a result of the strike there is human suffering, perhaps the minister could tell us what steps have been taken by the government to provide supplies for the people who obviously need them.

Mr. Starr: Probably my colleague the Minister of Transport would be able to give that information.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wonder whether the hon. member would be good enough to pose the question again. I was jotting down some notes about the last one that was asked and I am afraid I am one question behind.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As a result of the strike at the Northland Navigation Company there is, we are advised—and as undoubtedly the minister has been advised—great discomfort because of the lack of supplies. My question which was addressed to the Minister of Labour and is now addressed to the Minister of Transport is this, what steps has the government taken or does the government propose to take to relieve this situation?

Mr. Hees: I immediately got in touch with the chairman of the maritime commission as soon as the strike went into effect. He is investigating all possibilities of supplying vitally needed supplies to isolated communities in British Columbia. I expect to be able to report further on that matter early next week when the chairman of the maritime commission has reported to me what he has been able to do.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I have a supplementary question. May I ask the Minister of Transport when it was that he discussed this matter with the chairman of the maritime commission? Just the other day I asked him precisely the same question and he said the government was making no effort to deal with the situation.

Mr. Hees: I took it from the original question posed to me by the hon. member for Skeena that he expected us to engage in strikebreaking activities. That never is the intention of this government, as I thought he would know. Certainly I would have told him if he had taken the trouble to see me about if after the sitting, if he was worried about it, or before, he would have realized that this government, which is always interested in and vitally concerned with the welfare of Canadians, would naturally take all steps to see that human suffering is alleviated to the greatest possible degree.

Mr. Pickersgill: The little people.

Mr. Howard: I appreciate all the applause following the minister's remarks, but he did not answer my question and I rise on a point of order. I would request the minister to withdraw his charge that I was suggesting that they had engaged in strike-breaking activities.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, it was my firm impression from the way the hon. member asked his question that day that that was what he was suggesting. I am saying that was my impression, and I am entitled to form an impression from what any hon. member of this house says.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, may I go further with my point of order and clear up that erroneous impression.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I fail to see a point of order there. Does the hon. member for Ottawa West wish to say anything on the point?

Mr. McIlraith: The only point I want to draw to Your Honour's attention is that the minister's answer undoubtedly contained gratuitous references, which I submit is contrary to the rules as they appear in the fourth edition of Beauchesne at page 153.

Mr. Speaker: That is quite another point of order. It is true that the minister did range beyond the question. In fact I do not think he came to the question.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT—INQUIRY AS TO CONSULTATIONS WITH U.S. ON PILOTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister indicate at what level and with what United States departments any discussions on pilotage are taking place and whether the tenor of these discussions indicates any firm legislative possibilities in this field for the next session of this house?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The hon. member asked me a similar question a few days ago, at which time I told him I did not have any further report. That answer still stands.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to know whether the minister is working through the department of the Secretary of State or whether he is working directly with the coastguard which we realize is involved in this deal, and how high up in the United States echelon he is working with them, so we can get some indication whether there will be a likelihood of success in these negotiations.

Mr. Hees: As I think the hon. member knows, this matter is handled both by the Department of Commerce and by the coastguard in the United States. We are in close touch with both of them and are working closely with both departments.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question arising out of the question asked by the hon. member for Port Arthur. Has the minister seen the reports in the press to the effect that there is now before congress an amendment to the bill dealing with pilotage in which it is suggested that a pilotage board be established by the United States congress, and that that board enter into an agreement with Canada on the subject of pilotage on the great lakes?

Mr. Hees: I have not seen that particular report, Mr. Speaker, but I am very glad such a report has appeared, because it is following along the lines of my discussions with the United States authorities when I went to Washington, and it shows that the trip was worth while. I think we are drawing toward the conclusion at which this government had hoped to arrive.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY—REPORTED STATEMENT BY U.S. ADMIRAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence arising out of a statement in this morning's press in which Rear Admiral Thach, of the United States navy, is reported to have said that Canada should not build nuclear subs until she has built a more diversified navy, and that at a later stage it would be a good idea for Canada to build nuclear subs. Can the minister say whether this statement was made after consultation with him or his department, and is this the view of the Canadian government? If it is not, does the minister not agree that it would be more appropriate for statements regarding Canada's naval policy to be made by our own distinguished Minister of National Defence?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): The statement was not made after consultation with the Canadian government, and the matter of whether or not Canada adopts nuclear submarines is under very careful consideration. As has been said in this house a great many times, nuclear submarines are very expensive weapons, and we are not going to commit ourselves to the purchase of these weapons until we have obtained all the information that there is available on this matter. The opinion which was expressed was that attributed to a United States admiral who is visiting this country.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO CALLING OF CONFERENCE ON FISCAL MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if on this quiet, pleasant morning the Minister of Finance would not take offence if I asked him a question. Is it a fact that when he asked for a conference between the different levels of government on the matter of dominion-provincial fiscal relations, the premier of Manitoba also asked at the recent meetings in Ottawa for an interim payment; and if that was requested, can the Minister of Finance indicate to the house what kind of reply the government of which he is a distinguished member permitted him to make?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Replying in kind to this unusually inoffensive inquiry, I may say I do not quite know what the hon. gentleman refers to when he said I asked for a two-level conference, or two types of conferences. I must be very wary of these inoffensive questions of his.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I can fully appreciate that the hon. gentleman's preoccupations are so heavy that he finds it difficult at the moment to understand a very simple question. The question I asked him was this. What reply did the hon. gentleman give to Premier Roblin who, when he asked for a full-fledged dominion-provincial conference, associated with that request a further request for an interim payment from the federal government to the province?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In answer to that now simplified interrogation may I say that the purpose of the several provinces which sought a plenary, negotiating dominion-provincial conference to obtain a variation in the terms of the existing agreements entered into in pursuance of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act in order to derive larger sums under the terms of the agreements and the legislation. That was the purpose which was associated with the request for the calling of a plenary conference, and it was to these proposals that I indicated in reply, as I have told the house and the hon. gentleman on several occasions, that obviously if that were the purpose there would be little point in calling such a conference unless the federal government was in a position to comply in some measure with the request for that kind of variation in the terms of the agreements.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will have to read what the hon. gentleman has said in such a complicated way with regard to such a simple question. May I ask him another question. Is it a fact that his seminar or study group has decided not to hold any sessions during the hot weather?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The weather is never hot for the government. I can imagine, looking at the hon. gentleman, that the weather has been hot for him for a long time. I am not aware of what he has in mind in talking about a seminar or a study group. If I were organizing such a thing I can assure him he would be one of the first I would nominate to enjoy the benefits of that kind of instruction.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT ON PAYMENTS BY FEDERAL TREASURY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Finance a factual question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister explain how it happens that the estimate of the payments to the province of Quebec under the tax-sharing arrangements act which he gave yesterday are almost precisely $8 million higher than the estimates printed in the blue book?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): It is refreshing, for a change, to be asked what the hon. member calls a factual question, particularly after the type of question we have been listening to by the hon. gentleman from Essex East.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked a question on this subject yesterday, which will be found at page 5779 of Hansard, pertaining to the table of payments for the province of Quebec which I put on the record yesterday. His question asked for a comparison of the basis of those figures with respect to that one province with those given in the table which I placed on record in the budget speech as reported at page 2410 of Hansard of April 9.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that the table on page 2410 was based upon the blue book of estimates which, as hon. members will appreciate, was prepared last autumn. The figures I gave yesterday were a projection of the budget estimates of revenue for the current fiscal year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I would now like to ask the minister a question which is not so factual. In view of the obvious reflection of buoyant revenues evidenced by this increase, does the minister not think the time has now arrived for the government to reach the conclusion that it should have a plenary conference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had made it clear on earlier occasions, at least to all other hon. members of the house, that the budget estimate, which included our forecast of the gross national product and our revenues, was based upon the considerations, including the expansion of the economy, that we found when the budget was submitted to the house on April 9. There had been a considerable change in conditions since the previous autumn, and those matters were largely taken into account in the anticipations for the current fiscal year, based upon the expansion of the economy that had already taken place up to April 9 and which we were then quite confident would continue at an increasing tempo. The expansion which has taken place in the economy since that time at an extraordinary rate had been largely foreseen then and had entered into our budget calculations.

Mr. Pickersgill: A further supplementary question. Does the minister still expect a substantial deficit?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think hon. members should bear in mind that the estimates of the Department of Finance are still to be dealt with. There will be ample opportunity to debate federal-provincial relations at that time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister's reply was too long, in any event.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

CHIPPEWA INDIAN RESERVE, SARNIA—LAND DISPOSAL—SALE OF LAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Is the hon. lady yet in a position to table a return respecting the Chippewa Indian reserve at Sarnia?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say I did not get a report of the progress being made yesterday and, of course, as the hon. member knows, the staff is not working today, but I shall inquire into it the first thing Monday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BILL OF RIGHTS—HUMANE SLAUGHTER OF FOOD ANIMALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fairly definite indication which was given last evening by the house leader that he hopes prorogation will take place on July 18, may I ask the Prime Minister when we might expect the introduction of the bill of rights, if it is to be introduced this session?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope that on Monday there will be a full statement of the legislative program for the rest of the session. I must say that I trust that program, while receiving the fullest attention, will achieve the hope expressed by the house leader.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to raise for the Prime Minister's attention a matter concerning the business of the house. He will find in last night's Hansard it was indicated that the bill dealing with the humane slaughter of food animals probably would be taken up on Tuesday. I see it is indicated in Votes and Proceedings this morning that first reading would be moved on Monday. Would the Prime Minister consider asking unanimous consent to give first reading today so the bill could be made available to members by Monday morning? It would mean there would be an opportunity to see the bill a day before it was dealt with.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the suggestion is a very good one. This matter is one that has received the consideration of a committee, and the bill to be submitted I believe embodies the general recommendations made as a result of the deliberations of that committee. The suggestion is a good one and I would accordingly accede to it and suggest to Your Honour that, by leave of the house, this course be followed.

Mr. Speaker: By unanimous consent the Prime Minister, for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) asks for leave to introduce a bill which is contained in Votes and Proceedings of July 10 as a notice of motion. The bill is entitled "An act to provide for the humane slaughter of food animals". Does the house agree to the suggestion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LIVESTOCK

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE FOR THE HUMANE SLAUGHTER OF FOOD ANIMALS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-71, to provide for the humane slaughter of food animals.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

261. Departmental administration, $866,273.

The Deputy Chairman: This item will be found on page 54 of the blue book, and the details are on page 362.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, when the clock struck ten last night I was dealing with the bridge which is being built over the Saskatchewan river in the city of Prince Albert, under the vote having to do with roads to resources. The city of Prince Albert is 150 miles away from the nearest resource road in the province of Saskatchewan. When I look at the explanation in the estimates book this is the kind of explanation I get: "Contributions to the provinces to assist in the development of roads leading to resources". I wonder how it could happen that the minister could say that Prince Albert is the southern terminus of this road leading to Uranium City or lake Athabasca. I think it is a way to divert the attention of members of the house.

I wonder why they took this means of providing for the building of this bridge under the roads to resources program. Any member who wants to know if a bridge is being built within a city or between two cities or between two provinces would never resort to the estimates of the northern affairs department to find that out. He would go straight to the Minister of Public Works. As I said last night, I do not object to the idea of the federal government participating in the construction of bridges, because it has been done in the past and will be done in the future. What I object to is the fact that this is being done by a department which is not supposed to act in this way. What I object to is the fact that when we vote certain moneys to help a certain department they take those moneys and use them somewhere else.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I do not know, as I said, if this was done by the minister just to be in the Prime Minister's good graces or if it is a fact that the master ordered the serf to act accordingly. But one thing I do know is that if the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, had asked Mr. Lesage to build a bridge in the city of Quebec on the ground that it was the terminus of a road to the resources in Ungava, where there is iron ore, the present Prime Minister would have been the first one to protest against such action and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources would have protested because Mr. St. Laurent had so asked or ordered.

I want to know today why the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources had to go through this strategy to cover up something which should have been handled openly through the Department of Public Works. Nobody in Canada will believe that Prince Albert is the terminus for a resources road to Uranium City. I also want to know if this is a new way by which the government can show political favouritism in the riding of the Prime Minister, by taking money from a department from which it should not be taken and spending it there to please the electors of that one riding. I do not believe that the Prime Minister of this country should have special privileges. I think he should be the last to ask for special privileges, and if the minister adopted this strategy just to please the Prime Minister then in my opinion he has not measured up to the high responsibilities he has in the government.

The minister should be man enough to resist the demands of the Prime Minister if they are not according to the rules and practices of the house. I want the minister to explain to members of the house and to the people generally why he has had recourse to such a means in order to try to cover up political favouritism for the Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. McQuillan: Mr. Chairman, I could not quite understand the argument last night between the Leader of the Opposition and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources over permits, exploration leases and so on in the northern Arctic, because anyone who knows anything about the situation knows that the next great oil development could well be along the British Columbia coast. I have given a good deal of study to the program of the government for the development of the north. I think in most respects it is a very sound program. The development is pointed at the Mackenzie river valley which, as is well known, is probably the area of the north country with the most resources.

Sometimes I rather wish that a little more consideration with respect to development of resources would be given to the resources south of the 60th parallel. By far the greatest proportion of our undeveloped resources still lie south of the 60th parallel. I would be most happy if greater consideration could be given to the program of roads to resources in co-operation with the provinces. I have spoken before about what I think is a well merited roads to resources development in the northern section of Vancouver island, but I suppose because that is getting down toward the 49th parallel, and because it is along the coastal area, that project has not seemed to be considered worthy.

I was quite interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West with regard to the report on forestry made by the standing committee on mines, forests and waters. Having been a member of that committee, having attended most of the meetings, and having contributed somewhat to the preparation of the report, I was pleased that he approved of it. Of course that is only natural when you stop to realize that in the house he is considered to be the C.C.F. representative of the forest industries, and many people consider me as one who represents the British Columbia forest industry particularly. Therefore two capitalistic minds are bound to think the same.

I hope many of the recommendations in the report will be effected. I think they are sound recommendations. They are not new and have been made for years and years by most forestry and forest industry associations across Canada. By and large they are all very sound recommendations.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder whether I could ask the hon. member a question. This is most unusual, but is this British Columbia member admitting that places other than British Columbia have made some good suggestions with respect to forestry?

Mr. McQuillan: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Kootenay West was complaining last night about his colleague muttering about him being parochially minded. I certainly am not parochially minded with regard to the forest industry and the forest problems of Canada. One of the recommendations has to do with the forest access roads program in co-operation with the provinces, which has been very well received. The committee recommended that the program be extended from eight months to twelve months, with a lesser share contributed by the federal government toward labour costs in the summer months; 40 per cent, I believe, and 60 per cent in the winter months. One of the reasons for this recommendation is that in a great many parts of Canada, particularly British Columbia, it is almost impossible to build forest access roads in the winter. For that reason I heartily approve of that recommendation.

I should like to speak for a few minutes about the Columbia river. I have attempted in the past to get some figures from the department concerning the possible volume of timber that would have to be removed in the event that they proceed with the power development. I may be making a wild guess, but I know that country very well and in years gone by I have cruised timber there, and I would think there is perhaps somewhere in the neighbourhood of half a billion feet of timber in the area that may be flooded.

The point with which I am concerned is that this timber should not be removed without careful planning as to its disposal. The sudden dumping over a period of two or three years of hundreds of millions of feet of sawn lumber on the market, some of it of low grade, would have a disastrous effect on the lumber economy of British Columbia and Alberta as well. I trust that the Columbia river problem will soon be solved and we will be able to get ahead with this development.

I sometimes become a little concerned over the fact that we are not moving fast enough in British Columbia with the development of our power, and we may find in the years to come, if we fail to develop it early enough, that it has lost its value because of the progress in establishing thermal and nuclear plants which can be located in close proximity to markets and raw materials. By that time there may be a lessening in the differential between the cost of hydro power and other forms of energy. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that covers the remarks I wish to make at this moment. I have a few more remarks to make on the items.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, in the interests of saving time, I wonder whether I could ask the minister if he would like to reply at this time to the problem which has been raised by the hon. member for Hull in connection with the bridge, because if he did reply now he might save me from making a half hour speech.

Mr. Pickersgill: When the minister replies I wish he would reply also to this question. He could reply to both questions at once and that might save me from making a half hour speech as well on this subject. On May 8 the Prime Minister, in a speech at Montreal, had this to say:

> Another 86.5 million acres on the continental shelf in the Arctic islands are now being developed under exploratory permits.

I emphasize those words, "under exploratory permits". On May 11, three days later, in this house the minister said, at pages 3514 and 3515 of Hansard:

—we have not issued any exploratory permits, as this article states, with regard to the Arctic islands and the continental shelf.

One of those statements is manifestly not true, and I think the minister should tell us which one is not true.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I am glad in a way that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has raised the question as precisely as he has this morning, because if it is true that I am not telling the truth, as the Leader of the Opposition said last night several times—I will just read his remarks. I was asked about these exploratory permits and the permits that were awaiting servicing, and the Leader of the Opposition said, "Just tell the truth." Later on I went on to say that at no time did the Prime Minister ever make a false statement and the Leader of the Oppositon said, "Read his speech." The implication there is that he did. Later on the same page of Hansard I was pointing out to the Leader of the Opposition that the thing he did not like about the operation was that it was so successful, and his answer was, "Why don't you tell the truth?"

Now we have the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate coming here and putting it down precisely that on May 8 the Prime Minister, at Montreal, used the figure of 86.5 million acres. I assume he is not quarrelling over the 86.5, because the figures change from day to day.

Mr. Pickersgill: No; it is the phrase, "under exploratory permits".

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): He therefore wants me to explain "under exploratory permits".

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not want you to explain it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I was the one who provided that information to the Prime Minister, because under these applications for exploratory permits work is being done. If you want to lay the blame on my shoulders for having put it forward in that way, I can only say that it was made quite clear in the house last night that work is being done under these applications for exploratory permits just the same as if the exploratory permits had been granted.

We have not the regulations ready for final approval by council; at least they are ready, but council is studying them now. If you want to quibble over that you can make me out to be in error. The Prime Minister said "taken out", and there is development going on under these applications for exploratory permits.

As to the other statement I made in the house, at page 3514 of Hansard, I may say, as I made clear last night, that when you ask for precise terms there are actually no permits granted. An application for a permit has been received, priority has been established, and in the meantime for those companies which want it there are exploratory licences for them to go ahead. I made it clear last night that there are 10 or 12 companies actually doing preliminary work just the same as if they had exploratory permits. If the regulations are approved by council in the next week or so and the companies pick up their permits, as I am quite positive they will, there has been no time lost and we have been able to gain this year in exploration.

I am very unhappy that the opposition is trying to make a point of quibbling over phrases, but if you want to go out and say the minister was not too precise in using these phrases, then I am guilty. However, to say that I have not told the truth is going a little far, and I hope the hon. member will admit that.

Mr. Pickersgill: On that point, I did not say the minister had not told the truth. I did not say the Prime Minister had not told the truth. I said that one of those statements was manifestly untrue, and it is untrue. May I read them again. The Prime Minister said there were 86.5 million acres being developed under exploratory permits, not under applications but under exploratory permits. Then, three days later in this house, the minister says we have not issued any exploratory permits. It is not quibbling. One of those statements is a direct contradiction of the other. If the minister had had the advantage, like some of his colleagues on the treasury benches of sitting over here, he would have seen a great deal more made of a great deal less than this contradiction by the opposition to which his leader belonged, and by no one more than by the Prime Minister himself.

Now, I say this statement by the Prime Minister, which the minister has admitted is not correct, was certainly misleading to the public. The Prime Minister at that meeting in Montreal was trying to blow things up. I shall tell you something else he said at that meeting, since the subject has come up, which shows what a modest fellow the Prime Minister is. Here is what he said:

I have no hesitation in saying at this time that I believe that the government has accomplished more in those two years than any other government at any time in our history.

That is the modest claim the Prime Minister made at the Montreal meeting. That is one of the alleged facts that he produced to prove that. Then the minister three days later says there were no exploratory permits whatever.

Mr. Morton: Work was still being done.

Mr. Hardie: Work was not being done.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is another matter entirely. The Prime Minister has the responsibility to the public to inform the public accurately, carefully and precisely. No one was more assiduous than was the Prime Minister in trying to check up even the slightest deviation from technical accuracy on the part of his predecessors. He cannot expect and he is not entitled to any other treatment. Prime ministers even more than ministers should be careful of what they say and be sure that what they say is at all times accurate. This statement is inaccurate. It is preposterous. Imagine the Prime Minister saying in this modest fashion:

> I have no hesitation in saying at this time that I believe that the government has accomplished more in those two years than any other government at any time in our history.

An hon. Member: That is accurate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes; that is accurate. It is true that he obtained more seats than any other government in history. It is true that he has a higher deficit than any other government has had in our peacetime history. It is true that he has spent more money than was ever spent before in our peace time history and—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: —it is true that he has more people on the government payroll than ever before in our history.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member will take his seat when the Chair calls order. I also hope the hon. member will come back to the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall stay completely within the ambit of the opening speech of the hon. gentleman whose estimates are before us. He started out with wheat—I do not know whether Your Honour was in the chair at the time—and ended up with external affairs in the first paragraph. I do not intend to go beyond those two limits. I should just like to remind Your Honour that the minister's speech was about all aspects of national development. He praised the Department of Transport. He dealt with all sorts of other subjects. Surely we in the opposition are going to be given on the estimates the same freedom that the minister was given.

I just want to say one thing about this extraordinary statement which the Prime Minister was trying to bolster up with these phony statistics. I will just say this—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I want a complete withdrawal of those words "phony statistics".

Mr. Pickersgill: I believe I have the floor.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have the floor on a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: The minister is speaking to a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: All right.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I must insist that the hon. member withdraw those words "phony statistics" and in all fairness I think that he should apologize to the committee for following the example of his leader last night by making this flat statement that I was not telling the truth.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I speak on the point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. gentleman has asked for the withdrawal of the words "phony statistics". I would remind you that a similar request was made from this side of the chamber by myself, and it was decided that the word "phony" was not unparliamentary. I would suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the rule that was applied on that occasion must apply now.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I was in the house when that ruling was made, and of course I think that ruling will carry on at this time. I will ask the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to continue.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have only one sentence to utter on this statement; then I am coming back to the other point. I want to say that the Prime Minister who made this modest claim is the successor of a prime minister who in the first six months he was in office took this country into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and completed confederation with the union with Newfoundland. Then this government come along and say they have done more than any government in the history of this country; more than Macdonald, more than Borden. I am not surprised that he asserts he has done more than Bennett. But this is the kind of thing the Prime Minister goes about this country saying, and he bolsters it up with the statement that 86.5 million acres are under exploratory permits. Then the minister comes into the house and says, "We have not issued any exploratory permits".

Mr. Dumas: The minister should resign.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It is very difficult in the circumstances under which I am operating to decide what I should say. I know what the hon. gentleman thinks I should say.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If you want to get your estimates through, if I were you I would say nothing.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I want to make it clear that I think we all appreciate that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has to put on quite a show to make up for the fact that his own leader made such a tragic blunder in this house a few months ago in misinforming the public over some very statistics that I put on the record. This whole dialectical demonstration by the Leader of the Opposition last night and by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is as phoney as anything can be.

Mr. Habel: As you are.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Any person of reason will accept my word that I provided the figure that he quoted from the Prime Minister's speech in Montreal. Whether it is an application for a permit which is waiting to be processed or whether it is a permit that has been processed, as far as the public are concerned they want to know only one thing and it is this. Is the development being done? I said yesterday, I thought very reasonably, that we had a right to take some pride in the fact that this area of the northern islands, where nothing had been done, had suddenly come to life in the last year or so. I think a political party has the right to take credit occasionally. This makes hon. members opposite angry because they have been brought up not with the theory of history that believes there is a right and a wrong, and not the theory of history that there is a scientific interpretation, or that God enters into this also. They have been brought up on the interpretation of the Sifton press that what is Liberal is blessed and that all those things that are not Liberal are the opposite.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is fairly close to the truth.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I can understand why that is so, particularly with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. He has done a fairly creditable job of making this a great big issue, but I think the people, as they see the development of the country going ahead, will measure this country in their own way. All these storms raised in the house are not for the purpose of getting information but rather are for the purpose of making up for what they felt were the stings and arrows of events long since past. I am only here trying to present my estimates and I will answer any questions that hon. members put forward. But if there is going to be any blame attached in relation to this figure of 89.5 million—

Mr. Pickersgill: It is 86.5 million.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —or 86.5 million; it changes from day to day—and with the words "application for permit", whether "application" or "permit" is in order, put the blame on me where it belongs and not on anybody else.

Mr. Hardie: I do not think that was actually the point of the hon. member's question. The question was as to which of these two statements was right. I will read the statement of the Prime Minister on May 8:

> Another 86.5 million acres on the continental shelf and the Arctic islands are now being developed—

I think those are the important words in that statement. Last night the minister pointed out to the committee that 10—he now says, 10—out of over 30 applicants or people who have applied for permits in the Arctic islands are now doing active work. That was yesterday. Since the Prime Minister made that statement we are told in the committee on mines, forests and waters when considering the minister's estimates that no development work had been done up until, as I recall it, the end of the first week in June.

I think at that time the minister said this development work, or at least the beginning of it, was based on the approval by cabinet of new regulations for Arctic oil development. He said at that time, in the first week of June, that these regulations were before the cabinet for approval. I have continually asked him week after week, and yesterday I asked him, if these regulations had been approved, and the answer yesterday was "No".

As I said when I first stood up, the important point is that the Prime Minister has said that the Arctic islands are now being developed. Yesterday the minister said that 10 of the permittees who have some of this acreage are engaged in active development. This statement was made on May 11, and in June the minister said nothing was being done at that time, that things had to be held up until after the regulations were passed.

I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is quite justified in asking if this statement by the Prime Minister on May 8 was right, or whether the statement of the minister a few days later was right. From the evidence we heard in the committee on mines, forests and waters I would say that the minister's statement of May 11 was right and not the Prime Minister's statement of May 8.

Mr. Regier: Is the minister ready to make an announcement?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes. There has been a lot of excitement over the bridge, and I would like to point out that in the roads to resources program we have bridges in agreements with several provinces. In the first instance, under the roads to resources program there are bridges in New Brunswick and several in Newfoundland. I am not too sure about some of the other agreements, because they are not all here. There are bridges in Ontario, and also as part of the over-all agreement there is a special agreement to do a geological survey, which is an electromagnetic survey of the area, before we finally decide on the route of the road. Therefore in the roads to resources program the first point is that there are bridges and a special agreement on the geological survey. The bridge which is part of the agreement is not part of the issue.

The second suggestion made is that the bridge should be part of the public works program rather than part of the roads to resources program. We probably look on this a little differently from the way the hon. member for Hull does, because for years it has been the subject of great complaint in Saskatchewan that there is no way of getting across from the north side of the river to the south side of the river, and the geography at the present time forces you to come across the river at one of two places in that part of the province, namely at Prince Albert or at Nipawin. One of these roads, the Hanson lake road it is called, runs from a place near Flin Flon and works down between Nipawin and Prince Albert. The Uranium City road curves round through Uranium City right through one part of the province to Lac la Ronge, the final part of the route extending down to the city of Prince Albert.

We have maintained over the years in Saskatchewan—not just the Prime Minister, the people of Prince Albert but the province —that this bottleneck had to be eliminated, and for years there was quarrelling between the city and the province over who would build the road. One argued that it was outside the city and should be built as a highway, and the other argued that it was within the city and should be built by the city. But the whole thing was slowing down the development of the northern part of the province, and if we did not build this bridge there would always be this bottleneck.

I might say that this is not a new precedent. I believe when Mr. Mackenzie King was the prime minister of Canada and representing the people of Prince Albert he saw that a bridge was built south of there to make the Prince Albert national park more accessible to people from the south. That was a long way from the park, I would say the same kind of distance, but the people of that day were glad to get that help to funnel their trade and tourist traffic into the north, and they will be equally glad to get this help at this time.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I feel that the minister has completely evaded the contention made in this committee on this matter. I first raised the matter when I spoke in the debate on the speech from the throne, and I am very pleased at the able manner in which the hon. member for Hull has presented his argument. Yet the minister completely evades the argument and offers no reply whatsoever.

The minister says there is a little excitement about this bridge. Naturally there is a little excitement about this bridge, because we need more bridges all over the Dominion of Canada and all communities are very excited about the federal government having announced, in effect, a new cost sharing program in the matter of building bridges. We are certainly anticipating that when we want to build a bridge across the Fraser river, or when we want to build a bridge across the Pitt river, or any other river in British Columbia, or when the people in Montreal need a new bridge, or the people in Ottawa, they can now expect the federal government to share the cost of that bridge.

The federal government has departed here from the old attitude toward cost sharing in the matter of bridges. The federal government hitherto would share the cost of the bridge if it was part of the trans-Canada highway. The federal government used to share part of the cost of a bridge if it was used over a river that separated two provinces. The federal government would share the cost of a bridge over navigable waters. However, any community bridge has had to be paid for, hitherto, either by the provincial or municipal governments or by the two of them together.

The minister rather surprised us, or I should say the Minister of Public Works rather surprised us, when some months ago in this house he first indicated that the bridge at Prince Albert came under the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. We found it a little hard to believe our ears at the time. However, the minister said he had explained all this to the committee. He had explained to the committee last year how this bridge at Prince Albert happened to be a part of the roads to resources program.

As the minister's department knows by now, the minister did not explain to the committee how the bridge at Prince Albert was a part of the roads to resources program. We are hoping that the minister will now explain how a bridge 150 miles removed from the highway is a part of that highway. If that bridge is a part of the highway, what about all the other bridges south of Prince Albert down to the United States border? Cannot they also be said to be part of that highway?

We have need of a lot of bridges over the Fraser river, all of which would lead to some natural resource. There is hardly a bridge in Canada that does not lead to a natural resource, and the existence of which aids in the development of that resource. We are very happy that the people of Prince Albert are getting a new bridge. We hope this is the beginning of a new policy on the part of the federal government, and that henceforth any major community which is in need of a new bridge can apply to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and argue that it is within 150 miles or within 1,000 miles of a road he is already helping to build, and therefore the minister will agree to share the cost of building the bridge. We are very happy that the people of Saskatchewan are to be blessed with a new bridge. However, we do insist on an explanation as to how this bridge is part of a road the beginning of which is 150 miles away from the bridge. And how is it that the cost of this bridge is shared by the federal government through the agency of the department over which the minister presides rather than the Department of Public Works, which ordinarily is the department seized with the responsibility for matters of this kind?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall this item carry?

Mr. Regier: No, Mr. Chairman. I hope the minister will answer the reasonable request of the hon. member for Hull and tell us how this bridge is part of that road.

Mr. Martel: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Regier: Yes, but I am not the minister. I assume the minister has these answers.

Mr. Martel: Was that bridge in Saskatchewan not built by the Saskatchewan government under the roads to resources agreement signed at Ottawa?

Mr. Regier: That may be so. What we want to know is whether the corporation of the district of Burnaby or the government of the province of Quebec or the government of Prince Edward Island or any other provincial or municipal government now has an invitation to go to the minister if it needs a bridge, and the minister will say "Let us see; there is a road somewhere in that area, within hundreds of miles of the proposed bridge. Therefore I am able to share the cost of building that bridge with you." If that is the new policy I welcome it, and I think the whole committee would welcome it. However, let us not have a situation where only one community in Canada, which happens to have particular representation in this House of Commons, is able to obtain a bridge which, so far as we can see, has nothing whatever to do with the roads to resources program while other communities in Canada are to be denied equal treatment.

Mr. Henderson: Would you want us to dictate to the provincial governments where they should use the money provided for this roads to resources program by the federal government?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think I must tell the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that the answer to his question is yes; if a provincial government suggests to us that a bridge would play a vital part in the development of our resources I am certainly going to consider it. This proposal for a bridge at Prince Albert was not made by the federal government. It was made by a committee composed of several members of the Saskatchewan government, including also the mayor of Prince Albert, which argued that this was a very necessary part of clearing away this bottleneck into the northern part of Saskatchewan. We accepted that argument. It also happened to be near a road to a national park which, I think, was the earlier reason given.

With regard to the other matter which was raised, the government of New Brunswick asked us to bridge a gap at Fundy park which is not connected with another road—there is a gap of 20 miles—and we said, "Yes; it opens up facilities to tourists, and we accept it". So if a province wants to prove to us that the construction of a bridge is part of a resource development, we shall look into it.

Mr. Pickersgill: On that very point, the hon. member for Hull brought out very well yesterday that one of the most badly needed bridges anywhere in this country is right in sight of this very building, and not only is it near a national park but it is near a unique national park, one which was established in part as a memorial to those who died in the second world war.

Mr. Henderson: What happened when this government was in power for so long?

An hon. Member: Same old story.

Mr. Henderson: No, it is not the same old story. I am telling you, you can look right out here and see the bridge—

Mr. Pickersgill: Why not stand up and make your speech?

Mr. Henderson: All I can say is I have stood here all the spring listening to a windbag like this talk and not know what it is all about.

Mr. Pickersgill: I listened, as I always do, to the hon. member for Cariboo, and there is no hon. member of the house for whom I have greater esteem. I do not take the slightest exception to what he has said, but I think I ought to reply to his argument, since I think it is a serious argument. He asked why we did not do anything about this bridge when we were in power. Well, we did not build a bridge at Prince Albert, either, because we did not have a roads to resources—

Mr. Henderson: I will tell you this—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would you like to make your speech now?

Mr. Henderson: Go right ahead. You would talk, anyway.

Mr. Pickersgill: We did not have the kind of roads to resources program which the minister has before the committee now, because when we were in office we had full employment and did not have to think up schemes to keep the people of this country working. But since the minister has said he is building bridges anywhere within 150 miles of a national park to improve access to that park and other resources, here is a bridge which is within 10 miles of a national park and which is very badly needed, also, for the proper functioning of the government of Canada itself. It might be that if we had a good bridge across the Ottawa river, government employees could get to work at a reasonable time and not be delayed day after day. It might be we should not need to have as many civil servants and we could pay those we have better, as they should be paid. There are a variety of reasons.

I suggest that if this is to be the policy there is no place where it could be better applied than right here, and it might well be that if the minister would take the problem over from the national capital commission, which does not appear to be making much progress, under his roads to resources program, with his extraordinary capacity for persuading people he could see the premier of Quebec and the premier of Ontario and say "We will give you half the cost of this bridge", we might be a little nearer to getting the bridge. It seems to me that the hon. member for Hull made an unanswerable case for equal treatment with regard to that bridge, when he spoke in the discussion.

Mr. Regier: All I want to do is express the great pleasure of this group at the new policy which the minister has announced. If I understood the minister correctly, any municipality or province that needs a bridge—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Province.

Mr. Regier: Any province—I am sorry—the building of which would help to develop the national resources of Canada, then a request for aid from the federal government would receive very sympathetic consideration. I can assure the minister that our minister of highways in the province of British Columbia will not wait many hours before he will have a few proposals to make to the minister.

Mr. Henderson: A point of order. You are doing a lot of talking about the minister of roads in British Columbia. That government has been trying, and sending out Mr. Gagliardi here, and he comes down here with a story and never does anything; just the same as you, chock full of b.s.

Mr. Regier: I regret that the hon. member for Cariboo is not as happy as I am about the new policy the minister has announced; because that new policy, if the minister really meant what he said and he will implement his answer and have some consideration given to these proposals, will mean more for our province than anything which a federal government has done for British Columbia for many a long year. We badly need several new bridges across the Fraser river, several new bridges across Burrard inlet, all of which would aid tremendously in the opening up of the resources of our province. I can assure the minister that not much time will pass before he will be asked to implement his words.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question. In view of the fact that the premier who is provincial treasurer of his province is going to wipe out the remains of the debt of that province; in view of the fact that they have a huge surplus and that the federal government is virtually bankrupt, does he think it is reasonable for the government of British Columbia to make those demands on this government?

Mr. Regier: In answer to that question may I say that if the people of the province from which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate comes had the same faith in a high standard of living and in decent wages, then his province might also be in a satisfactory financial position.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before the minister replies, may I ask him a question. Will he give consideration to the appointment of the member for Cariboo as his parliamentary assistant?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): All I am going to say to the hon. member for Essex East is, beware of caribou; they have sharp horns.

I think the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam kind of worked up a head of steam. I hope no one in the press gallery is going to take his word for that and say they are going to have all sorts of bridges in British Columbia, for the very simple reason that British Columbia signed the agreement and, like any province, will have to work under the terms of the agreement, which are a maximum of $15 million and in any one year a maximum of $1,500,000. If he wants to go back and say that this program is available under those terms, he should also tell the people of the province that British Columbia signed an agreement. Other provinces have agreed with us and with the program as indicated which provides for bridges already in their programs, and that is about as far as we can go at this time.

Mr. Caron: At the same time that the money was spent for the bridge in Prince Albert was any money being spent on roads to resources in other provinces over the $1,500,000?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, I think that is true because there are those under the special agreements—the same as the city and the province—the same as the special agreement we have in Ontario on the electronic, magnetic and ground surveys.

Mr. Caron: Any other province that entered into a special agreement would receive like treatment?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If they came within the terms of the agreement and the ceiling of the agreement, yes.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, there are one or two comments I would like to make about the roads to resources program. After listening to the minister's opening, sort of free-wheeling, all-embracing remarks, and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who covered a wide range of subjects, perhaps we should classify the minister as the "minister of everything". He has certainly the fullest scope of matters under his jurisdiction, apparently.

[Mr. Regier.]

I should like to make a comment or two, if I may, on the roads to resources program and the road which is being built in British Columbia, which is generally classified as the Stewart-Cassiar road. First, even though the contract has been signed with British Columbia on a 50-50 basis, I am sure this will also be the basis of the financial arrangement which will be entered into with the other provinces. It does not appear to me that the policies advocated or put into effect by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources are in keeping with the policies of the government itself, because there is another department that participates with the provinces in the building of roads, namely the Department of Public Works.

I am thinking now of the trans-Canada highway arrangement under the Department of Public Works. Some time ago this department saw fit to make financial arrangements with provinces beyond the 50-50 program, and agreed to participate to the extent of 90 per cent of the cost of 10 per cent of the highway being built in a province. It would certainly seem to be sensible and in keeping with governmental policy for the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources to adopt the same attitude, the same sort of approach when it begins suggesting that contracts be drawn up with the provinces with regard to the roads to resources program. If it is sensible to pay 90 per cent of the cost of 10 per cent of the trans-Canada highway in each province, then it is equally sensible to pay 90 per cent of the cost of the so-called roads to resources program in which the government is also participating. I think this is something the minister should keep in mind; it is something that he should advocate to his colleagues in an attempt to have government policy, in so far as participation in road-building programs is concerned, at least uniform.

I certainly hope the situation which existed on the Stewart-Cassiar road and which was fostered by a number of people out there will not occur in the other provinces, because it has meant quite a set-back in the progress that could have been made on the building of that particular road. As the minister will know, there was quite a bit of conflict of opinion as to just where the southern terminus of that road would be. Would it start around Alice Arm, or Terrace, or Hazelton, or some other place along the line? In those communities there was conflict as to just where the southern terminus would be.

Unfortunately this controversy about the southern terminus came at the time of an election campaign, and as a result every political party and every candidate got into the controversy and suggested that the southern terminus for the road should be here, there and so on. All that the controversy did was to delay the actual program of construction of the southern end of the road. For instance —I am not imputing these words to the minister—I was told this and the story was quite widespread in Alice Arm. I was told by a person from there, who during the election campaign had been visiting relatives in Saskatchewan, that he had met the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and told him that he came from Alice Arm and that this place was one of the sites being considered for the southern terminus of the road. He spread the story that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources absolutely guaranteed to him that Alice Arm would be the southern terminus of the road that is being built up there.

This was an unfortunate incident. Whether the minister said that is beyond my knowledge. I am sure that when I finish the minister will take the opportunity to indicate whether he did or did not say that, or whether he recollects saying it, but the fact is that the story was spread pretty far and wide, in Alice Arm particularly and in other communities out there, and all it did was help to stir up more animosity among the communities as to which was going to be the southern terminus.

Unfortunately it had a bad effect not only in that way, but it had a bad effect on one of the communities in so far as its economic position was concerned, namely the village of Stewart, which is now to be the southern terminus of the road. The people of the village of Stewart had a pretty rough time last winter and the winter before because this government and the provincial government could not make up their minds as to where the southern terminus of the road was going to be. They would not make up their minds because an election campaign was in the offing, and if they made up their minds they might alienate some support in the village of Stewart and in one or two of the other communities.

I should like to pose some questions with respect to this roads to resources program. The minister says that British Columbia is the only province which has signed a contract on the basis of 50-50 financial participation. Other provinces have not yet signed agreements. It was our understanding originally that the contracts would be identical and there would not be differing provisions in the case of one province with respect to the arrangements with the federal government. It was our understanding that the contracts would be uniform. I should like the minister to indicate what the differences are and what is the reason for the delay in signing contracts with other provinces.

The $15 million is to be split equally between the province of British Columbia and the federal government, with each contributing $1,500,000 a year for a period of five years. In so far as the Stewart-Cassiar road is concerned, the rough estimates of people who have lived in the region for many years and of engineers who have surveyed the road indicates that the cost will be closer to $20 million than $15 million. This is common knowledge, and has been ever since this program started and ever since the provincial government participated, through its department of mines, in building a section of the road near Cassiar many years before the federal or provincial governments started to think in terms of a roads to resources program.

I should like an indication from the minister of what will happen if the contractual obligation of the federal government to pay half of $15 million will not fully meet the cost of completing the road. What will happen then? Will additional provision be made in order to complete the road?

We have heard quite a bit of discussion about oil and gas leases and the development of industry in the Arctic, the Northwest Territories and on the continental shelf. I am sure the minister has this in mind, but I hope he will keep in mind and carry out this general philosophy when it comes to entering into agreements to develop resources in the northern part of Canada. The history of industrial development and expansion throughout Canada has not been good. There are many cases on record where governments, provincial and federal, in past years entered into a fire sale of our natural resources in their haste to get some sort of development program under way. The Canadian Pacific Railway is a case in point, where acres and acres of land were given away. Forest management licences in British Columbia are another case in point. The proposed Wenner-Gren program would be nothing but another fire sale of our natural resources to outside private interests.

This is one thing the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources should guard against in his dealings with industrial people, particularly foreign and international concerns. He had better guard against entering into any sort of give-away program which will tie our children and our children's children to a contract which they cannot change in later years when some of them become members of parliament.

The minister has been referred to as a visionary. Of course I would classify him in the same way as the hon. member for Mackenzie River did the other day, when he quoted the dictionary definition of a visionary. The minister may be as dedicated and sincere as a person can be with respect to the development of our resources in the north. I do not question his sincerity, integrity or honesty in that regard but he should realize that neither he nor anyone else is infallible. We have no crystal ball in which we can see 30, 40 or 50 years ahead and determine whether what we do today will be acceptable and beneficial 50 years from now.

Experience has shown that past governments were not right in binding future generations to accept the give-away contracts into which they entered. We have found by sad experience in later years that previous governments were not so farsighted as they thought they were. We are now realizing the errors made by previous governments in attempting to have our natural resources developed and the production therefrom and the distribution of that production carried out in such a way as to be most beneficial to Canada and the citizens of other nations of the world. The minister must guard against that more than any other single thing. Do not be in any obscene haste, shall I say, to develop our natural resources. Do not give them away under conditions that bind the hands of the people of future generations, who may decide that the minister was not so clever after all, so that they will not be able to do anything about it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I should like to thank the hon. member for Skeena for being kind enough to verify my honesty and integrity. I appreciate it very much after what has been happening in the last couple of days.

Mr. Howard: I was not talking about statistical things.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Well, you are either on one side of the fence or the other.

Mr. Howard: Oh, no.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): As far as the contracts with the provinces are concerned, we make a different arrangement with each province in order to fit the needs of that particular province. The province suggests the roads and we see that they meet our criteria. But with respect to all the legal provisions the agreements are identical. They follow the type of contract used in the case of the trans-Canada highway.

One new factor has come into the picture since last year which has affected the identical nature of the agreements with the provinces. That is the factor of time. The original proposal put forward by the federal government was that there would be a five-year limit, and this was one of the causes for delay in getting agreements signed last fall. One of the provinces—Saskatchewan, as a matter of fact—took exception to the way the time payment clause would work out in effect. They asked for an extension of time. We asked the other provinces what they thought about it, and the final result was that we took out the five-year mandatory provision. You will find now that the new agreements run from five years to as high as eleven years, whatever is mutually agreeable between ourselves and the province.

The key clause to remember is that the maximum financial commitment by the federal government, agreed to earlier, is 50 per cent of $15 million over the period of time. With regard to the agreement with British Columbia, the provision of a maximum of $15 million is identical with the term that will be in the agreements with other provinces. If the estimate proves correct and the cost of the program is $20 million, then under the agreement the province has covenanted to complete the road, but there is no federal commitment to spend more than 50 per cent of $15 million during the life of the agreement.

With respect to the resources outside of the provinces, over which we have control, I can assure all hon. members that no person more than myself will seek every avenue to see that as much as possible these resources remain in the hands of Canadians or Canadian companies. I am not narrow in this matter at all. I welcome the setting up in Canada of subsidiaries of outside companies. I am very happy to welcome the interest of British, French, Swiss and Dutch capital at this time in our oil and gas resources.

I can assure the hon. member that I agree with him fully when he says that those in charge of resources have a great responsibility to remember that we hold these things in trust for future generations, and not to make commitments whereby we give away rights to our forests and mines for more than a reasonable period of time, and also to see that the terms of any agreement provide for renegotiation. I should not have used the word "mines" because there is a little different philosophy accepted in that regard. In so far as renewable resources are concerned, and even some that are not renewable, more and more we are thinking in terms of short term leases like 21 or 33 years than we are in terms of the perpetuity leases and these long leases of 200 or 300 years that used to be given occasionally.

Mr. Peters: We are very pleased to find that this particular department has grown rapidly over the past two years and that it is now engaged, in co-operation with the provinces, in many fields which were previously provincial in nature. We feel that this could be a good thing; and if the program the minister has outlined is accepted by the provinces, then a great deal of good can accrue from the work of this department.

These facts, Mr. Chairman, make this department one of the most important in the government and make this one of the most extensive departments, and the responsibilities of the minister have grown since he took office. This will all be to the good, provided it is used in an advantageous manner.

I was very interested yesterday in listening to the remarks made by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. One of the problems he mentioned was the tourist industry, and in recent years we have heard of some of the problems connected with that particular industry. A few years ago in northern Ontario we used to receive a great number of tourists from the United States, but the number has been dwindling in recent years. I think there are several reasons for this, and some of the most important ones were pointed out by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. These include the establishment of new and modern tourist camps, and making money available to tourist operators so they can bring the accommodation they offer up to the standard the people from the United States desire.

There was another point raised in the committee, I understand, by the hon. member for Calgary South. This related to the fact that for a number of years we in Canada have concentrated in our advertising on the fact that we are a wild, rough, frontier country; that the people from the United States should come over to Canada and rough it. I do not believe the United States tourists want to come to Canada to rough it. I do not want to rough it, as we are told to do in the various tourist pamphlets. We have become accustomed to certain standards of accommodation, and I do not think we want to be told that the Indians are running around in their native habitat and we are going to spend a couple of weeks with them and this will be fun.

I do not believe that is what really happens, but I think it is the impression that many United States tourists are given. As the hon. member for Calgary South said, we should impress upon them that we are a civilized country; that we do have shows and the things to which the United States tourists have become accustomed. Then the United States tourist would come into this country knowing full well that his wife would be able to get the accommodation and facilities that she wants.

At the same time, these United States tourists will continue to push further into the hinterland, where conditions are not as good as they could be, and this will bring more money into those areas and give the tourist operators an opportunity of improving the standard of accommodation they offer. Then the United States tourists will be quite pleased with their visits to Canada and will continue to push farther into the undeveloped areas, thus enjoying many of the things those areas have to offer.

I should like to mention, as an example, that conditions around Moosonee were relatively primitive until a few years ago. Tourist operators there have improved their facilities and are bringing in United States citizens by the thousands for duck hunting and fishing. Once these people come for a specialized reason, they will come back after they find that Canada is not a bad place. I would encourage the minister to ask his people to continue to press for the establishment of standards that the government could recommend for use in these brochures that are sent into the United States. Nothing is more disheartening than to go into a tourist camp which you may think is rated No. 1 or No. 2 and find that with regard to cleanliness and food it is not even up to the most elementary standards.

I should like to say a word now on the progress the minister is making in connection with these roads to resources. I find it difficult to understand why Premier Frost of Ontario, who has been talking about northern development for some time, has not negotiated a program for building a resource road from Kapuskasing to Moosonee, and one from the town of Cochrane to Moosonee. Both these roads would open up large timber and mining areas. If these projects were undertaken next winter they would alleviate a great deal of the serious unemployment that has been prevalent in that area. With the developments that are taking place there, power will be available, and I would suggest to the minister that he ask for the co-operation of Premier Frost in developing resource roads in that part of Canada.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Peters: Before lunch, Mr. Chairman, I was suggesting how this department had been extended and how the work of the department had increased. This gives me some hope that in northern Ontario we shall see something of the natural resources development that we know can and must take place and the follow up, which will be the secondary industry which will follow the development of our natural resources. To do this I would believe that we are going to have to have a focal point on the shores of James bay, the town now commonly known as Moosonee. The provincial government has been very much interested in this project. I know the minister is interested in it. It was discussed widely during the last election. The Conservative party during the last election, and in particular the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, made several references to a railway from the town of Churchill, Manitoba to Moose Factory and that this would provide, as the press release points out, a rail link between the two settlements, each of which is connected now by rail with the outside and to open a large portion of the coast of Hudson bay to exploration and development.

The minister also pointed out that they were willing to spend $36 million to start a survey for the planned railway extension and Ottawa would probably pay the whole shot. It went on to say what this will mean to the economy of the country. Over a number of years the Ontario Northland railway which runs a line from North Bay to the port of Moosonee has been very much interested in this matter. After conducting a number of surveys into that field they have ascertained the cost necessary to develop a deep sea port. They have done considerable work on it. On a number of occasions the premier of the province has indicated his willingness to spend upwards of $5 million on this port. I would suggest that the minister of northern affairs, if he believes in the development of the north, can find no better focal point than the port of Moosonee which will open up all of the Hudson bay area to further development. Much of this development has been curtailed for the simple reason that there is no port at the railhead at Moosonee and ships of any size are unable at the present time to come into the port. This is a sea port on salt water. It has a five-foot or six-foot tide and would open up to Ontario a second route competing only with the St. Lawrence seaway as a route to Europe and the markets of that area.

Mr. Frost, when asked about this matter, is reported in the Ottawa Journal of Friday, January 16, 1959—the heading is "Frost 'Expects' Federal Government to Build Moosonee Harbour"—as follows:

> Premier Frost has indicated he expects the federal government to build the harbour at Moosonee planned by the Ontario government.

[Mr. Peters.]

He goes on to point out that the jurisdiction falls within the scope of the federal government. A great deal of work has been done in this particular field. There are a number of reasons that would make this a centre of attraction for a development port in that particular area. A great deal has been said about it politically, economically and otherwise in the last twenty or thirty years. The day is coming closer and closer where some of the objects and the need for attention in that particular area become more and more important.

Mr. Chairman, we should just like to point to the development that took place on the mid-Canada line. The great amount of material that was sent into that line came through the port at Moosonee. Many difficulties were encountered because of the fact that this was not a deep port, a port sufficient to handle boats having a draft that would be necessary to carry the freight they have in that area. But continually during the summer small boats ply that area carrying fuel, food and all the necessary equipment for the maintenance of that line. I think it is quite clear that if this port had been in effect in the days when they started to build the D.E.W. line the expense of transportation involved in the building of that line would have been much less.

The Moosonee area on the Moose river near the south-western tip of James bay has been a port for small ships since 1673 when the Hudson's Bay Company established Moose Fort as a trading post. It was customary in the early days for these ships, which though small were of considerable draught, to lie at anchor near the mouth of the river at what was known as Ship Hole. Cargoes were lightered from that point to the fort about fourteen miles up stream. With the extension of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway to Moosonee fourteen miles from the mouth of the river, the Hudson's Bay Company ships, all of small tonnage, loaded and discharged cargo at the railhead. In 1956 ships of much greater tonnage and up to nine feet in draught took on cargo at Moosonee. Depending entirely on its natural advantages, Moosonee has become a practicable rail to ship transfer point. With port facilities and remedial works it could become an ocean port of prime importance.

Interest in Moosonee as a port is aroused at this time because of the very extensive deposits of iron ore which during the last few years have been outlined and evaluated on the Belcher islands and inland a distance of 37 miles from Great Whale on the southwest coast of Hudson bay. These deposits are now definitely known to contain hundreds of millions of tons of good concentrating ore ranging from 35 per cent to 45 per cent iron. While the Belchers have no source of power and would have to depend on imported fuel, the iron deposits in the Great Whale area have three potential sources of hydro-electric power within a radius of 22 miles. Neither location will present any great difficulty in establishing proper port facilities and Great Whale has a naturally well-protected harbour.

The advantages of a route through Moosonee for shipments to and from either of these points must be apparent to anyone at all familiar with James and Hudson bays. At best the northern route through Hudson strait is restricted to a three-month navigation period. It has been proposed, in connection with the shipment of ore from the Belchers, that this short period might best be utilized by establishing stock piles of ore at some ice-free winter port, possibly in Greenland. While this may be feasible, it does involve the expense of two extra handlings of the ore as well as very extensive docks and ore handling facilities at the chosen port.

A route to the south through Moosonee, on the other hand, would normally be open to shipping for a period of five months and under much less hazardous conditions than on the northern route. Stockpiling, if desirable, to extend deliveries to destinations over the entire year, could readily be effected at Moosonee and without the expense of building docks for this sole purpose. If this Canadian ore is to be shipped abroad to be smelted and manufactured for the benefit of a foreign country, there is little point in presenting the advantages of the southern route. If, however, the prevailing official and national opinion that Canadian ores should be processed for the benefit of Canada is to prevail, there is every argument in favour of the southern route.

Mining operations in remote areas can progress only if given transportation facilities which ensure prompt deliveries during the navigation season. Such deliveries could be made through Moosonee and by no other route. A return trip from Moosonee to the Belchers or to Great Whale could be made, with cargo in each direction, within a week or ten days. From Montreal by the all-water route two round trips during the navigation season are all that could be reasonably expected. It might further be pointed out that perishable foodstuffs, greatly to be desired in northern latitudes could readily be transported over the Moosonee route, whereas the all-water route would make this difficult and extremely expensive.

While the Moosonee route has the obvious advantages of a longer navigation season and is time saving, it also presents unique opportunity for additional savings. With hydro-electric power available from existing and potential sites on the Abitibi river, conversion of low grade iron ores to concentrates of 65 per cent iron content could readily be carried out. By using the natural gas which will be available in northern Ontario this year this process might be carried a step further, by a recently perfected process, to the production of pig iron directly from the ore. Such an advance would materially reduce the carrying charges over the railway portion of the route and at the same time establish a highly desirable industry with its consequential all-year round employment in northern Ontario.

It may be suggested that once the traffic in iron ore has been established the route would be of considerable advantage to the promotion of the development of other mineral deposits in northern areas. It would prove a direct incentive for intensive prospecting and development over a wide area with enduring possibilities. It could also be—

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that if the hon. member obtained unanimous consent of the house he could file this statement.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, if that suggestion were put into practice there is no question in my mind that it would make a lot less effective many of the speeches of even the hon. member. It would prove a direct incentive for intensive prospecting and development over a wide area, which I am sure would add to the vision that the minister has seen in that particular area.

So much for the advantages of this rail and water route from the awakening northland to the heart of industrial Canada. It is a development which must be undertaken immediately. This proposed route has been suggested. Development work has been done by a number of people. Development work started in 1911 when the federal government, under E. C. Ells, undertook a survey of this area. Many surveys and many phases of development and potential development have been carried out since that time. On one occasion the navy was interested in this and an extensive survey was carried out. From these surveys it has been readily assumed that the work of dredging from Ship Sands to the port of Moosonee can be easily undertaken. Docks can be established on the shore to provide docking facilities. These can be built into the shore where there is quite a height of land. This can be done so that ice and other conditions which exist each spring will no longer be a hazard, and dredges can be put into that area as they have been in the past. It has been established that dredging work can be maintained, and that when the silt and the gravel at the bottom of the river is removed the natural flow of water itself will keep this port open.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is quite easy for all hon. members to understand what this can mean to northern Ontario. If we have a flow of traffic, whether it be ore going south or north into the European markets, secondary industry will obviously follow in that area to supply the needs of the mining communities which will be set up in the area of the Belcher islands. This development is absolutely essential in northern Ontario where mining, particularly gold, has reached its apex and no further developments have taken place in that field. We have large cities and communities which are completely dependent upon the natural resources they were built to supply and maintain, and as these industries decrease and the mines are worked out it is absolutely necessary for this department to supply the leadership necessary to develop secondary industries, and I suggest to the minister that this is probably one of the most effective ways.

Just as an added incentive, it has been established in the last few months that the work that is being done in northern defence in connection with the Bomarc missile site in North Bay will mean the installation in James bay of heavy radar equipment and communication equipment. I would suggest that this is an opportunity for the minister to put into force somethiing which will be much more effective than the $3 million his department is now spending at Father Point, Quebec, near Rimouski. If the department is in a position to build a port, which I suggest to the minister is probably very badly needed in the area, there is all the more incentive for the minister to give consideration, in conjunction with Premier Frost and the Ontario government, to the building of Ontario's first salt water port at Moosonee.

The result of this will be more than beneficial to northern Ontario, because it will mean a flow from the industrial part of Ontario through northern Ontario and into the European market. This route will establish a much faster and cheaper method of transporting goods into the northern parts of Europe. I suggest that if the minister takes a look at the vision of which he spoke, this port is much more important than building a railway from Churchill down to Moose Factory. We would much more appreciate a port so that we can go by water from Moosonee to Churchill. I think this port will give the minister all the added facilities that he would need if he wishes to transfer some of the grain shipments from the port of Churchill to a port at Moosonee, where he would be able to take advantage of a shorter route from Winnipeg than we now enjoy.

For these reasons I suggest to the minister that he go into northern Ontario this summer to take a look at the facilities there, discuss with the premier of Ontario, who has made many statements about his willingness to co-operate and spend Ontario's money in this regard, and that the federal government give the leadership in the jurisdiction they have assumed. It will be very advantageous to northern Ontario, and I am sure it will give the impetus necessary to supply northern Ontario with secondary industries.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, there is one matter I want to raise having to do with the general administration by the minister of the items voted to the department by parliament. The matter arises out of what has been said in the discussion of this item so far, and it has to do with his whole attitude concerning the administration and allocation of the funds voted by parliament. We heard the discussion about the Prince Albert bridge and we heard the extraordinary argument advanced that the contribution to that bridge was made under the item under the minister's jurisdiction No. 280 and under the corresponding item last year. Item 280 reads as follows:

> Contributions to the provinces to assist in the development of roads leading to resources in accordance with agreements entered into by Canada and the provinces.

Two points arise from this. There is no specific reference to bridges, but I take it that bridges would be included under the item relating to roads; they are an integral part of a road system. I take that to be elementary. But the particular road with which we are concerned and in respect of which money was voted by parliament under the item I have just read is a road which, as I understand from the debate, starts 150 or 175 miles to the north of the bridge. It starts at Lac la Ronge and extends from there a considerable number of miles northward. In other words, there is a gap between the bridge in question and the roads to which parliament has authorized contributions to be made, a gap of some 150 miles. A road to the start of the authorized road is already in existence and, presumably, has been provided by the province and there was, of course, a bridge in existence which was serving that road. I take it the bridge with which we are now concerned is to be an additional bridge in Prince Albert. It does seem to me that it is stretching the language used in the estimates unreasonably to interpret the expression "roads to resources" to include bridges which are some 150 miles away. It is not realistic at all.

While I have no doubt that the bridge is a very good bridge and that it is needed very badly, I am raising this other part of the question. Is the minister using funds which have been voted for a particular purpose set out by parliament for what appears to be another purpose altogether? Surely we are entitled to some better information and explanation than the minister has so far given us. If there is no better explanation, then, surely, proper legislative authority should be brought forward regularizing what has been done. Certainly nothing which the minister has said so far, either in this debate or in answer to questions which were put to him on earlier occasions when this matter was referred to, can be regarded as satisfactory. Something further will have to be done, either by way of enlarging on the answer given on those occasions or by way of an indication of an authority other than that which is to be found in the item which I have just read. Hon. members will see that there will be no control whatever over the use of funds voted under this item which deals with access roads leading to resources under agreements with the provinces, unless a stricter standard is adhered to. One could find examples which would reduce this whole situation to absurdity, in the light of the distance which the minister has gone today.

The point I wish to make is that the minister must apply the moneys voted by parliament for the purposes for which they were voted. They may not be used by the department under his direction in any way which seems desirable, no matter how laudable the purpose may be. No one who has listened to the discussion on this first item so far can fail to be alarmed, because not only had we this example but we had a rather extraordinary explanation and argument coming from the minister on another point when he was dealing with some statistical information he had given as to development permits for oil and gas when the hon. gentleman argued that development permits and applications were one and the same thing. Looseness of view of that kind, when applied to all these matters, could become serious.

One further question arises, and perhaps I may deal with this same item as an example. The minister, in his answer to questions on July 4 and July 6, concerning the roads to resources program gave some very strange answers indeed. If he would refer to a question asked on July 4 this session, as appears in Hansard on page 5469, he will find the following exchange—I will try to paraphrase the question and answer, but it is there for any hon. member to see who wishes to read it. The minister was asked about federal assistance for an extensive highway program in northern Manitoba, and in answer he said the province was already working on certain of the roads, but an agreement had not yet been signed. Then, in answer to a supplementary question, he said that the road about which inquiry had been made was a part of the roads to resources program. Then there was a question about the limit of the funds that could be spent, and the minister went on to explain the amount that could be provided. What concerns me with regard to this aspect of the question is that on July 6 the minister was asked which provinces had signed agreements dealing with the roads to resources program, to which the minister replied: "British Columbia". In other words, he made it abundantly clear that Manitoba had not yet signed such an agreement. I point out to the committee once again, that the item under discussion reads:

> Contributions to provinces to assist in the development of roads leading to resources in accordance with agreements entered into by Canada and the provinces.

Observe that there is a definite limitation in that item. There must be an agreement between Canada and the province concerned. I should like to ask the minister to what extent has he been spending funds under this item prior to an agreement being reached and, if he has been spending moneys in this way as his answer would indicate, what is his authority for such expenditure? By what right has he spent this money, because not only must there be a vote—there is an interim supply vote—but there must be an agreement with the province. That limitation is imposed, and I think the minister would agree with me that this is a serious matter. If there is some authority of which I am not aware, I wish the minister would clear up this matter. If there is not, may I say to him that I regard it as a serious thing and something which ought to be clarified by the proper authority and regularized in the proper way, because if the minister will consider the other items in his estimates he would realize how far one could go in applying them if I am right in the facts as I have put them forward.

You can see how, for instance, under construction or acquisition of buildings and works, arising out of the reallocation of the town of Aklavik, item 279, the same principle could be applied to some other city in the country or area, and so on. One could give unlimited examples. I think the minister will agree, and I think all hon. members will agree, that the method of providing the funds through these estimates, with the approval of parliament, is a method that provides for a precise procedure. The bringing forward of these estimates by the government is not in the nature of giving the department a blank cheque. The expenditure cannot be defended merely on the grounds that it is a good expenditure in the circumstances. It must be defended as being within the authority granted by parliament. It is with that point in mind that I would like the minister to clear up these matters.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): To speak to the last matter first, there are letters between the governments which in effect legally form the agreement. With our legal representatives we are in the process of working out the terms of the final agreement. In the meantime I am informed that the letters between the two governments have the legal effect of an agreement.

As for the changing of the wording of the vote to cover such things as bridges in Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Saskatchewan, and the special deal in Ontario, I think we can take that under consideration. But the putting in of the bridges was well known to all of the officials and I think it is legally sound, but I will inquire. I cannot give the answer off-hand.

Mr. McIlraith: The point I am making in both cases has not to do with the appropriateness of the particular works undertaken or whether or not the federal government should in fact contribute to them. The point has to do with the legal situation.

I want to pursue the point about the highway in Manitoba. I understood the minister to say that there had been an exchange of letters between the province of Manitoba and the federal government as to the roads to resources program, and I take it from his remarks he expects the agreement will be signed shortly. My question is this: Did he, or did anyone, raise the point I have raised and did he obtain a report from justice, or indeed from any other authority, as to the propriety of his spending the money provided under the vote I have mentioned before the agreement was signed? I do not think there is any legal authority for expending it before the agreement is signed. I could be wrong. I do not set my opinion up against another opinion; if one has been obtained, I would like to see it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): As I understand it, the legal authority for the vote cannot be applied for unless the work is finished. No money has been spent under these votes because the money will not be paid until the agreement is signed. There is one exception, which was taken up with treasury board officials, because it was work that had been completed entirely on one portion of a project in Saskatchewan. They asked for an advance and we gave them an advance on it; but legally you cannot pay until the agreements are signed.

Mr. McIlraith: That is precisely my point. Then some money was paid before there was legal authority. What protection is there? I want to make myself perfectly clear in this. My concern arises out of what I fear to be a loosening up of the financial control by the commons over expenditures. I think that is very important and a rather basic matter in our parliamentary system. We had a case the other day in the Department of National Defence where an expenditure was being made on the termination of a contract that had been terminated last year; but it was being provided through a vote for the acquisition of materiel. I pointed it out to the minister and he undertook to have the point looked into. Then the debate today and last night on this same point rather alarmed me. In addition to the two instances I have mentioned the minister has said that there was an expenditure made in Saskatchewan, although there is no agreement with Saskatchewan. I wonder whether the minister will have this whole practice looked at and get a legal opinion on it?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I shall be glad to, but I would think that the members of the treasury board before whom I placed this application of Saskatchewan for an advance payment would have examined into the legal implications of that payment, Mr. Chairman. It was discussed by the officials of treasury board, with full treasury board, and it was agreed upon. I shall be glad to look into it again.

Mr. McIlraith: I hope the minister will not find me too persistent when I say I do not find the treasury board infallible. I find it tending to be used very often as an excuse and sometimes blamed for a great many things. I must take the view that I neither regard them as infallible nor as the last word in any of these matters. I still think that parliamentary control is the last word in these matters of voting the taxpayers' money and must be preserved as the last word. The mere fact that treasury board said it is all right to do it may be the beginning of a very bad practice. I hope that he will not be too respectful of the mere say-so of the treasury board, with all deference to it.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, this whole question of roads to resources is something which is very close to the hearts of my constituents in northern Alberta. I am very pleased to see that there is some hope that the mines committee may go north, and I hope that they will look into the northern half of Alberta while they are touring the north country because the transportation facilities up there are just about unbelievable. McMurray and Waterways are 150 miles from the nearest road, and our province is so vast that it is apparently outside the ability of the provincial legislature to build roads into those outlying communities where the population is small but the need is great.

I am only too pleased to see that the policy of the northern affairs department is flexible enough to provide such things as access bridges which make it possible to get onto what roads they do have in the north country.

We have another bottleneck apart from the physical bottleneck and that is the political one. The government of Alberta refuses to build roads into the north for reasons perhaps best known to themselves. I represent this great northern community but it is very difficult for me to get transportation facilities into those northern districts without emphasizing the needs to the northern affairs department in the hope that the roads to resources program may give them the only hope they have for a road. This also has a bearing on the question of building a railway up through my constituency. I have been accused at times of not pressing this railway as vigorously as I should. This is not the point. A good road into McMurray and Waterways would drastically reduce freight rates into the north and this would speed up the development of the whole of the north country from McMurray and Waterways right clean down to the Mackenzie delta and the whole of the Canadian shield. It is my considered opinion that a good all-weather road north between Edmonton and McMurray would do more to reduce freight costs in that whole country than anything else we could do. It may be significant that the only Liberal member returned in Alberta was from a provincial riding in my district where he has made himself vocal about transportation. These people, desperate as they are for transportation, saw fit to return a Liberal member to the legislature.

Mr. McIlraith: That was a good thing to do.

Mr. Churchill: What happened to the other 14?

Mr. Bigg: I am quite sure that if I had been able to promise them something from the dominion side the situation would have been different. Certainly it appears that if we rely on the Social Credit party to produce roads to the resources of the north we will wait a long time. I should like to suggest to the department that if the Alberta provincial government should make any suggestions as to building this road we should give them very careful attention not only politically but from the point of view of the development of the whole of the north country.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, first of all I think I should take this occasion to compliment the minister at least on his industry and zeal. I cannot agree that he always makes the right moves, but then there is the old story that the only man who does not make a mistake is the man who does not do anything. Certainly I think the minister has shown considerable industry and zeal in the pursuit of his duties in the department.

I should also like to say that I think the standing committee on mines, forests and waters did an outstanding job both this year and last year in dealing with the estimates of the department. I think their actions have been an example that many of the other committees could follow.

This department deals with the far north and I prefer that description because the riding I represent has been known for many years as the "north" and we have always considered ourselves as such. When this new great northern vision came along in the last federal election the people of northern Ontario more or less got the feeling that they were being by-passed, that they were no longer the north. I do not know whether you would call that area the near north, but it seemed that all the direction and energy of the federal government with regard to this vision was concentrated on the far north and by-passed the northern part of Ontario.

Of course, it is true that the government has continued, as the former government did, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act and has increased the assistance under that legislation. But many people, particularly in my riding, which possibly is affected as much as any riding in Canada by this legislation, have thought for a long time that rather than subsidizing these gold mines there might be other methods of using this money that would better implement the original intention of the legislation, that is, the maintenance and development of the mining municipalities of northern Ontario. That is why I was so pleased today, along with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, to hear the new policy announced by the minister. I think that the municipalities in the area I represent will certainly be very pleased to know that any assistance along this line may not necessarily be confined to more northerly regions and that if a case can be prepared justifying local assistance it will receive favourable consideration similar to that extended to Prince Albert, Saskatchewan.

However, Mr. Chairman, I think I should warn the minister at this stage that if any bridges are going to be built in northern Ontario he should keep a very close eye on them. We have learned from bitter experience in the past that bridges in northern Ontario by the Ontario government have a habit of disappearing and that although you may pay for them you are never able to find them. I suggest that if the construction of any bridges is embarked upon in this area the minister and his officials should keep a very close eye on them. Any assistance along this line will certainly be a terrific boon to the area I represent.

One thing that the area has needed for many years has been the opportunity to participate in the tourist industry but the industry has always fallen a little short of reaching our area. We are very hopeful that this situation can be corrected in the not too distant future. Certainly any consideration that the minister and his department can give to assistance along this line will be very much appreciated. We have all watched with some interest the recent development whereby the town of Timmins, which for many years has been known for its production of gold, suddenly became internationally known over night for its production of bears. I am sure that in the future that will stimulate the interest of many tourists in the area.

I should also like to endorse heartily the remarks of the hon. member for Timiskaming with regard to a port at Moosonee. If this very worth-while project is carried out the area I represent will no longer be the end of the line as it has been in the past. I think that possibly one of the greatest drawbacks to the establishment of secondary industries has been the fact that the area was the end of the line, and if the project to establish a salt water port at Moosonee is ever embarked upon it will have very beneficial effects.

Possibly one of the biggest shadows hanging over any mining municipality is the fact that the gold, or whatever the mineral is, is an expendable resource. There is always hanging over people's heads the thought that some day, be it ten years or fifty years from now, the ore will be exhausted in the area and, of course, that creates a sense of urgency with respect to the need for other industries and occupations to take up the slack which inevitably will come. Any development of the port or of the area leading up to the port of Moosonee will lead to new mineral exploration so that the secondary industries may very well be new mineral projects.

I should also like to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena when he warned the minister to guard rather carefully our resources which, to use the minister's own words, we hold in trust for future generations. In today's Globe and Mail I noticed something which bears this out very well. I do not know whether hon. members have read this article on page 7 of today's paper. It deals with the big nickel development in northern Manitoba. It is a fantastic story, one which most people would never even dream could happen in Canada today. I should like to put a few excerpts from the article on Hansard. It deals, of course, with the giant company that put up $175 million to develop this resource in northern Manitoba.

The provincial government was so delighted to see this new industry established that they leaped before they thought. They tied themselves up under agreements and it did not take very long for them to rue the day. In fact, I believe even before the industry had gone into production they were finding, to their grief, they should have been a little more careful before they signed this agreement. The article deals with a member of the provincial legislature who wanted to go into the area to see what was transpiring in this new municipality of Thompson in northern Manitoba. Here is what happened, and I shall read from this article:

> He telephoned Inco at Winnipeg.

This was to procure a train ticket to go into this area. He was told no by a company executive.

> Mr. Orlikow could not go to Thompson: There wasn't room for him there. Under the agreements the company owned everything. The railways could not even sell a ticket into Thompson, except to persons with a company pass.

Of course Mr. Orlikow, the provincial M.L.A., did not possess this pass. Then, when he decided to go in anyway, according to this article, he found that he could not rent a room because all the buildings were owned by the company and the people did not feel free to rent him a room. So he wanted to know if he could buy a tent and camp in the town.

The article reads:

> No, the town's zoning regulations prevented camping. Could he camp across the river from the town? No, under the agreements, the town controlled all such practices in the vicinity, even though, of course, it was crown land.

Then farther down on the page we find this:

Provincial officers went to Thompson to arrange a poll in the provincial election. No, said the company, there could be no poll on company property. It had to be a mile away. The result: 50 of Thompson's 1,000 voters cast ballots. A new inquiry has been started by the municipal affairs department to see what the election act has to say about that.

This illustrates very clearly the point raised by the hon. member for Skeena this morning to the effect that great care must be taken, and we must not leap in too quickly in signing agreements which could lead to situations such as this. The hon. member for Skeena mentioned what may happen 50 or 100 years from now, but here we have an example of what happens a few years after such an agreement is signed. In fact, the closing paragraph of this article poses a very significant question:

The question government lawyers want to answer: Just how much can you buy with $175 million?

So, Mr. Chairman, I would once again say how much we welcome the new policy the minister announced this morning. However, there is one thought that occurs to me. I understand that one province has already signed an agreement with the federal government with regard to these roads to resources. Now we find a new policy has been announced from that which I imagine was on the table during the discussions with the province that has already signed. I think this may hinder or further delay the signing of agreements with other provinces because when they see this change they will hope that there may be further changes in the future, and this could lead to considerable delay of this worth-while project in connection with roads to resources.

Mr. Caron: I should like to say just another word in connection with the bridge in the city of Prince Albert. I was wondering why the federal government was so generous to a city which is 150 miles away from the first road to resources. I should like the minister to confirm to us the truth or falseness of what a Conservative member told me. He said this generosity was to make an alliance between the C.C.F. and the Conservatives so they could more easily defeat the Liberals in that province.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering, too, whether perhaps the transaction could be summarized in another way. Perhaps this bridge was not so much for access to natural resources as for the conservation of political resources. I did not rise to discuss the bridge in Prince Albert, and I do not intend to make a speech. I am sure that will be very reassuring to the hon. member for Cariboo. However, if I may borrow a phrase used by the hon. member for Cariboo this morning, in one of the windier answers given in this house by the minister—it is rather difficult to compare one of the minister's answers with another on that particular score, but this one was exceptionally inflated—given on June 10 to a starred question asked by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, we find the following. The question reads as follows:

Have any measures been taken since March 31, 1958, to implement a national development program of federal assistance for developing the resources of the Atlantic provinces,—

You will note the limitation upon the question, since March 31, 1958.

—having regard to their differing needs and varying financial capabilities.

I have no doubt the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador used that language because, although it is rather windy, it happens to be the precise language that was used in the Atlantic manifesto of the Tory candidates in the 1957 election. We were naturally anxious to find out how much had been done toward carrying out these windy promises. The minister then took it upon himself to answer this question:

If so, what are those measures?

I am not going to read this long, windy answer. I am only going to give you two or three examples of the things the minister claimed to have done since March 31, 1958. One of them was the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, which was put on the statute books, of course, when the Liberal party was in office; another was the Maritime Freight Rates Act, and so it goes. One could give a number of similar examples of the things the minister claimed were done since March 31, 1958.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): They were increases.

Mr. Pickersgill: All of these items were of somewhat earlier origin, and I was going to ask the committee if I could have permission of the committee—the minister said they were all increases.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Over what the Liberals gave.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I could have the permission of the committee, I should like to place on the record a document which was prepared in the office of the economic adviser, Department of Trade and Commerce, for a seminar of the Atlantic provinces council at Fredericton on September 14, to 16, 1955. This document is entitled "Federal Government Assistance Programs in the Atlantic Provinces". It seems to me in view of the claims that have been made if we could have this basic information available in Hansard we would then have a background to which to refer what has been done since that time. I wonder if I could have the permission of the committee? I could, of course, read it.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be perfectly within my rights to read it.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent of the committee to put this document on the record?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think perhaps I could read it within the half-hour allotted me, if that is the preference of the committee, but I do not intend to take advantage of the rules of the house by doing that. I have not been extended a courtesy which I think I have invariably accorded so far as I was concerned to hon. members on the treasury benches ever since I sat over here. It is very exceptional, I might say, not to afford such a courtesy when a document is an official document. Since I have not that courtesy, thanks to the generous attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce who is now leading the house and who is not very pleased with something that was produced in his own department—

Mr. Churchill: I am very pleased with what is produced in the department.

Mr. Pickersgill: —I shall just content myself with reading a list of the programs which are listed on this document and will not go beyond that point. But I think they will indicate fairly clearly that a great deal was being done in this field before the advent on the federal scene of the hon. gentleman who is now presiding over this department. The programs listed are as follows:

1. Transportation subventions—coal movements.
2. Subsidy payments on coal used in manufacture of iron and steel.
3. Coal production subsidies, loans and rentals.
4. Coal production assistance.
5. Export subsidy—coal.
6. Steamship subventions for coastal services.
7. Freight assistance.
8. Fishing bounty.
9. Bait service—fisheries.
10. Bounty for destruction of harbour seals.
11. Educational service for fishermen.
12. Industrial development—fisheries.
13. Assistance in construction of fishing vessels.
14. Construction of bait-freezing and storage facilities.
15. Assistance in reclaiming and developing marshlands of the maritimes.
16. Agricultural lime assistance.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

That is another thing that the minister claimed credit for in his answer he gave the other day.

17. Freight assistance on western feed grains.
18. Assistance—cheese and cheese factories
19. Premiums on hog carcasses.
20. Assistance in removal of apple trees.
21. Assistance in the construction of coal storage warehouses.
22. Canadian farm loan board operations.
23. Loans for farm improvement.
24. Forest protection, development and utilization.
25. Assistance to combat spruce budworm infestation.
26. Industrial development bank.
27. Assistance to defence industries.
28. General health grants.
29. National Housing Act operations.

Then there is a long list of projects which I should like to have put on Hansard but which I do not think—

Mr. Lambert: You had plenty of time earlier.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not take that time earlier today. I recognized the fact that there were a great many hon. members, including some supporters of the government who wanted to speak and who do not speak perhaps as often as I do in the house.

An hon. Member: That is impossible.

Mr. Pickersgill: I waited until they had all had an opportunity before I had anything to say. I may say that I shall not forget the courtesy that I have been extended this afternoon.

Mr. Lambert: Neither will we.

Mr. Pickersgill: But notwithstanding that fact I shall not attempt at this time to put this list of projects on Hansard.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Put on the figures that were put on these things compared with the figures when you were in power.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would have been very happy to do so if hon. gentlemen opposite had accorded me the courtesy sought. I am quite willing to read them in.

Mr. Aiken: I rise on a point of order. This matter has been mentioned two or three times and I should like to clear it up now. The objection did not come from the treasury benches. I think that point should be clarified. It came from some of the backbenchers.

Mr. Pickersgill: The objection came from the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

An hon. Member: It was unanimous.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and he was ably seconded, as he so often is, by the hon. and distinguished member for Victoria.

An hon. Member: He was not even here.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sorry; I did not hear the hon. gentleman's intervention.

Mr. McPhillips: Mr. Chairman, may I say that I had nothing to do with this matter. I was not in the committee when this incident occurred.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understood the hon. gentleman to be expressing his approbation when he made his intervention; but if I have done him any injustice I will, of course, apologize.

There is one aspect of this answer that is extremely curious indeed and that is that it does not mention any project that was started after March 31, 1958. It is true—and I want to be quite fair to the hon. gentleman—that it does mention the Atlantic provinces grants and it also mentions the Atlantic power development, both of which were, of course, initiated before March 31, 1958. But the one thing that is very clear from these several pages of Hansard which the Minister used in purporting to give an answer to that question about what was being done by the government is that, in fact, nothing new whatever has been undertaken since March 31, 1958. That is the point that I wanted particularly to draw to the attention of the committee. I should like also to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that the minister was accorded the courtesy of putting on Hansard a long answer without being asked to read it.

I now come to another question that was answered by the minister. This was a question answered on July 1 and asked by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska or rather, it was asked by the hon. member for Gloucester. The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska is not very often here. The question was:

1. What is the total amount of money provided in estimates for advances in accordance with agreements entered into or to be entered into pursuant to the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act, for each of the fiscal years since the said act came into force?

The answers given to that question are, of course, in conformity with what appeared in the estimates and I do not think I need to burden the committee with them. The answers I want to draw attention to are the answers to the second and third parts of this question. The second part is as follows:

2. What is the total amount actually spent in the province of Nova Scotia for each of the fiscal years mentioned in question 1?

There is no answer to question 2 for the first fiscal year, namely 1957-58 so I take it that no money was spent. In the second fiscal year the amount actually spent was approximately $1,130,000 and that is all there is any record of actually being spent. But the minister, with that anticipatory quality which characterizes all his utterances, then refers to the fiscal year 1959-60 and he gives an estimate of what the claims may amount to, and that figure is $7,739,684.48. I must say that it sounds like extraordinarily close estimating when the year is not more than a quarter over. I wanted to draw attention to the fact that the result of this kind of misleading answer was the stories appearing in the press about $9 million for power this year. We have not any notion at all whether in fact—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. Is the hon. member suggesting that I misled the house in giving information at to what we spent this year?

Mr. Pickersgill: The question asks what is the total amount spent. It does not ask for estimates of what may be spent.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member again to ask him a pointblank question. I do not want any diversion. I asked him whether he is saying in the committee here that I misled the house by saying this is the amount of money that would be spent in the province of Nova Scotia this year.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am saying that the question—

Mr. Lambert: Answer the question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall answer it in my own way and I will need no assistance from the hon. member for Edmonton West. I do not think the minister will like my answer very much, however. The question which was asked and which he purports to answer was what was the total amount actually spent. This is the answer he gave.

Fiscal year 1959-60, (province estimates claims may amount to)—

That is not actually spent, and I say that that is a misleading answer and it is a very characteristic misleading answer from this minister. It is exactly on a par with describing applications as permits. I proceeded—

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the expression the hon. member used, "a characteristic misleading answer", implies that the minister is continually misleading the house. I suggest that that expression should be withdrawn.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, it has been stated in this house repeatedly by members on both sides of the house that other hon. members had mislead the house, and the Chair, as well as the Speaker, has not required the so-called offending member to withdraw those words because they are not considered unparliamentary.

The Deputy Chairman: I did not hear the hon. member say that the minister had deliberately done so-and-so.

Mr. Churchill: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, the words "characteristic misleading answer" imply that this is a constant practice—

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, it is.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member says it is, and therefore I say that he must withdraw that statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not imputing any motives of any kind. I have read an answer to a question which asked for facts, and the answer gave estimates. I say that is a misleading answer. I am not saying that the minister deliberately intended to mislead us; he may have been just confused. In fact, I am more inclined to believe the latter than the former. But I am saying that the answer is misleading, and it is just as misleading as the sort of thing we had this morning, and it is just as misleading as describing applications as permits.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): All I can say is that if the hon. member picks his own practice the house will judge it—

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister may reply when I have finished.

Mr. Lambert: Finish now, Hurricane Jackson.

Mr. Pickersgill: I started to say when I was interrupted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that I presided over a department which is now presided over by the hon. lady from Hamilton, where we had many thousands of applications from people every year to come to Canada, but it never occurred to me to count all those applicants as immigrants. But the minister gets applications for claims up in the Arctic islands and calls them permits. I submit that is in fact misleading. Whatever the minister's motives may be, that is what I am talking about, this constant suggestion that something that may or may not happen in the future has already happened. I know that people who have served in opposition as long as the hon. gentleman did get the habit of thinking that when they say something it is equivalent to an action; but you find when sitting on the treasury benches that if you have not facts to back up these assertions you get yourself into precisely the kind of trouble the minister himself admitted he got the Prime Minister into in Montreal on May 8.

Mr. Lambert: You should know.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): When will you start telling the truth?

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest he has done exactly the same sort of thing in these answers in the house. In actual fact nothing new whatever has been done. Nothing new whatever has been initiated since March 31, 1958 in the Atlantic provinces to implement that pledge which was made in 1957.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Utter nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: To find out was the purpose of these questions. Now I want to come to the third question, and that is—

Mr. Churchill: What is the page in Hansard, may I ask?

Mr. Pickersgill: Page 5328, Hansard for July 1. The third question is:

> What is the total amount actually spent in the province of New Brunswick for each of the fiscal years mentioned in question 1?

Of course there is no amount spent in the first of the three—no, I beg the minister's pardon, there was a small amount spent in respect of the first fiscal year, that is 1957-58, though it is noted that that payment was made on February 6, 1959. I do not understand the accounting practices which make it possible to do that. I understood you could make payments up until about June and charge them to the previous year, but it seems rather a long time to be making a payment on February 6 and charging it to the previous fiscal year. But there is conceivably an explanation, and it is probably that the province incurred that expenditure and that this was a reimbursement, and if that is the explanation I certainly would not say it is necessarily misleading. Then for the fiscal year 1958-59, transmission facilities were $364,000. Coal subventions were $562,000, and then there is an item called "Claims on hand". I do not know whether that is supposed to indicate that there has been an expenditure made or that that is some expenditure which the minister expects to make, but since he was asked what expenditures were actually made it would seem to me that unless that represents actual money paid out it is misleading. Then for the fiscal year 1959-60, there is a coal subvention of $83,000. I do not know whether that is an actual payment or an estimate. Then there is another item called "Province's estimate", but it does not even say what it is the province's estimate of. I want to point out again that these items are supposed to represent the answer to a question asking for actual money paid out, and that the most substantial amount, all but $8 million of something over $10 million, is for something called "Province's estimate", and another is for "Claims on hand" about which it is very hard to make everything.

The fourth question is:

Of the amounts mentioned in questions 2 and 3, what sum has been spent (a) in Nova Scotia; (b) in New Brunswick, for the construction of thermo plants?

This is the answer:

(a) It is estimated that $3,459,883.00 may be paid—

May be paid.

—in 1959/60 in connection with a 20 megawatt thermal plant at Trenton.

In other words, evidently nothing whatever has been paid, because I am sure if anything had the minister would have told us.

(b) It is estimated that $5,632,953.00 may be paid—

May be paid.

—in 1959/60 in connection with the East Saint John plant.

Now, we have been told at other times by the minister that there is no agreement whatever with the province about this East Saint John plant. We were told last year by the Minister of National Revenue that nothing would be paid for that East Saint John plant unless it used coal. The Minister of National Revenue gave a categorical undertaking in this house that in no circumstances would the federal government pay any sum whatever for that plant unless it used coal. We do not know whether it will use coal. We do not know whether there will be any agreement, or whether any federal money is going to be paid. I do not know whether there is an agreement about the Trenton plant. I do not know whether we have ever been told. But I do say that here again we have another example of this minister inflating things which may or may not happen and representing them in language which gives the impression that it is something that already has happened. It was to correct the record, sir, that I took the time of the committee.

Mr. Howard: Before this vote passes, perhaps I might have dealt with this question under another item, but I think this might be a more appropriate place to deal with it. I understand the department in some respects has jurisdiction with respect to Indians in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, and I wonder if the minister might be able to explain the line of demarcation of authority as between the Indian affairs branch and his own department so far as Indians in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon are concerned?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, we have nothing to do with Indians in the Northwest Territories with the exception of education, and there is an agreement between the commissioner of the Northwest Territories and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration with regard to Indian education.

Mr. Howard: Then education comes under the Indian affairs branch?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There is an agreement with the department of northern affairs.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if the minister would explain, again, what that agreement is. I understood him to say there is an agreement between the commissioner of the Northwest Territories and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): And, of course, there is another agreement with us, and under this agreement we look after the education of Indians within the territories.

Mr. Howard: Is there any liaison or consultation with the educational division of the Indian affairs branch in so far as a uniform curriculum is concerned?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In the Northwest Territories we have one curriculum for Eskimos, Indians and whites. There is no liaison as far as I know in regard to education with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Howard: Would that curriculum be comparable to the curriculum established and operated by the Indian affairs branch, or to one established in a particular province, or in all the provinces?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Generally speaking, the curriculum in the Northwest Territories is fashioned more closely on that of Alberta than on that of any of the other provinces, but we are trying to make it a satisfactory curriculum suitable to the children of all races in the Northwest Territories, planned to meet their needs and not the needs of a province.

Mr. Peters: Before this item passes I should like to ask the minister if he could give the committee a report on what is being done in the port at Moosonee.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This matter has been discussed between the government of Ontario and the federal government on numerous occasions. It is mostly a matter for the Department of Public Works. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is interested in the resources of the Belcher and Nastapoka islands and the continental shelf in James bay and Hudson bay, but at the present time no decisions have been reached.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have one question which I wish to put to the minister. I do not ask for an answer immediately, but perhaps he could let us have it before the estimates are concluded. Would the minister give an answer on exactly comparable basis to the answer he gave on March 9 to the hon. member for Mackenzie River, giving a breakdown for the total number of permits granted on the mainland up to the present time? The figure was for about three million acres and I think that on March 9 the minister gave a total figure of something like 60 million acres for which permits had been granted. If the hon. gentleman will give the breakdown for the 60 million acres, exactly as he gave it for this three million acres, or whatever the proper figure is, I should be glad to have that information.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have not the necessary information handy for March 9, but the information that I gave last night for the whole of the oil and gas permits in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon—and I will be very cautious and say that this includes the applications for permits as well—I will now give—

Mr. Pickersgill: For the mainland.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —and for permits granted.

Mr. Pickersgill: And for permits granted.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Only. I want to make it very clear so that everyone understands what I am talking about. This tabulation here is dated about June 15 because it changes every day and you have to have some cut-off date. This is about June 15. On the mainland, up to July 1, 1957—it is divided into two categories—United States companies, 10.9 per cent; after July 1, 33.22 per cent. Canadian subsidiaries, before July 1, 30.7 per cent; after July 1, 30.06 per cent. Canadian companies, before July 1, 1957, 30.7 per cent; after July 1, 1957, 29.32 per cent. United States citizens, before July 1, 17.2 per cent; after July 1, .74 per cent. Canadian citizens, before July 1st, nil; after July 1, 6.06 per cent. Joint holdings, before July 1st, 10.5 per cent; after July 1st, .60 per cent. I have not given the acreage. These figures are for the mainland only and do not include the reservations or the applications for permits on the islands to the north or areas in the territorial waters.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is for the total acreage for which permits have been granted on the mainland up to the date the minister gave.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Up to that date.

Mr. Pickersgill: And the minister has not the figure for the total acreage. If he would give it later it would be appreciated.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Does the hon. member want the acreage figures under that classification?

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh no, the total will do.

Mr. Hamilton: The total acreage prior to July 1, 1957 was 18,794,504; the total acreage after July 1, 1957, is 60,942,006.

Mr. Hardie: Does that include the six million acres in the Peel plateau?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No. The reservations before July 1, 1957, were 6,133,760.

Mr. Hardie: Would the minister agree that prior to July 1, 1957, including the Peel plateau reservations, that acreage, as I pointed out to him in committee, was controlled 51.7 per cent by Canadian companies and 48.3 per cent by United States companies; and that since July 1, 1957 United States companies have control of 63.6 per cent of the acreage and the Canadian companies have control of 36.4 per cent.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member has his own figures and he has joined them together in the way he wishes. If he wants to call a Canadian company which is a subsidiary of a United States company a United States company, he can go ahead, but those are not my figures. I will have nothing to do with them.

Mr. Hardie: I do not think we have got this clear yet. I asked if the six million acres in the Peel plateau reservation had been included in the hon. member's figures and he said, no. The Peel plateau reservation is controlled by Canadian companies who have been operating in this country since about 1952, I think. It would be only fair that if you are going to total the acreage given out by the former administration prior to July 1, 1957 you should include the six million acres of the Peel plateau, and if you do that, then it can be seen that before July 1, 1957 United States companies had control of 48.3 per cent of the total acreage while for the amount of acreage granted between July 1, 1957 and June 15, 1959, the date I think the minister mentioned, United States control increased from 48 per cent to 63.8 per cent.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If the committee would like to have a full record I would be glad to table this, or put it in as part of the Hansard record.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid I would find it very difficult to agree to that.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That leaves me no alternative but to point out that if the hon. member is going to put on to the record the figures on the mainland where there is no kind of sovereignty involved whatsoever—I must repeat what I said this morning, namely that in the area which could be considered sensitive, under the present government, the interest held by Canadian companies is: Canadian subsidiaries, nil per cent; Canadian companies, 32 per cent; Canadian citizens, 36 per cent. If you add these all together it would come to roughly 68 per cent. I think that would be accurate. Therefore, I can say that in the sensitive areas under the present government 68 per cent is held by Canadians or Canadian firms and their subsidiaries and of the remainder, 12 per cent by Americans, 14 per cent by American citizens and 3 per cent by British companies. I repeat what I said earlier today. These percentages are not the key thing at all. When it is offered and the oil comes into lease and we see what happens, then we shall know. I am not going to allow the hon. member to send across the country information that he has compiled from his own figures.

Mr. Pickersgill: How can the minister say that these are held when he says all he has are applications and not a single permit has yet been granted?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): He will never understand it, Mr. Chairman. Just as he said this morning that I was misleading the committee, his very answer has convicted himself because he did not understand my answer and he must assume that every person but himself is a moron because he understood it. I would say that 99.99 per cent of the rest of the people understand it if he can understand it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can understand this, sir, that when I apply for a job I have not got a job until I have been given it.

Item agreed to.

262. Northern research co-ordination centre, including a grant of $10,000 to the Arctic Institute of North America; and an amount of $5,000 for grants in aid of northern research subject to allocation by treasury board, $96,785.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, on this item I should like to say something about the report of the committee on mines, forests and waters in regard to this branch. In this debate we heard something about this report and recently in the newspapers, on television and radio, about the report of the mines, forests and waters committee in regard to research in northern Canada as it comes under the northern research co-ordination centre of this department. I should like to quote from paragraph 24 of the report of the committee:

> It became clear during the examination of the estimates of the northern administrative branch that the government policy in the north over many years has been a vacillation between inaction and reaction—inaction in not doing the things that obviously were required to be done, and reaction in doing things only when we were pushed into them by the activities of other countries.

Mr. Chairman, during the committee hearings in this particular regard the total evidence can be found on pages 467 to 470, inclusive, and this evidence is the evidence of one witness. Only one witness was called before this committee, namely Mr. Rowley, the chief of the northern co-ordination centre. In any event, the first part of paragraph 24 is apparently substantiated by questions and answers in the proceedings of the mines, forests and waters committee at page 467, which read as follows:

> Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Rowley, would I be correct in saying that policy in the past has been a mixture or perhaps a vacillation between inaction and reaction—inaction in not doing the things that obviously had to be done and reaction in doing things only when we are pushed into them by the activities of other countries.

This was the first question asked Mr. Rowley. Not one bit of evidence had come before the committee at that time. I ask members of this committee, is this a question, or is this an observation by the hon. member for Yukon that is based on any evidence? In any event, Mr. Rowley answered as follows:

> Yes, Mr. Chairman, I think it is a fair statement that most of the research which we have carried out was initiated and appears to have been inspired by outside influence—by a fear that other people would do it, or an obvious need to keep up with one's neighbours.
> The Chairman: You mean other countries, Mr. Rowley? You mentioned "other people"; you mean other countries?
> Mr. Rowley: Yes, largely other countries.

This is all the evidence that was taken in this committee on mines, forests and waters on which to base this part of the report. The wording is entirely the wording of the hon. member for Yukon in an observation he made in the form of a question. The next sentence in the report of the committee says:

> Judging from what has been done in Canada's north the government policy has fallen far short of being adequate in almost every aspect of research. Where Canada should have been a leading nation in northern research we have fallen behind. Improvements in recent years have been made, but much too slowly.

We will go back to the evidence before the committee, Mr. Chairman, and we will find that this statement is apparently substantiated by evidence which appears on page 467 of the committee proceedings, a question by the hon. member for Yukon to Mr. Rowley, which reads as follows:

If this is not too sweeping a question to ask you, Mr. Rowley, just what do you conceive to be Canada's responsibility as a polar nation; first, in so far as resource development is concerned—well, let us stick to the item, in so far as scientific research is concerned for the area north of the 60th parallel?

Mr. Rowley: Well, I think, Mr. Chairman, that it is quite obvious we have a large core of the Arctic region, and with our possession of that part goes the responsibility of carrying out a full program of research. As we have a very large part, I think we should be a leading nation in so far as research in the Arctic is concerned.

Mr. Nielsen: Have we been a leading nation in this field for the past 10 years?

Mr. Rowley: No, Mr. Chairman, we have not been a leading nation. I think we have been improving our position. We have been doing more since the war. We have been increasing the amount we have been doing, but we started from virtually nothing.

Mr. Nielsen: What in your view would be the reason for not taking the lead in this research; would it be a lack of funds, a lack of attention, or what would it be?

Mr. Rowley: Of course, it has been a lack of funds and a lack of people; but I think one must remember in saying this, that it is a particularly large country with a comparatively small population, and the demands of the rest of the country are very pressing, which has had the effect of putting research in the north in the background. There are so many things more pressing, more immediate, and more obviously of practical importance that research in the north would sometimes fall behind.

Now, this portion of the evidence seeks to substantiate the sweeping statement in the recommendation of the committee. On the rest of the page there is a question about Mr. Rowley ever having been in the Arctic, and he had been. Then I find the following on page 468 of the proceedings of the committee:

Mr. Nielsen: Are you familiar with Captain Joseph Bernier's work in the Arctic years ago?

Mr. Rowley: Yes, I am familiar with that.

Mr. Nielsen: I believe he died in 1934. Do you feel we have made any substantial progress in our Arctic areas, since the death of Captain Bernier, along the lines on which he was thinking?

Mr. Rowley: Yes, we have made substantial progress, Mr. Chairman. Captain Bernier really was carrying out exploration and he was the end, in many ways, of one phase. He really came into it too late, because most of the original exploration had been carried out by the time he came along. This exploration has taken a different form since; it is a scientific exploration, dealing with the details of various scientific disciplines, rather than finding out where the land and water lie. Since then we have done quite a lot, and I think the geological survey particularly has been the most active agency in the government in this respect.

Mr. Nielsen: Do you find you are restricted in the department with what you want to do or what you feel we should be doing in the Arctic because of restrictions placed on other departments, because of inability to obtain information from other departments such as that of mines and technical surveys?

[Mr. Hardie.]

Mr. Rowley: Do you mean so far as development is concerned and not so far as research is concerned?

Mr. Nielsen: Scientific research.

Mr. Rowley: Yes, I think we are. All scientific research depends on basic scientific data and there is a great shortage of basic facts about the Arctic. I think this goes into all phases of research and it affects all development, either resource development or social development. We do not know enough facts. In the case of resource development, I think to some extent it is rather better because they are well established and have extremely effective agencies gathering facts. They are not gathering them as fast as we would like, but certainly this collection of scientific data is going on.

Then, section 25 of the report of the committee reads as follows:

There are insufficient field laboratories in Canada's northland to accomplish adequate research. Small research laboratories or stations established in various northern localities are essential if we are to discharge our responsibilities in obtaining basic scientific data for development purposes.

In this regard the hon. member for the Yukon, immediately after the words I have just read, went on:

Mr. Nielsen: Do you feel we have sufficient field laboratories in the north to accomplish the gathering of this scientific information?

Mr. Rowley: No, Mr. Chairman, my opinion is that we do not have sufficient field laboratories. I do not want to imply that I support large research laboratories in the Arctic; I would sooner call them stations. I prefer small stations, because in due course one exhausts the scientific possibilities of an area. I do not think we have enough small scientific stations in the Arctic, stations to which scientists from various disciplines can go.

Then the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke asked Mr. Rowley what type of research they would carry on. He said that as he came from the south he did not understand the type of research that might be carried on in the Arctic. He asked Mr. Rowley what type of research would be carried on and Mr. Rowley answered:

Mr. Rowley: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like to see the stations concerned, first with the collection of what you might call the natural history of the area, and expanding that to the study of biology—the relationship between the animals and the vegetation, and I would also see the stations used as a basis from which investigations in other disciplines could be carried out—in archaeology and so on.

There is very little more in the evidence of the committee in this regard except that there were some questions about the depletion of the caribou and what scientific research might be done to indicate the reasons for this. There were also a few words about herding muskox, reindeer and buffalo, I think. Then there was a question about the Arctic institute of North America, and so on. But this is all the evidence that came before the committee on which the committee made the sweeping recommendation that we find in its report. That is all the evidence we received. Only one witness was called. Although I agree with some parts of the report, I cannot agree with a sweeping recommendation such as this one made on the basis of the evidence we obtained. I do not think we have any evidence. As a matter of fact, I think that in most cases words were put in the witness' mouth and then written directly into the report in the same wording. As a matter of fact, it looks to me very much like a prearranged deal.

Mr. Aiken: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hardie: Yes, sir.

Mr. Aiken: Was the hon. member on the steering committee of the mines, forests and waters committee?

Mr. Hardie: You can sit down. No, sir.

Mr. Aiken: Did the hon. member attend when the report of the committee was drafted?

Mr. Hardie: I told the chairman that the report would be passed on division and that my support would not be recorded in favour of it.

Mr. Aiken: I merely asked if you were there.

Mr. Hardie: I was there. I told the chairman. I am not going to go over the whole report but I should like to refer to section 28, paragraph (b), which reads as follows:

> Your committee expresses concern that . . . the projects which are undertaken on the basis of past policies will result in the setting of standards which are unnecessarily high.

Then, section 29 reads as follows:

> For instance, the standard of facility provided for the education of native northern children has been quite high. The hostel at Fort McPherson, the various buildings at Inuvik, and similar undertakings in other northern locations are examples in point.

I went through the evidence of the committee from one end to the other, Mr. Chairman, to find out on what they based this recommendation and how the hostel at Fort McPherson came into the picture. There was only one question in the whole of the evidence before the committee and that question was as to the cost of the Fort McPherson school. I forget the exact answer but I think it was something like $1,200,000. There was not another question. They did not know the size of the hostel, how many pupils there were, was there a playroom or an auditorium. They did not know how many cubic feet there were. There were no questions and no answers and yet they make this type of recommendation to the house.

As far as the buildings at Inuvik are concerned, there was no evidence given before the committee to justify this sort of sweeping statement. There is no evidence whatever. Look through the committee reports. I hope the minister will read them if he has not and tell us whether or not he agrees with the type of sweeping statement I have referred to in sections 24 and 25 and particularly in section 28.

I am not going to go through the rest of the report. I did not intend to take too much time on this matter but I want to point out that in my view the committee on mines, forests and waters had no right to bring in recommendations such as the ones to which I have just referred because there is no evidence in the committee reports to substantiate sweeping recommendations of that sort.

Item agreed to.

263. Contributions to the provinces, pursuant to agreements entered into with the approval of the governor in council, by Canada with the provinces, of amounts equal to one-half of the amounts confirmed by the provinces as having been spent by them for campground and picnic area developments, $1,500,000.

Mr. Caron: May I ask the minister if the province of Quebec has entered into any agreement with the federal government for campgrounds and picnic grounds?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

National parks branch—

270. Canadian wildlife service—wildlife resources conservation and development, including administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, $686,739.

Mr. Hardie: I wonder if I could ask the minister if he could give the committee a progress report on the studies being made in the north in regard to the depletion of the caribou?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, the studies of the declining caribou herds in the north have been fairly well completed. The conclusions reached, in brief, are that the situation is very serious and that strong measures will have to be taken if the caribou herds are to be saved. The department is now in negotiation with the governments of the three prairie provinces, the government of the territories and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration to see if agreement can be reached whereby these strong measures would be successful.

Item agreed to.

Water resources branch—

271. Administration, operation and maintenance, including Canada's share of the expenses of the international executive council, world power conference, $1,389,466.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might, under this vote, inquire of the minister whether the Fraser river board has been reconstituted or if the cabinet has approved the re-establishment of the Fraser river board? Who are the personnel of the board, and what are the terms of reference, if that has been established by the cabinet?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Both governments have agreed and are disposed to reconstitute the Fraser river board. However, the terms of the agreements are being worked out between the two governments.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if I could get some information from the minister concerning a statement that was made recently by Robert Moses, president of the New York state power authority. This is a matter which comes under the jurisdiction of the minister. He said recently that there were billions of gallons of water that were going to waste because of the inability of certain boards to come to a decision concerning the regulation of the flow of the water in the international section of the river. I know that one of these boards is under the jurisdiction of the minister. It has to do with the method of regulation of certain waters in the international section. I wondered what the minister had to say in connection wtih the statement made by Mr. Moses, and whether or not the method of regulation as approved by the international joint commission is operating effectively?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This matter came up in the house a year ago. I can only add at the present time that it is not working effectively. The hon. member will recall asking me about plan 1958-A and I believe —I am speaking from memory now but I have the officials here to verify it—that the international joint commission direction was that plan 1958-A be followed. This plan has not been followed. The federal government has formed an interdepartmental committee at cabinet level and at the official level and is trying to reach some understanding with the province of Ontario concerning the agreement of 1951.

Mr. Chevrier: I just have a few questions, if I may, in connection with this. The minister says that the plan is not working effectively. What means are being taken by the government or by the board over which he has jurisdiction to make the plan work?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In the first place, on a question of accuracy, the board comes under the international joint commission; it is the St. Lawrence river board. The board reports to the minister of external affairs, but I am on the committee so I would have some knowledge of it.

The action we are taking is as I have described. We have formed a committee at cabinet and the official level and are negotiating with the government of Ontario.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the statement made by the chairman of the New York state power authority accurate?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think I am accurate in this, but I am informed they are operating under pre-project conditions and water is going over that could be stored. For that reason plan 1958-A, as set out, is not in operation.

Mr. Chevrier: The point is that the power development has been completed and it would be possible, I think from the information I have, to develop pretty close to the full potential in the international section. The chairman of the New York state power commission says that is not being done, and not nearly that amount is being developed. My question now is, why is not the power being developed in accordance with the agreement and the decision made by the international joint commission?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The answer I can give to that is, first, the statement is correct, in fact, and water is going over, but also all the equipment that is in there is being used.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask this additional question? I know that some of this is under the jurisdiction of other departments, but the minister said something about the Ontario agreement. I understand that the Ontario agreement is ineffective; is that the case?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It is in effect.

Mr. Howard: I should like to leave a couple of thoughts with the minister in so far as the operation of the Fraser river board is concerned, and particularly some of the material contained in the preliminary report on flood control which was issued in June of 1958. I imagine that this preliminary report, like the interim report before it and the appendices, have been very carefully studied not only by this department but other departments of government of both the federal and provincial governments involved. There appears to be one matter dealt with in the preliminary report that would warrant action being taken on the material contained therein without waiting another three or four years until the board has completed its studies, as I understand it will take that length of time when the board is reconstituted.

In order to give some of the hon. members an understanding of the length of the area that is contained by the Fraser river, perhaps I could just say that it is over 800 miles in length and that it drains an area larger than the four maritime provinces put together. It is the most important fish river in British Columbia and one of the most important fish rivers in the world. This is one of the points of conflict in British Columbia at the moment and the federal government is involved. I refer to the fish versus power question, and whether or not dams should be placed on any of the tributaries to the Fraser or on any parts of the Fraser itself. However, I do not want to deal with the question of the hydroelectric-fish problem. We dealt with that question to some extent in the marine and fisheries committee. I should like to deal with the question of flood control.

Certainly British Columbia members who are here will recall the disastrous flood that took place in the Fraser valley in 1948 and along other rivers on the coast; but we recall the one in the Fraser valley which was the most disastrous and caused untold damage to farm lands and to buildings, to people's savings and to the very economy of the Fraser valley itself. In fact, the assessed value of the land and improvements in the Fraser valley that our now protected to a limited degree by the dikes that were established at the time of the 1948 flood is estimated or was actually in 1956 over $113 million, the market value of this land and improvements being somewhere in the neighbourhood, as the report of the board indicates, of $283 million. This report deals quite extensively with the question of flood control. It relates a number of alternate ways in which we can deal with flood control.

Before proceeding to what I think the report indicates is the most economical and fastest way to provide flood control protection for the Fraser valley I should like to point out that following the flood of 1948 the federal government and the provincial government entered into a joint financing of the diking plan along the Fraser valley, with the federal government paying 75 per cent of the cost and the provincial government putting up 25 per cent and they had completed that work in a period of a little less than two years. I believe it was a year and nine months or ten months that it took to complete the full diking that was necessary or that they felt was necessary at that time.

This preliminary report of the Fraser river board points out that it is possible to bring these dikes up to a standard which would contain what they estimate would be the highest possible runoff which they might expect based on past experience of floods and runoffs in that particular area and that this could be done at a cost of approximately $17 million, and that the operating cost of the dikes, maintenance and so on would cost another $1,195,000.

Another part of the report dealt with an alternate system of dikes and reservoirs further up the Fraser, that is dikes along the Fraser valley at the lower portion of it before it runs out into the gulf of Georgia; dikes there and reservoirs on tributaries and on streams further up inland—at an estimated cost of $526 million. What I am suggesting—and I rather think that the Fraser river board in its report suggests this too—is that if you are going to deal with the question of diking in order to protect the Fraser valley and $283 million worth of land and improvements, homes and farms of people throughout the valley and deal with the economy and protect the economy of the Fraser valley, the best way in which to do that is immediately to start planning to rebuild the dikes up to a level that will contain the flood level waters which they might expect to occur based on past experience of floods rather than attempt over a long period of time to put, as the report indicates, $526 million into reservoir dams and into diking also.

I am sure in my own mind that this government will not be less generous than was the former Liberal government preceding it. I believe it would want to be at least as generous and, if I am not mistaken, would want to go just one better; that is, if we can take account of what the Prime Minister has said in what my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate classifies as his very modest manner. But the federal government I think should right now start, if they have not already done so, to discuss the question of the diking of the Fraser valley with the provincial authorities and agree to be as generous at least as was the past Liberal administration in going for 75 per cent of the cost of rebuilding these dikes and should attempt to enter into this sort of agreement with the province before it is too late. We could very easily find next spring—next May and next June, for instance—that we in the Fraser valley—and in other parts of the province but in the Fraser valley particularly because that is the one I am dealing with and this Fraser river board deals with that section —would be faced with something similar to the disastrous flood which occurred in the Fraser valley in 1948.

In my estimation it is far better to do as I have suggested. There is an old saying that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. That saying applies to the Fraser valley just as it applies to other things. The federal government should start off now, if it has not already done so, and approach the province and indicate its willingness to find at least the 75 per cent that the Liberal administration went for—at least that amount of the cost of rebuilding the dikes to withstand the flood levels which they expect might occur. That will be a great deal better than to wait and then, if we have a disastrous flood next spring, scurry around to try to find the money, to try to get men and equipment in order to build up dikes to try to contain the river and in the process do a rather haphazard job and have many of the farms and the homes and the community in the Fraser valley flooded out as they were in 1948.

I suggest that the minister should take this question as being one of paramount importance and requiring immediate action. The question of hydroelectric development and the possibility of maintaining the Fraser river as a fish river is one that does not require immediate action. We have other hydroelectric projects in the offing in British Columbia, one of which might be dealt with in the house. Undoubtedly my friend the hon. member for Kootenay West will take occasion to deal with the possibility of developing the Columbia.

Then there is this great area to the north, and so on, but that is something which is not of immediate importance as is the question of providing dikes to sufficiently high levels in the Fraser valley to protect the people who live there from being flooded out as they were in 1948. If the minister will undertake to engage in that sort of program I know he will not find any objection from the people in the Fraser valley, and certainly will not find any objection from myself or I am sure from any other hon. member who knows of the disaster brought upon the people in the Fraser valley in 1948 merely because governments prior to that time did not have foresight to see that floods could take place and practically wipe out the entire valley itself. Not only do I make this suggestion but the minister should start right now with a flood control program for the Fraser valley by participating with the province in diking. I would appreciate it if he would give the committee an indication of his attitude in this regard and tell us what action has been taken, what studies have been made and what steps are under way to start such a program of diking and flood containment in the valley.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 271 carry?

Mr. Howard: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Winch: In view of the most important and most welcome speech of the hon. member, there must be some answer from the minister on that.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): All I can say is that the two governments have agreed to study the report. As to the diking, they are a provincial responsibility, and all we are doing under these studies, as I see it, is trying to make arrangements to fix the boat instead of trying to bail it.

Mr. Howard: That is a pretty weak and a pretty poor answer and attitude for the minister to take. We realize that the province has agreed to reconstitute the board and study the question, but as sure as I am standing here, if the Fraser valley ends up being flooded out next year the words of the minister will come back to the people of the Fraser valley and they will not forget. The minister cannot pass the buck and say that diking is a provincial responsibility. In 1948 the minister's predecessor, whom he tries to outdo on every occasion, established the principle that it was a disaster area and that the federal government had a responsibility, and they supported their responsibility to the extent of 75 per cent of the cost.

There is a federal government responsibility in this field or you would not be involved in participating in the establishment of a board to study the question of flood control in the first place. You cannot wash your hands of it that easily especially if there is a flood. If you are gambling that there will not be a flood in the Fraser valley within the next three or four years, during which time this Fraser river board is supposed to meet and study further the question of hydroelectric power, fish runs and everything else, then I hope you win your gamble. But it will be your neck and your responsibility and your reputation, as well as the reputation of this federal government, which will be at stake. The last government indicated eleven years ago that there was a responsibility by paying part of the cost, and it will be the reputation of this government which will suffer, along with the suffering which will come to the people in the valley, if there is a flood. As I say, if you are gambling there will not be, I hope you win your bet, and that there will not be any flood; but I suggest that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure and it is far better to be generous now, as was the case in 1948, than to follow your policy of re-establishing the board to discuss the question of flood control.

If the government has no responsibility, what is it doing in the field of studying this question in the first place? It would be far better off to follow that responsibility a little further and indicate its willingness to work with the provincial government. This can be done privately behind the scenes if you do not want any publicity attached to it, but the government should indicate its willingness to participate in the question of flood containment dikes along the Fraser valley. The reference to continuing to bail the boat out rather than fix it is an off the cuff comment which does not fit the circumstances at all.

If the minister looks at the report of the board he will see, so far as flood control is concerned, that diking is an integral part of any system. Even the reservoir program and the dikes themselves run to $526 million including $17 million for diking if brought up to a sufficiently high level, and it takes into account the question that it is necessary to build dikes rather than dams farther up the Fraser river. If the minister is indicating that he is in favour of building dams, hydroelectric reservoirs, storage and every other sort of project on the Fraser river, and in the process ruin the river as a fish run, then he had better talk to his colleague the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I would just like to get the record straight. The Fraser river board is, under the joint constitution of the two governments, trying to arrive at a plan to use the resources of the Fraser river without harm to the fishing industry and to protect the people along the banks against flooding, which includes diking, and also to provide enough power to pay for the whole operation. As I described it a moment ago, it is the firm opinion of the province of British Columbia that it is much better to get a policy which makes full use of the resources of the river without harming anybody else, and thereby, as I said earlier, fix the boat instead of just bailing here and there.

Mr. Howard: May I make another comment on that, Mr. Chairman. An integral part of all the plans laid out here requires diking along the lower Fraser valley in the valley itself. Dikes are going to have to be built anyway, plus another $526 million for storage dams and reservoirs. Also, remember you have a difficult problem with hydroelectric, too. You have the fisheries interests to concern yourself with there, but it is much better to go ahead and take steps with the diking which will have to be done anyway so that some sort of flood containment will take place. I would reiterate that if the minister is gambling on no floods for the next three or four years until the Fraser river board completes its studies, I hope he wins his bet and that the people are not flooded out in the valley.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, the Fraser river is an integral part of the economy of the lower mainland of British Columbia. I would say that 90 per cent of the flood control responsibility of the Fraser river rests with the federal government, because it is a navigable river. Because it is a navigable river, there is a great responsibility on the federal government. However, that matter we cannot discuss because the minister's estimates deal only with flood control. Mr. Chairman, I have seen the banks of the Fraser overcome. I have seen a time in the past 15 years when cattle had to be moved completely away from the normal area and feed had to be brought in from the prairies. The federal government makes money out of the Fraser river from navigation. Therefore why should the minister not make some agreement whereby we do not just wait for a flood to happen again? We should build up, provincially and federally, a major diking system the entire length of the Fraser river. Why should that not be done? In the end the government will make money. If you do not, it will cost you money without any return.

Item agreed to.

273. Studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed in Canada, $170,740.

Mr. Herridge: I only wish to make a very brief comment. First, I want to say that I am very pleased to hear the minister supplement the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs with respect to the negotiations on the Columbia between the governments of Canada and the United States and to hear him say that in his opinion success will attend these negotiations. Would the minister explain what the $170,740 is required for this year in connection with this service?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The amount of $170,000 is for the continuation of the studies on the power aspect of the question. The vote is reduced from last year because the field work is coming to an end.

Mr. Herridge: One more question. I know this is a very difficult question, but can the minister give the committee any information as to when, in his mind, it is possible that the negotiations between Canada and the United States will be successfully concluded. What period has he in mind? I think the public are very interested in this question.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I cannot answer that question, Mr. Chairman. I can say that the matter of the type of downstream benefits and their division is before the international joint commission. When they have agreed on those principles I imagine that discussions will begin between the two governments, and when I say the two governments, I might point out that the province of British Columbia and the federal government are working as one in connection with this matter.

Mr. Winch: I wish to refer again to this question of the development on the Columbia river because it is one which to both my hon. friend from Kootenay West and myself means a great deal. In answering the hon. member for Kootenay West the minister said he could not inform us when a decision would be reached. May I ask him this: can the hon. gentleman tell us whether in the course of these negotiations dealing with international waters any understanding has yet been reached, irrespective of any decision between the United States and Canada on upstream and downstream benefits, on development expenditures and revenues?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That stage has not yet been reached.

Mr. Winch: Is it being investigated?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Both governments have raised the issue with each other. Both governments have raised the subject of the type of energy that would be developed, its financing and so on, but no decision has been reached.

Mr. Winch: Are any consultations going on with the government of British Columbia?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): On that particular subject there is no discussion at the moment. There is close contact established. We both know the problem is there. We have talked it over, but that is as far as it goes at the moment.

Mr. Winch: There is no actual consultation between the two governments as to what will be the actual development of the river.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Oh yes, in so far as the physical development of the river is concerned, and the order of that development there is very close contact and consultation all the time. We have a joint technical committee which works as a unit. There is no difficulty on the technical side. I thought the hon. member was going further and had in mind the setting up of the entity, the financial division and so on.

Mr. Winch: When agreement is finally reached between the United States and Canada is there now the possibility of a plan between the federal government and the provincial government with regard to the capital cost of construction.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There is no plan at the present time.

Mr. Winch: Is one being considered?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes.

Mr. Howard: I am afraid the question I have to ask does not fit in precisely with this vote, but I wonder if the minister would be good enough to alow me to ask it, anyway, and give some sort of answer as to what steps if any of a similar nature to those taking place on the Columbia, for instance, are being taken either through the department exclusively or in conjunction with the province of British Columbia with regard to waters in the northwestern part of the province at Atlin lake, Sloko lake, and Teslin river up into the Yukon? Would the minister tell us whether any surveys are being made, the possibilities for hydroelectric development and the orderly development in other ways of that chain of rivers and lakes which runs through there.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There is no joint agreement between the two governments on the use of water resources in the northwest of British Columbia but the federal government, through the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, is carrying out studies of its own in that particular field.

Mr. Howard: Are those studies being made outside the province?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Both.

Mr. Howard: Both in the province and outside?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): And in the territories.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask the minister whether he can inform the committee whether he and his department have any connection with what is going on in the northern part of British Columbia under the authority of the government of British Columbia with regard to what is best known as the Wenner-Gren deal? I should like to know what is the position of the federal government in respect of the investigations they are making, and how they tie that in with the situation.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am informed that there is contact between the Wenner-Gren interests and the federal government to see in what respect the operations on that river by that company will effect the federal interest in the Peace river and the waters in that area.

Mr. Winch: Can I ask whether or not the request for information that came to the minister's office was from the government of British Columbia or from Wenner-Gren?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am informed that up to the present time it has been entirely from the company itself and not from the government.

Mr. Winch: I understand, then, that all requests in which you are now interested have come from Wenner-Gren. Is that right?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There have been requests for information on this subject from Wenner-Gren, only.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask the minister what is the attitude of himself and the government with regard to these Wenner-Gren interests and what investigations have been made of this man who has been declared an enemy of democracy by the United States and characterized, by an order in council passed here in Canada, as a man who no one can deal with. He was tied up with Krupp; he was a Hitlerite.

I would like to ask this question. What position does the minister take when he gets a request from this man for the grant of one-fifth of British Columbia? That is the request that has come to his department from Wenner-Gren, a man who could not be dealt with by order in council in 1942, a man who escaped to Mexico from his own country and who one year before was declared by Washington to be non compos mentis, if those are the right words. What is the attitude of the minister in regard to an application from Wenner-Gren who, having lost the hot war, now wants to take over a great deal of Canada by way of the cold war, with the authority of the Social Credit government of British Columbia and apparently now, unquestionably, with the authority of the minister?

This means a lot to us in British Columbia because a great many from British Columbia died in the last war. We want to know why and how, under a Progressive Conservative government, according to the minister's own statement, the only information he has is that requests are made by the Wenner-Gren company. What is the minister's position? What is his attitude toward this traitor to democracy, a man who is now tied in with Krupp, who will take over a great deal of our western country? Will the minister please tell me what is his relationship to this traitor of democracy who is now going to take over a great deal of our country?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have no relationship with Mr. Wenner-Gren. The Peace River Development Company has come to us with respect to their position.

Mr. Winch: It is Wenner-Gren, is it not?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It is also Lord Alexander and a number of others.

Mr. Winch: I understand Lord Alexander resigned as soon as he discovered who Wenner-Gren was.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The answer is we simply deal with the effect of their plans on the downstream waters of the Peace river.

Mr. Bourget: I should like to ask the minister whether that kind of agreement could be applied to flood control of the Chaudiere river in the county of Beauce? The minister will recall that on many occasions the hon. member for Beauce has tried to get some financial help from the federal government. If the province of Quebec is ready to enter into an agreement with the department, would that kind of agreement apply to that river?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am a little uncertain of my geography here but if the river crosses an international boundary we do have some jurisdiction. I do not believe this river does cross an international boundary.

Mr. Bourget: I am not sure that it does but I think it does, in the state of Maine. It comes down from the state of Maine into the St. Lawrence river. If the minister is not ready to give me the answer he could get in touch with me and let me have the information later.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): We will make a note of it and let the hon. member know.

Mr. Winch: I have one more question to ask the minister. As the minister of his department, when he receives a request for information or powers that only he can give, what is his reaction? When he receives a request from a company and a man who was by order in council declared to be a traitor to democracy, a man with whom nobody can work, and whose bullets killed thousands of our own Canadians, what is his reaction? What consideration does he give to a man who in 1942, through his companies, was declared a traitor to democracy? How does the minister deal with such a man and what has been his reaction in recent weeks or months? The minister has to pass upon his application to obtain the resources of our country. What is his reaction and how does he decide?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have no answer. I am not a psychiatrist or anything else so that I can psychoanalyse my feelings effectively.

Mr. Winch: Does the minister agree that Wenner-Gren was the man whose bullets shot down thousands of Canadians?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Item agreed to.

274. Contribution to the cost of constructing a dam on the Conestogo river near Glen Allan, Ontario, for the purposes of flood control and water conservation, in accordance with the terms of an agreement entered into between Canada and the province of Ontario, $300,000.

Mr. Bourget: I think I made a mistake a minute ago because I think I should have asked my question under item 274.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, vote 274 deals with a dam in Ontario under the Canada Water Conservation Act. Under this act the province must come to the federal government and put forward a proposition for the conservation of water. Under this program there must be a contribution by the municipality of 25 per cent and by the province of 37½ per cent, and if the federal government agrees, its contribution is 37½ per cent. From here on I have to give the same answer I gave before. I do not know the exact circumstances of the conservation program in this particular area.

Mr. Peters: How is this project progressing? How much work has already been done?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): As I understand it, it is expected to be finished this year.

278. Operation and maintenance, including grants and contributions as detailed in the estimates, $9,692,954.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, I have a simple question to ask the minister which requires a yes or no answer. Can the minister tell me whether he agrees with that portion of the report of the mines, forests and waters committee which says:

The projects which are undertaken on the basis of past policies will result in the setting of standards which are unnecessarily high.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member wants an answer in one word?

Mr. Hardie: Yes or no.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I will give him that answer, Mr. Chairman, if he will stand up in the house and tell me whether he has stopped beating his wife.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, this type of answer really shows how interested and sincere the minister is in answering questions in the committee. As was mentioned this afternoon, he has been giving misleading answers since the start of the session.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, surely such a statement cannot be allowed under the rules of the house.

Mr. Hardie: You had better study the rules.

Mr. Churchill: I have studied the rules and that is why I raise this point of order. He has stated that the minister has been giving misleading answers to the house since the beginning of the session.

Mr. Hardie: And what was that one?

Mr. Churchill: That statement should be withdrawn.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that point was raised by the hon. gentleman in the same manner as it was raised earlier today and the Chair did not rule on it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I wonder whether I could stop the whole thing by answering the question with neither a yes nor a no but by simply saying that the opinions I have expressed so far on the report of the standing committee have been very restrained. I think the committee and the whole house are quite well aware that the whole report of the standing committee is an indictment of the previous Liberal administration. It also demonstrates that the present government has allowed the committee to meet, which it had not done for 20 odd years, and has also allowed the committee to have a free and open discussion. Sometimes the chips fall on the department as I am now administering it but in the main they fall on the previous Liberal government. I know that the hon. member has made it very clear this afternoon that he resents any criticism of the previous government but how the hon. member can ask me to give a yes or no answer with respect to whether I agree with that part of the report of the committee referring to past policies—is that the phrase?

Mr. Hardie: I will read it.

—the projects which are undertaken on the basis of past policies will result in the setting of standards which are unnecessarily high.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think I made it clear in the committee that I had not seen most of these places under dispute and that I was not going to express an opinion until I had seen them.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I was a member of the previous administration and I had the responsibility for Indian education. As to where the Liberal party stands on this matter there is no question. We think that the Indians are entitled to just as good standards as the rest of this country and we are not ashamed to say it plainly.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, I did not get the type of answer I should have got. As a matter of fact, I think I can take it from the quietness of the minister that he actually approves this statement. I can take it from the lack of an answer that he approves this statement of the committee. I would point out that immediately following is section 29 which reads as follows:

> For instance, the standard of facility provided for the education of native northern children has been quite high. The hostel at Fort McPherson, the various buildings at Inuvik, and similar undertakings in other northern locations are examples in point.

As I pointed out earlier this afternoon, in the case of the hostel at Fort McPherson there was only one question and answer in all the evidence before the committee and that was as to how much the hostel cost. We got the answer as to its cost. We do not know the size of the building, how many pupils are living there or anything else. Further, the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Lambton West, took a tour last summer paid for by the government through the Yukon and my own riding of Mackenzie River. In the Yukon he picked up our friend, the member for the Yukon, and the two of them did go to Fort McPherson. These two men wrote this report, but no evidence was put before the committee to substantiate these charges. In the case of the buildings at Inuvik, the hon. member for the Yukon questioned the deputy minister of the department and the chief of the education division. He asked why there was a gymnasium in the school and a playroom in each of the hostels. In his mind this was too elaborate for Indian children. This was too much. They should not have playrooms in the hostels and a gymnasium in the school too.

But the deputy minister and the chief of the branch pointed out to the committee that the gymnasium was set up for 250 pupils while there were 500 pupils in residence at the school in addition to the day school pupils. They pointed out that the gymnasium was actually to small for the number of pupils in the school. The gymnasium was also used as a community hall. The hon. member for the Yukon asked questions about the playrooms and both the deputy minister and the chief of the education branch pointed out that the Indian children were allowed 24 square feet each in playroom space. They also pointed out to the committee that the Indian affairs branch provides 50 square feet in their hostels and residential schools. However, knowing the hon. member for the Yukon and the hon. member for Lambton West I understand very well why the Tories are not in agreement that Indian children should get the same treatment as white children.

Item agreed to.

280. Contributions to the provinces to assist in the development of roads leading to resources in accordance with agreements entered into by Canada and the provinces, $9,000,000.

Mr. Caron: This item covers agreements between the provinces and the federal government for roads leading to resources. Is the province of Quebec interested? Has any agreement been signed by the province of Quebec with the federal government for roads to resources?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No.

Mr. Caron: So that if there were any bridges to be built the province of Quebec could not take advantage of this provision as the province of Saskatchewan has.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think the member knows what the answer is.

Mr. Caron: I am not the minister. If I were the minister I might have the answer. I should like to have the answer from the minister. Quebec would not be able to benefit from the building of bridges?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There is no agreement with the province of Quebec. I have already answered that.

Mr. Caron: This is an item of the federal government's estimates. It is not the government of the province of Quebec that is presenting these estimates, it is the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In that case the province of Quebec could not take advantage of this?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If the province of Quebec signs an agreement they can take advantage of it.

Mr. Caron: If they sign an agreement.

Mr. Peters: What has been the participation of the province of Ontario under this item? What roads to resources have been constructed or what roads are provided for under this item?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The understanding we have with each of the provinces is that there will be no formal announcement as to what the roads are until the agreement has been signed. There will then be a joint press statement by both governments.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, all this may apply to those agreements that have not been signed yet. I should like to ask the minister what roads have been built, how expensive they are and where they are in northern Ontario?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member is still talking about the roads to resources under this vote?

Mr. Pickersgill: On this point raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming, surely if these roads are being built and we are being asked to vote money for them, we are entitled to be told what roads they are. I admit that if there are some roads being discussed and upon which the government has not yet reached an agreement, they cannot tell us about them. However, if a road is under construction and an agreement has been reached, taxpayers' money has been spent, surely it is treating this committee in contemptuous fashion to say that the Ontario government can announce what roads are being built and we are not entitled to know anything about them. I think the hon. member for Timiskaming should insist upon an answer.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Are you advising the other party now?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be very happy to advise your party any time you want, because you certainly need advice.

Mr. Winch: I am not going into detail in connection with the roads, but I am most interested in vote 280 because, according to the item in the blue book of estimates, vote 280 is a contribution to the provinces to assist in the development of roads leading to resources in accordance with agreements entered into by Canada and the provinces.

I have only one question there, and it is very important. Does the interpretation of that mean a federal contribution to a road into a provincial forest or a provincial park? I asked the question last year and I was told that it did mean that the federal government would make a contribution toward roads into provincial forests or provincial parks. I should like to ask the minister if my interpretation is correct. If it is, what is the contribution the federal government will make under vote 280? So far as British Columbia is concerned, has any agreement been entered into with that province to take advantage of this vote? What roads have been built, and what moneys spent? If there has been none, has British Columbia been advised that they could take advantage of this and have the federal government pay something toward the construction of roads into parks and provincial forests?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I understand that we are on vote 280. The only road being built in British Columbia under vote 280, I am at liberty to announce, is the Stewart to Cassiar road which was discussed at some length this afternoon by the hon. member for Skeena. It runs from Cassiar in the north, around Dease lake down to the headwaters where the community of Stewart is. This is the only road being constructed under agreement with British Columbia.

Mr. Winch: I am asking the minister, does the interpretation of vote 280 mean that the federal government is prepared to pay the cost—what is it, half the cost? Does that mean, under this item, you are prepared in principle to pay half the cost of any access road into a provincial forest or a provincial park? You say there is only one being built now, but is that the basis of it, and does British Columbia know it?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Winch: You mean that this does not mean that you are paying half the cost of access roads into a provincial park?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This means we are paying half the cost of roads to resources. If the roads to resources go through national parks, then we pay the cost. Under vote 280, there is only one road being built and that is from Stewart to Cassiar in British Columbia.

Mr. Winch: Is a provincial park not a resource?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It could be.

Mr. Winch: Well, now, the minister has said that sitting down. Will he not stand up and say it?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Anything to oblige; a provincial park may be a natural resource.

Mr. Peters: I think I must insist that we find out if there is any road to resources program in Ontario, where that is and how much money has been spent. I think this is information that we should have. I do not know where these roads are, but I understand there are some. I should like the minister to tell us where they are, the extent of these roads that have already been built under this program. I am not asking for confidential information on negotiations for proposed roads, but just roads that are either under construction or have been built under this program.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I can say this, that in Ontario there are seven roads upon which agreements have been made. There are two more that are under negotiation. I am not at liberty, under the agreement I have, to divulge them here until the agreement has been signed. There is only one exception to that. If any member asks about a specific road that has been agreed upon, I would acknowledge, yes or no, that that was it.

Mr. Winch: Tell us now, then, what are the seven roads agreed upon, not the two under consideration.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I just finished saying that I cannot do so under the agreement I have with the province of Ontario.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has just said he does not have any agreement with the province.

Mr. Winch: This is a most extraordinary situation. There have been contracts agreed upon, money spent and roads built, but we are told this afternoon in this House of Commons that the minister cannot break a confidence and tell the committee of the money spent and the roads built. Will the minister explain why, with the taxpayers' money being spent, roads built, contracts fulfilled, he is not permitted, under a confidence, to tell this committee why or where the money was spent?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have made it very clear to the committee this afternoon there has been no money spent by the federal government under this agreement and there will not be until an agreement is signed.

Mr. Winch: I thought you said seven had been built?

Mr. Fisher: There is one aspect of this, as I mentioned to the minister before, which is even more unfair than the point that has just been made. The effect of this program, in co-operation with the provinces, is that requests for information on the order paper have been denied. I am willing to concede that the minister, in confidence, has been willing to give us some information.

What is the situation on the provincial side? Can the minister explain to me why, if this is an agreement in confidence, the premier of Ontario and his disciples have been able in the last few months to range around the northern part of the province announcing these agreements in detail, even saying who was going to have the contract? This is the unfair side of it. This is where in fact it seems to me the minister has let the hon. member down. I should just like an explanation of it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I feel that as long as I keep my part of the bargain I have done my duty. I cannot be held responsible for the leak or the use of the information that occurred in Ontario.

Mr. Fisher: Let me just give an example of the context in which these announcements are made. I had one report from a political rally that said: "Look what you have. Now you have a Conservative government in Ottawa. If you re-elect a Conservative government in Ontario we are going to bring all these things to fruition". We cannot be blamed for taking a sort of jaundiced look at this particular kind of partisanship. I insist that if the hon. member for Port Arthur in the provincial constituency has the right, week after week, to make announcements about the building of a tiny culvert on one of these blasted roads on the roads to resources program, I as a member of this house should have the right to have some public information on the matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to support very warmly what has been said by the hon. member for Port Arthur. It is the most outrageous thing that I have heard said on the estimates in this house since I have been here. Here we are in the House of Commons of Canada being asked to vote money for a provincial purpose. The provincial government feels perfectly free in an election campaign to further its interests by broadcasting this information and we in the House of Commons are not entitled to be told, the minister says, because he has an agreement. Yet he tells us that he has not an agreement, that no agreement has been signed. He means that he reached some private understanding in his negotiations that he would not say anything about this matter until an agreement was reached.

We were very reasonable about the matter. Both the hon. member for Timiskaming and I said that if there was any road not yet in the program which they were still discussing, we would not imperil those discussions. But we know perfectly well that a great many of these roads have been agreed upon. Some of them have been started. One hon. member told me that one of the roads had work being done on it until the election and that no work has been done on it since then. I do not know whether or not that is true but it would not surprise me. Yet here the people who are the trustees for the taxpayers who have to pay for these things cannot have any information about them. This is an absolutely preposterous situation. Of course the minister has a huge majority behind him. If he wants to treat parliament in that way,

I suppose in the end we have to submit but at least we should protest about it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, this attitude of the opposition this afternoon, first of all by the hon. member for Mackenzie River and now once again by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, goes a little bit beyond what they can expect the minister to sit here and take. The dirty, vicious remarks this afternoon about Indians are now duplicated by a sneering, McCarthy-like statement by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Just because there is an information leak at the provincial level he stands up here and asks me to break my written word in letters to the governments of these provinces that no information would be put out from the federal level. If he is absolutely fair he will realize this. Conservative members from Prince Edward Island have come to me with complaints that they had no information about what Liberal M.L.A.'s in Prince Edward Island are doing with the roads program in their province. Why does not the hon. member apply the same rule of ethics to the Liberal government in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Pickersgill: I will answer that question.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Just you sit down until I finish.

An hon. Member: That's the stuff.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I will not sit down until the hon. gentleman is finished.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was going to sit down but now I rise on a question of privilege. I had not intended to bother doing it but in view of the attitude of the hon. gentleman I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman talked about my upholding the rights of parliament as being McCarthy-like tactics. That is an improper imputation of motives which the hon. member has no right whatsoever to make. I will not take up the time of the committee by asking him to withdraw it because the country is soon going to discover what attention should be paid the remarks made by this hon. gentleman. However, I will say this about Prince Edward Island. If that is being done in Prince Edward Island, it is wrong also. We in parliament are entitled to know this. Why there should be such secrecy about where these roads are going to be anyway, I do not understand. When we sat over there on the other side and proposed to keep secret certain things about the armament program of this country we were accused—

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Monteith (Perth): That is not a question of privilege. The minister has the floor.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): I suggest the hon. member stick to the question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: My question of privilege is that the minister has made a malicious attack upon my reputation and I am entitled to repudiate that attack. All I did which gave him any excuse for making that attack was to point out that parliament was entitled to information which provincial premiers and provincial cabinet ministers were spreading abroad about the country but which was denied us in this parliament. If that is McCarthyism, I intend to go on indulging in McCarthyism.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I gather that the chairman has ruled that there is no question of privilege.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I was on my feet with regard to inferences and allegations spread around by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. You can see, Mr. Chairman, the way in which his mind is twisted. I said that he was applying to one province's political party a code of ethics which was different from what he was willing to apply to another.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say anything about any province.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Then the hon. member is up like a firecracker and he tells us he is defending the rights of parliament. This afternoon, Mr. Chairman, this parliamentary institution, as we have known it, from the type of activities that have gone on the other side of the house, has taken a greater series of blows than it could sustain from any leaks or any misuse of information in the hands of provincial politicians. I should like nothing better, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pickersgill: You should have been here in 1956.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —than to give the name of every road and the amount that was spent on every road. I will give to this house all the information I have here available and put it on the record so you can go back and say that this is being done.

To those in British Columbia you can say that a road is being built under agreement 255 miles in length. The amount that was spent up to March 31, 1959 was $2,040,000. You can say in Alberta there is general agreement now on a road program for 430 miles of road and that all the province spent there up to March 31, 1959 was $500,000. In Saskatchewan there is agreement as far as the actual roads are concerned on 824 miles of road. Work started on May 5, 1958, last year, and is still continuing. The province's expenditures to March 31, 1959 are $2,500,000. In Manitoba the agreement calls for 688 miles of road. They started work on May 28 last year. The expenditures up to March 31, are $1,500,000. In Ontario the agreement at the present time calls for 355 miles of road. The amount actually spent up to March 31, 1959 was $200,000. When I hear here of all these roads starting and stopping after election time may I say that there could not have been too much there under this program because that is all we spent on this program.

In New Brunswick the agreement calls for 417 miles of road. They did $1,500,000 worth of work last year. In Nova Scotia the agreement calls for 465 miles of road and $2,500,000 was spent last year. In Prince Edward Island, 343 miles of road—on that little island—and they spent $2,500,000 last year. In Newfoundland, 269 miles of road so far have been agreed upon and they spent $220,000 last year. The total amount spent last year up to March 31, 1959 was $12,960,000. The amounts that we will have to pay can be easily discovered.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did I understand the minister to say that they spent $2,500,000 in Prince Edward Island? I thought the limit for each province was $1,500,000.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The limit each year in a province is $3 million, of which we pay one-half, $1,500,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: And $2,500,000 was spent in Prince Edward Island last year?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That is the figure I have here.

Mr. Winch: The information given us by the minister is most interesting and we appreciate it. We are now discussing this afternoon the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1960. The minister was most interesting, yes and informative, but I want to draw to the attention of the minister the fact that we are discussing now vote 280, which is the contribution to the provinces to assist in the development of roads leading to resources in accordance wtih agreements entered into by Canada and the provinces, and for that, in the period starting April 1 of this year until March 31 of next year, the minister is asking for the sum of $9 million. That is not for something in the past but for something in the future.

The only answer we have had from the minister so far is: "It is confidential; I cannot break confidences." Mr. Chairman, I say that if the members of this House of Commons are being asked to give authority for the payment of $9 million, then we are entitled to know where and why this $9 million is going to be spent. It is not good enough for us to wait until next year when the money has been spent. We have the authority now to decide whether the money shall be spent or not and I say that it is positively disgusting and disgraceful that the minister hides himself under the cloak that he has secret agreements with provinces and cannot tell the House of Commons, which has to pass the money, how, where or why the money will be spent.

Mr. Chairman, surely that is something that no one in this house should be entitled to anticipate or expect and as a matter of fact I have not even yet got the answer to the question I asked previously as to how it ties in with roads. But the important thing is this. The minister almost had a halo around his head when he told us how the money was spent last year. We are not discussing how the money was spent last year. That is a matter of public accounts and concerns the public accounts committee. What we have before us now is not the public accounts of last year but the estimates for the next 12 months, and under vote 280 we are being asked for $9 million. The minister has not told us one word yet. He has not taken us into his confidence one iota, except to say that he cannot because it is confidential with the provinces. Mr. Chairman, you may have something in common with the provinces and you may have some secret agreements, but it is the House of Commons which has to pass this $9 million and we are entitled to know how, why and where that $9 million is going to be spent. Until I get that answer I will have to reserve my opinion whether I vote for it or not because I want to know where, how and why this money is going to be spent.

Mr. Peters: I am not at all satisfied with the answer we got. I do not see why this should be secret in the first place, and I think it is high time the people of Ontario who have heard a great deal about access roads finally discovered where those access roads are. We have had an unpleasant record in Ontario with roads under a Conservative government, roads which were never built that we passed money for, particularly the bridge sections of those roads. I do not think that a federal Conservative government will be any better than a provincial Conservative government was, and I think parliament has the right to know where these particular roads are so that we can see if they are roads which are worth while or not. This seems to me a wonderful way of passing out patronage between the province and the federal government, when you do not have to explain where there is a road or there is not a road. We have to take the minister's word that there are 335 miles already contracted for in Ontario and that we have already spent some $200,000. He did not give us the figures for the ones which were not contracted for, I suppose because we did not ask for them.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that these roads have to serve some purpose, and they cannot serve a purpose unless they are known to the people in the communities nearby. I think we should point out to the minister that this $9 million in this particular item is not only in this year but was in last year. There is no difference between the item this year as compared with last year. I am not familiar with the geographical situation in the province of Prince Edward Island, but it always seemed to me that it was a fairly small province and I am surprised to find that $2,500,000 was spent in looking for the resources in that province. It indicates to me that there is probably not the supervision of this program that the minister envisioned for the Canadian people when he talked about it in the first place.

A great deal was said about these resource roads in the recent provincial election in the province of Ontario. At that time in various ridings there was reference to roads being built in the next riding, but there was no reference to the ones in my particular riding. I heard of roads which were going to be built from Timmins to Kapuskasing and other roads going to be built in numerous places, and I think we are entitled to this information and we are going to demand that it be made available to the committee. If not I will be quite happy to talk on this item until six o'clock and the minister can think it over during the weekend.

We are very much in favour of this roads to resources program. We know there are many areas in our part of the country in northern Ontario that have not been developed, and one of the reasons they have not been developed is that we have not been able to get roads put into those particular areas. In the province of Ontario the department of mines has gone into highway construction. Throughout northern Ontario they are building various sections of highways which the department of highways usually take over after they are completed. I had hoped that this would be the same type of program that would happen under this particular vote.

I can envision many roads being constructed, and I want to refer to one of them, the road from Kowganda and Shining Tree, West Tree, into the area of Sultan in the Chapleau district. This road is already completed and about 80 or 100 miles is owned by the K.P.C. The Kalamazoo Parchment Company have a big business in that area and they built a road at their own expense and closed it off to traffic, with the exception of the vehicles of some private individuals who have permission from the company to go through. This is a very important road because it opens up that new area in Kowganda, which is a well developed mining area.

This would mean that the tourist traffic, particularly from the area of Sault Ste. Marie and other areas would be greatly stimulated because of the benefit which would arise through having this important area of our country opened up to the public and made available for industrial development. I should like to know what consideration has been given to the roads which, we heard a year ago, were the only ones in which the minister was going to take an interest, that is those along the north branch of the Canadian National Railways. I was surprised, I must say, to hear that some of these roads were being built in places such as the province of Prince Edward Island—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I wonder if, in an effort to save the time of the committee, I could intervene at this point by reminding the committee that I said that if any hon. member asked me about a road that was approved I could tell him whether or not that was the case. The hon. member has mentioned a road, and I can tell him that the road which he has mentioned was proposed by the Ontario government and approved.

Mr. Fisher: I am willing to accept that. The minister has given me the information as it affects a constituency, but it was information given to me in confidence. The fact remains that other parties had not treated it in confidence. Surely if you have a deal and they do not keep one aspect of it, you can do something about it.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): That is the way you would operate.

Mr. Fisher: The Minister of National Health and Welfare says: "That is the way you would operate." So this is a fine way to operate, is it? We have got a sunshine blowhard up at the lakehead who announces every culvert and bridge crossing that comes along and he has been announcing them for months in connection with the roads to resources program, and I consider it an insult to the House of Commons that he should be announcing federal jobs. This affects other departments of government, and the situation produces its ridiculous aspects when you have a situation arising where a minister of defence production is unwilling to give information on particular questions addressed to him while this sunshine blowhard is spreading the information up there. All this party understanding business on the provincial and federal level depresses me. This is the sort of thing I could get very annoyed about—and I do not often get annoyed—because it involves the dignity of members of this house —I don't care whether they are Conservatives, Liberals or members of the C.C.F. I admit that the minister in this regard has been fair with me, within the limits that he has announced. I have been able to go to his office and get the information. But this is a damnable situation, and one to which I object very strongly. I suggest that an hon. member has the right to know if a contract has been broken—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If the hon. member will take my word for it, I will call the premier and ask permission to forget this mutual understanding of the two governments, though, no doubt, that will cause some embarrassment in other provinces. I will certainly phone the premier, and I am quite certain that if it is correct that the information is around the province he would agree that there is no reason to keep it quiet. The election is over.

An hon. Member: There is the answer.

Mr. Peters: What a horrible admission. "The election is over". How little use some ministers have for the rights of parliament when they can make that kind of statement. That makes it even worse—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I think we had better have some order brought into this committee. I am speaking on a point of order. I gave an answer to the hon. member and in giving that answer I stated quite candidly that I could not see there was any reason whatever of a political nature—there was no election in the offing —for not giving this information and immediately this stampede starts. My point of order is this: if we are going to conduct this committee of estimates, we have to decide whether we are going to have information about my department or whether we are going to fight a political battle in this committee. I think you should decide whether the type of stuff that has been going on this afternoon is in order or not.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order which has been raised, I cannot understand a man in the position of the minister of northern affairs suggesting that the remarks that have been made are remarks which should not be made by a member of parliament. We have heard the word "McCarthyism" hurled back and forth across this floor this afternoon. This would suggest to me that the minister is not only hurling the accusation, but also trying to practise it. The minister has said now: "We shall make this information available; why not? The election is over." What a slur on the House of Commons, that we should now get information because an election is over.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Argue: I have the floor on a point of order and I refuse to sit down for the minister.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): Kindly address the Chair.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, that is a fine remark. I was speaking on a point of order when I was rudely interrupted by the minister of northern affairs.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, you cannot have a point of order and a question of privilege at the same time. Now, on the point of order—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I want a ruling on this question regarding a point of order and a point of privilege.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): It being six o'clock I do now rise and report progress.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, there is a question that I wish to bring to your attention.

Mr. Speaker: The business of the house has been terminated, though a discussion on the business of the following day is usually permitted.

Mr. Winch: This is on the business of the house. A situation occurred in the committee and the question was raised with the deputy chairman as to whether or not a question of privilege could be raised on a point of order. I would like you as Speaker to give a direction, not perhaps now but at the next sitting.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member will state his point then.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister who is leading the house what the business will be for all of next week?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I was given to understand that some agreement had been reached among the whips of the parties and with the house leader with regard to attempting to terminate the business next week, on the understanding that we would complete the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources today and perhaps those of trade and commerce; but because of the developments that have occurred, I think all I can reasonably do at the present time is announce the government order of business for Monday.

The first item will be No. 12 on today's order paper having to do with grants to the province of Newfoundland. The second item will be No. 1 on today's order paper having to do with an extension of long term mortgage credit to farmers; No. 3 will be No. 11 on today's order paper, the resolution to approve the international wheat agreement; No. 4 will be No. 9 on today's order paper, the resolution with regard to approving the convention on the nationality of married women; No. 5 will be No. 7 on today's order paper, the second reading of Bill No. S-25, to confirm an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Nova Scotia; No. 6 will be No. 4 on today's order paper, a somewhat similar agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of New Brunswick; and No. 7 will be the second reading of Bill No. S-2, to amend the Public Lands Grant Act.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house what estimates will be taken up next week?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be advisable now to await the return of the house leader who apparently had some discussion with members on the other side as to the business for next week. We have his suggestions already with regard to estimates. I presume they would be taken in this order, the completion of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, followed by trade and commerce; then, mines and technical surveys; national health and welfare, fisheries, post office, secretary of state, privy council, national revenue, legislation and finance.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what we shall do on Tuesday in case the items that were mentioned were completed on Monday?

Mr. Winch: I understand legislation will be the last?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, having announced the business for Monday, in the present circumstances I think that is as far as I should go. The house leader will give the announcement on Monday night.

Mr. Chevrier: If we do not complete the business mentioned for Monday will we go on with that business on Tuesday?

Mr. Churchill: Oh, yes, and with any other bills that have not been dealt with. For example, the first item on Monday will be the resolution on the grants to Newfoundland. If that passes, then second reading of that would follow on Tuesday. I think the legislative program I have announced might well consume the two days' time.

It being eight minutes past six o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on June 25.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CHANGING OF GUARD, PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Question No. 520—Mr. Dupuis:

1. Has the government been requested to choose members of the armed forces, rather than those of our illustrious Royal Canadian Mounted Police, to carry out the daily changing of the guard in front of the parliament buildings?

2. If so, by whom were such requests made, and on what occasion?

3. Has the government decided to establish this British tradition permanently in Canada?

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

1, 2 and 3. As on previous occasions, a military guard was mounted on government house during the residence of Her Majesty the Queen. Following a number of requests, including representations from the Ottawa board of trade, arrangements were made to continue this practice during the summer months and to carry out the ceremony of the changing of this guard, which is a traditional ceremonial drill of the Canadian army, on the lawns in front of the parliament buildings.

It is not the practice for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to undertake this type of ceremony.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES—STATEMENT RESPECTING VISIT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, the right hon. Prime Minister and myself had the pleasure of holding a talk with Hon. Mr. Herter and his principal advisers for about 3½ hours on Saturday last. When the meeting ended we issued a brief communiqué which I might read to the house for the benefit of those who may not have seen it in the press. I might add that I have not seen it in the press myself. This is the release:

The Secretary of State of the United States, Honourable Christian Herter, en route to Geneva for the resumption of the foreign ministers' meeting called today on the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Mr. Herter, Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Green met for some time this morning at the Prime Minister's residence for discussions which were continued during and after lunch. Matters of general international concern were considered as well as subjects of special interest to the United States and Canada.

The Secretary of State was accompanied by Mr. Livingston Merchant, assistant secretary of state for European affairs—whom we all knew so well as ambassador in Canada of the United States and whom we all liked so very much—

—Mr. Frederick Reinhardt, counselor of the department of state and Mr. Tyler Thompson, minister at the United States embassy. Mr. Norman Robertson, under secretary of state for external affairs and Mr. Arnold Heeney, Canadian ambassador to the United States, were with the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I am sure hon. members will appreciate that there is very little that I am at liberty to say publicly concerning the substance of matters which were discussed. Mr. Herter and his advisers were on their way back to the resumed session of the foreign ministers' conference which begins today in Geneva and it is only natural in these circumstances that neither Mr. Herter nor the Canadian government would wish to make public views which may have a significant bearing on the difficult negotiations which are about to take place with the Soviet union.

I can say, however—and I think I can speak for the Prime Minister in this as well—that we were most impressed by the serious spirit and sense of purpose with which Mr. Herter is approaching this second round of talks, and that we have great confidence in his ability to engage in genuine negotiation without sacrificing any of the principles for which the western powers have consistently stood in respect of Berlin.

May I say also that the government—and I am sure all Canadians—appreciate greatly Mr. Herter having come to Ottawa at this particular time and given us this opportunity to have such a frank and valuable exchange of views on matters of common concern. As those who have met the Secretary of State of the United States well know, Mr. Herter is a man with great gifts for friendliness. It was in a spirit of two good friends—Canada and the United States—with many interests in common meeting to discuss these interests that the talks were held on Saturday. I should also like to say, Mr. Speaker, that it was a great help to have had the debate in the house last Thursday and to have the expression of support which we then received from both opposition parties in respect of the talks to be held at Geneva.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house appreciates the report which the minister has just made, as I am sure all hon. members here and indeed all Canadians appreciate the fact that the Secretary of State of the United States was able to stop off in Ottawa on his way back to Geneva.

I should like to associate myself and our party with what the minister has said about the new Secretary of State. I am sure all Canadians wish him well on the occasion of this conference and on future occasions of this kind. I am sure we all agree with the minister when he said that Mr. Herter is peculiarly qualified by experience and by ability to carry on the important work that has been entrusted to him. It is well that the Canadian government should be informed on these matters even though we may not be represented at the particular meeting, because our commitments and our responsibilities are definitely and deeply involved. If there is to be that essential unity inside the coalition that we all work for there must be this kind of consultation in advance of decision.

I quite appreciate the fact that it would be unfair to ask the minister to give us details of the negotiations which are taking place. That is not the way in which negotiations can best be conducted. But I think we are agreed that the principle which underlies these negotiations should be the maintenance of western rights in Berlin and that if there is to be any alteration of the situation there, it should not be at the expense of those rights. I think Mr. Herter's visit also emphasizes the unity inside the western coalition, which as I said is essential and is perhaps one of the most gratifying features of the earlier negotiations. Although there have been disappointments in the past I hope that during the weeks ahead, if there are to be further meetings, with this strong, fundamental unity among the three western foreign ministers, and with flexibility in negotiation, perhaps the new session will be able to come to some satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this group are very pleased to hear the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs of his meeting with Mr. Herter. We are glad to hear of these discussions, because we believe that discussions are the essence of progress toward some agreement and some final settlement of all our problems. Before taking my seat I do want to say how pleased we are that the government has emphasized its support for a summit conference and for the value of continuing negotiations during these difficult times.

TRADE

REPORTED STATEMENT BY U.S. SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture if his attention has been directed to a statement made by Mr. Ezra Benson, the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, who in a speech over the week end stressed the desirability of free trade between Canada and the United States, particularly in agricultural products. Has this statement been brought to the attention of the government, and is the Minister of Agriculture in a position to make any comment?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): The answer to all those questions, Mr. Speaker, is no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I, in answer to this very succinct reply, ask the minister if he would be good enough to look at the observations of his counterpart in the United States, study them, and be prepared to comment in this house upon them before we prorogue, if we ever do?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to look at Mr. Benson's speech. Whether I shall be prepared to comment on it I will not know until after I have read the speech.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON WINTER WORKS PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether it is the intention of the government to proceed with a winter works program for the coming winter months?

Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think in view of the fact that earlier questions have been directed to the Minister of Labour, and as the Minister of Labour will be here for the rest of the session, this question might be allowed to stand until his return.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENTS ON SALE OF VESSELS TO CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I would like to address a question to the Minister of Transport, the genesis of which is our interest in the accounts receivable by the government of Canada. Can the minister give the house any information as to the payments received on account to date with respect to the Canadian National ships which were sold to Cuban interests?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member will realize, not having given me notice of this question except for a very small slip of paper which indicated, as I sat down in my seat, that he intended to ask the question, that I cannot carry figures of that kind in my head. I will inquire of the management of the Canadian National Railways to find out the situation in that regard, and will be glad to report to the house when I have that information.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BILL OF RIGHTS—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday the hon. member for Skeena asked me a question and I said there would be an answer today. I rise simply to say that I trust the answer will be given tomorrow; it is not forthcoming at the moment.

HARBOURS

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—STATEMENT ON REPORTED WRECKAGE OF PILOT BOAT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday the hon. member for Lapointe asked me a question regarding the possible location of the pilot boat which was sunk in Saint John harbour two years ago. I have inquired into this and found that the object which was located in Saint John harbour is now definitely identified as the pilot boat which sank a couple of years ago.

We are in process of making arrangements to have the boat raised, and this, of course, would involve any bodies that might be found.

FINANCE

MEASURE TO PROVIDE ADDITIONAL GRANTS TO NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the payment of additional grants to the province of Newfoundland.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. McCleave in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The resolution before the committee asks leave to introduce a measure to provide for the payment of additional grants to the province of Newfoundland. The bill for the introduction of which leave is now sought will provide authority for the payment to the province of Newfoundland of amounts recommended by the royal commission on the terms of union with Newfoundland for the fiscal years 1957-58 to 1961-62 inclusive. This bill may well find itself placed among the important constitutional documents of our country. The operative portion of the measure is brief but the bill will contain extensive recitals. Having regard to the nature and importance of this legislation I may say I hope to approach the subject in keeping with the seriousness of it for the Canadian confederation.

Ten years have passed, sir, since Newfoundland, the Atlantic outpost of this continent, joined the Canadian family. This act of confederation brought a sense of completion to the farsighted work of the fathers of confederation which had not been until that time, attained. The only regret of Canadians in the other parts of Canada was that Newfoundland's entry into the Canadian family had been long delayed. Had Newfoundland come in during earlier years Newfoundlanders and other Canadians, in this expanded realm, might have grown together and Newfoundlanders might have played their influential part from the beginning of confederation in fashioning the history of this new young nation and adding to her glories and her destiny, as they are doing now and as Newfoundlanders will continue to do.

Forty-four years had passed since the last provincial members had been previously added to confederation, in 1905, and all Canadians welcomed with enthusiasm the entry of Newfoundland into the Canadian family. This is the spirit, I am sure, in which the house approaches this present measure today. It is in the larger spirit of the larger Canada.

Our concern in this present measure must, of course, relate to the financial basis of Newfoundland's confederation with Canada. I shall not delay the committee by any extended review of the financial terms of confederation. They are contained in articles 23 to 29 of the terms of confederation.

Article 23 related to the assumption of debt. Article 24 related to the disposal of the financial surplus that Newfoundland had at that time; article 25 to the retention by Newfoundland of its interest in the proceeds of a particular loan at that time. Article 26 provided for the payment of annual subsidies by Canada to the province of Newfoundland, and it is under that provision that the subsidies have been paid in the interval. Article 27 provided for the entry of Newfoundland into a tax agreement with Canada similar to that which had been entered into by the majority of the provinces at that time in relation to the sharing of the proceeds of the direct standard taxes. Article 28 provided for the payment of a series of annual transitional grants over a period of 12 years by Canada to Newfoundland.

These grants, for the first three years, were to be in the amount of $6,500,000 each, and from that point they graduated down until in the tenth year the amount was to be $1,050,000; in the eleventh year, $700,000, and in the twelfth year, $350,000. The last of these payments will be made in the fiscal year which will end on March 31, 1961.

Then we proceed to article 29, from which the measure now under discussion stems. The background of article 29 of the terms of union is, I am sure, well known to all members of the house. There existed at the time of confederation wide differences in the degree of development attained in Newfoundland as compared with the rest of Canada. Newfoundland, with Labrador, is a land of vast resources, but while there had been some development of those resources the great period of their development lay in the future. There was in Newfoundland a pronounced lack of what has come to be known as social capital, public investment in roads, schools, hospitals and other services. Communication was limited. The island government, however, was virtually free of debt.

Under these circumstances it was quite clear to those who negotiated the terms of confederation that following the union there would be what I might call a period of bridging the gaps. Premier Smallwood has called it a period of transition. The gaps which it was contemplated would need to be bridged involved time, first, to equalize services in Newfoundland wih those in other parts of Canada, and time also, in the second place, to develop the tremendous potential of Newfoundland. So far as the equalization of services was concerned, regard was had in term 29 to the state of taxation in the three maritime provinces.

I have stressed that this was a period of bridging the gaps or, as Mr. Smallwood has called it, a period of transition. It was not contemplated that this period would last forever. On the contrary, it was thought of as a period that would be limited in time, but at that stage no one could say how long the period would continue.

Now, sir, I think it appropriate to examine the terms of article 29. It reads as follows:

> In view of the difficulty of predicting with sufficient accuracy the financial consequences to Newfoundland of becoming a province of Canada, the government of Canada will appoint a royal commission within eight years from the date of union to review the financial position of the province of Newfoundland and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required by the government of the province of Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union, without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island.

It may be, Mr. Chairman, that the terms of this article have not been always clearly understood. It may be that in a sense they have been oversold in the understanding of some in relation to the fair interpretation of this important article. It is clear on examination that the elements in this article of union are as follows. First, the royal commission was to be a federal royal commission. In the second place, it was to be appointed within a period of eight years after the first day of April, 1949. No time was set for the completion of the hearings of the royal commission or the date of its report. The provision simply was that the appointment should be made before March 31, 1957. The reason given in the article for the appointment of the royal commission is in the opening words. It relates to the difficulty of predicting with sufficient accuracy the financial consequences to Newfoundland of becoming a province of Canada.

The purpose the royal commission was to serve was twofold. First, it was to conduct a review and, second, it was to make recommendations. It was in the first place to review the financial position of the province of Newfoundland, and in the second place it was to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that might be required by Newfoundland. "Additional financial assistance" obviously means in addition to the transitional grants provided for in article 28 and the subsidies provided in article 26. The purpose of the additional financial assistance, if any, was, first, to continue the public services reached in the post-union period. It is quite clear, and this has been a matter of comment since, that it was not to improve these services but to continue them. And second, this was to be done without resorting to taxation heavier in relation to capacity to pay than obtained in the three maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

The terms of reference of the royal commission were thus completely defined in article 29. The article, it may seem strange to some in reading it, makes no provision whatever for what is to follow the report of the royal commission. It is completely silent on that point. It gives no indication of what disposal shall be made of the recommendations the royal commission might make. Indeed, in terms of the express obligations created by this article it is quite clear that the only obligation expressly created on the part of the federal government was the appointment of a royal commission.

This limited extent of the provisions of article 29 was clearly recognized in the debate in this house on the terms of union, which occurred in February, 1949. The then prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, in introducing the resolution on February 7, 1949 made this comment on article 29 as recorded at page 289 of Hansard:

> It was also provided that within eight years from the coming into force of the terms of union a commission would be set up to examine the situation anew, and to report as to whether or not the terms provided are working satisfactorily and are sufficient to bring about the object of equalizing the lot of the people of the new province with that of the people of the older provinces. There is no undertaking to implement any terms of recommendation that may be made at that time by a royal commission. It was felt by the Newfoundland delegation, and by the representatives of the Canadian government, that this was something that was being entered into in a spirit of fairness on both sides, and that it was not necessary to make binding stipulations about what would happen with respect to the report of a royal commission. It was felt if there was an investigation and a report by a commission, in which the public at that time would have confidence, the legislators of that day could well be trusted to do what would prove to be right in order to make this enlarged nation a united nation continuing on its path of progress toward its great destiny.

I am sure every hon. member of this present parliament would applaud in full that comment made by Mr. St. Laurent on February 7, 1949. It is unquestionably an interpretation of the terms of article 29 to which no exception can be taken by anyone and it correctly expresses, I am sure, the spirit of the Canadian parliament in this day and in the days to come.

I may say that the same issue arose in the hearings of the royal commission, as was indeed inevitable. I will just mention several of the passages in the proceedings of the royal commission where the question arose. At page 1504 of the proceedings the chairman of the royal commission, Chief Justice McNair of New Brunswick, made this comment on the terms of article 29 and the work of the royal commission. He said:

> Anything we do here will have no binding effect.

Further, at pages 1512 and 1513 the chairman said, and this time his remarks were replied to by Mr. Carl Goldenberg, the very distinguished counsel who represented the province of Newfoundland before the royal commission:

> A number of questions arise in my mind on this point, Mr. Goldenberg. Our recommendation alone—

That is the recommendation of the commission.

> —will create nothing binding.

Mr. Goldenberg replied "No". Then the chairman commented further on page 1513:

> Our recommendation alone has no effect.

To this Mr. Goldenberg replied:

> It is only a recommendation to the government of Canada.

Premier Smallwood, and I add this for the completion of the record on this subject, at pages 1604 and 1605 apparently approached the question from a slightly different point of view. In speaking of term 29 he said:

> —but spells out—I thought until this hearing—very carefully and very clearly the actual words of the terms of reference.

He proceeded to base his argument on the terms and he said:

> The recommendations you make—

He was addressing the royal commission.

> —will morally bind not only the government of Canada to submit them to the parliament of Canada with their own qualified recommendation, but will morally bind the parliament of Canada to adopt them.

Premier Smallwood was there basing his argument on a moral obligation, while it was quite clear it was the stated view of the commission, as it was of the eminent counsel who appeared on behalf of Newfoundland before the royal commission, that there was no explicit or binding obligation. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I pause at this time simply to draw this inference in the light of the statements of Mr. St. Laurent, who was prime minister in 1949, and the statements by Chief Justice McNair and Mr. Goldenberg that what we do now in this parliament in 1959 is not done under any literal compulsion or binding stipulation, for there is none in article 29 or elsewhere. What we do now is an expression of the desire of the Canadian parliament and the Canadian people to be just and fair to our new partner in confederation, according to the abiding conceptions of justice and fair play of the Canadian people and their parliament.

These are the same conceptions of justice and fair play which animated the Canadians in 1867, in 1870, in 1871, in 1873 and in 1905 on the occasion of the accession of the other provinces to the federated family. It is the same spirit in which I am sure we can trust the parliament of Canada in the year 1962 to approach the same problem.

The royal commission was appointed by the former government on February 21, 1957 in fulfilment and discharge of the obligation created by article 29. The order in council naturally follows precisely and verbatim the language of article 29. I think regard must be had naturally to the personnel of the royal commission, particularly in the light of the language used by Mr. St. Laurent as I quoted him in 1949 when he referred to the commission at that time as men in whom the public would have confidence. Three distinguished commissioners were chosen; one was the chief justice of New Brunswick, Chief Justice McNair, who was chairman of the commission; the next member of the commission was Sir Albert Walsh, chief justice of Newfoundland, who had participated as one of the representatives of Newfoundland in the negotiation of the terms of union. The third member was Mr. John Deutsch, former assistant deputy minister of finance.

I do not need to say, I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that any royal commission composed of men of the experience and capacity of the members of this commission must be regarded with great respect in any part of Canada. The personnel of this commission was quite evidently chosen by the Canadian government of that time in consultation with the government of Newfoundland, because it is quite clear that the personnel of the commission was completely satisfactory to the government of Newfoundland. I have before me a press dispatch dated February 25, 1957, which appeared in the Charlottetown Guardian and which reads:

> A beaming Premier Smallwood groped for superlatives Friday to express his delight at the choice of members for the royal commission to review Newfoundland's financial terms of union with Canada.
> Work of the commission, whose appointment was announced in the commons Friday by Prime Minister St. Laurent, would be "of absolutely terrific importance to Newfoundland," Mr. Smallwood told a press conference.
>
> The future of Newfoundland's "standards and levels of services will be determined by the recommendations of the commission," he said. It would recommend "the form and scale" of additional financial assistance.
>
> Commission chairman John McNair, chief justice and former premier of New Brunswick, was "long a personal friend of mine," Mr. Smallwood said. Mr. McNair was "a famous fighter for maritime rights and after we went in for Atlantic provinces rights."
> John James Deutsch was "probably the most knowledgeable man in all Canada of federal-provincial affairs." He was "a great friend of Newfoundland . . . a man of great sympathy for Newfoundland."
> Of Newfoundland Chief Justice Sir Albert Walsh, third of the three commission members, Mr. Smallwood said "Newfoundland could be searched from end to end and we would not find a better man to represent Newfoundland on this royal commission. He is thoroughly informed."

When we as a government came into office on June 21, 1957 the royal commission had not yet commenced its sittings, and asked for directions from the new government in that respect. We requested the royal commission to carry on, and did everything in our power as a government to facilitate their inquiry.

The royal commission had not proceeded very far before it encountered the inevitable difficulties raised by the vague and nebulous terms of the reference which had been taken from article 29. The difficulties confronting the royal commission revolved principally around the problem of projecting a selected year into the indefinite future. It was the difficulty of determining future needs on the basis of past conditions.

This problem is quite clear to anyone reading the report, and it confronted the royal commission with constant difficulties. I shall not detain the committee by an extended review or an attempt at an extended review of the report of the royal commission. I am assuming that all hon. members are acquainted with its contents. Perhaps I might just mention a few passages in passing to emphasize the highlights of the report, both as to the difficulties confronting the royal commission and as to their findings. On page 3 we find this sentence:

> The economy of Newfoundland was more highly dependent upon external markets than any Canadian region.

> The new provincial government came into existence virtually free of debt and with $40 million in its treasury. These substantial resources were available for the improvement of public services and the promotion of economic development. However, these tasks had to be assumed under a number of serious handicaps. Unlike the rest of Canada, Newfoundland had not received the benefits of over 80 years of aggressive federal policies designed to assist economic development and to foster economic expansion. Newfoundland had been outside the great national structure of transportation facilities, highly developed government services, and extensive regional and industrial supports. Newfoundland was without a modern system of transportation. In the greater part of the populated area there were no roads whatever and in the remainder only a few miles were up to modern standards. The natural resources were largely unsurveyed and unexplored. Very few intensive investigations had been carried out. Little or no research had been applied to problems of untilization and marketing, even in the fisheries.

At page 5:

In this respect Newfoundland was at about the same stage as the maritime provinces were in 1867.

At page 8—

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister would mind reading the few lines in between.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, I shall be glad to read them. I am trying to pick out the essential highlights of the report without spending too much time on it. The words in the interval between those two last passages are as follows:

"Newfoundland has had a long history of poverty; and this poverty meant the neglect of the public services."

That quotation is taken from the submismission of the province of Newfoundland to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects. The report continues:

The deficiency in the public services was strongly evident in the lack of social capital and in the limited development of the social services. Aside from St. John's, and a few other centres the province was without municipal organizations or municipal facilities. In this respect Newfoundland was at about the same stage as the maritime provinces were in 1867.

At page 8:

There have been few really major improvements in the levels and standards of services. The deficiencies of the past have not been substantially overcome.

Further down:

The Newfoundland portion of the trans-Canada highway is not more than a quarter completed in terms of total estimated cost. There is no trans-provincial road whatever. The majority of the numerous small settlements in the province are still without any road connections.

Further down:

In short, Newfoundland is confronted with the urgent task of modernization, but is without the modern means of mobility and communication.

At the bottom of the page and extending over to page 9:

The average per capita incomes in Newfoundland are further affected by the more limited opportunities for female workers and by the fact that the proportion of the population of working age is significantly smaller than elsewhere in Canada. In 1956, 41 per cent of the population of Newfoundland was under 15 years of age as compared with 32 per cent for Canada as a whole.

Further down on page 9:

The addition of Labrador to Canadian territory has added also another frontier rich in minerals and water power. Labrador is already making its contribution to the vital role which undeveloped frontiers have played in the history of national economic expansion.

Then on page 16 in the course of the financial review the report proceeds:

The total of the federal payments—

This is in the post-union period.

—comprised 73 per cent of the total provincial net revenue in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1951 and 48 per cent in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957.

Further down on the same page:

In other words, during the past three years the revenues of the province on ordinary account have fallen more and more short of the requirements for ordinary expenditures.

Further down on the same page:

In the most recent fiscal year ending March 31, 1958, the estimated financial requirement was nearly $16 million, all of which would have had to be borrowed.

Then on page 18:

In the early years the debt position of the provincial government was very favourable. At the outset the provincial government had in hand a substantial net cash surplus and was virtually free of any net debt charges. Since 1952 the provincial debt has increased steadily.

And further down:

The total estimated net direct and indirect debt of the government of Newfoundland outstanding on March 31, 1958, was $71.0 million. This total amounted to $163 per capita compared with about twice this amount per capita for the governments of the maritime provinces combined. These comparisons would appear to indicate that the debt position of the government of Newfoundland continues to be favourable in relation to the maritime provinces.

Then on page 19 the commission enters upon chapter III which relates to the levels and standards of public services in Newfoundland. Here on page 19 the report points out—

The Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired. Is it the pleasure of the committee that the minister be permitted to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thank the committee, Mr. Chairman. On page 19 the report states as follows:

It must be assumed that the phrase "the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union" means the highest levels and standards reached. Otherwise term 29 has little meaning.

And further down:

The brief presented on behalf of the government of the province of Newfoundland in support of additional financial assistance assumes that the highest levels and standards of public service reached subsequent to the date of union were reached in the fiscal year 1956-57.

Then at page 25:

The calculations show that there has been a fairly steady improvement in the per capita levels and standards of public service over the period 1949 to 1956 although half of that improvement was due to increased federal grants in aid. The level of service in 1956 was about 22 per cent higher than in 1949.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I turn to page 37, where the commission concludes its chapter on the burden of taxation with this observation:

—we have come to the conclusion that the burdens imposed by the present tax systems of Newfoundland and the maritime provinces are of the same order and that, for the purposes of our inquiry, we should regard the burden as approximately equal.

Then at page 38 begins the important and final chapter V containing the recommendations of the commission. At page 38, after setting out certain tables, the commission reaches the conclusion that the revenue deficiency—and this is the final line of the table—including the transitional grant of $2,250,000 is $5,190,000 for the fiscal year in 1956-57. The commission's observation on this table is as follows:

It will be seen from the above table that the total requirements for 1956-57 exceeded the total revenue, exclusive of the transitional grant, by $5,190,000. In other words, on the basis of 1956-57 the province would require additional revenue of $5,190,000 less the transitional grant of $2,250,000, or $2,940,000, to continue public services at the levels and standards reached.

Then at page 39 in the next paragraph following we find this:

The terms of reference require the determination of the additional financial assistance necessary to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to union. In our view the words "to continue" involve consideration of the future at least as far as to make some assessment of the probable course of revenues and expenditures. While it is impossible to project the expenditure requirements and revenues of the province into the future, we feel that we should give consideration to the financial position of the provincial government as indicated by the estimates for the year 1957-58 furnished to us by the financial adviser to the province.

Then the commission proceeds to set forth a table relating to the fiscal year 1957-58, which concludes with this line:

Estimated revenue deficiency, including the transitional grant of $1,400,000, $8,102,000.

On that point the commission makes this comment:

The revenue deficiency indicated by the above table amounts to an estimated $8,102,000 inclusive of the transitional grant of $1,400,000 or $6,702,000 excluding the transitional grant.

Then on page 40, the final page of the report, the commission, after saying that with respect to the year 1957-58 the recession is no more than a temporary condition, proceeds to this final paragraph of the report:

After giving consideration to the deficiency in revenue indicated by our calculations for the fiscal years 1956-57 and 1958-59 and after attempting to make a fair and equitable assessment in respect of the uncertainties and special factors mentioned above, we find that the government of Newfoundland requires, as from April, 1957, additional financial assistance of $8,000,000 per annum, less the transitional grant while it applies, "to enable it to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island". Accordingly we recommend additional financial assistance as follows:

(a) for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1957, $8,000,00 less the transitional grant of $1,400,000 or, $6,600,000;

(b) for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1958, $8,000,000 less the transitional grant of $1,050,000 or, $6,950,000;

(c) for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1959, $8,000,000 less the transitional grant of $700,000 or, $7,300,000;

(d) for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1960, $8,000,000 less the transitional grant of $350,000 or $7,650,000;

(e) thereafter $8,000,000 per annum.

The report concludes at that point. It is signed by the three commissioners and evidently is a unanimous report. I have already said, Mr. Chairman, that having regard to the personnel of this royal commission its recommendations are entitled to great respect.

There are two questions which arise, I think, when anyone reads this report. The first is as to why, without any explanation, in the final chapter the royal commission departed from the year 1956-57, which was the basic year upon which all the evidence had been submitted up to that point, and chose to base its recommendation on the fiscal year 1957-58. That question remains unanswered.

The second question which arises is as to what the commission meant by the word "thereafter" in the final line of the final recommendation. This naturally presents a question, and in endeavouring to determine the meaning to be given to this expression in the report one must of course have regard to the fact that these commissioners are not men who are given to expressing themselves in words of imprecise meaning. Had they meant to say that these payments were to run indefinitely I think it might be expected that they would have said so explicitly. Certain it is that the province of Newfoundland did not ask or expect the royal commission to make any recommendations of this nature that would have indefinite effect. Indeed, counsel for the province, Mr. Goldenberg, in his submission dealt with this subject explicitly. At page 621 of the proceedings

Mr. Goldenberg, after dealing with the annual amount sought by the province of Newfoundland, made this comment:

> This is the minimum additional financial assistance now required in order to continue the existing levels and standards of services on a most conservative basis. It is not suggested, however, that such assistance will be required indefinitely.

Then further, at pages 627 and 628, Mr. Goldenberg, the eminent counsel for Newfoundland, again dealt with this aspect in his submission to the royal commission on July 26. He said:

> Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not suggesting that this additional financial assistance will be required by Newfoundland indefinitely. As Newfoundland's public services improve and its economy expands, the differentials in income and in tax burdens as compared with other provinces will narrow; with the narrowing of the gap, the dependence on grants from the government of Canada will decline. Accordingly, while Newfoundland is now entitled, under the provisions of term 29 of the terms of union, to receive additional annual financial assistance of the order of $17,000,000, provision should be made for a further review of its financial and economic position within a reasonable period of time.
> Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the government of Newfoundland I submit that the government of Newfoundland is entitled to claim from the government of Canada an annual grant of $17,000,000 subject to the adjustments which we have discussed over and above all other federal grants as the additional financial assistance required under the explicit provisions of term 29. I recommend further that the said grant should be paid annually to the province of Newfoundland, commencing in the fiscal year 1957-58. I recommend that the amount of the said annual grant should thereafter be subject to periodic review. That, Mr. Chairman, completes my presentation of the case under term 29.

I may add, Mr. Chairman, that throughout the hearings on more than one occasion the same theme had been reiterated, that the annual amounts which were being asked for by Newfoundland were not being asked on the basis of a period of indefinite duration but that there should be a further and later review.

Mr. Chairman, I do not need to remind the house of the reaction of the government of Newfoundland to the report when it was made public in July of 1958. If I say the report was received with keen disappointment in Newfoundland, I perhaps understate the reaction in the tenth province. This subject was discussed in this house last September, and I am sure I do not need to remind hon. members of the expressions used on that occasion. However, the discussion occurred, on September 4 and 6 and the comments of the premier of Newfoundland on the recommendations are recorded in Hansard at page 4724 of September 6. Feelings in Newfoundland were obviously deeply disturbed by the report, and the comments of the head of the government of the province were put in strong terms.

A meeting followed, Mr. Chairman, in Ottawa last January 26. Premier Smallwood and Mr. Spencer, the provincial treasurer of Newfoundland, came to Ottawa accompanied by Mr. A. B. Perlin, who had been a member of the royal commission which had prepared the submission which the province made to the federal royal commission, as well as Mr. Carl Goldenberg, the counsel. Premier Smallwood and Mr. Spencer met with the Prime Minister and myself in the morning. The conference continued in the afternoon without the Prime Minister, but officials of the Department of Finance were also present on this occasion.

I am not going to review in detail the nature of the extended and friendly discussions which were held at that time. Premier Smallwood was highly critical of the report of the royal commission. He criticized it on various grounds, and he asked that the federal government provide larger payments than those recommended. He pressed for a review at a later date on the subject of fiscal relations between the province and the dominion. He pointed out he had previously recommended that there should be this further and later review. In the course of the discussion possible dates for such a review were mentioned, and Mr. Smallwood suggested that in view of the imponderables in the situation concerning the future, this review should take place in the year 1965, or thereabouts; and he referred to the fact, as he put it, that there had already been ten reviews of the financial provision made on behalf of the maritime provinces in confederation since 1867.

I turn now to recall to the minds of hon. members that in the meantime, since the royal commission had been appointed in the spring of 1957, this government had moved, I think I may say swiftly, to enlarge the payments made to Newfoundland which were not related to the provisions of term 29. The Atlantic provinces adjustment grants came into effect on April 1, 1958, and provided for payments out of the federal treasury to the four Atlantic provinces of a total of $100 million over the four fiscal years then commencing. That provision had followed approval given to it at the dominion-provincial conference in November, 1957, and a meeting of representatives of the governments of the four Atlantic provinces at Halifax later in 1957, at which agreement had been reached as to the distribution of this $25 million annual payment from the federal treasury.

The agreement was that the payment should be divided at the rate of $7,500,000 each per annum, to Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and $2,500,000 to Prince Edward Island. It is, I think, of interest to say in this committee that the fact that there was this equal distribution among the three provinces of Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia reflects credit upon the attitude of the province of Nova Scotia, having regard to its very much larger population. Also an additional 3 per cent was provided for the provincial share of the yield from the standard taxes by an amendment to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

Those were increases in the unconditional payments made by the federal treasury to Newfoundland amounting in all to approximating $9 million per annum. On the side of conditional payments or cost sharing arrangements there was, of course, a very substantial addition for the benefit of Newfoundland. Here, Mr. Chairman, if the committee would approve, I might place on record for the information of hon. members a statistical summary of federal contributions to and for the benefit of Newfoundland for the fiscal years 1949-50 to 1959-60 inclusive classified under four headings; unconditional grants, conditional grants, payments for the benefit of provincial institutions and payments to individuals.

Mr. Pickersgill: On that point I think it would be extremely prejudicial to a dispassionate consideration of this case if those figures are to be given only for Newfoundland. I think they should be given for the four Atlantic provinces in exactly comparable form and for the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, with which comparisons have always been made in the past. Would the minister do that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not those figures with me, though they could be brought together. They were prepared for an order for return which was passed some time ago. However, I have not those figures here. While I believe we should consider this matter with the utmost harmony, having regard to its considerable constitutional importance, I could not agree that for this purpose the figures for other provinces have any relevance. The hon. gentleman and I may not agree on that. No one doubts that there were payments made to other provinces and that the payments were made in keeping with federal legislation, but this table which I was proposing to place at the disposal of hon. members is not put forward for the purpose of comparison with other provinces but simply to give the committee the factual data as to the provision which has been made and from which Newfoundland has derived benefit in the period since confederation.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister agree, however, that the payments which relate to the other provinces were made without consideration to any other payments which had been made previously as a result of obligations to those provinces?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, yes. I pointed out that these payments were made without any regard to the terms of term 29. In the preliminary figures for the years 1958-59 and 1959-60 this table includes the payments which are in contemplation as a result of the measure now under discussion.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Does the committee give the minister permission to include this compilation as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: In spite of the lack of courtesy shown me by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on Saturday, I do not object to what the Minister of Finance is asking for now.

Mr. Churchill: Nonsense. You were trying to break the rules, that was all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I appreciate the consideration extended by the hon. gentleman. I was simply putting this on the record because I thought the information might be of assistance to hon. members with regard to this point. I think it would be more useful to have them in the text of my remarks at this point rather than as an appendix to Hansard, and perhaps, Mr. Chairman, you would so direct.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Is it agreeable that the table be inserted in Hansard at this point of the proceedings?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The statistical summary referred to follows.]

STATISTICAL SUMMARY OF FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO NEWFOUNDLAND FOR THE FISCAL YEARS 1949-50 TO 1959-60

The statistical information for section A, unconditional grants, has been drawn from the public accounts of Canada. The information for section B, conditional grants, has been drawn for the fiscal years 1949-50 to 1952-53 from D.B.S. publication "Financial Statistics of Provincial Governments" and from fiscal year 1953-54 to 1957-58 from D.B.S. publication "Financial Statistics of the Government of Canada" which commenced publication with the former fiscal year. The figures for 1958-59 and 1959-60 are from various departmental sources and are preliminary. While the information is generally complete, in some cases no provincial distribution has been available and this has then been made on the basis of previous or anticipated experience.

The information in sections C and D is drawn from the public accounts of Canada, departmental and agency sources.

With respect to slum clearance (section B), this is the net cost. It does not include advances for purposes of land assembly and low cost housing projects some part of which is recoverable.

Grants to Newfoundland

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I hope not to detain the committee much longer. The government was faced with the necessity of making a decision with respect to the recommendations contained in the report of the royal commission, and to make such a decision in the light of what I have said about the extent of the provisions of article 29, of what I have said about the importance to be attached to the recommendation of the royal commission, the reservations on certain aspects, which one has on reading the report, and also the objections taken to the recommendation by the premier of Newfoundland notwithstanding what was said earlier about the personnel of the royal commission.

Under all the circumstances the government has decided to ask this house to make the following provision by the present bill. It has been decided to ask the house to provide for payments by the federal treasury to Newfoundland for the five-year period commencing April 1, 1957, and concluding March 31, 1962, at the rates recommended by the royal commission. The five-year period in question coincides with the current five-year period of agreements entered into in pursuance of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. Indeed, it coincides with the current five-year period prescribed by that particular enactment of this parliament.

If the bill receives the approval of parliament there will be provision made for payment in respect of these five years of course, over and above the transitional grants which expire on March 31, 1961, of a total of $36,500,000. Of this sum nearly one-half will become payable forthwith. The payments that were recommended for the fiscal years 1957-58 and 1958-59 and the first of the two semi-annual payments for the current fiscal year, 1959-60, will become immediately due and payable, and they aggregate $17.2 million.

It is proposed that this provision be made on a continuing basis by this bill, and that the matter should not be left to be dealt with by items in the annual estimates. In this respect the bill gives effect to the request made by Premier Smallwood. The payments, of course, will be unconditional.

The second aspect of the matter concerns what is to follow March 31, 1962. Already, as a result of decisions taken at the dominion-provincial conference of finance ministers and provincial treasurers last Monday and Tuesday, a comprehensive study of all aspects of federal-provincial fiscal relations has been proposed, approved and launched.

I point out that this bill notes and states that in the course of that comprehensive review not only will the circumstances of Newfoundland be taken into account along with those, of course, of any other provinces, but that any special circumstances relating to Newfoundland will be taken into account in determining the financial relations between Canada and Newfoundland after March 31, 1962. This position is clearly set out in a recital in the bill. Thus parliament is invited to place itself on record as giving to Newfoundland an assurance which, we are led to understand, means much to Newfoundland and to which that province will, it is expected, attach no little importance.

This, then, is the approach of the government in this important matter, and I think it may be quite fair to say that it is an approach in the spirit of confederation that we believe will be served through the medium of this significant measure. In conclusion may I point out that all financial relations between the dominion and the ten provinces of this country must be reviewed as at April 1, 1962.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, would the minister permit a question at this point. He said "must be reviewed". Could the minister give the statutory authority for that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not referring to statutory authority, Mr. Chairman. If my hon. friend will allow me to proceed I think he will see quite clearly what I mean. I point out that every province is concerned in what happens as from April 1, 1962, in regard to the financial relations between the dominion and the provinces. It is with this fact in mind that we proposed the comprehensive study which was approved and inaugurated last week. It is quite clear that Newfoundland's fiscal relations with the dominion are explicitly included in the scope of this comprehensive study. That is the setting in which this review will occur, as the Prime Minister said in this house in his statement of March 25.

What may be said of special claims on the part of Newfoundland? It is quite clear in the light of the difficulties the royal commissioners had to face that it would be impossible to make calculations today on that subject. No one can project that far in the future in a period when the development of resources in Newfoundland and Labrador is proceeding at a very rapid pace, and when the population is increasing at an unprecedented rate, and when many other changes are taking place. Therefore the bill expressly states in one of the recitals that "any special circumstances relating to the financial position of the province of Newfoundland after March 31, 1962, would be taken into consideration".

We have sought in this measure to spell out this matter in parliamentary form, indeed in black and white. May I remind hon. members that apart from the constitutional subsidies, no other province—not one of the other nine provinces—has anything in black and white beyond March 31, 1962, to define its financial relations with the dominion; yet does anyone doubt that honourable solutions of fiscal problems between the provinces and the dominion after that date will be earnestly sought? This is the way the Canadian confederation has worked, and in the view of the government this is the way the Canadian confederation will work in 1962 and in years to come.

As a government we have endeavoured to demonstrate our concern over the fiscal problems confronting the provinces and the municipalities. We have enlarged our own federal burdens in order to assist the provinces and municipalities to meet theirs. As I have already endeavoured to point out, there is no binding stipulation on the federal government under article 29 to follow in any way the terms of any recommendations made by the royal commission; yet in the same spirit that animated Mr. St. Laurent in his statement in the house in February, 1949, which I read earlier, we are asking the house to appropriate by this bill for the period ending March 31, 1962, the sum of $36,500,000. In this way we are inviting parliament to express the desire of parliament and the Canadian people to be just and fair to Newfoundland.

Likewise there was no obligation on parliament to make any such provision as is now made through the medium of the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant; yet parliament made that provision and the four Atlantic provinces are deriving the benefits thereof today. Why was that done? While there was no legal obligation to do it, it was an expression on the part of the Canadian parliament of its view that the Canadian people are one family and that we must have regard to the problems of all sections of this great country. That measure was an expression of the spirit of confederation. It was an expression of the concern of the dominion, with the concurrence of the other six provinces, at the conference of November, 1957, over the well-being of the four provinces down by the sea. That concern, Mr. Chairman, will continue.

Mr. Carter: Will the minister repeat that statement?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My friend will find it on record. I said it was a matter of concern, and that that concern will continue. So, Mr. Chairman, I do earnestly urge that the concern, the fear, let us say, in regard to what may happen in the future is not a justified fear. I think the expression contained in an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen, which is not a friendly newspaper to the present government, is a fair statement of the spirit that will actuate the parliament of Canada in the days to come. Concerning the recommendations of the royal commission and the action indicated by the Prime Minister in his statement in the house on March 25, the Citizen had this to say on March 28:

> No federal government, of whatever party stripe, is likely to seek by a deliberate act of bad faith to dismember that partnership.

So, Mr. Chairman, I do suggest that what we are doing today is proposed to the house in a spirit in keeping with the true spirit of the Canadian confederation. May I add, sir, that we look forward with confidence to a rapid advance by Newfoundland, to the fruitful development of her vast resources, to the exploitation of her material endowment for the benefit of her people, and to their enjoyment of public services, schools, hospitals and roads, worthy of Canada's Atlantic bastion. In assisting Newfoundland to attain her just place in Canadian prosperity and well-being, it is our hope and wish that the financial provision made by this bill and the assurances which accompany it will be effective, helpful and timely, and that they will demonstrate to our compatriots in the tenth province the warm and respected place they hold in the hearts and hopes of the other members of the Canadian family.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the committee will have listened, I know, with the greatest possible interest to the statement the minister has just made on the resolution before us. If I may quote the words of the minister as I took them down, "having regard to the importance and the nature" of the subject matter of this resolution, dealing as it does with fundamental matters concerning our confederation, it seems to me that it would have been more appropriate to have had this legislation introduced and sponsored in the house by the Prime Minister, the leader of the government. I say that without, of course, any disrespect to the minister who has put the case as he sees it before us this morning very clearly and in very moderate terms and tones. But I think it would have been even more appropriate if the Prime Minister had taken the responsibility for this legislation because of the statement he made on this matter in March last, and I will have something to say about that later.

This resolution deals with a matter which in a sense is concerned with the completion of the work of confederation. There was no single move made by the previous government, of which I had the honour to be a member for some years, which caused our party greater pride than that which brought about, except in regard to this one bit of unfinished business, the completion of this great work of unity in confederation, this great work of national development which had eluded the efforts of Canadian and Newfoundland statesmen for many, many years before it was successfully accomplished ten years ago.

There was, however, as I have said, one piece of unfinished financial business which was in a sense postponed but is dealt with in an article which is an integral part of the terms of union, article 29. Term 29, as it is called, was as much a condition of union as any other article of this fundamental pact which brought about union. We should keep it very much in our minds that if term 29 had not been included perhaps confederation could not have been completed at that time. I think those of us who had something to do with the negotiations which were so successfully concluded then will all agree as to the importance of term 29.

That article, just as much as the others, constituted a specific and solemn undertaking given by the Canadian government and accepted as satisfactory by the government of Newfoundland as the result of which two sovereign nations—I admit that one of them at that time had its sovereignty temporarily in a commission—within the commonwealth of nations signed a pact, a treaty if you like, which provided for their union. Indeed in that sense, because of the circumstances that surrounded the negotiations at that time ten years ago, the negotiations and this pact, if you want to call it that, differed from the negotiations, agreements and arrangements which covered the colonies coming into a confederation through an act of the British parliament in the nineteenth century. That is the way term 29 as part of the pact of union is regarded by the people of Newfoundland, and I think it is the way it should be regarded by all Canadians.

Perhaps I might put on the record, because I think it correctly reflects the views of the people of Newfoundland with regard to the significance of term 29, an excerpt from the budget speech of the minister of finance of Newfoundland, Hon. Mr. Spencer, on June 26 of this year. I quote what he had to say at that time in the Newfoundland legislature:

> It will be useful, I think, if I put the simple facts on the record. These facts are unmistakable. It would require almost a wilful attempt to misunderstand them.
> This term—

[Mr. Pearson.]

He was talking about term 29.

> —was passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom, House of Commons and House of Lords. It was passed by the parliament of Canada, House of Commons and Senate. It was confirmed by the government of the day in Newfoundland. That would be the commission of government. It forms part and parcel of Canada's constitution, the British North America Act of 1867 with amendments. It is therefore no ordinary document. It is not a contract made between two tradesmen. It is rather a solemn agreement made between two high contracting parties, these being the government of Newfoundland and the government of Canada at a time when they were separate countries.

What is term 29? The minister put it on the record once, but perhaps he will permit me and the committee will bear with me if I read it into my own remarks.

> In view of the difficulty of predicting with sufficient accuracy the financial consequences to Newfoundland of becoming a province of Canada, the government of Canada will appoint a royal commission within eight years from the date of union to review the financial position of the province of Newfoundland and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required—

May be required for what?

> —by the government of the province of Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union, without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

I would just point out in regard to term 29 that there is no time limit in any way, shape or form, directly or indirectly; no time limit has been placed in this particular obligation.

Now, as the minister pointed out, in due course the royal commission to examine this matter of term 29 was appointed and it consisted, as he well said, of distinguished, competent, and I think objective persons who gave this problem the careful and considered examination to which it was entitled, and who made their report on May 31, 1958.

I agree with the minister that the matter under investigation was complicated. Indeed, the difficulties that faced this commission were only matched by their importance. There is no doubt about that. It was not easy, I am sure, for the commission to come to the conclusions that are embodied in its report. But I am perfectly certain that it did not come to those conclusions, and it did not make those recommendations, without a most exhaustive and painstaking examination, and without having received evidence from every possible source bearing on this problem.

This morning the minister put on the record some quotations from the report of the commission, and perhaps I may supplement one or two of them. He was quoting from page 5 about the economic background of the immediate situation in Newfoundland. He quoted from the top paragraph on that page, or part of it, and I believe the last part of that paragraph should be added to what the minister said:

> In this respect Newfoundland was at about the same stage as the maritime provinces were in 1867.

The minister himself put that sentence on the record. Then the report goes on to say:

> The proportion of homes equipped with water and sewer services was only about one-third of the Canadian ratio. The death and disease rates were considerably higher than those in any other Canadian province, which indicated, among other things, a serious deficiency in health services. The physical facilities for education were generally inadequate.

There was, therefore, no question in anybody's mind—indeed, there is no question now—as to the need for help to bring about a situation in Newfoundland under which these deficiencies would be removed. In this respect, and indeed in other respects, Newfoundland would be assisted to reach at least the level of other provinces of Canada.

Then the minister also discussed certain observations of the royal commission on financial and debt matters. He read, for instance, from page 18 some sentences concerning the debt position of the provincial government which indicated, in the first sentence of that paragraph, that it was very favourable in the early years. I should like to put on the record also the last two sentences of that paragraph which he did not mention:

> However, in considering the significance of this relative position—

That is the position in regard to provincial debt relative to the other Atlantic provinces.

> —regard must be had to the fact that the government of Newfoundland has been encountering rising deficits on ordinary account over the last several years. Also, consideration must be given to the vulnerability and uncertainties of the Newfoundland economy and the significantly lower per capita personal income. In these circumstances special problems and limitations arise regarding the support of heavy fixed charges.

It was one of the purposes, of course, of the assistance to be provided under term 29 to raise the level of services which would involve heavier fixed charges. Then on page 19 of the report there is a paragraph dealing with the levels and standards of public services in Newfoundland, in which we find this:

> It must be assumed that the phrase "the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union" means the highest levels and standards reached. Otherwise term 29 has little meaning.

This has a bearing on something the ministers said about the year that was chosen as the basis.

> It would appear that the purpose of this clause in the terms of union was to ensure that levels and standards of public service reached in Newfoundland during the period under review would continue to be feasible for the province if its taxation were no less burdensome than that obtaining in the maritime provinces generally.

The minister quoted from the recommendations of the commission and wondered why the commission took the year 1956-57 as a basis; why did they pick on that year? Well, obviously they picked on the end of 1956-57 because that was the latest year at which a certain level had been established, and that must be the basis on which they must make their calculations into the future. I would have thought that was quite a reasonable attitude for the commission to adopt.

Then, having made these observations, the commission made its recommendations. I do not propose to put them on the record. The minister did that, and indeed it has been done before. The recommendation was that there should be a grant of $8 million a year, less the existing transitional grant, until 1961 and thereafter—thereafter being after the fourth year—$8 million per annum. There is no ambiguity about that; thereafter, $8 million per annum. There is no cut-off date recommended by the commission. There is no suggestion that the payment should stop at any particular time.

There is, of course, as the minister has pointed out, consideration given to the desirability of reviewing these matters; that would be the most normal and natural course to follow. But the provision for review which might have been agreed upon, I suggest, until any change had been made as a result of that review by agreement on both sides—any provision of that kind—could not affect the obligation of the recommendation of the royal commission; "thereafter $8 million a year".

Let me make it clear again what the understanding on this point was in Newfoundland. If we do not appreciate their clear understanding of the obligation which was undertaken by the federal government as the result of which Newfoundland accepted the act of union, and if we do not appreciate their feelings in this regard, it is difficult to understand their reaction to the announcement that was made last March. In the budget statement of the minister of finance he had this to say on this point:

> What is this treaty? It is a treaty under which one of these parties, Canada, undertakes to pay to Newfoundland each year the cost of continuing Newfoundland's public services at certain standards and levels. There is only one condition to this undertaking. The condition is that Newfoundland itself shall tax its people for that purpose no less burdensomely than the governments of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island tax their peoples for the support of their public services. Regard must be had, however, to the relative capacity to pay in each of the four provinces.

Then he went on to say this in his budget speech last session—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the session of 1958, does the hon. member mean?

Mr. Pearson: This is Mr. Spencer in his budget speech in Newfoundland.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I beg the hon. member's pardon. I thought he said the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pearson: I am sorry. I do not want to get my ministers of finance mixed up. This is the minister of finance of Newfoundland.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think he is known as the provincial treasurer.

Mr. Pearson: He calls himself minister of finance, anyway. He said this:

It is necessary to make one further observation on this matter. When the premier of Newfoundland and I visited the Prime Minister of Canada in January last the premier quite frankly suggested to the Prime Minister that Newfoundland would be pleased if the parliament of Canada provided for another review under term 29, according to the terms of reference of term 29.

There is no difference of opinion on that matter. The minister himself made that clear this morning. Then Mr. Spencer went on to say this:

The premier suggested that this second review might well take place within 16 years of the date of union. The $8 million a year would, he suggested—if the Canadian government would not in the meanwhile accede to Newfoundland's request to raise the amount—be paid each year for the eight years pending the holding of the second review. This is an altogether different thing from agreeing to pay the amount recommended for a strictly limited period of years, after which it was to come to a final and complete end. This review that might take place outside the terms of reference of term 29 would deprive Newfoundland of the special rights set up for her in term 29, and place her at the mercy of any general settlement which might be contrived from time to time for all the provinces or any number of them.

I realize that the minister made quite a point this morning of the fact that no legal obligation was imposed on the government of Canada by any recommendation of a royal commission. That, of course, is perfectly true. No legal obligation is imposed on the government of Canada by any recommendation of any royal commission. Perhaps no legal obligation was imposed on the government of Canada to continue the confederation subsidies after 1867. They had to be voted by parliament, and parliament was the master of its own destiny in regard to the voting of money.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the hon. member a question at this point? Does he not think that the British North America Act, having made provision for the payment, would have given the maritime provinces a right to this payment?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, indeed. The British North America Act has also been changed by term 29 of the act of union with Newfoundland. All I am pointing out is this. While these obligations are embodied in the constitution, both in the act of 1867 and amendments and in 1949, the money to carry out these obligations must be voted each year by the parliament of Canada; and if the parliament of Canada, in its sovereign wisdom, sees fit not to vote that money the province would not get the money and the obligation would have been infringed. If there is a constitutional obligation or a moral obligation of this kind—as I submit there is under term 29 and in the recommendation made by the royal commission under term 29—I suggest that the refusal by any federal government to carry out that obligation would be of the same nature as a refusal by the federal government to carry out similar obligations made in respect of other provinces for financial assistance when they came into confederation. Furthermore, it seems to me—

Mr. Walker: Might I ask the Leader of the Opposition this question. Was that the point of view of the then prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent?

Mr. Pearson: I will come to that matter. Indeed it was his point of view. I shall be glad to deal with that matter in a few moments.

But surely, Mr. Chairman, there was this obligation under term 29, and I think there was an equally strong moral and constitutional obligation with regard to the recommendations of the royal commission. If that is true, then any change with regard to these matters—and I am not suggesting that there should not be changes in the future—or any change with regard to recommendations of this kind made under term 29, should be a change made with the knowledge and approval of both parties to the contract. Indeed the Prime Minister himself last March, when he was referring to this matter, talked about a contractual obligation; and one party to a contract—especially a constitutional contract, a contract which is one of the bases now of confederation—surely has no right to alter the terms of the contract unilaterally. That is the argument I am now trying to make.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether you would call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, at one o'clock I was discussing the nature and effect of the recommendations of the royal commission. I was asked a question about the legal significance of those recommendations. I quite agree, and the minister made it perfectly clear this morning, that recommendations of a royal commission of this kind do not have legal significance in the sense that they impose any legal obligation on the government that has set up the royal commission. Indeed, as the minister pointed out this morning, the then prime minister on Monday, February 7, 1949 made it quite clear what his understanding of the significance of the work and recommendations of the royal commission would be. He said—and I quite agree that there is no undertaking—

Mr. Walker: What page is that?

Mr. Pearson: It is February 7, 1949; I have not the page here.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is page 289.

Mr. Pearson: Page 289 of Hansard for February 7, 1949. The then prime minister at that time said there was no undertaking to implement any terms of any recommendations which might be made by a royal commission. It was felt by the Newfoundland delegation and by the representatives of the Canadian government that it was something that was being entered into in a spirit of fairness on both sides, and that it was not necessary to make binding stipulations about what would happen with respect to the report of the royal commission.

On the other hand I think I am also right in my recollection, Mr. Chairman, that at that time—perhaps not exactly at that time but in discussions with regard to this matter—the Minister without Portfolio from Newfoundland had emphasized the importance that would be attached to the recommendations of this commission—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, may I make a correction. The passage which the hon. gentleman quoted from Mr. St. Laurent's speech was before the election of 1949, and I did not come into the house until October.

Mr. Pearson: That is right; but the minister also came into the house in 1953, I think it was; at any rate, when he was in the house he emphasized more than once the importance which would be attached to this royal commission when it was set up, and he argued that it should be set up. I think he said at that time, and he will correct me if I am wrong, that the government of that day should announce in advance that it would accept the recommendations of such a commission.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest that whatever the legal significance may be, the recommendations of a royal commission of this kind to implement term 29 of the act of union with Newfoundland should not be altered in their implementation by the federal government without consultation and agreement with the other party. The minister said this morning that they will be reviewed. Of course they will be reviewed, and I have tried to put on the record the understanding of the Newfoundland government in that regard. However, I suggest that until these recommendations, having regard to the nature of the commission, the importance of the work it undertook, and the constitutional character of that work, are altered as a result of the review in question, they should be implemented by the federal government.

The minister mentioned—and this has been mentioned before—that the Newfoundland government was not satisfied with the recommendations. They thought they were not generous enough to Newfoundland, and they wanted them reviewed and altered. There is no doubt they wanted them altered upward. If that suggestion of the government of Newfoundland had been accepted by the federal government there would indeed have been a review of those recommendations; there would have been an alteration of those recommendations accepted by both parties, and that would have been perfectly fair and perfectly normal. But that kind of alteration desired by the government of Newfoundland was not acceptable to the federal government. Surely if that is a reasonable position to take—and I am not quarrelling with it for the time being—that principle should be applied in both directions. It is not in accordance with what I think should have been the conduct of the federal government to make the kind of changes in the recommendation which it is now proposing to make and which are objected to by the government of Newfoundland.

It seems to me also, Mr. Chairman, that it is most unfair to justify this change in the recommendations by the argument that since union Newfoundland had also received a good deal of financial help from Ottawa, along with the other Atlantic provinces. That this particular help should have any bearing on the obligations under term 29 of the act of union with Newfoundland does not seem to me reasonable and fair or valid. Surely the grants to the Atlantic provinces which the minister talked about this morning are grants to put all the Atlantic provinces in a better economic position and have no relationship, as the minister admitted himself, to term 29. The financial assistance under term 29 is designed to put Newfoundland on a level with the other provinces in respect of services on which improvement can begin and would be based. To use the additional financial assistance given to Newfoundland in another context and for other purposes to justify an alteration in the recommendations of the royal commission, Mr. Chairman, does not seem to me to be fair.

The Minister of Finance said this morning that feelings had been disturbed in Newfoundland last March on a certain announcement of government policy.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Excuse me, but I must correct the hon. gentleman on that point. I spoke about the feelings in Newfoundland aroused by the announcement of the recommendations of the royal commission last summer.

Mr. Pearson: Well, the minister did that. He said that feelings were disturbed in Newfoundland owing to the announcement of the royal commission because those recommendations did not go far enough to satisfy the Newfoundland government and to satisfy what the people of that province thought were their just demands. But the minister also referred to the strong language which was used in Newfoundland as a result of the statement made here with regard to those recommendations.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, excuse me. The strong statements to which I referred were those put on record last September, and they related to the recommendations of the royal commission.

Mr. Pearson: I am sorry if I did the minister an injustice, but if he did not say so perhaps I can say so. Feelings were disturbed in Newfoundland last March, and that disturbance was expressed in strong language after the Prime Minister made a statement in this house on March 25 which unilaterally and without any consultation or agreement with the province of Newfoundland rejected a very important part of these recommendations. The Prime Minister had something to say about the recommendations that day, as reported at page 2215 of Hansard, and he put them on the record. The Hansard of that day made a very important omission, and after the Easter recess the Prime Minister corrected it and said there had been a mistake and that the figure for 1961-62 should be "thereafter, $8 million". So that was cleared up as far as Hansard was concerned. The Prime Minister then had this to say, and I am quoting from page 2216:

> My colleagues and I are accordingly of the opinion that parliament should be invited to take action on the commission's recommendations. It is proposed, therefore, to ask parliament to authorize payments as recommended by the royal commission, but in our view the duration of the payments should be limited to five years, as both Newfoundland and Canada have recognized the difficulties involved in making projections from one selected year into the future, and it has further appeared to be quite inappropriate to endeavour to provide for a fixed amount payable annually over a period of unlimited duration.

That is exactly what the royal commission did recommend, pending any agreed change in the recommendation. Then the Prime Minister went on to say:

> A resolution will shortly be placed on the order paper asking leave to introduce a bill to carry into effect these provisions pertaining to the terms of the union.

This was on March 25. The right hon. gentleman continued:

> The proposed payments will be unconditional, and will be in final and irrevocable settlement of the provisions of article 29 and the contractual obligations of the union consummated in 1949.

In other words, with respect to one part of these contractual obligations, without any agreement on the part of the other party—and this is a very important contractual obligation—the Prime Minister said "We will take action on term 29 of the act of union which will be in final and irrevocable settlement of that part of the agreement".

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the hon. gentleman whether, in justice, he will read the final paragraph?

Mr. Pearson: I was about to do that. The statement goes on:

> On conclusion of the payments as of March 31, 1962, which corresponds with the conclusion of the present five-year fiscal arrangement between Canada and the provinces, Newfoundland's position can be considered in the light of the general methods of providing financial assistance to the provinces which may be in effect at that time.

In other words, this obligation under term 29 extends for five years unconditionally and after that time, though there is nothing which would indicate this in the pact or in the terms of reference of the royal commission, it can be reconsidered; the whole question could be reconsidered by the federal government in the light of the circumstances of that time, and the federal government would no doubt take whatever action it seemed desirable to take at that time.

I think I do the minister no injustice when I say this seems to be the purport and significance of the bill which will be introduced if this resolution is passed. That is something to which we on this side take strong exception. When the Prime Minister talked about this, not in the house but at Saskatoon on March 28, as reported by the Canadian Press, he went a little further than he did in this chamber. This Canadian Press report which I quote from the Ottawa Journal under the dateline Saskatoon, March 28, reads as follows:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker says he does not interpret a royal commission report as recommending continuing payments of $8 million annually to Newfoundland indefinitely after 1962.

Though if that is not the interpretation the word "thereafter" means nothing. To continue this report:

> Mr. Diefenbaker was commenting in an interview on the announcement of Premier Smallwood of a provincial "day of mourning."
>
> Asked about opposition leader Pearson's claim that a royal commission had recommended specifically continuing payments of $8 million annually indefinitely after 1962, the Prime Minister replied that he did not so interpret the recommendations.

What other interpretation can you give to a recommendation which includes the phrase "thereafter $8 million a year"? The report goes on:

> Mr. Diefenbaker said Newfoundland's financial position would be reviewed by 1962—"the whole problem of dominion-provincial fiscal relations will be looked into by that time".

And the Prime Minister went on to say:

> Premier Smallwood had had a say in appointments to the commission which was named by the previous Liberal government.

I am calling to the attention of the committee this statement that a recommendation to end payments in 1962 was made by a royal commission, and I ask the Prime Minister whether he can point to anything in the report of the commission which would justify such an interpretation of its recommendations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask a question? Does the hon. gentleman interpret the royal commission recommendation as requiring the payment in perpetuity of the amount in question, $8 million?

Mr. Pearson: There is no other interpretation which can be given to a recommendation of the kind I have just read, which includes the words "thereafter, $8 million per annum". It is true that there are other provisos about the burden of taxation but, of course, that does not prevent a review of the position before 1962 and it does not prevent a change in that provision; it does not prevent an alteration in the terms of the report of the royal commission. However, it is our contention, and surely a reasonable one because of the nature of this obligation, that such a change in this recommendation of the royal commission should be made only after review and agreement by the two parties to the change.

After all, as I have said, the province of Newfoundland has wanted a change already; it has wanted a higher figure than $8 million, and the federal government has said "No, we cannot agree". Should it not apply both ways? Until that change is made by agreement it is our contention that there is an obligation on the part of the government to maintain the recommendation of the royal commission established under the terms of the act of union with Newfoundland; and when the Prime Minister made his statement, and particularly when he elaborated on it in Saskatoon, it is no wonder that there was uneasiness and disturbance in Newfoundland itself.

The Prime Minister gave a broadcast in "The Nation's Business" series on April 20 and had this to say; I am quoting from the text of that broadcast:

> I believe that the keystone of our union is the maintenance inviolate of the interpretation of those rights in terms of the fullest measure of equality of opportunity for all Canadians everywhere.

In so far as we are able to understand the nature of this bill, as explained by the minister this morning, it does not carry out those highly desirable principles which the Prime Minister enunciated in that particular sentence. I have just given my own interpretation of what the minister said in general terms about the nature of the bill, and he can correct me if I am wrong. He suggested that there will be payments made for five years as recommended by the royal commission, and after that time the federal government will decide whether or not those payments are to be continued. In other words there is no obligation on the federal government to do anything after 1962 except to have the matter reconsidered before 1962. That seems to me to be contrary to the spirit of the obligation entered into by the federal government under article 29 of the terms of union.

The province can, the minister said, rely on the good will and understanding of the federal government to take all factors into consideration which have a bearing on the situation. The province of Newfoundland can rely on the federal government to do the right thing, but the province of Newfoundland has a stronger basis for action than just relying on the good will and understanding of the federal government, in our view. It has article 29 of the terms of union and the recommendations of the royal commission, which should not be altered except through agreement with the province of Newfoundland. Therefore I appeal to the minister who spoke this morning and to the government to accept the recommendations of this royal commission until both parties to the act of union agree to their change.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, we in the C.C.F. group believe that Newfoundland has a very substantial claim for continuing grants from the federal treasury at such levels as will enable the province to maintain the level of services that has been reached in recent years without increasing their level of taxation beyond the general maritime level.

The objective, we feel, of national policy should be to raise the level of services all across our nation, but in particular the objective of national policy should be to increase the level of social services in the "have not" provinces. We believe it is essential in the context of our federal system that the federal government, which has such widespread taxing powers, should pay from general revenue to provincial governments by way of grants, moneys that will enable the residents of the "have not" provinces to enjoy substantially the same services that are maintained and enjoyed in the other provinces across this nation.

Anyone who has seen the province of Newfoundland will realize that levels of income and services in Canada's tenth province are definitely below the national average. As a matter of fact it is appalling to see many of the economic conditions that exist in that province. I refer to the lack of roads, and the housing that is below the standards that obtain in many other provinces. The general absence of prosperity and the appearance of prosperity as we see it in other provinces is very apparent.

During the few days I spent in Newfoundland last year I was given a very friendly reception and enjoyed meeting with the Canadian citizens of that province. Although I come from a province that has not enjoyed the same per capita income that has been enjoyed in some of the other provinces I was nevertheless shocked at what I saw of the economic conditions in Newfoundland. I remember being in one village where they were constructing some new streets and houses. The width of the new streets that were being surveyed, I was told, was just 50 feet. I asked why they would construct such a narrow street and was told that it was impossible to raise the funds necessary to provide wide, modern streets as we know them, for example, in the province of Ontario.

I believe that any member of this committee who has an interest in raising the standards of living for people in provinces where incomes are relatively low should support substantial grants and adopt a generous outlook toward the problems of the people of Newfoundland.

The members of the C.C.F. group, the party which forms the government today and the Liberal party which formed the government in 1949 supported the terms of union. Mr. M. J. Coldwell welcomed the entry of Newfoundland into confederation at that time as Canada's tenth province, and placed on the record our general objective that action by government at both levels should result in higher standards of living in the less well to do provinces. Mr. Coldwell, as reported on page 295 of Hansard for February, 7, 1949 had this to say:

> May I say at once that members of the C.C.F. throughout Canada join with other people in welcoming into confederation the island of Newfoundland ... We should consider Newfoundland and Labrador as part of the whole maritime region, which incidentally is a region that cries aloud for a new deal ... We welcome Newfoundland, then, on another count; because it will tend to strengthen the position of the maritime provinces and the other "have not" provinces, and to highlight their problems.

Canadians generally believe today that Newfoundland's association with Canada in our confederation has been a very wise move and has been beneficial both to the citizens of Newfoundland and the citizens of the rest of Canada. But one would be blinding oneself if one did not recognize that in this addition to confederation and in the relations that have existed there have been substantial misunderstandings. I believe those misunderstandings have come about not entirely through the fault of either the government of Newfoundland or the federal government but because both in different instances have made some very serious mistakes. I believe the province of Newfoundland made a serious mistake in the labour laws it placed on its statute books recently which have resulted in the wiping out in certain instances of the freedom of association of workers in various trade unions for which they had previously indicated their support under the laws of that province. This action by the government of Newfoundland has not added to the cementing of the bonds of confederation.

The announcement made by the Prime Minister on March 25 last was another instance where the bonds of confederation were not tightened but rather were strained, having regard to the terms in which the announcement was couched. We think the terms of confederation are clear. There was to be a study by a royal commission to determine what federal assistance should continue in order that social services in the province of Newfoundland might be maintained at the level which had been reached without increasing taxes beyond the level of taxes in the maritime provinces. This was surely a very minimum objective, because the level of services in the province of Newfoundland even after ten years of confederation is still substantially below the level of services in the rest of the maritime provinces. On page 8 of its report the royal commission had this to say on this point:

> The construction programs have included significant outlays by the provincial government on industrial projects for economic development, on roads, on municipal works, and on education and health facilities. However, the expenditures on these items of social capital have served largely to keep up with the pace of a rapidly growing population. There have been few really major improvements in the levels and standards of services.

In the next paragraph the royal commission went on to say:

> The lack of an adequate road system is, in the present day, one of the outstanding handicaps to economic development and social improvement.

And further:

> The notable increases in Newfoundland production and incomes in recent years have not measurably reduced the disparities with the rest of the country which had previously existed. In the generally prosperous year of 1956 the average per capita personal income after adjustment for differences in the cost of living was still somewhat less than half the Canadian average and about one third less than that of the maritime provinces.

It is very obvious from the documentation of this report that services in Newfoundland are still below the maritime average, and that economic conditions in Newfoundland are not only inferior to the rest of the maritime provinces but much inferior to the remaining part of Canada. As has already been quoted a number of times in this debate, and it is not necessary to put the exact words on record again, the royal commission concludes that in order to fulfil the terms of union the federal government should pay to the province of Newfoundland after March 31, 1961 a sum of $8 million per annum. In the light of that recommendation the government has made a decision which was announced initially in the house on March 25. On that day the Prime Minister stated, as found on page 2216 of Hansard:

> Notwithstanding the difficulties presented by its report, it remains a fact that the royal commission was appointed to fulfil the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada, and these terms are part of the British North America Act. My colleagues and I are accordingly of the opinion that parliament should be invited to take action on the commission's recommendations. It is proposed, therefore, to ask parliament to authorize payments as recommended by the royal commission, but in our view the duration of the payments should be limited to five years—

The Prime Minister readily admits, as the royal commission finds in its report, that payment is necessary under the terms of union of Newfoundland and Canada, but he has not hesitated to say in the very same paragraph that by action of the federal government alone the implementing of these recommendations will cease as at March 31, 1962. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> The proposed payments will be unconditional and will be in final and irrevocable settlement of the provisions of article 29 and the contractual obligations of the union consummated in 1949.

I think the Prime Minister erred gravely in making that latter statement. In the light of the objective that I feel all Canadians approve for the bringing of social services in the economically less fortunate provinces up to the level of services in other parts of Canada, in view of the fact that the history of this nation adequately demonstrates that the trend is for the federal government to pay more and more to the provinces to assist in the provision of essential services; and realizing that the trend in our economy is to expand, is there anyone here who believes that payments by the federal government to Newfoundland or to other provinces are likely to become less in the years ahead? So the suggestion in the Prime Minister's statement that this would be the end of the payments is not likely to be borne out by the facts. The fact is, I believe, and future events will prove this to be so, that increasing payments will be made to Newfoundland and other provinces. If that is what is most likely to happen, I think the Prime Minister's choice of words was unfortunate.

I can appreciate the position of the people of the province of Newfoundland. They have entered confederation and become a part of our nation in recent years. They are not fully conscious of the background of our nation. They feel that the guarantee they have as to economic conditions in the years ahead is contained in the terms of union, and the terms of union being further carried out have brought forth a royal commission recommendation which says, in simple English, that after the initial period spelled out, grants from the federal government shall be $8 million per annum.

I can understand their feeling that the government of Canada had sabotaged their terms of confederation when the Prime Minister announced that, in final and irrevocable settlement of the provisions of article 29, payments would be made to the end of March 31, 1962. They do not understand, as I think members of all political parties in this house really understand, that this kind of obligation of the central government to all the provinces is one that is continuing and will continue. In the light of the statement by the Prime Minister and their short history as part of Canada, I can understand why they felt this was a black day for the province of Newfoundland, and why the announcement would indicate for them that it was a day of mourning.

The government has taken into account, in some measure, the feeling of the people of the province of Newfoundland. They have announced that they are putting in the bill that will be introduced a special clause which says there will be further consideration of the position of Newfoundland by March 31, 1962. This is going some distance in taking into account the very natural feelings of the people of Newfoundland. Any federal statute that has within it a provision for the payment of a certain sum of money to a provincial government cannot, I think, be reasonably considered something that is there for all time. After all, it is the prerogative of the members of the House of Commons, of parliament, to amend Canadian statutes from time to time, and to amend those statutes which have in them provisions for certain payments, under certain conditions, and that are placed there on an indefinite basis.

I come to the conclusion, therefore, that in considering the recommendation of the royal commission that a grant of $8 million per annum should be paid thereafter, the federal government, in order to implement this recommendation, should have provided exactly what the recommendation says, namely for the payment of $8 million per annum to Newfoundland. This does not mean that $8 million, $8 million alone and nothing more, will remain in that statute forever. It merely means that is what the people of Newfoundland can look for on an indefinite basis until such time as the parliament of Canada, in its wisdom, decides to amend the provision.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that although we in the C.C.F. group have taken strong exception, and will continue to take strong exception, to certain actions of the government of Newfoundland which we have felt interfered with basic human rights and fundamental freedoms of Canadian citizens in Newfoundland, this in no way colours our attitude toward the economic case for Newfoundland or to the terms of confederation when they are under consideration. I feel it is a sorry day not only for Newfoundland but for all of Canada when there is so much misunderstanding over the grants that are paid to Newfoundland under the terms of confederation. I would think that a province like Newfoundland, coming into a new nation and accepting its obligations, should expect from any federal government in this country the maximum amount of consultation, the maximum amount of consideration. If there were this kind of consideration by both the federal and provincial government there would be no violent controversy as to whether or not the terms of union have been implemented.

I would suggest that, in keeping with the terms of reference, in keeping with the objectives of the Canadan nation, the federal government should act in such a way as to provide grants and assistance to Newfoundland, to the other maritime provinces and to the other provinces, that would provide financial help at such levels as would enable Canadian citizens from one coast of this nation to the other to enjoy substantially the same social services.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I was glad to hear the hon. member for Assiniboia say that the Newfoundland labour legislation has no relevance to this debate because I, too, regard it as irrelevant and for that reason I do not intend to make any reference whatever to it.

The purpose of introducing a resolution before a money bill must be to get the feeling of the house as to what the bill should contain. The wording of this particular resolution does less than justice to the bill that will be introduced if this resolution carries, because it makes reference only to provision for the payment of additional grants to Newfoundland, and makes no reference whatever to the fact that these payments are made as a constitutional right under the terms of union.

The bill that will be introduced after this resolution passes is not just another money bill to provide financial assistance to a needy province. The sums of money and payments specified in this bill are of a very special nature because they represent, in tangible form, one of the most important conditions under which Newfoundland agreed to forgo its own national sovereignty and become the tenth province of the Dominion of Canada.

These payments represent one of the constitutional rights of the province of Newfoundland, a constitutional right which is embodied in a solemn treaty between the people of Newfoundland and the people of Canada. This morning the minister went to some pains to point out that there was no legal obligation binding the government of Canada to make these payments, but he did admit that there was a moral obligation. Well, Mr. Chairman, are we to assume that a moral obligation is less binding than a legal obligation? Let there be no misunderstanding on this point. These payments represent a treaty obligation, and the amount and manner in which they are paid constitute an indication and a means by which the good faith of the mainland Canadians, on whose behalf they are made, can be measured.

These payments are to be made in accordance with term 29 of the act of union. When a sovereign country sacrifices its sovereignty and forfeits its chief sources of revenue, great financial adjustments must of necessity be involved. It was beyond human wisdom and capability to forecast with any degree of accuracy what financial impact confederation with Canada would have upon Newfoundland generally, and particularly upon revenues available to the provincial government. It was for that reason that term 29 was inserted in the terms of union. So union with Canada became largely an act of faith on the part of the Newfoundland people, faith in term 29 and in the integrity of the people of mainland Canada.

As the minister pointed out this morning, term 29 provides for a review of the financial position of Newfoundland within eight years from the date of union, and it makes the following provisions. In the first place, it postpones a final settlement indefinitely and it directs that a royal commission be set up within eight years to do certain things. It also directs that royal commission to review the financial position of the province of Newfoundland and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required by the government of the province of Newfoundland to enable it to do certain things having regard to certain conditions.

What was it that the Newfoundland government was to be enabled to do? Term 29 is very clear on this point. The Newfoundland government was to be enabled to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union, that is the levels and standards reached in 1957, eight years after the date of union. What was the limiting factor which would determine the size of payments and the conditions under which payments, if any were recommended, would be made? Again term 29 is perfectly clear. The limiting factor is that Newfoundland is to be enabled to continue these services at the 1957 level without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining in the maritime provinces generally.

Hon. members must bear in mind the fact that Newfoundland came into confederation 80 years late. Because of that fact Newfoundland did not enjoy the benefits of confederation which had been available to the mainland provinces for a period of some 80 years. Newfoundland has never at any time enjoyed as much prosperity as have the other maritime provinces of Canada, a prosperity which was due largely to their huge ship-building and shipping industry and which continued after confederation though at a much slower rate.

Consequently, at the time of confederation with Canada in 1949 the public services of Newfoundland—health services, hospitals, roads, schools, etc.—were about 50 years behind those of the maritime provinces. On becoming a part of Canada the provincial government, under the dynamic leadership of Premier Smallwood, put forth a concentrated effort to improve those services. Because she had been left to her own resources, dependent upon a precarious fishing industry as the mainstay of her economy; because she had been handicapped by severe laws passed in order to discourage colonization and to encourage exploitation by the English merchants; because she had been disappointed time and time again by apathy in the mother country; because she had been faced with fires, famine, financial crisis, catastrophes, and tragedies, Newfoundland had never been in a position to build up a high level of public services.

During the first eight years of confederation more roads were built, more classrooms were constructed, more hospital beds were provided than in all our previous history. But in spite of these prodigious efforts, at the time of the royal commission inquiry in 1957 our public services were still 25 years behind those of the maritime provinces, and the public services of the maritime provinces are themselves considerably below those of central and western Canada.

The purpose, then, of these payments under term 29 is to enable the public services of Newfoundland to be continued at a level which is at least 25 years behind that of the maritime provinces, provided this cannot be done by the Newfoundland government without resorting to taxation more burdensome than that of the other maritime provinces.

Hon. members must be quite clear as to the difference between payments made under term 29, which we are considering in this resolution, and payments made under the Atlantic provinces grants act. Reports and articles in the mainland press indicate a great deal of confusion in the public mind on this point. It has been intimated that the grants are similar, that they serve the same purpose and can be substituted the one for the other. Nothing could be further from the truth. They are quite different in nature, they serve different purposes and are paid under different conditions.

Payments made under the bill which will be introduced as a result of this resolution and which embodies term 29 are made as a matter of right. It is our safeguard, our guarantee that our levels and standards of public services will never be permitted to fall below what they were in 1957. It was on the basis of that guarantee that Newfoundland agreed to become a part of Canada, and Newfoundland can claim these payments as a constitutional right whenever and as long as she is unable to continue her public services at the 1957 level without resorting to taxation more burdensome than that which obtained in the maritime provinces at the same time.

Payments made under the Atlantic provinces grants act are not made as a matter of right but by the grace and favour of the government of the day. That is a very important difference. Equally important is the difference in purpose. The purpose of the payments under term 29 is to continue the public services of Newfoundland at their 1957 level. I should like to stress the word "continue". To continue the same level of public services for an increasing population means a yearly increase in public expenditures which cannot be satisfied by fixed grants even if dollar depreciation were not an important factor.

In contrast, the purpose of payments under the Atlantic provinces grants act is to enable the different provinces to improve their levels and standards of public services. If federal funds are to be devoted to the improvement of provincial public services, surely Newfoundland is entitled to share in that improvement. Indeed, on the basis of need Newfoundland would have a prior claim because her need is greater than that of the others. Otherwise the effect of the Atlantic provinces grants would be to widen the gap between Newfoundland and the other maritime provinces in their levels and standards of public services beyond the 25 years which is the case at the present time.

It cannot be denied that funds made available to the Newfoundland government through the Atlantic provinces grants, through tax rental agreements and other financial agreements, in so far as they contribute to the general revenue and affect the level of taxation in the province will have an important bearing on the size of payments made under term 29. It is true also that Newfoundland possesses a great potential of natural wealth which, when developed, will also improve her revenue position and tax burden.

We look forward to the day—and it may not be very far in the future—when Newfoundland will, through her own resources, be able to continue her public services at the 1957 level without a tax burden any heavier than that of other maritime provinces. When that day arrives, and as long as that condition continues, Newfoundland will have no claims for financial assistance under term 29. But that does not mean that the agreement under term 29 is terminated. That agreement is part of our constitution, and it must remain as long as our constitution lasts. It may become temporarily inoperative—we hope it will become permanently inoperative—but it must never be terminated because it is our guarantee of a minimum level and standard of public service; it is our only safeguard against a return in the future of those misfortunes which too often in the past have been our lot.

I therefore plead with the minister to insert in the bill that will be introduced later a provision to safeguard Newfoundland's constitutional right and to honour the solemn agreement with Newfoundland entered into in 1949.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, I had intended to make some rather extended remarks on this resolution, but following the statement made by the Minister of Finance this morning and having heard some of the general terms of the bill, there seems to me to be little purpose in discussing the resolution in detail when we already know in general terms what the bill is going to be.

My leader has placed our position on record, and it appears to me now that the comments I might have made at the resolution stage might more properly be made when the bill is before the house. However, there is one point which I think we ought to get clear and it is this. Term 29 is not an agreement between a province of Canada and the federal government. Term 29 is a solemn agreement between two sovereign nations and, in my opinion, has nothing at all to do with the fiscal relations existing between the province and the dominion. It was an agreement entered into before Newfoundland became a province of Canada and, may I say, it was an agreement which played a large part in Newfoundland becoming a province of Canada.

I suggest to you today, Mr. Chairman, that if term 29 had not been one of the terms of union with Newfoundland, I doubt very much whether we would be discussing this bill here today.

I know from my own people back in Newfoundland that one of the things which made the terms of union agreeable to them was the fact that after a period of eight years it would be possible to have this matter reviewed and to do something about maintaining the levels of services which had been reached at the end of the eight years. I say again that term 29 is not an agreement between the federal government and the province; it is an agreement between two sovereign, independent nations and one which I think this government has nothing else to do but to honour. If that agreement is going to be broken or if there is going to be a change in the agreement, I think that change should be after consultation between the federal government of Canada and the now province of Newfoundland. It was an agreement entered into by two parties, and I believe it should not be changed other than by agreement between the two parties.

In the report of the McNair commission there can surely be no misunderstanding of this recommendation. There can be no misunderstanding at all as to what the recommendation means. I had hoped the time would come when my province would be able to play a more independent part in the Canadian federation that it has played in the last ten years, and I believe that it will. I believe that the time will come when we can develop our province to the point where it will be far less dependent upon the federal government than it is today. But that is going to take time, and it will need support and it will need money. However, I still believe that although we are the newest and the youngest province of Canada, the time will come when we will be able to make a substantial contribution to the Canadian federation. Our natural resources when properly developed will bring not only income to the people of Newfoundland but will bring income to the federal government. If our people are permitted to become Canadians I have no doubt there will be none more loyal except perhaps those who have always had the privilege of calling themselves Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, I listened to the speech made by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I sincerely regret that it was necessary for him to describe the province from which I come in the terms he did, but I must agree with him. We do need in Newfoundland many more improvements in our services if we are to bring the level of our services up even to the levels which are enjoyed by the people of the three maritime provinces. In the field of education we are having a difficult time, not only in improving the standard as it is now but even in maintaining it. In a province where a great many of the people are settled around the shores in isolated settlements, education becomes a mighty expensive service. Some years ago I had the opportunity of comparing the system of education in Newfoundland with that in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario, and even today I must admit that our services are far below the services that are given to the young people of these other provinces.

Of course, that is not true in every place in Newfoundland. In my own city the educational services are perhaps a little higher than on the coast. That may be true for other larger centres in Newfoundland as well; but generally speaking the standards of education in Newfoundland require a great deal of improvement, and it will take a lot of support to be able to do that.

Our health services are at a much lower level than those experienced by people here on the mainland. In my own home city there exists a hospital that was built with some assistance from the provincial government, and by a large donation from the public in general. When that hospital was built it was well able to serve the needs of the area, but that is no longer so. Today the hospital is not able to provide the medical attention which an ordinary Canadian expects and deserves in this day and age.

One might also go on and mention other levels of services. On an earlier occasion in the house during this session, as I have in other sessions, I referred to transportation in Newfoundland and to the tremendous load which is placed upon Newfoundlanders in being asked to build their share of the trans-Canada highway. For example, the number of miles per 10,000 of population, regardless of the difficulty in building, regardless of cost, and regardless of the ability to pay, is still twice as much as in any other province, and is roughly four times that which exists in the province of Ontario. Certainly the need is great, and I hope that when this bill is introduced it will give to us something of a different conception than that given to us by the Minister of Finance this morning. If it does not, let me assure you, Mr. Chairman, that Newfoundlanders will be a very disappointed people. They will be angered, for they will feel that once again history, as it has so many times in the past, has worked against them, and I am sure they will feel that not the Canadian people but the Canadian government has deliberately failed to honour an agreement between the people of the province of Newfoundland and the central government of Canada.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, there have been many important items raised affecting the province of Newfoundland, both on the floor of the house and outside the house, in the recent past. They were items very controversial in their purport, and were subjects of far-reaching concern to the province of Newfoundland, indeed to this Dominion of Canada. I must confess that as a Newfoundlander I have found some of the points of view expressed inside and outside this house, and some of the decisions taken because of those points of view, a little difficult to reconcile. At the same time, I fully recognize the constitutional responsibilities of those placed in positions of authority.

Perhaps of all the questions to be discussed in this house and outside, none is more important to Newfoundland than that outlined in the resolution which is now under discussion, namely article 29 of the terms of union. Indeed, article 29 is the whole purpose of this debate today, and underlies our discussion. Article 29 was born out of the contract of union between Newfoundland and Canada. As has been outlined earlier today, Mr. Chairman, article 29 called for the establishment of a royal commission some eight years after union. That article has been quoted by the Minister of Finance and by others in its entirety, and I will not burden the house with undue repetition. However, we must not lose sight of one important fact, namely that as has been established clearly here today article 29 called for the setting up of a royal commission, and in my opinion it has placed certain obligations upon us. But there is one inescapable fact, and it is this: royal commissions may recommend, but they may never legislate; the sole body which may legislate is this parliament.

I was naturally interested, and I may say a little concerned, on going back through the debates of the House of Commons leading up to confederation in 1949 to find that so little reference was made to article 29, particularly in committee. One of the few references I could find was the reference by the then prime minister which has been quoted by the Minister of Finance and which is to be found on page 289 of Hansard of 1949. Perhaps one should not lose sight of that point, the fact that article 29 was perfectly clear to everybody in 1949 and prior to 1949 when it was adopted in this house.

What of the royal commission itself? We have heard many quotations read by hon. members who have preceded me from the report of the royal commission dealing with various economic factors in the province of Newfoundland. However, we have heard little reference to the failure of that royal commission to discharge one of the most important functions under article 29, namely to establish a scale. To my mind, this is where the royal commission fails—it failed to establish a scale of financial assistance. The royal commission bases its conclusions on its findings with regard to economic conditions in the province as they are now and as they were eight years ago. I should like to quote from the report of the royal commission on page 5. It says:

> The need to improve social services and health and educational facilities laid a heavy claim upon the provincial revenues. This claim was always in conflict with the need to achieve economic betterment. Under these conditions the provincial government sought out and resorted to short cuts. A considerable attempt was made to achieve a quick increase in employment opportunities through the establishment of secondary manufacturing industries with the aid of provincial loans and credits. Financial assistance was also given for the construction of a number of plants to process local natural resources. Substantial credits were made available to achieve a rapid increase in fish-processing facilities. To a considerable extent these direct financial commitments were undertaken at the expense of greater progress in the provision of basic facilities and services. Apparently, in the face of immediate employment problems it was thought that there was no time to waste for longer-run but more lasting results. In the event, these measures have met with a mixed and sometimes transitory success.

The conclusions to be drawn from this are evident, and I will not go into them here because they would bring in topics of a controversial provincial-political nature. After all, reference was made in the report as the minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Assiniboia pointed out, to what is perhaps one of the greatest shortcomings in Newfoundland today, namely the lack of an adequate road system. The minister quoted from page 4 of the royal commission's report and I will not go into that aspect of the question here. However, at page 8 there is another reference to this particular shortcoming, roads and it reads as follows:

> The lack of an adequate road system is, in the present day, one of the outstanding handicaps to economic development and social improvement. From the economic standpoint this basic deficiency is a serious obstacle to a better concentration of population; it hinders the development of natural resources, raises the costs of distribution, restricts the diversification of industry and limits the growth of local enterprise. From the social standpoint the lack of roads adds substantially to the cost and difficulty of providing a necessary and desirable standard of public services. In short, Newfoundland is confronted with the urgent tasks of modernization, but is without the modern means of mobility and communication.

This factor is also referred to in the Gordon report or the report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects, and the quotation which I should like to read can be found at page 408 of that report:

> It was made clear to us that perhaps Newfoundland's greatest single need was a greatly expanded system of roads in order to open up the resources of the province and also to establish communication between the centres of population and at least some of the potentially more accessible outports.

If the report of the McNair commission does not do anything more than highlight some of the deficiencies in Canada's overseas province, it will achieve a great deal as far as the economic development of the Atlantic coast is concerned. I am sure that hon. members are not fully aware of how important this road shortage is. Most hon. members of this committee have never visited the province of Newfoundland and indeed many government members have not visited there. I would suggest that steps be taken in the future to see that there is a greater familiarity with Canada's newest province, this least known area of Canada. If hon. members were to go there they would, as the hon. member for Assiniboia pointed out, see how apparent is this deficiency in a system of roads.

I wish to make a comparison. My figures may be questioned because it is extremely difficult to find accurate figures with regard to road mileage. According to the statistics I have, the province of Newfoundland with the territory of Labrador represents a land mass of 152,000 square miles and has a total road mileage of 7,101 miles as against the province of Nova Scotia with an area of only 21,068 square miles and a total road mileage of 15,257. The implications of this analysis are obvious.

Equally obvious is the fact that under the present arrangement Newfoundland lacks the financial resources which would enable it to live up to its obligations under the Trans-Canada Highway Act and to provide provincial access roads. It has been estimated that to build and finish the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland would cost $80 million. Nowhere else in Canada, I suggest, is there a road problem such as there is in Newfoundland nowhere else in this country has the lack of roads retarded progress to the extent it has there.

Another aspect dealt with in the McNair commission report which is highly important and one concerning which not enough is heard is the extreme vulnerability—and I underline the words "extreme vulnerability", —of the Newfoundland economy. We are at the very end of the economic yard stick. If there is a minor recession in North America, in Newfoundland it comes closer to being a full scale depression and indeed serious problems arose last year as a result of the North American economic recession. The vulnerability of the economy of the newest province is due to many factors, not the least of which is an economy based primarily on export trade, a false economy, referred to at page 7 of the McNair report in these words:

> The heavy dependence in recent years upon the construction industry has introduced a further source of instability. In the best of times, it is a highly seasonal industry. Consequently seasonal unemployment and underemployment have continued to be major problems and important factors in the low level of annual incomes. Furthermore the rate of construction activity is subject to wide fluctuations in accordance with business conditions and market developments as they affect an export economy. Throughout the period 1949-56 the magnitudes of the construction programs in Newfoundland whether for military purposes or resource development, have from year to year dominated the economic scene to a greater extent than in other regions of Canada.

This present year we in Newfoundland are experiencing a boom in the building industry, but what happens the year after that when these buildings are completed? What happens the year after that when there is no more building and there is a famine in the fishery? I say that these are serious questions requiring serious and careful attention and consideration lest we see in Canada's newest province a repetition of what happened in the early thirties. That is why it is so important for us to have the wherewithal to develop our own resources, to develop the resources of the great Labrador storehouse, a natural storehouse of untold mineral wealth, and the forests and minerals of the island of Newfoundland proper.

Another aspect touched on by the McNair commission which has not been mentioned in this debate thus far and which to my mind is worthy of consideration is this. I quote from page 12 of the report:

> Because of the very limited development of municipal institutions, the provincial revenues in Newfoundland were required to cover the cost of services which in other provinces are generally paid for out of municipal taxes—

In other words the municipalities in Newfoundland are unable through their own sources of revenue to provide the basic services that municipalities in other parts of Canada are expected to provide. Again this represents a tremendous drain on the finances of the Newfoundland government.

The vulnerability of the Newfoundland economy to which I referred a moment ago was clearly spelled out in the report of the royal commission at page 40 where it is stated:

> The economy of Newfoundland is highly vulnerable and is somewhat more dependent upon export industries than is the economy of the maritime provinces. For this reason the provincial and municipal revenues in Newfoundland may be subject to greater variation. The amount of accumulated capital and wealth is noticeably smaller in Newfoundland than in the maritime provinces. Average per capita money incomes, after the exemptions we have allowed in our calculations, are lower. This difference in incomes is greater in real terms because of the higher cost of living in Newfoundland—

These are some of the problems highlighted by the McNair report and very obvious to those people who are familiar with Newfoundland. There is on the order paper notice of motion with respect to encouraging industry in the Atlantic provinces. I should like to refer for a moment, just as a recommendation to be considered perhaps at some future date, to a statute on the books of the parliament at Westminster passed in 1945 and known as the distribution of industry act, 1945. This legislation was primarily designed to provide long term loans at low interest rates to establish industries in those areas of the United Kingdom which do not have, by comparison, the means to provide jobs. This act was amended in 1950 and again in 1958, widening its original intent and broadening its scope. I would commend similar legislation for those economically depressed regions of Canada of which Newfoundland is one. On April 13, 1959, referring to the need to encourage industry and develop resources, the Newfoundland board of trade, an organization known in Newfoundland for many years, sent an open letter to the Prime Minister. I should like to quote from that letter as it is apropos to my remarks concerning the United Kingdom distribution of industry act. It reads in part as follows:

> From the beginning of this century, until relatively recent times, the policy of the federal government was to develop the resources of Canada by extension of the frontiers and by assistance to private enterprise. This policy took the form of advancing and fostering settlement, creating a transportation system across the nation, encouraging manufacturing industries by tariff protection and other means; the construction of highways, canals, harbour developments, docks and terminals, public buildings and utilities of various kinds. Newfoundland, of course, was not part of Canada through all this process, and relatively little economic development took place; the island during that time depending on the export market for the sale of our primary produce and the cost of living in Newfoundland being kept artificially high by a substantial revenue tariff.

The letter goes on to refer to the fact that Newfoundland joined Canada in the era of social security and that while this is desirable and helpful it must not be allowed to become a substitute for productive, wealth-creating work which can only come as a result of developing our primary resources to the full.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that I have been broad in my remarks but I feel that the onus is on me not only to draw attention to these deficiencies in our economy but as a responsible member of the house to suggest some means of overcoming these deficiencies. I think that in my remarks there is at least some suggestion of how these problems might be overcome through the necessary research and investigation.

I would quote from the remarks made by the Prime Minister on April 20 of this year on the national television network program "The Nation's Business". The Prime Minister, in referring to Newfoundland at that time, had this to say:

> In the case of Newfoundland, there has, I am sorry to say, been some misunderstanding—but differences arise even in the best of families. Let me say at once that I believe that we can and will resolve these differences in that spirit of understanding, common sense and compromise which has been so characteristic of the Canadian confederation from its very beginning. While there is a difference of opinion at the moment about the interpretation of specific terms, what is much more important is that there should be neither doubt nor misunderstanding about the equality of Newfoundland's status in the Canadian partnership.

He emphasized the full equality of Newfoundland's status in the Canadian partnership. I do not wish to refer to personalities in any controversial way because I do not approve of that but for a moment I should like to refer to the words of the premier of Newfoundland uttered in Ottawa on April 8 of this year. The premier said at that time, and I quote from a press dispatch, that Canada "would resume its role of ignoring Newfoundland as it has done for 10 years". "As it has done for 10 years", and for the first eight years of confederation hon. gentlemen opposite were in office at Ottawa.

As has been pointed out already today, we in Newfoundland have the highest birth rate and the lowest death rate in all of Canada. At the same time we only produce 10 per cent of the province's estimated food requirements. It is this fact, coupled with the high cost of transportation, that gives Canada's tenth province the highest cost of living in the dominion. When this fact is compared with the very frightening statistic that we also have the lowest per capita income in the dominion, then the conclusions to be drawn go without saying. Always in Newfoundland we have had the problem of the people of that old and ancient colony fighting against difficult odds, always struggling against the spectre of poverty. This has been our lot down through the years and it is only of recent date with the promise of development of our great natural resources that we have shown some signs of achieving that degree of stability in our economy so essential to our own well-being.

I should like to refer for a moment to the statement of the Minister of Finance. In speaking of the bill he said that it expressly states in one of the recitals that any special circumstances relating to the financial position of the province of Newfoundland after March 31, 1962 will be taken into consideration. Although I have not seen the bill, I think some of the economic background and the economic circumstances and difficulties in Newfoundland have been clearly spelled out in the bill in the light of the reference to it by the Minister of Finance. I feel satisfied that after 1962 the special needs of Newfoundland will be given that consideration in keeping with the spirit of confederation. Who can tell whether at that time that consideration of this factor may or may not be an important factor?

The real issue underlying all the controversies, underlying term 29, underlying this resolution, underlying this debate, is not the payments that have been made in the past or the payments that are now being made but the future. What of the future? This to my mind is the crux of the matter, the future of Canada's newest province within the framework of confederation, the ability of the Newfoundland people to achieve a standard equitable with the standard taken for granted by Canadians in other parts of this great country. No one will question the fact that Newfoundland, like other provinces, will have to depend in large measure on fiscal payments from the federal government in order to develop resources and improve services. But in this way we will be adding to the development of Canada as a whole.

I believe it rather unfortunate that both inside this chamber and outside suggestions have been made that payments to Newfoundland will abruptly end in 1962. I take exception to those statements, and I further submit that this is a most unrealistic attitude, particularly from those people who have had experience in federal-provincial relations. I note also with considerable regret that during the controversies of recent months there have been many attacks of a personal nature upon the Prime Minister and members of the government by those people who purport to be responsible leaders in Newfoundland. I want to assure the Prime Minister and the members of this government—I feel I can speak on behalf of the great majority of Newfoundlanders—that these attacks of a personal nature are merely the narrow partisan views of a few and they in no way reflect the true feelings of the Newfoundland people.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. McGrath: If the committee would give me a few minutes more, I would be able to finish.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, certainly.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Is it the pleasure of hon. members to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McGrath: I was saying that these narrow partisan views are merely a reflection of the views of a few, and in no way characterize the view of the people of Newfoundland as a whole. Throughout their long history the people of Newfoundland have always, and in all places, manifested the highest respect for men in high office. Furthermore, the people of Newfoundland are not at all unaware of the record of achievement of this government, particularly as it applies to the Atlantic region and, indeed, as it applies to the province of Newfoundland.

Finally, may I say that a chain is only as strong as its weakest link and so, too, is this nation only as rich as its poorest province. In the words of my colleague from Halifax spoken in this house, we believe that government exists for the people and not the people for government. Underlying all the controversies are the people of Newfoundland and their disabilities. If they have disabilities, I am the less as a fellow Canadian.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, the statement of the Prime Minister made last March was unfavourably received in Newfoundland and also in many parts of Canada. I am sure that the announcement of the Minister of Finance today will be received with even greater disappointment. The minister said all Canadians welcomed the union. Of course they did. He also said that we entered union in a spirit of fairness on both sides. With this statement, I am sure all Newfoundlanders will agree.

He referred also to the word "thereafter" in the report of the royal commission on Newfoundland finances, and how it could be applied. I want to assure this committee that it only has one meaning so far as Newfoundlanders are concerned and that is, as it states, thereafter or until the government of Newfoundland and the federal government meet to discuss or review the terms of union. When Newfoundland entered confederation her entry was different from the entry of the other provinces because the result was a union between two sovereign states under the British crown, even though Newfoundland's sovereignty was temporarily suspended.

When the terms of union were signed they bound the governments of the future to carry out those terms, and the parliament of that day confirmed that obligation by a formal act of parliament approving the terms of union. An amendment was made to the British North America Act which made the terms of union a part of the constitution of Canada. It was Prime Minister Mackenzie King's opinion that if Newfoundland did not join Canada she would join with the United States, and ultimately confederation itself would be endangered if its eastern gateway were to be dominated by a foreign power.

When Newfoundlanders finally faced the issue and voted by a small majority to join

Canada, Prime Minister Mackenzie King was very disappointed with the slight majority. The final negotiations for union were left to Prime Minister St. Laurent, but Prime Minister King had fulfilled Macdonald's vision of a nation taking in the north half of the continent. Thus it was under the late Prime Minister Mackenzie King that confederation was completed.

Under the terms of union a royal commission was to be appointed within eight years of the date of union, and while the terms do not say that any parliament had to accept the recommendations of that commission, few Newfoundlanders thought the government would not carry out in good faith the constitutional obligation to provide additional financial assistance, if any were required, to enable the government of Newfoundland to continue the levels of provincial services without greater provincial taxes than the average in the maritimes. It was also the belief that the constitutional obligation was not to end in 1962, or any other year. It was to last as long as the union lasted, just as the constitutional subsidies to other provinces were to continue as long as confederation continued.

I was shocked at the announcement of the Minister of Finance of the decision of the Progressive Conservative government on term 29 of the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada. In my opinion, the recommendations of the McNair commission were the lowest possible that could, with honour, be offered to Newfoundland under term 29. I am convinced also that neither those who signed the terms of union 10 years ago nor the McNair commission ever recommended or even envisaged the stoppage of this grant after a definite period.

The Diefenbaker government, after twelve months considering the recommendations of the McNair commission and term 29, accepted the recommendations of this commission only as a yardstick to back up their decision and then by limiting the grant to only five years duration. I hope Mr. Chairman, that this does not show any political spleen toward the Newfoundland government or the Newfoundland premier who has the courage of his convictions and who has never been afraid to speak out whenever the welfare of Newfoundland or its people were at stake.

In my opinion, the government of Canada has lost face by this act of betrayal in failing to honour a sacred bond given and accepted in good faith just 10 years ago. The honour and record of Canada as a nation has been defamed and blackened in the nations of the world and unless and until this decision is voided or adjusted the word of Canada will never again be accepted with sincerity and confidence. This is a sad period in the history of Canada, when her honour and integrity have been blackened by the betrayal decision of a Progressive Conservative government which a short time ago won acclaim unequalled in political history based on promises of sincerity, integrity and fair dealings in all matters affecting Canada and Canadians. Today, by the decision of the Diefenbaker government in not honouring the sacred word given just over 10 years ago, Newfoundland has been betrayed and Canada stands before the nations of the world as a country which has betrayed her province. Canadians everywhere will deeply resent this blackening of their country's honour. I now conclude with a verse from our ode to Newfoundland:

> As loved our fathers, so we love,
> Where once they stood we stand,
> Their prayer we raise to Heaven above
> God guard thee, Newfoundland.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, in common, I believe, with virtually all of Newfoundland and, I would dare to say, most Canadians, I was deeply shocked this morning by the announcement of the Minister of Finance with regard to the final part of the confederation of Newfoundland with Canada. Term 29, which has been debated here today, was an act of faith on the part of the people of Newfoundland when they decided to join their destiny with the destiny of the great nation of Canada. The interpretation put upon term 29 this morning seems, to me at least, to be the negation of the spirit of that time. Indeed, it seems to contain the seeds of disunity and the fear of oppression.

Term 29 is distinct and clear from the other grants which have been made to Newfoundland. The grant to the Atlantic provinces was designed to help those provinces which were considered to be less prosperous than the rest of Canada. But term 29 was designed to help Newfoundland maintain the improved standards which it was hoped the province would have at this later date. Since Newfoundland entered confederation 10 years ago a great many improvements have been made in the public utilities of Newfoundland including roads, schools and hospitals. All these have been improved. I imagine that in the past 10 years more progress has been made than in previous history. However, this was done at high cost in effort and in money.

The maintenance of these improved services is what term 29 was designed to cover. Having obtained these improvements, having had more and better schools, more and better roads and more and better hospitals, how are we to maintain them if term 29 is not to be implemented in its original meaning? That meaning was clear. Ten years ago the government of the day and the Newfoundland people tried, as far as possible, to protect the future of Newfoundland. No one could forecast that far into the future but what they could do was to make sure that means were available by which adjustments, such as time and circumstance should determine, might be made. This in essence was term 29, and it was left to the future years for those who at that future time were the guardians of Canada's destiny and honour, to implement the intent of the people who wrote and signed that agreement. But the limited interpretation put upon term 29 this morning has jeopardized the whole future of our province. After the interpretation put upon the word "thereafter", what reason is there for us to have much faith in the phrase "special needs"? Today there is small reason to blame the people of my province for feeling that they have been betrayed.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister from Newfoundland not intend to speak?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What about?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman. If the minister is without voice, as he has been throughout the consideration of this matter up to now, I as the one remaining member from Newfoundland who has not yet spoken will certainly not be without voice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: At the same time, I do not intend to take a great deal of time in the committee this afternoon on this matter. I myself think that there is only one point that really divides the government and the opposition. That point was put with great clarity by the leader of our party and it has been successively put by each of the members on this side of the house from Newfoundland. It is in order to indicate our unanimity of view on this matter as much as anything else that I too am going to take a little of the time of the committee.

The hon. member for St. John's East made one or two observations but he carefully avoided discussing term 29 or what it meant. He seemed to express contentment with an enunication of some hazy and pious aspiration on the part of the Minister of Finance that there would be some vague clause in the bill indicating that special circumstances would be taken into account in 1962. We would never have had any of these fiscal arrangements between the federal and provincial governments which have been characteristic of the period since the second world war if it had not been for the inexorable need, because of the nature of our federal system, of special consideration for special situations. If all the provinces had the same levels of income and the same resources there would be no need for tax-sharing arrangements at all. Everyone could stand on his own feet. What the minister is saying, as clearly as we can see it without having the bill before us, is that Newfoundland is to lose a right under the constitution and in substitution thereof is to be given the same kind of consideration, or lack of consideration, that may or may not be given before 1962.

The minister said in response to a question of mine, when I asked him what statutory authority he had for saying that these tax sharing arrangements must be reviewed before 1962, that there was no statutory obligation. And there is no statutory obligation. There is no "must" at all. It all depends on the grace of this government, this government which in November, 1957 undertook to call a federal-provincial conference in January, 1958 and did not carry out that promise but imposed a unilateral arrangement. There is no reason, on the basis of the experience we have had with this government, to expect anything except unilateral treatment of the provinces in 1962. As my hon. friend from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador has just said, when we get the extraordinary distortion of the ordinary, plain English meaning of the word "thereafter" which we have already got from the Minister of Finance this morning, there is certainly no reason to expect that we will get anything whatsoever beyond what this government unilaterally is willing to do in 1962 or before 1962.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to make one or two observations about one or two of the points which were made by the Minister of Finance this morning before making my own brief contribution to this debate. First of all I want to say that I was disappointed, and I know the people of Newfoundland will also be disappointed, that it was the Minister of Finance and not the Prime Minister who introduced this legislation. It is, it seems to me, another example of the indifference of the government in this matter. This, after all, was the final act of confederation. It was the kind of degrading act that I cannot imagine any of the Prime Minister's predecessors performing. Even if he had wanted the minister to make the speech, as is often done in this house, the resolution could have been put in the name of the Prime Minister. In a situation where there is already a good deal of feeling about this very point, it seems to me that there was a lack of constitutional propriety, a lack of a sense of the fitness of things in this matter.

There is one other thing which I want to say a very brief word about. The Minister of Finance regretted, as I think all Canadians regret, that the completion of confederation did not take place long before 1949. The minister said that if it had taken place before 1949 the people of Newfoundland would have made an even bigger contribution to the development of Canada than in fact they have made in those ten years since union. But I do not think we should just leave it at that, because notwithstanding the fact that the formal union did not take place until 1949 there had been a more intimate association between Newfoundland and Canada for a longer period than was perhaps the case between any two countries, even Canada and the United States, before union. The formal union was really a formal acceptance of what had almost become a fact before that.

The minister does not need to go further than the city and university with which he is so closely associated to recall that the greatest of our Canadian poets is himself a Newfoundlander. One could go on into almost any field. I reminded the house the other day that the president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority is a gentleman who happened to have been born in the settlement of Twillingate and who had part of his education in Bonavista. It is the same wherever you go in Canada. And this is not new, it has been true since the beginning of confederation in 1867 and even before it. It is statistically impossible to demonstrate this fact, but I would be very surprised indeed if there were not more people who had some of their origins, at any rate, in Newfoundland on the mainland of Canada than there are in Newfoundland, despite the growth of population there has been in the last ten years.

I come next to the second point which the Minister of Finance made this morning, which I wanted to take issue with, and that was the question of the duration of term 29. The minister attempted to show that this term was for a period of transition and that it was not meant to last indefinitely. Of course, the terms of union themselves demonstrate conclusively that that is not correct, because the very term before term 29, term 28, is precisely the term which deals with the period of transition. It is the term which provides for the transitional grants, and term 29 was to provide for something which was to take the place of the transitional grants if that were necessary. As has been said over and over again, there is no question whatsoever that it was on term 29 that the negotiations almost failed, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out this morning. It was the critical term, and it was the term on which Mr. Crosbie refused to sign the terms of agreement, because he felt that it was not an adequate safeguard. The hon. member for St. John's West, when he was in the parliament two before the last one, made statements in 1950 and 1951 about this which I have looked up, and he too had his doubts about the adequacy of this matter and was pressing at that time to have the royal commission appointed immediately and have this matter settled at an earlier date.

The Leader of the Opposition pointed out that there was absolutely no hint in term 29 of any time limit, no hint whatever. And there is no hint whatever of any time limit in the report of the royal commission. It is true, as the Minister of Finance has pointed out, that the royal commission was urged by counsel for the province of Newfoundland to recommend a periodic review, but the royal commission in its wisdom did not do that. I suggest that one of the reasons why they did not do that, which was set out in a letter by Professor B. S. Keirstead, of Toronto, published in the Globe and Mail of April 3, 1959, was that Mr. Ritchie, who at that time was counsel for the federal government, took exception to this suggestion and suggested that it was not within their purview.

But after all it is a rather fruitless thing for the Minister of Finance and myself to be discussing what was in the minds of the royal commission. What we have before us is not what was in their minds but what is on paper in their report. In the entire report there is not a word, or a hint, or a suggestion of any termination. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition and I agree with the premier of Newfoundland and I agree, to a very limited extent, with the Minister of Finance that a payment in perpetuity of $8 million is probably not the most suitable way of dealing with this problem, though I think that if the government had chosen to deal with it in that way they would have discharged the obligation under the terms of union to the letter, and I think that no valid criticism either on constitutional grounds or on grounds of good faith could have been directed against them if they had done that.

But I do think, as the premier of Newfoundland has said and as the Leader of the Opposition indicated earlier today, that an agreement between the federal and provincial governments to review this question on the basis and under the conditions provided in term 29 after a period of years would be better than the payment of $8 million in perpetuity or for an indefinite period. I think the hon. member for Assiniboia put this point very well—that we do not legislate in perpetuity; we have a great many enactments with no time limit on them, but that does not mean that they cannot be changed by parliament within its sovereign power. I would suggest, as the Leader of the Opposition suggested before me, that any unilateral change of this character is a repudiation of the spirit of the constitution and certainly of what the Newfoundlanders believed they were getting when they had this article written into the terms of union.

The Minister of Finance read article 29, and I am not going to read it in full again, but I should like to emphasize briefly once again what it was that this article was supposed to do. It was supposed to provide whatever difference of revenue was necessary to continue the public services at the level they had reached at the time of the inquiry as long as it was necessary to do that, without obliging the government of Newfoundland to impose taxes heavier than those in the maritime provinces. The minister says that the only express legal obligation was to appoint a royal commission and, of course, that is quite true. That is perfectly true, and that was recognized, as the minister said, by Mr. St. Laurent in the quotation which, again, I will not read because the minister has put it on record in Hansard.

But does anyone in this committee think for one moment that any of those distinguished Newfoundlanders who signed the terms of union would have signed if they had not had confidence in the good faith of Canadian public men, regardless of political party, to carry out the obvious intent of article 29? No one in his senses would have signed that document believing that if a royal commission was appointed the government of Canada had discharged its full obligation. No one in his senses would have signed it. Are we in this parliament going to say that because that is the only express legal obligation there is therefore no constitutional obligation? It seems to me that to ask that question is to answer it.

So little confidence did the hon. member for St. John's West and his colleague of those days, the late Mr. Higgins, have in this kind of protection that they campaigned, as I well know, in the year 1953, when I was elected to parliament, against the St. Laurent government, and the burden of their campaign was that the government of Canada should obligate itself to accept the report of the royal commission regardless of what it was. That was supported by their leader, Mr. Drew, in a speech at St. John's. In other words, the position of the Conservative party under Mr. Drew in the year 1953 was that the royal commission's report should be accepted in advance regardless of what it contained.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can the hon. member give a citation in support of that?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not have them to hand but I will be glad to get them for the hon. gentleman and put them on record at the second reading stage of this bill.

I remember that situation very well, of course, because it was my first election. I was asked my own views on this subject and I repeated, though not literatim and verbatim, what Mr. St. Laurent had said. It was a big issue in Newfoundland at that time.

The Minister of Finance said there were two questions which arose concerning the recommendations of the royal commission. The first was that the commission gave no explanation of why it had departed from the year 1956-57 and taken the budget of Newfoundland for the year 1957-58 as the basis for its recommendation. The Leader of the Opposition dealt with that matter, I think. He made the point, but I should like to underline it a couple of times because the Minister of Finance did not seem to grasp it and because it does seem to be an important point. In 1956-57 the services were still being built up as they were in every previous year after 1949. The budget for 1957-58 was essentially to continue the services—because the word is "continue" not "maintain"—at the level they had reached at the end of the eight years. Of course, if a niggling, cheese-paring treasury board attitude were to be taken toward this matter of the final determination of confederation, perhaps some argument might be made about this, but it is an argument which I should be very surprised if hon. gentlemen opposite would carry very far.

The second question, the minister said, is what is meant by "thereafter". I am not going to argue that question because it seems to me to be very obvious that what is meant by "thereafter" is thereafter.

The minister has told us about the comprehensive study that has been launched into all aspects of fiscal policy. We on this side of the house have very grave reservations about that study. We have had a lot of experience of this kind of study going right back to 1936 and the Bank of Canada investigation into the three prairie provinces which was the foundation of the Rowell-Sirois commission. There was also the very thorough study made in preparation for the dominion-provincial conference of 1945, and those studies have been going on continuously ever since. During that period a great many ideas have been contributed by many of the provinces themselves, as well as by the federal government. But the one thing to which everyone in Newfoundland objects most in the attitude of the present government toward this matter is its persistent attempt to assimilate this question of term 29 to federal-provincial relations generally. That seemed to be the position which was taken by the Prime Minister during the federal-provincial conference of November, 1957, when he said as reported at page 12 of that conference:

> Now may I turn for a moment to the subject of fiscal relations in particular. As I view the situation, the first problem we have to consider is the need for some special recognition of the situation of the Atlantic provinces. There is, of course, a royal commission considering the particular problem of Newfoundland in accordance with the undertaking in the terms of union, so I shall not endeavour to express opinions upon Newfoundland's position pending receipt of the recommendations of the commision.
> I believe that we all recognize, however, that the Atlantic provinces as a group are confronted with greater difficulties in public finance than the rest of the nation, if they are to maintain the sort of provincial and municipal services that Canadians generally expect. The taxable capacity of the Atlantic provinces, even in the best of times, is significantly lower than that of the other provinces.

This statement does contain—I am not going to put it in any other way than that—what certainly appeared to the premier of Newfoundland, and what certainly seems to me, to be an ambiguity. One can draw one of two conclusions from that statement, either that Newfoundland was expected to participate in this general treatment of the Atlantic provinces or, because of the royal commission, it was not. Mr. Smallwood was sufficiently concerned about that to devote a large part of his speech to it and the relevant parts are mainly on pages 99, 100 and 101. I do not want to take up the time of the committee by reading them but I would like to briefly summarize them.

What Mr. Smallwood said—and it was put very well by my friend the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo a little while ago—was that term 29 would provide Newfoundland with the necessary money to continue the existing level of services, and what these Atlantic provinces grants appeared to envisage was some improvement in their existing situation, and that surely Newfoundland was entitled to participate in that improvement, and that the fact that she was also having consideration given to the means of continuing the existing services should not exclude her from participating with the other Atlantic provinces in the improvement. At page 101 the Prime Minister appeared to agree with that view. I will read the Prime Minister's words:

> The Chairman: I will say no more at this time, but I would point out to the premier of Newfoundland that when I used the expression "the Atlantic provinces" I anticipated what his views would be in regard to the use of that expression.

I was present in the audience. I heard that statement and took from it what most other people took from it, that the Prime Minister agreed that these were two entirely separate things. But that has not been the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite since.

Last year when we were endeavouring to get these payments that were requested unanimously by the legislature of Newfoundland in a resolution moved by the premier and seconded by the leader of the opposition, the Minister of Finance used the Atlantic provinces grants as an excuse for delaying. This attitude is bitterly and universally resented in Newfoundland. The suggestion that because they are allowed to participate with the other Atlantic provinces—and certainly, as the hon. member for St. John's East pointed out this afternoon, their need is at least as great as any other Atlantic province and we think greater—is no reason why they should be denied their constitutional rights. That is our position.

There is just one other point I want to deal with before I come to the crux of this matter. The hon. member for St. John's East referred to the attitude taken in Newfoundland. He said something about narrow partisan views. I feel I should put on the record an article which appeared in the St. John's News of March 26, 1959, quoting a statement made by the leader of the Conservative opposition in the Newfoundland legislature. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman would accuse him of narrow partisan views on this question. The article is entitled, "Hollett: We Fail to Understand", and reads as follows:

> Malcolm M. Hollett, leader of the opposition in the Newfoundland legislature and political leader of the Progressive Conservative party in this province, said he fails to understand the statement of the Prime Minister in relation to the provisions of term 29.
> Mr. Hollett said in a statement to the Daily News "We scarcely know what to say. The royal commission recommended $8 million from the first of April, 1957, to be paid annually to the government of Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union. These are the words of the term itself."
> "Rightly or wrongly," the opposition leader continued, "most of us thought that $8 million was too little. Even if $8 million were sufficient I fail to see how the federal government can accept the amount recommended by the royal commission and then limit it to five years, which is contrary to the commission's recommendation in respect to time."

Mr. McGrath: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. McGrath: Would the hon. member consider that to be a rude remark of a personal nature representing a personal attack such as I was referring to?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. Mr. Chairman, I took down the hon. member's words and he said "narrow partisan views". He seemed to apply that to all the opposition to the government's attitute in the province of Newfoundland. I thought I should remind the hon. gentleman of this statement by Mr. Hollet.

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is trying to put words in my mouth that I did not use. I referred to those people in Newfoundland who made attacks of a personal nature on the person of the Prime Minister and the members of the government and said that their opinions reflected their own narrow political views.

Mr. Pickersgill: I had not intended to mention this, but in that regard the hon. gentleman will remember that a delegation of students from Memorial University made a parade through the city of St. John's and they were led by a young man who was a prominent member of the young Progressive Conservative association. If that is what the hon. gentleman has reference to, that is all right with me.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Pickersgill: I had not intended to enter a discussion of this aspect of the matter at all. I merely wanted to correct the impression I thought was left by the hon. gentleman that there was something narrow or partisan about this opposition. I was in Newfoundland myself in the early days of April and I know perfectly well that it was extremely difficult to find anyone who did not share Mr. Hollett's views in greater or lesser degree. I now come to the crux of this whole situation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question before he moves on to another subject?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman made a reference a little earlier to the fact that this resolution had been introduced by the Minister of Finance rather than the Prime Minister. Is it not a fact that through the years—and I think particularly of 1956 the records of which I have before me—whenever financing arrangements were discussed and provision made by the house the resolution and indeed the bill itself was introduced by the minister of finance?

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister has illustrated precisely my point. As the Prime Minister very well knows, those tax-sharing arrangements were financial arrangements made long subsequent to confederation, starting in 1941, dealing with the fiscal arrangements and tax-sharing between the provinces and the federal government. What I had earlier said, as the Prime Minister will find if he looks at my words, and what I repeat, is that it is this very attempt to degrade this measure into that field that is resented in Newfoundland. This measure deals with the constitution itself. This is the implementation of one of the terms of the British North America Act. This is the completion of confederation. It was for that reason and for that reason alone that I made the observation I did and I take it that my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition made similar observations. I feel very keenly about this matter. What is more, of course, the Prime Minister will recall that it was he and not the Minister of Finance who made the statement on March 25.

I might point out to the Prime Minister that I never took any exception to the Minister of Finance bringing in the Atlantic provinces grants legisiation. I praised and supported them. I did not say the Prime Minister should have done it at all. That is one of the things that is quite within the normal departmental activities of the Minister of Finance. On the other hand I would not have blamed the Prime Minister if he had done it because I think it was about the only good thing this government has done in two years. However, he did not do it and I take no exception to that. But this is different. This measure is the completion of the constitutional framework of this country. I have no apology whatever to make for taking the position I have taken on this matter.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. McGrath: Would the hon. member permit a question—or he can carry on.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member would like to ask a question I would be very happy if he would do so.

Mr. McGrath: Does the hon. gentleman advocate payment of a definite, statutory grant in perpetuity?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. That is precisely the point I was coming to. I do not advocate that. I thought I had made that position clear, but I shall come to the very crux of this situation. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo put the essence of this obligation very well, I thought more clearly than I had ever heard it put before and I have heard this matter discussed a good many times. It seems to me that the essence of this obligation is that Newfoundland should have the necessary revenue to continue the level of public services that was attained eight years after the union and to continue that without a level of taxation higher than the average in the maritime provinces. That is what the delegates thought they were getting. That is what they signed this for. They did not sign it to get a royal commission. They did not sign it to get $8 million for an indefinite period. They signed it to have that specific condition fulfilled. It might have been nothing or it might have been $20 million.

Indeed, the hon. member for St. John's East made a rather interesting point. He suggested that if the government of Newfoundland had increased its services instead of devoting some money to industrial development they could have had even better services by 1957. At least, I took that to be the import of what he said. That would have meant that a figure more than $8 million would have been recommended here.

But what I am saying is that a royal commission was the instrument by which this was to be determined, subject, of course, to the ordinary prudential considerations that have to be taken into account and subject, of course, to the final action of a sovereign parliament. There is a real problem, as the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance both well know and as I am sure most hon. members also know, with respect to our normal conception of parliamentary sovereignty and the conception of federalism. In a unitary state there is no problem. In a federal state there always is a problem and it was illustrated very well by the Leader of the Opposition this morning.

But subject to that limitation there was no question that this royal commission was the instrumentality to determine what was needed in this matter, and I say that what was needed in this matter and what will continue to be needed is the essence of the matter. That is what good faith demands that this parliament provide.

I do think if the government had accepted the recommendation no one, as I said earlier and I want to repeat it, could criticize the government on constitutional grounds. No one could accuse them of bad faith. They might be accused of niggardliness, and I am sure some have so accused them, but there could not be a valid accusation of bad faith if they had accepted the recommendation in the report, legislated on it and had done nothing more. But what I think would be preferable, what the Leader of the Opposition indicated he thought would be preferable and what I still think would be the wise course for the government to take would be to consult with the government of Newfoundland and agree upon a period during which this award be paid and upon a method for its revision before the end of that period. If that were done I think there would have been unanimous approval for this measure. I know that as far as I am concerned I would have approved it wholeheartedly.

From what the Minister of Finance told us about the attitude taken by the premier and the minister of finance of Newfoundland at the conference in January it would seem to me that was the position they took at that time. I have no warrant to speak for the government of Newfoundland and I have never pretended I have, though I do happen to enjoy very friendly relations with that government which I hope will continue. I do think that if they were approached on this matter there would be very little difficulty in getting agreement as to the period of review and about the form of review that might be taken. When this measure was delayed so long after January, having been delayed to January from the previous July when the report was actually made available to parliament, although, of course, it was actually made available to the governor in council on May 31, we on this side felt—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not right.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, it is dated May 31—that the reason that the government was delaying this was precisely in order to give special consideration to a way in which a satisfactory review on the basis of the stipulation in term 29 could be incorporated into the bill. As I say again, I am sure if that had been done there would have been no difficulty whatsoever with this legislation on either side of the house. But simply to be told that we must trust this all-wise government to take some undefined special considerations and special needs into account in 1962 is very little to go on on the basis of the record of the government up to the present in dealing with the provinces.

But that is not the point. The point is that these fiscal arrangements are arrangements; that, apart from the statutory subsidies, the provinces have the right under the constitution to raise their own revenues. These fiscal arrangements are not part of the constitution. They are arrangements. They are of a different order from rights under the constitution, and to ask the people of Newfoundland to forego their rights under the constitution for something vague like "special circumstances" is not good enough. The Prime Minister himself recognized that this was a contractual obligation—

Mr. Lennard: Three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. Pickersgill: I heard one hon. member say something about three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, my reason for making that remark is that the hon. gentleman said that he was not going to take up the time of the committee and was only going to speak for a few minutes. Three-quarters of an hour is quite a few minutes. Personally I do not care. You can go on as long as you like.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister recognized that this was a contract. As the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, in the Prime Minister's statement on March 25 he referred to "the contractual obligations of the union consummated in 1949". The Prime Minister said, as found on page 2216 of Hansard:

> The proposed payments will be unconditional and will be in final and irrevocable settlement of the provisions of article 29 and the contractual obligations—

It seems to me that for one party to a contract, without consultation with the other, to change the terms of that contract and say that this is in final settlement of it is a most extraordinary attitude to take.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman advise whether he agrees with the words of Mr. St. Laurent that have already been quoted, namely:

> There is no undertaking to implement any terms of recommendation that may be made at that time by a royal commission.

Mr. Pickersgill: I certainly agree with the words of Mr. St. Laurent and I have said so. I said very much earlier that the only legal obligation, as the Minister of Finance pointed out this morning before hon. gentlemen make too much of it, was to appoint a royal commission, but the Prime Minister did not quote the other words of Mr. St. Laurent which are very relevant. Mr. St. Laurent never thought that anyone would be indulging in legal quibbles or talking about legal obligations. What he said right after that was:

> It was felt by the Newfoundland delegation, and by the representatives of the Canadian government, that this was something that was being entered into in a spirit of fairness on both sides, and that it was not necessary to make binding stipulations about what would happen with respect to the report of a royal commission. It was felt if there was an investigation and a report by a commission in which the public at that time would have confidence—

That is a commission in which the public would have confidence.

> —the legislators of that day could well be trusted to do what would prove to be right in order to make this enlarged nation a united nation continuing on its path of progress toward its great destiny.

What Mr. St. Laurent meant by that is quite plain. He meant that if the recommendations of the royal commission carried out the real intent of this clause, which was to provide the government of Newfoundland with the money to continue these services without having higher taxes than the other maritime provinces, this parliament would do that and do it according to the recommendation of the commission.

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Pickersgill: He did not say that, no, because everything under our unwritten British constitution is posited on good faith and that is perhaps the reason why the hon. member for St. John's West, when he was in opposition, thought this was not good enough and wanted from Mr. St. Laurent a pledge in advance to accept the report of the commission. Perhaps the hon. gentleman foresaw a change of government. Perhaps he foresaw a government that would be satisfied with a legal quibble instead of good faith as a basis of government, but surely not.

I should like also to draw the Prime Minister's attention to something that was said about this matter by somebody else in this same debate. I quote here the words of the present Prime Minister in this debate as recorded at page 339 of Hansard for February 8, 1949:

> That, of course, is the legal and parliamentary position. But in addition to the legal position, as I see it there is also a moral responsibility resting upon this parliament to remove or alleviate any causes of discontent on the part of the very large minority who voted in the negative during the two referendums. The essence of democracy is a recognition of the need to preserve the rights of minorities.

Then, he continued:

> The acquisition of Newfoundland will take its place, in strategic importance, with the acquisition by the United States of Alaska and Louisiana. It is actually the completion of that unity which caused Mr. Galt, as he then was, to say at the time of confederation:
>
> "Half a continent is ours if we have but the courage to take up the burden."

Then, he continued:

> In taking up that burden, in welcoming those who heretofore have belonged to a sister dominion, above everything else we want to be sure that these new citizens who join us will do so in a spirit of amity and unity, thereby making their contribution to the strength, power and destiny of this confederation.

Now we are told that by a legal quibble, they can escape this obligation.

On March 25, after the Prime Minister made his statement, I asked him this question:

Does the Prime Minister realize that every person in Newfoundland will regard this as another breach of a solemn contract?

That, of course, is precisely what has been the attitude of everyone in Newfoundland. It has been the attitude because it is so obviously a breach of a solemn contract.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not what Mr. St. Laurent said.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Pallett: May I ask for a standing vote, please?

Motion (Mr. Fleming, Eglinton) agreed to: Yeas, 71; nays, 16.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-72, to provide for the payment of additional grants to the province of Newfoundland.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AGRICULTURE

REPEAL OF CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT—PROVISION OF LONG TERM MORTGAGE CREDIT TO FARMERS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, July 7, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-67, to provide for the extension of long term mortgage credit to farmers—Mr. Harkness—Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Harkness: I think perhaps considerable time of the committee might be saved if I made a short statement at this time. I propose to ask one of my colleagues to move an amendment to clause 16 when we come to that clause. As members of the committee will perhaps recall, this clause deals with the rate of interest. The amendment I propose is:

That paragraph (c) of clause 16 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
(c) The interest rate on loans shall be 5 per cent per annum.

I observe, Mr. Chairman, that this announcement has apparently been received with universal acclaim throughout the committee. I should like to explain, shortly, the reasons why the government has considered it desirable to make this change. We had proposed, and we still intend, that the farm credit provision shall be a self-sustaining one, that it will not be a scheme providing for a subsidized rate of interest. However, a large number of members of parliament from the Conservative party as well as some organizations made representations to the effect that the type of scheme which was provided for in the bill as it was introduced, and which was that the rate of interest charged should be the cost of money to the government, would cause the rate of interest to vary from year to year and would be unfair to those farmers who borrowed in years when the rate of interest happened to be relatively high as compared to those farmers who borrowed in years when the rate of interest happened to be low.

It was felt, therefore, it was more desirable to have what you might call an equalized interest rate; in other words, an interest rate which would be the same from year to year and which would be set over a period of years so that the amount of interest paid would be sufficient to pay the costs on the money which the government would put up for these loans. As a result we propose to make this amendment and to put into effect the 5 per cent interest rate which it is calculated will be sufficient to pay the cost of money to the government plus the ordinary carrying or administrative costs of the scheme.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, we were pleased to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) state that he would leave the rate of interest at 5 per cent. I must congratulate him and thank him for that, on behalf of the farmers. We realize he has understood the value of the claims we submitted at the resolution stage.

In fact, we had asked that the rate of interest be not higher than 5 per cent, and we had even recommended that it be made equal to the rate paid by the government on its loans. Besides, it is the same recommendation which was made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, as well as by all other farm organizations in general.

Having made other suggestions, we hope that on each item, the minister, having welcomed our suggestions, will introduce suitable amendments.

We suggested in the course of the debate that the bill be considered by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, since this large scale bill involves far-reaching consequences; in fact, it should have been referred to that standing committee so that it might have come back well prepared, well considered, polished and ready for efficient implementation.

The future of family farming is at stake. If we want to save the family farm, which is still the soundest unit of our national economy, it must be given the minimum of stimulus which its vitality and survival require.

In the province of Quebec, the number of farms is decreasing at the rate of 2,000 a year. Soon, with the farm laws being fostered by the Conservative government, it will not only be the number of abandoned lands that we will deplore, but actually the number of parishes. Our parish organizations, our school boards are deep in debt, and their burdens are becoming heavier and heavier, as a result of higher rates of interest.

What we need, Mr. Chairman, and what we have recommended many times, is the study of the very basis of the agricultural problem, which could be done if a federal-provincial commission were set up to consider particular farm conditions in each province.

Such a commission would have a huge and most useful task to accomplish, in the study of land use and conservation, readaptation of cultures and productions to their respective environments, and in the field of research, price products stabilization, marketing, etc.

We shall achieve those results when the Minister of Agriculture will have understood the problems of eastern farmers as well as those of western farmers.

According to the Gordon commission, it costs the Canadian taxpayers $1 billion a year to protect our industry in general. The agricultural class does not ask that much.

I do hope the Minister of Agriculture will fully understand the problems of our farmers, especially those of eastern Canada, so that, thanks to that new farm credit act, they may maintain themselves and prosper.

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I must frankly admit that the minister's announcement was very pleasing to members of this group. I had intended to deal mainly with the interest rate and the inequalities of the interest rate. However, the minister has now scuttled my argument. Consequently I shall not have as much to say as had been my intention. Before proceeding I must say that we are pleased that the minister listened to the arguments of the members of the opposition when the resolution was before the house. In my opinion he has taken a sensible course.

As one who appreciatss the value of the economic family farm in Canadian society, I am pleased indeed to see this measure come before the house. It is on that account that we support the measure in principle. It provides for supervised farm credit in reasonable amounts over a reasonable period of years and will make possible the maintenance, the improvement and the development of economic farm units in Canada. If the interest rate is maintained at not more than 5 per cent this measure could mean a new era in the use of agricultural credit in Canada.

We are in a somewhat better position with this bill than we were with the bill providing for crop insurance. There is definite and genuine experience upon which to base this legislation. That experience comes from the activities of the Veterans Land Act administration. I presume that this measure is based on that experience. I want to say once again—and I have no hesitation in saying this wherever I have the opportunity to speak on this subject—that this is to a great extent due to the dynamic and imaginative direction of the Veterans Land Act administration under Brigadier Rutherford supported by an extremely competent staff.

In that connection I want to bring to the attention of the committee some documents. I want to illustrate the imagination that has been used by the director of the Veterans Land Act administration and his officials in the preparation of materials that assists people to understand the results of the settlement of veterans under that act since the second world war. This shows a human interest in the problems of those we settle on the land and in their needs and requirements. It also shows an interest in making suggestions to improve the legislation.

I am not going to deal at length with them here, but I have here the Veterans Land Act administration quarterly comparative summary dealing with director's quarterly letter to all staff; self-analysis questionnaire for credit advisers; collection standing by districts and regions; number of special arrears by districts and regions; summary of work by districts; summary of work by regions and summary of work by fields. Then there is another pamphlet dealing with the organization, distribution and duties of staff, classifications and so on. Then there is another pamphlet pertaining to full-time farming settlement, part-time farming settlement, commercial fishing settlement, housing, civilian purchase contracts and various other matters. Then there is a very excellent book which deals with the summary of a survey of 5,000 V.L.A. farmers made between July, 1957 and September, 1958 for the purpose of assessing the progress and future credit requirements of farmers settled under the Veterans Land Act.

This demonstrates in an imaginative direction something we have not had before with respect to agricultural credit in this country. This is the sort of thing which lays a sound foundation for governments to pass legislation on, and I have no hesitation in paying a tribute to the excellent work being done by the Veterans Land Act administration. I would also say it is not only recognized by the members of this house and the veterans who have benefited from this legislation, but it is recognized by the Canadian Legion and other veterans' organizations. The Canadian Legion in its representations to the Senate committee on veterans affairs just recently urged the government to consider extending the same type of credit facilities which are provided to veterans under the Veterans Land Act to young Canadians who wish to commence farming in this country. It is an illustration of what has been done and can be done under this legislation for young Canadians who wish to commence farming.

On page 3 of this summary there is a table dealing with net worth, and it says:

> The average net worth of the settlers, including the conditional grant of $2,320 as if earned at time of settlement, $5,376. The average net worth at time of survey, an average of 8.9 years after settlement, $13,487.

That is a clear, concrete illustration of the success which has been obtained under this legislation.

I want to make reference too to a paragraph on page 6, and I am putting this on the record because I think it is important that as many people as possible in Canada know what is being done under the Veterans Land Act administration, and know what can be done under this legislation now before the house, if it is used constructively and with the assistance of the Veterans Land Act officials. It says:

> In this survey, we see 5,000 comparatively young farmers in all parts of Canada sitting down with their resident credit advisers and planning their future farm organization and production progams on the basis of at least some probability that ample supervised credit will be made available to them in order to carry out their plans. These men can see the possibility of increasing their net property and labour income by an average of about 60 per cent—which this survey has indicated to be possible and practicable—and of earning 30 per cent annually on the extra capital necessarily borrowed, or 24 per cent capital income after allowing $10 per day for the 40 days additional labour required. They are at the same time, and without even deliberately planning to do so, adjusting their future production in a way that, if made more general, would eventually largely eliminate surpluses of have-to-sell products such as wheat, and better ensure the required supply of high-protein refrigerator foods such as beef—for which there is an ever-increasing demand and which, on a calorie basis, take up to five times more land to produce an equivalent human ration. One can only speculate what would happen during the next ten years if even 50 per cent of the more progressive Canadian farmers with inadequate units did the same thing—which they undoubtedly would if given the opportunity.

[Mr. Herridge.]

I have no hesitation in saying that we are very glad they are going to be given the opportunity of this legislation.

> The ultimate result would be fewer farms, but many more farms that could be classified as sound, economic, family sized units. Units in this class are able to make full and advantageous use of available labour and of the minimum equipment necessary to the production of a standard, readily marketable product on a production-line basis and at the lowest possible cost. There would seem to be little doubt that such units, given similar soil, climate and market conditions, could compete successfully over a long period with almost any corporate or integrated farm set-up.

That is very necessary for the success of the economic family farm.

> If, through the use of adequate credit, Canadian agriculture could voluntarily reorganize itself over a period of years into economically sized family units, a considerably lower production cost and a higher quality product would ensure a fair profit at a lower selling price which would give Canadian farmers a safer corner on the home market now being threatened by the United States and New Zealand and put them in a much better position to compete in markets abroad.
> To achieve this result through the medium of a controlled credit program would necessitate very careful credit administration in line with a consistent and long term policy, and much would depend on how well such a policy was accepted by farmers and farm organizations.
> If V.L.A. farmers are at all typical of Canadian farmers generally, and we think they are, it would appear from the response to this survey that the great majority would welcome a credit program designed to encourage the voluntary reorganization of Canadian farms into economic family sized production units which would be more in line with present day capital and income requirements, and that they would be only too ready to co-operate fully in any long term program designed to assist with such voluntary reorganization. There would seem to be much to be gained and nothing to lose from such a program. Sound economic family sized units probably represent the most secure long term investment available which carries with it capital increment possibilities. The opposite could be said, however, of sub-marginal and inadequate farm units, since production costs on such units very often leave little or nothing in the way of profit with which to repay a capital debt.

I put that on the record because I think it is a very sound, but brief, analysis of the situation.

As I say, we were very pleased to hear the minister's announcement. Why should we be doing this in view of the value of the economic family farm to Canadian society? It maintains many of the values in rural life which are very necessary if we are going to keep a healthy, democratic society in this country. We subsidize gold mines, we subsidize railways, we subsidize shipping companies, and we subsidize other industries. If we can subsidize this too I am sure that whatever slight subsidization results from maintaining the interest at 5 per cent will not only be supported by all members of this house but by farm organizations across Canada and the people of Canada generally. I have a number of constituents in my riding who welcome this legislation and who are in the very circumstances that this legislation is advanced to meet.

In conclusion, I have had my whole argument scuppered, and I wish the minister had let me know beforehand. I expected to spend about an hour on the deficiences of the bill, and it would have saved me some time. But we are pleased to hear this announcement and we accept it with pleasure. I might say we have a few suggestions to make and it is likely we will have an amendment; but our major criticism of the bill is met by the minister's announcement prior to the commencement of this debate.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, there was nothing for fishermen comparable with the Canadian farm loan board an dthe new legislation makes no provision for long term loans to fishermen. I regret that once again the government has ignored the fishermen.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I failed to take advantage of the resolution stage and second reading to make the few remarks I had in mind because, even if they concern specific matters, they also deal with several clauses of the bill which is before the house and the committee.

First of all, I would like to point out to the house that my remarks apply specifically to subparagraph (i) of section 2, as well as to sections 23 and 26.

Mr. Chairman, I see that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) has picked up his receiver—

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: I wonder if I might request the hon. member to save his remarks on this particular clause until we come to that clause, because I think that would make for a more orderly discussion than an attempt to deal with all the clauses at once?

Mr. Roberge: As my remarks relate to more than one clause of the bill I think it would be more appropriate for me to make them at this time than to wait until a specific clause is under review, because If I do that it may be too late for the minister to agree whether or not some of the things I have said are just.

(Translation):

I have noticed that section 23—as the minister realized, judging by his remarks—deals mainly with "supervised farm loans".

If we look up subparagraph (i) of section 2 of this bill we see, in the French version, that the word "hypothèque" includes "mortgages" and ventes à réméré. I am not too sure whether the word "mortgage" is French, but I assume that the translators made sure of the accuracy of that word. In the English version under subsection (1) of section 2, the word "mortgage" is defined as follows:

> "mortgage" includes hypothecs and ventes à réméré.

You will note, Mr. Chairman, that the phrase "ventes à réméré" is expressed in French words.

There are such things as "ventes à réméré" in the province of Quebec. I do not know if there are "ventes à réméré" in the other provinces which have adopted the English code of laws; in any case, I know that such sales occur in the province of Quebec. In my opinion, this bill, especially as regards part 3, might create complications. At least I am afraid so. I believe this bill will create complications for the farmers of the province of Quebec.

In fact, section 23 of the bill provides:

> —loans to farmers upon the security of first mortgages on farm lands and chattels and such additional security as the Corporation may require.

Under the civil code of the province of Quebec, farmers may pledge their live-stock as security for a period of 18 months only, and for that matter, I refer the minister to section 1979 (a) of the civil code of the province of Quebec, which reads as follows:

> Any farmer may pledge, as security for a loan which he contracts, for a term not exceeding eighteen months, all his livestock and farm produce, present and future while at the same time retaining them in his possession. The borrower shall have, towards the creditor, the obligations of a depository, without having any recourse against him for the cost of custody and conservation.

As we can see, that farm security which has been introduced in our civil code a few years ago provides for loans upon the security of livestock only and farm produce, but not on the security of farm implements or other things included in the definition of "chattels" that we find at subparagraph (c) of section 2. This will no doubt create some legal difficulties in contracts drawn up in the province of Quebec.

Proposed Long Term Credit to Farmers

As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, the "ventes à réméré" system exists in the province of Quebec, and again I refer the minister to section 1546 and the following sections of the Quebec civil code. In a "vente à réméré", the borrower, as a means of providing adequate security, sells his chattels to the lender. It doesn't matter what they are; they may be actual chattels or real property. Whichever they are, the maximum term allowed for a loan under the "ventes à réméré" system is ten years. During that ten-year period, the vendor "à réméré", who is in fact the borrower, may buy back the property he has given as security. That explains why the phrase "droit de réméré" is known in English as "option of repurchase", or "right of redemption". The vendor has a right to buy back what he has sold, but this right must be exercised within ten years.

In the case of real estate, if the borrower or vendor "à réméré" has repaid 75 per cent of the loan, he can require his lender, that is, the purchaser à réméré, to grant him a mortgage.

If chattels are involved, whether they be livestock or farm equipment, the right to repurchase is retained for a maximum of 10 years. In such a case, the borrower cannot ask for a mortgage, because in the province of Quebec, as the minister no doubt knows—or perhaps his Quebec colleagues in the cabinet have told him—there can be no mortgages on livestock or chattels.

The minister will therefore realize the problems that may be raised in Quebec by this bill, particularly in the drawing up of contracts.

Turning to section 26 of the bill, here is what I find at subparagraph (c):

> The portion of the loan based on the appraised value of the land shall be repayable within a period not exceeding thirty years and the remainder of the loan shall be repayable within a period not exceeding ten years;

I do not know whether this is what the minister had in mind when this subparagraph (c) was put in by the drafters of the bill. I do not know whether they had in mind those aspects of the vente à réméré which would enable borrowers, in the province of Quebec, to use chattels, livestock and farm implements as security for a ten-year period only, and to mortgage their real property, such as buildings, for a 30-year period. What I do know is that, under section 26 subparagraph (c), the amount to be repaid by the borrower in the first ten years will be much too high in my view.

[Mr. Roberge.]

Those are problems that occurred to me, Mr. Chairman, on examining this bill, particularly Part III.

There is a mortgage provision which applies to real property, including land and buildings, and that raises no problem; there is also provision for redemption sales for a ten-year period and also for an agricultural security for a period of 18 months. People who draw up contracts, that is, notaries, in the province of Quebec, will find things difficult, not knowing to what period those provisions apply, and what kind of security is to be given to the government.

I should be grateful if the minister would reply to my remarks, which I have made in good faith and which are merely intended to help improve this legislation.

(Text):

Mr. Argue: I am very happy at the announcement of the Minister of Agriculture. There has been some comment about the place to the effect that as the session draws to a close debate on resolutions is unnecessary and that by eliminating this stage we could shorten the session without interfering with the rights of hon. members to speak. The example we have had this afternoon demonstrates the great value to the Canadian public of having a resolution preceding a money bill and a resolution stage at which debate can take place. When the measure was before the committee of the whole my major criticism was that there was no ceiling as to the interest rate that could be charged. When I asked the minister whether he could assure me that at least in the initial operation of the new act the interest rate would not be above 5 per cent his answer was no, but since giving that reply the government, in the light of the debate that took place at the resolution stage, has reconsidered its position and has now announced that there will be a statutory rate of 5 per cent.

Mr. Rapp: Others, too, were interested in the problem.

Mr. Argue: I am sorry I did not hear that interjection because I should be happy to have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. Rapp: Other hon. members were also interested in the problem.

Mr. Argue: Hansard will show how many hon. members advocated this. I am not certain about it.

Mr. Parizeau: We work behind the scenes.

Mr. Argue: Is that right? Hon. members, I take it, sit up with the minister late at night after the house has risen and give him the benefit of their advice. We are pleased to hear that and hope that in the future on these important questions hon. members will tell us in this chamber what they are working on and report on the progress they are making.

The corporation set up under this measure will replace the Canadian farm loan board. Over the years I have bitterly complained about the narrow concept of the board in processing applications. I have been pleased to observe that in recent years some improvement was made in its administration and a larger number of loans have been made under the act. I have, however, a substantial file of letters from people whose applications for loans have been turned down by the board. I think that in substantial measure the criticism made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture before the banking and commerce committee in 1956 is still valid, that this board has taken a conservative attitude in the processing of applications.

I would like the minister to tell me when he replies if in actual practice the board has denied large areas of western Canada loans under this act? I also want to know if the new corporation will have a more efficient system of filing than the board apparently had. I have received letters from people in my constituency complaining that their applications for loans were turned down although they felt their financial position would encourage the board to grant them a loan. I have suspected that large areas of western Canada have been declared areas where the board will not grant loans. I asked the board how many applications for loans were received in each year since 1950 from persons whose post office addresses were Killdeer, Wood Mountain, Rockglen, Scout Lake, Lisieux, Canopus and Strathallen. The answer I received was as follows:

The Canadian farm loan board does not maintain records respecting applications and loans by municipalities as it does not require to do so for administrative purposes and the information requested is therefore not available.

This seems a rather devious way to answer the question. I then framed the question in these terms:

How many (a) loans; (b) applications for loans, have been made by and to the Canadian farm loan board in each year since 1950, in each of townships 1-4 inclusive in ranges 27-30 inclusive, west of the 2nd meridian, and in each of townships 1-4 inclusive in ranges 1-3 inclusive, west of the 3rd meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan?

The reply to that question was as follows:

The Canadian farm loan board does not maintain records respecting applications and loans by federal constituencies or parts thereof as it does not require to do so for administrative purposes and the information requested is therefore not available.

The question I now put to the minister is this. On what basis will the records of the new corporation be kept? How can an hon. member frame a question so as to determine the policy of the board in the past or the policy of the new corporation in the future in respect of denying loans to large areas of western Canada? I have asked for that information on the basis of the legal description of the land and on the basis of the post office description but to no avail. I am sure the minister will give me some assistance in phrasing a question so that an hon. member may determine what policy is being followed.

Mr. Green: Before we rise, Mr. Chairman, may I say the suggestion was made that it might facilitate the business of the house if at eight o'clock this evening we commenced with the second reading of the bill to amend the Public Lands Grants Act, and then took the two bills having to do with agreements between the government of Canada and the governments of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in respect of Indian reserves, followed by the approval of the convention on the nationality of married women. As soon as those were through we would go back to the farm credit bill.

One reason for that is that I have to take the amendments to the Public Lands Grants Act and I must leave for Vancouver tomorrow morning. I understand there is no opposition to these four bills and it would at least clear the order paper of this business.

Mr. Chevrier: That is perfectly satisfactory as far as we are concerned, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Argue: The house leader was good enough to come over to my desk and tell me about some of the suggestions that had been made to expedite the business of the house. I understood that he would like the bill in his name brought forward because he was leaving Ottawa, but I did not understand that these additional requests would be made. I do not know whether or not the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is leaving town. I would suggest that the house accede to the request of the house leader to suit his own convenience because he has to make this very necessary trip, but other than that, unless there are equally good reasons, the announced order of business of the house should be maintained.

Mr. Green: Whatever the house wishes. I understood that these other three measures were also agreed to and would only take a very few minutes but if there is to be a debate of any length on them we will have to call them in the order which was announced.

Mr. Argue: As I said, I am perfectly happy to agree to the request to take the bill in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs so that he can make this important trip. Other than that, unless there are equally good reasons, and apparently there are not, I think we should stick to the order of business that was outlined last Friday.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Argue: If the minister would reply to my question I would be quite happy to let clause 1 go at this point.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, as I wrote down the hon. member's question he asked whether the farm loan board has in practice removed large areas of western Canada from the lending facilities. I am informed that there are no such areas and never have been in western Canada where the farm loan board has refused to make loans. In any event, I can assure the hon. member and the committee that under this legislation each application will be dealt with strictly on its own merits and without any regard to what area is involved or anything else. There are, of course, as I think the hon. member realizes, areas not only in western Canada but in all parts of Canada where the security that can be attached to the land is so small that the amount of loan that can be made is also very small. In many cases it is not a proposition on which a loan should be made at all. Frequently you have an area where the soil is infertile and the amount of cultivated land on the farm is very small with the result that it is impossible to create an economic unit there. That is why you will note in two or three places in the bill that some emphasis is put on money being lent to create an economic unit. The only reason that any farm in any area would not be able to get a loan under this legislation is that it would be impossible to create an economic farm unit there.

Mr. Argue: In the area I am talking about it is correct that on the basis of wheat productivity it is not the best land in Saskatchewan. However, it is an area in which a substantial quantity of grain is produced and it is a very important and prosperous livestock area. Therefore, while it may be difficult to create an economic unit if it is related to the production of wheat, if you relate the economic unit to the production of beef and the production of grain it is an area in which economic units of substantial acreage would enable farm families to make good incomes comparable with those of people in other areas. I am not endeavouring to put the minister on the spot. I would be satisfied if he would check with the officials of the new corporation to see whether or not the kind of information I have requested can be obtained from the files of the Canadian farm loan board. Surely when one defines a large area it is possible for the board by some means to find out whether or not, within the operations of the board, money has been lent to farmers in that area. I think this is a very simple question. I have a strong feeling that if the board had wished to answer the question the information would have been produced.

Mr. Harkness: I will be glad to try to get that information for the hon. member. In connection with his other remarks I can only say that the idea of an economic farm unit is by no means limited to grain production. In fact, to a large extent the situation is just the reverse. One of the reasons why this supervised credit scheme is being introduced is so that expert advice will be available to a farmer to direct him into the type of activity or combination of farming activities which will give him a profitable enterprise.

PUBLIC LANDS GRANTS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING TRANSFERS TO CROWN IN ANY OTHER RIGHT

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-2, to amend the Public Lands Grants Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the purpose of this bill has given consent, so far as Her Majesty's property rights are affected, that the house may do therein as they think fit.

The object of this bill is to make a purely technical amendment to the Public Lands Grants Act. The amendment has to do with the transfer of the right of management of public lands from the federal government to a provincial government or some other government of Her Majesty. The transfer of the right of management or administration is technically different from the sale of the land. When lands are sold there is a change in title. However, all public lands are vested in the crown, which is one and indivisible. The transfer of lands between one government of the crown and another does not involve a change in title. Transfers between governments of Her Majesty merely pass from one government to another the right to control the disposition of lands.

I might point out that the transfer of a publicly owned lot of land from the government of Canada to, for example, the government of the United Kingdom, does not in any way affect sovereignty. The transferred to remain within the jurisdiction of Canada as much as if a private individual had sold it to the government of the United Kingdom.

I should perhaps further point out that this bill has nothing to do with the transfer of lands to any government outside of the Commonwealth. It deals only with transfers from the government of Canada to provincial governments or other governments of Her Majesty.

Now, because an ordinary sale to a private individual is technically different from the transfer of administration to another government of the crown, the method of transfer is different. In an ordinary sale letters patent are issued transferring the title to the purchaser, letters patent being the form of deed used in conveyances by the crown. But because there is no transfer of title when administration is passed to another government of the crown the courts have long held that letters patent or a deed should not be used. The proper method according to the courts is for the transferring government merely to pass an order in council transferring the right of administration and control. This is the method which has been used by the government of Canada for many years.

The present section 4 (a) of the Public Lands Grants Act authorizes the sale of lands, but does not authorize the government of Canada to transfer the administration of public lands to another government of the crown. Nevertheless, such transfers were made as it was not thought that statutory authority was necessary. However, in a recent case in the Supreme Court of Canada, referred to in the explanatory notes in the bill, some of the judges said that transfers to the provinces by order in council are not valid unless the governor in council has the express authority of parliament to make such a transfer. It is to remove any doubt as to the validity of such transfers that it is proposed by this bill to give the governor in council the authority to transfer lands to the crown in the right of a province or in some other right.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): There need not be much time spent, I take it, on this bill. The minister, I assume, has had the advice of the law officers of the crown, based on the case of the Attorney General of Canada versus Higbie, although up until this case was decided I take it from what the minister has said in explanation of the bill there has always been a judicial view that the proper way to transfer land from the crown in the right of Canada to the crown in respect of one of Her Majesty's dominions was by order in council and not by a grant provided for in a deed.

The case to which the explanatory note directs our attention has indicated a different view, and I assume it is because of this that the government has found it necessary to meet the technical objections involved in the transfer of land from Her Majesty in the right of Canada to Her Majesty in the right of some other jurisdiction, I take it that would include the provinces as well as any other jurisdiction under the crown outside of Canada and within the British commonwealth. The minister said in his explanation, however, that a transfer to Her Majesty was not to be regarded as an infringement of Canadian sovereignty. I assume that this bill does not change that situation. A grant under the old method, that is through order in council, certainly did not involve any challenge to Canadian sovereignty. The minister's observation was simply by way of a gratuitous, although valuable, explanation, and was not in any way directed to this particular bill. The minister nods, so I take it my observations are correct.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I think the information that has been given by the Minister of Public Works is valuable and that this is merely a case, according to the advice of the Department of Justice and according to the ruling of the supreme court, of giving to the governor in council a right to transfer to the crown at some other level this land, and to do so by means of an order in council. We are pleased, Mr. Speaker, to support the passage of this bill at this time because we think it is a measure which has been deemed, by the courts, to be necessary, and also to facilitate the departure of the minister on his very important assignment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister just answer this question? I do not know the case of the Attorney General of Canada versus Higbie and consequently I am not in a position to say whether or not it would apply to a temporary arrangement provided by the government of Canada with regard to the use for a particular purpose of a sovereign power outside of the commonwealth itself. I know this bill does not direct itself to that, but my hon. friend will remember that in the case of the birth of a child to the present Queen of the Netherlands there was some declaration that the hospital room was to be regarded, for the purpose of the birth, as foreign territory. Does the minister know under what authority that particular declaration was made?

Mr. Speaker: May I inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. McMillan: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Green: Perhaps I could answer the questions in committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes. Let us do that.

Mr. McMillan: I should just like to ask this question. How would the transfer of lands from a province to the federal government be effected?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In the same way. The question can be asked in committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clause 1—Transfer to the crown in any right other than Canada.

Mr. Green: In answer to the point raised by the hon. member for Essex East, Mr. Chairman, may I say that my understanding is that this bill merely makes it certain that the practice which has been followed in years gone by is legal. Evidently the case of the Attorney General of Canada versus Higbie referred to in the explanatory note casts some doubt on the validity of the course which had been followed prior to that time. I do not think that the declaration made in respect of the birth of a child to the present queen of the Netherlands would come under the Public Lands Grants Act, although it may do so. However, it would certainly not be under this particular section which is merely for the dealing with lands between two governments of the commonwealth, including dealings between the federal government and the provincial governments.

Then the point raised by the hon. member for Welland was as to how these transfers were carried out by a provincial government to the federal government. I believe that matter will be subject to provincial legislation. I am not in a position to say just what form the provinces used to use to authorize such a transfer. Probably it differs in the various provinces.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The case of the Attorney General of Canada versus Higbie would apply to the provinces as well.

Mr. Green: I think the case which the hon. member for Essex East has mentioned was referring to the Public Lands Grants Act of Canada. It may be that the legislation of the various provinces provides for such a transfer in some other way. I really am not in a position to answer that question.

Mr. Bourget: I do not think there is much to be said with regard to what the minister has just stated. I understand the purpose of this bill is simply to empower the governor in council to transfer by order in council rather than by deed the administration and control of public lands from Her Majesty in right of Canada to the crown in right of any province or otherwise. From what the minister has just said I understand it has been the practice in the past but there was some doubt—and I think that doubt was raised in the supreme court—whether the governor in council could do so without specific authority. I understand that the purpose of this amendment is just to resolve that doubt.

Mr. Green: That is the whole story.

Mr. Bourget: The minister says that is the whole story. If that is the purpose of the bill, we have no objection to its passing.

REPEAL OF THE CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT—PROVISION OF LONG TERM MORTGAGE CREDIT TO FARMERS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-67, to provide for the extension of long term mortgage credit to farmers—Mr. Harkness—Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned at ten past six, the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge) had asked some questions which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) had not yet answered.

On second reading of the bill, I myself asked the minister some questions as to the possibility, for farmers in the province of Quebec, to borrow as much as $27,500. I said then that Quebec farmers would not qualify under the act, if it were adopted in its present form, because our laws do not allow farmers to use livestock as collateral for more than 18 months. I also said that there is legislation governing "ventes à réméré" which prohibits the mortgaging of livestock for a period of more than 10 years.

Consequently, I am asking the minister to tell us if farmers in the province of Quebec will be able to borrow more than $20,000 and obtain supervised loans?

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I did not answer some of the questions which were posed on clause 1 because they really come more properly under some of the subsequent clauses. However, if it will expedite matters I perhaps should say a word on some of the points which have been raised.

The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, in speaking previously, expressed some doubt whether this legislation was applicable in eastern Canada as well as in western Canada. He also expressed some doubt whether I was aware of agricultural problems in the east as well as in the west. I can assure him that I certainly am aware of them. As a matter of fact, I have them brought to my attention very forcibly every day. I may also tell him that my first recollections actually were of life on a farm in eastern Canada. I have therefore had a certain amount of familiarity with farming conditions in eastern Canada from the time that I can first remember anything.

In connection with this question of whether a farmer in the province of Quebec would be able to borrow the maximum amount possible under this legislation, namely $27,500, may I say that it would be just as possible for a farmer in Quebec to secure the maximum amount as it would be for a farmer in any other province as long as he has sufficient security in land, livestock and chattels to justify a loan of that amount. There are in the eastern townships of Quebec a considerable number of farms with which I am familiar on which a loan of $27,500 would be well justified. A young man, say the son of a farmer or somebody else who wished to buy the farmer's place in that particular area, I think could qualify there for the $27,500 just as well as or in fact much better than in many other areas in Canada of which I know. I trust that is sufficient as far as that point is concerned.

I should like to compliment and thank the hon. member for Kootenay West for his tribute to the Veterans Land Act and the work it has done in this country. I myself never lose an opportunity of saying how great a contribution the Veterans Land Act has made, not only to the Canadian veteran but to Canadian agriculture generally, in the work it has enabled to be done in the past 15 years. The Veterans Land Act has set up an excellent organization and they have done an extremely good job as far as supervising farm credit is concerned, and it is on the basis of the great success the Veterans Land Act has had that we thought it was a practical and useful endeavour to set up a supervised farm credit plan such as the one we now have under consideration, which would be applicable to the younger farmers throughout Canada. I am quite sure that this present bill will work out just as successfully as the Veterans Land Act has done in establishing younger men on farms, and in aiding the setting up in this country of economic farm units.

The member for Megantic brought up the question of "rentes a réméré". Those are, as I understand it, a particular type of agreement for sale which exists in the province of Quebec. The precise reason why we have used those words in this act, both in the English and the French versions—there is no good English translation of that phrase, I understand—was to make it clear that the type of instrument used in the province of Quebec would be acceptable and could be used as far as this bill is concerned. I am not familiar with what I might call the legal ramifications of this, but certainly the legal people from Quebec were consulted by our justice department when this bill was drafted, and that is the reason why the term was included in what would be looked upon as a mortgage for the purposes of this act. As far as I know, I am advised that there will be no serious legal difficulties in applying the act in the province of Quebec.

I think that I dealt with the points brought up by the hon. member for Assiniboia before we adjourned.

Clause agreed to.

Proposed Long Term Credit to Farmers

On clause 2—Definitions.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, sub-paragraph (e) of section 2 of the bill defines the word "farmer" as follows:

"Farmer" means a person whose principal occupation is farming, and, for the purposes of Part II, includes a co-operative farm association and a family farming corporation as defined by regulation;

May I ask the minister what is meant here by a "co-operative farm association"?

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Yes, Mr. Chairman, there exist a number of co-operative farming organizations, particularly in western Canada, in which 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 or more farmers have combined together to do their farming as a co-operative and thus are able to buy bigger machinery and a greater variety of machinery than anyone could do individually. They form a co-operative under the co-operative laws of the province to carry on their farming operations. It was felt that an organization of that kind should have the advantages of this farm credit act.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, just a brief remark. Subclause (e) says that:

"farmer" means a person whose principal occupation is farming—

We all realize the purpose of this being included in the interpretation clause of the bill, but I would like to express the hope to the minister that his officials, when administering this act, will be a little more flexible in their interpretation than were the officials of the farm loan board in days gone by. There are a great many people, particularly in my part of Canada, especially new Canadians from the Netherlands, who are very anxious to obtain farms, and everyone in the family gets out and works to try to pay for the farm. It often happens that the father may have a job in a plant in town in order to try to earn enough money to help pay off the mortgage more quickly, and his wife and the other members of the family look after the farm. I know that in the past people who wished to become genuine farmers under the long term provisions of the act, and who are working temporarily in a plant only to try to raise money to buy sufficient stock and implements to make it a paying operation, have been discriminated against. I hope when this act comes into effect much more flexibility will be given, as I feel sure it will, to the interpretation of the words "whose principal occupation is farming", and that the needs of many people who have side jobs occasionnally on a full-time basis, as I say only in order to make payments on the farm and buy stock and equipment, will be given greater consideration than was given them by the former farm loan board.

Mr. Harkness: It is to look after situations of this kind which have now become reasonably common that clause 11 (2) was put into the bill, so that where a man has two occupations and it can be determined that the major occupation is farming, he would be eligible for a loan, which up to date he has not been.

Mr. Henderson: I am very interested in this bill. In my part of the country the average farmer is getting past his working age and he would like to sell the place to his son. Of course the son has not enough money to buy it, and this act is made to order for him. There is not a chance in the world of losing a cent because these people are all good farmers. These people are in the Peace river country, the finest grain producing part of Canada, and farmers from this district won the world championship for growing wheat five times. The exhibitor Herman Trelle was finally barred at Chicago. You can look his name up and you will find it. Also the champion grain grower last year was growing grain in that country. These young farmers want to start. I have had dozens of letters from them. The older farmers cannot retire because they have nothing to retire with. There is no country more sure than this country I am speaking about. They have a crop every year, not like Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Henderson: The young fellows feed cattle in the winter time and they really know their jobs. But grain growing and growing grass seed is essential, and if they can get this loan at 5 per cent—they do not want to pay 10 or 12 per cent—then they will make a success and you will not lose one dollar.

Mr. Harkness: I am sure the Peace river country is one of the areas where this bill will be particularly beneficial. It might be of interest to the hon. member and other hon. members of the committee to know that the three times wheat champion, Herman Trelle, did have a loan under the farm loan board.

Mr. Aiken: I would like to direct the attention of the minister to subclause (g) which defines farm land. I notice that the definition of farm land now includes buildings and other improvements thereon, which was not in the previous act. I am referring particularly to people like poultry raisers who have been unable to get a loan because they did not have enough land and most of the investment was in buildings. I would like to ask the minister if this new definition of farm land will be of assistance to that type of person.

Mr. Harkness: I think it will, but the appraisal of any particular piece of land for the purpose of this act will be made primarily on its production potential. If you have an acre of land with three or four chicken houses on it I do not think the production potential could be based on the chickens you would be able to produce in those circumstances. In other words, the land would have to be valued on the basis of an appraisal of what the chances would be in the next ten or more years in that particular branch of the industry.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in connection with the minister's reply about loans to farm co-operatives. I would have liked the minister to announce a system of loans for farm co-operatives, like the one reported by farmers through their associations. In fact, the Canadian Farmers' Association has requested on many occasions that loans be put at their disposal to promote their business and the marketing of farm produce, because our co-operatives are in urgent need of money to prepare, produce and market their products.

I would ask the Minister of Agriculture to kindly consider their request and introduce an amendment accordingly, in order to help farmers who are in need of money, and to offset integration from which we are suffering today.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: The farm co-operatives which are mentioned in subclause (f) are, as I indicated earlier, associations of a relatively small number of farmers in most cases who pool their operations and machinery. They are producing co-operatives. The type of farm co-operatives about which the hon. member is thinking are mostly marketing co-operatives, and we have legislation to look after them in the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act. This measure is not designed to assist people who market their production and I do not think we should confuse the purpose of this act, which is designed to enable people to get into the farm business or expand their present farm operations, with the objects of the legislation which I have just mentioned, because they are two different things.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I wonder whether the minister does not think there may be some clash between clause 2 subclause (e) and clause 21 in part II of the bill which says:

(2) The total amount outstanding of loans made under this part to any one person, alone or jointly with others or in respect of a single farming enterprise, shall not exceed $20,000.

How would this apply so far as co-operative groups are concerned?

Mr. Harkness: No, there is no conflict with regard to that matter at all. A co-operative group is entitled to $20,000 or $27,500 as the case may be, or two men in partnership might be entitled to it. However, the total amount for a particular farming operation would not exceed $20,000 under part II and $27,500 under part III.

Mr. McQuillan: I should like to ask the minister if this bill applies to tree farming.

Mr. Harkness: There is a special clause which we have put into the bill to deal with wood lots. It is clause 19(2) which reads:

For the purposes of this act the value of a farm for agricultural purposes may include the commercial value of any part thereof used for the production of forests products.

That is to look after, in particular, the value of wood lots. As I say it would include, of course, tree planting for commercial purposes.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 9—Advisory committee.

Mr. Argue: Clause 9 provides for an advisory committee. It reads as follows:

9. (1) The Minister shall appoint an Advisory Committee consisting of a Chairman and at least six but not more than nine other members, the majority of whom shall be farmers or representatives of farm organizations.

(2) The Advisory Committee appointed under subsection (1) shall advise the Corporation with respect to such matters arising under this Act as are referred to it by the Minister or the Corporation.

(3) The members of the Advisory Committee may be paid for their services such remuneration and expenses as are fixed by the Governor in Council.

We are pleased that there is to be an advisory committee and that the majority of the members will be farmers or representatives of farm organizations but we feel that the advice of this committee should not be available only when sought expressly at the direction of the minister or of the corporation but rather that the committee should, of its own right, be able to tender advice to the corporation and to the minister. What will happen, in effect, if the advisory commitee has not the right to tender advice on its own is that its advice will seldom be sought, that the committee will meet very seldom, if ever, and that in time its advice, if sought at all, will be requested with regard to some particular matter referred to it by the Minister of Agriculture. I think that is far too narrow a scope. I think it restricts unduly the function of such an advisory committee and will probably mean that the committee will be entirely useless. We have had experience with advisory committees set up under acts. We know that sometimes they are seldom called together and that their advice is sought not on important policy or controversial matters but with regard to details of questions which are not as important as questions involving major policy.

We had a discussion on this point in connection with the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act and finally there was a provision made, if I recall it correctly, that the advisory committee should meet twice a year. However, there is no provision in this bill for regular meetings of the advisory committee. Unless something is done to meet this point the committee will have its hands tied and be unable to do its job of giving advice to the minister and to the corporation on what it feels are important policy matters. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming:

That paragraph 2 of clause 9 be amended by deleting there from all of the words after the word "corporation" in line 19, and substituting therefore the following words: "and the minister on matters of policy within the term of this act."

Paragraph 2 would then read as follows:

The advisory committee appointed under subsection (1) shall advise the corporation and the minister on matters of policy within the terms of this act.

This would allow a competent and energetic advisory committee composed of farmers and representatives of farm organizations to give advice to the corporation and to the minister on matters of policy within the terms of the act. We have used the word "policy" to make it clear that we would not ask the advisory committee to pass on particular applications, but to look into the details of the operation of the board.

We have heard a great deal of strong criticism in this house of the Canadian farm loan board in recent years. I am certain that if there had been a strong and lively committee that had the right to tender advice to the board its administration would have been much better than it in fact has been.

We are hopeful that this new legislation will work in the long term interests of agricultural producers. We say again that we are pleased with the announcement that there shall be a fixed rate of interest. That will prevent an increase in the interest rate to more than 5 per cent as long as that provision is in the bill. If the minister cannot accept this amendment we would have no objection to his accepting the spirit of it and wording it somewhat differently.

The idea behind the amendment is that the advisory committee should feel free to advise the corporation and the minister on main policies coming within the scope of the legislation.

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member had had any experience with advisory committees of this kind he would know they are never loath to give advice on general policy measures or anything else that might come within the purview of the body to which they are an advisory committee.

The terms here are the same as in the Agricultural Stabilization Act. The advisory committee is set up under a very general type of terms. Certainly there is no idea in anybody's mind that the committee will be circumscribed in any way.

The hon. member is trying to establish a point that does not exist, that the wording here would circumscribe severely the advisory committee. That is just not the case. It is the same type of committee that we have under the Agricultural Stabilization Act. That advisory committee discusses matters of all kinds and tenders advice on matters of all kinds concerning stabilization policies. I presume this advisory committee would follow the same course.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to support the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia and let the minister know that we thought this amendment over and offer it in a most constructive and co-operative spirit as we have demonstrated throughout the discussion of the bill since the improvements were announced by the minister this afternoon. We take the words "as are referred to it by the minister or the corporation" as limiting the capacity of the advisory committee to advise the minister or the corporation. We fully understand in moving the amendment that the responsibility for decisions continues to rest with the minister and the corporation, even after advice is given on any matter and even if the amendment is carried.

This amendment is not moved with the idea of transgressing the responsibilities and powers of the minister and the corporation. It is moved with the idea of making it possible for the committee to at all times submit its views to the minister or the corporation on any matter with respect to policy in the administration of this legislation. Those would be matters of direct concern to farmers, borrowers and persons of that sort

We urge the minister to give further consideration to our amendment and representations knowing they are advanced, as I said before, in a most constructive and co-operative spirit.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, the last speaker and the leader of his very small group, as usual, have completely ignored the fact that in matters agricultural the minister and his new farm loans organization have the finest advisory body in Canada; they have members on this side of the chamber who are dedicated to the farmers of Canada. I should like to say to the two hon. gentlemen that as one having had some experience with the Canadian Farm Loan Board I know that one of the weaknesses of the board as operated to date has stemmed from the fact that there has been no advisory body of any kind. The interpretation and administration of the act, the classification, granting and refusal of applications and matters related thereto, have been determined very largely by one man. That individual is no longer with the Canadian Farm Loan Board.

It seems to me, may I say in all humility, that with the very valuable advice of many of us on this side of the chamber who are in a position to give the minister and his administrators our conscientious views on questions of this kind, and with the services of the advisory board that is now to be created, this legislation will be far superior to anything we have had in Canada with respect to farm loans and therefore should be endorsed.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, it would strike me that the purpose of this clause is to establish an advisory committee which, I take it, would from time to time advise the minister. It would also strike me that if the minister required advice from the advisory committee all he would need do would be to seek advice from time to time as is the case with respect to another matter that came before the house concerning the Unemployment Insurance Act. In that light it would strike me that this amendment is redundant to that effect at least. For that reason we propose to vote against it.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I did not reply to the hon. member's suggestion. He mentioned the unemployment insurance advisory board. If this advisory committee were to operate in the same way it would mean the minister would not take any advice.

Mr. Peters: In reply to the hon. member who has spoken for the Conservative party I would like to point out that a great deal has been said recently about the matter of the advice that legislators are giving to the cabinet. It is about time we found out how fast these backbenchers can talk. There are 208 Conservative members and during the course of one caucus meeting—

An hon. Member: Listen to the C.C.F. brainchild.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am just pointing out that each member has 26 seconds a week to tell the frontbenchers what they should do—

The Chairman: Order. At the present time we are talking about the members of the advisory committee.

Mr. Argue: We have just had a volunteer from Medicine Hat.

Mr. Peters: I am just talking about the 208 who are going to act as the advisory committee to the minister.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Peter: I pointed out that each has only 26 seconds a week to talk on this matter.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Another farm expert.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, we move this amendment because we are aware that the advisory committees have not been satisfactory in the way they have been constituted either in the case of the unemployment insurance commission or with respect to the agricultural stabilization legislation. In neither case have the members of these committees been able to give the advice that they were fully capable of giving. I am sure that the members of this advisory committee will be capable of giving advice on a variety of subjects. Their advice may not suit the minister but it may be of vital importance to the farm organizations and the farmers who are going to take advantage of these loans.

I can see no objection if the minister wishes the type of advice that the people to be appointed to this advisory board are in a position to give. If he says he is willing to accept this type of advice in the case of the agricultural stabilization board, then I see no reason why this amendment cannot be adopted and why it is not supported by the minister unless he has it in mind that only those matters he wishes will be referred to the committee. I would urge the committee to accept the amendment either in its present form or in a form that the minister himself may see fit to introduce.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the clause as it now stands makes a farce of the advisory committee. It makes the advisory committee not only a creation of the government and of the minister but it leaves any future meetings of the advisory committee entirely at the discretion of the board and the minister and that is also true as to the subjects it may consider for the purpose of tendering advice to the government. I am surprised that the Minister of Agriculture has taken the position of emasculating the advisory committee even before it has been set up.

I always listen to the remarks of the hon. member for Medicine Hat with great interest. I can remember occasions when he has said things in the house with which I have agreed very emphatically. But I do not think he was on very sound ground tonight. What he has said is that we do not really need an advisory committee representing farmers and farm organizations.

Mr. Brunsden: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is he putting words in my mouth? I did not say that. I merely said that with respect to policy the minister had the opportunity to draw on the experience of a lot of members who represent farming constituencies. I did not oppose the advisory committee.

Mr. Argue: I quite understand that. The hon. member did not oppose the type of advisory committee that would be provided for by this clause. The member has emphasized exactly what I thought he was saying, namely that when policy matters are concerned it is not an occasion for advice from an advisory committee consisting of farmers and representatives of farm organizations but rather it is an occasion for advice from the private members of parliament who support the government.

An hon. Member: The elected representatives from certain ridings.

Mr. Argue: My hon. friend has talked about the advice that has been given with regard to the farm loan board for which this new corporation is to be substituted. He has said that one important person who used to have a good deal to do with the farm loan board is now gone because of the advice that has been given. This is a classic example, Mr. Chairman, of one set of politicians in power trying to get rid of another set of politicians. The hon. member has said that the advice that they have given to the minister and the government has brought about the dropping of the head of the Canadian farm loan board. I say to my hon. friend that he has strengthened the very reason why we have moved this amendment, namely to try to get an advisory committee of farmers and representatives of farm organizations who are in an independent position to advise the government on matters of policy. We do not want these matters to remain the exclusive property apparently of the backbench Conservative members. Rather, we want to see established a strong, independent advisory committee that is not the child of the Minister of Agriculture and does not depend for its existence on the minister asking for its advice and then being remunerated in accordance with the terms of subclause 3.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat has said that when it comes to policy matters the government has a very strong group to advise it.

An hon. Member: Haven't we?

Mr. Argue: That is very true. Almost every member in their vast majority is there to advise the government, but I am wondering what the advice has been with regard to other matters. If their advice as to policy is being followed now, it is a wonder that these gentlemen are not advising the government to make deficiency payments.

Mr. Churchill: You are out of order.

The Chairman: Order. I listened with great care to the arguments of the hon. member for Medicine Hat. I must say that until I had heard what he had to say I could hardly call him out of order, which he actually was. I therefore have given a similar chance to the hon. member for Timiskaming and the hon. member for Assiniboia to be out of order for a while. I believe that at present we are discussing a rather simple matter concerning an advisory board to the minister to advise on questions of farming. We are straying somewhat into a general political discussion and I believe all hon. members will agree with me that this is neither the time nor the place to stray into such a discussion. I must therefore declare the present debate on this particular question of politics out of order. Hon. members have heard the amendment. Those who are in favour—

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I have the floor. Even the chairman cannot take that away from me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: I have the floor.

Mr. Grafftey: Louder.

Mr. Argue: I am wondering for how long it has been out of order in this house to have a political discussion. As a matter of fact, I think that is the pith and substance of discussion in the Canadian House of Commons. This measure has been brought in by the government and in that sense is a political measure. It is a measure that we have supported and we will continue to support it. I am endeavouring to say why there should be a strengthening of the advisory committee under clause 9 of the bill. I have said that the committee should be strengthened in order to remove advice on policy matters given to the corporation as far from political considerations as may be possible.

Mr. Grafftey: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is the hon. member suggesting that the elected representatives of the people are not in a position to advise, or at least give their suggestions, because that is exactly what he has said?

Mr. Argue: Oh, no, not at all.

Mr. Grafftey: You say that, and you should know that is right.

Mr. Argue: I am very pleased indeed with these interruptions and these questions.

Mr. Grafftey: Answer my question.

Mr. Argue: Yes, I am in favour of it. Is that good enough? The hon. gentleman asked if I was in favour of members of parliament being able to give advice and the answer is definitely yes. That is what we are here for, and we are doing it all the time. However, I do not believe the hon. member for Medicine Hat should endeavour to say that because members of parliament on the government side of the house are giving advice to the board on policy matters, that therefore you do not need a strong advisory committee as we are requesting by this amendment.

We have other advisory committees, Mr. Chairman, giving advice on some occasions to the government and to other boards. I would be very much interested to have the opinion of the hon. member for Essex East on this very important amendment that has been presented here tonight because not only do I realize that the member for Essex East is studying farm questions very diligently and is making continued and substantial progress, but I am well aware, as I know government members are painfully aware, of the tremendous interest the hon. gentleman has taken in another advisory board, namely the board advising the unemployment insurance commission.

Before you rule me out of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Churchill: A constant breaking of the rules.

Mr. Argue: I am listening to the Minister of Trade and Commerce who has been interrupting, in spite of the rules, as he always does.

Mr. Churchill: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Argue: Let us have a legal interruption.

Mr. Churchill: Will you rule the hon. member for Assiniboia out of order for discussing a matter that had been raised earlier and which you indicated was out of order? He is now continuing his flagrant flouting of the rules, which is outrageous conduct.

Mr. Argue: We would make a lot more progress—

An hon. Member: If you sat down.

The Chairman: I must remind the members of the committee that we are discussing at present the question of the appointment of an advisory committee under subclause 1 which says:

> —shall advise the corporation with respect to such matters arising under this act as are referred to it by the minister or the corporation.

Then, the hon. member for Assiniboia introduced his amendment. What is actually out of order is to change things around and suggest that the advisory board should be composed of hon. members of this house. It was out of order to suggest such a thing. It is quite out of order for the hon. member for Assiniboia to carry on in this fashion. It is also out of order, in this particular matter, to ask the hon. member for Essex East to become an expert on agricultural matters.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have no right to rise on a point of order, as you know, but I am sure Your Honour would recognize that has now become an accomplished fact.

Mr. Argue: I have been referring to the hon. member for Essex East, and since the hon. member for Essex East is not at all backward, before I had announced that he had graduated from the school of agriculture he has announced that he is already an expert. I know, therefore, he would be most interested in my reference to his strong stand on the need for advisory committees and the need to have advisory committees advise the government and boards that carry on under important acts, independently and beyond the control and influence of the government.

I was dissappointed with the statement made by the hon. member for Laurier. Sometimes we in this group advance an idea that commends itself to the government and the government, after considering it, will accept it. One of the things that makes it most difficult is when we in the C.C.F. advance an idea for the consideration of the government to be opposed by the Liberal party. I have spoken to farm leaders in recent weeks and they are not satisfied with the method of operation of the advisory committee to the agricultural prices stabilization board. I say, and I think I can do so without fear of successful contradiction, that farm leaders across Canada would welcome the amendment that has been proposed. they would welcome the right to appoint representatives to the advisory committee who, in turn, would have the right without qualification to advise the government on policy matters. But the hon. member for Laurier says that is not acceptable; he does not want to give an advisory committee that much power.

Mr. Chevrier: He said no such thing.

Mr. Argue: Therefore, if the government should decide to oppose this amendment, and the minister should continue to oppose the amendment, if members of the Liberal party join with the government in opposing this amendment, then they will have to answer to farm organizations and farm leaders in this country, who not only support advisory boards but support boards advisory to the government and to the minister that have the authority in their own right to tender advice without waiting for something to be submitted to them by the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the amendment which is before the committee seems to me to be a very simple one, and one which could be very easily defined. The hon. member for Assiniboia, unfortunately, instead of dealing with the amendment has dealt with a number of other things, and Your Honour has allowed him to do so.

The point which I am trying to make now, and which I tried to make earlier as briefly as I could in order to hasten the passage of what appears to us on this side of the house to be a measure which is commendable in itself, was this: What the amendment seeks to do is to ask the advisory committee to advise the minister as well as the board; so that under the circumstances there could be no doubt, in our mind at least nor is there any question, of the personnel of the advisory committee. This does not come up in the amendment, nor is it here for consideration.

If one looks at the definitions in clause 2 one has not got to be a Philadelphia lawyer in order to understand that the amendment now before the house is redundant in that the definition of the minister is given as that of the Minister of Agriculture. It strikes me, and I hope it will strike those who sit with us on this side of the house, that if the Minister of Agriculture is the responsible one for the appointment of the advisory board, then that advisory board will report to him. The minister will then be in a position to either accept or reject or ask for advice. On the amendment as it stands now, it is not a question of whether or not the personnel of the advisory committee should be considered, but as it reads it is simply this: That the advisory committee appointed under subsection one shall advise the corporation and the minister on matters of policy within the terms of the act.

My submission is that the clause as now formed contains what is in the amendment and for that reason the amendment is redundant.

Mr. Harkness: I have been trying to intrude myself into this argument for some time in what for me perhaps may be a somewhat unusual role, namely that of pourer of oil on troubled waters. If the hon. member will look at his amendment and at the clause that is written in the bill, I think he must come to the conclusion that his amendment is redundant. What else can the board advise the minister on? What else would they be asked to advise on except policy matters? They are certainly not going to advise whether Jones gets a loan of $20,000 or $15,000, individual cases as I think the hon. member for Kootenay West stated. In other words, the purpose of the advisory committee is to give advice on policy matters. That is why they are there. That is really the only type of advice that they can give. They cannot give advice with regard to individual cases. Therefore to write in or to try to write in, as the hon. member has done "shall advise the corporation and the minister on matters of policy within the terms of the act" is a procedure which, as the hon. member for Laurier has said, makes the language completely redundant and does nothing. In other words, I submit that all this argument has been really over practically nothing. Instead of wasting our time on something that is not material, I think we should get on with the other clauses of the bill.

Mr. Howard: We listened very carefully both to the comments from the hon. member for Laurier and those of the minister just recently on the question of redundancy or whether the idea behind the amendment is already contained in the clause. I would suggest to the minister that if he is following the advice given to him by the hon. member for Laurier he is taking rather poor advice and that he would do better to consult the officials in front of him.

An hon. Member: What about those behind him?

Mr. Howard: Yes, and those behind him. I wish the minister would take that advice when it comes to important matters like deficiency payments. Whether or not they have advised him, I do not know.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Howard: If I may, I should like to point out again the purpose of the amendment, and it is quite clear without any reference to Philadelphia lawyers or lawyers from any other part of the country. It is quite clear that the design behind this amendment is to give the advisory committee the right to study things and make reports and recommendations to the minister on its own initiative without having to wait for the minister if and when he so decides, after he gets political advice from his 206 friends; without having to decide whether he should refer that to the advisory council or without having to wait for the corporation to decide whether or not to refer something to the committee. This would give to the advisory committee the right to study things itself, to take matters under consideration, to look at them as they arrive from day to day, without waiting for the minister or the corporation to make up their minds, without waiting for these self-appointed advisers that are in the house at the moment to decide what they might suggest to the minister he should refer to the committee.

Mr. Grafftey: Explain that term "self-appointed advisers".

Mr. Howard: The minister was just looking for some sort of lame excuse to oppose the amendment merely because it comes from this section of the house and he grasps the straw offered to him by the hon. member for Laurier who likewise does not know what he is talking about. The hon. member for Laurier must still think he is sitting on the other side of the house on the government benches. He should learn for at least a while that he is sitting on this side of the house where sense prevails and where we do not tackle things with all the intensity of inexperience but look at them as they should be looked at, namely in the light of the words that are used.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Howard: I am sure that the minister in reflecting upon the comments he has just made in giving the committee the Liberal policy such as it is on this particular phase of the agricultural question will make the frank admission that he was in error in talking about redundancy. I ask him to be honest and say that he was incorrect and that he will accept the amendment and will disregard what my friend the hon. member for Laurier tells him.

Amendment (Mr. Argue) negatived: yeas, 6; nays, 99.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10 agreed to.

On clause 11—Objects, purposes and powers.

Mr. Peters: It is not clear to me how close we are going to get the Veterans Land Act directors involved in this matter and the extent of supervision. We have heard the favourable words that have already been said by hon. members on the other side of the house with regard to the need of some supervision and the wonderful job the Veterans Land Act administration has done. I should like to ask the minister how closely they want to co-operate or intend to co-operate with the officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs and in particular the administration of the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. Harkness: The closest possible co-operation is in mind. We expect that all of the supervision will be carried on and most of the appraisal work or at least a good deal of it, will be carried on by the Veterans Land Act administration. As I have said, all of the supervision will be carried on by the Veterans Land Act administration. For this purpose the director of the Veterans Land Act will use exactly the same personnel, the same organization and so forth but he will report to me as Minister of Agriculture for the work he does under this act rather than to the Minister of Veterans Affairs to whom he will continue to report for the work he does under the Veterans Land Act with regard to soldier settlers, veteran settlers and so on.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to say that I am very pleased to hear that the practical administration of the act will be through the director of the Veterans Land Act administration and his officials. On that basis I am quite sure that we can be assured that success will be the result of the administration of this act.

Mr. Peters: I should also like to express my thanks and the appreciation, I am sure, of all those who are going to be getting loans because of the decision that the minister has taken. In speaking on the resolution the other day I asked that some consideration be given to this matter of insurance. Clause (f) states as follows:

> (f) take such steps and do all such things as to it appear necessary or desirable to protect the interest of the corporation;

That sounds very much like some of the writing which came out of the trans-Canada pipe line easement clauses where there is all kinds of protection for the corporation but none for the farmer. This is a case where the minister could turn to some of the backbenchers and ask their advice, because if it is not important to them, it should be.

As I mentioned, Household Finance will take out insurance on the life of a mortgagor. This has obviously been advantageous because now banks have followed suit as well as other financial organizations. I cannot see any justification for protecting the government and this corporation, but taking no steps to protect the farmer, particularly his family where the breadwinner dies leaving his family with the mortgage and the widow is not able to carry on or even to sell the farm. This type of insurance would at least ensure that the widow and children left behind as a result of a disaster of this nature would have a mortgage-free farm. This is a matter which I am sure every mortgagor would welcome. He would pay the small premium necessary for insurance of this nature, which is not expensive. I can see no justification for this government, a government represented by so many who say they have the interests of the farmer borrowing under this bill in mind, neglecting to have insurance attached to the mortgage. I suggest another clause should be written in the bill in conjunction with this one which protects the interests of the corporation in order to protect as well the interests of the families which are dependent on the breadwinner and who will be obtaining this mortgage.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the hon. member did not bother to read the bill. If he had he might have saved himself and the committee the last five minutes of time, because if he will look at clause 26 it is provided that there shall be insurance on the life of the borrower to cover the loan, and in the event that the borrower dies his widow and family will have the land and chattels free of debt. That is one of the provisions in this bill.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 12 to 15 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 16—General provisions respecting loans.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, on clause 16, as I indicated when we commenced our study of this bill, I should like to ask my colleague the Minister of Transport to move an amendment to subclause (c) governing the rate of interest. As I indicated at the start in committee, we have decided to place an equalized interest rate, I might call it, of 5 per cent instead of the proposal, as it was to begin with, of an interest rate which would be the cost of money in any particular year to the corporation, which would have meant, of course, high interest rates at certain times and low interest rates at others. As I said, it was felt that this would be an inequality, and to some extent an inequity, as far as farmers who borrowed at the high rate were concerned, and that it would be better to put them all at the same level.

There is one other thing in connection with it. At the present time it may seem to be somewhat embarrassing to certain provinces which have farm credit schemes of their own. For example the province of Saskatchewan has a farm credit scheme in which the interest rate is 6½ per cent.

Mr. Argue: That is incorrect.

Mr. Harkness: One of the reasons why, as I stated on second reading, we had this interest rate in the form it was was to avoid making it difficult or embarrassing in any way to any of the provincial credit schemes. However, as I say, the general opinion of most of the supporters of the government was that it would be better to have an equalized interest rate rather than the basis which was originally proposed. The hon. member for Assiniboia said that this is not correct and that the Saskatchewan C.C.F. government scheme does not bear interest at 6½ per cent. However, that is the case.

Mr. Argue: That is not what I mean. I will explain to the minister in a moment.

Mr. Harkness: I have an excerpt from his favourite paper here, The Western Producer for June 25, which states very definitely that the interest rate has been set initially at 6½ per cent. However, as I say, for the reasons I have given we have decided now upon this equalized interest rate, and I will ask my colleague, the Minister of Transport to move the amendment providing for that.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That paragraph (c) of clause 16 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(c) the interest rate on loans shall be 5 per cent per annum;"

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I want to assure the Minister of Agriculture that not only is the amendment which has been moved by his colleague, the Minister of Transport, not something which will embarrass the C.C.F. or the Saskatchewan government, but it is something we have advocated many, many times in this house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: Before the Minister of Agriculture and his supporters get too joyful, they should remember that what this does is not to lower the interest rate. What this does is to make certain that the interest rate does not go any higher, and that is very important. I was reading the other day the evidence given by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture on agricultural credit and a system of agricultural credit, and one of their strong recommendations was that the whole question of agricultural credit should be removed from the Department of Finance and placed under the Minister of Agriculture. Although the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in 1956 could not know the interest situation in Canada today, they must take great satisfaction in having advocated the transfer of farm loan legislation from the Department of Finance to the Minister of Agriculture. This is the first hopeful suggestion we have had that perhaps, if the Minister of Finance himself will not put a brake on the ever-increasing interest rates that result from his policy, other ministers, in this case the Minister of Agriculture—

Mr. Harkness: Order.

Mr. Argue: —will put a very welcome, but a very necessary brake on interest rates. I think that in the light of the continuing high interest rates this amendment presented by the Minister of Agriculture is a very acceptable and a very commendable one.

The Saskatchewan government legislation has been referred to, and I will sit down if the minister thinks anything I say now is misinterpreting the information which he has. As I understand it, the Saskatchewan government itself is not in the field of farm loans at all. It has not intended and does not intend to get into that field. Rather, having waited for a long time for action at the federal level, they have decided that they would provide certain guarantees to the very large co-operative credit societies we have in Saskatchewan so that the co-operatives could provide the machinery for the making of loans to farmers in Saskatchewan. The Saskatchewan government will be making no loans to farmers in Saskatchewan. The agency which will be making loans is the Co-operative Trust Company, and its debentures and credit are guaranteed by the Saskatchewan treasury. To that extent, of course, the Saskatchewan government is promoting the field of farm credit.

Mr. Harkness: They are in exactly the same position as we are with this proposed farm credit corporation that the present bill sets up.

Mr. Argue: I do not think so. The corporation the minister is establishing here is a government corporation. This is a socialist enterprise which our federal Minister of Agriculture is piloting through this house. This corporation, owned by the federal government, owned by the people of Canada, will be in the position of making loans to farmers at 5 per cent, and in the context of the high interest rates being charged today by the private lending institutions for agricultural credit, if the new loan corporation follows a policy which is liberal with a small "l" it will be doing the bulk of the farm loan business in Canada and will be driving out the private mortgage interests as we know them. Farmers are sufficiently good businessmen to try to get their mortgages at the least possible rate of interest, and to my knowledge there is not a single mortgage company in business which is making loans at 5 per cent; the majority are making loans at 6 per cent, 6½ per cent, 7 per cent and perhaps even higher.

Mr. Hanbidge: Is there any company making farm loans in Saskatchewan outside the Canadian Farm Loan Board?

Mr. Argue: Yes. I can think of a couple of loan companies in Saskatchewan which in very recent times have provided loans to farmers in that province. Since the hon. member for Kindersley has asked that question, may I say that I do not think the mortgage companies have been doing any large business; I do not believe the farmers of Saskatchewan are too anxious to become involved, because of their experience with private mortgage companies in the past, and therefore it has been necessary for the federal government to provide for a crown corporation which would lend money to farmers at a rate of interest fixed at 5 per cent. This means that this corporation, if it looks at the applications in a reasonable manner, will do a very large business and supersede to a large extent private mortgage companies in this country as far as agriculture is concerned.

On clause 18—Agreements to supervise farming operations.

Mr. Harkness: On clause 18 there seems, from some of the articles I have read in the newspapers and from some of the letters I have received, to be a certain amount of confusion in regard to the supervision of loans. I should like to point out that this clause makes it possible for supervision to be provided in connection with any loan made under the act.

Proposed Long Term Credit to Farmers

A number of people apparently think that supervision can only be given when a loan is made under part III, that is, the type of loan for which the maximum is $27,500 made to a farmer between the ages of 21 and 45. However, that is not the case. Clause 18 makes it possible to supervise a loan secured by a farmer under part II. I should make that clear to the committee. I do this particularly because only today on my return from the west I received a letter from Mr. Walls, the manager of the British Columbia federation of agriculture who was under that impression. His letter states:

I wish to congratulate you and your government on the presentation of Bill C-67, the new Farm Credit Act. This may well be one of the most important and far-reaching pieces of legislation promulgated for the benefit of Canadian farmers.

The legislation includes practically everything which the Canadian Federation of Agriculture proposed with one principal exception—and it is on this exception that I would solicit your giving consideraton to amendng this bill before it obtains third reading.

I refer to the granting of supervised credit only to farmers up to the age of 45—

As I say, this seems to be a general misapprehension, that supervision was only for people who took loans under part III. That is not the case, and I want to take this opportunity of making it clear that any farmer who secures a loan can obtain supervision.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 19 agreed to.

On clause 20—Loans to farmers.

(Translation):

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, this clause of the bill reads as follows:

The corporation may make a loan to a farmer on the security of a first mortgage on farm lands and such additional security as the Corporation may require.

Now it appears that in some cases, a farmer who borrows from the new corporation will have to give all his real property and chattels as security for the loan, and with all his assets thus tied up as security for the corporation, he will be unable to secure an additional loan. It follows that under certain circumstances, where a farmer needs a further loan, for instance if he sustains damage through an act of God such as a flood, etc., he will be unable to do so.

If I remember correctly, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, in its brief to the government, had suggested a practical credit system for the granting of government loans in certain special cases. I believe it would be important to consider, as a complement to this act, a policy of providing credit to farmers faced with emergency situations resulting from damage caused by an act of God.

I therefore wish to move the following amendment:

(Text):

That section 20 be amended by adding the following: "Provided that, notwithstanding any provisions contained in this act or in any other act, the corporation may, in special cases, make loans on first or second mortgage to farmers, when a group is affected, in a specified devastated district, wherein their real or personal property has been damaged as a result of natural causes or acts of God, such as inundations, tornadoes and hailstorms. Such loans may be granted after investigation by an authorized official of the corporation who, after assessing the damage, shall establish the amount of the loan, the period of reimbursement of such loan which shall extend over a period of three to ten years, due consideration being given to the amount of the loan and the rate of interest, which shall cover administration costs only."

(Translation):

If I remember correctly, this is along the lines of the recommendation made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in its brief to the government.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: I think that what the hon. member is doing here is attempting to introduce some very modified form of crop insurance into a farm loan act. We have already passed a crop insurance act in the past week and I do not think we should attempt to write a crop insurance feature into a farm loan act. The chief purpose of this bill as I have indicated on several previous occasions is to enable farmers to farm economic farm units, not to protect them against hail storms and things of that nature. That is the proper function of insurance. I do not think we should try to mix up insurance with a long term farm credit measure.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, by the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), I can see that he has not read the recommendations of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. In fact, in its brief, under the heading "Farm Credit", that organization recommended the establishment of a special credit in case of emergency or disaster. Here is what it said:

(Text):

A system of emergency or disaster credit, wherein, on the recommendation of local and provincial authorities, funds could be made available at no interest to persons struck by natural disaster of the kind which, occurring on a large scale, often results in massive public and government relief, but on a small scale often finds no sympathetic public response.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, on many occasions and more particularly, last year, at the time of the proposed amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, I mentioned that, in the eastern part of the country, and in the province of Quebec, we could not qualify under the act. I also gave instances proving that those who incur damages, on account of flood or hail in that part of the country, could not get any government assistance, while in other areas of Canada farmers were covered by special legislation.

It is as a result of the recommendations of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture that my colleague, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Racine) introduced his amendment which we fully endorse.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, the minister mentioned in his remarks, that this amendment mainly deals with crop insurance.

I know quite well that in some parts of the country, for instance in Beauce county, no insurance company will insure farmers against flood risks. That is the reason for the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Beauce.

I also know that the area I represent was flooded recently by a river that does not too often go on a rampage. A good many farmers in the parish of Ste. Sophie de Megantic suffered losses in a recent flood; it is quite likely that they did not have the required insurance coverage, and it is also likely that they will not be eligible for insurance under this act.

I therefore feel, Mr. Chairman, if the minister is unwilling to accept the amendment suggested by my colleague from Beauce he should at least consider the matter.

(Text):

The Chairman: I know that the hon. member for Assiniboia wishes to comment on this amendment and before ruling on the matter I am prepared to listen to his comments.

Mr. Argue: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I just wish to express general support for the principle behind the amendment. As the minister has indicated, this legislation goes a long way toward meeting the recommendations farm organizations have made. However, I am sure he is aware of the policy statement on farm credit of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture dated January 1956. In that statement they set forth the very type of amendment that has been presented to this committee.

If it were passed the amendment would give the board general power to make loans in situations where disaster had struck on a local basis. I would point out to the committee that even the passage of this amendment would not assure farmers who experienced such disasters that loans would be made. All that would take place if the amendment were passed would be that authority would rest with the board to consider applications.

I do not know if the minister would care to comment on the question I am about to put. Without this amendment and in the face of a disaster, could the farm loan board not provide mortgage money? I would think that if a farmer were in good financial shape otherwise, and a flood came along and destroyed all his dairy cattle, even without the amendment his application would be given consideration. All I am saying is that an amendment of this kind would not necessarily provide the mortgages that are sought nor would the refusal of the government to accept the amendment prevent money being provided to a farmer in the event a disaster took place.

Mr. Harkness: I believe what the hon. member for Assiniboia has said is correct. A farmer who has sufficient equity in land, livestock and chattels could secure a loan following a flood in order to re-equip himself just as anyone else could secure one. If he did not have an equity—in other words if the flood destroyed all his equity, livestock, chattels and so on—he would not be able to secure a loan under the other provisions of the legislation in any event because it is provided there that you cannot make a loan for more than 75 per cent of the appraised value of the land and chattels.

I do not believe this amendment would really accomplish anything and it would have a bad effect in giving unjustified hope to many people that they could secure a loan when in effect they could not obtain one.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, if you are going to rule on the validity of this, I should like to speak to it.

The Chairman: I will then give the floor to the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for recognizing a junior member of the committee in preference to a veteran member like the hon. member for Laurier. We are supporting this amendment because we believe in the principle of disaster insurance. If the amendment is voted down I would suggest to the government that there is a place for national disaster insurance in this country in co-operation with the provinces which would cover not only agricultural disasters but the disasters suffered by other sections of the community.

We have had disaster funds and generally speaking the experience has not been too satisfactory. If the minister sees fit to reject this amendment we urge the government to give consideration to the necessity for a national disaster fund or act that could be drafted, operated and administrated in co-operation with the provinces to meet disasters affecting not only agriculturists but other segments of the community.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, my purpose in rising is not to deal with the merits of the amendment because I think they were dealt with amply by the two hon. members who have spoken. I have risen because when Your Honour rose earlier I took it for granted that you were going to deal with whether or not the amendment was in order. If I am wrong about that, perhaps Your Honour might so indicate and I will resume my seat. But if I am not wrong then I should like to deal with the amendment from the point of view of whether or not it is in order.

The point I wish to make is that the amendment does not provide for an extra charge on the crown because clause 20 reads as follows:

> The corporation may make a loan to a farmer on the security of a first mortgage on farm lands and such additional security as the corporation may require.

What the amendment seeks to do is to spell out in another form and in another manner what is already in clause 20 of the bill, and for that reason I am not going to deal with the merits and the necessity of the content of the amendment. What I am maintaining now is that the amendment does not provide for an extra charge upon the crown. All it does is to change the distribution of the sums of money and the loans which can be made to a farmer. It only specifies and defines at greater length what I think is the subject matter of the clause. For that reason, sir, I would hope that you would find it in order.

(Translation):

Mr. Racine: In his remarks on the amendment, the minister referred, among other things, to crop insurance. The major point, in that amendment, is the matter of the second mortgage. Besides, if the house and outbuildings of a farmer were damaged, I cannot see how crop insurance would do the farmer any good.

On the other hand, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) said that a farmer has only to make a request. If the farmer has suffered damage from hail, tornadoes, etc., and if he has already obtained a farm loan under this legislation, and if his repayment terms are not reduced by a certain amount, the corporation probably will not be able to lend him money, on the grounds that he would already have obtained the 75 per cent provided for in the act.

I believe that, under the circumstances, the most important thing in that amendment is the question of a second mortgage that could be made available to the farmer.

(Text):

The Chairman: It seems to me that the amendment goes beyond the scope of the explanatory note of the present bill. Furthermore I do not believe that the amendment means too much, because, as the minister rightly explained, it is not simply because a farmer has suffered damages due to natural causes that he has lost all his power to borrow. If, however, the question of a second mortgage enters into the picture, then a second mortgage probably means additional expenditure going beyond the scope of the present bill. If the amendment does not actually means added expenditure and if, as explained by the minister, the farmer has not necessarily lost his power to borrow because he has suffered damage, then the amendment really is meaningless. However, it is rather difficult for the Chair to rule at this stage that the amendment is out of order. If the committee is ready for the question I will be pleased to put the question.

Amendment (Mr. Racine) negatived: Yeas, 19; nays, 69.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 21—Amount of loan.

Mr. Peters: I should like to ask whether the minister has given any consideration to changing the method of making valuations of land. Most of the emphasis is put on land and therefore it is quite important that an over-all amount of money is not specified per acre for a particular area because of the variance from the real cost or real selling value of the land. I have had many complaints of valuations being made of only $25 a cleared acre and it has cost the farmers more than $25 just for the clearing of the land. In most cases it costs upwards of $50.

Therefore the farmers in my area at least feel that the valuations have not taken into consideration the real value of the land. They believe that this has been unfair and has tended to reduce the amount of money they can borrow on the land. I would think that there must be a fair relationship between the selling value of a farm and its appraised value, and quite often they have been nowhere near the same amount. When the minister is setting up the new board I should like him to see to it that the board gives consideration to being more lenient and taking into account the actual sale value of the farm. I can give an example of a farm that was for sale at a price of $17,000. The valuation of the board was $10,000. The farm was sold a year later for $20,000. The person who applied for the loan had no opportunity to buy it at all because of the valuation. It meant that he was only going to get $7,000 to buy a farm that was going to cost him $17,000.

Mr. Harkness: Once more, if the hon. member had studied the bill he would know this is provided for. Paragraph (a) of clause 19 (1) provides that the corporation may make regulations for:

(a) establishing the basis and method of determining the appraised value of property for the purposes of this act, but the appraised value shall be based only on the value of the land for agricultural purposes and as far as possible on the productive value as shown by experience.

In other words, the appraisal will be made on the productive value of the farm for agricultural purposes. This clause was framed that way specifically so that land which is close to a city and has a value some years in the future, or perhaps immediately, for subdivision purposes or things along that line, will not be appraised on its value for building lots but on its value for producing agricultural products.

Mr. Peters: The minister should know that I have read that clause of the bill, and although I made one mistake earlier, in this particular case I think there is some difference of opinion between the purchase price and the productive value. The productive value depends entirely, in my opinion, on the use to which the farm is put. If a farm has not been in production for a number of years it will be very difficult for an outside appraiser to come in and say the farm is worth a certain amount. The selling price of that farm may be determined by other factors, some of which the minister has mentioned. I am quite pleased he is familiar with this problem. All I ask is that he give some instructions to some of the people who are doing this work because, in my particular area, the valuations by the Canadian farm loan board have been very low.

Clause agreed to.

The Chairman: I believe it is the pleasure of the house that we continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 22 agreed to.

On clause 23—Supervised loans.

Mr. Roberge: I have some remarks to make with reference to this clause, as I did earlier this afternoon. I was very pleased that during the recess the minister considered the remarks I made. I am not fully satisfied with what he said shortly after eight o'clock on clause one of the bill. I am also pleased to know that the minister knows about the eastern townships. I may say that I come from that part of the country. I know there are some fine farms in that section, but that is not the situation all over Canada and it is certainly not the situation all over Quebec.

Having said that, I want to return to the subject I discussed earlier today. This clause 23 refers to supervised loans and to mortgages on farm lands and chattels. In my estimation the wording of the clause has the effect of joining the land and the chattels on the first mortgage. Now, as I said earlier, that is not possible in the province of Quebec under the civil code that is in force in that province. I know that earlier clauses of the bill provide that the corporation will have the power to prepare drafts of contracts to submit to the prospective borrower.

I repeat that I believe that in the province of Quebec, in order to make a loan on both farm land and on chattels it would be necessary to have two separate deeds, one deed for the land and another deed possibly for the cattle and farm equipment. The bill would be much clearer if we could separate these two things. I drew this amendment, and I put it forward now because I have another amendment to another section. I would move:

That section 23 be amended by deleting in line 3 thereof the words "on farm lands and chattels" and by substituting therefor the following words: "on either farm lands or chattels or on both".

I feel that this amendment does not endanger at all the interpretation of the bill but it does give more opportunity, in my opinion, to farmers in Quebec to take part in the scheme for supervised loans. I hope the minister will agree with this proposed amendment to clarify that clause.

Mr. Harkness: I do not believe there is any necessity for this, and actually the legal officers of the crown spent a great deal of time studying the best way in which to draft this clause in order to make it possible to make loans throughout Canada. So far as the province of Quebec is concerned, and this would apply in practically all the provinces, there would be two documents. There would be a mortgage on the land and there would be some document covering the chattels, which would be taken separately. As I say, the law officers of the crown, after a good deal of study of this matter came up with this clause as it is, and I think I am bound to follow their advice in a legal matter of this kind rather than that of the hon. member.

Mr. Roberge: I would ask the minister if he would consider at this time allowing the clause to stand until we reach clause 26 and he hears what I have to say on clause 26.

Mr. Harkness: I am quite willing to stand it until we get to clause 26, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Herridge: I have a question to ask the minister in respect of the supervised farm loans. Will the same reports and the same procedure be used in administrating supervised farm loans under this act as those used under the Veterans Land Act?

Mr. Harkness: I think essentially the same; as I say, the Veterans Land Act administration is going to do the supervision. We will pay them a small fee for this, whatever they calculate it should be and that is provided for later. I would presume they would carry on this work in almost exactly the same way as they have been carrying on their ordinary work under the Veterans Land Act.

Clause stands.

On clause 24—Conditions under which loans may be made.

Mr. Racine: There is mention made in this clause of the fact the borrower has to have at least five years experience in farming. Would the son of a farmer, who has been living on a farm with his family, be considered under this act as having at least five years experience?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The idea is that a young man who has had five years experience in farming would be qualified under this clause. This would make it impossible for a man who was living in the city, for example, to say, "I want to borrow $20,000 to buy this piece of land". In other words, it makes experience on the farm a requisite to securing a loan.

Clause 25 agreed to.

On clause 26—Provisions applicable to loans.

Mr. Roberge: The amendment I have devised to clause 26 is in three parts. The first two parts are very much related to the amendment I presented to clause 23. I should like to say a few more words on paragraph (c) of clause 26. This paragraph reads as follows:

(c) the portion of the loan based on the appraised value of the land shall be repayable within a period not exceeding thirty years and the remainder of the loan shall be repayable within a period not exceeding ten years;

Before I go any further I should like to ask the minister a question which I should like him to answer now. Is the ten years mentioned in the last part of the subparagraph in addition to the thirty years mentioned in the first part of the paragraph?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman. You may have a case such as this. Suppose a man gets a loan for, say, $25,000. Of that amount $15,000 would be based on the appraised value of the land. The other $10,000 would be on the appraised value of the livestock, chattels and so forth. The amount on the appraised value of the livestock, and chattels would have to be paid off in 10 years and the amortization of the loan would be drawn with that idea in mind, namely the payment of so much a year to amortize it in ten years, whereas the other part of the loan based on the land would be amortized over 30 years.
