Mr. Roberge: As I understand it, the maximum period on the livestock and chattels is 10 years. It seems to me, as I said earlier, that the amount to be repaid in the first 10 years will be a little bit too much for the farmer to handle if he is obliged to repay that amount at the same time as he is repaying on the land; that is, for the first 10 years. It is with that idea in mind that I have prepared and now wish to move an amendment which reads as follows:

That section 26 be amended in the following manner:

(a) By deleting in line 24 thereof the words "on farm lands and chattels of the borrower" and by substituting therefor the following words:

"on either farm lands or chattels of the borrower or on both";

(b) By deleting in lines 30 and 31 thereof the words "of the farm lands and chattels" and by substituting therefor the following words:

"of either the farm lands or chattels or of both"; and

(c) By deleting in line 37 thereof the semicolon and the word "and" and by adding the following:

"provided that the former portion may not be made repayable before the date on which the latter portion is to be completely reimbursed".

The effect of this proposed amendment, especially the last part of it, is that the borrower will have to reimburse a portion of the mortgage loan in the first part of the period of the loan and the rest of the money borrowed in the last part of the period of the loan.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I think that most of these matters could more appropriately be covered by regulations made under the act than by being written into the legislation. The main point which the hon.

member raised was that payments would be too high during the first ten years. The amortization which would be provided for on a package deal of this kind would be such that the amount paid in would pay off the portion of the loan which was on the livestock and chattels during the first ten years and during that period the amortization payments on the land would really be very small. Therefore the difficulty of which the hon. member is afraid or which he has envisaged will not arise, in my opinion.

Mr. Herridge: May I say that we in this group are not quite certain of the legal necessity for this amendment. However, in order to indicate our desire to make certain that our fellow citizens in Quebec suffer no handicap under this legislation, we are going to support it.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, together with the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge), who is a lawyer of note in the eastern townships, I carefully studied this legislation, and as we see it, it is impossible for a farmer of the province of Quebec to combine payments on a "vente à réméré" and on ordinary mortgage.

I do not know what farm experts think, especially experts in farm credit. We are privileged to have among us one such, and I mean the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois). I would therefore like to hear his opinion about the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Megantic.

(Text):

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Roberge) negatived: yeas, 20; nays, 62.

Clause stands.

The Chairman: As the amendment to clause 23 is rather similar to the amendment to clause 26, is it the pleasure of the committee to revert to clause 23?

On section 23—Supervised loans.

Mr. Roberge: I think the amendment was put previously. Since the amendment to clause 26 was defeated, there is now no reason whatsoever to vote on the amendment to clause 23. That would be a waste of the time of the committee. I therefore withdraw the amendment to clause 23.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to allow the amendment to be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 26—Provisions applicable to loans.

Mr. Boulanger: Will the interest of 5 per cent include the cost of insurance on the life of the borrower under part III of the bill?

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. Boulanger: What will be the interest for the insurance?

Mr. Harkness: The interest, Mr. Chairman, is provided in clause 16 at 5 per cent. The cost of the insurance will be in addition to that. I think we will probably have a group insurance policy which will mean quite a low premium rate.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): That would mean that in addition to the basic 5 per cent rate there would be three additional charges; one for insurance, one for the appraisal fee, and one for the supervising fee?

Mr. Harkness: That is right. I should like to point out, however, that the appraisal fee is limited to a maximum of $100, and that would come only once, of course. We anticipate that the charge made by the Veterans Land Act for their supervision will be very modest.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): This supervising fee would be a fee to the officials of the Veterans Land Act administration?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 27 to 30 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 31—Repeal.

Mr. Herridge: Before clause 31, the repeal of the Canadian Farm Loan Act, carries, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that a good number of people are interested in this legislation. They have been waiting for it for some months and will want to take advantage of it at the first opportunity. Would the corporation give consideration to the publication of a small booklet which would give the information required to anyone who wishes to take advantage of this legislation? It is not quite sufficient just to send a copy of the act to people; a pamphlet with some explanation would be much better for them to understand.

Mr. Harkness: I think that is a very good suggestion and we shall certainly give consideration to it. It is something, I think, which could be done without perhaps too much expense, and when the arrangements for the transition from the farm loan act to this new act are ready to go into effect I think we could have something ready to distribute at that time.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 32—Commencement.

Mr. Boulanger: What date will this law come into force?

Mr. Harkness: As I think the hon. member for Essex East could tell his colleague, this is a thing which is pretty difficult to predict with accuracy. We have, of course, not only to complete it here but the other place has to consider it as well. Then how long it will take before all the administrative arrangements can be made to have the organization of the farm loan board passed over to the new corporation, I do not know. We expect to do it within a relatively short space of time, but it is bound to take some time.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank all hon. members for sitting overtime and for their co-operation in getting this bill through.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader if he would be good enough to indicate what the business will be from now to the end of the session?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, we have made very good progress today, thanks to the co-operation of the two opposition parties. Tomorrow the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has to leave in the afternoon, so we will commence with item No. 4 on today's order paper, an agreement between the federal government and the government of New Brunswick concerning Indian reserves. Then we will take item No. 7, a similar agreement with Nova Scotia; then item No. 10, concerning the convention on the nationality of married women. Then we will take item No. 12, the international wheat agreement; item No. 13, second reading of the Newfoundland grants act; item No. 2, the Senate amendments to the Income Tax Act, on which I think concurrence will be moved. Then we will take item No. 9, the act to provide for the humane slaughter of food animals.

The intention for Wednesday is to take up estimates, commencing with the Department of Trade and Commerce. Then we will take those of mines and technical surveys, fisheries and post office. We have a tentative agreement between the parties to sit from 2.00 to 2.30 on Wednesday and so long thereafter as we continue estimates, and an extra hour from 7.00 to 8.00 in the evening. I would hope that we could start next Wednesday evening, so we will then sit the whole of Wednesday evening and also take the extra hour from 7.00 to 8.00 on Thursday, Friday, and also sit on Saturday evening if necessary.

On Thursday the item No. 3 on today's order paper, the Senate amendments to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, will be taken; then item No. 8, concerning the Combines Investigation Act. Then we will take the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and of the Secretary of State. On Friday we will take the estimates of the Privy Council, the C.B.C., national revenue, legislation and health and welfare, and on Saturday the estimates of finance.

Mr. Winch: Which Saturday will that be?

Mr. Green: Saturday, July 18.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister did not tell us when the legislation with regard to the deficiency payments on wheat would be brought up.

It being 31 minutes past ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

LAND LEASE, ST. JEAN D'IBERVILLE

Question No. 519—Mr. Dupuis:

Question

1. Has the Minister of Transport, his executive assistant, his deputy minister or any other officer of his department, received a delegation from St. Jean d'Iberville on or about June 23, 1959, concerning the lease of a parcel of federal land south of the central Vermont bridge?

2. If so, what are the names of the members of such delegation, what requests did they make, and what action has been taken by the department with respect to the said request?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. No.
2. Answered by part 1.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, July 14, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Second report of joint committee on Indian Affairs.—Mr. Dorion.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INTEGRATED COMMUNICATIONS SYSTEM—EXCHANGE OF NOTES BETWEEN U.S. AND CANADA

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table in English and in French copies of the exchange of notes between the government of Canada and the government of the United States of America governing the establishment of the integrated communications system to support the ballistic missile early warning system.

The house will recall that I referred to this system in the report on defence issued last April. I made further reference to it on July 2 when introducing the estimates of my department, and again on July 4 in answer to a question from the Leader of the Opposition. As I explained then, to enable the detection and early warning of intercontinental ballistic missiles the United States is establishing detection units in northern regions external to Canada. These units will report directly to NORAD headquarters in order to allow defence measures to be initiated as quickly as possible.

The most direct and economic routes for the communication links between these detection units and NORAD headquarters traverse Canada. In keeping with our joint efforts with the United States for the air defence of the North American continent, the Canadian government is co-operating in facilitating the establishment of the necessary communication links across Canadian territory.

In the main the facilities will be provided by existing Canadian commercial companies and leased to the United States. In those areas where facilities do not now exist they will be constructed, with the work being done by Canadian companies. On completion they will be leased to the United States authorities. This work will be undertaken under mutually agreed arrangements between the United States and Canadian authorities.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the documents in question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRADE

URANIUM—REPORTED U.S. INTENTION TO REDUCE CANADIAN IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of a press report of this morning. It deals with a matter of great importance and one which I have more than once brought to the attention of the minister. The report is from Washington, and is to the effect that the United States is about to make a big slash in imports of uranium, especially from Canada, after 1962. It is attributed to officials of the atomic energy commission and state department sources. Will the minister comment on this matter, especially in view of the anxiety that reports of this kind must arouse?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This matter has been up for discussion previously in the house. It hinges on the world supply of uranium. Naturally it is a matter of anxiety to Canadians, certainly in so far as uranium supplies may be concerned after 1962. The matter is under consideration, and we have had discussions with the authorities in the United States, but they have indicated that there is some uncertainty with regard to their requirements after 1962. They have much more abundant supplies of uranium now than was the case just a few years ago.

However, I do not think there is cause for alarm over this matter at the present time. This is the type of press report which will certainly arouse interest in areas where uranium is being produced, but we have time to work out a plan between Canada and the United States which may result in a satisfactory solution to what is a very difficult problem. However, basically we have to recognize that whereas a few years ago uranium was in short supply throughout the world, it is now not in short supply; hence the type of article to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister not agree that while uranium may not be in short supply now, it is likely to be so in years to come, and therefore it is important to maintain this industry at its present level until that time arrives?

Mr. Churchill: Quite right, Mr. Speaker. The forecasts I have been reading, produced by very competent scientists, indicate that the long term view shows that there will be a reasonably good demand for uranium. In fact some of those people estimate that by 1966, certainly by 1970, world demand will certainly equate with world supply. The difficult period lies between about 1962 and 1966. However, we are making a study of the situation. I have had reports from various sources with regard to this matter. Some are optimistic, one or two are a bit pessimistic, but generally the feeling is that as the peaceful uses of atomic energy are developed—and they are being developed rather widely now throughout the world—the demand for uranium will be sufficiently strong in the latter part of the 1960's that our uranium industry may be sustained.

NORTHLAND NAVIGATION COMPANY

INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, might I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. I would like to ask the minister what report he can give the house about the progress, or lack of it, that Mr. Currie has made in his attempts to mediate in the dispute between Northland Navigation and the unions in Vancouver, in order to get services restored.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my report is that a meeting of the interested parties was called by the labour representative yesterday. That meeting was held, some progress was made, and other meetings are being held today and on ensuing days.

SHIPPING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROVISION OF SERVICE TO UP-COAST COMMUNITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Transport on this same matter. Is he in a position to give us a report as to arrangements for the provision of supplies?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, considerable progress has been made. I discussed this matter in detail yesterday with the chairman of the maritime commission and the two members of parliament for the areas concerned. They have been kept advised as to what is being done, and everything possible is being done to make vital supplies available to these isolated communities. That matter is being looked after, and I feel that satisfactory progress is being made.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has said that progress is being made, and I am sure the house will be very pleased to know that. But what progress is being made? Are supplies now being made available to these people?

Mr. Hees: Arrangements have been made with one shipping company to supply one area, and negotiations are going on for the supplying of another area. As I say, I have kept the members of parliament for the two areas concerned advised of exactly what is going on, and I am interested to note the great interest taken by the hon. member for Essex East in this matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think I would have had a further supplementary question but for the last observation of the hon. gentleman. He says he has kept the two members of parliament advised, and I think that is quite right; but would he mind, from now on, keeping all members of parliament advised on a matter so vitally important to the people of that area?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON WINTER WORKS PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister say whether the government has yet decided to continue the winter works program for this coming winter? When will the minister be able to make an announcement in this regard?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Because of the fact that unemployment figures are still decreasing appreciably, it is impossible to assess now what the situation may be this coming winter. We hope the situation will be such that it will not be necessary to have this program repeated. However, I want to assure the house that we are watching the situation very closely, and if it should be necessary, consideration will be given to putting a plan into effect.

Mr. Argue: Does the minister not feel that such a program is necessary in order to take care of ordinary seasonal unemployment and should not be hinged on widespread or extraordinary unemployment such as we have experienced recently?

Mr. Starr: This plan was inaugurated by the government for the first time in the history of this country, in participation with the provincial and municipal governments, in order to alleviate an abnormal situation. It was instituted for that purpose only. Whenever further consideration has to be given to this problem because of circumstances which may arise, this government will always look sympathetically on the matter.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the Minister of Labour could tell the house whether any studies are going on as to what action might be taken to alleviate ordinary winter or seasonal unemployment.

Mr. Starr: That aspect is being studied continuously in the Department of Labour and by various committees connected with the department.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Has his attention been drawn to a news story in the morning press that a chairman of the board of directors, who would not be president of the corporation, is to be appointed? Has the government given consideration to this matter, as well as to the legality of such an appointment?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): My attention has been drawn to the article in question. Somebody spoke to me about it, but I have not had a chance to read the article. I am not in a position to comment on it, and the government has taken no action in that regard.

DURELLE-MOORE FIGHT—NEGOTIATIONS FOR TELECAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. M. Creaghan (Westmorland): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Would the minister advise the house if the C.B.C. will be carrying a live telecast of the Yvon Durelle-Archie Moore light heavyweight title fight on July 29? If not, are the responsible parties still negotiating?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): The hon. member was good enough to send me notice of his question this morning, and I have received some information from the C.B.C. which I will give to the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

The original fight between Archie Moore and Yvon Durelle, fought in Montreal on December 10, was covered by the C.B.C., and the corporation paid $20,000 for the rights to that fight in Canada. Negotiations opened for the July 15 fight, later postponed to July 29, with Mr. Quinn, the promoter, asking $50,000 with a blackout of the telecast in Quebec city, Sherbrooke, Montreal, Cornwall, Kingston and Ottawa. This was the same blackout requirement as for the first fight. Early in April the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation made an offer to Mr. Quinn of $40,000 for the full rights but with a proposal to blackout only Montreal and Sherbrooke. Mr. Quinn has countered with a proposal of $50,000 with no blackout restrictions but with a guarantee by the corporation to pay for all empty seats in the Montreal Forum on the night of the fight. The corporation has rejected this offer.

The corporation has now made a final offer of $50,000 for full Canadian rights without any blackout restrictions. It was noted in the press that Mr. Quinn will reject this offer. The corporation has received no official answer.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, does the minister consider that the statement he has just given is clandestine political interference in the affairs of the C.B.C.?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if the blackout applied to Ottawa some would think there had been clandestine interference.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

STATEMENT AS TO PAYMENTS ON SALE OF VESSELS TO CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay West asked if I could give information as to payments received to date in respect of the sale of the Canadian National (West Indies) steamship fleet.

The amount received to date by the vendor is $560,000, which represents the payment under the terms of the sale agreement of 20 per cent of the purchase price of $2,800,000. The remainder is payable in five equal yearly payments with interest at 5 per cent per annum. The sale having taken place in August, 1958, there will be an instalment due next month. As the hon. member is aware, the payments are secured by letter of credit issued by the Banco Cubano del Comercio Exterior, and confirmed by the Bank of America International.

Inquiries of the Ministry

(Translation):

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

CONTRIBUTIONS TO DEVELOPMENT MADE BY MESSRS. BENNETT AND HOOVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport?

At the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway, the names of one Mr. Bennett and one Mr. Hoover were mentioned as having contributed to the materialization of that project. Is the minister able to tell us in what respect those two men participated in the project, unless it was as a Conservative and as a Republican?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that this question, relating to events of the past, might very well be put on the order paper.

OLD WELLAND CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO CLEAN-UP AND RESTORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister keep the local members concerned advised on the progress in the clean-up of the old Welland ship canal? Conditions are particularly bad in that area, and there is certainly no evidence of any activity whatever.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am not aware of the exact condition of that clean-up operation at the moment, but I shall be very glad to inquire and report to the hon. member within the next day or so.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister tell us whether or not the government has received the final report of the Borden commission on the marketing of oil; and if not, when that report is likely to be received?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is no. With respect to the second question, the commission is operating in the usual way and when the report is ready it will be presented to the house.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the Prime Minister might make further inquiries in the light of a statement made by him in the house on May 5, to the effect that the report would be made available a few weeks after the end of that month.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Inasmuch as we are approaching the end of the session, can he undertake to provide answers to a number of questions of mine which have appeared on the order paper since April 28?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as soon as I receive answers I will be glad to give them to the hon. member.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LEGISLATION TO CONFIRM CANADA-NEW BRUNSWICK AGREEMENT RESPECTING RESERVES

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-6, to confirm an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of New Brunswick respecting Indian reserves.

She said: Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the purpose of this bill, has given consent so far as Her Majesty's property rights are concerned, that the house may do therein as it shall think fit.

The purpose of this legislation is to ratify and confirm an agreement made on March 25, 1958 between the government of Canada and the government of the province of New Brunswick in relation to lands forming part of Indian reserves in the province of New Brunswick. The necessity for such an agreement arose from decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council of Great Britain in two cases involving the sale of portions of Indian reserves in Ontario and Quebec, by the federal government, following surrenders for sale given by the Indian bands for whom the reserves had been set apart.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member would allow me to interrupt to ask for better attention so the house may hear the statement being made.

Mrs. Fairclough: In both cases it was held that notwithstanding that Canada had exclusive jurisdiction over lands reserved for Indians, the radical title to the reserves was in the province and therefore a valid agreement, after a surrender for sale by an Indian band, could only be made by the province.

The effect of these decisions was far reaching. In the first place, they rendered void the various grants of surrendered reserve lands which Canada had purportedly made between confederation and the date of the court decisions, the last of which was in 1921. They also placed a serious restriction on the Indians' right to use their reserve lands to the best possible advantage, for in effect they stated that a surrender of Indian reserve lands, even when surrendered in trust for sale, operated to free the land from the burden of the Indian title for the benefit of the province without affording the Indians any right of compensation for the loss of their lands. Finally, they established in the province the right to recover from Canada all moneys which Canada had received from the sale of surrendered reserve land, despite the fact that such moneys may have been expended on behalf of the Indians.

The agreement in question is intended to settle the problems arising out of the court decisions. The effect of this ratification and confirmation by parliament and the legislature of the province of New Brunswick will be to validate the effective land grants made by Canada, permit Canada to retain for the benefit of the Indians all moneys received from former sales of surrendered reserve lands, and enable Canada, which is responsible for the administration of Indian affairs, to effectively deal with reserve lands in the province of New Brunswick which may be surrendered for sale in the future.

The agreement was ratified by the legislature of the province of New Brunswick by an act which received royal assent on April 18, 1958. This act is chapter 4 of the statutes of New Brunswick, 1958.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for her statement. In view of the concentrated effort to wind up the session and also the fact that the minister is scheduled to leave very shortly I shall make only a few remarks. I may first state that the official opposition supports the passage of this bill. This is Bill No. S-6, to confirm an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of New Brunswick. The purpose of this bill is, as the minister said, to ratify and confirm this agreement which was made on March 25, 1958. This agreement was ratified by New Brunswick on April 18, 1958. This bill was introduced in the other place and given first reading on January 29. It received second reading on February 5 and third reading on February 12.

It is not my intention to go into the background of the events leading up to this agreement. From time to time lands were surrendered, and the position taken down through the years was that the surrendered lands belonged to the crown in the right of the Dominion of Canada. Certain cases were appealed to the privy council, and it was held that these lands were the property of the crown in the right of the province. This means that it was necessary to take action to validate the defective grants, and negotiations between the two levels of government have been going on for some 10 years and have now ended in mutual agreement. The agreement covered by this bill will enable the dominion government, which is responsible for the administration of Indian affairs, to deal in future in a proper and legal way with surrendered lands offered for sale.

The constituency of Northumberland-Miramichi is involved in that eight parcels of Indian lands are involved, namely Indian Point, Eel Ground, Red Bank, two parcels of the Big Hole tract, Tabusintac, Renous and Burnt Church, out of a total of 18 in the province which are covered in this bill. As the federal member for Northumberland-Miramichi I have had representations made to me from time to time by Indians and others in connection with claims to ownership of surrendered lands. Doubts have been expressed as to legal ownership, and dissatisfaction arose in a number of cases which were, in the main, resolved and titles accepted, even if not legal in the strictest interpretation.

The official opposition supports the passage of this agreement and the bill based thereon, because it will clear up the matter of jurisdiction in the sale of surrendered lands, which I think will be a good thing to accomplish and will eliminate a lot of this friction which has existed down through the years.

In the schedule to the bill which spells out the memorandum of agreement between the government of Canada and the government of New Brunswick I read these words, in the fourth paragraph:

> —in order to settle all outstanding problems relating to Indian reserves in the province of New Brunswick,—

This, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion is away beyond the scope of this agreement. There are other outstanding problems in connection with Indian reserves in the province of New Brunswick in which the federal and provincial governments have a joint interest, which I will not enumerate at this time.

The main clause in the agreement states that it will settle all outstanding problems. Perhaps the minister can explain the purpose of these words. It may be that the province of New Brunswick should be asked to amend the wording of this clause, which can only apply to the problems concerning the lands forming part of the Indian reserves in the province, because certainly this bill will not settle all outstanding problems on Indian reserves by any means.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that we support the passage of this bill which will eliminate the confusion about which I spoke, and will subsequently bring about better business relationships between parties interested in surrendered lands.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): On behalf of the C.C.F. I want to make a few comments in support of the bill before us and to express appreciation to the minister and the government that the federal government and New Brunswick have been able to reach a satisfactory conclusion to this matter. We are particularly pleased with the reference in the bill to minerals, and to the fact that a band does not become extinct by reason of its enfranchisement. If a band should become enfranchised, they would still retain the land which has been set aside for them.

I should like to say to the minister that any time she and the province of British Columbia, and particularly the Indian bands in British Columbia, could reach some sort of agreement which will satisfy the claims of the Indians in British Columbia in so far as the British Columbia land question is concerned, we would be pleased to support that also.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Just before the minister replies, I may say that I have nothing to add to what the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. McWilliam) said about the bill in general. However, there is a special situation in connection with one of the reserves at Big Cove in the county of Kent about which the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Michaud) asked me to say a word. It is a legal question, and is the result of litigation between someone who the court decided really owned the land and whose land was trespassed upon by the Indians on the reserve. This person got a judgment in 1958 against the Indians, but of course the judgment is really worthless because there can be no execution against the Indians. It did seem to me the minister might look into it and see whether, in real equity, the crown ought not to do something about it.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. McWilliam.]

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now she will close the debate.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not think there is much comment called for at this time. I should like to assure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that I shall be glad to look into the particular case he has cited.

With reference to the words which were protested by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi, if I may use so strong a word, I think it must be considered that this agreement was drawn and passed first by the legislature of New Brunswick. I agree that probably the words he quoted, that is "to settle all outstanding problems", are a little broad. Nevertheless it was the true intention of the bill, as understood by both New Brunswick and Canada, that the agreement was to cover the outstanding problems in this particular field which were the main ones interesting the two governments at that time. These same words, I think, were copied from former agreements that were entered into between the provinces and the federal government, and have been used on several occasions, notably in 1912 and again in 1924. I am sure there is no real objection to their appearance in this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. McGee in the chair.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. Howard: In so far as the schedule is concerned, I pose a question to the minister which arises from clause 6, subclause 4, paragraphs (a), (b) and (c), with respect to the appointment of an arbitration board to deal with differences which may arise. Paragraph (a) reads:

> Canada and New Brunswick shall each appoint one arbitrator, and the two arbitrators so appointed shall appoint a third arbitrator—

I wonder what would take place if the two arbitrators so appointed were not able to agree on the third arbitrator. What steps would be taken to select him? I do not know whether this would ever be a possibility, but I know that in arbitration cases in other instances, dealing with other matters, it arises. There is usually provision for the selection of the third arbitrator when the two participating parties are not able to agree.

Mrs. Fairclough: I think that is such a hypothetical question that it raises the problem of giving an answer which might be taken as a ruling, but I would think the usual law would take over. Personally I am not concerned about this section. I do not think we will run into any difficulty.

Mr. Howard: I do not imagine you would either, but the question could be dealt with through the process used in establishing arbitration boards in settling disputes, in expropriation questions and things of that nature. If that is the process to be used, it provides a solution.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LEGISLATION TO CONFIRM CANADA-NOVA SCOTIA AGREEMENT RESPECTING RESERVES

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-25, to confirm an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Nova Scotia respecting Indian reserves.

She said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the purpose of this bill, has given his consent as far as Her Majesty's property rights are affected that the house may do therein at it thinks fit. I could make similar remarks on this bill to those I made on the bill which has just been adopted by the house. The situation is exactly the same. If hon. members agree, I think I might just ask if there are any comments.

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): The minister has just said that this bill is similar to Bill No. S-6 which just passed second and third reading, and that she did not think it was necessary to make any statement on the bill. I quite agree with that sentence. For the same reason I feel that there is not much more that can be added by me on this bill in addition to what I said on Bill No. S-6. However, I wish to say that the official opposition supports the passage of this bill. I note that once again the same phraseology is used with regard to the settling of outstanding problems. However, as the minister said previously—and as I agree—this is not a very serious thing, and we have no objection.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, this affords me the opportunity to make probably the shortest speech I have made yet. We support this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

MOTION TO APPROVE CONVENTION ON NATIONALITY OF MARRIED WOMEN

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved:

That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament approve the convention on the nationality of married women done at New York on February 20, 1957, and that this house do approve the same.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I need not say more than a few words in support of this resolution. As hon. members will appreciate immediately, the convention on the nationality of married women is an especially forthright, commendable and timely document that should win the spontaneous approval of the progressive countries of the world. The convention contains only three substantive articles which are, however, of considerable significance in their recognition of the autonomy of married women with regard to citizenship. I think, Mr. Speaker, I might read them into the record:

Article 1

Each contracting state agrees that neither the celebration nor the dissolution of a marriage between one of its nationals and an alien, nor the change of nationality by the husband during marriage, shall automatically affect the nationality of the wife.

Article 2

Each contracting state agrees that neither the voluntary acquisition of the nationality of another state nor the renunciation of its nationality by one of its nationals shall prevent the retention of its nationality by the wife of such national.

Article 3

1. Each contracting state agrees that the alien wife of one of its nationals may, at her request, acquire the nationality of her husband through specially privileged naturalization procedures; the grant of such nationality may be subject to such limitations as may be imposed in the interests of national security or public policy.

2. Each contracting state agrees that the present convention shall not be construed as affecting any legislation or judicial practice by which the alien wife of one of its nationals may, at her request, acquire her husband's nationality as a matter of right.

As will be apparent, the general purpose of the convention is to ensure that the nationality of a married woman will not be affected automatically by her marriage to a national of another country, by the dissolution of such a marriage or by a change in the nationality of her husband. If she wishes to retain her nationality she will be free to do so. On the other hand, if she chooses to acquire the nationality of her husband the naturalization procedures will be eased in her favour. Yet the contracting states are free to determine how this easing of procedures is to be done, within the limits of national security and public policy.

Nationality of Married Women

As every hon. member knows, up to a few decades ago it was the universal rule that a woman who was of a different nationality than her husband acquired his nationality automatically upon marriage, and lost the nationality which she had possessed until then. In the process of time a number of countries, notably the United States, France and the U.S.S.R., enacted legislation providing that no such change in a wife's nationality would be automatic. However, the fact that this progressive action was not concerted among the nations brought domestic laws into conflict. The consequence at first was that while women no longer always acquired the nationality of their husbands, they still lost their own, and some were accordingly left stateless. It was imperative therefore that legislative action be made universal. Otherwise the attempt to resolve one hardship would have simply resulted in the creation of another.

Without waiting for the establishment of an international convention on the subject, Canada took the necessary steps in 1931 to maintain the national status of Canadian women who married nationals of countries that no longer granted automatic naturalization upon marriage. Moreover, with the adoption of the Canadian Citizenship Act in 1946, Canada became the first country of the commonwealth to provide that a woman has a fully autonomous citizenship status. Unless she herself wishes it and takes special steps in this direction, a Canadian woman will not lose her nationality, nor will an alien woman gain Canadian nationality upon marriage. On the other hand, there exists a simplified naturalization procedure for the alien wife who wishes to acquire the nationality of her Canadian husband.

The international agreement that is before this house for approval is therefore in full conformity with the citizenship policy followed by Canada at least over the past 12 years. It was prepared on the recommendation of the economic and social council of the United Nations, and opened for signature and ratification by a resolution of the general assembly adopted two years ago. Canada signed it on February 20, 1957, and on April 9 of that year the convention was tabled in the House of Commons. Twenty-two countries, including the United Kingdom and the U.S.S.R., have now signed the convention, which came into force last August. The number of ratifications has now reached 12.

Canada has taken a very active interest in this question at the United Nations, and is one of the states which sought to promote the drafting of the convention. Women's organizations in this country have expressed their satisfaction at Canada's signature, and have displayed considerable interest in Canadian ratification. I am confident that every hon. member of this house will agree that it is desirable for Canada to approve the convention, both so as to reaffirm the equality of citizenship status as between men and women in Canada, and so as to give encouragement to a highly desirable development in modern society.

(Translation):

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough). I agree with her that this convention conforms in a general way with the terms of the Canadian Citizenship Act.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to read into Hansard part of the preamble of the convention on the nationality of married women, which was signed in New York on February 20, 1957, and has been tabled in this house and in the other place on April 9, 1957, as the minister pointed out. The part of the preamble I mean reads as follows:

(Text):

"Everyone has the right to a nationality" and that "no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality nor denied the right to change his nationality".

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I have a feeling I have already heard some discussion in this house with regard to a bill asking that no distinction be made between native born Canadians and naturalized Canadians. As a matter of fact, this discrimination still exists in our citizenship act, and I hope that, as a result of the ratification by the house of the convention on the nationality of married women, the minister will consider introducing the required amendment to our citizenship act so that, at last, any discrimination between naturalized citizens and native Canadians be eliminated from our statutes.

Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house are happy to support the convention which has already been approved by the United Nations and quite a number of countries.

(Text):

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, one of the pleasant duties which falls on members, particularly those who belong to the male sex, is to rise and indicate support for any measure such as this which will be beneficial to the most fascinating, delightful and romantic section of our society, especially when the hon. member who is introducing the motion is herself a woman. It is just in these short words that I wish to indicate our unqualified support for this motion before us and for the convention itself.

Mr. Caron: Would the minister have this convention printed in French?

Mrs. Fairclough: In answer to hon. members who have spoken previously, I would say that the convention was tabled, as I said, on April 9, 1957. There are 100 or so copies available, and the ones I saw were all in English. I daresay it would not be difficult to translate it, but I am not sure whether we have any translated copies.

Mr. Caron: May we have it translated and given to us in French?

Mrs. Fairclough: I would be very happy to arrange that.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

WHEAT—MOTION FOR APPROVAL OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament do approve the international wheat agreement opened for signature at Washington, D.C., on April 6, 1959, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on March 10 I announced to the house the successful conclusion of negotiations for a new international wheat agreement at the United Nations wheat conference in Geneva. The new agreement was open for signature in Washington from April 6 to April 24, and on April 22 the Canadian ambassador to the United States, Mr. Heeney, signed the agreement on behalf of Canada, subject to ratification by parliament.

As at May 31 the governments of 26 importing countries and of all nine exporting countries had signed the agreement. The house will note that the United Kingdom is a signatory to the new agreement. Four of the smaller importing countries listed in the agreement have not yet signed, but their accession to the agreement, as well as that of several other importing countries which are members of the current international wheat agreement but did not participate in the conference, is expected to take place before December 1, 1959, which is the final date stipulated in the agreement.

The exporting countries now include Italy, Mexico and Spain—previously importing countries—in addition to Argentina, Australia, Canada, France, Sweden and the United States. Instruments of acceptance following ratification must be deposited before July 16, in order that the new agreement enters fully into force on August 1, on the expiry of the current agreement.

This new agreement has the full support of the principal producer organizations in western Canada. The leaders of these organizations, who are members of the advisory committee of the Canadian wheat board, formed part of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations wheat conference. I should like to add in this connection that, as in previous negotiations, the counsel and judgment of these men, reflecting their mature experience in wheat affairs, gave valued support to the contribution made by the Canadian delegation to the conference.

The house will expect me at this time to give a broad outline of the new agreement and its main features. The 1959 agreement is new not only in the sense that it will succeed and replace the 1956 agreement on its expiry on July 31; it is also new in that it is different and broader in concept, scope and content than any of the three previous agreements concluded since 1949. In this sense it will mark a new era for the international wheat council, which should now provide an enlarged framework with realistic terms of reference directed to the practical and urgent needs of the world wheat situation as it is and as it has been developing.

The principal objectives of the new international wheat agreement remain the same, namely the assurance of supplies to importing countries and of markets to exporting countries at equitable and stable prices, and the overcoming of the serious hardship caused to producers and consumers by burdensome surpluses and critical shortages of wheat. However, these objectives have now been significantly broadened to include the expansion and freest possible flow of the international trade in wheat and flour in the interests of both exporting and importing countries; the encouragement of increased consumption of wheat and wheat flour generally, particularly as a means of improving health and nutrition, and the furtherance of international co-operation in connection with world wheat problems.

In order to appreciate fully the significance of these broader objectives, perhaps it may be useful to refer briefly to some of the background to the new agreement, and this may also help to give point to the changes in its operational clauses. Hon. members will recall that the three previous agreements of 1949, 1953 and 1956 were based essentially on reciprocal undertakings by exporting and importing countries. At the maximum price, exporting countries were committed to supply guaranteed quantities to importing countries: and at the minimum price, the importing countries were committed to purchase guaranteed quantities from the exporting countries. Within the price range there was no commitment, either to sell or to purchase under the agreement.

In a period of strong demand and rising prices, stimulated by the post-war shortage of grains and later by the Korean crisis, the first wheat agreement did stabilize prices for almost two-thirds of the world wheat trade throughout its four-year period, 1949-50 to 1952-53. In 1956, under the burdensome weight of accumulating wheat surpluses almost everywhere in the world, the quantities committed under the I.W.A. fell to almost a quarter of the international trade in wheat. Purchases transacted under the agreement since then have declined to about a third of the total movement of wheat between those countries which are members of the agreement. In such circumstances, when the quantity of wheat moving outside the agreement was twice as large as that transacted under it, and when the problems of surplus accumulation and disposal were beyond the scope of the agreement, it was clear that the former type of agreement was no longer adequate to cope with issues in the current wheat situation which require a solution, either by grappling with root causes or by the formulation of remedial measures to mitigate their adverse international effects.

The 1959 agreement reaffirms the belief of its members in intergovernmental co-operation on world wheat problems. It also represents an attempt on the part of its members to devise a new framework to meet changed conditions. Under the new agreement the international wheat council has wider powers and functions. It is authorized to hold an annual review of the world wheat situation covering developments in national production, stocks, prices and trade, including surplus disposal and special transactions, details of which must be supplied regularly to the council.

Instead of expressing rights and obligations in terms of guaranteed quantities applicable only at the maximum or at the minimum price, in the new agreement individual importing countries are under a continuing obligation to purchase, when prices are within the price range but below the maximum, not a guaranteed quantity but a specified minimum percentage of their total commercial imports. When prices reach the maximum the exporting countries undertake, if requested, to supply importing countries, at prices no higher than the maximum, with quantities of wheat equal to the average of their total commercial purchases from them over a representative base period.

In this connection it should be pointed out that as the obligations of exporting countries at the maximum price are related to the average level of past purchases on commercial terms, there is an inducement to importing countries to buy more than their percentage commitment when prices are below the maximum in order to build up a larger entitlement. At the same time, while prices are at the maximum importing countries are released from their obligations to purchase under the agreement, and if they so wish may obtain their commercial needs from any other source. Thus mutual obligations are balanced in a way that is conclusive to a freer and larger movement of trade under the agreement.

From Canada's standpoint this aspect of the agreement represents a great improvement. In the previous agreement, guaranteed quantities were of the order of 295 million bushels, against which only 195 million bushels were transacted in 1957-58, the last year for which final figures are available. Under the new agreement, to the extent that the importing countries will purchase their requirements commercially, and in bushel terms, these may increase as well as decrease; a specific minimum percentage will have to be transacted under the agreement each year so long as prices are below the maximum. If the minimum percentages of the 30 importing countries specified in the agreement are expressed in terms of commercial purchases over a representative period, 1954-55 to 1957-58, the commercial movement within the agreement will amount to about 420 million bushels. If allowance is also made for the former United Kingdom dependent overseas territories, such as Ghana, Malaya and the West Indies Federation, and for members of the current agreement and other countries that did not participate in the conference but which are expected to accede to the new agreement, it is expected that annual commercial trade under the agreement will rise to about 450 million bushels or more.

Under earlier agreements the total of the importing countries' guaranteed quantities was divided among the exporting countries, each exporting country's share representing its individual guaranteed quantity. Importing countries could theoretically be required to take this guaranteed quantity if prices reached the minimum. In practice this right was never used, since prices did not fall to the floor. Moreover, there was considerable doubt whether the provisions safeguarding the exporters' position at the minimum would have proven effective had they been put to the test. In the new agreement the market represented by the total of the importing countries' commitment to purchase a specified percentage of their commercial imports will be open to competition among the exporting countries. There is every prospect that on grounds of quality and price Canadian wheat will be able to compete successfully, and that this pressure will prove advantageous to our trade.

The price range in the new agreement is $1.50 to $1.90 per bushel for No. 1 Manitoba northern wheat, basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur. The minimum remains unchanged and the maximum price has dropped 10 cents per bushel. In the face of the persisting accumulation of supply in excess of foreign commercial demand there was heavy pressure from the importers for a downward adjustment of the floor as well as the ceiling price. The exporters were successful in holding the minimum price and were able to agree to a reduction in the ceiling in the light of considerable advantages offered elsewhere in the new agreement, particularly the importers undertaking to purchase throughout the price range. Some decrease in the price range was inevitable in prevailing circumstances, and the reduction made can be regarded as the minimum necessary to secure acceptance of a more effective agreement. Whether the maximum price provisions will become operative during the three year currency of the new agreement cannot now be foreseen.

While the rights and obligations of exporting and importing countries are confined to sales and purchases transacted on commercial terms only, all transactions, commercial and special, entered into by member countries are to be recorded by the secretariat of the international wheat council for the purposes of the agreement. A "special" transaction is defined as "one which, whether or not within the price range, includes features introduced by the government of the country concerned which do not conform with usual commercial practices". The chief purpose of bringing special or non-commercial transactions within the effective scope of the agreement is to enable the council in its annual review to have a complete and comprehensive picture of the international trade in wheat. A complete record of non-commercial transactions will, of course, facilitate the task of safeguarding normal commercial markets.

To sum up, the new agreement is a flexible international instrument devised to deal with trade in wheat and the most pressing problems of the world wheat situation. With its wider responsibilities and functions the new council will provide an effective forum for intergovernmental consultations and co-operation in wheat, and as such will be better equipped to tackle world wheat problems and to promote corrective measures. In this way it is hoped that it will be able to exert a beneficial and stabilizing influence on the world wheat economy. In the present world wheat situation the new agreement affords increased assurance of markets for our wheat at a fair return to our wheat producers. For these reasons I commend to the house the new international wheat agreement for approval.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the resolution the hon. gentleman has moved in connection with the fourth international wheat agreement is of importance, of course, to all sections of the Canadian people. The minister in noting some of the advantages of the fourth treaty called our attention to the statement of objectives which will be found in part I, article 1. In referring to these objectives the minister said there is an improvement over the purposes and objectives envisaged in the last international wheat agreement.

That is true, but one should not confuse the statement of intention with reality, particularly when in the treaty as presently drawn up there is no commitment to make effective the promotion of the expansion of international trade in wheat and wheat flour as stated in clause (b) of the objectives, nor is there any provision that would make it obligatory on any signatory to live up to the implications involved in clause (e), where it is proposed as the final objective to further international co-operation in connection with world wheat problems, recognizing the relationship of the trade in wheat to the economic stability of markets for other agricultural products.

I do agree with the minister, however, that as a statement of objectives in a collective effort such as this under the auspices of the United Nations there can be no quarrel with the broad concepts which are envisaged. I think at the outset it should be stated that in practical terms it is doubtful that this new international wheat agreement will be a guarantee of permanent stability in wheat prices.

The new agreement becomes effective on August 1 and will run until July 31, 1962. The minister has referred to the fact that unlike the preceding wheat agreement, and its predecessor Britain has become an adherent to the treaty. However, while that is welcome certainly on sentimental grounds, the economic implications ought not to be overstated. The participation by Britain will not bring about any major increase in the demand for Canadian wheat under the international wheat agreement, in my view. It is significant that the price for British participation—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong in this—is that the ceiling price has been reduced from $2 to $1.90. The cut, therefore, is 10 cents, from $2 a bushel to $1.90 a bushel. As the minister has pointed out, the floor remains at $1.50. I believe the current price for No. 1 northern is below the present $2 ceiling, and is around $1.69.

The overriding consideration in this agreement, of course, is that we are faced again with a very serious world surplus, and that is a very important conditioning factor in this particular treaty. As a matter of fact my slight research indicates that most authorities in this matter feel that in the next three years the continuing world surplus situation will prevent the price of wheat reaching the maximum level. Crop failure, of course, could alter this situation, and in that event there is one safeguarding feature in the treaty that the minister has not mentioned, and that is that in the event of crop failures the exporting countries are not obliged to sell any more than their normal amounts to purchaser countries that are signatories to this treaty. The latter would therefore, I take it, be precluded under the treaty from stockpiling at the $1.90 level, a situation that price-wise could not attend any serious reduction in the world surplus situation and which might in itself be a cause for an improvement in the price situation but for the stockpiling control provisions contained in the treaty.

I suppose it will be argued that the participation by Britain in this treaty will give some steadiness and some orderliness to the marketing of wheat, but it will remain to be seen in the light of experience whether this will really be the case; for, as the minister has pointed out, there is no obligation as in this treaty to buy on the basis of fixed quotas. There is merely the requirement that countries give an indication of their intended purchases. In the case of Britain this will mean 80 per cent of their requirements.

It is very interesting to examine the annex to this treaty and see the various percentage requirements to which the purchasing countries commit themselves. Without belittling the principle behind this treaty, I do not think Canadian farmers and wheat producers should be taken in by these figures. I notice, for instance, that Vatican City is given at 100 per cent. Some new countries are given at fairly high figures. I am sure the minister will agree that it will be interesting to see whether many of these countries are really potential purchasers, particularly of Canadian wheat in these amounts. I think the percentage commitments of some purchasing countries should not be exaggerated.

There is, however, a new feature in this treaty which the minister has mentioned. It is that while the old treaty covered 25 per cent of the world's commerce in wheat, the new agreement will cover 75 per cent. And that, of course, does represent an improvement. However, the elimination of the fixed quota purchase has another implication, and that is the effect of this on the Soviet union. The Soviet union has not become one of the signatories to the treaty. The minister did not explain why. I suppose there were reasons in the minds of some of the exporting countries as well as considerations arising out of the position of the Soviet union itself, but perhaps the overriding reason was the fear of a flooding of the world market, such as the Soviet union was able to effect in the matter of tin. In that connection, it is noteworthy that in the annex West Germany undertakes to buy 70 per cent of her total requirements, leaving 30 per cent to be purchased from other than countries supplying wheat under this international agreement. Germany, of course, is not precluded from purchasing some of that 30 per cent, or all of it, from the Soviet union.

The minister did point out that the treaty takes into account give-aways—I do not think the minister did mention this—but the treaty takes into account the give-aways to underdeveloped and starving countries. The advantage of this, of course, is that it would be done on a collective basis and not, as it is being done now by some countries, on a unilateral basis with very disturbing effects to other countries. This is the principle behind some of the criticism which the present and the preceding Canadian government have levelled against the surplus disposal policy of the United States.

The treaty, notwithstanding some comments which I have seen in the press, does not provide for any controls in world wheat production. Without in any way saying whether or not I think it would be a good thing in itself, the fact is regardless of some of the advantages which this fourth international wheat agreement is supposed to give, the basis certainly does not include any step by which the gap between world production and world consumption can be improved. All that is indicated is that it should be regarded as the common concern of all countries to see to it that the gap between production and consumption was such as not to add to the burden which arises out of the serious surplus situation that now prevails.

In the statement of objectives, as I mentioned at the outset, there is an expression of support for the promotion of the expansion of world trade and the freest practical flow of trade among the signatory countries. That is a very desirable thing, but this is nothing more than a mere pious expression of intention. The only effective way by which this could be given effect to would be for the signatories themselves to take steps in their own domestic policies toward a freer world trade and the expansion of world trade itself. The mere statement of these objectives should not be misconstrued.

In many respects this particular treaty is a victory for a buyer's market because of the cut-back of 10 cents. I know the minister would join with me and with any who speak on this measure in indicating that while there is a cut-back of 10 cents, it should be the policy and the aim of the government, having in mind the interests of the wheat producer, to keep the price at the ceiling. I emphasize this because of a press report which I saw in the Ottawa Journal of March 11 of this year under the heading:

U.K. Minister Sees Cheaper Wheat From I.W.A. Pact.

The article goes on:

British agriculture minister John Hare said last night the international wheat agreement reached yesterday in Geneva should pave the way to cheaper wheat.

A little further on it says:

Britain, by far the largest wheat importing country, has said the revisions in the new agreement meet all her objections to the agreement of 1953 and 1956.

Well, what may be Britain's objective and Britain's interest may not necessarily meet the objectives and the interests of the Canadian wheat producer. In any event, I suppose because of the world surplus situation, the present ceiling may be the price level most easily attainable; but I think it is important for us to bear in mind that for the admission of Britain, desirable as that is, we have had to pay some price.

It is argued by some that as a result of this cut-back the Canadian wheat producers may have lost some prospective buyers. If he replies possibly the minister will be able to comment on that point.

I notice that the number of participating countries has dropped from 42 to 36. I do not think the minister gave any explanation of that, and perhaps he would be good enough to do so when he replies.

This treaty, of course, recognizes the value of the principle of multilateralism in world trade as opposed to the operations of a free market. There will continue to be the usual arguments by those who feel that the latter would bring about a better price for the producer; but speaking for myself, certainly I believe this multilateral approach is more orderly and more inclined to bring about in the long run the kind of satisfaction of interests we desire, not only for the peoples of the world but for the Canadian wheat producers themselves.

Mr. Argue: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he not think the multilateral arrangement to which he refers would also bring about a better price than a free market in certain circumstances?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Personally I am inclined to think that is the case, and that is what I meant when I said I think an orderly arrangement as the result of such a collective effort would likely have greater consequences for the wheat producers as well as for the other countries of the world involved in the two considerations, which I think go hand in hand.

I wonder whether the minister can indicate whether we are simply going to get 80 per cent of Britain's requirements, because my examination of this situation indicates that in recent years 97 per cent of Britain's wheat purchases were made from the major wheat exporting countries who continue as signatories to this treaty, notwithstanding the fact that Britain herself was not obligated to any of the requirements of the last two international wheat agreements.

I think the minister ought to indicate to us what will be the effect of the new European common market on exports by major wheat-producing countries. Moreover, it seems to me that the minister has not fully satisfied the committee when he speaks of the new powers given to the council with respect to the supervision of surplus disposal programs. It is true that we argued that under GATT there was a violation, at least in spirit, in the surplus disposal programs, particularly of the United States. But I am not convinced that this new treaty will or does provide for a greater measure of public scrutiny, that it really does go further than the situation that prevails under the existing treaty. I note that, while in part VI, article 21, there is provision for an annual review of the practices in connection with wheat disposal, in the final subsection of article 21 the following appears:

Nothing in this article shall prejudice the complete liberty of action of any exporting or importing country in the determination and administration of its internal agricultural and price policies.

It should not be forgotten likewise that in the agreement that comes to an end on July 31 there is provision for a periodic review of surplus disposal operations, just as there is, in effect though different in form, in the new agreement.

I think all these questions of the supervision of surplus disposal products are very important. I know the minister would not want to leave the country with an exaggerated impression of the extent of the agreement which was arrived at in Geneva. It is true the international wheat council will make a yearly review of annual production and marketing measures affecting trade in wheat, and sales by member countries. This will, admittedly, include not only commercial sales, as the minister observed, but special transactions. Article 3 of the treaty defines what are special transactions. Commercial purchases are the percentages of purchases which importing countries agree to make of their total requirements of commercial wheat. Special transactions are defined as:

(a) sales on long term credit resulting from government intervention;
(b) sales under tied government loans;
(c) sales for inconvertible currency;
(d) barter transactions;
(e) bilateral trading agreements;
(f) gifts or grants.

It may be very well in principle to say the wheat council now, under this treaty, is going to have a review power that was not as clearly stated under the old treaty. However, this is to be observed. When the United States gave away wheat for foreign currency, and gave it away on tied government loans as it did to certain South American countries, we argued that the United States violated the spirit of the international wheat agreement, if it did not violate the letter of the agreement itself. I do not believe it can be argued that this limitation is removed under the present treaty. Under this treaty the United States now, without violating even the spirit or the letter of the agreement, may sell on long term credit to any country. It can continue to sell on tied government loans. It can say to a country, "We will make you loans for industrial purposes if you will take a certain amount of wheat from us."

As I understand it, there is nothing to prevent that under this treaty. It can continue to sell for inconvertible currencies, for instance to India for rupees. It can make barter transactions, which are the worst of all. It can make bilateral trading arrangements and agreements. It may dispose of wheat by gifts or grants.

We have been objecting to all this. We have been arguing that this was contrary to GATT at least in spirit. But now, under the new agreement, the United States will be able to take the position that while there is an obligation to have an annual review of all transactions of this kind, there is no possible argument that these various kinds of transactions, other than commercial ones are even contrary to the spirit of the international wheat agreement. Under this new agreement therefore, as I see it, these practices really received the approval of the signatory countries to the international wheat agreement.

There is no need for any further extended comment on this treaty which, in principle, represents a sound approach. I do not believe, in fairness, it could be argued that it is a great improvement or, on balance, an improvement at all over the existing agreement. One appreciates all the difficulties in arriving at an agreement involving a matter of this sort. One recognizes the advantage of British participation, notwithstanding the fact that this means a cut-back from $2 to $1.90. While this treaty is perhaps the best that could have been obtained under all the circumstances—I want to be fair in my comments —I do believe its value should not be exaggerated. We should not think that by this agreement, involving the participation now of Britain, involving the greater publicity for certain transactions which we felt were inimical to our trading interests as a great wheat producing country, the argument we made against the surplus disposal policies of the United States has been destroyed.

However, with these observations I want the minister to know, as one who believes in the collective way of approaching these matters, that I do not overlook the fact that in principle this treaty does perpetuate some of the principles of the three preceding agreements. But it is certainly, I think, a great overstatement to argue that this treaty represents a fundamental change or an improvement over its predecessors.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the international wheat situation is a difficult one, and any consultation or any arrangement for consultation by most of the wheat exporting and wheat importing countries is something that should be supported. Agricultural producers have long been of the opinion that, in producing wheat and other grains and in the storage and sale of those grains, a proper central agency acting on behalf of producers is necessary, and have also believed that in the sale of wheat and in international deals in wheat this same principle of collective agreement should be continued.

We have had a number of wheat agreements in the past, and with the exception of the initial wheat agreement when there was a very definite price advantage under the agreement, those agreements have been standby rules for the sale of wheat. In general the buying and selling of wheat has taken place without the wheat agreements having any particular effect.

This agreement is perhaps the best effort that could be made by all of the nations collectively in the light of the current wheat situation. The Canadian government has had the support of farm organizations in its effort to bring about such an agreement. In fact it had some of the leading members of the agricultural organizations of this country actively participate in bringing about the formulation of this agreement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Warren was one of them, was he not, or Mr. Wesson?

Mr. Argue: Is he from your part of the country?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, he is a westerner.

Mr. Argue: Mr. J. H. Wesson, president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, was one of the leading members on the Canadian side. Mr. Alf. Gleave, president of the Saskatchewan farmers' union, was also in attendance. There were undoubtedly others equally eminent whose names escape me for the moment.

Mr. Benidickson: I thought a list of them should be put on the record later.

Mr. Argue: Having said that this is probably the best arrangement that could be made under existing circumstances, one should recognize the fact that this agreement in no way assures the solution of this extremely difficult problem. I have listened in this house over the years to many speeches by ministers of trade and commerce, in which the minister of the day has presented the argument of the government in favour of the particular policy that was being followed at that time. The optimism for which Right Hon. C. D. Howe was so well known in the house has been carried into the speeches of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce.

We have had from the minister this morning a survey of this agreement. While one can discover from the statement he has made that he realizes that this agreement is not likely to meet the total situation as it exists, nevertheless the language the minister used emphasizes, this agreement, I believe, beyond its likely real value. By that I mean that the present minister is taking this same optimistic approach. I am wondering whether the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, when it comes to a discussion of the grain situation, has not perhaps the same ghost writer or ghost writers who used to prepare the extremely optimistic statements that were once prepared for his predecessor.

Mr. Churchill: No; they are new ones.

Mr. Argue: The minister says they are new ghost writers, but one undoubtedly is following in the footsteps of the other. He probably has been checking the files and has put into the hands of the minister, by the minister's own admission, the statement which was made this morning and which I think is so optimistic as in fact to give rise to a misleading conclusion, and which in fact would mislead people who do not understand this situation.

The minister has spoken of this agreements as being broader in concept, scope and content, and as an enlarged framework, and has said many optimistic things about the agreement. Mr. Speaker, I should like to hear from the minister at some time a frank statement on the extremely difficult situation in wheat that today faces Canada and the world. That is not in this statement made this morning. In this agreement there is not an adequate guarantee that these difficulties will in fact be met.

This agreement continues the trend of lower wheat prices. There is a reduction in the ceiling price from $2 a bushel to $1.90 a bushel. That is not likely to be a real factor within the life of this agreement, as I see it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Unless there were big failures.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member for Essex East says "unless there were big failures".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I mean crop failures.

Mr. Argue: Crop failures, of course. I do not think in the major wheat producing countries of the world you are likely to get a series of crop failures that would so affect the world situation as to bring about a shortage of wheat.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Argue: Another factor of this agreement is the continuation of the floor price at $1.50 a bushel, basis No. 1 northern, Fort William. We would have been happier if, along with a reduction in the ceiling price, there had been some increase in the floor price that would have brought that price to $1.60 a bushel. The selling price at Fort William today is $1.67 a bushel, which means that the price in recent years has been above $1.60. But any reduction in present wheat prices to the floor price set out in this international wheat agreement that we are approving this morning would spell disaster to the wheat producers of this country.

That would mean a net reduction in the present price of wheat of about 17 cents a bushel. In general that would wipe out the interim and final payments to wheat producers as we have known them. So if the price should go to the floor contained in the agreement, of $1.50 a bushel, the agreement would spell disaster to the wheat producers of this country.

Another factor in this agreement which reduces its value is the fact that there are no fixed quantities that countries agree to purchase; there are merely percentages. It is valuable that countries agree to do even that, but it would have been a much more adequate guarantee if the percentages could have been related to actual quantities of wheat so the producing countries in the world and the grain producers would have some idea of just what is involved.

Then there are important importing countries which are allowed by this agreement to purchase large quantities outside of the agreement itself. The Federal Republic of Germany, which has become Canada's second best customer for wheat in recent years, agrees to purchase 70 per cent of its requirements. In other words 30 per cent of the purchases of the Federal Republic of Germany can be made, under this agreement, outside of the agreement. That is what is set forth here. Another country, Japan, which has been an exceedingly important customer of Canada—a customer that recently, at any rate, has been growing in importance—is allowed under this agreement to purchase 50 per cent of its wheat from countries other than the exporting countries listed in this agreement. That is therefore another feature which shows that there are large quantities which can be purchased and sold outside of the agreement.

Then, of course, another thing that bears on the wheat situation as it now exists is the larger number of exporting countries that are brought under this agreement. It used to be considered that there were four exporting countries, the Argentine, Australia, Canada and the United States. To those countries from time to time have been added other countries. France is now a large exporter of wheat. We have had such other countries added to this agreement as Italy, Mexico and Spain. Countries which have not been large importers of wheat in the past but who still have imported wheat from time to time are now becoming exporting nations. This is another indication that the wheat situation is rather disturbing from the standpoint of the agricultural producers of this country.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Has my hon. friend the figures for world surplus?

Mr. Argue: Our minds must think alike; I have them in my hand and it was the next thing I was coming to. These figures are contained in the most recent issue of The Wheat Review for May, 1959, and here is the paragraph dealing with world surplus:

> Latest available estimates indicate that supplies of wheat remaining on or about May 1, 1959 in the four major exporting countries for export and for carryover at the end of their respective crop years amounted to 2,207.7 million bushels, representing an increase of 22 per cent over the 1,815.5 million available a year ago. Supplies at May 1, 1959 in millions of bushels were held as follows: . . . United States, 1,373.7; Canada, 609.2; Argentina, 99.4; Australia, 125.4.

These are large and growing surpluses. There is an indication also that the U.S.S.R. is becoming a very important factor in the wheat situation. I have in my hand the Alberta Wheat Pool Budget of June 26, and it has this to say about the wheat production in Russia:

> Reports from Russia indicate that country may harvest another tremendous wheat crop this year. Last year Russia produced a wheat crop claimed to be in excess of 2,300 million bushels, compared to the United States' all time record harvest of 1,450 million bushels. Another 2 billion bushel Russian crop could result in a substantial wheat surplus for export and create further wheat trading problems for Canada.

And, I might add, for the world.

> The possibility of Russia entering the world wheat market on a large scale was a matter of some considerable concern at the international wheat agreement negotiations at Geneva last winter where the fear was expressed that Russia might decide to use wheat as an economic weapon in the world cold war. With the United States already distributing wheat in every manner possible, Canada's trading position would be greatly aggravated should Russia take such action.
> This spring a total of 112.5 million acres were reported to have been sown to spring wheat in Russia. This compares with a total U.S. winter and spring wheat acreage of about 55 million and the Canadian acreage of only 22 million. About two-thirds of the Russian wheat crop is sown in the spring.

When the Canadian wheat board officials were before the agriculture committee they recognized that the Soviet union today stands as a very important potential competitor in the wheat markets of the world, and a country that in recent months has played a more active part in wheat exports.

For Canada there are indications that the grain situation is becoming more difficult. The Minister of Trade and Commerce seems to disagree with me every time I point out the difficulties that Canada is facing in the export field, and the difficulty Canada is facing in obtaining markets. The minister takes the same generally optimistic view which was taken by his predecessor, but I say to him that the wheat situation in Canada is not only serious at the present time but that the outlook for wheat sales in the days ahead is difficult.

This agreement provides for an annual review of the surplus disposal policies which are being followed by other countries in the world. It would have been much better, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, if under this agreement there had been provision for an immediate survey of any transactions concerning the disposal of world surpluses in an extraordinary manner which interfered with normal sales. This is a case of closing the barn door after the horse is missing. After this situation has gone on for a year, then a review is made of the difficulties that have obtained. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this part of the agreement is so worded as to allow—I would not say condone but certainly to allow—these extraordinary features of the United States disposal program, for example, to be continued.

Paragraph (c) of article 21 reads as follows:

> To assist in its review of surplus disposal, exporting and importing countries shall inform the council of the measures taken by them to secure compliance with the following principles: that the solution to the problems involved in the disposal of surpluses of wheat should be sought—

Here are the important words:

> —wherever possible through efforts to increase consumption.

"Wherever possible" means that if it happens to increase consumption—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Argue: Before one o'clock I had been pointing out that welcome as the international wheat agreement is to this house and to the country, it does not guarantee that producers will have either adequate wheat markets or adequate prices. Undoubtedly it is a factor which tends to stabilize a state of affairs which is causing wheat producers great concern, but there is another body engaged in the wheat business which I think is probably a greater stabilizing factor than even this international agreement which we have under consideration.

I think beyond question the Canadian wheat board in recent years has demonstrated that it is a major stabilizing influence in the world situation. Not only is Canada a major exporting country—indeed, the second most important exporting country in the world, giving way only to the United States in first place—but we have exerted and we are exerting through the Canadian wheat board an important stabilizing influence on world wheat prices. I am certain that if it were not for the Canadian wheat board, wheat prices in Canada and in the world would collapse immediately to the floor under the wheat agreement and then, without the wheat agreement, would fall even lower. The Canadian wheat board has followed sound pricing practices in the light of all the factors in world trade, and the United States, Australia, and even the U.S.S.R. have to a very large extent followed the lead given by the Canadian wheat board in its pricing policy. The wheat board has been a major asset to the wheat producers of this country in very difficult circumstances, and continues to be so.

There are those who say, when we have a wheat problem—and I read an editorial to this effect in the Globe and Mail the other day—why do the producers of wheat not diversify their efforts? The fact is that with the possible exception of beef production, the wheat producers have diversified in every possible way, even to the extent of endangering other markets and the prices of other commodities. When there has been a surplus of wheat farmers have gone into the production of barley, feed barley and malting barley, until they are told by the Canadian wheat board that it is difficult to sell Canadian barley.

To show what a loose interpretation the United States gives to its marketing policy, I remind the committee that they say they are prepared under public law 480 to promote the sales of their commodities as long as they do not interfere with normal sales. But though the sale of Canadian barley to the United Kingdom has been going on for a long time, and though this is an important Canadian market, the Americans are pushing into that market because they say that Canadian sales to the United Kingdom today are running as high as they were a year ago. In other words the United States feels free to get into our market in the United Kingdom.

Farmers have diversified their crops and produced barley as far as possible. They have developed the production of flax until flax prices are relatively poor at about $2.80 a bushel. Producers of bread grains have developed the production of Durum wheat, and everybody in the trade today urges the farmers not to produce more Durum wheat because there is greater danger of a declining market at present for that product than there is for normal grain.

I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the government will give consideration to adopting more aggressive policies for the sale of wheat than those which have been followed heretofore. Canada itself will be obliged to enter the field of specialized sales if the export market is to be maintained, and I suggest to the government that they should be prepared to accept the local currency of nations which need our wheat but are unable to buy it because of shortage of dollars. In addition, we should be prepared to enter into barter deals for the exchange of wheat for the goods which other countries may have and which we could use.

I know the minister is going to hold up his hands in horror, but the United States is following these policies with great success and to our detriment, and unless Canada follows similar policies we shall be pushed even further out of international markets.

A third suggestion I wish to make is that in addition to being prepared to sell Canadian wheat on the basis of long term contracts, Canada should be prepared to purchase goods for import on similar long term contracts; there should be reciprocal long term contracts for the sale of goods. When there are discussions on the continuation or enlargement of the Polish market for Canadian wheat or of the U.S.S.R. market which we have developed in recent years, the answer always comes back that they would buy more Canadian wheat if Canadians would import from them and buy more of the goods they have to sell.

We feel that as time goes by these further policies must be developed. There is an obvious trend in policies with regard to the sale of wheat. As time goes on wheat is being more and more removed from the private trader, taken out of the hands of the speculators and being sold through government boards and agencies and under collective international agreements. We welcome this trend and hope the government will pursue these policies that time will show are essential if Canada is to maintain wheat exports.

I want to end on a note of caution. Unless these things are done the Canadian export market for wheat will be in danger. After hearing the evidence of the Canadian wheat board there is no question in my mind but that the board is very much concerned with growing competition from additional countries entering the export markets, and with the potential danger of widespread competition from the Soviet union. It remains for the Canadian government to do everything possible to restore and improve Canadian export markets for wheat.

We welcome this agreement. We know it is not flawless, but we feel it is better than no agreement at all.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, at this stage in the session I know that no one desires any repetition, and it is not my intention to indulge in that at all. The position of this party was extremely well stated this morning by the hon. member for Essex East. The hon. member for Assiniboia made some reference to the former minister of trade and commerce, and described him as an exceedingly optimistic man. I am not going to assume the right to make any definition of his characteristics. I think most of us know that he was a great realist and a great developer, and that this country would be much poorer if he had not been the courageous realist and developer he was. When the hon. member for Assiniboia described him as an optimist—which I think a good Canadian should be—I felt he did it in the context of an international wheat agreement. The hon. member indicated that even the present minister was practically repeating the type of explanation of advantages that might be obtained from an international wheat agreement that would have been given in former days by the minister's predecessor, Right Hon. C. D. Howe.

The hon. member for Assiniboia was in the house when the resolution ratifying the previous agreement came before parliament. Either he has forgotten the circumstances or he chose to be unfair to the then minister of trade and commerce, because certainly Mr. Howe was a realist with respect to the possibilities of the international wheat agreement. Without repetition I simply want in the context of this debate to place on record the views expressed by the minister of trade and commerce of 1956, Mr. Howe, when he introduced a resolution such as the present minister introduced today. At page 7067 of Hansard of August 6, 1956, Mr. Howe is reported to have said:

> We must remember that no one is obliged to purchase wheat under the international wheat agreement unless we offer wheat at the minimum, which last year would have meant offering No. 1 northern wheat at $1.55 per bushel and this year would mean offering No. 1 northern wheat at $1.50 per bushel. Well, I would not like to be pressed into the necessity of offering wheat at those prices with any belief that the member countries of the wheat agreement would take up the wheat. There are physical difficulties of storage in the way, among others; and therefore I have never been prepared to suggest that the wheat agreement is a guarantee of a minimum price. Perhaps it contributes to that end, but the guarantee simply is not there.

And again at page 7068 he is reported as having said:

> I wish we could dispose of the idea that the printing on a piece of paper determines whether Canada can or cannot sell wheat.

I think the hon. member for Assiniboia will remember that debate and realize that when he refers to Mr. Howe as an optimist—which most of us now recognize he is—his remarks would probably not be understood in the context of the debate on the international wheat agreement which we are having today.

Mr. Argue: May I briefly interrupt my hon. friend to say that I was referring to statements the former minister made in this house in answer to questions of mine, and to statements he made in other debates many times —almost every week—in which he was overly optimistic.

Mr. Benidickson: May I suggest to my hon. friend that my memory is as good as his, and I fail to remember many occasions when what my hon. friend calls the optimism of Mr. Howe was not recognized by all as being the realism which so characterized his conduct and attitudes.

The merits of the international wheat agreement are generally agreed upon by all parties of the house. When this matter was presented in 1956 by the then government and the resolution was introduced by Mr. Howe, the present Prime Minister, who was then the chief agricultural critic of the Conservative party, indicated that he had views not very different from those of the mover of the resolution. At page 7055 of Hansard of August 6, 1956 the present Prime Minister said:

> It is of interest to note that in effect what has been done in respect of the amounts purchaseable under this agreement is the establishment of a floor price for wheat. That is an important matter and achieves in part, although to a limited extent as compared to previous agreements, something that the farmer in this country and I think generally throughout the world does desire, a stabilizing security and a floor price.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must advise the house that by speaking now the minister will close the debate.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I thought I might say a word or two in answer to the hon. members who have spoken, the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Assiniboia. I welcomed the explanation given by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. There is obviously general agreement with regard to the international wheat agreement. The comments made by my hon. friends have been objective and indicate a knowledge of the subject.

Their criticisms of the wheat agreement were valid in part. I have made no claim that this agreement is perfect, and I doubt that a claim of that nature has been made by any other participant in the agreement. I have never suggested that it would solve all our difficulties. My hon. friends have pointed out some of the things which perhaps are not settled by this present agreement.

The hon. member for Essex East raised several problems. He pointed out that this does not necesarily guarantee stability in wheat prices, but it goes quite a long distance toward so doing, just as any international commodity agreement does. He suggested that there would be no major increase through the participation of the United Kingdom in terms of purchases of Canadian wheat. That may be so. Britain is perhaps our most stable market for Canadian wheat, however, and I see no reason to worry about it.

The hon. gentleman drew attention to the increasing surpluses in world wheat supplies, with which subject I shall deal in just a moment. He noted that the Soviet union was not a signatory to the treaty, nor has it been to the others. He raised a question with regard to the European common market. I might say on this point that the countries of Europe which are in the common market, and also are members of the international wheat agreement, will not find that their arrangements under the common market will interfere with the arrangements they have made under the international wheat agreement. Therefore I do not think there is anything to worry about concerning the development of the common market in so far as the international trade in wheat is concerned. Those countries which have been international traders and international purchasers will continue to be so whether or not they are members of the common market.

Then my hon. friend had something to say with regard to the United States and suggested that article 21, subsection 4, went almost as far as to give approval to what might be called bad practices in world trading in wheat. The hon. member for Assiniboia, however, drew our attention to an earlier section of article 21, and I should like to read paragraph (c) of subsection 1 which he touched upon. It reads:

> To assist it—

That is the council.

> —in its review of surplus disposals, exporting and importing countries shall inform the council of the measures taken by them to secure compliance with the following principles: that the solutions to the problems involved in the disposal of surpluses of wheat should be sought, wherever possible, through efforts to increase consumption; that disposals should take place in an orderly manner; and that, where surpluses are disposed of under special terms, exporting and importing countries concerned should undertake that such arrangements will be made without harmful interference with normal patterns of production and international commercial trade.

He also stated that we should not exaggerate the value of this international wheat agreement. I hope I did not do that in the course of my remarks, but this is a continuation of three earlier agreements which have proved their usefulness in the trade in wheat. It is obvious, because of the number of countries which are participating in this agreement, that it has been of assistance in world trade. The experience of the past has been drawn upon, and this new international wheat agreement has gone a bit further than earlier ones. I do not wish to exaggerate its value, but it is very useful. As the hon. member for Assiniboia pointed out—and I think his phrase was rather good—this agreement gives us stand-by rules for the buying and selling of wheat.

I noted the remark of the hon. member for Assiniboia about my rigid optimism. I do not know whether or not I class myself as an optimist, but I think it is rather well to have what might be termed an optimistic approach to some of our Canadian problems rather than the opposite word, pessimistic. This was the only time in the course of my hon. friend's remarks when he deviated from what was a statesmanlike utterance, but he dealt for a little bit with this optimistic approach. My hon. friend is constantly warning us about disaster: he is sounding alarm; he is pointing out difficulties; he is purveying gloom; he uses adjectives like alarming, disturbing and drastic. I think he must be a very depressing type of person to live with.

Mr. Argue: I was just talking about you.

Mr. Churchill: I think it is wise now and again to look at the brighter side of life without becoming extravagant or careless in our use of words and phrases. I take an optimistic view, if you like to put it that way, with regard to conditions in Canada, and I am not depressed over the wheat situation. In fact it would be rather disturbing, I think, to our farm population if we here in the House of Commons were continually pointing out the grave difficulties that face us in the future, when we know from actual experience that some of the difficulties will be dissipated as time goes on.

Let me give you an example of that. Two years ago we had hanging over our heads here in Canada a surplus of wheat amounting to 730 million bushels. I well recall how pessimistic the outlook was two years ago on the part of some people in this country, but that surplus has now been whittled down to about 500 million bushels, which is quite an improvement. Two years ago perhaps we could not have foreseen that, but it was better to take the optimistic view than to be crying blue ruin.

Mr. Benidickson: Will the minister not agree that we must again, as I said earlier in my remarks, be realists? The over-all surplus of the exporting countries named in this agreement is perhaps larger than it was before.

Mr. Churchill: I quite agree that we have to be realistic in these things, and I hope I am being realistic. I shall speak in a moment about the world wheat surplus. I would just interpolate another word based on the remark of my hon. friend from Assiniboia about ghost writers. These are distinguished civil servants who prepare quite a bit of useful material. The only material they can be sure I will use without alteration are statements they prepare such as those for use in the House of Commons.

If the house will permit me, I should like to make mention of the fact that about a year ago I spoke to a group in New York and a distinguished member of the press gallery, Mr. Arthur Blakely, wrote a column along the line of what my hon. friend was saying; that this was a repetition of what had been said in the past and obviously I must be employing the same ghost writer who had written articles for Messrs. St. Laurent, C. D. Howe and Lester Pearson. Well, I wrote a note to Mr. Blakely and asked him to please not blame the officials of my department, because I had written every word of my speech myself and I regretted if I had simply been following along the lines that had been spoken by my predecessors. Well, so much for ghost writers.

May I say this with regard to the world surplus of wheat. We have to recognize the fact that wheat is grown in practically every country of the world. There is an increasing surplus of wheat being built up. Fortunately it is not of the same standard as the wheat grown in western Canada. A great part of it is softer wheat, which does not compete actively with the hard wheat which comes from our country; but there is an increased amount of wheat available throughout the world, and that creates problems with regard to international trade and brings up this problem of surplus disposal.

To deal with the subject of surplus disposal, this government actually, I think, made adequate protests to the United States with regard to this matter. At the same time we must recognize that they have taken cognizance of our protests and have modified their surplus disposal program of two or three years ago, and they are now operating under a method whereby consultation is carried on with our country on all occasions when the surplus disposal of wheat is being considered. This to our mind is a great gain, and we are thankful to the United States authorities for the attitude they are taking. Consequently I think we should modify our criticism of United States surplus disposal programs.

The surplus disposal programs of the United States, in many instances, have been directed to very worthy causes. Some of these disposal programs are aimed at the increased use of wheat flour by peoples in the world who have not heretofore been consumers of that type of food. As that program advances the prospects, then, for exporting nations such as the United States and ourselves are increased. We must also recognize the fact that we ourselves are engaged in the surplus disposal of wheat, and have been playing our part in providing wheat on long term loans or on a gift basis to India, Pakistan, Ceylon and the Palestinian refugees, and we intend to continue that program.

In so far as the surplus disposal program does not interfere with normal commercial marketings of wheat, we cannot have much objection. The United States, all credit to them, have not been interfering recently with our normal, commercial sales of wheat to the United Kingdom, countries of Europe, and Japan. With assurance along that line, we cannot object to their providing wheat flour to countries that are really in need of food.

The hon. member for Assiniboia quite properly paid tribute to the stabilizing influence of the Canadian wheat board. He mentioned the fact that Canada was now the second greatest exporter of wheat. We actually are first in the field when it comes to commercial sales of wheat abroad. The United States has emerged as the largest exporter of wheat, but is still second to us on commercial sales. Our commercial sales abroad run to an average of 262 million bushels a year to their 160 million bushels a year. The excess which they export over our export figure of about 300 million bushels is made up by these programs for surplus disposal and gifts to needy countries. The activity of the Canadian wheat board in stabilizing the price of wheat throughout the world is recognized, and I am glad the hon. member for Assiniboia drew attention to that fact.

He made suggestions with regard to the barter of our wheat for goods from other countries. We recognize that this has been done by some countries, but we are not a state trader and it is difficult to barter products of this country for products from some other country unless we enter the field of state trading. This would apply also to his suggestion about long term contracts to purchase goods from Poland or from the U.S.S.R. in exchange for purchases they make from us. There again state trading would have to be entered into if that were to be done.

May I conclude, Mr. Speaker, with this. As I have said on occasions, Canada's position in the international wheat field would not be as important as it is today, and cannot be maintained in the future, unless the quality and standard of Canadian wheat is maintained. Fortunately for us our country produces a hard, good grade milling wheat of high protein value which is a premium wheat in the world market and is desired by millers in countries abroad. My consultations with the importers of wheat in the United Kingdom and Europe, and my talks with Japanese millers who have visited this country, confirm our conclusion that Canadian wheat is a premium wheat, superior in quality to the soft wheats which are grown in most other countries of the world. A market for Canadian wheat should be maintained without any diminution of our sales abroad if that quality is maintained.

The emphasis, then, in Canada should be on maintaining quality. It is because of this that a person can take a reasonably optimistic view of the future, and can assure the Canadian farmer that there is a market abroad for Canadian wheat. That market abroad is being maintained by close personal relations between the Canadian wheat board and the countries abroad; by government activity and consultation with the governments of other countries who are importers of our wheat, and by our participation in the international wheat agreement and various international conferences where these matters are discussed. The outlook for the future is not too gloomy, not too difficult. We have to maintain a realistic approach; and a little trace of optimism in that, I think, is all to the good.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. C-48, to amend the Income Tax Act.

He said: As recorded in the Votes and Proceedings of the house for June 18, at page 579, a message was received that day from the Senate informing this house that the Senate had passed Bill No. C-48, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, with the following amendments:

1. Page 11, line 16:—After "or" insert "charter-party".
2. Page 11:—Strike out clause 19.

There are these two amendments which have been made by the Senate. As to the first, Mr. Speaker, may I comment that it is simply a drafting change and I believe alters, in no way at all the sense of the clause in question.

As to the second amendment, may I point out to the house that it has the effect of striking out clause 19 of the bill. Clause 19 amended section 71 of the Income Tax Act, which is the section of the act concerning foreign business corporations. There was some debate in this house on this clause of the bill, but I am sure I do not need to review now the questions that were raised at that time. The effect of the amendment by the Senate has been to strike this clause out of the bill. I regret that it has done so, for I think there was merit in clause 19 of the bill. However, it must be conceded at once that clause 19 was not a provision of leading importance in the bill; it certainly was not a clause particularly directed to affecting the revenues of the treasury.

Mr. Benidickson: Did my hon. friend say "particularly affecting the revenues"?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. It would have had some effect, but probably a very slight effect indeed, upon the revenues. Had it been otherwise the government could not have accepted this amendment by the Senate, having regard to the provisions of the standing orders of this house, particularly Nos. 63 and 64, and the long cherished rights and privileges of this house.

I wish to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that the government does not concede any right or power on the part of the Senate to amend money bills. Had this been a more serious matter, or had this amendment related to something affecting the revenues, I would have considered it my duty to challenge any infraction of the privileges and rights of this house thereby created.

In a word, Mr. Speaker, the position is the same as that which confronted this house on September 15, 1917 on a Senate amendment to the income war tax act at that time, and again on June 11, 1941 on a Senate amendment to a bill to amend the special war revenue act. I propose to follow the same course that was pursued by my predecessor, Sir Thomas White, with the concurrence of Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the first occasion I have mentioned, and by my predecessor Mr. Ilsley on the second occasion. Having regard to the circumstances I have already mentioned and to the advanced stage of the present session, now in its final week, I move:

That the said amendments be now read the second time and concurred in; but that this house, while disapproving of any infraction of its privileges or rights by the other house, in this case waives its claims to insist upon such rights and privileges, but the waiver of said rights and privileges is not to be drawn into a precedent.

And that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours therewith.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McGee): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): The house will recall, Mr. Speaker, that this slight controversy with the other place with respect to the important section amended relates to a matter that we on this side of the house drew to the attention of the Minister of Finance when his resolutions were advanced. I was one of those who on May 4, when the resolutions were before the house, indicated that I was in good company in that I found taxation experts across the country described the proposed amendment as an enigma. They, like myself, from their experience could find no real, concrete example to justify the amendment. Like myself, they thought the law existing at this time had, throughout its history in broad and important lines, been to the advantage of the economy of this country.

At that time I gave some illustrations. We were, of course, aware of the most prominent foreign business corporation, namely Brazilian Traction Company. In the debate it was indicated that we well knew that this company had a fairly substantial number of head office people in the city of Toronto. The company had been organized in Canada. It had respect and regard for Canadian interests as a result of their background. I indicated that I remembered that this corporation, for instance, had been an applicant for export credit insurance with respect to substantial purchases that were made from Canadian manufacturers for use in the foreign country in which the actual operation took place.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will my hon. friend not agree that that company would not have been affected at all by this measure?

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, quite so. But the point we were trying to make at that time was to obtain from the minister concrete examples of deleterious effects to Canada as a whole that were resulting from the existing law. The minister did give a couple of examples. Again, out of consideration for the house, I am not going to repeat them; I am simply going to give the reference. The minister gave two references after a great deal of pressure from our side. He was prepared to keep them a secret and just indicate that in his opinion and that of the officials, this was a desirable amendment, and that we should simply take his word for it. But at page 3305 of Hansard of May 4 the minister did give some illustrations of possible tax evasion or the possible setting up of a tax haven that would result under existing section 7 (1) of the Income Tax Act.

Again it is a matter of public record—and I am not going to take the time of the house to repeat some of the evidence—that in the other place they did have a discussion of this matter in the Senate banking and commerce committee. That is a procedure that was not followed here. I admitted that it is not too usual on budget bills to examine the tax officials in a Commons committee. However, in the other place they did have a thorough examination of the resolutions, and they examined officials of the national revenue department and officials of the minister's Department of Finance. Then by quite a substantial vote they decided that in their opinion they had not been presented with evidence indicating that the proposal was likely to be advantageous to Canada but that, on the contrary, it would be better for Canada to have the present law continued.

The minister, of course, told this house in May that in the meantime he was proposing to examine carefully into all the ramifications of this particular law. I want to indicate that as I read the evidence in the Senate committee, the discussions, the debates and so on in the other place, it would appear to me that the examples given by the minister at page 3305 of our Hansard, to which I referred, did not stand up as examples that should worry us unduly with regard to any tax loss for Canada.

The minister referred to the question of whether or not the Senate should, under our rules, have authority to amend what is called in common language a money bill. The minister also made reference to the precedent of 1917, but his conclusion is rather different from mine. I understand that in 1917 the then leader of the opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, did not, as the minister has indicated, concur in the proposal. My information is—and I have had a very brief opportunity to look at the precedents—that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then leader of the opposition, resisted the motion. I have here a quotation from his remarks at that time, to this effect:

> —this house alone has the privilege of dealing with money bills. The only right the Senate has is that of rejecting or assenting to such money bills.

The minister has indicated to us that the effect on the revenues by this amendment is inconsequential. He has decided in view of that fact not to regard this as a precedent, but on the contrary simply to accept it reluctantly without it being binding in future.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend will permit me to say so, I think he will find that while Sir Wilfrid took that firm position, as did the minister of finance and the Speaker at that time, in the final analysis it was thought that having regard to the advanced stage of the session, the house would not press the matter to a conclusion but would accept the amendments, and stated its waiver in terms similar to those of my motion today. But Sir Wilfrid did concur at the final stage.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, we are in rather an amusing position in that in both the resolution of 1917 and that of 1921 the words of the motion of the House of Commons were in these terms:

> The waiver of the said rights and privileges is not to be drawn into a precedent.

My hon. friend today, of course, sort of adds precedent to precedent, and I hope he will have some further explanation to make.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Ilsley did the same thing.

Mr. Benidickson: That was the second precedent, but precedents build on each other and get increased strength from repetition. The important thing I would like to bring to the minister's attention is this. I would like to hear his reply to the evidence of public availability, the evidence before the banking and commerce committee of the Senate, and the debate after that committee reported to the Senate on June 16 and 17, I think it was, in which I felt that the other place had completely destroyed the examples which were given to this house by the Minister of Finance on May 4 as possibilities of tax avoidance deleterious to the interests of Canada. I would hope that the minister would give some reply to the evidence, which I have no doubt he has read, given in the other place.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I am not—

Mr. Speaker: May I say, before the hon. member begins, that I would like to deal with a question of order which arises on this motion, and I think it might be more convenient to deal with it before the minister replies.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to deal in any way with the merits of the action that has been taken by the Senate. The responsible minister, the Minister of Finance, acting for the government is prepared this time to accept these amendments but to declare that by our acceptance the House of Commons in no way waives its rights and privileges.

I do not think we can emphasize too strongly that with regard to money bills it should be the sole right of the House of Commons not only to originate them but in fact to have them passed in their original form. It is impossible under the British North America Act for the Senate to initiate money bills. If it is assumed that the Senate has the right to amend money bills, then they can use the right to amend money bills to circumvent the rule that they cannot initiate money bills. Such a bill as this could be amended in so many ways and to such major extent as to make the new bill beyond recognition, and in fact then give to the Senate a power that it does not have.

I wish the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River had made a forthright statement as far as the rights of parliament and the rights of the House of Commons are concerned, rather than going into substantial detail on the merits of what the Senate is doing. I would think if the Senate continues in future this very regrettable practice, we in the House of Commons should consider how the Canadian constitution can be appropriately amended to make certain that money bills are not only the prerogative of the House of Commons to introduce, but that this right shall not be usurped by the Senate through major amendments.

I think, particularly in the context of the political make-up of the Senate at this time, a forthright statement by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River would have been even more significant. It is regrettable to me that the great Liberal party, once a party of reform, once a party of small "l" liberalism, has now become a party of the right, a party that defends the status quo, a party that has failed in this instance to assert beyond question the rights of the Canadian House of Commons with regard to money matters. I say that such a statement should be made by the Leader of the Opposition, particularly when one considers the division of party affiliation in the other place.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the Prime Minister going to speak to the point of order which arises or on the substance of the motion?

Mr. Diefenbaker: On the substance of the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Then perhaps it would be more convenient if he proceeded now. I thought I should indicate the point of order which seems to me to arise on this amendment, at some stage before the matter is dealt with.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then may I defer my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: Briefly it is this. Although the point is broadly, I suppose, a constitutional issue and it is not my function to decide constitutional issues, we do have a standing order of the house which creates a problem to which I would like to draw the attention of hon. members at this time. The standing order in question is No. 63. The house has declared its position with respect to the alteration of money bills by the other place in standing order 63, and I consider that I am bound by that standing order and that the house is bound by it unless it is prepared to suspend the rule. Standing order 63 says:

> All aids and supplies granted to Her Majesty by the parliament of Canada, are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the house, as it is the undoubted right of the house to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants—

These are the significant words.

> —which are not alterable by the Senate.

So as the House of Commons we have adopted standing order 63 in which we declare that bills to grant aids and supplies, in other words money bills of this kind, not only must originate in this house but are not alterable by the Senate.

We have before us now an alteration of such a bill which the Senate has made and sent back to us for consideration. I intervene in this way because of citation 104 in Beauchesne's fourth edition in which it is stated:

> It is the function of the Speaker to direct the attention of the house when an occasion arises to a breach of its privileges in bills or amendments brought from the Senate, and to direct the special entries to be made in the Journals by which the house, in respect of particular amendments, signifies its willingness to waive its privileges without thereby establishing a general precedent.

The matter has been raised by both of the hon. members who have spoken, but it seems to me to involve more than a question of agreement. It involves a question of the privileges of the house which have been enshrined in a rule—standing order 63—and if the house in its wisdom feels that the circumstances are such that it should waive its asserted privileges in this particular case, by doing so it in effect suspends rule 63. Therefore the view which I take is that unless the amendment properly suspends rule 63 it would require the unanimous consent of the house at this time to pass the amendment which is proposed.

In other words, the amendment would not only do what it purports to do, that is, to accept the alterations by the Senate, but it would also, in effect, suspend rule 63 for the purpose of doing so. That is the problem that I wish to present to the minister for consideration.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not wish to reiterate what has already been said by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), except to say it has always been very clear as a matter of constitutional practice that the other place shall not interfere with supply, that money bills shall not originate in that body or be amended by that body. That principle is asserted in the motion made by the Minister of Finance today, and the waiver is apparent in the words which are used in the motion:

> That the said amendments be now read the second time and concurred in; but that this house, while disapproving of any infraction of its privileges or rights by the other house, in this case waives its claims to insist upon such rights and privileges, but the waiver of said rights and privileges is not to be drawn into a precedent.

I think the wording of the motion actually has the effect which Your Honour had in mind when you pointed out the situation resulting from the effect of section 63 of the rules. Throughout the years this has been the means whereby this particular rule or section has been waived on the part of the House of Commons.

There are a number of examples—not very many—in which a similar course has been followed. Mention was made a moment ago of the case in 1917, the ruling of the Speaker, resuming an adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Thomas White for the concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 117, an act to authorize the levying of a war tax upon certain incomes as reported on September 15 of that year. It was resumed from Friday, September 7, on which date Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the clearest and most unequivocal language pointed out that this right of the House of Commons should not be in any way circumvented by the other place. The Speaker then made a ruling which, with the leave of the house, I am going to read:

> On a previous occasion when this motion was under consideration, two points of order were taken by the hon. the leader of the opposition, (1) that the Senate has no power to amend a money bill, and, (2) if the Senate makes such an amendment, in view of rule 78, the house is bound to insist on its privileges and reject the amendment.
> As to the first point, it is beyond question that, in view of section 53 of the British North America Act, bills appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax or impost must originate in the House of Commons; and there is no doubt that the Senate has neither power to increase the tax or impost nor to change the incidence of the burden of any such tax or impost in any such bill originating in this house; but the question whether the Senate can make such amendments as have been made in the bill now under consideration is a point of constitutional law in respect to which it would I think be improper for me to undertake to give an official decision. Matters of such high constitutional import are for the house and not for your speaker to determine.

In that connection, may I say that the declaration there represents the constitutional position. I will continue to read from this ruling:

> With respect to the second point, viz., that rule 78 prevents the house from entertaining the present motion, while this rule is an affirmation of what this house considers its powers and prerogatives, there is nothing contained in it or any of our rules which prevents this house from adopting as its own, amendments such as this now under consideration.

I point that out to you, sir, because I think it answers the point of order which you have drawn to the attention of the house. Continuing the quotation:

> In the year 1874, amendments of the Senate to a bill originating in this house were concurred in with the reservation that such action was not to be construed as a waiver of its rules and privileges. While the action of this house in the year 1874 was with respect to a bill dealing with dominion lands, and the present bill deals with taxation, in my judgment the principle involved as to the authority of this house to waive under stated conditions its rights and privileges is the same.

I think, sir, with great respect, that this covers the particular matter that you directed to the attention of the house.

Mr. Benidickson: Could I ask the Prime Minister a question? He did not argue specifically on the point that perhaps, as suggested by the Speaker, this would require unanimous consent.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going into that at the moment. The question of unanimous consent was another portion of the suggested argument advanced by the Speaker. I was dealing, first, with the question as to whether or not there could now be a waiver by the means adopted in the motion put forward by the Minister of Finance. And then the Speaker, in 1917, went on to say:

> After careful consideration, I am of the opinion that the motion of the Minister of Finance is in order, but should it be accepted by this house I shall give directions to the clerk to make a special entry in the Journals of the house to the effect that this house, while disapproving of any infraction of its privileges or rights by the other house, in this case waives its claims to insist upon such rights and privileges, but that the waiver of the said rights and privileges in this case is not to be drawn into a precedent.

I point out, sir, that the wording is much the same in the motion put forward by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. At this point, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> I have nothing to say as to your ruling, sir, but I would suggest that, instead of the caveat proceeding from the Chair, it should be part of the motion itself.

Mr. Speaker: With the respect to the point raised by the right hon. member, there is no objection, so far as I am concerned. I may say that I am guided in taking the action I have taken by similar action on the part of the Speaker of the British House of Commons in respect to an analogous case some ten years ago.

Mr. Murphy: Does the precedent to which Your Honour has just referred also extend to the entry which you purpose to have made in the Journals of the house, as emanating from the Speaker rather than from the house?

Mr. Speaker: I have used the exact language of the Speaker of the British House of Commons, except that I have added a line taken from the entry made in the Journals of this house in 1874.

Generally, as to the right of the house to waive its unchallengeable right on the part of the House of Commons not to have its money bills or legislation changed or altered in the other place, it is very clear that that right exists and that it can in particular cases be waived.

I believe the latest example can be found in 1947 and I particularly recall an example that occurred on June 11, 1941. On that occasion there had been a similar action taken by the other place in respect of a money bill. This is reported in the Journals of the house for 1941 at page 491 in these words:

Mr. Ilsley then moved,—That the said amendment be now read the second time and concurred in; but that this house, while disapproving of any infraction of its privileges or rights by the other house, in this case waives its claims to insist upon such rights and privileges but the waiver of said rights and privileges is not to be drawn into a precedent; and, further, that this house agrees to the incorporation in this bill of Bill No. 101, an act to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

The question was asked by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) as to whether or not it would require unanimous consent on the part of the house. Without going into that question directly, I think perhaps that as a whole, while strongly asserting the right of this house to be the sole emanation for legislation connected with finance, taxation and the like—and I hope that will be the view of this house—in view of the motion of the Minister of Finance the house will give unanimous consent to that motion. The house will thereby assert in the clearest and most unequivocal language the undoubted constitutional right of this house, so that there can be no doubt that in allowing an amendment in this particular case there shall be no suggestion of precedent established and no future basis for the assertion in the other place of its right to continue this course.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that a very important constitutional principle is involved in this matter. I am sure we all feel that we have a duty to ensure that the rights and privileges of this house are not violated, circumscribed or abridged by any action which we might be taking arising out of action taken in the other place. The rights and privileges of the House of Commons are well known in this matter and the limitations on the action of the other house in respect of those rights and privileges are also well known.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has just said that we must make perfectly certain that our rights are clearly expressed in any action we may take and that nothing that could constitute a precedent should be established, but in order to justify the action we might desire to take this afternoon reference has been made to action taken previously which was taken at that time on the understanding that it would not be a precedent. So action does become a precedent when you refer to it to justify action which you may take but which you do not wish to be taken as a precedent. That is the difficulty we are in, as I see it.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) said a few moments ago, I believe, that the government accepted this course reluctantly. If the government's reluctance was due to the substance of the amendment in question, it seems to me all the more surprising that the government would take this particular course. If the government's reluctance is due to misunderstandings which may be created in the future because of the procedure we are following and because of the possible effect of that procedure on the rights and privileges of this house, then it seems surprising to me that having this reluctance the government would pursue this particular course.

Why should we run the risk—even if it is only a risk—of waiving our rights in this matter as a House of Commons if some other course could be followed which would accomplish the same purpose, if it is the intention of the government to make this change in the legislation? Could the government not take its responsibility in this matter, if it so desires, and introduce an amendment to its own bill in its own right without referring to any amendment from any other place? Would that not be a possible course of action? Would that not be the best course to be followed? If that course could be taken, I can assure the government that we would certainly do everything we could to expedite the procedure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask my hon. friend this question. Is not the course that has been suggested by the Minister of Finance that which has been followed by successive governments since 1874 in particular cases?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance made it quite clear that this course has been followed twice previously. Perhaps that itself illustrates the danger into which we may be leading ourselves because on both those occasions it was understood that the course that was followed was not to be taken as a precedent. It is now being taken as a precedent and used to justify this course. On at least one of the occasions to which reference has been made —the amendment to the Special War Revenue Act of 1941—Mr. Ilsley, in part at least, justified the course he was taking, which was not to be taken as precedent, by saying that the amendment in question was scarcely a revenue amendment at all.

I take it from what the minister has said that there is no doubt on this score in the present instance. This is a revenue amendment and so the position is not even in substance exactly the same as in 1941 which has been advanced as a precedent.

Again I ask the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance what objection could be taken to the course I have suggested, that the government itself introduce on its own initiative and on its own responsibility an amendment for the purpose the government has in mind?

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking on the entire issue now before us. I believe this places a great responsibility on your shoulders. I rise to ask that the rights of parliament and the traditions of centuries be maintained through your voice and on your advice.

If what the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) said is correct, this House of Commons can make changes by unanimous vote or agreement. But, Mr. Speaker, I want to say as emphatically as I can that although the house has the right by vote to make changes, you are as Speaker the embodiment of the rights of parliament and of the traditions of centuries.

There are two main traditions of centuries. One is that the monarch cannot enter the House of Commons; only the monarch's representative can do that by knocking on the door. But the second is that what is known in Great Britain as the House of Lords and as the other place in our country cannot interfere with the right of the House of Commons on taxation and on expenditures. Because this right has been broken in the past we are now asked once again to break it.

Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) was quite correct a few moments ago when he said that what was established once would not be a precedent, but again we are asked to do what, to break, not the precedent of 600 years that a monarch cannot enter here but that what is the other place, the House of Lords in the mother of parliaments, the United Kingdom, be given the right to break the precedent of the control of the House of Commons over taxation. I say to you, sir, with all sincerity as a traditionalist, as one who believes so much in democracy and in those who fought and died to lay down those principles, that if this is done you should make it obvious in this House of Commons that we shall not again break what has been established in the past and allowed to be broken in the past. If parliament and democracy mean anything, let us maintain the tradition and the power of this house. I am most amazed that the Prime Minister would be the one to suggest that we now do it again.

Mr. Speaker: I accept as obvious a good deal of what has been said in the course of the discussion of this rather serious matter involving the relationships of the houses of parliament and the privileges of this house. It is undoubtedly true that the house has done what is proposed now to do again and can do it again, provided it takes the proper course to do so. The precedents are, like this one, those which have arisen at the end of sessions when a money bill has been rejected by the other place and when perhaps the house was not disposed to enter too deeply into constitutional arguments; but if this motion is properly before the house it is for the house to decide whether it wishes to do again what it has done before and what it can do again.

This is the point that troubles me, and I have come to the conclusion that the motion which has been proposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), if it in effect amounts to a waiver of standing order 63, would require notice. That was why I said that because standing orders can be suspended only by an order of the house made on proper notice or by unanimous consent, that is why I suggested because no notice had been given that unanimous consent would be necessary before we could enter on a discussion of this motion and before this motion could be voted upon.

It may be that the house is prepared to have the matter dealt with in that way and I would say that perhaps that would be the way for the house to decide whether it wishes to follow this precedent again or whether it does not wish to follow it. It can decide that by voting. If the house allows this motion to come before it today by unanimous consent. If it will not allow this motion to come before it by unanimous consent today, then the government of course is free to give notice of this motion and bring it on in the usual way at a later time. I suggest then, with the permission of the house, that I ask now whether unanimous consent be given for the minister to introduce this motion today? I have in mind that it has the effect of suspending standing order 63. The house could then proceed with a discussion of the motion and to a vote on the motion when that discussion is concluded. Is the house prepared to give the minister unanimous consent to introduce this motion?

Mr. Pearson: No.

Mr. Winch: Are you, Mr. Speaker, prepared to advise the house on the powers of this house and whether or not you think this is proper?

Mr. Speaker: I have indicated that it is for parliament to decide what will be the disposition of this motion. My concern is rather a procedural one, the matter of bringing this motion before the house so that it can deal with it. If the government cannot do it today, it can do it again; therefore, it seemed to me that it might be the course of wisdom and economy of time to give the minister unanimous consent to have this motion brought before the house. Is the house prepared to give unanimous consent at this time to this motion being brought before the house for debate and to be voted on?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the constitutional implications of this matter and its importance, I think the government should take its responsibility and put a notice on the order paper and discuss it in due course. I am sure if the matter comes up for discussion there will not be any delay as far as we are concerned. Our views have already been made known in regard to the proposition itself.

Mr. Speaker: In the absence of that unanimous consent I have come to the conclusion—and I may say I appreciate that it may not be in accordance with the views of all members of the house—that this motion is not properly before the house now. Notice must be given on the order paper. I say that because of the practices which we have followed and which are set out in Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 10, and because of the view that I take that in effect this motion is a suspension of standing order 63. The citation reads:

> Standing orders may be suspended for a particular case without prejudice to their continued validity, for the house possesses the inherent power to destroy the self-imposed barriers and fetters of its own regulations. It may even pass an order prescribing a course of procedure inconsistent with the standing order. A motion for such temporary suspension requires notice under standing order 41, but in urgent cases the notice can be waived under standing order 42.

It seems to me that that is the thing to do; in the absence of waiver by the house the motion is not to be proceeded with.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Before you leave that matter, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that on previous occasions where this course was followed the point was not raised that unanimous consent was required. The same standing order, of course, has been in effect in this house for many years. But rather more specifically on the point than the citation which you read, if I may say so, is citation 281, the concluding portion of which reads:

> The question whether the Senate has power to amend a bill to impose taxation is a point of constitutional law in respect of which the Speaker must not give an official decision; but the house may adopt as its own the amendments made by the Senate and order that a protest be entered in the Journals.

Therefore, what the government has done is simply and completely in keeping with the course that has been followed on previous occasions where the issue was precisely the same. The point is that unanimous consent was not involved. The standing order to which reference has been made was in effect on those occasions, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: May I say that the minister has introduced a further consideration. I am not, in my view, making any constitutional decision. I am dealing simply with an order of the house, standing order 63, which it is my duty to enforce. The purport of that order is that a money bill is unalterable by the Senate and unless that order is suspended I do not see how I can permit alterations of a money bill by the Senate to be brought before the house for approval.

I take the view that if the rule is to be suspended, it must be suspended in accordance with our practice. It is purely a procedural matter, so far as I am concerned, and therefore if the house would give unanimous consent the matter could be dealt with, without notice, under standing order 42. However, in view of standing order 42, we cannot proceed with it without proper notice. Standing order 42 says:

> A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover, be made by unanimous consent of the house without notice having been given under standing order 41.

However, it still requires unanimity, and that apparently we do not have.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a question of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Speaker: Order; I think the matter is disposed of, unless some hon. member wishes to protest the ruling of the Chair. This concludes the matter for the time being.

FINANCE

MEASURE TO PROVIDE ADDITIONAL GRANTS TO NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-72, to provide for the payment of additional grants to the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Pearson: Is the minister going to say anything about this bill?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I think there is no occasion for me to make any statement on this motion for second reading. Yesterday I reviewed at some length the history of this matter in the debate on the resolution preceding the bill. I think that I cannot, at this point, usefully add anything to what I said yesterday. The bill, as I indicated in my remarks at the resolution stage, is brief in its operative clauses but contains important recitals.

The first recital refers to the terms of article 29 of the terms of union. The second recital refers to the appointment of the royal commission in accordance with the terms of article 29. The third refers to the report of the royal commission and its recommendations, and the fourth contains a statement of undoubted fact, namely that both the government of the province of Newfoundland and the government of Canada have recognized the great difficulties inherent in determining future payments on an equitable basis from the experience of one selected year. This is the great difficulty that confronted the royal commission and virtually defied its efforts to find a suitable basis of recommendation, in the light of the very difficult, vague and nebulous terms of article 29.

The next recital refers to the fact that since the report of the royal commission was made the government of Canada has proposed a comprehensive study of dominion-provincial fiscal relations in co-operation with the provinces and all—I underline that word "all"—of the provinces have agreed to participate therein.

Then, the next paragraph contains a recital which is of some considerable importance in the light of the requests made repeatedly by those who spoke for Newfoundland for a review, some future review, of the fiscal relations between Canada and Newfoundland in relation to this matter of grants. It reads—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question? Will the minister not concede that on several occasions the review that was asked for by Newfoundland was asked for on the basis of term 29 and no other basis?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I will not concede that for one minute, Mr. Speaker. I read extracts yesterday from the language used by Mr. Goldenberg, the counsel who represented Newfoundland before the royal commission, in which he stressed more than once the fact that Newfoundland was not asking the royal commission to recommend any payment for an indefinite period. He stressed repeatedly he was asking for a review. In discussion yesterday I referred also to the fact that Mr. Smallwood and those associated with him, asked last January, for future reviews. As I pointed out, in asking for successive reviews at periods—a period of eight years was mentioned—what was involved, in effect, was moving the yardsticks forward each time which could not, by any stretch of the imagination, be said to be a review in pursuance of the terms of article 29.

I think it is quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that if there had been any doubt in the minds of hon. members it must have been removed yesterday by the quotation from the language used by Mr. St. Laurent in this house in February, 1949 when he drew attention to the fact that all term 29 says is that eight years after union comes into effect the federal government shall appoint a royal commission to review and to recommend.

Mr. Pickersgill: A travesty.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As Mr. St. Laurent pointed out, that was all it did; it created no continuing obligation. It was left then for decision on the part of parliament as to what steps, if any, should be taken in the light of the recommendation which such a royal commission might choose to make.

Coming back now to this matter of the review, what is proposed by this government is that as from April 1, 1952 the comprehensive review of federal-provincial relations which has been agreed upon by all the provinces should embrace the fiscal relations between Canada and all the provinces, and that means between Canada and Newfoundland. Having regard to the history of this matter, to what has happened since union with Newfoundland in 1949, any special circumstances affecting Newfoundland in this matter of fiscal relations between the federal government and that province should be taken into account in the course of that comprehensive review. It is within that comprehensive review that the fiscal relations between Canada, on the one hand, and the province on the other, are going to be governed in the period following April 1, 1962.

I am not going to delay the house by repeating the point which I made yesterday. It seems to me to be one of fundamental importance in this matter that outside the constitutional subsidies which are payable to the provinces, including the province of Newfoundland, there is nothing contained in any binding statute—I put it yesterday, nothing in black and white—that governs the fiscal relations between the dominion, on the one hand, and the provinces or any of them on the other, after March 31, 1962. Therefore, in proposing a review which will take account of any special circumstances of Newfoundland in her financial position after March 31, 1962 we are, in my respectful submission, giving what was sought by Newfoundland on the occasions which I have mentioned.

It is indeed going beyond the terms of the article of union and it is in my submission to this house proceeding in a way that is an expression of the desire of all Canadians and of this Canadian parliament to be just and fair in its treatment of Newfoundlanders having regard to the warmth of welcome that Canada extended to Newfoundland when it became the tenth province in 1949. Therefore this present recital puts the parliament of Canada on record in a manner which is perhaps without direct precedent but it is put forward in this form to give assurance to all reasonable persons in Newfoundland that any special circumstances affecting the province of Newfoundland will be taken into account in determining the fiscal relations between Canada and Newfoundland after March 31, 1962.

The bill proposes that the treasury of this country be bound to pay to Newfoundland every cent that was recommended by the royal commission up to the 31st day of March, 1962.

Mr. Pickersgill: And then the constitution goes out the window.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is to be read along with this accompanying assurance to be found in this recital:

> Whereas in the course of such review any special circumstances relating to the financial position of the province of Newfoundland after the 31st day of March, 1962, would be taken into consideration;

Therefore if this house chooses to adopt this bill the house will be putting itself on record on those terms; and in my respectful submission, Mr. Speaker, nobody who approaches this matter in a reasonable light could expect the parliament of Canada to go further under the circumstances. The next recital proceeds as follows:

> Whereas pursuant to the recommendations made by the royal commission established in fulfilment of the obligation of the government of Canada under the said term 29, it is now desirable to enact a measure to provide for additional grants to the province of Newfoundland.

Then follow the operative provisions of the bill and provision is there made for payment to Newfoundland of all of the sums which were recommended by the royal commission up to the 31st day of March, 1962.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday something was made or, as perhaps I should more accurately say, something was attempted to be made in argument that the word "thereafter" appearing in the final paragraph of the report of the royal commission means forever and forever thereafter. In my respectful submission, Mr. Speaker, that is an interpretation which that language will not bear, even in the most strained interpretation. The fact is that the royal commission, faced with the strong argument from counsel for the province of Newfoundland urging review, would have proposed a review at a named date if they had felt that they had the power to do so. But unfortunately for that purpose, the terms in article 29, as drafted, whether those who were in the federal government in those days and the government of Newfoundland in those days were responsible for it, do not take into account all the difficulties or burdens that were cast upon the shoulders of a royal commission in asking that royal commission to project into the future, however far they might attempt to do so, recommendations of a financial nature based upon evidence of what had occurred up to that time.

I am perfectly satisfied that if those who drew article 29 had had the foresight to enlarge that term to include within the ambit of the reference to the royal commission the power to make a recommendation with regard to a future review, this royal commission would have followed that course. They would have named some particular period and said, "That is as far as we can see ahead and at that date we wish that there should be some further review". But article 29 did not make any such provision. The royal commission therefore felt itself circumscribed and therefore it used this word "thereafter" knowing perfectly well that the competent counsel for the province of Newfoundland had said to it in his submission, "These payments are not being asked for indefinitely" because they were dealing with a period which was expected to be of limited duration.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether he ever discussed this interpretation of their responsibilities with any members of this royal commission?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have refrained from doing so because I would not have considered it proper to do so.

Mr. Pearson: Why interpret then?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it is perfectly obvious to anyone who approaches this question with an open mind and with a desire to arrive at reasonable readings, reasonable interpretations and reasonable conclusions, instead of indulging in the kind of sophistry that was resorted to by some hon. members yesterday that they cannot make the word "thereafter"—

Mr. Pearson: What does it mean?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —by their contention, stretched and strained, to mean forever and forever.

Mr. Pearson: What does it mean?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It means for such a period as was within the contemplation of those who drew this reference and those who were speaking for Newfoundland when they said this was not for an indefinite period.

Mr. Pearson: What period was it? One year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That would be something having regard to the financial situation which is precisely the matter which the undertaking given yesterday and now inscribed in the recitals in this bill makes clear provision for. This is a sensible way of dealing with this matter; and having regard to the desire on the part of this government for good relations between Newfoundland and all parts of this country, what we are doing here is not only sensible and reasonable but it is also the way which, in the long run, will most effectively contribute to establishing a sense of fairness in the dealings between Canada and the province of Newfoundland.

This is not a matter that should be prejudged now in the way in which some hon. members for Newfoundland constituencies sought to judge it yesterday.

I remind them that this article 29 has been quite obviously oversold. It has been subjected to interpretations which that term never could have borne in the minds of those who are prepared to read it carefully and interpret it properly. If those words used by Mr. St. Laurent—

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I just finish? If those words used by Mr. St. Laurent in this house in February, 1949 had been carried with this article to the minds of those who have sought to place upon that article an impossible interpretation, then I am quite satisfied that this clause would not have been subjected to all the strains, to the overselling and to the misunderstanding to which it has obviously been subjected since. I therefore think the house is justified in receiving this bill as a constructive proposal for dealing with this problem in a manner that assures to Newfoundlanders that when this period of fixed, determined payments expires they have the assurance that in the review, which has already been initiated, of fiscal relations between the dominion and the provinces the special circumstances relating to the financial position of the province of Newfoundland after March 31, 1962, would in the language of this bill, be taken into consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister indicated that he would permit a question. The question that I should like to put to the minister is this. By whom does he consider that article 29 was oversold? Was it by the author?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it is quite apparent, from statements which the hon. member himself has made, that he is one of those who have oversold or been oversold in the interpretation of this article. For correction of his misinterpretation I direct him to the language that Mr. St. Laurent used in this house in February, 1949, language which I quoted yesterday.

We accept the interpretation that Mr. St. Laurent put upon this article at that time. It is crystal clear. It is not to be perverted and it is not to be watered down in the manner in which evidently some hon. members would like to see it watered down. Here I place the essential part of it, not the total portion which I read yesterday but the essential part, once more on record, and I would like to say to the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) that I do not think he was forthright yesterday in dealing with it. If the Leader of the Opposition accepts the interpretation which was placed on this article by Mr. St. Laurent speaking in this house on February 7, 1949, then I say to him that he cannot reassert some of the propositions which he put before the house yesterday. Here is Mr. St. Laurent's interpretation which he put on this article, one which in my respectful submission is completely correct, not only correct in terms of law but in the spirit of it. It is the type of expression which would be re-echoed in this house and is certainly re-echoed by this government. Mr. St. Laurent said, when speaking on article 29:

> There is no undertaking to implement any terms of recommendation that may be made at that time by a royal commission. It was felt by the Newfoundland delegation, and by the representatives of the Canadian government, that this was something that was being entered into in a spirit of fairness on both sides, and that it was not necessary to make binding stipulations about what would happen with respect to the report of a royal commission.

Note, that he is saying there is no binding stipulation about what is to happen to the report of a royal commission or its recommendations. Those who framed this article decided it was better not to make any attempt at setting forth any stipulations as to what was to be done with the recommendations of the royal commission. Then he concluded with these words:

> It was felt that if there was an investigation and a report by a commission, in which the public at that time would have confidence, the legislators of that day could well be trusted to do what would prove to be right in order to make this enlarged nation a united nation continuing on its path of progress toward its great destiny.

Mr. Speaker, we are the legislators to whom Mr. St. Laurent referred in the closing passage, and I believe that in this measure we are fully maintaining the view that was expressed by Mr. St. Laurent at that time as to the course that the legislators could well be trusted to take today, having regard to the desire that this enlarged nation be a united nation continuing on its path of progress toward its great destiny.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister in introducing this bill expressed the hope that its main effect would be to strengthen the friendly feeling between Newfoundland and the rest of Canada, and to strengthen the unity inside our country. If that is his hope the reports that have already been received from Newfoundland of the action announced yesterday to be taken by the government indicate that that hope may not be realized.

This is a small bill but it is an important bill and it embodies a constitutional principle which is perhaps quite as important as the one we were discussing a few moments ago. That constitutional principle is simply whether the solemn obligation of Canada in respect of a pact between two countries will be carried out. This bill is a rejection of the recommendations of a report of a royal commission set up under term 29 of the act of union with Newfoundland. It is a rejection of the recommendations of that report, yet there is a preamble in this bill which reads:

> Whereas pursuant to the recommendations made by the royal commission established in fulfilment of the obligation of the government of Canada under the said term 29, it is now desirable—

And so on. This bill is not in pursuance of all the recommendations of that royal commission, and because it rejects a very important part of those recommendations it is a rejection of that report. Indeed, this very short bill is a final and irrevocable settlement, to use the Prime Minister's (Mr. Diefenbaker's) words, of the contractual obligations, to use his words again, of term 29 of the act of union. This is a settlement imposed by one party to the act of union on the other party. It is a settlement brought about in this House of Commons by the government without consultation or agreement with the government of the other party, the government of Newfoundland.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was consultation.

Mr. Pearson: There was consultation before this announcement was made. When the government decided to take this course it had not at any time consulted with the government of Newfoundland in the terms of this resolution and the terms of this bill and tried to work out a course of action which would be acceptable to both parties to this act of union. Because the government did not do that, or make any attempt to do that, and because of the nature of this bill, I claim that this bill represents a repudiation of the act of union between two countries, and it weakens, and will weaken until it is rescinded, that union. It is unfair for that reason and it is a breach of faith with the people of Newfoundland. That is undoubtedly how it is being interpreted by the people of Newfoundland. It will cause disappointment. It has caused disappointment already and justified resentment in Newfoundland, and for that the government in introducing this bill is responsible.

This bill embodies exactly what the Prime Minister said on March 25 he would do. It embodies his interpretation of the nature of the recommendation of the royal commission, and I ask the hon. members on the other side of this house from Newfoundland whether they accept that interpretation, an interpretation repeated this afernoon, of the obligations imposed on a government under the recommendations of that royal commission. Certainly that was not the interpretation given to the recommendations of a royal commission by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), the Minister without Portfolio, some years ago in this house.

This bill ignores a word which is of no importance to the minister, but a very significant word in these recommendations. It ignores the word "thereafter", as having no meaning or a meaning so limited as to be ridiculous. Indeed, according to the Prime Minister, the word "thereafter" has no existence at all. As he wrongly stated in Saskatoon on March 28, the royal commission intended in its recommendations to end all payments in 1962, that that was the meaning of the recommendations, and therefore the word "thereafter" not only had no meaning but no existence. Mr. Speaker, no doubt when we point that out we will be accused of quibbling with words. This bill is a decision of the government in respect of term 29 and of the recommendations of the royal commission appointed under term 29.

What happens now to term 29 of the act of union, a part of the act of union which was so important, and remained so important that if it had not been agreed on ten years ago there would not have been any act of union with Newfoundland?

What happens to the pledged word of the government of Canada under term 29 to take certain action? What happens to term 29 now? The minister has repeated his assurance to review the matter. One party to the contract will review the matter before 1962 as part of a general review of dominion-provincial financial relations where no such commitment as this is involved. The minister says: We will drop this special obligation, this solemn promise, into our seminar, into our study group, a study group which is, itself, an evasion of a promise.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Does the Leader of the Opposition contend that the recommendations of the royal commission are binding on the federal government?

Mr. Pearson: Of course not. I said yesterday that no recommendation of a royal commission is legally binding on any government. But there is something which is more important than legality, and that is the moral and constitutional responsibility of this government to take no action which would interfere with the implementation of term 29 as long as that term is part of the act of union unless the changes made to term 29 are made by agreement between the two parties to the contract.

The minister said this afternoon that in this review which will be made by one party to the contract would take into consideration, before taking any decision as to the entitlement of Newfoundland under term 29, any special circumstances relating to the financial position of that province. He was saying: Though we do not mention term 29 in that connection in the preamble, we shall take into consideration any special circumstances. If that is the case, why not mention specifically term 29 as one factor to be taken into consideration? Again, I ask hon. members from Newfoundland who sit on the other side of this house whether they are satisfied with that commitment on the part of the government, namely that in this review the government will take into consideration all factors and then make up its own mind in the light of those factors regarding what should be done to carry out contractual obligations of this kind. This makes Newfoundland, the other party to the contract, entirely dependent upon the decision of the federal government in respect to the implementation of term 29.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman if he would rather these questions be left—

Mr. Pearson: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —but I am trying to follow this argument. How does he square what he is saying now with article 29? He is talking about promises, commitments and obligations. Where is the obligation created by term 29 except to appoint a royal commission, as Mr. St. Laurent pointed out?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the obligation under term 29 is for the federal government to give assistance to Newfoundland to ensure that the level of services, and so on—I need not quote the term because the minister knows what it is. The specific obligation was to set up a royal commission to see how that undertaking could best be implemented. The royal commission has made its report. This government has not accepted that report and does not provide any alternative to that report, nor does it even consult with the government of Newfoundland as to how term 29 can best be carried out.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is hard to recognize term 29 there.

Mr. Pearson: I suggest this is an exceptional example of centralization in our federal structure.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Pearson: It certainly is centralization. Here is a pact between two countries in consequence of which the federal government—the Canadian government—undertook to do certain things. It undertook to set up a royal commission which would make recommendations as to how term 29 could be implemented in the way laid down in the pact. Then, without, consultation of any kind with the government of Newfoundland with respect to this matter and without an effort being made to see whether this problem could be worked out by agreement, this government, representing one side of the union, brings in a bill which rejects a fundamental feature of the recommendations of the royal commission, without I repeat, any consultation with the other party to the agreement.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was consultation.

Mr. Pearson: The fundamental feature of the recommendation which is rejected is that which reads: thereafter $8 million per annum until both parties agree to a change as a result of a review. The word "thereafter" does have a meaning. The minister says the government will make a review and perhaps make a change without any reference to the rights of Newfoundland to be consulted on the decision to be made after the review has taken place. Moreover, this promise, this commitment if you like, to review the situation is not even in the operative part of this bill, but is placed in the preamble to the bill. That, of course, is merely adding insult to injury.

So, we on this side will oppose this bill. Our party intends to stand firm on the commitments made and the obligations undertaken in the pact of union and at the time of union. We stand for carrying out that pact both in letter and in spirit. When the commitments of that pact are to be changed, that should be done not by arrogant imposition of federal decisions on a province but by consultation and agreement with Newfoundland. That, Mr. Speaker, is how we interpret what the Prime Minister calls a contractual obligation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, when the responsibility is ours again we shall remove this injustice. We shall correct this violation of a contract and we shall make sure once again that the act of union is honoured in all its parts and is carried out as it must be carried out in letter and in spirit. When the people of Newfoundland joined their destiny and linked their history and added their glorious and honoured traditions to ours, they did not dream that ten years later the government of the other party to the contract would impose on them a decision, a settlement, without consultation with them; one, moreover, which does not carry out the recommendations of the royal commission set up under term 29 of the act of union and one which does not ensure that the obligations of that term will be carried out in the future through consultation and agreement between the two parties to the contract. For that reason I repeat that we shall oppose this bill as strongly as we can.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to speak at any great length. However, certain statements which have been made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) deserve to be answered immediately.

Let me at once underline the fact that in so far as the Conservative party is concerned and in so far as this government is concerned we intend at all times to live up to the spirit of confederation and to carry out those terms which will assure a reasonable equality of opportunity everywhere in this land.

I am not going back to the beginning to the speeches that were made at the time of union but I want to underline once more a point that cannot be too strongly emphasized, that Mr. St. Laurent, the then prime minister, made it perfectly clear that the responsibility of the federal government under the act of union was the appointment of a royal commission. Although this has been placed on the record before, I intend to do so once again because the words that Mr. St. Laurent used are the words which are accepted by this government as representative of the proper interpretation to be placed upon article 29. At the expense of reiteration I shall read once more the words Mr. St. Laurent used as reported at page 289 of Hansard of February 7, 1949:

> It was also provided that within eight years from the coming into force of the terms of union a commission would be set up to examine the situation anew, and to report as to whether or not the terms provided are working satisfactorily and are sufficient to bring about the object of equalizing the lot of the people of the new province with that of the people of the older provinces.

I emphasize these words that have been referred to previously. There is no undertaking to implement any terms of recommendation that may be made at that time by a royal commission. Those words are clear, unchallengeable and unequivocal. It is all very well in the light of subsequent events to apply principles to the interpretation given by the then prime minister. In the light of subsequent events those in the opposition endeavour to leave the impression that what they meant by article 29 was not the actual reading and the proper interpretation on the basis of the words used, but the interpretation which they today place upon the words of the undertaking entered into at that time when Newfoundland entered confederation. One would almost think there was something sacrosanct about the findings of the royal commission and that Newfoundland was in agreement therewith.

I am not here for the purpose of indulging in any way in recriminations with the premier of that province, but I want to say this. His views of that royal commission and its findings were certainly not in keeping with the grand and eloquent phrases used today by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Pearson: He thought it was ungenerous and wanted more. You are giving him less.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The premier did not think very much of the findings of that royal commission. This is what he said, as reported in the St. John's daily News of September 6, 1958:

The work of the McNair royal commission was a dead loss and the commissioners were a dead loss.

Those are the words of the premier of Newfoundland.

Mr. Pearson: He wanted more money.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With respect to the commissioners he went on to say:

I recommended the appointment of some of them, God forgive me.

Those, too, are the words of the premier of Newfoundland regarding the royal commission which has been spoken of in such eulogies by the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Pearson: And by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) yesterday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Those are the words of the premier of Newfoundland. Those are not my words or the interpretation of the Minister of Finance. Those are the words of the premier regarding a royal commission about which at the time it was set up the premier said the choice of personnel could not have been better. As a matter of fact he spoke of that royal commission in the most touching manner. He referred to the high qualifications and the great capacity of the membership. Let me refer to his words as reported on February 25, 1957 in the Charlottetown Guardian:

A beaming premier Smallwood groped for superlatives Friday to express his delight at the choice of members for the royal commission to review Newfoundland's financial terms of union with Canada.

Work of the commission, whose appointment was announced in the commons Friday by Prime Minister St. Laurent, would be "of absolutely terrific importance to Newfoundland," Mr. Smallwood told a press conference.

The future of Newfoundland's "standards and levels of services will be determined by the recommendations of the commission," he said. It would recommend "the form and scale" of additional financial assistance.

He then went on to say:

Commission chairman John McNair, Chief Justice and former premier of New Brunswick, was "long a personal friend of mine," Mr. Smallwood said. Mr. McNair was "a famous fighter for maritime rights and after we went in for Atlantic provinces rights."

John James Deutsch was "probably the most knowledgeable man in all Canada of federal-provincial affairs." He was "a great friend of Newfoundland—a man of great sympathy for Newfoundland."

Of Newfoundland Chief Justice Sir Albert Walsh, third of the three commission members, Mr. Smallwood said "Newfoundland could be searched from end to end and we would not find a better man to represent Newfoundland on this royal commission. He is thoroughly informed."

Those were his words at the time of the appointment. Let us go on and see what else was said regarding the McNair report. The premier went on to say, on September 6, 1958, after the findings were made by the royal commission, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of that date:

I'm glad that there was a change of government in Ottawa following the last federal election.

Simply because these findings have been thrown into such a favourable light by the Leader of the Opposition today does not mean that they were acceptable then to the premier of Newfoundland. As reported in the same press article, the premier referring to the commissioner, said:

You couldn't budge them. They practically mutinied when we tried to show them pictures of our institutions.

In other words the attitude on September 6, 1958, was an attitude of disappointment. The amount asked for, as I recall it, by the Lewis commission was $15 million. The Lewis royal commission was set up by the province of Newfoundland to determine the whole question. The findings of the Lewis provincial royal commission as summarized at page 207 of the report are as follows:

1. That the government of Newfoundland is entitled to claim from the government of Canada an annual grant of $17 million over and above all other federal grants as the additional financial assistance required under the explicit provisions of term 29;

2. That the said grant should be paid annually to the province of Newfoundland commencing in the fiscal year 1957-58; and

3. That the amount of the said annual grant should thereafter be subject to periodic review.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the Prime Minister say what he is reading from?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am reading from page 287 of the Lewis provincial royal commission report. What did Mr. Smallwood say? I will have a few references to make about some of the things he said about those who today pretend in opposition that they are the friends of Newfoundland. I am going to refer to some of the statements he made respecting the type of treatment given to Newfoundland even during the days of the government of which the self-adopted son of Newfoundland the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) was a member.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask the Prime Minister a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will be giving the hon. gentleman further attention in a minute.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister has been waiting a long time for this day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am quoting from the St. John's Telegram of July 28, 1958 a statement concerning the McNair commission report attributed to the premier of Newfoundland:

I hope that the Diefenbaker parliament will study the recommendations and see fit to make the grant larger and provide for a future re-examination into Newfoundland's requirements.

Then, he went on to say this:

I believe our own royal commission is right, and that the McNair royal commission wrong. We can make the $8 million a year do for the next few years but the royal commission set up to make recommendations under term 29 were not expected to look forward to a mere four or five years. They were expected to complete and finalize the financial terms. I hope that the government of Canada will not refuse, in the future, to re-examine the position in the light of further experience and its desire to live up to the true spirit in which confederation was born.

We have made provision for that in the bill which is now before the house in these words, something which the royal commission did not ask for, did not direct and did not recommend, something which the government of Newfoundland wanted, namely a review as to the circumstances. I am going to read those portions of the preamble set out in the bill which deal with our intention with regard to the future. When the Leader of the Opposition speaks of a breach of faith, let me quote him the words of Premier Smallwood regarding the findings of the royal commission. I shall also quote him in a moment some of the references to the former government and to the degree to which the former government had failed to discharge its responsibility to this new and great province of Newfoundland. Before I do so—

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that an excuse for you?

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate continues I will deal with the time he became a member over there and some of the promises made at that time and some of the eulogistic references he made to the premier of Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a question of privilege. If the Prime Minister can cite any promises of mines that I have not kept I should be very glad to have him do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently I have already pointed out one.

Mr. Pickersgill: Go ahead and cite it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman denies this I will accept his denial immediately. During the campaigns of 1953 and 1957 did the hon. gentleman not say that there would be a review of Newfoundland's position?

Mr. Pickersgill: I will answer that question. To the best of my knowledge I never said any such thing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think that sentence could well end on nothing. Let me read on.

Mr. Pickersgill: What difference would it make, anyway?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall be referring to the hon. gentleman in a moment, if he persists, because the record is replete—

Mr. Pickersgill: I will persist.

Mr. Pearson: You had better find it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —with observations that I think might find their place on the record if I were not dealing with this in an objective manner. Mr. Speaker, we say this:

Whereas both the government of the province of Newfoundland and the government of Canada have recognized the great difficulties inherent in determining future payments on an equitable basis from the experience of one selected year; and

Whereas since the report of the royal commission was made, the government of Canada has proposed a comprehensive study of dominion-provincial financial relations in co-operation with the provinces, and all the provinces have agreed to participate therein;—

And this is the important section:

Whereas in the course of such a review any special circumstances relating to the financial position of the province of Newfoundland after the 31st day of March, 1962, would be taken into consideration;—

Let me make this clear. In that review regard, and full regard, will be had to assuring those conditions inherent in section 29 being upheld to the end that Newfoundland shall enjoy a reasonable degree of equality of opportunity along with the other provinces in this country.

Mr. Pearson: That is not the terms of the bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the essence of confederation, and that is the essence of the principles upon which we believe that the spirit of confederation shall be maintained.

Mention was made by the Leader of the Opposition that in the last couple of days there have been some observations made in the province of Newfoundland respecting this legislation. I realize that there have been statements made. I am not going to enter into any competition in the matter of recriminations. I am simply going to say that there have been exaggerated statements, statements which are not in keeping with a sense of full responsibility of the great issues that are inherent in this matter. Let my hon.

friends look back to those days when they believed that they would be in the seats of office forever. Their treatment of Newfoundland at that time is a far cry from the verbal protestations of today. Certainly, the premier has been outspoken, but what did he say regarding the government of the day of which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was so distinguished a representative? This was the kind of system used in his appointment. Mr. Smallwood recommended the member for Bonavista-Twillingate and Mr. St. Laurent said he accepted that recommendation. What did Mr. Smallwood say of those who today say that they are the friends of Newfoundland; that they intend to do those things that they did not do when they were in office, namely to raise living standards in Newfoundland. What did Mr. Smallwood say on June 25, 1955, when speaking at St. Andrews-by-the-Sea? This is what he said:

> Premier Joseph Smallwood threatened last night to lead Newfoundland out of confederation with Canada unless the federal government stopped discriminating against the four Atlantic provinces, including his own.

Mr. Speaker, that was in 1955, and he went on to say—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether I might interrupt the Prime Minister. It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of public bills, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we could have unanimous consent of the house to carry on?

Mr. Pickersgill: As far as we are concerned, yes.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the unanimous consent of the house to waive the hour for private and public bills under section 3, standing order 15?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I continue:

> It is not good for Canada to leave these Atlantic provinces to their own resources.

Then, he went on to use these words:

> Before we become second-class citizens of Canada, we will show the other maritime provinces how to get out of confederation.

That was in 1955, Mr. Speaker, after they had been in confederation for six years. He went on—and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate may take whatever joy he can out of this:

> The federal government has made miserable proposals of sharing the cost in surveys of the wealth of timber, hydro power and minerals. We have gone ahead on our own and since confederation have spent $23 million to help build new industries.
> If confederation was not to recognize the right of all Canadians to some equality in living standards and opportunity, Newfoundland and the maritimes might as well be declared game preserves for the holidays of Canadians from more prosperous provinces.

Where was this triumvirate sitting opposite me at that time? The ministers of the crown making of Newfoundland a game preserve, a place for holidays—

Mr. Pearson: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and making the people of Newfoundland second class citizens. Where was the Leader of the Opposition then, except in a position of power? Where was the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill)?

Those are the things that I thought might be of interest when my hon. friends opposite reiterate the shortcomings of this government which in the period since June 21, 1957 has made available over and above everything for which Canada was responsible under the extant agreement, $7.5 million a year to Newfoundland which, had the former government remained in power, would never have been paid to Newfoundland.

After all, the record speaks. Now, we come to the Toronto Daily Star of July 9, 1955 when the premier wrote an article which is headed:

> Premier "Joey" Smallwood, who almost single-handedly led Newfoundland into confederation with Canada, threatened the other day to lead her out again unless the federal government acted to make the four Atlantic provinces "economically strong."

Mr. Speaker, what did they do, those who sit today in the seats of the opposition? In those days from 1949 to 1955 what did they do? Newfoundland asked for action from 1953 onward, and Newfoundland had the representative for Bonavista - Twillingate. What did they do in those years? I give you the answer from the premier himself. He said this:

> I am ashamed and angry to say it, but the altogether stupid, bungling, inadequate effort of great Canada to assist the Atlantic fishing industry (which is potentially almost as valuable in dollars and cents and much more valuable in numbers of families that can be supported than the oil industry of Alberta) is a reproach to a great and progressive country.

Who was in power when he said that? The question answers itself. Where was the self-appointed custodian of the rights of Newfoundland, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, then? Where was the Department of Fisheries? The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has shown a tremendous interest in the last two years in fisheries. What did he do when he was a member of the government? What did Mr. Smallwood say? He said:

> The whole policy of the Department of Fisheries of Canada, in so far as there appears to be a policy for Newfoundland, is to drive the fishermen away from fishing.

This is an article contributed by the premier of the province, speaking of those halcyon days when these two members of the opposition who speak so loudly and protest so vehemently, were in power. Then, Mr. Smallwood went on to say:

> The present Minister of Fisheries told one very prominent Newfoundlander that it wouldn't matter if the Newfoundland fishermen had to leave the fisheries, because they could always find work in some other part of Canada.

There is the record of those who today criticize this government for bringing about, first, the payment of the amount recommended by the royal commission and, in addition to that, provided for a review in order to assure that the principles of confederation, of which the Conservative party has a real knowledge and a tradition, shall be carried into effect in so far as the last province to join confederation is concerned.

Then, I should point out also the payments that have been made under the Atlantic provinces grants and the tremendous effect that the $7.5 million must have had on the economy of the province of Newfoundland and the other two provinces in the Atlantic area, and the $2.5 million to Prince Edward Island. This is what the St. John's evening Telegram said on January 24, 1958:

> The Conservative administration is supported by two representatives from Newfoundland. The other five are in opposition. But we are getting far more sympathetic attention now than we got from the Liberals. Not that the government at Ottawa is favouring us because we voted so overwhelmingly for the opposition, but because it has been the declared Conservative policy to devote a greater proportion of the revenue to provincial needs, and especially to the needs of the Atlantic provinces. All this is quite contrary to Liberal policy.

I might refer for a moment to something to which I alluded on another occasion, the attitude that has been taken by this government to the various provinces. I point out that since we came into power we have endeavoured to bring about an equalization of opportunity amongst the provinces. We have been endeavouring to do that in order to bring about and achieve that degree of equality without which confederation would be meaningless. I should like to deal, in so far as conditional grants and unconditional grants are concerned, with the province of Newfoundland. I point out that from 1949 on, and prior to 1957, unconditional grants payments to the province of Newfoundland, in the highest amount in any one year, were $20,106,000 in 1952-53. You talk about discrimination against Newfoundland. Let me point out this, that in 1957-58 the payment was $19,244,000, and for 1958-59 it will be in the neighbourhood of approximately twice that amount.

Then so far as conditional grants are concerned, from the time Newfoundland came into confederation, the highest payment that was made was in 1956-57 and it amounted to $6,573,000. For the first full year after this government came into office, the amount was $14,576,000, and it will be approximately the same amount in 1958-59, counting in, as my hon. friends says, the payments to which I have already made reference.

Talk about discrimination and unfairness; let me point out this fact. In addition to that, there were developments in Terra Nova national park; the tremendous development in St. John's harbour; joint housing developments; winter works program and the contribution to the construction of highways, 269 miles in Newfoundland. Those things were not peculiar to Newfoundland but they did bring, not only for Newfoundland but throughout Canada, new opportunities for the provinces to discharge their responsibilities and thereby assure individuals within each of the provinces a new vista in the future.

In so far as provincial governments are concerned, the direct federal contribution to Newfoundland has increased approximately twice in amount since this government came into power. All these things are indicative of the attitude that we adopt, which is not one of discrimination, as was suggested against the province of Newfoundland but rather the realization that whatever the political complexion of any province may be, that province shall not—as was sometimes the case in the past—be unfairly treated in any way.

A moment ago I mentioned some of the developments in that province. I neglected to mention as well the Gander development that has taken place and has been completed under this government.

Mr. Chevrier: It was started by us.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They started some things, Mr. Speaker; but we completed this and many other things.

I come to the general question of our attitude toward Newfoundland. Our attitude is this. We believe that province is entitled to fair and reasonable consideration. We believe that by 1962—and we have incorporated our belief in the statute—there should be that review which, ever since the findings of the royal commission, has been demanded by the government of Newfoundland. When that review takes place, consideration will be given to the matter. On the basis of the experience of the past of the degree to which we have increased the amount of contribution to the province, what do we find? In the period since 1956-57 to date the amount of contributions and payments to all provinces of Canada has risen from $689 million in 1956-57 to an estimated $1,212 million this year.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the Prime Minister a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why does not the Prime Minister give the figure for 1957-58?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I beg the hon. member's pardon?

Mr. Pickersgill: Why does not the Prime Minister use 1957-58 for purposes of comparison? All the payments for 1957-58 were provided by the previous government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I took the last year in which the former government was in power.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister does not do so for the obvious reason.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I took 1956-57 up to March 31. It was three months thereafter before we came into power. For that reason I gave the figures in question. As a matter of fact, if the hon. gentleman wants to continue until March 31, 1958, for the first year that we were in power, 1957-58, the amount was $853,700,000. In the ensuing two years that amount has been increased by $300 million, from $853,700,000 to $1,212,500,000 which in no way spoils the record.

Mr. Pearson: What is a hundred million?

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend says "What is a hundred million?" He used to have a mentor who said, "What is a million anyhow?" The Leader of the Opposition increased that amount by $99 million.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the $617 million deficit?

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend says, "What is $17 million?" Apparently these gentlemen are complaining about the millions we are providing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. I said what about the deficit of $617 million.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, Mr. Speaker, these hon. gentlemen—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know what the Prime Minister will say.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We dealt with that matter over and over again.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You always have an insult.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman mentioned "insult" Mr. Speaker. Where is the insult in stating facts? Ever since this session began—and I say this in view of the fact that they speak of insults—there has been an apparent effort on the part of my hon. friends opposite at all times to use that method against me personally, but you never hear any objection. Yet when you tell them the truth, it is an insult in their vocabulary.

I am now going to refer to the statement which I made in the course of a television speech which sets out the viewpoint of this government as to Newfoundland. I said:

> In the case of Newfoundland there has, I am sorry to say, been some misunderstanding—but differences arise even in the best of families.

My friend the Leader of the Opposition laughs. He will remember what Mr. Smallwood said.

Mr. Pearson: What did he say yesterday?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I continue:

> Let me say at once that I believe that we can and will resolve these differences in that spirit of understanding, common sense and compromise which has been so characteristic of the Canadian confederation from its very beginning.

Then I went on to point out that the equality of each province exists as a right. I said:

> That equality exists as a right of our newest province's membership in the Canadian confederation. It is the earnest hope of my government that the differences may be settled as quickly as possible so that we may get together, and achieve together the raising of the general standard of living of the province and its people to that which we covet for all Canadians.

That is the attitude in which we have placed this legislation before the house. We start with the foundation of the words of Mr. St. Laurent. Mr. Smallwood naturally contends that the amount should be $15 or $17 million, in spite of the fact that he has obtained $7.5 million more than he would have obtained if the former government had remained in power for the three years. He also contended that there should be a review. We have provided in the meantime for the $8 million recommended. We have also made provision for a review to the end that, in the light of the circumstances then existing, we may be able to achieve by such further action and subsidy as is necessary the attainment of that equality to which I have referred.

I would point out that in all the other provinces there have been changes. The original of section 118 of the British North America Act stated that Ontario would be adequately compensated by $68,000 a year, Quebec by $70,000, Nova Scotia by $60,000 and New Brunswick by $50,000. But in the intervening years there have been many changes in this regard. Those payments, at the time they entered into the pact of confederation were believed to be in existence in perpetuity. But in the light of events and in the light of economic development changes became necessary. We look forward to a period from the beginning of the term provided by this bill, namely five years, in which we allow for the amount which we believe will attain the objective of article 29; and then assure, at the end of that period, a review in the light of the economic development and the social changes which may take place in the interval, and which I am sure will take place in the interval because of the resource development which is taking place in Newfoundland and elsewhere in this country.

All I want to say is this in conclusion. No matter what is the amount that is fixed, it is natural that more will be asked for. After the report came out that $8 million was recommended, the premier of Newfoundland called on me and said that he wanted an additional $15 million a year in treasury grants instead of the $8 million recommended by the royal commission.

I simply say this, Mr. Speaker. I know it will arouse feelings, because after all when the act of union was entered into, the words of Mr. St. Laurent apparently were not distributed in the new province of Newfoundland in an underlined or emphasized manner. An interpretation was given, a political interpretation if I may say so, holding out hopes which those who uttered them knew could not be fulfilled. I say to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that I am sure that at no time did he make clear to the people of Newfoundland the meaning of the agreement that was entered into under the act of union. I am sure he did not make clear to the people of Newfoundland the interpretation placed thereon by Mr. St. Laurent. I am sure, in that expansive way, which is not peculiar to him, he led the people there to believe that something would be obtained which the agreement entered into did not contain.

There has been a wonderful spirit of Damon and Pythias between the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the premier of Newfoundland. I do not want to put them on the record, but even one as modest as the hon. gentleman would feel just a slight feeling of emotion, or even bashfulness, were I to read some of the views expressed by the premier of Newfoundland during successive campaigns, and also some of the words of the hon. gentleman spoken of the premier of Newfoundland. However, there is one expression I cannot refrain from referring to. On April 1, 1959, I think it was—

Mr. Pickersgill: It was March 31.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sorry, I am a day out. On March 31, 1959 the hon. gentleman stated of the premier of Newfoundland that he had served under two prime ministers of Canada, but he said, "I can tell you this; nobody has ever equalled the premier of Newfoundland."

Mr. Pickersgill: No, that is not what I said.

Mr. Pearson: Of course that is not true.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) would not want to misquote what I said. What I said was that I had served under two very distinguished prime ministers and I had known a lot of other very distinguished politicians, but I had only known one political genius, and I do not take that back.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The actual words were better than my interpretation, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman's memory is perfect. "I have served under two Canadian prime ministers, but I have known in my life time only one political genius." I can hardly understand the next reference with Mr. St. Laurent still with us, and he will be, I hope, for many years to come, when the hon. gentleman finally ended up his speech of adulation by saying that the premier of Newfoundland was the greatest Canadian of all time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Now the Prime Minister knows that is not true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am quoting from the press report.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister is not quoting, he is reading from a document. I wrote a letter to the Ottawa Journal about this very report, and I also wrote one to the Toronto Telegram; as far as I know they are the only two papers where this story appeared. What I said was that he was one of the greatest Canadians of our time, and I added that in my opinion Louis St. Laurent was the greatest Canadian of our time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I was not quoting from the Ottawa Journal. I am quoting from a report by one who was there at the meeting, I understand, Miss Judith Robinson, in which she has, in quotation marks:

—Mr. Pickersgill said . . . "the greatest Canadian of our time."

The hon. gentleman said he did not say that, however, and it is accepted.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister knows he did not.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, and it is a rather serious matter, I think. I know these are the ways one persuades some audiences, but we are trying to get at the truth here. A tape recording of my speech was made and before I made that correction I took the trouble of having it verified to be sure of precisely what I had said. I then wrote to the only two newspapers in which this erroneous statement occurred and made the correction. I never saw whether the Telegram carried it, but the Ottawa Journal did, and I am sure, knowing the Prime Minister's clipping service at least as well as he does, that he would have found the clipping there if he had looked for it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know what the complaint is. I accepted the correction because it is obvious the hon. gentleman did not think that.

Mr. Pearson: Then stop repeating untruths.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I therefore conclude by referring to the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition and say that we do want to strengthen the bonds between Canada and Newfoundland, as we do with all the provinces of Canada. That has been the reason for the policies adopted by this government which render available several hundred million dollars more to the provinces than was the case under the previous government. So far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned, we saw there the results of 22 years of rule on the part of those hon. gentlemen opposite. We brought into effect grants each year to assist those provinces to make provision economically for their development, and we will follow and continue to follow those policies to the end. There will not be in the years ahead, as we expect, the inequality which existed for so many years between the economic earnings of people in all parts of our country. We also want to see the building of that spirit of Canadianism. In that regard Newfoundland has shown its spirit and its attitude, and it is welcomed.

My hon. friend says that there has been a breach of faith, but I say to him, with all the power at my command, that statement is unwarranted, unfair and unjust. Those things were said, those exaggerated phrases were uttered, in the course of debate; but as the years go by and the people of Newfoundland see the application of these principles which we have adopted, the criticisms of 1955 made against the former government will evaporate in the light of a progressive policy to ensure that Newfoundland shall attain its proper position along with the other provinces in the confederation.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): As you know, Mr. Speaker, all of us in this house are equal, but some are more equal than others and as I have not got the unlimited time which the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has I cannot enter into all the aspects of the 100 per cent diversion from the subject to which the house listened this afternoon. It is very characteristic of the Prime Minister that when there is no answer to an argument he should change the scene, shift the scenery with great skill and produce effects which sometimes take people in until the third or fourth performance. But we in this house are getting well past the third or fourth performance.

I do not intend to pursue some of the things he said about statements made by Mr. Smallwood in 1954 or 1955—statements which perhaps I might not agree with—any more than I could remind the Prime Minister of some of the things said by Mr. Duff Roblin in the past few weeks of which, perhaps, the Prime Minister would not like to be reminded, to say nothing of the statements which have been made by Mr. Frost.

The Prime Minister said something about what had been done by the previous government for the fishery. I should like to tell the Prime Minister what was done by the previous government about the fishery, but I think the best evidence that the people of Newfoundland were satisfied with what was done in at least one constituency was the fact that I did not need to be self appointed in 1958, despite the Prime Minister's best efforts to see that I did not get back to this house; in fact, I was elected in 1958 with a majority considerably larger than in 1957. I say this for one reason only, because this suggestion that in some way or another the people of Newfoundland do not vote for their representatives like other people of Canada is, I think, an unreasonable one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who suggested that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What is the next diversion?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am merely following the Prime Minister's diversions, and I am not going to follow many of them.

An hon. Member: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I think I would prefer to continue, for the reason that I should prefer to have my own 40 minutes. If I am allowed a little extension of time I shall be glad to answer the hon. gentleman.

The Prime Minister quoted something from the St. John's Telegram of 1958, but if he would read the St. John's Telegram since March, 1959 he would find it impossible to discover any similar articles anywhere; I do not think he would find many of them agreeable any more than, I am sure, he found agreeable reading what the premier of Newfoundland had to say about what some articles in the press today described as the peace move which was made yesterday. "Peace move" is a very curious way to describe it.

The Prime Minister indulged in his usual rhetoric about the Tory party living up to the spirit of confederation—the usual words, idle words, with which these things begin—and then he went on to pervert, and that is the only term I can apply to it, the words of Mr. St. Laurent about term 29. I should like to read some of page 289 of Hansard for February 7, 1949 which was carefully left out by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was quoted yesterday, twice.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not this part:

> This section of the Canadian economy generally described as the maritimes was felt to be the one which would be most nearly comparable to the situation which would be apt to develop in Newfoundland. It was felt that for a transitional term the government of Newfoundland had to be provided with sufficient funds to establish and develop services comparable to those available to the people of the maritime region, and that it had to be able to do so without imposing upon the people of Newfoundland a burden of taxation heavier than that prevailing in the maritime region.

Then he went on—

> After long negotiations it proved possible, I think, to arrive at the scheme which is set out in the terms of union, and which is apt to achieve that result.

In other words, what Mr. St. Laurent said about this was that it could be expected that these transitional grants would enable Newfoundland to bring her situation up to the maritime level, which she has not, in fact, done. And then he went on to say:

> Human foresight, however, is never as good as hindsight.

The Prime Minister did not quote that, for obvious reasons.

> It was also provided that within eight years from the coming into force of the terms of union a commission would be set up to examine the situation anew, and to report as to whether or not the terms provided are working satisfactorily and are sufficient to bring about the object of equalizing the lot of the people of the new province with that of the people of the older provinces.

Anyone who reads this report will see that that has certainly not been achieved, and the commissioners did not suggest or hint that it would be achieved soon. In fact, they made it perfectly clear that it would not be achieved by 1962, the cut-off date. But what is going to be much harder for people to take than anything else, and for Mr. St. Laurent, himself, is the perversion of these words:

> There is no undertaking to implement any terms of recommendation that may be made at that time by a royal commission.

By itself, taken out of its context, this has one significance, but read with the following words, what does it mean?

> It was felt by the Newfoundland delegation, and by the representatives of the Canadian government, that this was something that was being entered into in a spirit of fairness on both sides, and that it was not necessary to make binding stipulations about what would happen with respect to the report of a royal commission.

Why? Because it was expected that men of honour would be dealing with the question on both sides, and that the terms of union, like those of the British North America Act, would not be interpreted by police court quibbling.

When the Prime Minister was serving under another leader his party took a very different view of this matter, and I should just like to remind hon. members of the view taken by Mr. Drew when he was leader of the party. I have here an extract from the St. John's Telegram of January 15, 1953 which is headed: "Drew—Deserve Better Terms" which reads as follows:

> The first national party leader to react to E. J. Russell's proposal that Newfoundland "give all seven federal seats to the party which will commit itself most deeply to a revision and a betterment of the financial terms of union", was Hon. George Drew.
> He wired Gordon Higgins, Q.C., M.P. for St. John's East, last night that he believes Newfoundland is entitled to much better terms than those now existing.

I should just like to read the telegram, the text of which was given in full. It was addressed to Mr. Gordon Higgins, St. John's, Newfoundland.

> Replying your question regarding 1949 statement revision financial terms with Newfoundland you may confirm this without hesitation. I believe Newfoundland is entitled to much better terms than those now existing. As you are also aware I believe the rights of the province should be much more firmly established than they are now.

That was the pledge on which the hon. gentleman who is now a member of the government sought the suffrages of the electors unsuccessfully in that election. That was the position that was taken by the Conservative party. It was also taken by the hon. gentleman in 1957.

What do we have now? We have a repudiation of the existing terms; not better terms and not an improvement in the terms but a repudiation of the existing terms.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Finance whose favourite word is "nonsense"—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Just as your favourite stock in trade is nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: —talked about the overselling of term 29. I take it that although the minister was not prepared to say so, he was referring primarily to the premier of Newfoundland in talking about this overselling, and if he was not he can correct me. In any case, to show how very precise the premier of Newfoundland was in his interpretation of term 29, let me say this. I have heard him interpret it on many occasions on public platforms. I have never heard him deviate from the terms at all. He has always explained very precisely what they were as he did at the dominion-provincial conference in November of 1957 as will be found at page 99 of the report of the proceedings where he said:

> Under the terms of reference,—

That is, of the royal commission. I continue:

> —under the terms of section 29, the royal commission will not be allowed to recommend that the parliament of Canada on your recommendation—

He was speaking to the Prime Minister at the time. I continue:

> —vote us more than enough to continue at the levels which we now have. In other words, the most we can hope for from the royal commission is enough to keep us 25 years behind Nova Scotia as she is today.

That was the interpretation and that was always the interpretation that was put upon it, as the plain terms show, that after eight years the purpose of this grant—if any was needed—was to continue the level of services then reached, not to improve the services and not to equalize at all. As Mr. St. Laurent said, it was to try to bring them up during the transitional period and after that to continue them.

The Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) do not seem to be able to understand that that is why the people of Newfoundland resent so bitterly all these reminders of the other things they are getting, in common with other Canadians, because they consider that they are entitled to their rights and that they are also entitled to be treated like other Canadians.

Term 29 to a Newfoundlander is almost the equivalent to a French-speaking citizen of Canada of the language term of the British North America Act. It is a sheet anchor. It is the right of Newfoundlanders to be assured that whatever comes they will have enough, without having to have punitive taxation higher than the rest of the provinces.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman permit a question arising out of the comparison he makes. Does he remember that Mr. St. Laurent said that the language rights of French Canada could be changed without consultation by a majority of parliament?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, I remember that very well but I also remember what else he said. He went on to state that no man of honour would ever do it. And that is precisely why, under the terms of union with Newfoundland, no one ever believed that this would happen.

Mr. Pearson: No person of honour would have made that change.

Mr. Pickersgill: It must be remembered that we had had no previous experience. No one would have believed that any Canadian government would have come into this house and proposed legislation to repudiate the terms of the British North America Act. That is what we have before the house today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Rot.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is why every Newfoundlander, except one or two, resents bitterly the action being taken by this government. It does not matter how many millions any minister says have been spent on family allowances or unemployment insurance in Newfoundland or how many millions have been spent on Atlantic provinces grants or on anything else which goes equally to other people. I admit that the Atlantic provinces grants do not go equally to other people but they go to four provinces and are given for one purpose—at least that is what we are told—and that purpose is to enable these four provinces to improve their situation, not to continue what they have but to improve their situation.

The Minister of Finance stood here on September 4 last year and said that because these Atlantic provinces grants were given to Newfoundland they could wait for another year for the disposition of this matter. That has not been forgotten either, in Newfoundland, and it is not going to be forgotten for a very long time to come.

The Prime Minister made a great deal of the dissatisfaction of the government of Newfoundland with the report of the royal commission and, of course, it is quite true that they were dissatisfied. It is not at all surprising to me that they should have been dissatisfied because they had appointed a royal commission consisting of very respected and eminent citizens of that province to prepare a case to be presented to the federal royal commission. They believed in that case and believed they had a good case. They suffered the natural disappointment that perhaps the Prime Minister himself has had at times when he believed that he had a good case and was not able to convince the judge.

The recommendations of the royal commission were objected to on one count and on one count only by the government of Newfoundland and that is that its recommendation —its award—was inadequate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And there was no review. I believe the hon. gentleman will agree that this was another ground on which objection was taken to the report.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I do not think the Prime Minister will find that to be the case—well, it may be that the Prime Minister is right. The reason why there was no review, of course, the Minister of Finance told us today, was that the commission did not have the power to recommend a review under term 29. I was rather surprised that the minister said that. I know that Mr. Ritchie said that to the commissioners and that presumably is what impressed the commissioners. That may very well be the reason why they did not provide for a review. I should be rather surprised if the premier of Newfoundland would have been very insistent about this question of a review if the commission had in fact recommended what was asked for, but that again is another matter.

At any rate, there were these two difficulties. The Prime Minister will also recall that as early as August 11 last year the premier of Newfoundland made an appeal to the Prime Minister—to which, incidentally, he received no reply—by telegram, asking that provision should be made on an interim basis for these payments because of the urgent need of the money to provide employment during the winter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know the hon. gentleman does not want to leave the wrong impression. A communication was made with me and then the premier and I had a discussion about this whole question.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I remember the events very well. If the Prime Minister will look it up I believe he will find that between August 11 when the telegram was received and September, any discussions that occurred must have been conducted by telephone. I recollect very clearly what took place and I put the telegrams on Hansard on either September 4 or September 6 of last year. There were three telegrams. The first telegram on August 11 asked for interim payments. Some days later there was a second telegram which asked for the review. Then there was a third telegram consequent upon the unanimous resolution of the legislature which came in on September 3. That was the occasion of this matter being raised in this house on September 4.

I say that this whole matter, which could have been disposed of on the basis on which we are now being asked to dispose of it just as well last September or last August as now, was postponed and the excuse that was given to this house by the Minister of Finance was that, well, they are getting $7,500,000 anyway that they would not have got if the Liberals were in office and therefore they can be denied their constitutional rights because they got some honey.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a question of privilege, if the hon. member is going to quote me I suggest that he quote me accurately and refer to Hansard and not use this mumbo-jumbo that he is now inflicting on the house. It bears little or no resemblance to what I said.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is pretty good at mumbo-jumbo. I was not purporting to quote him; I was purporting to paraphrase him.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A pretty bad perversion of what I said and he knows it pretty well.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are not in this debate at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would like to say it seems to me that this government has never understood at all, never appreciated at all, what term 29 meant and what it was about. The Prime Minister, having delved into my past, I will recall one incident in his. It so happened that he and I arrived in Newfoundland on the same day in the same airplane in the year 1957, on the same general mission. The Prime Minister was on television that evening and I had the pleasure of watching him. He was asked by Mr. Don Jamieson of CJON about the royal commission provided under the constitution, and his answer was that he did not think this royal commission should be appointed; there were too many royal commissions anyway.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As I recall it, there was no reference provided under the constitution.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think Mr. Jamieson mentioned the constitution. Everybody in Newfoundland and everybody who had anything to do with public affairs in Newfoundland knew perfectly well what the royal commission was that was provided for under the constitution. The Prime Minister was a member of this parliament; he took a large part in the debates at the time of union. He was the leader of the opposition. He was going to Newfoundland in that capacity for the first time to ask for the suffrage of the people; and on the most important question, the question that they attached more importance to in that province than any other, the Prime Minister did not know or had forgotten that under the constitution there was an obligation to appoint this royal commission. It seems to me that from the beginning to end of this matter that has been the attitude of this government; that there is no real obligation of any kind under term 29, no obligation at all; that what they have here is another of those fiscal arrangements on which they can make a dictate as they did, of course, at the beginning of the year 1958.

Now, we are asked in this bill, and the people of Newfoundland are asked, to be satisfied with this clause in the preamble:

> Whereas in the course of such a review any special circumstances relating to the financial position of the province of Newfoundland after the 31st day of March, 1962, would be taken into consideration.

Now we are asked to do this by this government that failed to keep the promise to all the provinces that the Prime Minister had made in November, 1957 that he would reconvene the conference in January, 1958. Therefore, the government is saying to the people of Newfoundland: Now, sell your birthright, give up your birthright, give up your rights under the constitution and accept instead our word that when our seminar is over, when our study group has completed its work and when 1962 comes along we will do right by you.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): How can any man in this chamber talk such nonsense?

Mr. Pearson: It is absolutely true, every word of it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Everybody who has had any experience—and I have had a good deal —with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements knows that one of the basic principles of all the agreements right from the start has been that whatever is offered to one province is equally available to all others. That has always been the principle, and the only deviation there has been from that principle—and I do not criticize it on that account—is in the case of the Atlantic provinces grants. Now here the people of Newfoundland are being told we are going to extinguish by this bill the rights you have under the constitution, the rights you have under term 29. They go out the window. You have no rights.

No longer after 1962 can you point to the charter, point to the British North America Act and say, "We are assured, as long as it is needed, that we will have enough money to provide the services"—not the services that they have in Ontario or Saskatchewan—"at the level they were in Newfoundland in 1957". That is all it is. It is not very much oversold, sir. That is what it is, and that is what is being taken away from the people of Newfoundland; this right that was written into the constitution is being taken away from them if this legislation is enacted.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the hon. member a question? Will he point to any words in this bill that are going to take anything away from Newfoundland?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The words there provide for payments to Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: The words that take it away are these:

> Whereas pursuant to the recommendations made by the royal commission established in fulfilment of the obligation—

There is no fulfilment of the obligation here; there is a "ratting" on the obligation. That is what there is and the hon. gentleman has a very uneasy conscience about it. What has happened here is that the government is trying to take away the rights under the constitution and substitute in their place the words of a preamble which hon. gentlemen know have no legal effect. How in the name of heaven do these gentlemen expect when they do not respect the constitution, when they disregard the constitution, to have anyone pay the slightest attention to a few words printed in the preamble of a bill which is itself a repudiation of an obligation?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Hon. W. J. Browne (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the bill which we are now examining is more illuminating than the resolution which we had before us yesterday. Yesterday, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) was explaining the resolution he did not stress some of the clauses in the preamble which I feel deserve very great consideration. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who is a law student, said this afternoon that the preamble has no legal effect. I think the lawyers in this house will disagree with him because, especially in a bill such as this, the preamble is of the utmost importance. It has legal effect, and will be so recognized in a court of law. The preamble deserves to be read, at least the two principal sections. It says:

> Whereas since the report of the royal commission was made, the government of Canada has proposed a comprehensive study of dominion-provincial financial relations in co-operation with the provinces, and all the provinces have agreed to participate therein;

That is all the provinces including Newfoundland.

> Whereas in the course of such a review any special circumstances relating to the financial position of the province of Newfoundland after the 31st day of March, 1962, would be taken into consideration;

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is much more definite than term 29 which contained the obligation of establishing a royal commission to make an investigation. Here the government pledges itself to take into consideration the special circumstances that would exist in Newfoundland after March 31, 1962. Opposition speakers do not seem to be able to get away from the provisions of term 29, and yet it was admitted here by several of them that the legal obligations established by the term had been fulfilled. We have now moved to another stage of the fiscal relationship between the dominion of Canada and the province of Newfoundland. It is admitted also that the federal government is doing its duty in fulfilling this recommendation up to March 31, 1962. We are making the payments which the royal commission recommended should be paid up until that time.

Opposition speakers, however, had little or no faith in the provisions for review to which I have referred. This is a review in which Newfoundland is able to bring forward any special circumstances, and I propose to elaborate on those as I go along. I listened to the hon. members on the other side of the house yesterday and today and, with the exception of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), most of them were full of dire forebodings about what was going to happen in Newfoundland after March 31, 1962. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) went further than his colleagues and he almost said, he certainly insinuated, that he did not trust the government. He said the same thing today, that he did not think the government should be trusted in connection with the provision that is contained in the preamble.

I was a member of the house of assembly of Newfoundland between 1954 and 1957, and I had a good many opportunities of hearing at first hand some of the views which the premier of Newfoundland held in regard to the terms of union, and indeed to some members of the federal Liberal government as well. But I resigned my seat and came up here because I thought that I could assist my colleagues when we were in opposition in demanding better terms from the government and if, as was likely going to happen, we were returned then our government would give better terms to the people of Newfoundland. I feel we have done so, and I think I can show that. I believe it can be easily shown that the government can be trusted to do what is right in the future and that already the government has done far more for Newfoundland during the two years it has been in office than was done during any similar period when the previous government was in office.

It is inevitable, I suppose, that we should have this discussion on term 29. It is a pity it did not take place before the terms of union were signed. But, Mr. Speaker, I have here all the debates that took place in the House of Commons, in the committees, in the Senate, and its committee, in the House of Lords in England and in the House of Commons in England, but I could not find a reference to term 29. It was not until it was drawn to my attention that the prime minister of the day, Mr. St. Laurent, had made a reference to it in the course of a long speech that I came across his statement.

This statement, of course, has been quoted here several times and is very illuminating on the attitude which the government must have taken at that time in regard to term 29. Why did this term 29 to which so much importance is now being attached escape the notice of the members of the House of Commons, the members of the Senate and other places when the matter was being discussed? Was it because they all took for granted the interpretation which the prime minister of the day, Mr. St. Laurent, had placed upon it?

In order to give some hon. members who were not here a proper perspective of the subject we are discussing, I should like to be permitted, for a few moments, to sketch in some of the background of this whole business. There have been some references, one by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), to an agreement between two sovereign nations, and many hon. members may not appreciate what really happened in 1949.

The government of Newfoundland was entitled to become a full-fledged dominion under the statute of Westminster in 1931, but the government of Newfoundland never took the step that was necessary to proclaim its intention to become a full-fledged dominion. They passed the legislation, but there was one part that did not become operative which would have made us a dominion. That year 1931 was a critical year in the history of Newfoundland. I remember it so well because I predicted what was likely to happen; I remember doing that. The government had been borrowing so much that it was not likely to be able to borrow the $8 million for which they were looking.

As a result we had quite a financial crisis, and we had to get the assistance of Canadian banks, the assistance of the Canadian government and the assistance of the United Kingdom government. There was an election in 1932, and a new government was elected. The new government was compelled to agree to the appointment of a royal commission appointed by the United Kingdom government, the Amulree commission, which investigated the financial situation in Newfoundland. They recommended that there should be a commission of government consisting of three members from Newfoundland, three members from the United Kingdom, with the governor presiding who would be the seventh member. This was done. They carried on the government of Newfoundland between 1934 and 1949 for a period of 15 years.

When they started they received financial assistance from the United Kingdom. But as fishing markets improved and world conditions improved after the crisis of the thirties, especially when the United States forces came in 1941 under the bases agreement, things began to pick up financially in Newfoundland. As a result, the commission of government was able to pay off a great proportion of Newfoundland's indebtedness and also have a surplus of nearly $50 million by the time the terms of union were signed in 1949.

In 1946 the United Kingdom government said: "Well, now, Newfoundland is self-supporting again and it should decide what its future is going to be". They decided to set up a national convention consisting of 45 members who would be elected from all over Newfoundland. These members would sit down and decide what the future of the government of Newfoundland would be. They did this. The 45 members were elected, one of whom was the present premier of Newfoundland and another was a gentleman who is in the other place, Senator Bradley, the former secretary of state. They sat down and discussed whether we should have a continuation of commission government or whether we should revert to responsible government, and the premier of Newfoundland advocated from the beginning that we should come into confederation with Canada. He tried to get people to support his view, but he could not get support for a long time. Eventually, he did.

The governor of Newfoundland wrote to Mr. Mackenzie King, the prime minister of Canada at the time in 1947 and said: "will you accept a delegation from the national convention of Newfoundland to see whether there is a basis existing for Newfoundland to become a province of the dominion of Canada." Mr. King wrote back and said yes, that he would be pleased to receive a delegation. The delegation was appointed and it came up here and they sat down together and they discussed the terms under which Newfoundland should come into confederation, to see whether there was a basis for Newfoundland coming into confederation. Most people overlook it, but that was another set of terms. There was no term 29 in that set but there was a term 14 which was a very much shorter one but similar one, a predecessor of term 29.

I should like to draw attention here to the fact that the original financial terms were very much less than the terms finally decided upon. They provided for transitional grants. The transitional grants afterwards were $6.5 million for the first three years, but the original terms on which the people voted in the summer of 1948 provided for only $3.5 million for the first three years and after that diminished by a sum of $350,000 a year until they disappeared in the twelfth year. Then term 14 as it was at that time, went on to say this:

> 14. In view of the difficulty of predicting with sufficient accuracy the financial consequences to Newfoundland of adjustment to provincial status the government of Canada will appoint a royal commission within eight years of union to review the financial position of Newfoundland and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, which may be required by the government of Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at then prevailing levels—

I quote this especially in reference to transitional grants, which, Mr. Speaker, you will notice were only $3.5 million and that was the maximum the government of that day thought that Newfoundland could get along on. And that is not so very long ago; that was in 1947—with $3.5 million.

That was sent to the national convention and they discussed it. They decided not to accept it by a vote of 29 to 16 and they decided to submit to the people of Newfoundland two alternatives only, whether the people wanted the return of responsible government as it was in 1933 or whether they wanted the continuation of the commission of government. But no alternative of confederation was on the ballot paper. They would not have that. The United Kingdom came into the picture then.

In the meantime Mr. Smallwood had presented a petition which he said had been signed by fifty thousand people demanding that it should be put on the ballot paper. The United Kingdom said, "this matter has been thoroughly discussed; the people are aware of the issues and we will put it on the ballot paper". I am quoting this to show the Leader of the Opposition that that would not happen to a sovereign nation. It happened because Newfoundland was not a sovereign nation at the time. Confederation was put on the ballot paper. In the first referendum responsible government came first, confederation second and commission government third. In the second referendum confederation was approved with a majority of 2 or 3 per cent.

When the prime minister of Canada of the day, namely Mr. Mackenzie King, wrote to the governor and sent the terms he had this to say:

> I feel I must emphasize that as far as the financial aspects of the proposed arrangements for union are concerned, the government of Canada believes that the arrangements go as far as the government can go under the circumstances. The government could not readily contemplate any change in these arrangements which would impose larger financial burdens on Canada.

Hence you see, Mr. Speaker, that in 1947 the government thought that $3.5 million a year was the utmost that the Canadian government could pay to the province of Newfoundland if it came into confederation.

After the referendum favoured confederation a new delegation was picked by the governor and was sent up here to negotiate the final terms. They came to Ottawa on October 5 and on December 11, 1948 the measure was signed embodying these final terms, including terms 28 and 29. Term 28 was the new transitional grant in which, as I pointed out, the original payments to Newfoundland were increased from $3.5 million a year was the utmost that the Canadian govving by $800,000 a year until the eighth year when they diminished by $350,000 a year. The late Sir Albert Walsh—may the Lord have mercy on him—told me that it was largely due to his efforts that the $16.5 million extra was gained for Newfoundland. I think the Leader of the Opposition who was, I believe, a member of the committee that negotiated with him will agree that his prestige and influence stood high with the government of the day, and the $16.5 million increase was gained on the offer which had come from Mr. Mackenzie King.

It must be remembered that these transitional grants were on a declining scale. Nobody on the other side of the chamber has yet asked this question: why is it that those transitional grants were on a declining scale? If now they think that Newfoundland's needs are getting greater and greater every year and ought to be provided for every year and spelled out in the bill why did they provide grants on a downward sliding scale? How much do you think these grants had declined up to 1956-57? Does the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate or any hon. member from Newfoundland know how much that grant had declined? I refer to the grant of $6.5 million of 1949-50. Do they know how much that grant had declined by 1956-57? Can they tell me? Let me tell them that it had declined to $2,250,000. That is all that Newfoundland was receiving in 1956-57, namely $2.25 million. I should like everyone to remember how little Newfoundland was receiving from the dominion government in the eighth year of union. They show such a great interest in Newfoundland now. No wonder.

I have here the Auditor General's report for 1958. In that is given the revenue and expenditure for 1957-58 and for 1956-57. Despite that low transitional grant of $2.25 million in 1956-57, the Newfoundland government balanced its budget that year. It is not necessary to refer to all of the terms of union. There are a great many of them. However, I want to point out that when Newfoundland went into confederation Newfoundland had a cash surplus of $45 million. The federal government took over $46 million of debt, leaving Newfoundland with a debt of only $6 million. Was there ever a country in the world that started off with greater advantages than did Newfoundland owing only $6 million and with $45 million cash to start with? I hate to tell you what the public debt is now, Mr. Speaker. The debt of Newfoundland, I am sure must be up to nearly $100 million, direct and indirect. Where is the $45 million surplus? I know where $28 million of it went. It went into the great industries, the great socialist enterprises which the socialist premier of Newfoundland started. When I was on the political platform it was $25 million. I used to say "Do you know how much money the government got back out of that?" I looked in my pocket for a coin and I did not have a cent, so I had to show them whatever I had say, a ten cent piece. But the government did not get 10 cents back out of the principal and interest and all the money which went into the socialized industries, and it is my "dear friend", the premier of Newfoundland who sets himself up as a judge of royal commissions and a judge of the prime ministers of governments. He is the one who knows how everything should be done. I used to say that you could start at the end of Water street in St. John's, walk two miles along, and you would pass private enterprises all the way along the road. You can start off at Duckworth street and go another two miles up as far as Mrs. Power's shop, which has been in existence for 75 years, and every one was operated with private capital and every one was making a living for the people who operated them, and the government was giving out $25 million to Germans, Latvians and anyone who cared to take it and they never returned one cent of interest or capital on the capital invested in them.

Mr. Carter: Would the hon. minister say what this has to do with term 29?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member can speak afterwards, I have not much time.

Mr. Pearson: He will.

Mr. Browne (St John's West): As I said, the public debt of Newfoundland was only $6 million in 1949, $20 per head. The per capita debt in Canada was $875, and I said that Newfoundland should have received payment on the same principles adopted in 1867 and when the other provinces came in after that date. They should have been given credit for the difference in the per capita debt. If that had been done with regard to Newfoundland, Newfoundland would have received something like $13 million a year. I am happy to say that since this government came into office Newfoundland is receiving more than it would have received if that principle had been carried out.

I may say that in 1895 that principle was used to prevent Newfoundland's entry into confederation. Our public debt was greater per capita than Canada's was, and amounted to a difference of $5 million which the Canadian government would not accept. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) wants the Canadian government—I looked up his speech—to pay to Newfoundland financial assistance necessary to continue public services at the levels and standards reached by 1956-57. The brilliant hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate today said the same thing. He said, "It is a very simple matter; all you do is to keep it at the 1956-57 level." Remember that, that is what they want; they want to keep it at the 1956-57 level. I have here a report of the royal commission. Let us see what their recommendations are about the levels and standards of services in Newfoundland. At page 21 the royal commission said:

> It should be made clear, at this point, that we have decided to proceed upon the assumption that the levels and standards of public service are indicated by their cost.

I repeat, "are indicated by their cost".

> For example, if $100,000 is spent on the salaries of doctors and nurses to provide a health service, we assume for the purpose of our study that $100,000 is the measure of the flow of service which results from that expenditure.

Now let us see what the cost of the services was in 1956-57 and in the years since we assumed office. I have here the Auditor General's report for Newfoundland for the year ending March 31, 1958. This gives the actual expenditure for 1956-57 at $43,892,000, and for 1957-58 at $51,509,000. I also have here the budget of the Hon. Mr. Spencer for this year in which he sets out the estimated expenditures for last year and the expenditures for this year. The current account expenditure for 1958-59, estimated originally in the amount of $59 million, resulted in an expenditure of $63,887,600. For 1959-60 the estimated total current expenditure is $67,545,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was $67 million, I think the hon. member will find.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There is an increase of current account expenditure. In 1956-57, $43,892,000; in 1959-60, $67.5 million; that is an increase of over 50 per cent. Do the hon. members for Burin-Burgeo and Bonavista-Twillingate want to go back to those standards of 1956-57? That is what they were advocating here this afternoon.

Mr. Carter: Does the hon. member want an answer?

Mr. Pearson: He asked a question.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): These expenditures, Mr. Speaker, were made possible by the recommendations of the McNair report which we are implementing and by the Atlantic provinces grants, and by a special addition to the standard tax and by other new and increased grants to Newfoundland under various other departments.

Let us take the unconditional grants for Newfoundland which were put on the record yesterday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) at page 5901 of Hansard. Just compare these. The unconditional grants are as follows. Some hon. members may not be familiar with this thing. I have been going over and over this, I suppose, more than any other person in Canada, except perhaps the editor of the St. John's daily News who has been writing a series of articles on it. But I have lived with this for the last two years. The unconditional grants in 1956 and 1957 included the transitional grant and the tax rental agreement; it included the equalization grant, the stabilization grant and so forth. In 1956-57 the figure was $17,838,000; in 1957-58, $19,244,000; in 1958-59—prepare for a shock now, hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—$40,847,000; in 1959-60, $36,587,000. These grants have been increased over 110 per cent in three years taking into account 1959-60. Does the hon. member want to insist that we set the standards in Newfoundland at the 1956-57 level?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, let us come back to the transitional grants and those special grants that carry no return at all because the tax rental agreement brings a return into Canada. The transitional grant for 1956-57 was $2,250,000. Remember I told you that the only free payment made by the Canadian government in 1956-57 to Newfoundland was $2,250,000. For 1957-58 Newfoundland will get $8 million, because it gets $6,600,000 under the McNair report; in 1958-59, $15,500,000; in 1959-60, $15,500,000 plus the 3 per cent increase in the standard tax. So you see an increase from $2,250,000 in 1956-57 to $15,500,000 in 1959-60. Do you still want to go back to the standards of 1956-57?

The Leader of the Opposition criticized the Minister of Finance and said it was most unfair to justify a change in the recommendations by the argument that since union Newfoundland had also received a good deal of financial help from Ottawa along with the other Atlantic provinces. The Minister of Finance was not justifying anything; he was just stating facts, and he put all those facts on record in Hansard where they are mute but eloquent testimony of the assistance which Newfoundland has received from our government in the past two years, assistance far and away beyond anything which had been received from the previous government.

I think the Leader of the Opposition does not want to hear about all the things that this government has done for Newfoundland since it came to office. He does not like to hear what increased financial assistance has been provided.

Mr. Pearson: I want to hear about this bill.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That's right. You want to get back to the 1956-57 standards of $2,250,000. As far as Newfoundland is concerned, as far as Newfoundlanders are concerned and as far as constituents of Bonavista-Twillingate, of Burin-Burgeo and any other part of Newfoundland are concerned, it does not make any difference whether the money comes in under term 29 or whether it comes in under the Atlantic provinces adjustment act or whether it comes in in any of the different ways in which money has been flowing into the treasury of Newfoundland since we came to office. It makes no difference. My hon. friend the minister of health (Mr. Monteith) could say something about this. How much was the Newfoundland government getting from the federal government in respect of hospital insurance in 1956-57? Nothing. How much were they getting from the federal government in 1959-60 for hospital insurance; how much was any province getting before we came into office? Not a cent. How much is Newfoundland getting now? More than $4 million, $4.6 million, to be exact. Perhaps hon. members opposite do not like hearing about the increase in hospital insurance payments, the increases under the health grants, the increase in unemployment assistance, the increase in university grants—

Mr. Pearson: With 30 per cent unemployment, you needed an increase in unemployment assistance.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): —the increase in grants for picnic sites and access roads and so on—all money contributed by the federal government to the government of Newfoundland resulting in an improvement of services, and levels and standards of services in that province. All that money from whatever source it comes and into whatever department of government in Newfoundland it goes is used equally for the benefit of Newfoundland. Surely a contribution of over $4 million to the department of health on account of the hospital insurance scheme constituting as it does, I believe, 71 per cent of the total cost of the insurance scheme in Newfoundland is something that should be known to the Leader of the Opposition and to all other members in this house as well as to people all over Newfoundland.

Mr. Pearson: We know all about it. It was Liberal legislation.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It does not make any difference either if grants of a similar kind are made to other provinces as long as Newfoundland is getting its share. As I say, the Minister of Finance was not attempting to justify any change in the recommendations; he was just citing the facts.

Let us look at the total revenue which Newfoundland is receiving today. You will find these figures listed in the public accounts of Newfoundland and in the estimates for various years.

They are:

Total revenue ..	$44,095,000	$49,200,000	$74,140,000
Federal grants ..	22,100,000	24,000,000	49,726,000

The federal grants are 66 per cent of the total revenue of Newfoundland in 1958-59 as compared to 50 per cent in 1956-57.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: That includes the money which has not yet been paid.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I know exactly what the hon. member is going to say. He is going to say that that includes the amount for 1957-58.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, it does.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): And in 1959-60 the total revenue will amount to no less than $71,587,000.

Now, I have here the revenue of the province of New Brunswick, a province which is 50 per cent larger than the province of Newfoundland, yet the revenue is not 50 per cent greater. Indeed, it is very little larger than the revenue of the province of Newfoundland. I suppose I may as well give it to the house. I have it here. The revenue of the province of New Brunswick for 1959-60 is $74,888,000 and the revenue of Newfoundland which is only two-thirds the size is $72 million dollars. And of that sum the federal grant amounts to $46,800,000, or no less than 65 per cent.

Now let us compare the increase in the provincial revenue—the real provincial revenue—with the increase in the federal grants:

	(millions of dollars)
Provincial Revenue .	22.0	25.2	24.4	24.0

There is an increase of about 12 per cent in provincial revenue between 1956-57 and 1959-60. Whereas the federal grants show an increase of over 110 per cent in the same period.

Thus it can be seen that the revenues of Newfoundland have suddenly increased since we took office and the standards and levels of public services have increased accordingly. The credit is due entirely to us, and these patriots, these men who love Newfoundland—there are no traitors among them—all want to go back to the 1956-57 standard.

The levels and standards have increased to a degree that no one, not even the premier of Newfoundland himself, had ever imagined was possible. The Newfoundland minister of finance himself said he never dreamed he would be bringing in a budget of $74 million dollars, and nobody else did either. This is not accidental. This is the result of the policy of our government. Newfoundland has never been so well treated as it has during the past two years under the able leadership of our Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), and no one knows this better than the premier of Newfoundland and my good friend—I wish I could say my learned friend—the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

What is the policy of the government? Yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate read from the report of the federal-provincial proceedings for November, 1957. I do not think I have time to read from it—

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, go ahead.

Mr. Pearson: I think the minister ought to be given time to get to the bill.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I thank the hon. member for that suggestion because I know he does not want to get away from it.

Mr. Chevrier: I think the minister ought to say a few words in French, too.

(Translation):

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Perhaps I will say a few words in French—

(Text):

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) read from the federal-provincial conference proceedings of 1957. This is another book I keep very close to me and read from time to time because I find it most inspiring.

Mr. Pickersgill: Almost archeological.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I would like to read particularly the opening speech of the Prime Minister in which he said:

> We desire to achieve harmony in the operation of our governmental institutions in Canada.

Again he said:

> The purpose of each of us here today, as premier Smallwood said in effect, is to come together in a spirit of amity, to endeavour while maintaining the spirit and intent of the British North America Act to assure the ability and capacity of the federal and provincial governments to discharge their respective constitutional functions.

He then went on:

> We believe that this federation cannot thrive in a climate of glaring disparities in levels and standards of service and development—

Does that not have a familiar ring: "levels and standards of service"? Those words came from term 29. I continue:

> —as between the several provinces from Newfoundland to British Columbia. It is our opinion that positive government is necesary both at the dominion and provincial levels in assuring national development and we are prepared to assist provinces in carrying out their functions where we agree that is necessary and when parliament approves. We are prepared to consider on their merits major projects which will contribute to national development and which are beyond the capacities of any of the provinces.

Has that not been carried out in New Brunswick and in Saskatchewan? It will be carried out in other provinces as well.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree to give the hon. member additional time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, my hon. friends.

The Prime Minister went on to say:

Now may I turn for a moment to the subject of fiscal relations in particular. As I view the situation, the first problem we have to consider is the need for some special recognition of the situation of the Atlantic provinces. There is, of course, a royal commission considering the particular problem of Newfoundland in accordance with the undertaking in the terms of union, so I shall not endeavour to express opinions upon Newfoundland's position pending receipt of the recommendations of the commission.

My hon. friend quoted this. I continue:

I believe that we all recognize, however, that the Atlantic provinces as a group are confronted with greater difficulties in public finance than the rest of the nation, if they are to maintain the sort of provincial and municipal services that Canadians generally expect.

Are these the words of a man who is unfair or untrue to the interests of Newfoundland or of any province in Canada? I say no. Those are words expressing the thoughts of a man who is really ambitious to see that all parts of Canada shall have equal opportunities to progress. The Prime Minister went on to say:

My colleagues and I are prepared to recommend to parliament some form of special assistance to the governments of the Atlantic provinces. I ask you to consider—

I repeat, "I ask you to consider"—you, meaning the group of premiers. I continue:

I ask you to consider what the total amount should be and how best it can be divided, for it must not be forgotten that this assistance will be provided by all the people of Canada.

We know what happened. They recommended $100 million for the Atlantic provinces and Newfoundland was to receive $30 million of that. My friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate knows that that sum will go into every harbour, cove, town and settlement in his dear district of Bonavista-Twillingate as much as it will go into mine.

Not only Atlantic grants totalling $30 million in four years are to be considered, but there is also the Atlantic power act. I should like to ask what happened to the request of the premier of Newfoundland concerning the building of a transmission line from Bay d'Espoir? We agreed to do that at a cost of $10 million. What happened? We have not heard about it since we told the premier about it.

When that $30 million was voted for Newfoundland we received letters of thanks from the parliaments of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia but no one heard a sound from Newfoundland. Did anyone hear what the premier had to say about it? No, he just tucked it in his pocket and never said a word of thanks. The first sign of any gratitude came from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate yesterday when he said he approved of it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said so on the bill, too.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That was the first indication we had of any gratitude. This money was really a godsend to Newfoundland. I do not know how the province would have got along without it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I agree.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In 1958-59 Newfoundland is to have a surplus of $12 million and in 1959-60 a surplus of $4 million, as a result of what is being paid. I am sure the present Minister of Finance of the federal government would like to have even that small surplus.

The Leader of the Opposition said that the problem was complicated. If the problem is complicated the report of the commission is extremely complicated. I do not know how many hon. members have read this report but it certainly is a difficult report. I found it exceedingly difficult to understand. If they read it thoroughly they will recognize that what the government is doing represents a very much better means of solving the financial problems of Newfoundland than was provided for under term 29.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo said that this bill postpones a final settlement indefinitely and he is right. There can never be any final settlement to the relationship between the federal government and the provinces. The original subsidies were given to the provinces in 1867 and thereafter have been changed ten times. It is reasonable to conclude that this parliament is not attempting to write finis to financial aid to Newfoundland. I should like to compliment the hon. member for Assiniboia for his very reasonable speech. I really expected he would support this measure from the way he spoke.

The bill provides for a review of fiscal relations between Newfoundland and Canada before March 31, 1962. The special circumstances of Newfoundland will be considered.

If the present premier of Newfoundland is in office then—which I hope he will not be, for the good of Newfoundland—he will be able to put forward in his own inimitable way, probably assisted by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who is so close to him, very good arguments as to why Newfoundland should continue to receive financial aid.

The action of this government in providing special Atlantic grants was a guarantee of the goodwill of this government toward Newfoundland and of its future attitude toward that province. Those grants amount to $7,500,000 a year.

We heard the hon. member for Assiniboia speak of the poor housing and bad roads in Newfoundland. He said it was appalling to see the roads there. In contrast let me read one or two extracts from the budget speech of the minister of finance of Newfoundland. He said:

> I think it will be universally agreed that the union of Newfoundland and Canada has been a very happy one, and a very successful one. You could almost count on the fingers of your two hands the number of persons in this province today who do not share the universal view.

In the final paragraph he made another interesting statement. Before I read this part I want to remind the house that an hon. gentleman yesterday read extracts from the report of the royal commission to the effect that the commission found that there had been very little improvement in public services in the first eight years following confederation. Now listen to the final paragraph of the speech of the provincial finance minister:

> And so, Mr. Speaker, we have seen ten years of confederation. We have seen ten years of steady and in some respects spectacular success. Newfoundland is beyond all comparison healthier, richer and happier than she ever was before. We are better fed, better clothed, better housed than we ever were. We have more roads, more cars, more electric light, more of almost everything than we had ten years ago.

Those are the words of Mr. Spencer, the minister of finance of Newfoundland. If the commission found that very little change had taken place in the province in the first eight years, then our government must get the credit for all of the progress made. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that every member of this house rejoices in the progress that has been related by the Newfoundland minister of finance, and I am quite sure that everyone, even the members of the opposition, recognize in their hearts that we have contributed most substantially and made the greatest contribution to that progress and to that happy state described by the minister of finance.

In Labrador, the government of Newfoundland still has rights left, rights to royalties, not rights to timber, water power or minerals, but rights to royalties from those companies which are exploiting the minerals there. In the very near future Newfoundland expects large revenues from those royalties. We hope that soon materializes; we hope the progress described will continue and we believe that with the help of our government Newfoundland will have a greater and a happier future than any of the members of the opposition ever dreamed of.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I cannot conscientiously support the principle of this bill because if I did I believe I would be acting as a traitor not only to the people of Newfoundland but to the people of mainland Canada as well since today, in so far as this question is concerned, their integrity and their honour rest in our hands. My reasons for saying this are as follows: In the first place, this bill is a part of the Canadian constitution but its principle is to destroy one of the constitutional rights of Newfoundland, a right which was the determining factor that caused Newfoundland to agree to become a part of Canada. It removes the substance from our constitution and substitutes a shadow in its place.

I was not only surprised, I was shocked, to hear the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), say that the legal obligations of our constitution have been fulfilled in this bill. How can a legal obligation be fulfilled by a bill which destroys one of our rights under the constitution of Canada? And if there is no legal obligation, what about the moral obligation? Is that not important, to the hon. member for St. John's West? Term 29 no longer exists when this bill is passed and in its place we shall have a vague promise of a review that will take place some time after March 31, 1962 and which will take into consideration the special circumstances of Newfoundland.

One may well ask, if the guarantees contained in the constitution of Canada itself have no value, what worth can be placed on any assurance given in this bill? In this respect the principle of the bill is contrary to the principle of the constitution itself—the British North America Act, of which this bill is a part, since it finalizes the union of Newfoundland with Canada. Not only is the principle of this bill contrary to that of the constitution but it violates the spirit of the constitution in that it terminates by unilateral action a solemn agreement between two sovereign parties. The sins of the former Liberal government, recounted by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) this afternoon, are no justification for that. Two wrongs can never make a right and the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for St. John's West, can quote figures until he is black in the face, and still these facts remain. They cannot be obliterated and they cannot be justified.

The action contemplated by this bill and the attitude which it indicates are prejudicial to national unity. Ten years ago of their own free will Newfoundland took an irrevocable step, placing their faith solely in the honour and in the integrity of the Canadian people. Now at a time when national unity is so important and should be our main objective, the bitterness and the resentment of a half million Newfoundlanders who are stung by a sense of betrayal—

Mr. Grafftey: Who provoked it?

Mr. Carter: —are something terrible to contemplate.

The constitutional aspects of this bill were fully discussed yesterday and again today and I do not propose to go any further into that question except to reply to one point made by the Minister of Finance. Yesterday the minister said, and I am quoting from page 5898 of yesterday's Hansard:

> The second question which arises is as to what the commission meant by the word "thereafter" in the final line of the final recommendation. This naturally presents a question, and in endeavouring to determine the meaning to be given to this expression in the report one must of course have regard to the fact that these commissioners are not men who are given to expressing themselves in words of imprecise meaning.

This is what the minister said yesterday but what did he say last September? I am quoting now from Hansard of September 4 at page 4624. This is what the minister said then:

> I have indicated that this is not a matter for one year but one that is going to be of continuing effect in the years to come. The royal commission has not set any particular period on the time within which the proposed annual payments of $8 million less transitional grants are to run. Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with a very large matter.

Mr. Pearson: When did he change his mind on that?

Mr. Carter: This, of course, was before the minister had time to think up a change of position. I am not going to take the time to elaborate on these two statements because they speak for themselves.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Pearson: It will take all the longer if you start that.

Mr. Carter: I am going to take my time. The adequacy or otherwise of these payments included in this bill will be dealth with by my colleague from Newfoundland. Money is always important, particularly to a have-not province, but whatever payments are made under this bill or any other measure will depend largely upon the spirit and attitudes we develop toward each other as separate parts of a great nation which has been so appropriately designated a dominion. This, in turn, will depend upon our ideas, our concepts and comprehension of what confederation was meant to be and what it actually has become. An act of parliament can join two countries together, but it cannot achieve unity and a nation without unity is like an empty shell without the all important kernel; it looks all right on the outside but the vital seed, life powers so essential to future growth and development, is missing.

The act of union of 1840 is a fine example of this. It joined together Upper and Lower Canada into a union which Sir John A. Macdonald himself referred to in a speech at Halifax as nominal only. When we Canadians discuss national unity we are prone to think mostly in terms of French speaking and English speaking Canadians. This is certainly a very important aspect of the problem as the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) pointed out in his excellent address at the opening of this session. But equally important, and equally difficult to solve, is the problem of unity between English speaking Canadians in general and between the nine English speaking provinces in particular. It is right and proper that we should work to achieve unity with our French speaking compatriots. But should we overlook the necessity of putting forth any effort to achieve unity amongst ourselves? In the absence of a language barrier, for some unaccountable reason we assume that unity follows automatically. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The whole course of our history since confederation proves the fallacy of that assumption. If we need any further proof we need only go back to the dominion-provincial fiscal conference in 1957. Anyone who analyses the speeches made by the 10 provincial premiers on that occasion could only conclude that far from having a national concept, we think and act as if Canada were merely a group of separate states joined together by the Canadian National Railways and the C.B.C. Perhaps we should not be surprised at this because if we look back through the corridors of our history we find that it was ever thus.

The dominion-provincial conference to which I referred a minute ago only confirmed that we have made very little real progress toward genuine national unity. Such unity as we appear to have is more glitter than gold, more shadow than substance. It may appear genuine on the surface, but if we are honest we must admit it does not run very deep; our divisions are still very real. They arise primarily out of mutual suspicion and mistrust.

An hon. Member: Caused by the Liberals.

Mr. Carter: There was distrust of the motives of the two Canadas when they approached the maritime provinces and held out to them this vision of a Canadian nation. This distrust, unhappily, has been confirmed over and over again by the actions and attitudes of the central provinces during the past 80 years. Hon. members who have been indoctrinated with the myth that the poor down and out Atlantic provinces sought union with Canada for their own benefit may be surprised to learn that it was Canada, and not the maritimes, who made the first approach. These are historical facts. The reasons are quite clear. The maritimes could get along without Canada, but for central Canada confederation was an absolute necessity.

To refresh our minds let us go back in history to the period in which confederation first took place. At that time the British North American colonies were divided into two isolated groups separated by hundreds of miles of uninhabited wilderness from Upper and Lower Canada in central Canada to the maritime provinces on the eastern seaboard. The minister yesterday made this statement, and I am reading now from page 5903 of Hansard:

> —does anyone doubt that honourable solutions of fiscal problems between the provinces and the dominion after that date will be earnestly sought? This is the way the Canadian confederation has worked, and in the view of the government this is the way the Canadian confederation will work in 1962 and in the years to come.

This, sir, is precisely the point. We do not want confederation to work—at least I do not want confederation to work—in the years to come as it has worked in the years gone by. We want to learn from our mistakes, not repeat them. As I said, the Canadas were separated from the maritimes and to their south was a new, vigorous and prosperous nation, the United States, which had come into being 100 years before. This nation had broken away from the mother country and the crown to which the British North American colonies owed allegiance and appeared to take it for granted that sooner or later the British North American colonies would seek union with them. The hostility between the United States and Great Britain engendered by the American revolution was renewed by the American civil war which was going on at that time and in which Great Britain sympathized openly and assisted the cause of the southern states.

It was natural that this hostility should overflow toward the British colonies. The British government had learned from bitter experience in the American revolution how difficult it was for their regular armies to wage war in the North American wilderness—

Mr. McGrath: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Carter: —and was deeply conscious of their inability to defend their North American colonies from a concentrated attack by the United States. They were anxious, therefore—

Mr. McGrath: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Carter: I will permit any questions you want to ask after I am finished.

Mr. McGrath: I want to know what relationship this has to the bill?

Mr. Carter: You wait a minute, and you will find out. The British government was very anxious that the North American colonies should take some responsibility for their own defence, and to do this some form of union between them was necessary. It was in this setting that the British North American colonies found themselves in the year 1864, and for the benefit of my hon. friend if he cannot contain his patience, I refer to this because it affords an interesting parallel between the experience of Newfoundland and the experience of the other maritime provinces since confederation.

In 1864 the maritime provinces began taking steps to form a confederation of their own. It was a propitious time. The maritime provinces were enjoying unprecedented prosperity based on their shipbuilding industry, their shipping industry and a lucrative foreign trade.

They had developed sound economies with both Nova Scotia and New Brunswick budgeting for surpluses of nearly half a million dollars. That is not exactly hay even in these days, but in those days it was something relatively huge. With their public debt of about $13 per head, their financial position generally was sound and capital was flowing in to develop their natural resources. Mines were being opened up, manufacturing industries were being established and prosperity was growing. Recognizing the threat to their security and bearing in mind that union had brought prosperity to the colonies in the south, in 1864 they took the first steps towards bringing about a maritime confederation.

It was then that Sir John A. Macdonald and Hon. George Etienne Cartier arrived on the scene with their vision of a British North American nation and their proposal that the maritime provinces should unite with them to bring it about. As a further inducement they held out the prospects of the maritime provinces becoming the Massachusetts of British North America. The manufacturing industries of the maritimes would supply the agricultural economy of central Canada. The intercolonial railway which the maritime provinces had planned to build for themselves would be extended to Montreal and Toronto, with central Canada bearing the largest cost. Thus maritime coal would have a market in central Canada and the maritime provinces would provide a market for central Canada beef and farm produce. In addition to this domestic trade, all the foreign trade of the confederated provinces was going to flow through maritime ports; and Halifax and Saint John, New Brunswick were destined to take their place among the great emporiums of the world. These promises were all outlined in speeches by Sir John A. Macdonald and Hon. George Etienne Cartier as they toured the maritime capitals, and they are a matter of record.

This idea of a British North American nation appealed to the patriotic instincts of the maritime people but they were frankly sceptical of the purity of the motives that prompted it. They had heard of the old saying "Beware of the Greeks, especially when they come bringing gifts". They knew that Upper and Lower Canada were enjoying a measure of prosperity but they knew also that it was based largely on trade with the United States which would diminish, if not disappear, when the civil war ended. They knew that the population of Upper Canada, like their own, had been greatly increased by the influx of Loyalists from the United States. They were aware that while the population of the two Canadas was over three times as great as theirs combined, yet the per capita public debt was $65 as compared with theirs of $13.

They were aware that the two Canadas themselves were joined together in a union which was so imcompatible that it could not possibly work and would have to be dissolved. They were conscious of the fact that the St. Lawrence seaway, frozen up five months or six months out of the year, made the two Canadas dependent on the United States for an outlet to the sea. This made them particularly vulnerable to pressure from the United States which could force them into political union simply by denying them access to the sea. The maritime leaders knew that without access to the sea the economic life of the two Canadas would be severely restricted, if not completely strangled and that unless the maritimes confederated with them the two Canadas could never of themselves become a nation and would eventually be absorbed into the United States economy.

They saw that Upper and Lower Canada had nothing to lose and everything to gain from their proposals while the maritimes had much to lose, including their industries and their prosperity, because they would become a captive market, and whatever benefits they received would depend entirely on the good faith of the people and the government of central Canada. Consequently they had misgivings; and so for them confederation would be an act of faith.

But the maritime provinces, like Newfoundland, had one vulnerable spot. Their Achilles heel was an overwhelming patriotism and loyalty to the British crown and British traditions. For the sake of ensuring that North America would remain within the British commonwealth, in 1867 they finally entered into union. They knew it would involve some sacrifice and they were prepared to make it out of loyalty and patriotism in order to preserve British influence in North America.

But they saw too that the vision of a British nation in North America could become a reality and that their prosperity need not be impaired—and could even be improved—provided that the central provinces were sincere and would live up to their side of the bargain. So they came into confederation fully realizing, that like Newfoundland they were putting themselves completely at the mercy of central Canada whose larger representation would control the federal government and their only protection was sincerity, good will and good faith on the part of those whose proposals they had accepted.

Ninety years have now passed and to what extent has that faith been justified? What is the verdict of history? I am not going to take the time of the house to deal with that matter because we know what has happened. We know what world emporiums are on the Atlantic seaboard. We know what has happened to the shipping industry, the shipbuilding industry and to the prosperity of the maritimes. The answers to all these questions are recorded in history and they prove that the scepticism and fears of the people of the maritimes were well founded when the Upper Canada "Greeks" appeared with their gifts and promises.

Once their dependence on the United States had been removed; once their means of defence had been organized and a line of defence communications set up to make possible supplies and reinforcements from the mother country; and once the outlets on the Atlantic seaboard had been secured to permit expansion of their trade and commerce, central Canada had little further use for the maritimes, and the great national vision became concentrated within the confines of Upper and Lower Canada.

No blame is to be attached to the ordinary people of those days because they were uninformed. Mass communications were few and far between and were poor in quality. But the federal government of the day certainly knew what was going on and it is on them that the blame must be placed. The big business interests of central Canada had no intention whatever of permitting strong competitive economies to develop on the eastern seabord and they succeeded in bringing to bear on the federal government sufficient pressure to ensure the success of their plans.

It was not long before the maritime provinces—deprived of their trading advantages, forced to buy in a captive market, victims of preferential tariffs designed to protect the industries and economy of central Canada to which their own economies had been made prisoner—began to assume the status of poor relations dependent upon the bounty and generosity of their sister provinces. That is the way that confederation has worked in the past. I ask the Minister of Finance whether that is the way in which he wants it to work in the years to come.

Newfoundland did not have any part in this great North American drama but she was a very interested spectator. She did not send delegates to the Charlottetown conference when the maritime confederation was being discussed, but she did send two delegates—Hon. F. B. T. Carter and Hon. Ambrose Shea—to the Quebec conference where the resolutions embodying the terms of the larger union were drawn up.

These terms were so unacceptable that Newfoundland rejected them outright, as indeed did Prince Edward Island and the other maritime provinces. In New Brunswick the proponents of confederation were so roundly defeated in a provincial election that Dr. Tupper, the Conservative leader, dared not risk an election in Nova Scotia on the same issue and the people of Nova Scotia to this day have never had a chance to vote on that issue.

Thirty years later, as the Minister without Portfolio pointed out, in 1894 Newfoundland, after experiencing a series of disasters—

Mr. McPhillips: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am following the text and I find that the hon. member has made a mistake in his speech.

Mr. Pearson: That is very clever.

Mr. Speaker: This has been a very general debate, but the hon. member, as I followed him, spent about 15 minutes on confederation without seeming to relate it to the bill. I hope he will do so in the time which remains.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I was endeavouring to draw a parallel between the experience of Newfoundland over the last ten years and the experience of the maritime provinces over the last 80 years, and I was replying to a statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), who said he wanted confederation to work in the years to come in the same way as it had worked in years past. If that is what the Minister of Finance wants, that is something which I do not want.

As I said, in 1894 Newfoundland, after experiencing a series of disasters, made overtures to the government of Canada concerning confederation. The terms offered on that occasion were so harsh that even in the dire extremity in which she found herself Newfoundland had no choice but to reject them again. But by 1949 circumstances had changed. Due to the establishment of United States bases, good fisheries, a flourishing paper industry and successful mining developments, Newfoundland was prosperous as never before in her history. She had accumulated a surplus of $40 million and her public debt had almost vanished. Her population was over 350,000. She owned 100,000 square miles of territory of vast potential wealth in Labrador and two great international airports at Gander and Goose Bay. Moreover, two wars had demonstrated her strategic importance as the sentinel of the Atlantic guarding the eastern gateway to Canada. Now she could enter confederation without coming empty-handed to the wedding, and so the marriage took place on March 31, 1949. Today that marriage is being consummated. It should be a day of rejoicing. In Newfoundland it is a day of sorrow, because if the entry of the maritimes into confederation was an act of faith, the entry of Newfoundland was doubly so. We had no elected government of our own to negotiate on even terms with the government of Canada or even to represent the will of the people during those negotiations.

The hon. member for St. John's West tried to make much of the point that Newfoundland did not have her sovereignty. The hon. member knows very well why Newfoundland did not have her sovereignty. At the time

Newfoundland was governed by a dictatorship appointed by the British crown and not elected by the Newfoundland people, which did not represent the wishes of the Newfoundland people but represented only the will of the British government in London, and the will of the British government was to force Newfoundland into confederation come what may.

Mr. McGrath: What did you do to try to restore sovereignty in 1949?

Mr. Carter: What was that?

Mr. McGrath: I said, what did you do to try to restore sovereignty in 1949? Let the hon. member answer that question.

Mr. Carter: Does the hon. gentleman know what any person can do under a dictatorship? I think I should remind the hon. gentleman and the other hon. members of the house that it was the very hon. gentleman from St. John's West, the Minister without Portfolio, who was one of the gentlemen who gave away Newfoundland's sovereignty.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I think I should not let that stand uncontradicted on the record and I rise on a question of privilege. I cannot be said to be the one who gave away Newfoundland's sovereignty, because we did not have true sovereignty. That is, Newfoundland was not a dominion under the statute of Westminster.

Mr. Carter: There will be lots of time to reply to the hon. gentlemen. The referendum which took place in Newfoundland concerning confederation showed only a majority of some 7,000 votes out of 150,000 votes cast, and that only on the second ballot. We had no battery of economic experts to prepare our case or to examine and analyse our estimated revenues and financial requirements as worked out by the federal experts, calculations which the hon. gentleman from St. John's West has admitted contained tremendous errors of 100 per cent and over. But we did have term 29 which made it possible for all errors to be corrected after a trial period of eight years and we, like the people of the maritimes, were willing to trust the people of Canada that they would do right by us when the time arrived. Term 29 was to be our lifesaver, our sheet anchor, our only protection against all eventualities that might arise in the future.

The Minister without Portfolio asked, did we want to go back to the levels of 1957? Who said anything about going back to the levels of 1957?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You did.

[Mr. Carter.]

Mr. Carter: Nobody on this side made any such assertion. What we said was that term 29 was our guarantee that Newfoundland, come what may, no matter what misfortune might befall her, would never have her public services reduced below the level of 1957.

Mr. Henderson: Hurrah!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has only two minutes more.

Mr. Carter: Hon. gentlemen opposite laugh. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. gentlemen on the other side find so funny. Unless it is, Mr. Speaker, that they have a perverted sense of humour, which appears likely when we take a look at this bill, because the bill certainly is an expression of perverted humour. But what is funny about insisting on a guarantee that her level of public services would never fall below the level obtaining in 1957? What is funny about that?

An hon. Member: You.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, if we look back over the last ten years, it is evident that history has repeated itself. It is true that Newfoundland was given a warm welcome, and there was much evidence of good will in the first two or three years of the union. But very little interest has been shown in our difficulties, and very little effort has been made to understand the nature or the magnitude of the problems which would have to be overcome in order to close the gap between our levels of public services and those of the mainland, or between the fundamental differences in our concepts and outlook. It was not long before we were told that we must expect to receive exactly the same treatment as every other province. On the surface that appears logical and quite fair enough, but when you consider the extra handicaps that Newfoundland must overcome due to that 80-years gap to give Newfoundland equal treatment, it actually amounts to discrimination. I know that sounds like a paradox but it is the truth, because the effect of equal treatment is to perpetuate that 80-year gap and prevent Newfoundland from catching up with the standards of the other maritime provinces.

After three of four years of confederation we began to be reminded of the large sums of money Newfoundland was receiving from the federal government. As time went on the sums grew more fantastic and more inaccurate and misleading. The latest examples of these are the television broadcast by the Prime Minister, and we have the statements by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) during his first visit to Newfoundland in May.

But the latest example is the one put on Hansard by the Minister of Finance yesterday and by the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for St. John's West today. It is noteworthy that only one side of the picture is ever emphasized, namely the burden that Newfoundland is becoming upon the mainland taxpayers. Nothing whatever has been said about what Canada is receiving and has received from Newfoundland. The greatest care is taken not to mention by way of comparison what other provinces receive from the federal government. Newfoundland is singled out and presented in the worst possible light. When I asked the Minister of Finance for comparative figures on April 30 with regard to payments to other provinces he refused to give that information. I put a question on the order paper requesting the comparative figures for Saskatchewan. That question was made an order for return on May 13, eight weeks ago, but the government has not made them available and will very likely not do so this session. Is this conducive to national unity?

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired. The hon. member for Skeena—

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: We have heard enough.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman has not completed his remarks, in order to show the same consideration which has been extended from the other side, I am sure we should be delighted to have him continue.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo wish to continue? Very well. The hon. member for Skeena—

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I listened earlier today with a great deal of interest to the historical account and the statistical juggling engaged in by the hon. member for St. John's West, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Browne), and his account of the affairs of Newfoundland, and how well they had been managed by the federal Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). If the Minister of Finance has been so able in handling the financial, fiscal and economic affairs of the province of Newfoundland then it is about time he turned his attention to Canada as a whole and tried to straighten out some of the difficulties we are facing.

I am sure that all hon. members appreciate my own dislike and distaste for the premier of Newfoundland because of certain actions in which he has been engaged and certain legislation which he arranged to channel through the legislature, legislation which denied justice and freedom to people. All members might expect, that because of that they would hear of a move in retaliation, but we do not operate on that basis, and two wrongs do not make a right. Because the premier of Newfoundland has decided to deny justice to people is no reason why we should persist in the same sort of underhanded game. We approach this bill as we approach all other questions on the basis of fairness and justice to the people involved.

The government's present approach is, I think, regrettable, and if this administration had a sense of decency and honesty in this matter they would withdraw this bill, redraft it and resubmit it to this house in order that it might be in keeping with the solemn pledge and promise which was made to the people of Newfoundland when they entered confederation and the pledge which was made to them with regard to carrying out the terms of the union and the recommendations of the report of the royal commission. It is regrettable that the two gold dust twins over there, the Minister of Finance and the person who sits next to him have sought here to declare political warfare, with their legalistic terms and their twisty, fork-tongued interpretation of words in order to justify the awkward position that they are in. We believe that this is a betrayal of trust bordering very closely on treason.

Mr. Speaker: I must ask the hon. member to consider the language he is using. A minute ago he was reflecting on the honesty of the government, and now there is a mention of treason in connection with this bill. I must ask the hon. member to withdraw any suggestion of the word treason and also to moderate his language.

Mr. Howard: I certainly will. I understood that during previous proceedings in this house that self-same word had been used and allowed to pass, and it was on that basis that I proceeded.

Mr. Speaker: To remove any doubt, while I am sitting in the chair no one will impugn the honesty of any other member of the house.

Mr. Howard: I am sure you will recollect, Mr. Speaker, that when you suggested the word "treason" was unparliamentary the first word I said was that I would withdraw it without qualification. Then I explained why I had made use of it. I realize I was out of order and regret I was not better informed.

But we believe that political and economic justice should be provided for the people of Newfoundland, not political tomfoolery and back-stabbing, and on that basis we intend to oppose this bill.

Grants to Newfoundland

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to oppose this bill, and I am opposing it because it destroys one of the terms of the union of Newfoundland with Canada, and distorts the meaning of this union.

What are the terms of union? The terms of union are a solemn treaty entered into between the high contracting powers. They are a solemn contract and covenant entered into between two sovereign nations. They were signed by our representatives. They were signed by representatives of Canada. They were solemnly ratified by the parliament of Canada. As was then necessary, they were ratified by the United Kingdom parliament, and then they became part of the British North America Act, the fundamental law of Canada, the bulwark of the confederation.

It is in the British North America Act that the rights of the provinces are defined and established and set down for all time. It is to the British North America Act that Prince Edward Island looks to preserve its identity and its autonomy. It is to the British North America Act that the French Canadian looks to safeguard his language, his religion and his culture. The British North America Act is the link that crosses the Rockies and ties in British Columbia with the rest of Canada. This great sprawling nation, with all its differences, geographical, historic, climatic, ethnic, is kept together by the British North America Act and of course by the monarchy. And the terms of union are part of the British North America Act, and term 29 is part of the terms of union.

By term 29 Canada is supposed to enable Newfoundland to continue the public services at the levels and standards reached eight years after confederation without having to resort to unreasonable or unreasonably onerous taxation. As I see it, term 29 is a contract, a contractual obligation to use the Prime Minister's words. Under it there was on the part of Canada an undertaking, a guarantee that come what might, Canada would never allow the public services in Newfoundland to go below the level in 1957. Come what might, Canada would enable Newfoundland to continue our public services at the levels and standards then reached.

Of course, Newfoundland was to impose provincial taxation as heavy as the maritime average to continue the public services at these levels but if she was unable to do so without resorting to taxation more burdensome than the maritime average then Canada would provide the difference. How? By giving the additional assistance required. How much? As much as required. For how long? For as long as required. Not for five years or for fifty years but as long as required.

The royal commission was appointed and it sat and it made its recommendations. The sum of $8 million a year was recommended. The commission established two extremely important points. In the first place it clearly recognized a contract, a contractual obligation, a financial responsibility to Newfoundland on the part of Canada. Secondly, it put no time limit upon it: "and thereafter $8 million". There was dissatisfaction with the report but no one questioned its legality. What was questioned was its generosity, its lack of imagination. After all, it is quite possible to be legal without being generous.

Take a man's legal obligations to his children embracing food, clothing, shelter, and a minimum of education. A man without a heart or soul could discharge his legal obligations at low financial cost but no one would call such a man a generous man. A man's legal obligation toward his wife or his aged parents can be set at a minimum level in terms of dollars and cents but a man who set himself such standards would not be a very admirable character. There was another cause for dissatisfaction. The commission had set a specific amount with no attempt to make provision for changing events or circumstances in the future. Surely, we said, there should be provision for an escalator clause or a periodic review. That was ten months ago. And then the Prime Minister intervened. Why? Because, he said, of the dissatisfaction in Newfoundland. Many Newfoundlanders were elated. After all, if a man notices dissatisfaction and has the power to allay it, the natural assumption is that he will allay it, unless of course he intended all the time to kick us in the teeth.

That was ten months ago. The delay caused Newfoundland financial embarrassment. Over $13 million which was due the province immediately was withheld. In order to continue public services at standards and levels then obtaining Newfoundland had to borrow the money from the bank at 6 per cent. But after all, many Newfoundlanders said, it was worth it. The government of Canada was now considering the case and all would be well. Here was our chance to see a great human document which would put the final seal on the act of confederation. After all, it is not every day in the week that a new nation is born. Here was a chance for vision and magnanimity. The government of Canada was rich in vision; they had told us so. The Prime Minister had great visions about the undeveloped parts of Canada and was most anxious to see that they should have proper levels and standards of public services. Here was a chance for generosity and sympathy. The way many thought the government of Canada would allay our dissatisfaction would be to take the bare bones of the contract and breathe the breath of life into it and make it a warm and living thing. What they actually did to allay our dissatisfaction was to take our contract, tear it into pieces and throw it back in our face. It was a gross betrayal.

Legalities have been mentioned but more than legalities are needed. If I understand history correctly nations are not built on technicalities. Nations grow in strength and greatness because of a union of hearts, and because of mutual understanding and aid between the various peoples who make up the whole. The measure of a nation's destiny can be gauged by the greatness of the comprehension of the peoples and their leaders of the mutual interests involved.

In term 29 the nation of Canada and the people of Newfoundland pledged their mutual faith in each other and left it for other people of similar goodwill to complete the union which they had begun. It is a pity that this final part of the creation of a mighty modern nation which should be a bright moment in its history should be tarnished by bad faith. It is degrading to see those who are walking with history attempt to reduce a great moment in a nation's development to the lowest common denominator in dollars and cents.

But the final act is not yet over. The time will come, and come it will, when those of us on this side of the house will be in a position to rectify this wrong being done today and justice will be done to the province of Newfoundland by a Liberal government of the future.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, we have before us Bill No. C-72 which in my opinion is a complete and definite denial of the constitutional rights of Newfoundland. I said yesterday and I repeat now that term 29 gave to Newfoundland some special rights under the terms of union. I say that it was a special term because it was an agreement made between two countries. My friend the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) quibbles about whether or not Newfoundland at that time was a sovereign country, but at least Canada and Newfoundland were two separate countries within the British commonwealth and had the right to make an agreement as to union between them. I believe that those terms of union which included term 29 represented a solemn declaration between two separate countries to enter into a union.

I believe that term 29 is an agreement altogether different from any entered into between the central government and a province, after Newfoundland became a province. If we examine the tax agreement contained in article 27 of the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada we find there are five subsections. The first begins with these words:

> The government of Canada will forthwith after the date of union—

The second begins:

> The offer to be made under this term—

The third begins with these words:

> The offer of the government of Canada to be made under this term—

The fifth commences:

> If the province of Newfoundland enters into a tax agreement—

In every case with one exception we find that the agreement entered into between the central government of Canada and the province of Newfoundland as regards tax agreements refers to that period after Newfoundland had become a province of Canada. Term 29 was a different agreement altogether. I believe it was a solemn undertaking between the two parties and if any change is to be made in term 29 it should be made by agreement between the two parties.

I listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) yesterday and today as he talked about the fairness and the fair play which he would like the government to give to Newfoundland. I believe he was sincere. I heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) use the same argument. I think he was sincere but I want to point out that the concept of fair play, surely, is not all on one side. I believe that if the two parties concerned in this agreement were to get together now or in the future it would be found that both parties have a concept of fair play which would result in a proper decision being reached between the two parties; but in the present situation we have a unilateral action taken by the government which destroys, eliminates and extinguishes this special right that was given to Newfoundland in the terms of union.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance in his opening remarks placed on Hansard at page 5901 a table showing all the payments that had been made to Newfoundland from the year 1949 to the estimated payments for 1959-60. To place only this table on Hansard may very well leave the impression in the minds of some people that these were special grants and that no grants under similar headings were made to other provinces. But what I would like to see here, and I would hope that during the committee stage the Minister of Finance would be prepared to provide this information, is a similar table for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and maybe one of the western provinces. I would like to see a table showing the amount of money that has been collected in Newfoundland under income tax, corporation tax, succession duties and customs and excise, to show that the amounts of money which are included in this table which the Minister of Finance placed on record are only one side of the coin. There is another side showing the amount of money which has been collected over those years in the province of Newfoundland. I should like to have a further look at these figures.

My hon. friend from St. John's West compared the amount of unconditional grants for the year 1957-58 with the year 1958-59. The total amount of unconditional grants, according to this table, for the year 1957-58 was $19,244,000. For the year 1958-59, according to this table, the total amount of unconditional grants was $40,847,000. The Minister without Portfolio says that here is an increase of over 100 per cent; but let me point out something here.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I did not say that at all.

Mr. Batten: If the hon. gentleman has any remarks to make he can make them after I have finished.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On a question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The minister will be given a chance after the hon. member has completed his remarks.

Mr. Batten: We notice that for the year 1958-59 there was included in the unconditional grants for that year an amount of $7,500,000 which, for that year, was Newfoundland's part of the Atlantic provinces grants. I have said in the house before and I still say now—and I hope I shall have the opportunity to say it in the future both here and in other places—that I believe the present government, when they made the grants to the Atlantic provinces, did a very fine thing. I have agreed with them before and I agree with them now. I believe that the money they have given to the eastern provinces under these particular grants will do a lot of good, and any credit which the provinces can give this government for those grants it justly deserve. I have no argument there at all and I agree with what the government has done, but I do disagree with the hon. gentleman including in the $40,847,000, $13,550,000 which has not yet been paid.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or even voted.

Mr. Batten: And not even voted, and will not be voted until this bill is passed.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Who is holding it up now?

Mr. Caron: An hour and a half.

Mr. Pearson: How long did you speak?

Mr. Batten: In talking about the conditional grants made to Newfoundland the hon. gentleman went on further and referred to the $4,900,000 which had been given to Newfoundland under the hospital insurance scheme and now claims credit for legislation which was placed on the statutes of Canada before this government came into office.

The hon. gentleman wants to know what happened to the transmission line that this government offered to the province of Newfoundland. I will tell him what happened to the transmission line. Two years ago we had in this house a bill known as the Atlantic power bill. Under that bill the provinces of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick were able to get assistance in the building of thermal power plants. I argued then, as I argue now, that the thing to do in Newfoundland, because we did not have supplies of coal and oil, and they would have to be transported there, was to use the available water power. I even moved an amendment to the bill but it was turned down by the government. If that amendment had been accepted and if the same assistance had been given to the province of Newfoundland to build hydro power plants that was given to the other maritime provinces to build thermal power plants, maybe we would have something to hook this line up to.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Batten: No. That is where the transmission line went. It is true that this government made the offer to Newfoundland but surely it would be a little bit silly to build a transmission line without any power plant at the other end of it.

Mr. McIlraith: That would be like the bridge at Prince Albert.

Mr. Speaker: Order; ten o'clock.

Mr Churchill: I wonder whether the house would consent to continue this interesting debate for some time?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: Agreed; carry on.

Mr. Speaker: I hear that it is ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, in so far as we are concerned, there is no objection to carrying on.

Mr. Churchill: Is there some objection to carrying on? I think the house generally is agreed to proceed with the business tonight.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming draws my attention to the fact that it is ten o'clock.

An hon. Member: He does not have to sit here; he can go home.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the acting house leader what the business will be for tomorrow and the rest of the week?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) announced a tentative program last night which naturally will be subject to modification from day to day but tomorrow we will continue this debate and on its completion we shall then proceed with the second reading of Bill No. C-71, to provide for the humane slaughter of food animals. On that being completed we shall go on with estimates in the order in which they were indicated last night, namely trade and commerce, mines and technical surveys, fisheries, post office, northern affairs, secretary of state, privy council, national revenue and the C.B.C., legislation, health and welfare and finance.

I have to announce one change in the program as indicated last night. It is impossible for the Minister of Justice to be present on Thursday, as was thought then, so the two bills standing in his name will not come forward on that occasion. Last evening the minister of external affairs indicated that there had been a tentative agreement amongst the parties to commence sitting at 2.00 instead of 2.30 on Wednesday and at 7.00 in the evening, through Wednesday evening. I trust that will meet with the approval of the house.

Mr. Speaker: In order to have a definite arrangement about that I think the house should make its order now as to the hours of sitting, if it could be done by unanimous agreement. Will the minister state the arrangement again?

Mr. Churchill: The arrangement being that on Wednesday, and on subsequent days, the house assemble in the afternoon at 2.00 rather than 2.30 and assemble again at 7.00 o'clock rather than 8.00, and in addition continue on Wednesday evening from 7.00 to 10 or whatever time the house determines.

Mr. Chevrier: This arrangement, as announced by the acting leader and as stated also by the house leader last night, is satisfactory to us.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that is for the duration of the session? Does the house give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: In connection with this matter, I feel that many of the matters that are coming up now are of grave importance, and we expect to extend some of these hours. We gave one hour today, and we are in agreement to do that but Wednesday night was not one of the matters that was discussed. I think we would like to reserve the right to make an agreement beyond this week if the work is not finished this week. I do not think we should be bound, and particularly I do not want to be bound, for next week.

Mr. Speaker: Could we have unanimous agreement, then, to the times stated by the minister, excluding Wednesday night?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Churchill: I think I understood the hon. member to say if it did not go beyond this week he was satisfied with that arrangement. I think I can give that assurance.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will be satisfied if the arrangement set forth by the minister is limited to this week?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered and the sitting hours will be according to this arrangement to which unanimous consent has been given at this time.

It being five minutes after ten the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

GRAHAM MOSES

Question No. 507—Mr. Argue:

1. Is a Mr. Graham Moses, presently employed by the Canadian government in any capacity?
2. If so, in what department, on what date was he appointed, by what authority, what are his duties, his salary, and what qualifications has he for this position?
3. On what date did Mr. Moses first enter government employment, what positions has he held, the date he took up service in each, and where has he served?
4. Were all of these appointments made through a civil service competition?
5. If so, what was the date and number of the competition?
6. If not, which ones were not, under what authority were they made, and on what date?
7. What moneys have been paid by the Canadian government to Mr. Moses in (a) salary; (b) expenses, each year since his first appointment, to January 1, 1959?

Answer by: Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production):

STARRED QUESTIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—MINUTES OF INVESTMENT COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Question No. 112—Mr. Caron:

1. On what dates, since January 1, 1958, are there formal minutes reporting meetings of the investment committee of the unemployment insurance fund?
2. Which members of the committee were recorded as present on the occasions of each of such meetings?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer to these two questions is as follows; I will combine questions 1 and 2 in my answer. July 21, 1958, by letter signed by all three members. October 1, 1958; Mr. Coyne, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Cushing. January 9, 1959; Mr. Coyne, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Cushing. February 2, 1959; Mr. Coyne, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Cushing. March 18, 1959; Mr. Beattie, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Cushing. April 21, 1959; Mr. Coyne, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Cushing.

FUEL TENDERS, PUBLIC BUILDING, SHERBROOKE, N.S.

Question No. 113—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Were tenders called within the past year for the supply of fuel to the public building at Sherbrooke, Guysborough county, Nova Scotia?
2. If so, how many bids were received, in what amounts and which person was the successful bidder?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Acting Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes; public tenders were called on April 24, 1959. The answer to the second question is that three bids were received, as follows: R. W. Anderson, $21.47 per ton; Albert E. Whidden, $21.90 per ton; Sears and McIntosh, $22 per ton. The contract was awarded to R. W. Anderson, of Sherbrooke, Nova Scotia, the lowest bidder, for 20 tons of Acadia oil treated lump coal.

FEDERAL BUILDING SITE, NEW GLASGOW, N.S.

Question No. 114—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Were lands purchased by the Department of Public Works as a site for a federal building in New Glasgow, Nova Scotia?
2. If so, were tenders called for this land?
3. What bids were received?
4. Who was the successful bidder?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Acting Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is that the department has approved the acquisition of property in the end of the Town block, bounded by East River road, Donald and Temperance streets. Action is being taken by the Department of Justice toward completion of the transactions. The answer to the seond question is no, and questions 3 and 4 are answered by answer No. 2.

C.N.R. LAND SALES, TURCOT YARD, MONTREAL

Question No. 115—Mr. Lessard:

1. Has any land belonging to the Canadian National Railways, in the Turcot yard, Montreal, been sold since January 1, 1957, to individuals, corporations or companies?
2. If so, how many parcels have been sold and what are the names of the persons, corporations or companies acquiring same?
3. What was the sale price in each case?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of the Canadian National Railways advise me that the answer to part 1 is no. Parts 2 and 3 are, of course, answered by the answer to part 1.

CARCINOGEN RESEARCH

Question No. 116—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Can the Minister of National Health and Welfare inform the house whether research is being carried on regarding the presence of a cancer-producing agent known as carcinogen, reported to be found in wax milk cartons?
2. If so, will the minister state what conclusions have been reached as a result of such research?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first question, research has been carried out in the United States on the chemical and biological aspects of a substance found in crude petroleum, the basic material employed in the manufacture of the wax used for milk cartons. This substance, known as dibenzanthracene, has been termed a carcinogen by scientists working on the experimental production of tumours in mice

2. It has been reported that two out of 50 samples of waxes examined contain dibenzanthracene in amounts of the order of one part per million and one half part per billion of the wax. While the substance has produced tumours when administered to mice it has not been shown to produce cancer in men and the chemical has not been detected in milk held in wax milk cartons. I am advised that while the findings are not final, no indications of a health hazard have been found.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NATIONAL MUSEUM ANNUAL BUDGET

Question No. 181—Mr. Argue:

1. What was the annual budget for the national museum of Canada for each year since 1935?
2. What amount of this money was spent for each year specified?
3. What amount of this was spent each year on: (a) salaries of the senior officers, and salaries of the other staff; (b) exhibits; (c) publication of scientific studies; (d) scientific field work under contract; (e) scientific field work conducted by the permanent scientists of the museum; (f) purchase of specimens and collections; (g) public education?

NATIONAL MUSEUM—STAFF RESEARCH STUDIES

Question No. 195—Mr. Argue:

1. What specific research studies have each of the continuing members of the scientific staff of the national museum of Canada made for each year since January 1, 1945?
2. Have any of these studies been completed?
3. If so, which ones, what was the name of the person who did the research study, and on what approximate date was it completed?
4. Have any of these completed studies been published?
5. If so, which ones, what was the title under which it was published, the author listed, the name of the person who did the research, and by whom were they published?
6. How many completed studies remain unpublished, who made the studies, when were they completed, what is the title of each, is it intended that any of these be published?

NATIONAL MUSEUM—COLLECTIONS OF SPECIMENS

Question No. 204—Mr. Argue:

1. What scientific collections and specimens have been purchased by the national museum of Canada each year since 1945, and to which branch of the museum does each now belong?
2. How much money was paid for each collection, from whom were they purchased, and who authorized each purchase?
3. Which collections are presently on exhibit, which ones have ever been exhibited and of these what date were they last exhibited?
4. Are any of these collections presently in storage?
5. If so, (a) which ones; (b) how long have they been in storage; (c) in what buildings are they housed; (d) are these buildings fireproof; (e) who is in charge of the repair, maintenance and protection of each collection?
6. What proportion of the total collections and specimens owned by each branch of the museum are in storage?

FEDERAL COMMERCE NAVIGATION COMPANY LIMITED

Question No. 504—Mr. Argue:

1. Has any government department entered into a contract or agreement with Federal Commerce Navigation Company Limited at any time since its incorporaton?
2. If so, (a) what were the dates of the contracts or agreements, and with what department were they made; (b) for what purpose; (c) what was the nature of each contract or agreement; (d) what were the terms?
3. Were tenders called on each of these contracts?
4. If so, who submitted tenders on each contract, and what was the tender price?
5. On what date was this company incorporated?
6. What were the names of the original members of the board of this company, and who were their successors in each year since its incorporation to date?

PRICE SPREADS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I wonder if the Prime Minister could now answer a question I addressed to him last week as to the date on which the report of the royal commission on price spreads is likely to be received?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have not that information at the moment, but I will make inquiries of the chairman.

TELEVISION

ST. BONIFACE, MAN.—INQUIRY AS TO RECOMMENDATION BY BOARD OF GOVERNORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Laurier Regnier (St. Boniface): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the government given any consideration to the proposals of the board of broadcasting governors in connection with the St. Boniface television station?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): The short answer to that question would be no, but the fact is that when this recommendation was received from the board of broadcast governors certain technical questions were raised as to the availability of other channels in the province of Manitoba. I referred the matter to the Department of Transport, and the difficulty having been resolved I intend to bring the matter before the cabinet in the immediate future.

FRUIT

INQUIRY AS TO PROCLAMATION OF CUSTOMS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Knowing his avid affection for agriculture I want to ask the Minister of National Revenue a question. In view of the approach of the fruit harvesting season, would the minister inform the house when it is the government's intention to relieve the growing anxiety of fruit growers by proclaiming section 40A, subsection 7, clause (c) of the Customs Act?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): When a decision has been made on that point it will be announced in due course.

AIRPORTS

WATERLOO-WELLINGTON—INQUIRY AS TO IMPROVEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. W. Weichel (Waterloo North): On behalf of my colleagues from Waterloo South and Wellington South I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Could the minister please advise what progress has been made in the proposed improvement of the Waterloo-Wellington airport?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes. The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. This year's construction plans call for the installation of a lighting system on runway 07-25. Tenders for this work were recently opened, and I understand that a contract has now been let through our regional office in Toronto. Estimated cost for the work was $25,000, but the final tender figure has not yet been forwarded from Toronto to Ottawa.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

OLD WELLAND CANAL—STATEMENT AS TO CLEAN-UP AND RESTORATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Welland asked me a question relating to the clean-up of the old Welland canal.

Tenders for the next major stage in this work have been received and opened within the last few days and are now being studied by the consulting engineers for this project, and by the St. Lawrence seaway authority, with a view to making a recommendation on acceptance of tender. This recommendation is expected within the next week and will immediately be submitted to treasury board for approval.

Inquiries of the Ministry

R. A. C. HENRY—INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENTS AS CONSULTANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport of which I have sent him notice. Does the minister consider there is anything anomalous or worthy of investigation in the information tabled in this house which shows that Mr. R. A. C. Henry, a vice president of Marine Industries Limited, was receiving some $40,000 from this government as consultant on the St. Lawrence seaway at the same time that his company was getting many millions of dollars in contracts on the seaway from the Department of Public Works?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The return to the order of the house shows that Mr. R. A. C. Henry was engaged as consulting engineer on the St. Lawrence seaway project from August 1, 1952 to September 30, 1954. The remuneration he received was paid through the Department of Transport.

I am advised that Mr. Henry was not engaged by nor received any remuneration from the St. Lawrence seaway authority. As the house knows, the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act was proclaimed on July 1, 1954, and no contract was let by the seaway authority until some time after that date. The date of the first contract given by the St. Lawrence seaway authority to Marine Industries was March 23, 1955.

Regarding the hon. member's inquiry as to whether or not I should like to pass comment on this matter, as this is something that took place under the former government he is in just as good a position to comment on it as I am.

SHIPPING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STATEMENT RESPECTING PROVISION OF SERVICE TO UP-COAST COMMUNITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Essex East showed a great interest in the shipping arrangements we have been able to work out on the west coast following the strike of Northland Navigation Company. As I advised him yesterday, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Skeena both showed great interest in this matter from the very beginning and discussed it thoroughly with me. I kept them fully advised at all times, and thoroughly informed with regard to this matter. However, since the hon. member for Essex East shows the great interest he has, I am going to give him the information he asked for, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pearson: Very good of you.

Mr. Pickersgill: How condescending.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the following substitutional services are in effect to provide essential supplies to the communities left without service as a result of the suspension of the subsidized services of Northland Navigation Company due to the strike.

1. Barkley Sound Transportation Company is instituting, on July 18, a temporary service from Port Alberni to the following ports formerly served by Northland Navigation Company. I might say to the Hansard reporter that although these names are somewhat difficult to understand I shall give him a list of them afterwards, so he need not worry too much about them. The list of ports is as follows: Ucluelet, Port Albion, Tofino, Clayoquot, Kakawis, Ahousat, Hot Springs Cove, Hesquiat, Nootka, Gold River, Mooyah Bay, Tahsis, Esperanza, Zeballos and Chamiss Bay (for Kyuquot).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: Oh, we are just beginning, Mr. Speaker.

2. Coast Ferries Limited is continuing to serve regularly the lower Johnstone strait ports and the islands and inlets on the route to and from Vancouver.

3. Island Tug and Barge Limited is carrying out a barge service to the upper Johnstone strait ports including Beaver Cove, Alert Bay, Port McNeil, Port Hardy and Quatsino sound.

4. The packers of the various fishing companies are serving the following ports where there are fish canneries or storage plants: Smith inlet, Rivers inlet, Skeena river, Namu, Bella Bella, Klemtu, and Butedale.

5. B.C. Packers Steamship Company Limited is giving a regular call at Bella Coola.

6. Vancouver Tug and Barge Company Limited is calling regularly at Ocean Falls.

7. Straits Towing Limited is serving Prince Rupert and Kitimat and through the latter, Kemano; these ports also have road and rail connections.

8. Straits Towing Limited is serving Massett in the Queen Charlotte islands and from Massett there is road connection to Port Clements, Skidegate and Queen Charlotte city. Sandspit, the site of the Department of Transport airport, is situated opposite Skidegate on Skidegate inlet.

9. At Cumshewa inlet there were ports of call at two large logging camps which are closed because of the woodworkers' strike; there is logging road connection from these ports to Sandspit.

10. Up to this moment the Canadian maritime commission has not yet been successful in establishing a temporary service to Stewart, Kincolith, Alice Arm and Port Simpson in the Portland canal area; however, it is making every effort to organize such a temporary service out of Prince Rupert.

Mail for the coast communities is being forwarded either by air or by the services I have mentioned. Passengers will have to rely on the many air services available on the British Columbia coast, because there is no alternative steamship company with vessels available and capable of performing the required services.

The services I have described will not be as convenient as those normally given by Northland Navigation Company, but the communities served will receive the basic supplies necessary for their existence.

I hope the hon. member for Essex East has all the information that he requires to carry on, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In doing so, of course, I appreciate the friendly attitude the minister has taken toward me personally, but I rise not only on a point of order but on a question of privilege that affects this house.

The minister in giving his reply said he would be pleased to give an extended reply as a favour to the hon. member for Essex East who, along with two other hon. members, he said, had shown some interest in this matter. A minister's answer is not given to an hon. member as a matter of favour but as a matter of right. This is the House of Commons, and when questions are put to ministers of the crown, to those who sit on the treasury benches, answers made by them are not made out of their goodness and kindness of heart and friendship toward one member; they must be made under our constitutional practice as a matter of duty involving the recognition of the rights of parliament itself. While I appreciate the friendly attitude of the minister, I should remind him that he is a member of a government whose party and whose leader has insisted that the rights of parliament must at all times be observed.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is not observing the rights of parliament to say that ministers shall answer questions only as a favour to other members in the House of Commons. I know the Minister of Transport will realize his constitutional breach in this particular instance.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, at no time did I say I was giving this answer as a personal favour to the hon. member. I simply said he has shown great interest in it, and because of the great interest he had shown I was going to take great pains to give a full and complete answer. This, I take it, is hard to understand by the hon. member who was formerly a minister, because when he was asked questions when he was on this side of the house he never gave complete or informative answers.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to engage in any of the extraneous things I just listened to but I hope the minister and the maritime commission will apply themselves with great zeal to assure that a service will be given to the Portland canal area.

Some hon. Members: Order.

AGRICULTURE

HOGS AND EGGS—INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF CHANGE IN SUPPORT METHOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. On April 10 the minister announced that the floor price for hogs would be reduced to $23.65 from $25 per hundredweight and that "the change in the method of supporting that floor price will come into effect just as soon as we can get the machinery ready, which might be six weeks or two months. Will the minister make an announcement of this change before the end of this session?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know when I will be in a position to make that announcement. I shall certainly make it, as I indicated at that time, as soon as possible.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put another question to the Minister of Agriculture. On May 7 the minister announced in this house that the egg support program would be changed from an offer to purchase basis to that of a method based on deficiency payments. Will the minister be in position to announce his new policy before the end of this session?

Mr. Harkness: I have just answered that kind of question, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

CONVENTION ON NATIONALITY OF MARRIED WOMEN—FRENCH TRANSLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Hull asked me if I would have the convention on the nationality of married women translated into French. I promised him I would do so, but I find that it is not necessary because, first of all, when the convention was originally tabled it was tabled in both languages, and a more recent edition also appears in the French version of the Senate Hansard of March 19 this year, which I am sure he will have in his office. If not, it is very easily procured.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, what appears in the Senate Hansard does not affect us. I do not receive the Senate Hansard, and I should like to have it in the House of Commons Hansard.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sure the distribution office will secure a copy for the hon. member.

FINANCE

TARIFF BOARD—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance, and ask him if he has any intention of appointing a chairman of the tariff board?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

REPORT OF SENATE COMMITTEE ON INFLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the great interest in this matter and the responsibility of the government and parliament with regard to it, the government will take steps to make available to the House of Commons the report in the other place on inflation?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will give consideration to the suggestion, but I really do not know that there is any responsibility on this house to distribute the reports of the other place.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance. In view of his great responsibility in this matter, has he been following the proceedings of that committee, and does he propose to live up to the promise that this government would give a lead in trying to curb government expenditures?

Mr. Speaker: I think it is contrary to the practice of this house to refer to the proceedings taking place in either its own committees or in committees of the other house. When the report itself has been made I believe it is then appropriate to refer in debate to the proceedings of the other house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker may I say this. This is a matter of the greatest importance, and it is now referred to in the public press. Surely we are not going to be denied the right in this house to ask the Minister of Finance whether his attention has been called to an important study made elsewhere, involving evidence by leading economists, in a matter which this government and the minister has dodged throughout the session.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has chosen to smuggle one of his demagogic, tub-thumping speeches into a point of order. It also lacked nothing in pomposity. The hon. member would apparently ask me to override the rules of the house by making comment upon the proceedings of the other house. He has been here a long time. He has been here longer than practically all other members in this house, but apparently he has not yet become aware of the rule of this house that it is quite out of order to make reference to proceedings in the other place. Indeed, if I were to make any comment on the report of a committee of the other house under these circumstances I would be entirely out of order, and I am sure that you, Mr. Speaker, would be the first to call me to order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nonsense.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I therefore do not intend to accept the hon. member's invitation to transgress the rules of the house.

As to the responsibility of the government in this matter, let me say that the government will continue to discharge its responsibility to the Canadian people, and that it will not need any jogging from my hon. friend opposite or any of his tub-thumping speeches which are quite out of order.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether it is out of order to make reference in this house to a report of the other place which has been completed and made public?

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Speaker: I shall have to take that matter under consideration. I know it is in order, in the course of debate, to read extracts from the proceedings in the other place. However, I am not in a position to give an answer to that question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): By way of further supplementary questions to my hon. friend, may I say that I am sorry if I have in any way offended him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has only offended the rules of the house; that is all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister this question. If he is so preoccupied that he cannot give this matter his own personal attention, would he direct that this matter be referred to the study committee or the seminar which he has set up in connection with dominion-provincial fiscal relations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have taken under consideration the idea of setting up a study group or seminar for the instruction of such members of the house as badly need it.

Mr. Pearson: The minister had better join us.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have due regard for the present need of my hon. friend. I think I am ready to give a decision on that point now and invite him to be the first of those who will be nominated for this tutorial assistance.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO CONTINUATION OF ACREAGE PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the assertion by the government that the $1 an acre payment to western farmers had in effect established a true parity price for wheat, is the government now considering the continuation of this policy?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in so far as the preamble to the question is concerned, may I say that I know of no statement to that effect having been made. The statement that was made that the amount paid last year represented approximately the difference between the prices that were paid on the world market and those that would be paid in respect of that portion of the wheat which was utilized in Canada for domestic purposes.

As to the second part of the question, whenever any decision is made parliament will be made aware of it.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

BATTLE OF PLAINS OF ABRAHAM—REPORTED COMMEMORATIVE STAMP ISSUE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Yesterday's newspapers announced a new stamp issue having to do with the battle of the plains of Abraham. Will the minister comment?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in the interests of saving the time of the house may I suggest that the hon. member might agree to wait until my estimates are up, perhaps later today or tomorrow, when we can explore this subject.

Mr. Denis: I am afraid the minister will have some other questions to answer on his estimates, and as we want to finish on Saturday or as soon as possible I should like to ask a supplementary question. What is the idea of reminding the people of Canada of old family quarrels by a stamp issue?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, it was not in my mind that by this stamp issue we were reminding anyone of any old quarrels, but rather that we were marking one of the great accomplishments in all history which has resulted from English and French co-operation in this country of ours.

Mr. Denis: Will the minister take into consideration before issuing the stamp other phases of progress in Canada; for instance, the Hull bridge, the Prince Albert bridge and so forth?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, it has been my experience over the last six months to sit here daily and examine one of the faces of Canada immediately opposite, that of the hon. member for St. Denis, and I find myself remarkably attracted by comparison to this new stamp.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I direct a supplementary question to the Postmaster General. Has the Postmaster General considered having a stamp issued to commemorate the extinction of term 29?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This does not seem to me to be the appropriate time in the proceedings of the house to try to design the postage stamps of Canada.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): In fairness, Mr. Speaker, since the question has been asked, may I say that we do not commemorate non-existing events.

FISHERIES

NEW BRUNSWICK—LIFT PERIOD OF MIRAMICHI SALMON SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. I regret that I was not able to send him advance notice, but I just received a telegram from the Miramichi salmon drift net fishermen's association advising me that this association has made a further request to the minister for the elimination of the salmon drift net lift period for this season. Can the minister advise me whether he has reached a decision in this connection? If not, when does he expect a decision will be reached?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): I may say that I also received a similar telegram. No decision has been reached as yet on the request that the lift period be eliminated entirely this year. As a matter of fact I doubt that that request can be met, because the Department of Fisheries has an extremely important responsibility to make sure that the needs of conservation are met and that enough fish—salmon, in this case—are allowed to escape in order to reproduce the species for future years. I doubt very much that it would be really of any assistance or that we would be doing anything in the general interests of the salmon fishermen if the lift period were eliminated entirely. As the hon. member knows, we have already postponed it. In any case, I will be able to give him a more definite answer at a later date.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF SITTINGS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is still the intention of the Borden commission to hold hearings in the maritime provinces on coal?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have no further information than that which was given on an earlier date in answer to a similar question.

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Prime Minister a related question. On June 8 the Minister of National Revenue indicated that the government was proposing to set up a royal commission of some kind to inquire into the coal situation in the maritime provinces. Has any progress been made in that matter?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As soon as the government is in a position to report on that situation, an answer will be given.

FINANCE

MEASURE TO PROVIDE ADDITIONAL GRANTS TO NEWFOUNDLAND

The house resumed, from Tuesday, July 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the second reading of Bill No. C-72, to provide for the payment of additional grants to the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Last evening Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at ten o'clock I had said that Bill No. C-72 was a complete and definite denial of the constitutional rights of Newfoundland. I had made some remarks in reference to the table placed on Hansard by the Minister of Finance and to be found at page 5901, and had suggested to him that similar information for other Atlantic provinces be provided during the committee stage; and that a table showing the amount of money collected from the province of Newfoundland be provided at that time also.

May I go along, Mr. Speaker, and say that while any statement with regard to the amount of money paid to the province of Newfoundland by the federal government and any statement with regard to the amount of money collected by the federal government from Newfoundland are extremely important, nevertheless there are other considerations. I am sure this house will not fail to appreciate the important advantages that were brought to Canada in 1949, the date of union. There was a territory of over 150,000 square miles added to Canada, with a population of over 400,000, to which must be added to the industrial potential of the province itself. Forest products is one of the major industries in Canada if not the major industry. Production in that industry was increased by 10 per cent with the union of Newfoundland with Canada. Added to these we have the production of our fisheries and our mines, and also the potential water power which exists at bay d'Espoir and at Grand Falls, Labrador. Certainly, too, we must not forget the improved defensive position which was created by the addition of Newfoundland to Canada.

Before confederation Newfoundland bought from the Canadian mainland approximately $50 million worth of imports. Today imports to Newfoundland from the mainland of Canada are five times that amount. Here we have a province which, if it were not a province of Canada and still imported the same amount that it does now, would as far as imports are concerned be Canada's third best customer. Here we have a market where nearly everything that is produced has to be sold outside the confines of Canada, and nearly everything that is used is imported from the mainland of Canada.

I do not think there is any better statement I could make to describe this situation than that made by the Newfoundland board of trade to the Prime Minister under date of April 13, 1959. On page 2 of that letter, in the first paragraph, this statement is made:

> Because the economy of Newfoundland depends so largely upon the primary industries of fishing, mining and forestry, and we are without secondary manufacturing industries, our income "leaks out" of the island directly and at once to the central manufacturing areas of Ontario and Quebec, from which we draw our supplies. In view of this, an expenditure in Newfoundland is almost as successful in stimulating the economy of Ontario and Quebec as is a direct expenditure in either of these provinces. Because of heavy purchases by Newfoundland from the rest of Canada, and since other parts of Canada purchase little from Newfoundland, there is a serious "balance of payments" problem between Newfoundland and the rest of Canada. The federal government alone can offset this income "leakage" by transfer payments of various kinds.

I would like to go further, Mr. Speaker, and say that I disagree completely with the way the government has handled this bill. First of all we had the report of the McNair commission upon which the Prime Minister made some statements, if my memory serves me correctly, last August, almost a year ago. This bill is brought in now, almost a year later, in the dying days of the session. It is my opinion that this bill deserves a more important place in the legislative program of this particular session.

The statement of the Prime Minister on March 25 certainly allayed no fears in the minds of the people of Newfoundland. Then the Minister of Justice went down to Newfoundland and made his speech on Thursday, May 14. There is no need to add any further comments about that, but I would refer to an editorial in the St. John's Daily News of Friday, May 15 with reference to the statements made by the Minister of Justice. The editorial begins:

> Mr. Fulton, the federal Minister of Justice, said in his address to the Newfoundland board of trade that it was time to put the record straight in respect of Newfoundland's relations with the government of Canada. Mr. Fulton spoke for an hour. The record was still unstraightened after he had finished.

He seemed to have two main objectives. One was to assure us of his government's good will and good intentions. The other was to convince us that the Prime Minister's decision on term 29 was good for Newfoundland. He has failed.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the editorial goes on:

He has copied Mr. Diefenbaker's attempt to convince us of Canada's generosity by setting out the allocations we have received from Ottawa as if they were special to this province—

He was plausible. He was pleasant. He was possibly good-intentioned. But he was completely unconvincing, completely unfamiliar with our case under the terms of union, and completely a failure as a peacemaker. We had hoped for better results from his visit.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that I regret that this matter has been handled in the way it has. I thought yesterday when the Prime Minister was speaking that this particular topic deserved a little more serious consideration than was given to it. When the Prime Minister defends an issue as he did yesterday he does so for one of two reasons. Either there is political kudos to be obtained, or there is something to be defended. I was interested, too, in the statement made by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne); and while he certainly obtained the applause of this house last evening I suggest to you that he would not obtain the applause of Newfoundlanders.

I have already made reference to the Atlantic grants, and I am not going to go further into them now. Neither am I going to outline, because it has been outlined by other hon. members, the real need for term 29. Let me finish by saying this. Newfoundlanders will ask the question, by virtue of what logic can a nebulous pledge be accepted by them when a firm contractual obligation under the British North America Act has not been honoured by this government?

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay passage of this bill at this time, because I agree with the legislation under the circumstances. At the same time there is not too much that can be said about the bill or about the subject which has not been said already, either by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance or what was said so very meaningfully by the minister from Newfoundland last night. However, I do feel, Mr. Speaker, that it is very unfortunate that words of an unparliamentary nature have been brought into this debate.

This debate, as suggested by the Minister of Finance and by hon. members opposite, concerns what will probably be one of the important pieces of legislation as far as our constitution is concerned. We have heard words, as I said, sir, that are to my mind, as Your Honour ruled last night, unparliamentary; words which are not, I suggest, befitting hon. members opposite. They are words which as far as I am concerned are only in keeping with the irresponsible and impetuous premier of Newfoundland, and should not be used by learned colleagues opposite.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member said something about words used by members from Newfoundland. I cannot recall any words used by members from Newfoundland being ruled out of order by the Chair.

Mr. McGrath: If the hon. member will restrain himself, I will come to the words in a moment. I was not referring to hon. members from Newfoundland. As the hon. member well knows, I was referring to hon. gentlemen in the corner.

An hon. Member: You said "opposite".

Mr. McGrath: However, I do say that hon. gentlemen opposite did use the word "betrayal".

Mr. Pearson: Is that unparliamentary?

Mr. McGrath: In my opinion that is not in keeping with the importance which hon. members have attached to this subject or to this debate. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, when confederation was being negotiated, was at that time, as I think he himself will admit, the grey eminence of Canadian politics. In Newfoundland he has been referred to on many occasions as the chief architect of the terms of union, this same hon. gentleman who mentioned betrayal. Let him look back in his conscience when he begins throwing around words such as "betrayal" and "constitutional rights". Let him think back on the way in which the constitutional rights of Newfoundland were ridden over roughshod in 1947 and 1948 when they were so anxious to consummate the act of union for their own political ends.

The words of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) are not worthy of comment. You ruled on them last night, Mr. Speaker. But I do feel I should refer to them because they are a reflection on hon. members of this house and more particularly on the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Browne) and upon myself.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and his colleagues opposite have tried to convey the impression during this debate that nobody in Newfoundland shares the views expressed by the minister from Newfoundland and myself in this house. He said, as reported at page 5999 of Hansard of July 14:

That is why every Newfoundlander, except one or two, recents bitterly the action taken by this government.

The hon. member also referred to the Leader of the Opposition in the Newfoundland legislature and, by implication, to those other people engaged in the public life of Newfoundland who share the same political philosophy as myself. I would just like to say, for the purpose of setting the record straight, that those responsible people in Newfoundland charged with providing an opposition to the government of Newfoundland do not take their responsibilities lightly. A statement issued yesterday by one of the members of the opposition—a statement which reflects the feeling of that opposition—reads as follows:

> The Prime Minister of Canada has cut clean through the vagueness and uncertainty of term 29 and has spelled out in black and white that Newfoundland will have its special financial needs attended to over and beyond the 31 day of March 1962.

Later the statement goes on:

> In my opinion Prime Minister Diefenbaker has, as was to be expected, offered the hand of friendship to Newfoundland and I, for one, intend to grasp it—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the hon. member is reading a comment on what was said in this house, and that is contrary to the practice of the house.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to a comment made in Newfoundland by a Newfoundlander in the public life of the province, which was apropos of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and his colleagues opposite. However, I will not refer to it if you do not wish me to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order you raised, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman was really in order. This did not seem to be a comment on this debate, and I should not like to see the hon. member's right to quote abridged.

Mr. Speaker: I raised the question of whether it was in order, because it was not clear. The statement was made yesterday, and I took it that it was a comment on the debate in this house, in which event it would be out of order. If it relates to statements of the Prime Minister made elsewhere, that is another matter. But I ask the hon. member to bear in mind that it is not correct to read anything which comments on the debate in the house or which reflects in any way on what is said here.

Mr. McGrath: To clarify the record, I was reading a press release of yesterday, and I am perfectly happy to make those words my own if that will put them in order.

There was also a quotation carried in yesterday's press in Newfoundland to the effect that the Leader of the Opposition—I do not have the exact quotation, so I will paraphrase the words used—had said there was no question in anybody's mind but that Newfoundland needed help and would be assisted to reach the level of other provinces. I think if we look back in the record we will find that this is what the hon. gentleman said.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the most striking aspect of the line taken by hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with this discussion is their inability to agree on exactly what term 29 really is, and just precisely what it does imply. This is very clearly borne out by the record of July 13. When the Leader of the Opposition was speaking the Prime Minister interrupted him, as recorded at page 5909 of Hansard, and asked the following question:

> Does the hon. gentleman interpret the royal commission recommendation as requiring the payment in perpetuity of the amount in question, $8 million?

To which the Leader of the Opposition replied:

> There is no other interpretation which can be given to a recommendation of the kind I have just read, which includes the words "thereafter, $8 million per annum".

Further on, in the record of the same day, when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was speaking I interrupted him as recorded on page 5925 of Hansard, and asked a similar question:

> Does the hon. gentleman advocate payment of a definite, statutory grant in perpetuity?

To which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate replied "No".

Clearly, then, it would seem advisable for the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the Leader of the Opposition to get together on this question, to have a meeting of minds. Let them establish clearly just what line they want to take. I suggest that they would be unable to make up their minds, because they feel that here they have a hot political potato of which they do not intend to be deprived regardless of how acceptable the legislation may be to Newfoundland.

In other words, the importance of the question now under debate has been capably stated by hon. gentlemen opposite with their pious platitudes about the preservation of constitutional rights and the violation of the constitution, which statements are a disgrace to the honour and integrity of this nation and reveal that they are trying to make whatever political kudos they can from this controversial subject irrespective, as I said, of how acceptable the legislation might be.

I suggest that this is good legislation. It is the best legislation that could possibly come out of such a nebulous and meaningless clause as term 29 in the drafting of which no doubt my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had some hand. It is the best possible legislation that could be introduced. When the people of Newfoundland have had a chance to study the legislation and reflect upon it, hon. gentlemen opposite will discover that they have gone just a little too far out on a limb.

Reference was made yesterday by the Minister without Portfolio from Newfoundland to arguments advanced with respect to clauses in the preamble and other clauses which perhaps should be in the body of the bill. I believe that point was very well covered and I do not intend to go into it at this time. However, I do suggest that the special needs and considerations of Newfoundland are now more clearly defined and more explicitly spelled out than they ever were. What is more, they are spelled out in legislation in parliamentary form, as the Minister of Finance said.

I feel that this is good legislation, and as a responsible Newfoundlander who is aware of his responsibilities to Newfoundland, if not more so than the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I have no hesitation in supporting this legislation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I did not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman but I should like to make a correction of fact. The hon. gentleman suggested that I had something to do with drafting term 29. I had nothing whatever, at any time, to do with drafting it. The hon. gentleman also suggested that I was one of the principal architects of the terms of union. I should be very proud if that were true, but in all modesty I have to say that is not correct.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What modesty and humility we see.

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member who just resumed his seat stated, much has been said for and against this bill. While it is not my intention to make a lengthy speech or to rehash any of the remarks that have been made I feel I must add my personal observations to the debate.

We now have the bill and, having read it, it confirms our worst fears. Newfoundland has been let down. We feel that the terms of union have not been carried out, because there is nothing in the bill to give any indication that payments will be made to Newfoundland after March 31, 1962, to enable the provincial government to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

The reference in the preamble to a comprehensive study of dominion-provincial financial relations is no substitute for the constitutional rights of Newfoundland under term 29, even with the words "special circumstances" added. Therefore any hon. member who believes in upholding the constitution, in defending the rights of the provinces and in maintaining the good faith and good name of Canada has no choice but to vote against this bill.

We Newfoundlanders are unable to express the degree of our disappointment, sorrow and disapproval of the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). Much laughter was heard in this house yesterday afternoon and last evening, but for Newfoundland this bill is no joke. I wish to read the last paragraph of an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of July 14 entitled "Smallwood Charges Betrayal":

> Thus, parliament is clearly invited to place itself on record in giving to Newfoundland an assurance which, we are led to understand, means much to Newfoundland and to which that province will, it is expected, attach no little importance.

Truer words were never written. No Newfoundlander ever thought he would receive such treatment. What Newfoundland will receive in the future will be the result of an act of grace instead of the fulfilment of an agreement. In my opinion the present government is unwilling to honour an obligation written into the British North America Act. The bill before the house has not changed the position of this government.

Reference has been made to the Atlantic grants. The maritime provinces can use these grants to improve their standards, but in Newfoundland much of the money received has had to be used to continue public services because the government has delayed for over 12 months the payment of the McNair grants as recommended by that commission. Our standards are still far below those of the rest of Canada, and it looks as though this government wants to maintain this situation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Shame. Shame on you.

Mr. Tucker: We in Newfoundland do not feel that we are a "have not" province. In 1948, as the hon. member for Humber-St George's said, Newfoundland was the third largest external market for Canada. We are now doing five times as much trade with Canada as we did prior to confederation. As has already been stated, a fair estimate would be $250 million.

A recent issue of the Financial Post contained an article which reads in part as follows:

> Newfoundland means much to Canada:
> A market for mainland goods estimated at $250 million a year.
> A strategic defence base in the north Atlantic.
> Population of 435,000 expanding rapidly; an area of 152,000 square miles.
> Billions of tons of undeveloped minerals, especially iron and copper.
> More than 7 million horsepower of undeveloped hydro power, which may some day support big new industry, even supply power to other areas of eastern Canada.

And I might add, Mr. Speaker, an island whose waters are teeming with fish of many species representing untold wealth.

We are led to believe in Newfoundland that our entry into confederation was a one-way street. This we strongly object to. Our natural resources are adding vastly to the total wealth of Canada, but for many years to come we cannot hope to have taxable income comparable with that of other provinces, even the maritimes. This is why we are so insistent on full respect for our constitutional rights, including term 29, which in 1949 was regarded as the sheet anchor of security for Newfoundland. Without this, Mr. Speaker, I say without fear of contradiction that the terms of union never would have been signed and we never woud have been a province of this great dominion.

We listened to the Prime Minister, who dealt with the past, but unfortunately in Newfoundland we have to live for the future. Most of his remarks, or the observations he made, referred to water which had long since passed under the bridge, and some of it dirty water. The Prime Minister spoke for approximately 60 minutes, but what bearing had his speech on the bill now before the house? He spoke about all that had been done for Newfoundland, but I fail to see where Newfoundland has received any better treatment than that received by the other provinces, or treatment to which she was not justly entitled. However, the Prime Minister said yesterday that the Progressive Conservative party will live up to the spirit of confederation. We were glad to hear that statement, and we shall look forward with great anticipation and anxety to the fulfilment of his statement. Whether his statement is correct time alone will tell.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, to the members who told me that Newfoundland had lost their sympathies, I can only say that we do not want the sympathy of any member of this house. We just want reasonable understanding and our rights under the terms of union.

Mr. D. J. Walker (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Trinity-Conception on his statement of what Newfoundland wants and on his sympathy for Newfoundland. We, the 206 mainlanders on the government side of the house, want to assure the hon. member for Trinity-Conception and the other distinguished members from Newfoundland on the other side of the house that we share to a superlative degree his sympathy. We believe that Newfoundland is entitled to justice.

Apparently, owing to a misunderstanding on the other side of the house, fanned by a certain member on that side of the house, all the members from Newfoundland on that side have misconceived what is being done for them. In an effort to see that justice is understood may I outline what we on this side of the house believe is being done, and in doing so I shall not repeat what has already been said. There are certain facets that have not yet been viewed.

In the first place, I was amazed to hear that mainlander, the Leader of the Opposition, in his speech compare term 29 with the other terms of the British North America Act by which other provinces have been given grants. Newfoundland received its grants under the act of union under term 28, and my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has pointed that out. Term 29 is something entirely different. My old professor of history, the Leader of the Opposition, made this statement on the history of this matter at page 5906 of Hansard. He said:

> I suggest that the refusal by any federal government to carry out that obligation would be of the same nature as a refusal by the federal government to carry out similar obligations made in respect of other provinces for financial assistance when they came into confederation.

The Leader of the Opposition should know better than that. He was a good history professor, although I do not recall that he taught constitutional history.

Mr. Pearson: I did.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): English constitutional history.

Mr. Walker: I looked up the record last night to see whether what he said was correct, and I think I am safe in saying, Mr. Speaker, that with regard to the obligations to the provinces—and I know hon. members from Newfoundland will be interested in this—when the other provinces came into confederation, the terms under which they came in were not subject to review or inquiry or report by a royal commission, and the amounts they were to receive were definitely fixed. Furthermore, it is my opinion that term 29 is unique in Canadian history, very unique. I believe it is safe to say that in no other part of the British North America Act is there anything that can be compared with term 29.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Walker: Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. gentleman not realize that term 29 is part of the British North America Acts?

Mr. Walker: Indeed I do. It is the misconception of the Leader of the Opposition in comparing term 29 with the other provisions of the British North America Act for the other provinces that I am taking exception to.

In the second place, Mr. Speaker, not only have we the statement of Mr. St. Laurent that there is no undertaking to implement any recommendation of the royal commission, but we have what is far more important than that, although his statement was made 10 years ago. We have the statement made at the hearings of the commission itself by the chairman of that commission, Chief Justice McNair, who was a great admirer of Newfoundland. He was sitting as the chairman of the commission, and this is what he said at page 1504 of the evidence before that royal commission:

> It is a very difficult problem, and we will apply the best we have to it, and I will be concerned with the reaction to it—

He was referring to term 29 and their report in connection therewith. I continue:

> —and I will be concerned with the reaction to it when the recommendations are made, because anything we do here will have no binding effect.

To the members from Newfoundland surely that is clear. The grants they were to receive under confederation—that is, the fixed amounts which they received when they came into confederation—are set out in term 28. Term 29 is something unique, and it must be clear now because even the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has admitted this. It only requires the government of the day to set up a royal commission to investigate the financial position of the province of Newfoundland. That has been done, and in doing that the obligation of the government as such under term 29 has been fulfilled.

The Leader of the Opposition, in an extraordinary statement, suggests that if there is not a legal obligation there is a moral obligation to fulfil to the letter all the recommendations of the report. This is something new. I have never heard this before, either in the law lectures from the professor or in this parliament. For instance, the Borden commission brought in its report. Does the Leader of the Opposition or any member from Newfoundland say there is either a legal or a moral obligation to carry out the recommendations of that report? Take part of them, yes; reject part of them, yes. But when has there ever been a royal commission established by the government of Canada all of whose recommendations have been accepted? Take the Gordon report. What happened to the Gordon report? Has there been any obligation, either legal or moral, to implement its recommendations? Take the Rowell-Sirois report, and so we could go right back to confederation.

I may be wrong in this, but I suggest to the other professor over there, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, that never has a government of the Dominion of Canada felt called upon, either legally or morally, to accept all the recommendations of a royal commission report.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since the hon. member has mentioned my name, will he permit a question?

Mr. Walker: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Pickersgill: My question is this. Has the hon. member forgotten that the former leader of his party, when he was leader of the opposition, took the view that the government should be bound by the recommendations of this royal commission?

Mr. Pearson: So did the member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne).

Mr. Walker: I am interested in the views of the former leader of this party, but I am fascinated by the views of our Prime Minister, who has solved a most difficult problem, who has untied the Gordian knot and arrived at a solution of what was an impossible situation with respect to the recommendations of the report as to term 29. I say to the Leader of the Opposition that to do otherwise, to make it obligatory on the government to accept the findings of a royal commission—and he knows this quite well as my former professor—would be to transfer legislative power to a commission. That would be government by commission instead of by the elected representatives of the people.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate knows this very well, particularly since he is now a student at law. I understand he is articled to a barrister in Newfoundland. He is going to become a barrister without any schooling. He is going to become a barrister by remote control. While he sits in parliament his articles will run.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope the hon. gentleman's prediction is right.

Mr. Walker: I hope so, too. We would love to have him as a member of our bar. I would be glad to article him in my office in Toronto.

Mr. Pickersgill: I cannot reciprocate.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member made a very profound observation, such as he alone in the house is capable of making so often. As found at page 5923 of Hansard for July 13 he asked himself the profound question, "what is meant by 'thereafter' ". This has been tormenting me ever since I read the report of the royal commission, but with his experience in the law, with the training he is getting by remote control, this was his reply:

> I am not going to argue that question because it seems to me to be very obvious that what is meant by "thereafter" is thereafter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Thereafter; and so would say any other honest person.

Mr. Walker: He was asked by the Prime Minister whether "thereafter" meant in perpetuity, and he said no.

Mr. Pickersgill: It means indefinitely.

Mr. Walker: He said definitely not.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member quote what I did say, instead of paraphrasing it?

Mr. Walker: What you said is in Hansard.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a typical lawyer's trick.

Mr. Walker: If the hon. member, instead of advertising himself, will keep his seat I will let him ask a question when he has a relevant one. In this debate my hon. friend has filled up the members from Newfoundland with all this Pickersgillian gobbledygook, and he would be better employed pursuing his course in the practice of law than dragging red herrings across our Canadian unity.

The government's solution is the only possible one. We have term 29 to deal with, and nobody knows exactly what was meant by "thereafter". But certainly there is no evidence, and my hon. friend at the bar will agree with me that when a royal commission brings in its report it is supposed to be based on evidence. My respectful submission, after perusing the 12 volumes of the lengthy proceedings of the royal commission, is that there is no evidence that would justify projecting the report into the future. Therefore, if for no other reason that that, it is the duty of the government of the day to reject a recommendation which is not based on conclusive facts.

You can imagine the problem that the Prime Minister and the government of the day had in coming to a solution of this matter. They came to the only possible solution. What I am about to say I do not say in any sense of nagging or carping criticism but in the greatest effort to gain the good will of my distinguished friends from Newfoundland, whom I like very much, and that includes the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I say that since no one knows what "thereafter" means, since no one can support "thereafter" with evidence taken before the royal commission, since both the counsel for Newfoundland and the government of Newfoundland—is my friend coming over to this side of the house?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): We do not want him.

Mr. Walker: —and since the commissioners themselves admitted—I do not like diversionary tactics.

Mr. Pickersgill: What are you in that party for, then?

Mr. Walker: —since the commissioners themselves admitted the difficulty of penetrating the mists of the future, and since they themselves concede that their recommendations are only recommendations and need not of necessity be implemented, then I say the government solved the problem in the only way it could, by giving to the people of Newfoundland everything the commission recommended for the years up to 1962, $8 million a year less certain small grants.

As to what will happen in 1962, I suggest that the government has put forward a wonderful solution. I ask hon. members from Newfoundland to forget the influence and the pressure that has been brought on them by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I ask them, do they not agree that it is a magnificent solution to this vexed problem to consider in 1962 the problem of our brothers in Newfoundland and of the government of Newfoundland in relation to the government of Canada, not within the narrow scope or narrow field of term 29 only—my hon. friends will admit that is a limited field—but to consider the whole broad field of all the requirements of Newfoundland, including the field set out and promulgated in term 29?

That is far more than they could expect if all the recommendations of the report had been accepted by the government, because even then the premier of Newfoundland would not have been satisfied. He has put it on record that the report is a shameful disgrace and does not give Newfoundland enough.

These are all factors which must be taken into consideration. The people of Newfoundland have good cause to put their faith in the government of Canada. According to the premier of Newfoundland they had no faith in the Liberal government at the time it was doing things for them, though that changed by the time the election came around. The people of Newfoundland have good cause to put their faith in the government of Canada to give them a square deal, because in 1962 the Prime Minister of Canada will do exactly what he has promised to do.

An hon. Member: He will be a Liberal.

Mr. Walker: "Woe worth the chase, woe worth the day" that would cause that situation. It is true that my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said extremely complimentary things about the premier of Newfoundland, and I do not intend in any way to engage in any controversy or to criticize in any way any of his utterances about that distinguished statesman. But let me say this. As the Prime Minister said, it is a Damon and Pythias relationship. That is something where emotion enters in rather than just plain, hard thinking. After all, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is under a tremendous obligation to the premier of Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, is it not against the rules of this house to impute motives or to ascribe motives?

Mr. Walker: By his remarks my hon. friend almost ascribes his own motives. Let me quote from a Canadian Press dispatch in the Ottawa Journal of July 3, 1953. This indicates the gratitude which my hon. friend opposite owes to the premier of Newfoundland:

> Prime Minister St. Laurent last night gave the answer to a question that political Canada has been speculating about for weeks.
> The question: How did John W. (Jack) Pickersgill, erudite, politically sharp, and clerk of the privy council in the civil service, come to be chosen as secretary of state and representative in the federal cabinet of Newfoundland?
> The answer: He was picked by Premier Joseph Smallwood of Newfoundland.
> The Prime Minister said at a meeting here Mr. Smallwood made the recommendation because of 47 year old Mr. Pickersgill's close interest in Newfoundland's affairs, particularly—

And I know he is famous for this.

> —for his behind the scenes role in drafting the Canada-Newfoundland confederation pact of 1949.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Walker: My friend has denied doing something this morning, but does he deny having a part in drafting that ubiquitous term 29?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We are discussing a particular bill—

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. member take his seat? We are discussing a particular bill, Mr. Speaker, and the honourable, distinguished and experienced parliamentarian from Toronto has now introduced circumstances that have to do with the appointment of a member of this house to the cabinet. I would submit to Your Honour that it is not in order for the hon. gentleman to discuss the circumstances involving the appointment of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to the cabinet. If the hon. gentleman has no sounder argument than that, I suggest that he might well take his seat.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Rosedale would indicate the relevance of what he is saying.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, because of the slavish adherence of my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to this defunct proposition and the stand he has taken about term 29, I simply want to indicate to the house the reasoning or the motive behind my hon. friend's actions.

Mr. Pickersgill: Motive?

Mr. Walker: I want, first, to indicate that he had a part in writing it, although Premier Smallwood has taken credit for it.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am hearing the hon. member for Rosedale on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Walker: Second, I think the members of this house should know and be fully cognizant of what makes the hon. member tick.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has said that he is trying to get at the motive of the hon. member and that, of course, is out of order. The hon. member is also dealing with the hon. member's relationship with the drafting of term 29. He has already denied in this house this morning that he had anything to do with it. For the hon. member for Rosedale to keep referring to that subject is just another indication of the bankruptcy of his argument.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That statement is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should indicate that it is not always irregular to refer to motives. It is contrary to the rules of this house to impute improper motives to an hon. member. But anything which is an explanation of actions which are properly criticized would, I think, be relevant. However, I think the hon. member for Rosedale was going rather far afield in the line he was following.

Mr. Pickersgill: He has exhausted the subject.

Mr. Walker: I thought you were thoroughly convinced by the argument. I am just now giving some reason for my hon. friend having made the sorry exhibition that he indulged in yesterday. The Globe and Mail of July 4, 1953 stated this:

> Picture the benighted islanders waiting for their young Lochinvar. He appears, on a ship instead of a horse, and promises them justice. But the two odd features of the story are that Newfoundland never heard of Mr. Pickersgill until last month and that he speaks for the party that is in power.

Mr. Pearson: Cheap.

Mr. Walker: The quotation continues:

> What sort of deal has Newfoundland been getting up till now?

That is the Globe and Mail. You do not often say that is cheap. I continue with the quotation:

> The compliments flew thick and fast at that three-cornered meeting. Mr. St. Laurent praised Messrs. Pickersgill and Smallwood. Mr. Smallwood praised Messrs. St. Laurent and Pickersgill. And Jack himself praised Messrs. St. Laurent, Smallwood and Pickersgill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Walker: If there has been any misunderstanding up to the present time among my hon. friends on the other side of the house who are following so slavishly the lead of the former mainlander, you can understand that he is obliged to say these things. He must do his best. Finally may I quote from the Toronto Telegram—an authoritative paper, of course—of August 11, 1953. In this we see the denouement of the whole business. This was after the election of August 10, when I was beaten and when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was elected. This is a British United Press dispatch:

> Premier Joey Smallwood, elated at a Liberal sweep of Newfoundland's seven seats, predicted today that secretary of state Jack Pickersgill one day would be prime minister of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: What call are you preaching for now?

Mr. Walker: It may be that the premier of that province, might not be infallible in his predicting, because he also said this:

> Smallwood said the future of the Conservative party was now very doubtful.
> "I wouldn't be surprised if a new party took its place," he said.

This was in 1953.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon gentleman would permit a question?

Mr. Walker: Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the hon. gentleman himself preaching for a call at the moment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Another diversion.

Mr. Walker: My answer to that question is this. I think all 208 members of this house or all 207, I should say, have in the past two years been preaching for a call so they can best serve in their own way this Dominion of Canada through the instrumentality of the present government. May I say this to the hon. gentleman opposite. Just keep on. Your smart wisecracks are appreciated by none more than myself.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to address himself to the Chair.

Mr. Walker: Yes, indeed. Pardon me, Mr. Speaker; I owe great deference to the Chair.

Here are the reasons why the Newfoundlanders and their very sound members over there—yes, the members opposite, because I do not need to preach to the two on this side of the house—should have faith in the Conservative government. This is going to be very brief. My hon. friend will be glad to know this. The federal contributions as set out at page 5901 of Hansard indicate that Newfoundland during the fiscal year 1956-57, under the Liberal administration, received grants and payments from the federal government in the amount of $55,341,000. That is amazing, is it not? Then in 1958-59, under the leadership of the present Prime Minister, Newfoundland received not $55 million—this after a period of two years—but $100,284,000, almost twice as much.

Mr. Pickersgill: Might I ask the hon. gentleman what the total budget of Newfoundland is? The total budget is $71 million, so it is pretty hard to believe we received $100 million. The hon. member is making the same mistake made by the Minister of Justice.

An hon. Member: You have made your speech.

Mr. Walker: He has made several speeches, and this is another of his interruptions. But let us not get off the track. I thought the population of Newfoundland—

Mr. Pickersgill: They are the same phony figures the minister used in St. John's.

Mr. Walker: —was 400,000. My hon. friend from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) tells me that because the birth rate is so high we had better put the figure at 450,000. We have a $100 million grant made to 450,000 people. We do not regret this, we are delighted. We take pride in it, and boast about it. A grant of $100 million is made to the province of Newfoundland, the population of which is approximately the same as that of metropolitan Hamilton. What does that mean? It means $225 for every man, woman, child and newborn babe in Newfoundland. That is not any mean figure.

Let us pause to realize what that really means. Is it not amazing that the government of Canada, when making the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant of $25 million a year, gave $7.5 million to Newfoundland? On a per capita basis, on the same basis, for instance, as Nova Scotia, Newfoundland would receive $4.5 million. On the same basis as New Brunswick, Newfoundland would get a little more than $5 million. So generosity exudes from all the acts of the dominion government in relation to Newfoundland, and we are proud of that and should boast about it, and we hope to continue to do so.

Then faced with the interpretation of the McNair report, the government of Canada has given every cent that the McNair report recommends up to the year 1962. After that date I have already gone into detail as to what is to be done. That is why you should have faith. You must have faith, because it is by the works of the Conservative party that we shall know them.

May I say in conclusion that we on this side of the house know that the people of Newfoundland, the government of Newfoundland—whatever that government is, whether it is Liberal or Conservative—can safely look forward to the same generous treatment they have received up to the present time.

I want to say in closing that for some reason or other, ever since I can remember I have been fascinated by this island and by the people of Newfoundland. I do not know why. It must be because they are men of character, inured as they have been to hardship, to danger, to privation, and to solid hard work over the centuries. But whatever it is, they have produced a fine race of people; there is no question about that.

Further, and this is very important, there are no people who uphold the British crown with greater vehemence and loyalty than the people of Newfoundland. When the Prime Minister on July 1 referred to Newfoundland's day of glory in battle I could not help but think of the traditions of the British navy, which for the very best, the very ablest of its able-bodied seamen has drawn for generations, yes, many generations, on the hardy, loyal folk of Newfoundland.

When we consider our obligation to this great province we should do so recalling that when the Pilgrim fathers came over to America they stopped on their way and sent in for food and help to the people in Newfoundland, in St. John's. Mr. Speaker, we should, and this government does, consider this newest of our provinces as not a new province in the circle but as something special, something extra, because it can boast and proudly boast of being the oldest and most esteemed colony in the British empire.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, after the extended debate which has already taken place on second reading, I do not think in closing this debate on second reading I need do more than touch up and bring into sharp focus some of the essential points which have arisen in the course of the discussion.

The debate at the resolution stage began with an attempt to set the tone of the debate in conciliatory terms. I can only express regret that partisan considerations have entered into many of the speeches which opposition members have made in the course of the debate. It is significant, and I also think it is regrettable, Mr. Speaker, that the speeches from the opposition in criticism of this measure have become much stronger since the premier of Newfoundland spoke his mind with reference to this bill yesterday morning. Apparently the lead has been accepted from the premier of Newfoundland in the rather bitter remarks which have been made by hon. members of the opposition on this measure.

Mr. Speaker, let me ask them to consider calmly what this bill contains. This bill contains two provisions that are of the essence of the proposed enactment. The first is the provision of sums of money under the operative provisions of the bill. The amount of $36.5 million will be provided by these clauses as a direct parliamentary enactment. Of that sum, on the enactment of this bill $17.2 million will be payable at once. Every cent of that sum was recommended by the royal commission, and in this proposal we are carrying out in full the recommendations of the royal commission for payments up to March 31, 1962.

We have been told, and told repeatedly, that Newfoundland asks for and needs this money; yet, to what I think must have been the amazement of the house and of the people of Newfoundland, the opposition voted against the resolution paving the way for the introduction of this bill, and has announced its intention of voting against this bill.

Mr. Speaker, surely this is an amazing attitude for the opposition to take. It is an amazing attitude for hon. members in the opposition representing Newfoundland constituencies to take with reference to this proposed provision of money for the benefit of Newfoundland. I might comment that this attitude and the declared intention of the opposition to vote against this measure expose a crude partisanship in their approach to this problem, and I think the people of Newfoundland as well as the people of the other provinces of Canada will have their opportunity and will certainly impose their judgment upon the irresponsibility of the opposition in regard to this issue.

Mr. Pickersgill: Cheap trickery.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let the people of Newfoundland judge in the light of this opposition by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and others as to who are their friends in this house; those who are prepared to commit the parliament of Canada to the payment of $36,500,000 to Newfoundland in the space of the period up to March 31, 1962, as well as other benefits in this bill that I will mention later, or those who have in this house denounced this measure in the bitterest terms and done everything in their power to resist the effort that is being made to make this provision for Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question? Has the minister ever heard of Esau?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have heard of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, and that is enough for anybody to listen to.

I said I was going to turn, now, to the other leading provision of this bill. We have heard talk in the course of this debate about a cut-off date in 1962, and this kind of talk has been accompanied, if you please, by wild statements, frenzied statements, irresponsible statements in this house about a breach of faith, a breach of trust, betrayal—

Mr. Pickersgill: Repudiation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The word "betrayal" was used, and I intend to deal with accusations of that kind and examine what substance there is in the wild and vitriolic language of the kind used by hon. members opposite apparently in an attempt to emulate an example which they are prepared to follow; that is, the voice which has been heard from St. John's, according to the press yesterday.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

I say, Mr. Speaker, that those who find it necessary to indulge in vitriolic language of this kind and to impute betrayal or a breach of trust are attacking not just a few people sitting on the treasury benches here in this parliament, but whoever may be sitting in these places in 1962 and in years to come. Those who make charges of that kind against the Canadian parliament are making them against the people of Canada; and it will take more than the sophistry which permits these wild and vitriolic charges to be made to enable them to stand up in the face of examination.

Hon. members of this house who resort to vitriolic language of this kind have forfeited their right to be taken very seriously in this house. I do not ask them to have regard to Conservative statements. I simply ask them to have regard to what has been said by many Liberal newspapers in Canada. What has been said by the Ottawa Citizen on this very subject? When the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was indulging in this kind of bitter language this rebuke was administered to him by a newspaper in this city of Ottawa, a newspaper which makes no pretence of being a friend of the present government. Referring to this question, that newspaper said in an editorial on March 28:

> No federal government of whatever party stripe is likely to seek by a deliberate act of bad faith to dismember that partnership.

And there are other Liberal newspapers in other parts of Canada which were striking the same note in editorials on this subject and rebuking hon. members like the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and others who spoke in a similar tone in making what was a calculated slur on the Canadian parliament and the Canadian people. If this on their part is an accusation that the Canadian people want to commit an act of bad faith, or would tolerate such an act, or that the Canadian parliament in the year 1962 or at any other date would be prepared to be a party to an act of bad faith, I may tell them that Canadians are not built that way and the Canadian parliament is, I am sure, never going to resort to base tactics of that kind.

The sooner the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and those associated with him learn that fact, the sooner they will be able to do justice to their responsibilities as members of the Canadian parliament. If Newfoundland has any case to present in this respect it is surely a case which ought to be capable of presentation in temperate terms appealing to the good sense as well as to the good will of the hon. members of this house.

What is the trust we are told we have broken? It must amaze hon. members who have followed this debate that when Newfoundlanders are told they cannot trust what the Canadian parliament is prepared to say in a statutory enactment, somehow or other they were prepared to entrust their whole future to the vague and nebulous terms of article 29 which did not give them anything, expressly, except the right to have a royal commission appointed by the federal government, and which gave them nothing more, as Mr. St. Laurent plainly said in this house in 1949. How is it that the trust which apparently Newfoundland was prepared to vouchsafe in article 29 in 1949 may not, apparently, be vouchsafed today in an enactment of the Canadian parliament which is put before this house in plain terms?

It is quite obvious, I submit, why hon. members opposite are resorting to this frenzied talk about article 29 and breaches of faith. It is evident that some of the chickens are now coming home to roost. It is quite clear that those who oversold the people of Newfoundland on what the terms of article 29 really meant are being faced now with inescapable facts which they have withheld from the people of Newfoundland up to this time.

I remind the house of the words of Mr. St. Laurent, uttered in this chamber in February, 1949. Had those words been carried to the people of Newfoundland by hon. members opposite, or those associated with them; had those words been carried to that province in all frankness, much of the difficulty and bad feeling which members of the opposition have generated in Newfoundland since could never have been created by them.

I see it is one o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The house will resume, then, at two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, at one o'clock I was referring to the fact that it was quite evident that those who have been overselling the terms of article 29 in Newfoundland had not laid before the good people of Newfoundland the words of Mr. St. Laurent in his authoritative pronouncement in this house on February 7, 1949 upon the effect of the terms of article 29. Perhaps the attitude of a good many of those who have been purporting to speak for Newfoundland might have been very different today if that corrective and authoritative pronouncement of Mr. St. Laurent had been made known to the people of Newfoundland as effectively as some have evidently been applying their efforts to oversell the effect of the terms of article 29.

I was suggesting that perhaps in the rather frenzied approach to the present debate of some hon. members opposite we see now something of a situation in which the chickens are coming home to roost, and in which this overselling of the term of article 29 which has been carried on by some persons has now been subjected to exposure. We are accused by certain hon. members opposite of violating some obligation. I am going to examine that accusation, because the government does not intend to leave allegations of that kind unanswered. They are baseless, and I suggest that in the end they will not reflect credit upon those who have resorted to them.

What is the obligation that it is said the federal government was under and which it has not fulfilled? Here I propose to strip the sophistry off some of the remarks we have heard from hon. members opposite in the course of this debate. I tried as best I could to follow the Leader of the Opposition in what he was saying on this point. First of all, Mr. Speaker, I ask, does article 29 create an obligation? The obligation created by article 29 is very clearly an obligation placed upon the federal government to appoint a royal commission in accordance with its terms. And as to that, either Mr. St. Laurent was right or the Leader of the Opposition was right in his speech. They cannot both be right. If the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday was sound, if his speech had any merit, it could only have that merit on the basis of repudiating what Mr. St. Laurent said in this house on February 7, 1949, as reported at page 289 of Hansard of that date. The words of Mr. St. Laurent are crystal clear. Speaking of this very point he said:

> There is no undertaking to implement any terms of recommendation that may be made by a royal commission.

What could be clearer than that? If there is any suggestion from hon. members opposite that article 29 created any obligation except an obligation to appoint a royal commission, then Mr. St. Laurent has completely removed any suggestion of any other obligation. If we are to heed what was said by hon. members opposite and by the Leader of the Opposition about some moral obligation in this respect, again I invite the attention of hon. members to what Mr. St. Laurent said on that point. Here are his concluding words in the passage to which I have made reference:

> It was felt that if there was an investigation and a report by a commission, in which the public at that time would have confidence, the legislature of that day—

Note those words, "the legislators of that day". That means parliament; that means hon. members of this house and the other place. I continue:

—could well be trusted to do what would prove to be right in order to make this enlarged nation a united nation continuing on its path of progress toward its great destiny.

Mr. St. Laurent, as to the alleged moral obligation, was simply saying that this is a matter which must be left to the legislators when the report of the royal commission comes before the House of Commons. He said that, and he said not one word more than that about any obligation of the legislators in the Canadian parliament. He said the legislators in parliament can be trusted. That is what he said, and we are here discharging that duty; and if there is to be a contradiction between the views expressed by hon. members opposite now and by Mr. St. Laurent at that time, when it comes to a matter of the interpretation of a constitutional document, then with great respect to hon. members opposite I must say that having regard to the experience of Mr. St. Laurent, I do not think there is any doubt that it is the view of Mr. St. Laurent that hon. members will accept.

Therefore there is not to be found in article 29, as interpreted by Mr. St. Laurent, any continuing obligation.

Mr. Pickersgill: What a perversion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What of the next stage, Mr. Speaker? What about the recommendations? Is there an obligation created in respect of the recommendations of that royal commission? Here again we have had some extraordinary sophistry on the part of hon. members opposite. The royal commission has made its recommendations. What effect have these? What binding effect, if any, have they upon the Canadian parliament? Here I need do no more than cite the words of the Leader of the Opposition yesterday as recorded at page 5989 of Hansard of July 14. I put the following question to him:

Does the Leader of the Opposition contend that the recommendations of the royal commission are binding on the federal government?

His answer was:

Of course not. I said yesterday that no recommendation of a royal commission is legally binding on any government.

The Leader of the Opposition is quite correct. There was no binding effect so far as the recommendations of the royal commission are concerned. It is perfectly clear. It remained, then, in the light of the terms of article 29, in the light of this authoritative interpretation by Mr. St. Laurent, a matter for decision by parliament. There is nothing said there about further negociation. There is nothing said there about entering into a new agreement. No, not at all; article 29 simply leaves it to parliament, as Mr. St. Laurent has said, and it is not left with any suggestion of any binding effect that those recommendations might have upon parliament. There is no such binding effect so there is no obligation up to that point. These recommendations are not binding on the federal government nor are they binding on the federal parliament. We do not say they are binding on Newfoundland either.

Newfoundland through its premier is entitled to approve them or criticize them as he chooses. No one will deny him that right. Nor is there anything to prevent him asking for more, as he did when we met with him in January last. That is his right. But there is no right—and here I wish to be very clear and emphatic in regard to this alleged obligation—there is no right, contractual or constitutional, on the part of anyone in this country to the implementation of the recommendations of this royal commission in whole or in part.

Hon. members opposite in going on talking about an obligation are simply doing so in the face of clear and uncontestable facts. A fair test of the effect of this constitutional provision in article 29 is to test it under other circumstances for its meaning. Had circumstances been different, it is perfectly clear that under the terms of article 29 the royal commission might—as I say, had circumstances warranted it—have recommended larger or smaller payments, or no payments, or payments for a year, or six months, or two years, or for any period the royal commission might have chosen. It was a question of the circumstances found by the royal commission.

It is not a question of any obligation or absolute right, contractual or constitutional, on the part of the province of Newfoundland or anyone else, and hon. members opposite are completely mistaken in talking about unilateral action. The Canadian parliament has to take the responsibility in this matter, Mr. Speaker. Why? Because those who were responsible for the drafting of the terms of article 29 so provided. It was not left for further negotiation of a new agreement. Article 29 and the other terms of union were final in their terms, Mr. Speaker. What was required at that point, Mr. St. Laurent makes crystal clear, was a decision by the Canadian parliament. If hon. members opposite today do not like that procedure they can take the responsibility upon themselves, because it was they who drew article 29.

What has been the attitude of this government, Mr. Speaker, toward the recommendations of the royal commission?

Mr. Pickersgill: What did Mr. Drew say?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Drew did not say anything at variance with what I am saying now, but hon. members opposite in argument for the last two days have been saying things directly repudiating the statement of Mr. St. Laurent. We prefer the statement of Mr. Laurent in his authoritative pronouncement.

What has been the attitude of the government toward the recommendations of the royal commission? We have recognized the eminence, the competence of the three members who constituted that commission. We do not attack the personnel of that commission, whether or not we like their recommendations. We have examined the report. I have indicated that we think there are weaknesses in the report, that the recommendations in some respects are not well founded; but on balance and in the hope of arriving at happier relationships we have asked this house to proceed in the manner indicated in the present bill; to provide immediately, by immediate decision of parliament, for the payment of those sums of money in the period up to March 31, 1962, the end of the current period.

As to the word "thereafter" upon which hon. members opposite have staked their case we say, Mr. Speaker, that had the royal commission, men of the quality and training of those who constituted the royal commission, intended to make a recommendation for a payment in perpetuity it might be safe to conclude that they would have said so, and said so in express terms. Parliamentarians, when perpetual obligations are created, do not leave matters of that kind to strained inference. When obligations of that nature are being created they are spelled out, Mr. Speaker, in plain terms. The men who constituted this royal commission were well aware—

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We shall be in committee shortly. I will be glad to answer questions there.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can understand why the minister does not want to answer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Those members who constituted the royal commission were not the kind of men who, in matters of such high importance, were likely to leave their thoughts in vague terms, had they intended to propose a recommendation effective in perpetuity. Sir, to say that "thereafter" means in perpetuity is, I submit, to put a proposition to this house, as hon. members opposite have done, that simply flies in the teeth of reason.

Mr. Pearson: What does it mean?

Mr. Pickersgill: What does the word "thereafter" mean?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If hon. members will just wait, I am going to develop that point.

Mr. Pickersgill: Read it from the dictionary.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will read it where I choose; I do not take my orders from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I come back and ask, Mr. Speaker, what was the purpose of article 29? It was never in the contemplation of anyone in drafting the terms of article 29 that there should be a situation in perpetuity that would require payments from the federal treasury. Newfoundland is a province with great resources. It was a period of limited duration that was in contemplation by those who drew article 29. It would be an insult to Newfoundland to say that it was to be contemplated that forever and ever conditions of the province of Newfoundland in relation to services were always to be at a lower level than those in the three maritime provinces. No; the whole tenor of discussion has always been that what article 29 was dealing with was a situation of limited duration. It was not something that was going to run on forever and ever. I say that for hon. members opposite to assume that Newfoundland was going to stand still and that its services were always going to be at a lower level than those in the other three Atlantic provinces is an insult to Newfoundland.

Mr. Pearson: It certainly is the case.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And that is exactly what hon. members opposite use as the basis of their argument, if their argument has any meaning at all.

The other answer to them, Mr. Speaker, in exposure of the curious sophistry to which they have resorted in their speeches, is this; that those who spoke for the province of Newfoundland before the royal commission put their case on the basis of a request for payments for a limited period, not for the indefinite future.

Mr. Pickersgill: What limited period?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I read yesterday the statement of Mr. Carl Goldenberg, the extremely competent counsel who represented Newfoundland before the royal commission.

Here is what he said, which is to be found at pages 627 and 628 of the proceedings of the royal commission:

> Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not suggesting that this additional financial assistance will be required by Newfoundland indefinitely.

What can be clearer than that, Mr. Speaker? There is the counsel chosen by the province of Newfoundland, a very competent counsel. I am sure no one in this house is going to say that he has a greater right to speak for Newfoundland than Mr. Carl Goldenberg, selected by the government of the province for the purpose. I read his next sentence:

> As Newfoundland's public services improve and its economy expands, the differentials in income and in tax burdens as compared with other provinces will narrow; with the narrowing of the gap, the dependence on grants from the government of Canada will decline.

It is precisely what we have said, Mr. Speaker, and it is directly the opposite to what hon. members in the opposition have been saying on this subject. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we have said and proposed to the house in this bill that the sensible thing to do, the sensible course to follow, is to have a review at the conclusion of this period for which the payments are being expressly provided. This is a sensible course. It is the course that was sought by Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker. Let me remind the house of what Mr. Goldenberg said on this subject in his submission to the royal commission:

> Accordingly, while Newfoundland is now entitled, under the provisions of term 29 of the terms of union, to receive additional annual financial assistance of the order of $17 million, provision should be made for a further review—

Note these words, sir:

> —a further review of its financial and economic position within a reasonable period of time.
> Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the government of Newfoundland I submit that the government of Newfoundland is entitled to claim from the government of Canada an annual grant of $17 million subject to the adjustments which we have discussed over and above all other federal grants as the additional financial assistance required under the explicit provisions of term 29. I recommend further that the said grant should be paid annually to the province of Newfoundland, commencing in the fiscal year 1957-58. I recommend that the amount of the said annual grant should thereafter—

Where did the word "thereafter" come from in the report? Here is the word "thereafter" in the closing submission of the counsel for the province of Newfoundland:

> I recommend that the amount of the said annual grant should thereafter be subject to periodic review.

What can be plainer than that? That was his concluding submission. This is what the spokesman for Newfoundland said, not those voices opposite that parrot the views of one outside the house. That was the authentic voice of the spokesman chosen by the province of Newfoundland to present its case to the royal commission. I remind the house that in our meetings with him in January last Mr. Smallwood was still asking for a review, and proposed that there should be a review in 1965. He would have liked reviews at periodic intervals.

I do not wish to labour this point further, Mr. Speaker, but I was taken to task yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition for saying I was quite certain that if the royal commission had thought they had the power under the terms of article 29 to recommend a periodic review they would have done so. The Leader of the Opposition challenged that statement. I refer now to the proceedings of the royal commission, pages 1511 and 1512. There was a question about a review and Chief Justice Walsh said:

> I am concerned about our authority to write down there shall be a review at a certain time. Have we that authority?

Then Mr. Goldenberg replied:

> I see, do you think you have the authority to make your recommendation subject—
> Commissioner Walsh: I feel we would be going beyond our terms of reference to provide for a review.

And further, on page 1514 these are the words of the chairman, Chief Justice McNair:

> The point I think you were advancing that our recommendation could contain a suggestion for further review. I am doubtful whether that is within our province. These financial settlements between governments never prove final, as you know.

Does that sound like any thought that there was going to be a proposal for payments in perpetuity as a final settlement? Here is the chairman of the commission saying that "these financial settlements between governments never prove final, as you know".

Then sir, here is the submission of the other counsel for the province of Newfoundland to the royal commission. Mr. Lewis had this to say, as found at page 1598 of the proceedings:

> We are, I am sure, all fully convinced this is the last time that Newfoundland can come before any tribunal such as this to plead her cause as of right. When the signatures are affixed to the report of this commission the final act in the consummation of confederation will have been performed. From that day forward no man shall have the contractual right to demand that Newfoundland's position as a partner of Canada should be reviewed or reassessed.

We have to listen in the house, Mr. Speaker, to hon. members asserting that there are still surviving contractual or constitutional rights that have not been acknowledged or honoured by the government of Canada in the manner in which they have been honoured both in the appointment of the royal commission and in the terms of the present bill. These hon. members are repudiating the stand that Newfoundland took before the royal commission.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought you said a while ago that we were parrotting it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are repudiating the stand that was effectively taken before that commission by those who were qualified to speak for the province of Newfoundland.

This is my concluding word, Mr. Speaker. The terms of article 29, for which hon. members opposite were the responsible draftsmen and with respect to which they are the irresponsible spokesmen today, were vague and nebulous. They presented the royal commission with a virtually impossible task. We are taking out of that report of the royal commission whatever is definite, and we are asking the house in the interests of good relations, in the spirit that Mr. St. Laurent was confident when speaking in 1949 that Canadian legislators in the Canadian parliament would demonstrate when this matter came before them in due course, to join with us in making definite provisions to be translated into an obligation created by parliament in the plain terms of a statutory enactment of the Canadian parliament. We are proposing that the Canadian parliament place itself on record in a way it has not done in relation to Newfoundland before; not in any vague, nebulous terms but in clear, definite terms.

In this bill we are spelling out the undertaking that in the wide review of dominion-provincial fiscal and financial relations that is to take place as of the period that will follow March 31, 1962, Newfoundland may not only put forward her position with all the other provinces of Canada but in her case, where there are any special circumstances affecting her, she will have full opportunity to put them forward, and in this review of dominion-provincial fiscal relations those special circumstances put forward by Newfoundland shall be taken into consideration.

That is the effect of the bill. That is the way in which the government, if parliament approves, proposes to undertake to meet a difficult situation; to meet it in terms of good will, to meet it on the basis of mutual trust, and to meet it in a way which we believe will bring honour and, in the end, satisfaction to the good people of Newfoundland.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fleming) which was agreed to on the following division:

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Pearson: I do not propose to say very much on clause 1. I shall reserve most of my comments until we reach clause 2, which deals with some of the more detailed provisions of the bill. But the words to which we have just listened—and there were a lot of them uttered by the Minister of Finance—certainly were such as to provoke a few observations from this side of the house. We will have occasion during the very comprehensive consideration which we propose to give to the terms of this bill—and this will take some time—to deal with some of the more detailed aspects of the minister's argument.

Perhaps I can say at once that the violence of the minister's language does not conceal the hollowness of his argument, as we will endeavour to point out. We on this side of the house, especially those from Newfoundland, have strong views with regard to this legislation. This being the case the minister, in immoderate and extravagant language, challenges our right to express those views in strong language. The hon. gentleman's complaint is, of course, that we do not now agree with the view he takes at this time in regard to this matter. It was not always his view, as we shall be able to point out.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, yes; it was always his view.

Mr. Pearson: The minister on this occasion —and he has done it many times before in this house—spoke with a self assurance which verged on arrogance and a complete certainty of his own infallibility which more than verged on self righteousness. He carried that characteristic a little too far, however, when he identified himself at the beginning of his remarks not only with the government—perhaps he is entitled to do that—but with parliament, and indeed with the people of Canada, in respect to this particular bill which in the words of the Prime Minister is a final and irrevocable settlement of the obligations contracted by the federal government with Newfoundland at the time of union.

In respect of the position taken by the minister, he had the effrontery a short while ago to say that he was speaking for parliament and for the people of Canada. Nothing quite so ridiculous as that has been heard since the three tailors of Tooley street took unto themselves the people of England. All the hon. gentleman's talk and all the identification of himself with the people of Canada cannot conceal the fact that the obligation under term 29 is far more than an obligation to set up a royal commission, as any fair minded person must realize.

Mr. Montgomery: No, it is not. You cannot say that.

Mr. Pearson: If the hon. member has anything to say in addition to his babbling interruptions, why does he not get up and say it when we get into committee?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are in committee.

Mr. Pearson: As I was saying before I was interrupted from the end of the chamber by an hon. member who has done nothing in this debate except interrupt, who spoke not a word on second reading and perhaps will not say a word at this stage, and who I suggest might well stop interrupting, all the talk of the minister and all the ferocity of the minister's language—and goodness knows, he is a past master in that—does not conceal the fact that the obligation under term 29—and there is an obligation in addition to the appointment of a royal commission, as any fair minded person would agree—which has now been repudiated, and the people of Newfoundland and the government of Newfoundland have to rely in future for the implementation of this particular term of the act of union on the good will of the federal government of Canada.

An hon. Member: That is all Mr. St. Laurent said—

Mr. Pearson: Nothing Mr. St. Laurent said denies that fact, and we shall have ample occasion to demonstrate that, too. Perhaps that is all I need say on clause 1. When we get to clause 2 I shall have a good deal more to say about that part of the bill.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have not spoken at all during this debate, but I have listened with a great deal of interest to what at times I considered somewhat unnecesary vehemence on both sides of the argument. I want to explain our position briefly. I must say, first of all, that we think the Prime Minister was entirely wrong when he said on March 25, as reported at page 2216 of Hansard:

> The proposed payments will be unconditional and will be in final and irrevocable settlement of the provisions of article 29 and the contractual obligations of the union consummated in 1949.

We think he was wrong because in saying that he was, in our view, departing from the recommendation of the royal commission. Then again, we think this statement was unnecessary. Personally I was very surprised that one so politically astute as the Prime Minister could have made such an unnecessary statement at this time. That statement has without a doubt caused misunderstanding in Newfoundland, and great disappointment. I have no hesitation in repeating what my leader said yesterday, namely that this is something of a tempest in a teacup. We recognize that, but we voted against the resolution and today against the bill to show our sympathy with the representatives from Newfoundland because of the Prime Minister's statement which, as I say, we think was so unnecessary.

Before sitting down, I want to say this. We have no fear whatever as far as this group is concerned that the people of Newfoundland will fail to get fair treatment in the years ahead. I am quite sure that the parliament and the people of Canada want to see all our people treated on an equal basis. When it comes to legislation of this kind, we have no fear that when 1962 comes the people of Newfoundland will receive the same treatment as far as dominion-provincial relations are concerned as all other provinces, because that is the Canadian way to deal with these questions.

Mr. Pickersgill: I cannot, of course, agree with the hon. member's last sentence, because it seems to me it does repeat what we have complained about from the beginning, the suggestion on the part of the government that Newfoundland has a right as an ordinary province of Canada to be treated on the same basis as any other province. That is not what is at issue here. What is at issue is something that was agreed to as a part of the union, and something which this government by this bill is seeking to take away from Newfoundland. That is the whole basis of our argument.

The Minister of Finance made a rather successful effort the other day. I listened this morning to a program that is very dear to the heart of the Prime Minister, the program called "Preview Commentary" and the word "perpetuity" was used there. The Minister of Finance seems to think parliament either has to put a definite term on something or legislate in perpetuity. That, of course, is absolute nonsense, to use the hon. gentleman's favourite word. I believe that 99 per cent of all the legislation we pass in this house is for neither of those terms. It is indefinite until parliament takes some other course. That is what this legislation should have been. That is what the royal commission said it should have been. That is what "thereafter" means. It does not mean thereafter to eternity, but thereafter without a specific term, because there was no specific term recommended by the commission.

On Monday the Minister of Finance made a statement which I know he made believing it to be true, but he ought to have known that it was not true. He said—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Page?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am reading from page 5903 of Hansard of July 13, at the very top of the first column, after the expression "black and white" is used, which is another of the minister's favourite expressions, and I must say a very characteristic expression because the minister has no greys. Perhaps that is why he cannot see any intermediate term between March 31, 1962, and perpetuity. Everything is either black or white to the minister. However, this is something the minister said in black and white which happens, historically, to be untrue:

> Mav I remind hon. members that apart from the constitutional subsidies, no other province—not one of the other nine province—has anything in black and white beyond March 31, 1962, to define its financial relations with the dominion—

I have in my hand, Mr. Chairman, the report of the royal commission on financial arrangements between the dominion and the maritime provinces set up by the Bennett government under the late Sir Thomas White, which commission made its report in 1935. The purpose of this commission was to consider, under the recommendation of the Duncan commission which was set up some years earlier, the financial relations between the three maritime provinces and the federal government. At page 20 of the report it is stated:

> An assessment in detail of each claim is not possible as the claims are for the most part based upon broad and general considerations of fairness and equity having regard to the treatment enjoyed by other provinces under the same headings and to the economic disadvantages to which the maritime provinces are peculiarly subject owing to their isolated geographic position in relation to the central and western parts of Canada toward which the trend of Canadian development has continuously and increasingly set ever since the establishment of the dominion. Such claims are by their nature not susceptible of detailed appraisal by any process of mathematical calculation as the basis for accurate comparison is wanting on account of the diversity of conditions and circumstances of development of the several provinces.

It was then stated:

As an assessment in detail of each of the claims presented before us is, for the reasons given, manifestly impracticable, we adopt the only course available to us, viz., to consider equitably the claims in the aggregate assigning to each its due weight according to our best judgment and making our recommendation in the form of special additional annual subsidies to the maritime provinces respectively as a final equitable settlement of the claims brought before us for adjudication. These additional annual subsidies so recommended are to be in substitution for the interim annual subsidies recommended by the Duncan commission. They should commence in the fiscal year 1935-6 and the interim annual subsidies recommended by the Duncan commission should cease at the end of the fiscal year 1934-5.

I draw hon. members' attention to the marked similarity with the present case. There you have interim payments under the Duncan commission, and here in this case you have transitional payments made under term 28.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Those are subsidies. They are referred to as subsidies.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not constitutional subsidies; that is the word the minister used. This commission was not set up pursuant to the constitution, as was the McNair commission, but was set up simply in the wisdom of the government of the day. It was a wise thing to do, but it was not a constitutional obligation. The minister by his intervention has very much weakened what little case he had. This was something that was done by the federal government in its wisdom in order to be equitable to the maritime provinces. It was not required under the constitution at all. I repeat:

They should commence in the fiscal year 1935-6 and the interim annual subsidies recommended by the Duncan commission should cease at the end of the fiscal year 1934-5.

The additional annual subsidies which we recommend are as follows:

To Nova Scotia, $1,300,000.
To New Brunswick, $900,000.
To Prince Edward Island, $250,000.

Now, what disposition was made of that? Sir George Perley was asked a question by Mr. McClure, who was at that time a member of this house representing a Prince Edward Island constituency, and Sir George Perley said that this recommendation would be dealt with either by a bill or by an item in the estimates. It appears in the Appropriation Act for one year only, for the fiscal year 1935-36. I have not examined the statutes for every year, but I am advised that it was dealt with in the same way every year until 1942, when it was embodied in a statute, chapter 14, entitled "An act to provide for the payment of additional subsidies to the maritime provinces". It sets out these subsidies recommended by this report, and there is no time limit whatever put on them.

I do not think and I am not arguing that that is legislation in perpetuity. It is still on the statute books. They are still being paid in that form, and I take it they will go on being paid indefinitely. I would be very surprised if any government would ever reduce them, but circumstances might arise in the future when they would be increased. The minister was manifestly incorrect concerning a very important matter in his department with which he should have been better acquainted after two years at 18 hours a day.

If the government of Mr. Mackenzie King in 1942 could carry out what obviously was intended by the government of Mr. Bennett in 1935 in accepting the recommendation of the White commission and providing for additional subsidies to these three provinces and no others for an indefinite period, surely there is no reason on earth why the same action should not be taken in this bill except that this government wanted to punish Newfoundland, and for no other reason.

There could be no other reason except one. The year 1962 may be the end of the mandate of this parliament, and it may be that hon. gentlemen thought that by putting in that date it would give them an opportunity to make some more of those promises of which we had so many in 1957. There is no other explanation whatsoever that is credible to any dispassionate, objective person.

I suggest, sir, that hon. gentlemen—I will not ascribe motives—can take whichever explanation they like.

But this is not the only case. This morning I took a look at the Provincial Subsidies Act. These are not the constitutional subsidies of 1867; I understand those subsidies are provided under the Financial Administration Act at the present time. I looked into this matter. It is not very easy to trace the evolution of these statutes but these subsidies in the Provincial Subsidies Act are not the original constitutional subsidies; they are various other payments.

First of all there is one to New Brunswick, which is indefinite in time and is made on account of the repeal of duties on the export of lumber. It is not a very large amount, but it has been paid for a long time. It is $150,000 annually; there is no term on it; it does not end in 1962; it goes right on. It is not one of the constitutional subsidies at all; it is a payment that is made indefinitely, as this should have been.

There are at least eight or nine of those. Some of them are paid to Manitoba, several to British Columbia and some to Prince Edward Island for various reasons, and they are being paid indefinitely. It does not necessarily mean that they are going to be paid forever, but they are being paid quite indefinitely. In other words the minister was completely and utterly wrong in his facts when he said that, apart from the constitutional subsidies, not one of the other nine provinces has anything anywhere that goes beyond March 31, 1962. It seems to me that this completely destroys any argument the minister might have had for putting this arbitrary date upon what was obviously intended to go on thereafter.

Now, for the benefit of the hon. and erudite member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker), I thought I would give him the definition of "thereafter" which can be found in the Concise Oxford dictionary. It means after that; in other words after March 31, 1962. This is the first definition.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, not 1962; the last previous date referred to is March 31, 1961.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, no.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the recommendations.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister say "thereafter" meant for one year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Don't run away.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister mean to say that "thereafter" is for one year? Nothing more ridiculous—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Don't run away.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let me read the other definition of "thereafter". "According to that rule". Now, do you have a rule for a single case, Mr. Chairman? Has anyone ever heard of having a rule for a single case? I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that in spite of the quibbling of the hon. member for Rosedale, ordinary, plain people, speaking plain English, have no trouble in understanding that "thereafter" means thereafter.

Now, sir, the minister made a lot of what Mr. St. Laurent, according to him, meant; and yesterday the Prime Minister raised that old question that his party tried very unsuccessfully to create prejudice about in the 1949 election, namely Mr. St. Laurent's statement about the right to use the French language.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No such statement was ever made by me about prejudicing the people.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not suggest that; I said the Prime Minister's party, and I could quote—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought you said the Prime Minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: —a statement by Mr. Hackett and those of a good many other members. I saw their speeches. I took a good deal of interest in speeches in those days.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You were just writing them in those days. Did you write that one?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Hackett's? No, he never asked me.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Did you write Mr. St. Laurent's speech?

Mr. Pickersgill: Which one of Mr. St. Laurent's?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The one you are referring to.

Mr. Pickersgill: As I recollect it, Mr. St. Laurent was replying to a question in the house one evening. I think it was one evening; I was not even here. I read it in Hansard, and I remember very well the rest of what Mr. St. Laurent said. It applies so precisely to this case, and it is so like the words he always used. Mr. St. Laurent took the view—I am afraid that perhaps some of us here are not so charitable—that we would always in this parliament be dealing with honourable people acting in an honourable fashion, and it never occurred to him that anyone at any time would have the effrontery to suggest that all that was required by term 29 was to appoint a royal commission to engage in an academic exercise. Just to state that proposition is surely to show how fantastically absurd it is.

The purpose of the royal commission, as I said on Monday and I repeat for the benefit of the Minister of Finance, was to find a mechanism, a relatively independent and objective mechanism. For my part I accept that it was a relatively objective commission, and I have never myself made any criticism whatsoever of its recommendations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Do you agree with Mr. Smallwood's expression of view?

Mr. Pickersgill: I will choose my own time to express my agreement or disagreement with Mr. Smallwood or anyone else. I have never felt I was under any compulsion at any time in my life to agree with anyone. I have a fairly good record, I think, of making up my own mind and reaching my own conclusions, which I think some hon. members would perhaps be willing to concede.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): When he speaks about his view of the report of the royal commission and not having criticized it apart from the period, the length of time the payments were to run, is he satisfied with the recommendation of the $8 million per annum as against Mr. Smallwood's request first for $17 million per annum and later for $15 million per annum?

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, my answer to this question is very simple. This recommendation was made by the royal commission which was given that responsibility under the constitution; I was not given it. I will say this for the government. It seems to me that it would have been very difficult for any federal government to deviate from the award made by that commission, whatever their views might have been.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member disagrees with Mr. Smallwood.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not agreeing or disagreeing with Mr. Smallwood. This was not my business. This was why the royal commission was appointed. I think Mr. Smallwood was understandably disappointed. I said that the other day. If the hon. gentleman thinks he is going to get some satisfaction out of getting me to say that I disagree with Mr. Smallwood, well, he can get what satisfaction he likes. I have disagreed with Mr. Smallwood about a good many things and I expect to disagree with him about a good many more; but about this matter, Mr. Smallwood is the premier of Newfoundland and I am a member of this parliament, and I am taking my responsibility as a member of this parliament.

I have been very categorical about this and I will be so again. My view—and it is precisely the same view as the Leader of the Opposition has—is that if the government had carried out literally the recommendations of this royal commission they would have discharged the obligation under term 29, and they could not be criticized on the grounds of a breach or repudiation of the constitution at all.

I said the other day and I say again, like the Leader of the Opposition and like the premier of Newfoundland, that I think it would be much better to provide after a period for a review; and I think, like the Leader of the Opposition, that review should be a review agreed upon between the two parties to the original contract. But I say that this contractual obligation is very plain. It is to provide—I want to use the exact words—to provide the additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required by the government of the province of Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union, without resorting to taxation more burdensome—perhaps I can just say more burdensome than the maritime average and save quoting the rather more precise words.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): To recommend, not to provide.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I am not talking about what obligation was on the commission. I am talking about what constitutional obligation is on this parliament. That is what the Newfoundlanders believed they were getting when they signed the terms of union, and that is what Mr. St. Laurent believed they were getting, too. That is perfectly plain if anyone will take the trouble to read Mr. St. Laurent's words a little earlier on in the same passage that has been read so many times before. He said, as found at page 289 of Hansard of February 7, 1949:

> We on our side wanted to provide financial terms which would make it reasonably probable, if not certain, that the addition of Newfoundland to the economy of Canada would ultimately prove to be beneficial to both partners, to the older Canadians and to the newer arrivals. It was found, after more precise and careful study of the administrative problems that would be faced by the government of the province of Newfoundland, that the terms suggested in the offer submitted in October, 1947—

Those were the terms referred to by the hon. member for St. John's West last night.

> —would not be sufficient at the start to enable the provincial government to provide for its people on a basis comparable to that which is provided by the other Canadian provinces. It was felt there had to be quite substantial provisional grants, extending over a period of 12 years on a diminishing scale, to bridge the transition from the present economy of the island to the kind of economy which would make it possible for the provincial government to provide the people of Newfoundland with substantially the services that are provided for the rest of the Canadian people by their provincial governments, without resorting to a burden of taxation heavier, having regard to capacity to pay, than that which bears upon the people of the maritime region.

There is no doubt that is what Mr. St. Laurent indicated was the obligation, as between term 28 and term 29, that had been assumed in the terms of union. I am going to do something I do not do very often in the house, and I hope I will not do it very often in the future. I made a speech outside of the house the other day to the Canadian club in Winnipeg in which I said something about this very point. I am going to inflict it on the committee because I think it is put more briefly here than I could put it if I ad libbed.

But the great snag in the negotiations was provincial finance.

I was talking about the negotiations with which, I will admit quite frankly to the hon. member for Rosedale, I was very closely associated although I was not a member of the negotiating team. I was in very close touch with them, as was natural because of the position I held at that time, in the prime minister's office.

Mr. McGrath: That is not what you said earlier.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said I had nothing to do with the drafting of term 29, and it so happens I had nothing to do with it. I would not have been ashamed of it, if I had, but the truth happens to be that I did not. Since the question was raised I thought it might be just as well to dispose of it. That does not mean to say I did not have a good deal to do with these negotiations. I have never said I did not. I have never been ashamed of it. Indeed, there is nothing I am prouder of than any little part I had in helping to complete confederation.

But the great snag in the negotiations was provincial finance. How could enough revenue be ensured to the new provincial government to carry on the provincial administration on Canadian standards, without making provision for Newfoundland from the federal treasury on a scale which would seem unjust to all the other provinces?

That was the question; that was the problem.

I can well remember one evening when Mr. St. Laurent told me he was afraid that problem just could not be solved.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where was that?

Mr. Pickersgill: It was in a private conversation I had with him at the end of one of the sessions of the two negotiating committees, when he was very discouraged indeed about the prospect of meeting this problem, which I admit at once is a very, very difficult problem indeed; as the royal commission showed, because of the great disparity between the development of the rest of Canada and the development that was possible in Newfoundland on account of some of the sad events to which the hon. member for St. John's West referred last night and with some of which he was rather intimately associated.

That problem was finally met by the recognition of a principle. In simple language that principle was that the new province should have eight years to build up its public services, and at the end of those eight years the province should be provided whatever additional financial assistance was needed to continue the public services of the province without a higher level of provincial taxes in Newfoundland than in the maritime provinces. That principle was written into the Canadian constitution in term 29 of the terms of union. That is an obligation that the people of Newfoundland expect, and have a right to expect, the people of Canada to live up to.

That is the position I take. If I may say so, it is the position I have always taken on the matter, and as far as any overselling of it is concerned, I have never done anything except to point out, sometimes to people who did believe that it meant more, that all it meant was a guarantee of maintenance of the services as in 1957.

The hon. member for St. John's West tried to make a lot of that last night. He tried to make a lot of his statement that the Liberal opposition was trying to put services back to 1957. We are not trying to do anything of the kind. We are trying to get this right to which Newfoundland is entitled under the constitution, so that the money we get under the Atlantic provinces grants or anything else the government provides can be used in Newfoundland as in all other provinces to improve services. But the hon. member for St. John's West seems to want to force Newfoundland after 1962, because of the loss of these rights, to use money that other provinces can use for improvements for the purpose of continuing existing services. As precisely as I can put it, that is the difference between us.

While I am on my feet there is one other thing I should like to say, if I have not exceeded my time. Last night the Minister without Portfolio referred to the surpluses in Newfoundland and compared them with the colossal deficits of the Minister of Finance, I thought rather unkindly and rather to the minister's discomfort. The fact of the matter is, of course, that while Newfoundland has had a surplus on current account the hon. gentleman, as a former member of the house of assembly, knows very well that there is a very substantial deficit on capital account. He knows, I am sure, that because this government failed to act last September, when we pleaded with them to act, it has cost the government of Newfoundland over half a million dollars in interest payments, which money could have been used to much better advantage in that province if action, even the kind of limited, attenuated action being taken now, had been taken then.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why do you hold this up?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not holding it up.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why do you oppose it then?

Mr. Pickersgill: I asked the minister when he was making his speech if he had ever heard of Esau. What the minister is doing, what the Prime Minister is doing, what the Minister of Justice went to Newfoundland to do, is to say, if I may put it in this way, "Now we are showering so many blessings upon you, give up your rights and trust us." That is what you are saying.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You had better stay out of the field of scriptural interpretation.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the Prime Minister needs any reminder of what Esau did, he sold his birthright for a mess of pottage. Here the minister is not even offering a mess of pottage. What the minister is doing here is saying "You can have your rights until 1962, and you must hurry up and take them or maybe we will change our minds. After that you have no rights at all, but trust us who have extinguished your rights".

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, we have been listening for the last two days to this debate, which has reached bombastic proportions at times. I must frankly admit that when the debate started I was not too familiar with the circumstances surrounding this bill. At the conclusion of two days of debate on it I must admit that I am still confused on various points.

However, from sitting back and listening to both sides of this debate, I have reached a couple of conclusions. The first is that this is not by any yardstick the worst bill this government has brought into this house. In fact, as submitted by the Minister without Portfolio, there may even be the possibility that this bill will be a better one, or will bring more benefit to the province of Newfoundland than what it is enjoying at the present time.

I think the highly important factor here is that what they had before was something they had by right of confederation and that what they will have in the future, if we adopt this bill, is something they will have by right of the Conservative government. I wonder why this government should think Newfoundland or any other province should be beholden to them even though they do not want to be so beholden. It reminded me of a cartoon I saw in a newspaper not so long ago. I do not know what newspaper it was, and I do not know just what the subject was. However, it certainly was very appropriate at the time. It showed a baby sitting in a high chair with a very firm nurse, and there was no mistaking the features of the nurse. They were those of our Prime Minister. He held a bottle of medicine and a spoon and the caption was, "So you don't like it; so it is good for you", I believe this bill would fit that particular cartoon very well.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate listed a couple of reasons which he believed were the only possible reason for this measure. However, I think he left out one possible reason, though I think he touched on it in his later remarks. I think that reason can be found if hon. members would look at page 1033 of Hansard for this session dealing with another matter, and that is the creeping paternalism of both the Prime Minister and the government he heads. In fact this bill says in as many words to the people of Newfoundland, "Never mind confederation. We can look after you better than anybody else, in fact better than you can look after yourselves".

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I deal with three points that were raised in course of the discussion of this clause. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate raised a question about the maritime provinces subsidies. I should like to remind him that those subsidies have for all practical purposes been assimilated with the subsidies provided under the British North America Act. They are bulked together. They are not separated in the estimates. They are together in the estimates and they have been, as all hon. members are aware, assimilated together for all practical purposes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just as this should be.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My statement should be read by the hon. gentleman in the light of that fact.

Mr. Pickersgill: But it is not.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The second point is this. When hon. members wrench one sentence out of the announcement made in this house by the Prime Minister on March 25, they are not being fair. They treat it as though it were the whole speech. I would ask them in future, in fairness, to read the next following sentence. It follows directly on the heels of the words which they have been quoting. It reads as follows:

> On conclusion of the payments as of March 31, 1962, which corresponds with the conclusion of the present five-year fiscal arrangement between Canada and the provinces. Newfoundland's position can be considered in the light of the general methods of providing financial assistance to the provinces which may be in effect at that time.

Mr. Pearson: Big brother.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is quite clear that the Prime Minister at that time was indicating that there would be the review for which this bill makes explicit provision.

Finally, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate I think will be glad to correct himself. I sought to do it when he was speaking about the word "thereafter" appearing in the concluding paragraph of the report of the royal commission. He said the report stated that it was after March 31, 1962. I sought to bring to his attention at the time—

Mr. Pickersgill: I agree with the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that it was after the conclusion of the fiscal year that begins April 1, 1960.

Mr. Pickersgill: On that point I should like to say that I agreed with the minister at the time. I had made an error and I admit that fact right away. It was March 31, 1961. I think I made it plain that I was conceding the minister's point, because I said to him right away, did he think that "thereafter $8 million per annum" means for one year only, because he has provided $8 million for one year only. Surely the commissioners would have been explicit, and they would have said $8 million in the same form as they give all the others if they had meant it to end at March 31, 1962. The very fact that they did not do that surely indicates that they accepted the simple, reasonable, ordinary dictionary meaning of "thereafter" which is "according to the rule", and the rule was to be $8 million per annum.

The minister said these White subsidies had been "assimilated", which was his word, to the constitutional subsidies. I am glad they have been assimilated. I think they should have been. I think that was the intention of Mr. Mackenzie King's government when Mr. Ilsley introduced the legislation in 1942. But they were not provided for in the constitution. These subsidies are provided in the constitution. They are in the British North America Act now. What the government is trying to do, instead of assimilating them, is to tear them out of the British North America Act and terminate them in 1962.

Mr. Walker: In reply may I say this. My friend does not seem to be convinced. He speaks of the rule. It is a Pickersgillian rule. Nobody speaks as he did. Let me read from Hon. Mr. Lewis of the Newfoundland government.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. Walker: I am reading from the royal commission on Newfoundland finances:

> Because of the peculiar position resulting from the implementation of term 29, there is included in the recommendations one to the effect that a further periodic review should be made within a limited number of years in order that the fiscal position of the province vis-à-vis Canada may be reassessed so that payments may not be continued which may not be required, or alternatively, that payments might be increased in order that Newfoundland may be able to continue her services at the levels and standards reached.

That is what the Newfoundland government wanted. That is what they recommended.

Mr. Pickersgill: But that is not what the McNair commission recommends, and that is what we are talking about.

Mr. Walker: At page 1504, this morning, I read to the house how Chief Justice McNair felt about it. He stated that when the recommendations were made there would be nothing binding about them and they would have no binding effect. There are some who cannot be convinced because they do not wish to be. At page 1510A the distinguished counsel for the province of Newfoundland, Mr. Goldenberg said:

> When I submitted this recommendation for a review with a reasonable period of time, it was submitted in the best interests of both Canada and Newfoundland. I agree that there is nothing in term 29 requiring this commission to recommend further review, but I also submit that there is nothing in term 29 to preclude such a recommendation by this commission if it sees fit to make it. For example, if this commission attempts to consider whether the gap which has been discussed will close, and feels that the estimate it arrives at of the period is not something that can be fixed, the commission might suggest a further review.

And again at the bottom of the page he goes on to advocate that:

> —our recommendation be further reviewed, not necessarily by a royal commission but perhaps by the two governments.

Mr. Pickersgill: By the two governments.

Mr. Walker: Exactly. Are you suggesting that in 1962 the government of Canada is going to take unilateral action when the federal-provincial meeting takes place and Newfoundland's case is considered? In spite of the eloquence of my hon. friend, no one else thinks as he does. The senior counsel for the province of Newfoundland and the chairman of the royal commission both felt as the Prime Minister has stated and as this legislation will implement.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I reply very briefly to that?

Mr. Walker: Just a minute. I love to hear my hon. friend but I have to do a duty.

Mr. Pearson: Do your duty.

Mr. Walker: At page 1512 Mr. Goldenberg said:

> I do not want my learned friend to think it is only he who wants to make your task easy, if you suggested that a further review might be advisable.

But I do agree with you, I do not think you could make your final recommendation subject unconditionally to a further review.

Then the chairman intervened again, the chief justice of New Brunswick—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member say what he was reading before? I did not catch what he read before the chief justice.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Goldenberg, the senior counsel for your adopted province. The chairman of the royal commission answered in this way:

A number of questions arise in my mind on this point, Mr. Goldenberg. Our recommendation alone—that is the recommendation of the commission—will create nothing binding.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate says it does.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Walker: Just sit down and I will finish.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have a question of privilege. My question of privilege is that the hon. gentleman has stated that I said the recommendation of the royal commission was binding. I never said any such thing at any time.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): The hon. member is not stating a question of privilege but making a correction.

Mr. Walker: Then Mr. Goldenberg, when told by the chief commissioner that the recommendations of the commission would create nothing binding, said in the presence of Premier Smallwood who was there on that occasion, as indicated in the remarks on page 1521 of the transcript, that he agreed with the chief commissioner. Then on page 1513 the chairman again stated:

I am thinking there of the pattern laid down in connection with the tax rental agreements, but our recommendation alone has no effect.

Then Mr. Goldenberg answered:

It is only a recommendation to the government of Canada.

At page 1514 the chairman again said:

I am doubtful whether that is within our province. These financial settlements between governments never prove final, as you know.

Mr. Goldenberg: As we all know, Mr. Chairman.

As we all know, Mr. Chairman. Surely my hon. friend, who purports to want to get through here by Saturday night, should drop this innocuous, fatuous, whimsical point of his and take some cognizance of what real lawyers have said, knowing as they do, all the circumstances.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the hon. gentleman for his patronizing observation, but I would like to point out that what he said had nothing whatever to do with any argument I used at any time. Any member of this parliament who does not know that a royal commission's recommendations have no legal effect really should not be a member of this parliament, so why waste time arguing about that? Everyone knows that, and everyone knows that I have never quarrelled with that statement by Mr. St. Laurent. What I said was that it has to be read with the next sentence, which is to the effect that if the report of the royal commission was the kind of report, and the royal commission was the kind of royal commission, that people would have confidence in, a government with any sense of honour would act upon that report.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What Mr. St. Laurent said was that you could trust the legislators of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: In that Mr. St. Laurent was wrong, unfortunately.

Mr. Walker: How blind are they who will not see.

Mr. Pearson: The wicked flee and no man pursueth.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take a few minutes to reply to some of the statements made by the government members from Newfoundland last night. The hon. member for St. John's East said that this was a good bill.

Mr. McGrath: That is right.

Mr. Carter: The hon. member says that is right. I ask hon. members, how can a bill be good if it creates division? How can it be a good bill if it creates bitterness and resentment and a sense of injustice in the hearts of nearly half a million people, sentiments which will last perhaps for a generation? How can a bill be good that does these things?

Mr. McGrath: Why is there a division?

Mr. Carter: What is the compulsion for taking away a right, a constitutional right, contained in the terms of our union? How can a bill be good that destroys a constitutional right? What compulsion was there upon the government to impose a final and irrevocable settlement under term 29, as this bill does? The Minister of Finance laid stress this afternoon upon what the bill contains, and as usual he tried to make up with sound and fury what he lacked in argument. Judging from the noise and vehemence which he exhibited this afternoon we can conclude that he was conscious of the fact that his argument was very, very weak indeed.

The Minister of Finance and hon. members on the government side have based their arguments solely upon what the bill contains. They say that all that matters is money. They ask, "As long as you get your money, what does it matter whether you get it under term 29 or whether you get it under some of the other grants?" They say to us, "We have been so generous in the past two years and we are going to be so much more generous in the future that you will never need to make any claims under term 29 anyway." That weakens their argument still further, because if they are going to make term 29 inoperative through their generosity, what need is there to extinguish it from the constitution?

The Minister of Finance and the Minister without Portfolio have said that it makes no difference as long as we get the money. Well, it makes a great deal of difference whether we get the money as a mater of constitutional right or whether we get it by the grace and favour of the government that happens to be in power at the time. The minister over and over again has emphasized the point that Newfoundland is going to get half the total amount immediately, and he has emphasized that fact to create the impression that this is a wonderful favour they are doing Newfoundland. No one word has been uttered by the Minister of Finance or the Minister without Portfolio about the fact that part of this money is a year overdue and the rest of it is two years overdue. The words "at once" are being used as though they are really putting themselves out to help Newfoundland.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, it was not put forward with that implication, I can assure my hon. friend. It expressed surprise at the opposition to the bill.

Mr. Carter: The minister emphasized the words "at once" two or three times. What point was there in using these words and emphasizing them if it was not just to create the impression that here is something they are doing as a special favour?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. The point is, you are holding it up and Newfoundland needs it.

Mr. Carter: I am going to hold it up a few minutes more and inform the public that this money should have been paid long ago; the government is already one year and in some cases two years late in meeting its obligation. We are not interested only in what the bill contains. We are interested in what the bill does and what it neglects to do. Money is not the only issue involved.

The main issue in this debate is the question of a constitutional right. I am prepared to admit that the legal obligation of the government is vague, but there is no doubt about the moral obligation; because even if there were no legal contract at all the fact remains that Newfoundland came into confederation only because she understood that she had a safeguard in term 29, a guarantee under that provision that if times go bad, and if the worst came to the worst, her level of public services would never be permitted to fall below the level they had reached in 1957.

I ask the Minister without Portfolio and the hon. member for St. John's East this question in all sincerity. Can they conscientiously state in this house that Newfoundland would have agreed to enter confederation had it been known that the rights under term 29 would be extinguished in 1962? I am willing to yield the floor to either or both those hon. members if they are ready to get up and state that they honestly believe that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What were the rights under term 29? Mr. St. Laurent said the obligation there was to appoint a royal commission to make an investigation.

Mr. Pearson: That was not the only obligation.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is the only reference I can find in all the debates and discussions that took place. Not only that, but Mr. J. Harvey Perry, a great friend of the premier of Newfoundland, has written two books since 1949, and he had a chapter in each of them dealing with the terms of union. He never even mentioned term 29, though he is the financial adviser to the Newfoundland government.

Mr. Carter: I just asked for a simple answer, yes or no.

An hon. Member: You got it.

Mr. Carter: The minister did not give a simple answer.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You did not ask a simple question.

Mr. Carter: I asked the minister whether he conscientiously believed that Newfoundland would have entered into union with Canada had the officials and everyone concerned with the negotiation of the terms of union not believed that the people of Newfoundland had a guarantee under term 29 that the level of public services would not be permitted to fall below the level of 1957. That is what they thought they were getting, and that is the reason they came into federation. And I asked the minister if he really thinks they would have come into federation had that not been the understanding.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But the fact is that the standard of public services in Newfoundland today is well above what it was in 1957—

Mr. Carter: That doesn't cut any ice. Answer the question straight; say yes or no.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You took about five minutes to ask the question. It is not a simple question.

Mr. Carter: It is easy to say yes or no if you honestly believe a thing—

Mr. McGrath: The question was put to me, also, and may I say that it is the type of question to which one cannot answer yes or no, and the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo knows that perfectly well. The hon. member is also fully aware of the fact that in 1949, when these terms should have been properly discussed, the legislature was not constituted. The question of legislation could not be studied and dealt with in the proper manner under those circumstances.

Mr. Carter: The hon. member knows that the people who agreed to the terms of union agreed to it on that basis.

Mr. McGrath: What experience did they have, those people who negotiated this article in these terms and accepted the nebulous terms of article 29?

Mr. Carter: It does not matter what experience they had; it is what understanding they had. I should like to read what the Minister without Portfolio said on March 9, 1950, as reported on page 624 of Hansard:

> The terms of union contain a provision, section 29, which I should like to draw to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), who had something to do with drafting them.

And then he went on to quote term 29, as follows:

> 29. In view of the difficulty of predicting with sufficient accuracy the financial consequences to Newfoundland of becoming a province of Canada, the government of Canada will appoint a royal commission within eight years from the date of union to review the financial position of the province of Newfoundland and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required by the government of the province Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union, without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island.

Then the Minister without Portfolio, as he now is, went on to say:

> I consider that the presence of this section in the terms of union is evidence of the good will of the government of Canada, and shows a recognition of the problem that has now come to the forefront.

So the minister himself recognized that term 29 had some significance in the act of union, that it was some sort of a guarantee.

Mr. Lennard: Oh.

Mr. Carter: You can laugh. I know this is a funny business for some of you people. The performance that we witnessed here last night is very great evidence of the seriousness that hon. gentlemen opposite attach to this matter.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member will read Hansard he will find what we were laughing at last night.

Mr. Carter: This is not a laughing matter for us nor for the people of Newfoundland. Term 29 was put in because it was impossible at that time to draw up with any accuracy the financial terms of union. Last night the Minister without Portfolio from Newfoundland referred to the transitional grants and asked the following question as reported at page 6004 of Hansard:

> It must be remembered that these transitional grants were on a declining scale. Nobody on the other side of the chamber has yet asked this question: why is it that those transitional grants were on a declining scale?

That is a simple question. The transitional grants were worked out by federal experts. That was their appraisal of the situation. It was only a guess and could be nothing else. They contained errors as large as 300 per cent. It was to correct these large errors and to tidy up the thing in the light of experience that term 29 was inserted so that whatever injustice might have been experienced under the transitional grants would be corrected under term 29. Therefore, even if there is no legal obligation on the government to implement the recommendations of the royal commission, surely there is a moral obligation upon it to carry out the agreement under which Newfoundland became a part of Canada.

These transitional grants and these financial arrangements were so unsatisfactory at the time that one of the members, Mr. Chesley Crosbie, refused to sign because he said they were inadequate and unsatisfactory. They were not satisfactory to him or to the other members, but the other people signed this document making Newfoundland a part of Canada because they honestly believed that term 29 would take care of any errors or inadequacies contained in these grants.

Before I leave this subject I want to make one more point concerning a remark made by the Minister without Portfolio last evening. I am quoting now from the same paragraph to which I referred earlier, a little further down the page. The minister said:

> I refer to the grant of $6.5 million of 1949-50. Do they know how much that grant had declined by 1956-57? Can they tell me? Let me tell them that it had declined to $2,250,000. That is all that Newfoundland was receiving in 1956-57, namely $2.25 million.

He tried to use that argument to prove that Newfoundland was getting along very well on that reduced grant. What he neglected to tell us was that to make up for the decline in these transitional grants Newfoundland had to borrow against the $10 million of her surplus on deposit with the federal government.

Mr. McCleave: That was the Liberal government's fault, was it not?

Mr. Carter: Yes, but the hon. gentleman told only part of the truth and created a wrong impression which I want to correct at this time. The hon. member for Timmins said that he was confused—

Mr. McCleave: Oh, he is always confused.

Mr. Carter: —and it is small wonder that he is. I will tell hon. gentlemen opposite that the people of Canada are confused on this issue and the blame rests with the Minister of Finance and his colleagues in the government who have been endeavouring to confuse this issue. They have raised the question of perpetuity and their propaganda machine and press agents have gone about attempting to create in the minds of the people of Canada the impression that we Newfoundlanders in this chamber are demanding that the federal government pay $8 million or some other amount in perpetuity. Nothing could be further from the truth. We have never asked for that at any time and term 29 does not require it.

All that term 29 says is that these grants would be paid if it should happen that Newfoundland could not continue her services at the 1957 level without resorting to a heavier burden of taxation than that of the maritime provinces generally. If the government is going to be as generous as it says it will be and as I hope it will be then perhaps Newfoundland will be able to continue her services without having a taxation burden heavier than that of the maritime provinces. If Newfoundland prospers, as we hope she will, and if her resources are developed, her own revenues will enable her to take care of her public services at that level without resorting to taxation more burdensome than what obtains in the maritime provinces.

As long as these conditions continue Newfoundland will have no claim for payments under term 29. Nobody has ever pretended that she did have. Term 29 comes into effect only when and if it should happen that sometime in the future Newfoundland should unfortunately find herself unable to continue her services at the 1957 level without imposing heavy burdens of taxation. This business of trying to create the impression that we are asking for grants to be paid year after year in perpetuity is absolute nonsense and completely misleading. I hope the propaganda machine of the government will correct the confusion that has gone out and spread among the Canadian people.

The Minister without Portfolio last night made the statement that the Liberal members from Newfoundland wanted to return to the 1957 levels. I ask the minister the following question as reported at page 6014:

> The Minister without Portfolio asked, did we want to go back to the levels of 1957? Who said anything about going back to the levels of 1957?

A that point the minister interjected:

> You did.

The minister is now in his seat and I invite him to rise and read from Hansard the passage where I or any other hon. member said we wanted to go back to the 1957 levels.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You just said it now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at all.

Mr. Fraser: He does not know what he wants.

Mr. Carter: The Minister without Portfolio is a Rhodes scholar. I do not know how anyone could be a Rhodes scholar and yet be so stupid as not to be able to understand that simple statement.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): I ask the hon. member to moderate his language.

Mr. Carter: Yes, Mr. Chairman. If these jackasses will modify their braying, I will modify my language.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that remark should be withdrawn.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): I think the hon. member should withdraw that word "jackasses".

Mr. Pickersgill: And substitute "trained seals".

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): Shall clause 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Chairman, clause 2 is not carried.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is a terrible thing. What are hon. members reducing parliament to?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: I take it, Mr. Chairman, that we are on clause 2?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): Yes, clause 2.

Mr. Pearson: The minister a little while ago reproached us for holding up this bill. It is not necessary to rush it through on this basis: clause 1 carried, clause 2 carried, clause 3 carried. If the bill has been delayed, who is responsible for it? Was it a member of the opposition or was it the Prime Minister who on March 25 last as reported at page 2216 of Hansard said:

> It is proposed, therefore, to ask parliament to authorize payments as recommended by the royal commission—

Those are the words of the Prime Minister. He then went on to say:

> A resolution will shortly be placed on the order paper asking leave to introduce a bill to carry into effect these provisions pertaining to the terms of union.

That was March 25. When did we start discussing this resolution? Was it shortly after the Prime Minister made this statement? We have been asking for it every week since, and the minister now tries to stop us talking on this important measure because he says we are holding up a bill which the Prime Minister promised on March 25 to bring forward shortly. Perhaps the minister will explain the delay in this matter; but it has now been brought in and we are having a debate and we propose to continue it, Mr. Chairman. We are now on section 2, which is the important operative section of the bill; in fact, the only operative section of the bill. Anything else the minister and his colleagues have been talking about is in the preamble which, of course is not an operative part of the bill at all.

It is very surprising that some of the important things in the preamble, so important to the minister and the government, have not been put in the operative part of the bill, and we shall have something to say about this a little later. But here we have section 2 which says:

> There shall be paid to the province of Newfoundland out of the consolidated revenue fund in respect of the fiscal years set forth in this section, additional grants as follows;

There follow in this section details of the grants for the five years. This particular section, Mr. Chairman, is put in the bill, according to the preamble, pursuant to the recommendations made by the royal commission. In other words, we are asked to believe that this section carries out the recommendations made by the royal commission. Of course, it does nothing of the sort. It is a rejection of the recommendations of the royal commission; it is a rejection of a most important part of those recommendations. The minister shakes his head. It is not difficult to prove that.

The hon. member for Rosedale spent a lot of time on this argument whether the royal commission's recommendations have to be accepted or rejected. There is no argument about that. The government is perfectly within its rights in rejecting this part of the recommendations of the royal commission, which I submit they do in this particular section. They can do that if they so desire. Quite apart from the moral obligation they may have to carry it out, they have no legal obligation to do so, and they do not do so in this particular section. In other words, it is a deviation from the recommendations in one respect, though the minister challenged us a few moments ago as to whether we would agree to a deviation in any other respect; that is, in respect of the amounts of the recommendations, as to that my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate said he felt that the government would have been discharging the obligation that it had under the royal commission if it accepted the figures in that report. These figures are here but the last particular line of this section says: "fiscal year 1961-62, $8,000,000."

Mr. Chairman, that is no recommendation of any royal commission because the same section of the royal commission recommendation, section (e), on page 40 of their report, does not read "$8,000,000 for the fiscal year 1961-62", it says: "thereafter $8,000,000 per annum". But the way this appears in this particular section does indeed carry out the Prime Minister's wrong and misleading interpretation of these recommendations which he gave—and I have put this on the record already—at Saskatoon, and he has never denied it; he has never even tried to explain this remark which was so misleading. It was carried by the press all over Canada. He said that the recommendation to end in 1962 special payments to Newfoundland under article 29 of the agreement was made by a royal commission. It was made by no royal commission but it is certainly made in this particular bill. Perhaps that is why this section appears in this form. Perhaps it is because of the statement made by the Prime Minister at that time, and which he made in the House of Commons in substantially the same terms on March 25, and which has already been quoted, and I think fairly, to the Prime Minister. The minister himself added another sentence or two but I think they were on the record earlier as well.

A great effort has been made—and it seems to me to be one of the most meaningless operations that could be performed in the House of Commons—to explain away the meaning of the word "thereafter". I do not propose to spend very much time on that. According to hon. gentlemen opposite "thereafter" has no meaning. It got into the report of the royal commission perhaps by a typist's error. It has no meaning at all; it has no significance because the only alternative to putting in the word "thereafter" was presumably perpetuity. That argument is so fallacious and so absurd and has been so completely dealt with that perhaps we need not waste any more time on it. The idea that the members of a royal commission as experienced, intelligent and qualified as these were, would put that word in without any understanding of its meaning at all is just too nonsensical to labour. The meaning is clear.

In their view it meant after that until a change was made by agreement $8 million a year should be paid to the government of Newfoundland. That constituted a floor, a security for Newfoundland in respect of this matter which was enshrined not only within the royal commission's recommendations but in term 29 because—and this is the core of the argument—there is an obligation in term 29 not merely to appoint a royal commission but there is an obligation on the federal government, on the federal parliament, to pay the amount which is required to ensure that the level of services do not fall below a certain point. That is the obligation.

When the royal commission put in these words "thereafter $8,000,000 a year" they were discharging an obligation to ensure that that amount at least would be allocated to Newfoundland until a change was made by agreement between Newfoundland and the federal government. By the removal of that word and by the removal of that concept they have removed the security that the people of Newfoundland felt they were getting under term 29. Perhaps the government in the future, perhaps parliament in the future will, as a result of a review, make available to Newfoundland far more money than $8 million a year, but there is no assurance. It has been taken out of a constitutional guarantee and it has been turned over to the good will of the federal government.

Perhaps in 1962 the good will of the federal government will be great, and perhaps it will make generous provision for Newfoundland in respect of services. I do not know; but now the government and the people of Newfoundland have to depend on that good will which would be expressed presumably as a result of the review which will be undertaken. There is no incompatibility in the position that we have been taking on this side in regard to this matter, and the idea of a review. The two things are not incompatible. Of course, there can always be a review at any time, a review called by one party or the other. But pending that review and pending any decision made from any review, Newfoundland could, if the terms of the royal commission recommendations had been carried out, always count on this floor to ensure that the obligation of term 29 would be carried out, namely a level for its services.

That concept, that security, that floor, has been completely changed by this particular section of the bill. Mr. Chairman, I need hardly say, after what we have been saying in the committee and in the house, that this section is not, we think, satisfactory in any way, shape or form. In essence it means this. Without any provision for the future, after 1962, the people of Newfoundland are merely being told that big brother will look after them. Trust big brother and everything will be all right and do not worry about term 29. We may want to have another look at this and perhaps even submit an amendment in due course which will, if the government is sincere in its avowed intention of living up to the provisions of term 29 in every respect, alter this clause in such a way as to make that quite clear in its terms.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is just one very brief word I should like to say about this cut-off business. I am wondering whether this is a carryover ten years later of the niggardly attitude taken by the hon. member for Eglinton in the debate on the union. On February 9, 1949, as found at page 409 of Hansard, he pressed Mr. Abbott very hard to find out what the net cost to the treasury of taking Newfoundland into confederation was going to be.

Mr. Bigg: What is niggardly about that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Was that not information that the house was entitled to?

Mr. Pickersgill: It was certainly information that the house was entitled to. I think perhaps it suggests the attitude of mind of the Minister of Finance, coming as he does from the place he does, toward the poorer relations in other parts of Canada. From the outset his idea was that if there was more money expended in a province than was taken in from that province it was apparently a loss to confederation. I am wondering whether that is why he is trying to cut Newfoundland off with as little as possible.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I believe I have listened to almost every speech made in the debate on second reading and in committee, and up till now I have not said a word. I am going to make only two very brief comments because I feel I have a responsibility. I know that we are in committee, Mr. Chairman, but having heard everything that has been said in the past two or three days I want to say that the matter is very confusing. Nevertheless I still feel that Newfoundland has never had it so good as it has since it came into confederation with Canada. It has never had it so good even though its standards of security and income are still the lowest in Canada.

I cannot conceive of any government formed by any party in Canada not carrying on assistance to Newfoundland in order to see that eventually that province at least reaches the average standard of all Canada. Any government would see to that. But had it not been for Newfoundland entering confederation and receiving old age pension and family allowance benefits average income in that province today would be considerably lower than it is. Every province entered confederation under an agreement, and for the life of me I cannot understand the statements made here that Canada is betraying our tenth and wonderful province of Newfoundland. I say that by way of introduction.

We are now in committee dealing with Bill No. C-72 and at the present time are only discussing one clause, not article 29 of the terms of union. We are discussing clause 2 of Bill No. C-72, which is very short and reads as follows:

> There shall be paid to the province of Newfoundland out of the consolidated revenue fund in respect of the fiscal years set forth in this section, additional grants as follows—

Then the grants are set out for the fiscal years running from 1957-58 to 1961-62 and the total of these additional grants is $36,500,000. I cannot understand anyone in the house opposing clause 2. We are not discussing what has happened in the past. We are only discussing clause 2 which says that in addition to everything else Newfoundland shall be granted from 1957-58 through 1961-62 an additional $36,500,000. My position is clear. I support Newfoundland receiving additional grants amounting to $36,500,000 under clause 2.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to make any extended remarks. I have been listening patiently to the various speeches on this matter during the course of the last two days and, if I may say so, I have listened to what the Minister of Finance has said with very great care. Not only have I listened to what he has said but I have read most of what he has said in the house on this matter. I would not want to say I have read everything the hon. gentleman has said because that would be a task away beyond the ability of the most industrious member of the house. I have before me Hansard for September 4, 1958, and speaking on this particular problem the Minister of Finance is reported as having said on that occasion, as found on page 4624:

> I have indicated that this is not a matter for one year but one that is going to be of continuing effect in the years to come.

The hon. gentleman has insisted in this discussion that one must give the interpretation to words which the words suggest. Surely there is only one interpretation possible from these words, and I repeat them:

> I have indicated that this is not a matter for one year but one that is going to be of continuing effect in the years to come.

I do not believe that these words, whatever else the hon. gentleman may have said, are open to any other construction than that placed on this whole matter by those who have spoken from this side of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are only two brief comments I wish to make on the observations made by hon. gentlemen opposite on this clause of the bill. Concerning the final and perhaps somewhat gratuitous comment of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I will say that I take some satisfaction from having been the minister who had the honour of introducing the proposal for Atlantic adjustment grants in the house under which Newfoundland will receive $30 million and in addition the benefit of her share of the additional 3 per cent allocated to the provinces out of the yield from the three standard direct taxes under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Agreements Act. I think that will dispose of the not very pleasant innuendo he tried to leave on the record as a result of his misinterpretation of a question which I asked in 1949.

Concerning the observation just made by the hon. member for Essex East, may I say first that I wondered whether we would go through the full length of this debate without having the benefit of some comment from the hon. member. However, I am afraid he is wrenching the words that I used on the occasion in question quite out of the meaning that they fairly bear. We were asked last year by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate if we would not bring in legislation immediately to pay for one year or two years the amounts proposed by the royal commission—in other words, on an interim basis. It was in reply to that proposal for interim payments, on the basis of legislation to be immediately introduced, that I pointed out that we were not dealing with one year but were dealing with future relations between Newfoundland and Canada.

What we are doing in this bill, in keeping with that view, is to provide fixed payments fully defined in this present clause of the bill, for the five years that are enumerated in this bill; and beyond that we are proposing the review that is contemplated by the recital which has already been mentioned. There has been no change in the view taken in this case.

Mr. Pearson: Will the minister explain what was meant in the sentence following that which the hon. member for Essex East has just quoted? The sentence quoted was this:

> I have indicated that this is not a matter for one year but one that is going to be of continuing effect in the years to come.

Then the minister went on to say this:

> The royal commission has not set any particular period on the time within which the proposed annual payments of $8 million less transitional grants are to run.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no secret about that. The royal commission did not set the particular time. They left it indefinite—

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —as to what was to follow the fiscal year 1960-61. We have proposed to deal with that indefinite feature in a sensible way by the method proposed in this bill of naming the definite amount for the fiscal year 1961-62 and then having a review of the whole matter because that is—for reasons that have already been discussed and repeated—a very good time for a review of this question, in keeping with the large review of dominion-provincial fiscal relations.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Time of payment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Earlier I made a brief reference to the effect of the failure of the government to carry out the recommendation or the suggestion which the minister flatteringly said was mine last year but which, in fact, was a solemn resolution adopted unanimously by the assembly of Newfoundland, moved by the premier and seconded by the leader of the opposition who is the leader of the hon. gentleman's party in that province but which I urged the minister here in parliament to carry out.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a correction in the observation just made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman would like to make a speech, he can do it after I have finished.

Mr. McGrath: I just want to make a correction. There is no constituted leader of the Conservative party. He is house leader.

Mr. Pickersgill: We are having more repudiations. I thought it was understood that Mr. Hollett was the leader of the Conservative party. But apparently Mr. Hollett has displeased the junior member for St. John's in this house. He has therefore been removed from that position and is now only house leader.

An hon. Member: You are wrong again.

Mr. Pickersgill: In any event, I do not know that he has actually been read out of the Conservative party yet, although he has been demoted by the hon. gentleman. He is leader of the opposition in the assembly and he has three followers in the assembly who are still—although I believe some of them are finding it rather hard—nominal members of the hon. gentleman's party. They all voted for that resolution that was moved by the premier and seconded by the leader of the opposition. They voted for it. Why? Because there was an abnormally high level of unemployment in Newfoundland last year which this government so belatedly recognized that we were going to have a very serious winter and recognized that by producing late in October a very inadequate winter works program.

They were urged by the assembly—by a unanimous vote of the assembly—to give Newfoundland what the McNair commission had recommended for the fiscal year 1957-58 and the fiscal year 1958-59. The minister made the lame excuse in this house that, because they were getting the Atlantic provinces grant, which was for an entirely different purpose, they were not entitled to get these payments and parliament was too busy and the government was anxious to end the session and therefore it would not be done. That was what happened. The consequence of the failure to act was a report dated May 31, 1958—a report which was certainly in the hands of the government not later than the very beginning of July, because that is on the record; the dates are all in those debates—and which the government held up from public view until a French translation could be made, although many documents of much more interest to our French speaking citizens are not held up.

There can be no doubt that the government showed a callous indifference last year to this very desperate need there was in Newfoundland of this money. The consequence was that the government of Newfoundland was obliged to borrow from the banks an amount approximately equal to the amount they were entitled to at that time. The last time I heard the figures, the interest which they had had to pay—and may I say, the unnecessary interest—because of the dereliction of its clear duty by the present government was over half a million dollars. That was over a month ago. Of course, this bill makes no provision for that. It does not even make provision for paying the interest on this money since March 31, although the minister in a most extraordinary and unprecedented action printed it in his budget paper as though this act had already been passed and the money had already been voted.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then the Minister of Justice was sent down to Newfoundland and he included it among the payments as though they had been received, as did the Prime Minister in that television performance of his—$13.6 million which has not yet been voted and it is in last year's accounts, perverting those accounts.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true. The hon. member ought to know that. He should not be making these irresponsible statements.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have the floor.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Stick to the truth.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister can correct me when I am finished.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Stick to the truth.

Mr. Pickersgill: If he will look at Hansard where my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition raised this matter he will find that there is a reference in those accounts to the Newfoundland additional grants act; that the amount of $13.6 million is included as having been paid already, and that we had to have these documents reprinted and corrected by a special order of the house because of the careless way in which the minister administers his department.

I have always felt that if this sort of thing had happened when hon. gentlemen opposite were over here on this side of the chamber we would have debated it for about a week because that was the kind of thing which they particularly gloried in when they were in opposition. Actually, of course, one knows that some clerk in the Department of Finance took the Prime Minister at his word, took the word "shortly" to mean shortly, the word that was used on March 25 and expected this bill to be passed early in April, probably before the budget, and put it in as though it had been done. But the Prime Minister's "shortly" apparently had another meaning. We know what "immediately" means when he uses the word. "Shortly" apparently is longer than "immediately". Actually we received the resolution in the middle of July, having been promised it shortly on March 25. In the meantime a great deal of legislation of much less import had been brought in.

As I say, this caused a very serious financial loss to an extremely poor province. I know that it would be fruitless to suggest that the government should—as it ought to do in equity and as it ought to do morally—assume that interest and repay it to the government of the province of Newfoundland. But knowing the Minister of Finance as I do, I feel that it would be quite useless to make that suggestion. However, I am going to suggest to him that there is one way in which, in some small measure, this loss—this delay, this procrastination—might be made up. That could be done if the minister would change subsection 2 of section 3 to provide that the payments for the year 1959-60 and the subsequent years would be made on July 1 instead of half on July 1 and half on January 1. In view of the budgetary problems existing in Newfoundland, it would be at least a small accommodation to the treasury of the province and would, at any rate, be some small compensation for this loss of money which could very well have been used for works projects last winter which the government of Newfoundland did not have enough money in its treasury to carry out.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Clause agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the preamble carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you call the preamble, Mr. Chairman, I would like to move that a clause be inserted after clause 3. Before I move this amendment I would like to give a word of explanation. Perhaps I should read the clause I am proposing to move, then give a word of explanation, and then, Mr. Chairman, you can put it to the house. This is the proposed clause, and it is in the operative part of the bill:

There shall be held a review of the financial position of the province of Newfoundland before the 31st day of March, 1962, for the purpose of determining what additional financial assistance might still be required after the 31st day of March, 1962, to enable the government of Newfoundland to continue public services at the levels and standards reached in 1957 without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island; and until such review is completed and the consequent legislation enacted the scale of assistance recommended by the royal commission shall be continued; and the form of any such review shall be agreed upon with the government of the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Chairman, this expresses precisely the view which the Leader of the Opposition and other hon. members of this party have taken of the proper constitutional obligation which there is upon the government under term 29. It expresses it in very precise language, and it provides that until that review is completed and action taken by this parliament the McNair awards should continue to be paid. It would make it quite possible under the government scheme and under the scheme suggested in the preamble to have this study made before March 31, 1962 so that the legislation could be enacted before that time and replace it at that time.

The Prime Minister told us yesterday—if I am paraphrasing him incorrectly I know he will correct me—that these special circumstances which would be taken into account under the terms of the preamble would include those which were provided for in term 29. So this is something which the Prime Minister said Newfoundland could be assured of anyway, and it seems to me that if this were done this legislation would be in conformity with our constitutional obligation. It also seems to me that if the government were prepared to accept this amendment we could take no further exception to the legislation. I should now like to move the following amendment:

There shall be held a review of the financial position of the province of Newfoundland before the 31st day of March, 1962, for the purpose of determining what additional financial assistance might still be required after the 31st day of March, 1962, to enable the government of Newfoundland to continue public services at the levels and standards reached in 1957 without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and until such review is completed and the consequent legislation enacted the scale of assistance recommended by the royal commission shall be continued; and the form of any such review shall be agreed upon with the government of the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I think it is quite clear that this amendment is out of order, and I strongly suspect that the hon. member who introduced it was well aware of that fact when he introduced it. These remarks come strangely from the mouth of an hon. member who has taken the stand which he has taken throughout on this measure and voted against it twice.

It is quite clear that the first part of the amendment is redundant, having regard to the other provisions of the bill, and in the second place it is equally clear that this clause seeks to impose a burden on the crown, a financial burden, which it is not within the right of any private member of this house to introduce.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I submit that this amendment is clearly out of order. The hon. member is seeking, on his interpretation of what the royal commission said, to commit the treasury beyond the date fixed in clause two of this bill to these payments of $8 million per annum. That is the whole effect of the second part of this amendment in relation to what is to happen pending any review and the outcome of the review, and no private member of this house, may introduce, of course, such an amendment to legislation. This is a government measure preceded by a royal commission recommendation and no private member can introduce an amendment the effect of which is to impose a charge upon the crown.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, on the point raised by the minister, of course I considered the point which he has raised and I did feel, as I admit quite freely, that there was some doubt about the point. But it seemed to me that if the government was sincere in its protestation, and intended its study group and its special consideration to mean anything, they would do what has been done invariably in the past in relation to these fiscal matters and make the new legislative provision well before March 31, 1962, in which case there would be no such charge. It seemed to me that the contingency of there being such a charge, if we were to take the protestation of the government at its face value, was so slight that it could hardly be said to constitute a charge.

The Deputy Chairman: In reading the resolution its says that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the payment of additional grants to the province of Newfoundland. The explanatory note on the bill which is in front of all hon. members is as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to authorize the payment of additional annual grants to the province of Newfoundland in accordance with the scale contained in the report of the royal commission on Newfoundland finances that was appointed as required by term 29 of the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada.

According to Beauchesne, article 406 says:

Amendments are out of order if they are
(a) irrelevant to the bill, or beyond its scope—

As I feel this amendment comes under that category, I therefore rule that this amendment is out of order.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, you have ruled this amendment out of order, presumably on the grounds advanced by the Minister of Finance. That being the case, perhaps the government, because of the essential reasonableness of this additional clause, might like to consider adding it to the bill themselves. The government has said that their main objection to the recommendations of the royal commission—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, surely the Leader of the Opposition is quite out of order in raising this matter again now. An attempt has been made to introduce an amendment to the bill and introduce something that is not contained in the bill. The amendment has been submitted and you have ruled it out of order. Now the Leader of the Opposition is undertaking to discuss the same matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He is asking the government to do that which is contained in the amendment which you have ruled out of order. With respect, Mr. Chairman, that is clearly outside the confines of debate on this bill, and it is surely not proper to go ahead and proceed now as the Leader of the Opposition is to discuss the matter contained in an amendment which has been ruled by the Chair to be out of order.

Mr. Pearson: On that point, I understand that the amendment was ruled out of order on the grounds advanced by the Minister of Finance, and that the opposition would be out of order in moving an amendment which involves an extra charge on the treasury. But that argument, surely, would not apply to action taken in this regard in respect of this bill by the government itself. All I am doing is to make a suggestion to the government that they do this, and I am trying to explain why it would be reasonable for them to do this.

The Deputy Chairman: I think I ought to say that in ruling this amendment out of order I did not deal with the financial structure of the amendment at all. However, while technically the Leader of the Opposition might be out of order we have allowed quite a wide scope of discussion on the bill, and I think the Chair would like to hear what the Leader of the Oppositon has to say.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Pearson: All I was going to say was this. I was going to ask the government if they would consider amending the bill in this way, because they have objected to the terms of the royal commission's report on the ground that they extend indefinitely into the future an obligation to make payments to Newfoundland of $8 million a year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not accept that statement.

Mr. Pearson: The minister might accept it or he might not. He made the argument several times that the interpretation which we placed upon the word "thereafter"—the interpretation which, we think, is the only reasonable way in which it can be interpreted —was not acceptable to the government because it extended payments in perpetuity, as he put it. This would meet that point.

The minister has also said—and the bill mentions it—that there will be a review, when all these special circumstances as far as Newfoundland is concerned will be taken into consideration. We are asking that this should be written into the bill so that it may be made perfectly clear that the situation which will be taken into consideration shall include term 29 which will be spelled out as one of the things to which regard must be paid and whose obligations are accepted.

For these two reasons, perhaps the government will consider amending the bill accordingly, so as to make it acceptable, I am sure, to all members of the house.

On the preamble.

Mr. Pearson: The preamble contains a good many words, as has already been pointed out and there is one paragraph—the second paragraph on page 2, which reads:

Whereas in the course of such a review any special circumstances relating to the financial position of the province of Newfoundland after the 31st day of March, 1962, would be taken into consideration.

I intend to move, seconded by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill):

That the preamble be amended by striking out the word "and" in line 9 on page 2 and inserting the following paragraph:

Whereas the form of any such review should be agreed upon with the government of the province of Newfoundland for the purpose of determining what additional financial assistance might still be required to enable the government of Newfoundland to continue public services at the levels and standards reached in 1957 without resorting to taxation, more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island; and until such review is completed and the consequent legislation enacted the scale of assistance recommended by the royal commission should be continued; and—

Then we go to the next paragraph.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this is just the reintroduction of the amendment which you ruled out of order five minutes ago. The Leader of the Opposition is simply seeking to introduce it now into the preamble of the bill, whereas previously the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate sought to introduce it into the operative portion of the bill. I think the same rule which rendered the amendment out of order the first time clearly renders it out of order this time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that an entirely different situation arises in respect to the preamble. There is no doubt that had the amendment which I moved been acceptable to the committee, or had the minister been willing to move it and had it become part of the law it would have placed an obligation on the government. But this amendment is drafted in a form which, like the rest of the preamble, is merely an expression of intent which imposes no legal obligation. There cannot, therefore, be any question of there being any charge imposed. Moreover, it merely embodies in express language what the Prime Minister told us yesterday regarding the intention of the government and it seems to me, therefore, that while this amendment would be much less acceptable to us than the amendment first proposed, this amendment would at least give the people of Newfoundland the satisfaction of knowing that what they thought was an iron clad guarantee under term 29 was not being scrapped altogether.

The Deputy Chairman: Once again we have to make a decision, and I should like to refer to May's sixteenth edition, page 564, under the heading "Preamble":

> When all the clauses and schedules have been agreed to and any new clauses or schedules added, the preamble is considered and amendments may be moved thereto if rendered necessary by amendments made to the bill, and the chairman puts the question—

If there are no changes in the clauses, then the preamble is a recitation of the effect, not of the bill but of the act. Therefore, as there were no changes in the clauses, no amendments to the preamble can be accepted. This example deals with an amendment offered on April 11, 1932, to the preamble of the army and air force annual bill to leave out the words "or stir up sedition". The chairman stated that the preamble was a recitation of the effect, not of the bill but of the Army Act. The citation concludes:

> As no amendment had been made to the section of the Army Act dealing with mutiny, etc. the proposed amendment to the preamble, which could only be consequential on such an amendment having been made, was out of order.

Therefore, while I regret very much having to do this twice in succession, I must say in my opinion the amendment is out of order.

Mr. Pearson: Of course, we accept your ruling in this matter, Mr. Chairman, but in discussing the preamble might I express disappointment that in this preamble as it is at present there is no reference of any kind to the fact that the review which is referred to in the preamble should be agreed upon with the government of Newfoundland. There is no assurance, even in the preamble, that in any such review consideration will be given to term 29, and there is no indication, even in the preamble, that pending such a review, and a decision coming from such a review, the scale of assistance to Newfoundland will be that recommended by the royal commission. We regret very much indeed that these assurances are not included even in the preamble and, while not challenging your ruling, Mr. Chairman, we regret that you are unable because of the reasons you have stated to accept an amendment which would have corrected this position.

Mr. Carter: The Minister of Finance referred over and over again to the vague language of term 29. I should like to ask a question about the words "special circumstances". These words are included in the second paragraph of the preamble, but who is to determine these special circumstances, or whether the circumstances are special or not? Will the fact that term 29 has been terminated be regarded as a special circumstance?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A comprehensive study of all dominion-provincial fiscal and financial relations has already been agreed upon and has been launched. As to the question asked by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, we are not attempting to put any narrow limits on the words "special circumstances". Anything that any province wants to bring forward for discussion in the context of dominion-provincial fiscal relations will, or can be brought forward in the present comprehensive study which has been approved by all the governments in Canada.

In the case of Newfoundland, no one is suggesting that there is going to be any narrow limitation put upon these words. Anything that the province of Newfoundland thinks is special in its case can certainly be brought forward and fully discussed and considered there. There are some aspects of dominion-provincial fiscal relations that are common to all the provinces. I do not need to recount them. In the case of Newfoundland here is a special provision that takes account of the possibility of special circumstances and explicitly leaves the door open to Newfoundland to introduce those into the discussions.

I do not need to remind the hon. member that the field of dominion-provincial fiscal relations is an area in which agreement is sought, indeed in which agreement must be sought, and it is our intention to seek agreement. That is why we have inaugurated these comprehensive studies, and well in advance of March 31, 1962. We are seeking to lay the basis for understandings and accords between the dominion and the provincial governments. I think that view has commended itself as a constructive approach to this problem.

If we look back at what has happened on some previous occasions where the federal government, our predecessors, were not able to come to terms with some provincial government or were unwilling to, they stated their terms and asked the house for legislative sanction of them and entered into agreement with the provinces that were prepared to meet those terms and left others to levy their own taxes and carry on their own normal constitutional functions.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the minister has now made it perfectly clear that because of the existence of term 29 which is part of our constitution and part of the act of union; that merely because of that circumstance no special consideration is being given to Newfoundland in this preamble. No special consideration of any kind is being given notwithstanding the existence of term 29. The minister has made it perfectly clear that the special circumstances which might be brought forward apply to any province. Any province in this review may bring forward any special circumstance and no special consideration in this measure dealing with Newfoundland is being given to Newfoundland in that review arising out of term 29. The special circumstances which may be brought forward are those that obviously could be brought forward by any province and would be brought forward whether or not this preamble were incorporated—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is quite mistaken.

Mr. Pearson: The minister just said that in this review any province can bring forward any circumstance bearing on the problem of dominion-provincial fiscal relations. Of course they can. The minister is now saying that any province may bring forward any problem affecting their circumstances. Of course they can. Newfoundland is in exactly the same position in that respect as any other province, no better and no worse. And therefore the special circumstance arising out of term 29 has no special meaning as far as this preamble or the bill are concerned. That is why we are trying to give it a meaning in the amendment we propose.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition was never more wrong in his life than in the statement he just made. He was certainly not quoting any words of mine. If he was attempting to restate my submission to the committee in my last remarks he has wrenched my remarks beyond all recognition. What the hon. gentleman has just now said is the very opposite to what I said. In addressing myself to the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo in reply to his question I pointed out that there are some questions that are common to all of the provinces and those are matters that will certainly be reviewed. That is what is in the contemplation of everyone. But in addition to that we point out here in a special paragraph of the preamble that in the case of Newfoundland—and Newfoundland is singled out above all the other provinces in Canada in that respect—if Newfoundland has any special circumstance at all to bring forward in relation to federal-provincial fiscal relations, then Newfoundland may bring that circumstance forward in the course of the review and that is not to be confounded, as the Leader of the Opposition has confused it, with the general review of matters common to all the provinces.

We have here set out in a special paragraph the fact that in the course of the review to which reference has been made any special circumstance relating to Newfoundland after March 31, 1962 would be taken into consideration. The Leader of the Opposition was completely wrong in saying this is just the same thing as every other province has. That kind of submission on the part of the Leader of the Opposition just does not tally with the facts or with the language that the committee is asked to approve in this paragraph.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I regret having to refer to this matter again. The minister has now said that Newfoundland in the course of this review, because of this preamble, can bring forward any special circumstance relating to her financial position. Of course, Newfoundland can do that. It would be an absurd situation indeed in a review of the financial positon of a province vis-à-vis the federal government if that province could not bring forward any special circumstance. Does the minister attempt to argue that if there were a similar review in respect of any other province that that province could not bring forward any special circumstance affecting its position? Does he take that position? If he does not, then Newfoundland is exactly on the same basis as every other province. Bringing forward special circumstances in the case of Newfoundland might mean bringing forward term 29 whereas in the case of another province it might mean something else.

If the minister wishes to be specific in this matter and show that Newfoundland's special position was being given special consideration, why has he refused to make specific in the preamble term 29 or the obligations of that term, the obligations concerning consulting Newfoundland about the review so that it will be an agreed review, and the obligation on the part of the federal government to continue payments as recommended by the royal commission pending decisions made by that review?

My submission—and the minister has done nothing to weaken it—is that Newfoundland in this preamble is in exactly the same position as any province would be in respect of a review of its relations with the federal government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that statement of the Leader of the Opposition just is not true. It does not tally with the facts concerning this special consideration in the case of Newfoundland. Surely he must realize that by now.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister this question. If the government agrees there should be a review concerning federal-provincial financial relations between the federal government and the government say, of the province of Nova Scotia, could the province of Nova Scotia not bring forward in that review any special circumstances affecting that province? The answer is obvious.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I want to repeat, not quite verbatim, but almost verbatim, the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition. I am going to change it just a little bit, however. The preamble reads:

> Whereas since the report of the royal commission was made the government of Canada has proposed a comprehensive study—

It is a comprehensive study for all the provinces. The minister has told us about this study group many times, on some occasions rather unwillingly. I continue:

> —of dominion-provincial financial relations in co-operation with the provinces, and all the provinces have agreed to participate therein—

And then it says:

> Whereas in the course of such a review—

That is a review for all the provinces: "such a review". It is hard to say any more what plain language means in this chamber when the minister cannot understand what "thereafter" means but surely the minister would agree that "such a review" referred to in the second paragraph is the review referred to in the first paragraph. I ask the minister this question. Do the words "in the course of such a review" refer to the review mentioned in the first paragraph?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where is "review" referred to in the first paragraph?

Mr. Pickersgill: All right, "study" then; and then in the second paragraph "such a review". Is the Prime Minister getting ready for another quibble two or three years from now? Either "such a review" implies that there would be a review somewhere in the preceding part of the preamble or it implies nothing. I take it that the words "study" and "review" were meant to be the same thing. If they are not and if this review is something else, I should like to be told what it is. Perhaps the minister would like to clear up that point before I proceed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The review mentioned in line 6 on page 2 of the bill obviously refers to the comprehensive study mentioned in the preceding paragraph.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the minister for that. In the course of that comprehensive study, if the government of the province of Prince Edward Island asks to have any special circumstance relating to its financial position considered will the government refuse?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, any special circumstance that the hon. member is asking about is hypothetical and not the kind of special circumstances that are in contemplation in the case of Newfoundland in the second paragraph of the preamble on page 2, because here we are thinking of something that is special in Newfoundland. I have made that clear, and we are just going over the ground again and again.

Mr. Pearson: We are not.

Mr. Pickersgill: We have a special definition of "special" now, if we have no definition of "thereafter". "Thereafter" means nothing and "special" does not mean special; it means something special, according to the minister. This is the most absurd situation, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out. Here we have the minister saying that this is something special for Newfoundland; and yet when I put a plain question to him, if Prince Edward Island wants to bring up its special circumstances, as it has at every federal-provincial conference that I have been at, and I have been at a good many, are they going to be denied that right? If they are not, what are you doing for Newfoundland that is not already done for Prince Edward Island? You are doing absolutely nothing. This paragraph in its present form is totally meaningless.

Mr. Winch: I think it is time that someone told the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate something. Since when did any province in Canada require to have a special consideration?

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that a question?

Mr. Winch: They are provinces of Canada, and under the terms of confederation they are covered. By the terms of confederation and by special acts of parliament, by agreements of parliament, any province that has a special problem will be given consideration. And, Mr. Chairman, a special problem is a special problem of any province. No province under confederation has the right to demand a special special consideration; otherwise, you would break down the entire terms of confederation. If that is to be the basis of the argument, then each province can say that it has a special special consideration. Surely, the meaning of confederation is that the terms on which each province or territory that comes into confederation are laid down. Under the terms at the present time special consideration will be given to special problems of any province of Canada. What more can any province from Newfoundland to British Columbia ask beyond that the special problems of a province will be considered when the time comes to appoint a royal commission or new agreements or arrangements are made? I say once again I am getting a little bit fed up, quite honestly.

An hon. Member: Are you?

Mr. Winch: Yes, with all of this talk. We have our problems in British Columbia. They have problems in Newfoundland; there is absolutely no question about that at all and special consideration will be given to them. I think it has been ignored by some of the members from Newfoundland that when Newfoundland entered into confederation, according to some of their own members, they were from 25 to 80 years behind the rest of Canada; but in 10 years they have increased their per capita income from $472 in 1949—God help them, how they lived I do not know—to $802 in 1958, which is still too far below the rest of Canada, but it has at least doubled in that 10 years; it has gone up 100 per cent since. As I think of the moneys which have been paid in old age pensions, in family allowances, in subsidies and in special grants in the last 10 years, with an additional $36,500,000 in the next five, and when I think that Newfoundland shall have the same right as any other province to special consideration, why it has taken us three days to get this bill through I do not know. No province of Canada, including Newfoundland, wants special special consideration. All it wants is a square deal. In view of the increases and the betterments that have taken place in Newfoundland, if it needs more help I do not know of any government in Canada that will not give them that additional help when the time comes to negotiate a new agreement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am glad the hon. member agrees with me completely in the point I was making. I certainly thoroughly agree with the last statement he made. I believe that Newfoundland does not want special consideration; it does want a square deal; it does want its constitutional rights, and that is precisely the difference between us and the government. We are asking for the constitutional rights of Newfoundland and the government is giving to Newfoundland "special consideration" which has nothing special about it.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Now, by leave.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten):

That the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of considering the advisability of adding the words "and for each year thereafter" immediately after the words "fiscal year 1961-62" in line 28 of clause 2.

Mr. Speaker: The question that arises on this amendment is whether it goes beyond the scope of the bill. An amendment on third reading, as has been well settled must, as the bill has been through committee of the whole, be limited to amending the contents of the bill as it has come from committee of the whole and must not introduce new matter. Of course, the relevant words are, "and for each year thereafter immediately after the words 'fiscal year 1961-62' ". Perhaps the hon. member who moved the amendment would like to support the view that it does come within the contents of the bill because I have doubts that it does.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would it be all right if I said a word? I draw Your Honour's attention to the explanatory note which reads as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to authorize the payment of additional annual grants to the province of Newfoundland in accordance with the scale contained in the report of the royal commission on Newfoundland finances that was appointed as required by term 29 of the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada.

The suggestion for reconsideration made in the amendment is in precise conformity with the scale contained in that report.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I submit that the proposed amendment is clearly out of order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has sought to bring the subject matter of the amendment somehow or other within the scope of the bill by saying that the report of the royal commission had something to say about a later year. I cannot agree with him on that, but surely that is the weakest possible kind of argument for trying to make it appear that the subject matter of the amendment comes within the scope of the subject matter of the bill.

The operative and essential clause of the bill, which is the one sought to be amended by the amendment, clause 2, sets out specific amounts for five fiscal years, the last of them being the fiscal year 1961-62. The effect of the amendment, if it were given to the house as proposed here, would be to introduce provision for the payment of $8 million per year virtually in perpetuity thereafter, going into an entirely different period. We have a measure here that deals with fixed payments for a five year period. This amendment is something completely outside the scope of that operative provision of the bill. There are other reasons why the amendment is out of order, but I am sure I do not need to mention them.

Mr. Speaker: May I refer the house to Beauchesne, fourth edition, citation 418, which reads in part as follows:

All amendments which may be moved on a second reading of a bill may be moved on the third reading with the restriction that they cannot deal with any matter which is not contained in the bill.

I would have thought that an amendment to alter some provision of the bill, for example, to reduce the amount of payment for the fiscal year 1961-62, which is the last line of clause 2, would have been in order if the bill were to be referred back for that purpose, but this amendment asks that the bill be referred back to consider the addition of payments for years subsequent to 1961-62, something which is not in the bill at all now and which would add additional provisions which are not contained in the bill. Therefore it is clear to me that the amendment goes beyond the scope of the bill and is not in order at this stage. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Pickersgill: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed on division.

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE FOR THE HUMANE SLAUGHTER OF FOOD ANIMALS

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill C-71, to provide for the humane slaughter of food animals.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, the matter of humane slaughter of food animals was the subject of quite exhaustive investigation during this session of parliament by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization. I am sure that all members of the house would wish to join with me in expressing appreciation to that committee and to the organizations and individuals who presented evidence to it.

The committee, in its report tabled on June 16th, recommended that parliament require the humane slaughter of meat animals in plants covered by the jurisdiction of the Meat Inspection Act. This bill gives effect to that recommendation. It will ensure that humane slaughter practices are followed in plants that are within the jurisdiction of parliament and come under federal meat inspection. These account for some 80 per cent of the total slaughter of meat animals.

The committee had recommended that this objective be achieved through an amendment to the Meat Inspection Act. On reflection, it was considered preferable to provide for it by a separate statute rather than as an amendment to the Meat Inspection Act. Hon. members will note, however, that the bill is tied closely to the Meat Inspection Act. It requires meat slaughtering establishments registered under that act to conform with the requirements of the regulations under this act. The act will be administered by officers now engaged in the administration of the Meat Inspection Act, and the bill clothes inspectors with the same powers as they possess under the Meat Inspection Act.

The committee report recommended that certain practices in association with the slaughter of meat animals be considered to be inhumane, and that certain other practices be considered to be humane. It will be noted that the bill does not list acceptable or unacceptable practices specifically, but provides for them to be established by regulation. This will permit the approval of slaughter methods and devices which have now been determined to be humane and will provide the necessary flexibility to recognize others which may subsequently be developed.

The committee recommended that the operation of the proposed law be postponed for a reasonable time to enable all persons affected by it to take the necessary steps to comply with the law when it becomes effective. This will be dealt with by regulation, as the amount of time needed to enable the persons concerned to comply with humane slaughter requirements will vary with different classes of livestock. The packing industry has already adopted the use of mechanical stunners for cattle, as recommended by the committee, and there need be no delay in this respect.

Considerable study and experimentation has gone into the development of humane slaughter methods for hogs and other small livestock, and this has progressed to the point where adequate alternative methods for the humane slaughter of these animals should soon be available. While a reasonable period will have to be provided for the installation of the necessary facilities, I should like to assure the house that the minimum time possible will be allowed. I would certainly envisage that the regulations would be completely in force within a year.

As the house knows, the committee on agriculture and colonization considered whether the objective of humane slaughter should be achieved by way of an amendment to the Criminal Code or by a statute limiting its direct jurisdiction to establishments operating under federal meat inspection. As I noted at the outset, it recommended the latter procedure. The Criminal Code has, of course, for many years contained a provision requiring the humane treatment of animals. This will continue to apply.

There has been lacking, however, any special provision prescribing in detail the practices that may or may not be employed in the slaughter of meat animals. The bill now before the house and the regulations under it will establish those procedures in meat slaughter operations coming within the jurisdiction of parliament.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement was quite comprehensive but I wish that its substance had formed part of the bill. In looking at the measure it seems quite a simple bill but I should like to say that a measure of this kind can have far-reaching and serious effects. In fact, as hon. members know, anything that at any time may touch upon religious beliefs or religious practices is an extremely delicate matter. I should therefore like to ask for the patient and considerate indulgence of the house while I deal with this matter because the bill itself could seriously affect the religious beliefs and practices of an important sector of Canadians.

I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that certainly the principle of the bill is universally accepted and it is indeed a very laudable bill. But we must be careful that in doing one good thing we do not inadvertently do another thing that might destroy or interfere with other universally accepted principles. In this instance, Mr. Speaker, in legislating on methods for the humane slaughter of food animals, the house should be careful that we do not destroy or invade the freedom of religious practices of Canadians. I suggest that the house should seek a synthesis so that both principles can be preserved. It is to this objective that I want to address myself for a few moments.

Lest anything I might say should be interpreted as meaning that I do not support a measure of this kind, let me say at once—and make it as clear as language will permit—that I support any measure that will ensure humane treatment of animals. I do this not only out of personal conviction, but even more so because of the ethical and religious teachings which we receive from earliest childhood. The theory of kind treatment of animals is as old as the Jewish religion itself. It is first mentioned in the Ten Commandments. In the fourth commandment we are directed not to labour our animals on the Sabbath. It also directs that our animals be treated with the same kindness and the same consideration in that regard as even our own sons and daughters. That is indeed a far-reaching lesson on kindness to animals.

There are many other effective lessons on this point and I should like briefly to mention but a few. I do so, because I feel that the subject matter touching upon religious beliefs and practices is an extremely delicate one, as I said a moment ago. I should like to support that statement by saying that if a method is being used in the slaughter of animals for food purposes for people of the Jewish religion, it is not without careful consideration to kindness to animals.

For example, do hon. members know that no one practising my faith is permitted to sit down to a meal unless he first makes certain that his animals have been watered and fed? It is also forbidden to yoke a strong animal with a weaker one, lest there be suffering by the weaker animal. It is also forbidden to muzzle an ox when he treadeth the corn—and this is almost a verbatim quotation—because the ox should not suffer undue anguish from not being able to partake of the plenty around him. If he is muzzled he is not able to do so.

Another interesting point I should like to make is this. No animal may be slaughtered within the sight of another animal lest it be caused unnecessary anguish. Hunting, for example, is forbidden lest undue suffering be inflicted by wounding; and in order to discourage hunting, no animal killed at the hunt can be consumed by those who observe the tenets of their religion.

I want to make one or two more observations along the same line. It is expressly forbidden to ship over long distances or to keep in market places unweaned calves or kids lest they be deprived of food in that way and therefore suffer unduly. Judging from these humane religious teachings I venture to point out that I could be speaking for the oldest humane society in the world.

It may also be interesting for hon. members to know that according to a standard medieval ethical work—and I now refer to the Book of the Saints—we are told that a man will be called to account before the Judge of judges for any pain he has caused to an animal. But to bring this ancient record of kindness up to date may I say this. It is a fact that the founder of the royal society for the prevention of cruelty to animals was of the Jewish faith. Mr. Lewis Gompertz who was its first honorary secretary and, I believe the first president of the society for the prevention of cruelty to animals in the United States, was also of the same faith.

May I just touch on another point of interest. In the Jewish religion the taking of the life of an animal is not treated lightly. The slaying of animals for food is considered to be a religious rite and is accompanied by a prayer as a sacrifice. The act is performed by a religious functionary who must be a person of approved high moral character, specially trained and possessing a thorough knowledge of the precise rules and regulations to slaughter an animal without pain. He must be steady of hand, qualified by examination, certified and subjected to re-examination at frequent intervals by ecclesiastical authorities who alone can license a person to exercise the calling of slaying animals for food consumption by Jews.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, I have indicated to some degree the high regard which the people of our faith are taught to have for all animals and the particular attention given to animals slaughtered for food purposes. This matter is independently commented upon in an editorial of the Calgary Herald of December 26, 1956. I should now like to read this editorial to hon. members. It concerned a dispute in Calgary involving the society for the prevention of cruelty to animals and some threats which were presumed to have been made to institute prosecutions for the slaughter of animals in what was considered to be an inhumane way. The heading of the article is "The S.P.C.A. Corrects a Bad Mistake" and it reads as follows:

> The Calgary society for the prevention of cruelty to animals has reversed the stand taken by its president a few days ago against what he termed the "inhumane" methods of slaughtering cattle under the Jewish kosher rites.
> While the details behind its decision to reverse itself are as yet unknown to the public, the society has been well advised in retracting its earlier threat to lay a charge under the Criminal Code of Canada against the Jewish slaughterhouses here.
> Making its retraction, it has, we hope, nipped a particularly nasty and prejudiced publicity campaign against a community whose regard for the lives and the proper treatment of animals dates back to a point where it is almost lost in antiquity. Never, in the long history of the world, has any group of civilized people had a finer record of kindness to animals—a principle which forms an integral part of their ancient religious laws—than the Jews.
> Any slaughtering of animals for human consumption is bound to be a revolting sight to the majority of people who, happily, have been able to divorce the slab of steak, or other animal foods, on their dinner plates from the actual process of slaughtering. And every method of slaughtering must necessarily involve some pain and suffering to the animal whether it is by a blow on the skull with a heavy sledgehammer, a slaughtering "gun" which fires a steel spike into the animal's brain, or under the age-old Jewish rites. The chief aim, then, must be handling the slaughtering in a way which will cause the least suffering to the animal, and there is in existence even when compared with the so-called modern methods an abundance of medical and other evidence that the Jewish procedure is as humane as any other, and perhaps less open to error or careless and faulty handling. Furthermore, it has long been a recognized fact that for the animal the cruellest part of the slaughtering is from the time it is first driven into the slaughtering house premises where it immediately senses what is in store for it from the smell of blood and other odours unavoidably associated with slaughtering.
> The ancient laws of Judaism were expressly designed to avoid unnecessary cruelty to the animals, under the pain of the lash and other severe penalties. And investigations from time to time—the latest having been by a commission of the British House of Lords within the last ten years—have failed to uncover any evidence that the immediate and guaranteed method of completely severing an animal's jugular vein is not an acceptable means of ensuring a quick and merciful death.
> By launching such a prejudiced campaign against the Jewish race and religion the SPCA has done a serious disservice to the Jewish people and to its own cause.

Unfortunately, however, Mr. Speaker, in spite of this long record, historic and religious, where we were taught to prevent unkindness or cruelty to animals, which I have just recited and which has just been confirmed by a quite independent non-Jewish authority, I would like to say that there is a sorrowful history revealed behind similar legislation in other countries which has affected the right of Jews to slaughter their food animals according to their religious ritual. Most hon. members may not be familiar with this type of innocuous-sounding legislation.

During my own lifetime I have had occasion to be saddened by legislation which sprang from and followed from so-called humane slaughtering regulations. I do not in the slightest, Mr. Speaker, impute any such motives to the sponsor of this bill. I attribute to him only the loftiest consideration based purely on the humaneness of the procedure of slaughtering food animals. Unwittingly and unknowingly, however, many of these benevolent activities have in the past covered ulterior and malevolent desires. Humane slaughter legislation has been used as a springboard for devious anti-religious campaigns, and in some countries ritual slaughter has been completely banned. The histories of those countries stand out as a blot on the escutcheon of modern civilization.

I would like to read a paragraph from the Toronto Globe and Mail for July 14 last, headed "Humane Killing Religious Threat, Rabbi Warns". The article says:

> Approval of a measure requiring the humane slaughter of livestock in New Jersey could be the first step in depriving Jews of their religious freedom, a Rabbi warned today.
> Rabbi Pichas Teitz, leader of the orthodox Jewish community of Elizabeth, made this assertion during a public hearing on a bill directing meat packers to use humane methods in killing livestock.
> He said a study of Jewish history shows Jewish sufferings began with approval of humane slaughter laws. He said Adolph Hitler prefaced his killings of Jews in Poland with a humane slaughter act.

I am sure that hon. members can, therefore, readily understand and appreciate the very genuine and deep-rooted concern, and even suspicion, which the 250,000 Jews living in Canada have about legislation of this kind. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his government inadvertently and very innocently may be made the victims of people with ulterior motives. I therefore feel it is my duty to call on them to exercise the greatest caution to make certain that if there are any diabolic or unrecognizable objectives which a measure of this kind may be loaded with, they should do nothing that may to the slightest degree invade the religious observances of our Jewish fellow Canadians, and do everything possible to adopt this legislation and also to safeguard their religious rights.

I repeat again, let no one think for a moment that I oppose any measure that outlaws inhumane treatment of animals. What I do say is that in the process of adopting this legislation we should not invade or minimize the freedom of religion in Canada. We should seek that synthesis that will safeguard both and that certainly will solve this problem as it has been solved in the United Kingdom, in Scotland, in Ireland and in a great many other countries, and as it is now being dealt with in the United States itself.

I know that to find that synthesis is the objective of every hon. member of this house, and it is to this that I would now like to speak with respect to the bill itself. I have the fullest confidence that every hon. member who sat on the committee, as well as every hon. member in the house, has all the sympathy in the world and will do everything possible not to invade the religious rights of a large sector of Canadians. We find that the bill is entitled "An Act to Provide for the Humane Slaughter of Food Animals". But sadly enough, nowhere in the bill is humane slaughter of food animals defined. I think it is a mistake not to have in the bill a full and comprehensive definition of what is a humane method of slaughter and what is not a humane method of slaughter. The bill is so simple that to me it forebodes some danger. The most significant clause in the bill is the power that is given to the governor in council. I think parliament should know what is a humane method and what is not a humane method. We should define it and not leave it to the governor in council to decide.

Parliament appointed a committee and the minister referred very clearly to that committee. The committee made recommendations to parliament, and may I point out to the minister that when the Prime Minister introduced this measure for first reading on Friday —and he did this somewhat hastily, because he had to ask the unanimous consent of the house before doing so—he stated, and I quote:

> This matter is one that has received the consideration of a committee, and the bill to be submitted I believe embodies the general recommendations made as a result of the deliberations of that committee.

Peculiarly enough, there is not a single word in the bill to justify that statement by the Prime Minister that the general recommendations of the committee were embodied in the bill. There is not a word. Not a single recommendation of that committee is embodied in this bill. To prove my contention, let me read a section of the report of the committee. I draw the attention of the minister especially to paragraph 7, which reads:

> Your committee, after careful deliberation, submits the following recommendations for incorporation into legislation to provide for the humane slaughter of food animals—

And the recommendations were, as this shows, expected to be incorporated into the legislation, because during its discussions the committee expressed some apprehension as to whether or not this matter should be left to the governor in council or to officials no matter how able or how knowledgeable they might be, namely to decide for the committee, for parliament and for the country what is and what is not a humane method of slaughter. We expressly said that we wanted parliament to be able to decide that question, and we wanted it in the legislation. But, alas, not a single one of these recommendations is in this bill. For the benefit of any hon. members who are not familar with them, the recommendations were as follows:

(a) That inadequate holding pens and/or unsafe ramps, inclines and floor surfaces over which animals must move in packing plants or slaughterhouses shall be considered inhumane.
(b) That the combination of shackling and hoisting of a food animal before rendering it unconscious shall be considered inhumane;
(c) Humane methods of slaughter shall be deemed to include
(i) shooting,
(ii) schechita (the Hebrew term for slaughter) as practised in compliance with Hebrew religious requirements;
(d) Humane methods of pre-slaughter shall be deemed to include
(i) stunning with a mechanical stunner,
(ii) certain electrical stunning methods,
(iii) the use of anaesthetising agents.

These recommendations are quite clear and we asked that they should be included in this bill so that we might be able to debate this subject adequately. We may now suspect that there may be other definitions made by order in council, and, unfortunately, we will not have an opportunity of debating them. I say, therefore, that I have the feeling that the Prime Minister possibly did not see the report of the committee, or that if he did see the report of the committee he apparently did not see the bill which, as I said, was rushed into the house last Friday for first reading. Being the busy man that he is, he probably took it for granted that the bill would follow the recommendations of the committee and my opinion is confirmed, apparently, by the right hon. gentleman's use of the words "I believe" in the course of his statement. If he had seen the bill the Prime Minister would not have used those words, because he would have been sure. I can readily understand that he might not have seen it because it might well have been handed to him hastily before he presented it for first reading. No criticism can be levelled at the Prime Minister for that, but I do address myself to the minister who is presenting this bill and I point out that the recommendations of the committee contained, as I said, a request that they be included in the legislation.

I hope the Prime Minister was shocked when he saw the contents of this rather controversial bill. Certainly I was shocked and no doubt other members of the committee who were responsible for the wording of the report as to the recommendations being included in the legislation were disappointed when they saw the bill. I would suggest to the minister that he should include in the bill itself what are considered to be humane methods of slaughter of animals for human food. That is the very purpose of this bill, and yet no single word is mentioned about it. If this were done, and if humane methods of slaughter were defined in the bill, it would certainly confirm by an act of parliament the recommendations made by the committee that humane methods of slaughter shall be deemed to include schechita, the Hebrew term for slaughter as practised in compliance with Hebrew religious requirements. If that were in the legislation it would be an attempt to synthesize the two good things we are attempting to do by this enactment, but having omitted to do that we have no such security.

May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps before I leave the chair I should remind the house that by a special order passed yesterday we shall resume this sitting at 7 p.m.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 7 p.m.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Speaker, at the adjournment I was attempting to impress on the minister my submission that the bill should clearly contain provisions which set forth what humane slaughter is and what it is not. I mentioned the desirability of achieving a synthesis of two principles, the principle of outlawing inhumane slaughter of animals and the principle of not disturbing religious rights and freedoms in this country. In my submission it would contribute substantially to this desirable synthesis if the bill were to contain language like the following: that nothing in this bill shall be deemed to interfere with the religious rites and practices of anyone in Canada. This wording or language similar to it is contained in the legislation of other countries that were desirous of ensuring that legislation dealing with the humane slaughter of animals would not interfere in the religious rites of anyone. When this bill was before the committee to which it was referred for study I moved such an amendment in the following terms:

That paragraph 6 of the committee's report be amended by adding thereto the words:
"having due regard for the religious practices and observances of all people in Canada".

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. gentleman who has the floor is referring to proceedings in a committee and I believe such references should not be made.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Were the proceedings tabled in the house?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Pallett: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw.

Mr. Crestohl: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I did not understand the point of order or the ruling on it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): The hon. member for Peel thought the proceedings of the committee had not been tabled in the house.

Mr. Crestohl: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The amendment which I have just read was rejected by the government majority in the committee. I cannot understand why an amendment in those terms should have been rejected. Most surely it embodies a principle of which the entire house approves. Instead of leaving any doubt in the minds of the people of Canada that this measure might interfere with the religious rites or practices of anyone or might in any way invade those rights to the slightest degree I believe an amendment of this nature should have been adopted and incorporated in the legislation. Perhaps the minister will explain why such an amendment should not have won unanimous support. It merely states a principle which the house constantly approves. I know that the Prime Minister and members of the government acknowledge the freedom of religion and support and uphold that principle. Why, then, should the majority of the Prime Minister's party in the committee have rejected an amendment like that? I trust that the minister will explain because I feel that an explanation is owing.

In a further attempt to build up the synthesis about which I was speaking I introduced another amendment in the committee which I should now like to place on the record. I moved:

That the report be amended by adding thereto the following paragraph to be known as paragraph 8:

Your committee also notes that food animals killed in accordance with Hebrew religious requirements must not first be maimed or rendered unconscious by stunning or other means. We, therefore, further recommend that, before legislation dealing with this method is promulgated, further study be made of alternate procedures by which the animal can be delivered by humane means for the actual "shechita" cut. To this end your committee recommends that the government consult with leading Canadian packers and abattoirs with a view to the installation and use of casting pens or other procedures approved by government authorities, so as to preserve for the people of the Hebrew and Mohammedan faiths the freedom of their respective religions and practices in Canada.

The purpose of that amendment was merely to ensure that we do not legislate in a way that would actually prevent the carrying out of the method of slaughter that is part of a religious rite. That, too, was rejected by the government majority in the committee which also puzzled me. The amendment simply sought to make certain that there would be no interference in the practice of the religious rites of any group through the fixing of a time limit.

As I examine the bill it appears to me to be designed to accomplish but one thing. It seeks to transfer to the governor in council the authority to declare what is and what is not a humane method of slaughter of animals. That, I believe, is what the committee sought to determine. The committee laboured for weeks, heard evidence, debated the matter in camera at several meetings and finally drew conclusions and reached decisions on the basis of the evidence presented to it. It determined what is and what is not humane slaughter. Are we to say now that the time of the committee was wasted? None of the findings of the committee are incorporated in this piece of legislation. We are removing from parliament the right of determination in this regard and placing it with the governor in council. This to me is the most poignant illustration of government by order in council.

But when parliament is in session, when parliament has appointed a committee to study a problem and the committee has sat and studied the problem and presented a report, the minister, or whoever it was that drafted this bill, is by no stretch of the imagination justified in ignoring that report completely and not bringing its recommendations before parliament. To say that these things will be decided by the governor in council is a derogation of power and authority. It is the business of parliament to decide these things. By the very nature of the bill parliament has not been asked to do that; parliament is deprived of that opportunity.

I presented that second amendment because I hoped that by that amendment the government might call in the abattoirs and the packers in Canada and consult with them. There was an area of a delicate problem there. While in principle we established that the Hebrew method, the Jewish method, of slaughter is humane, we might run into the danger that in the administration and in the regulations that will be laid down that lofty principle, that right which the committee has established, might be frustrated. There was the possibility of that being done.

Let me explain this to the house. While the schechita is declared humane, the committee found that the method by which the abattoir delivered the animals for the schechita cut was not considered humane. That is the section which speaks about shackling and hoisting being considered inhumane. Having outlawed the method of delivering the animal for the ritual cuts and stating legislatively that it is a humane method, and not making it possible really, as I said, could frustrate the intention of the legislation, I introduced that amendment and said: "Let the bill not come into force, let it not be promulgated until after consultation with the abattoirs, and until another more humane method of delivering the animal for the cut has been established". That, too, was rejected.

I say that the bold and the cruel effect of rejecting this amendment is a painful one because although the traditional Jewish method of slaughter may be declared humane, administratively it may be impossible to perform. I therefore respectfully say—and I repeat—that most certainly the measure requires the careful and conscientious consideration of the house. Because there might be frustration in the carrying out of the slaughtering in a way that will invade religious rights, religious freedoms, I urge respectfully on the Prime Minister who is a man, I know, of deep religious principles, who will not permit anything to be done that will invade the religious right of any ethnic group in Canada, since that certainly would be inconsistent with one of the principal principles urged in his bill of rights, to use his good offices to set out in this bill in language that the whole country may see and recognize as a law which safeguards the religious freedom of all people in Canada.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, it should also be made clear by setting out these recommendations in the bill that this is not a measure which will remove from parliament the right of seeing and debating the real issues instead of delegating them outside of parliament.

The making of Canada's laws is the responsibility of parliament alone. Mr. Speaker, in order to bring before parliament the basic issues in this bill, I want to move an amendment, but I say to the minister at once that if he will declare that appropriate amendments along the lines suggested, or along the lines indicated and recommended by the committee, will be favourably considered by him I will withdraw my amendment. It may even be the wiser course, perhaps, to reconsider the bill altogether. Therefore, I would like to move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith):

That because the bill fails to define humane slaughter or otherwise indicate what are and what are not humane methods of slaughter and because such definition is inherent in the title, purpose, and very nature of the bill, and further because the bill fails to preserve the freedom of certain religious rights and practices now enjoyed by Canadians, that the bill be not now read a second time; but that the motion be amended by deleting the word "now" and adding in its place the words "this day six months hence".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. In looking over this amendment I find there are really two parts to it. A condition is part of the amendment and, of course, on second reading you cannot add a condition to a bill. However, if the mover was to move that the bill be not now read a second time, and carry on from there the amendment would be acceptable to the Chair.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Speaker, perhaps, in order to obtain the best attention on the points I have raised it might be wiser for me to withdraw this amendment, if I can have unanimous permission.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): It has not been accepted by the Chair. I have not read it. Would the hon. member like to withdraw it?

Mr. Crestohl: I would like to. I certainly will accept the principle of the bill. Perhaps we can discuss this thing further in committee.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order which is involved here—

Mr. Winch: There is no point of order now; the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. Harkness: The Speaker had already ruled that the amendment was out of order. Therefore, having ruled that it is out of order, I think that disposes of it. The hon. member has no right to withdraw something which has disappeared.

Mr. D. J. Walker (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, for two years now we have laboured over the question of humane slaughter. Originally it was the intention to introduce an amendment to the Criminal Code but it was thought that such an amendment would be too harsh under all the circumstances. So the standing committee on agriculture met over a period of six weeks during this session and after ten long meetings brought in a report which was tabled in the house. Before arriving at this report the committee on agriculture, under the able chairmanship of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stanton), heard evidence from all interested parties. Anyone who wanted to say anything was invited to say it. Free scope was given to all. We had three very distinguished members from the Canadian Jewish congress and we benefited greatly from their evidence. We had representatives from the meat packers' council, the humane society and the society for the prevention of cruelty to animals. We had representatives from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture as well as experts and veterinarians who were authorities on the subject of humane killing.

I am very pleased that we now have before the house Bill No. C-71, an act to provide for the humane slaughter of animals. It is quite true that the bill is enabling legislation so that regulations can be promulgated by the Department of Agriculture, regulations which will be enforced by the inspectors under the Meat Inspection Act, regulations which will be drafted within the recommendations of the committee's report. I might also add, lest anyone feel that there is any usurpation of the powers of parliament, that these regulations must be advertised in the Canada Gazette and must be available to the house. If any hon. member should feel, once the regulations are tabled in the house, that they are not within the purview of the report or in any way infringe what he feels to be the rights of any such party, such honourable member can criticize any of the regulations in the house and has ample opportunity to do so either in the debate on the speech from the throne or when the minister's estimates are brought before the house.

The bill is short, simple and very much to the point. I want to thank the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) for agreeing with the principle of the bill which he states is universally accepted. I might point out to hon. members that the bill does exactly what the committee has recommended in paragraph six of its report, which paragraph reads as follows:

> Your committee recommends, after due deliberation, that legislation amending the Meat Inspection Act be introduced to provide for humane handling and slaughter regulations.

That is exactly what the bill purports to do. There is nothing here that cannot be interpreted simply. Clause 4 of the bill states:

> The governor in council may, for the purpose of ensuring humane slaughter of food animals in an establishment, make regulations respecting the manner of, and methods and devices to be employed in, the slaughter of food animals in an establishment.

I should like to point out that the report of the committee, which is very succinct, definite and to the point, is an excellent guide to the Department of Agriculture in drafting regulations. One might say, as I believe the hon. member who last spoke suggested, why should the regulations not be incorporated in the bill itself? That might create a sorry plight, Mr. Speaker, in the event that any of the regulations turned out to be unjust or unworkable. It would then be necessary to wait until the next session of parliament to amend the regulations. After all, the regulations are subject to change from time to time but the one important thing is that they should be in keeping with and within the purview of the recommendations made by the standing committee on agriculture. So Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of pleasure in supporting Bill No. C-71.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, during the present session I had the opportunity of making a rather prolonged speech on the matter of the humane slaughter of animals and, if my memory is correct, that was the third time I had done so in the past three years. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the C.C.F. group supports the principle of this bill to provide for the humane slaughter of animals. Because we support that in principle it naturally follows that we support Bill No. C-71. But I should like to add that we are somewhat disappointed that the bill is not as definite as we had hoped it might be and also that it only deals with the slaughter of animals which will be sold on an interprovincial or international basis. I presume that is because of the fact that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) and his department have decided that it is not possible for the federal government to introduce legislation dealing with the slaughter of animals for consumption strictly within a province.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member but actually this legislation will cover the great proportion of the meat consumed within a particular province, something over 80 per cent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I am sorry but I cannot allow the minister to speak because if he does other than ask a question he will close the debate.

Mr. Harkness: I am sorry. I did not want an incorrect impression to be conveyed by what the hon. member had just said.

Mr. Winch: I appreciate very much the information that has been given although it rather strikes me as not quite understandable that in a province like Alberta or British Columbia over 80 per cent of the animals killed will be covered but will not be consumed within British Columbia or Alberta. However, if the minister says that I must accept it. I am glad he has said that 80 per cent of all animals killed—

Mr. Harkness: I will explain it when I close the debate.

Mr. Winch: That is fine. I only wish we could make it 100 per cent instead of 80 per cent. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that it has not been possible for the minister to bring in something more definite in the legislation as to the methods to be used which the government maintains will bring about the humane slaughter of food animals.

Quite honestly, Mr. Speaker, I think it is rather regrettable that in Canada we should be one of the last of the countries of the world that still—as it has in the past—to some extent uses outdated methods of slaughtering animals for food consumption. In the course of years as an elected member I have been through slaughter-houses in Canada. On the visits I made in order to try to become a better member by understanding how things were done it always disturbed me to see hogs hoisted up by a logging chain, have their throats slit and perhaps not be dead before they went into the boiling vat. I myself have seen a calf hoisted up by one leg by a logging chain, when the logging chain slipped and the calf came down on its head.

Because of those things which I have seen personally on inspections of slaughter-houses and because of other things I have been told by members of the packinghouse union who work in slaughter-houses, I am very grateful that at long last something is going to be done. But in view of the experiences in European countries where for a number of years different methods have been used and conclusions have been arrived at I should like to know why it is not possible to outline in legislation that a humane method of slaughter of animals for food consumption can be done by captive bolt, by the concussion stunner or by anaesthetic.

If they have proved successful in other countries, are they not now acceptable here or has any study been made of their use in view of the fact that in Scandinavian countries in particular these methods have been used for years and, as far as I know, have been declared to be a humane method. I should like to know why they are not named as methods in the act with a proviso that by order in council a different method could be put into effect if something new, different and better were discovered and found applicable.

I must admit that I was very much interested in and somewhat disturbed by the remarks made by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl). There is no one in this house or in this country who will take any action to interfere with anyone's religious beliefs or rituals. The hon. member for Cartier really disturbed me when he made mention of a reported statement of a rabbi from the United States to the effect that the introduction of legislation in the United States or in Canada was the first move toward a dictatorship leading to anti-Semitism.

Mr. Crestohl: Could be.

Mr. Winch: I read the same article. I say, Mr. Speaker, that I regret, with all the respect that I have for him, that the hon. member for Cartier should quote a rabbi from the United States—and a similar statement has been made in Canada—that the introduction of legislation for the humane slaughter of animals is the first attack on Jewish nationals. That is an approach that I hoped never to hear in this House of Commons.

Mr. Crestohl: Could be.

Mr. Winch: I know exactly what the hon. member had in mind. It may be that that was the first approach that was made by Hitler. Therefore, on the basis of the speech made only two days ago, I think it was, we in the United States and Canada should not consider legislation on the humane slaughter of animals because it might be the same approach which was used by Hitler and which led to the unfortunate incidents which happened in that country.

In this country every person's religion is his own. That is one of the great things of our country. Every person's beliefs are his own. But I hope the time will never come when we in this House of Commons are going to be governed in our decisions on the treatment of animals on the basis of whether the introduction of legislation on humane slaughter might mean something that happened under Hitler. We can deal with matters in our own democracy in our own way.

As I said, I was sorry to hear the hon. member for Cartier speak as he did. I thought the hon. member for Cartier had more trust in the Canadian parliament and in the Canadian people than to use that as an argument in opposition to this bill or in asking that some changes be made in it. May I say this, Mr. Speaker, because I always believe in being blunt and honest. This bill is described as an act to provide for the humane slaughter of animals. Being plain and being honest, may I say that I cannot understand any religion or any belief that has in connection with the killing of animals a ritual which is not humane.

The hon. member for Cartier maintained, not only by quoting records but by the fourth commandment which he quoted, that their ritual is humane. If so, they are covered under this act. The act makes it clear, although I am not satisfied as to how far it goes. The fact is that details are not set forth. However, it does make it clear that regulations shall be established by order in council under certain authority as to methods of killing. Therefore if the hon. member for Cartier is sincere—as I know he is—and if he is correct —and that I do not know because I have never seen a Jewish ritual killing—then he is covered under this bill because it says that under regulation, if it is humane, it shall be allowable.

I think the hon. member for Cartier is covered on that score and is covered on his own statement. But if there are those in our country who have a ritual which says an animal shall not be killed humanely, I have no hesitation in saying that perhaps they should be governed by legislation. But the bill does not cover the hon. member nor his people, in view of what he himself has said.

In principle we support the bill. We have always fought and talked for this bill. It does not go as far as we should like it to go, but it is a start and a start is always welcome. We will without any hesitation support this bill and we look forward to the regulations being introduced as soon as possible so as to enable the industry to comply with humane slaughter. I know, Mr. Speaker, that irrespective of race or religion no regulations will ever be introduced that will in any way interfere with one's religion as long as his religion is humanity to animals as well as to human beings.

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, my remarks in support of the principle of this bill will be most brief indeed. I was inclined, as a matter of fact, before you mentioned my constituency to take my seat in favour of the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken). It is about her and other hon. members in this house and the vast numbers of people across this country that I would like to speak for a moment at this stage in the debate.

There are fewer bills or fewer measures which have come before this house in my experience which have attracted wider comment and interest from among virtually all sections and levels of our society. I have received some thousands of letters through 1957 and 1958, as I know have many other hon. members in this house. As I mentioned, I am going to speak for the hon. member for York-Humber, and also the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Kucherepa), the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) and of course our friend the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker), who has just resumed his seat. The amount of work which has gone into research and study in connection with this bill on the part of the hon. members I have just mentioned, and many other hon. members in other parties in the house, is unique in my experience.

Again, I would simply like to add my words to those who are speaking in support of the principle of this bill, and in particular to the many thousands of citizens across this country who have given so freely of their time and efforts to resolve this most difficult situation, the solution to which is most long, long overdue, I would add my congratulations.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) has said that we on this side will support the principle of this bill. Because it deals with humane slaughter, I do not see how anyone could oppose such a principle; certainly not myself, who once had the privilege of working in a packinghouse in Chicago, during which I think perhaps I suffered as much as the animals did. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker) has said that this bill is succinct, definite and to the point. It is certainly succinct and it is certainly definite. Whether it is to the point or not I am not so sure. He also said it was an excellent guide to the government, but I fail to see where the government in its wisdom in the promulgation of its orders will get very much guidance from it.

What this bill does, of course, is to give the government the authority under legislation to pass orders in council for the purpose of ensuring humane slaughter of food animals in an establishment, and make regulations respecting the manner of and methods and devices to be employed in the slaughter of food animals in an establishment. In other words, for this particular purpose it authorizes government to act by order in council. Some of us on this side, who in days past used to hear such violent talk of government by order in council, are naturally surprised that the government in a matter of this importance should have adopted this course.

The hon. member for Rosedale said, of course, "Well, the orders in council and the regulations will be tabled. The members can talk about them and complain about them in the speech from the throne debate and on the estimates, if they so desire." But that certainly does not meet the point, Mr. Speaker. So this bill provides government by order in council in this matter, and it is all the more surprising because, as the hon. member for Rosedale said, the committee laboured, and I am sure it did labour, for two years in dealing with this subject. That committee did not produce anything which would justify this kind of limited bill. That committee reported as follows:

—after careful deliberation, submits the following recommendations for incorporation into legislation to provide for the humane slaughter of food animals,—

Not one of those recommendations is incorporated in this bill. So where is the guidance that is to be given to the government in this bill in the promulgation of its regulations? I am at a loss to understand why, if the committee laboured so long and so widely on this matter and produced recommendations, which were adopted, the government did not see fit at least to consider including some of those recommendations in the bill. If they decided that that was not desirable, surely, when parliament is giving the government power by order in council to act in this way to deal with humane slaughter, there should have been a definition of humane slaughter in the bill. The government is being given power by order in council to deal with humane slaughter when humane slaughter is not even defined in the bill.

Therefore, this bill is, we think, inadequate to accomplish the purpose which we all have in mind. While, of course, we support the principle of the bill, when we go into committee we will do our best to add to this bill provisions which will make it far more effective for that purpose than it is certainly at the present time.

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a word or two on this bill. First of all, I would like to commend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) and the agriculture committee for finding a way of legislating on this very difficult subject of humane slaughter of food animals. Ever since coming to the house, and I consider myself a veteran now, I have concerned myself over this very complicated subject. I have concerned myself first because it was something that I believed in personally, and also because I have had literally hundreds of letters from my constituents asking me to speak for them in the House of Commons on this subject.

The same request was put to the previous government, and I think actually it was my first question in the House of Commons. I asked the then minister of justice if he was going to bring in any legislation on this subject. This criticism by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) rather surprises me. He does not think that the bill spells things out enough, yet the previous government sidestepped it every time it was brought up to them because they said it was impossible to bring in such legislation.

As the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) has said, when the present government took office a group of us, mostly from Toronto but some from Vancouver, formed ourselves into a self-appointed committee to study the various ways of humane slaughter and bring suggestions before the Minister of Justice. We discovered, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) had already discovered, that the drawing up of this legislation is a very difficult process. We discovered that some slaughtering devices did harm to meat, while others are so costly as to be almost prohibitive of purchase by the small packing firms. There were other difficulties. One was to find a practical and forceful way of legislating with regard to small slaughtering houses. As the Minister of Justice has said, it is just not good sense to enact legislation which cannot be enforced or which will not receive general public approval.

By the time I came into parliament, public opinion in connection with this matter was definitely aroused and in this regard I should like to pay tribute to the Toronto humane society and also to the Vancouver humane slaughter association. The Toronto humane society took up this question as early as 1948 and they claimed at that time that their main obstacle was the apathy, indifference and even the hostility of the general public. Due, I think, to the crusade conducted by the society, that apathy has now disappeared; it is a thing of the past. As a people we have a great regard for animals and I know this applied to many of our forefathers in Britain, and I think that when the situation was brought to the attention of Canadians they did feel aroused. A letter from the humane slaughter association of British Columbia pointed out that with the passage of legislation in the United States Canada became one of the very few civilized countries which had failed to provide protection for animals slaughtered for food.

There is wide unanimity that such protection is needed and that legislation of this kind had to be brought in. The problem which faced the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Agriculture was not whether or not to bring in this legislation but how to enforce it and how to prepare it in such a way that it was enforceable. Canadian packinghouses were agreeable to the legislation. In fact, one of them, Canada Packers in Toronto, has already put carbon dioxide equipment into all its plants at a cost of almost $250,000. The packinghouse workers union was also in full agreement, and gave its full support to humane slaughter and, certainly, I feel the general public will welcome this legislation and the enactment of Bill No. C-71.

Mr. J. W. Kucherepa (High Park): I should like to say a few words on this subject. First of all, of course, I support the principle of the bill. I have, perhaps, the rare distinction of having been interested in this problem at two levels of government and in looking over my files during the supper hour I noticed, in an extract from the minutes of the local board of health of the city of Toronto, an entry relating to a meeting on April 2, 1957 as follows:

> On a motion by Alderman Kucherepa the board also decided to recommend to the city council that the federal government authorities be requested to consider the endorsation of the principle of humane slaughter as contained in the report of the special humane slaughter committee and to pass as soon as possible the necessary legislation to implement the principle of humane slaughter.

As the previous speaker has pointed out, the former government found the problem insurmountable. It was unable to come up with any kind of answer. When I came to this house in the twenty-third parliament, on the first occasion I spoke, on November 12, 1957, I referred to this problem of humane slaughter of food animals. I pointed out at that time, as the previous speaker has just done, that Canada was one of the few countries left in the civilized world which had not produced some type of legislation to deal with this matter.

There is, I believe, unanimity of opinion with regard to the necessity of legislating for humane slaughter of food animals, and without going into details at this stage, may I say I think this legislation will be one more of those progressive steps that this parliament has taken, and I believe that in the end it will work out to everybody's satisfaction.

Mr. Hayden Stanton (Leeds): When the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) referred this subject of humane slaughter to the committee on agriculture and colonization he asked me to take all the time that was necessary to procure whatever information and evidence that could be procured concerning the humane slaughter of animals. This the committee did, and the report which has been presented to the house makes it clear that dozens of witnesses were brought in from across Canada to give evidence before the committee.

These witnesses were called and, as the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker) has stated, as soon as the people of this country were aware of the fact that the subject of humane slaughter had been placed before the agriculture committee hundreds of letters flowed in from organizations, municipal councillors and individuals across Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. This illustrates the degree of interest which was taken in the subject.

After listening to the evidence which was presented, it was the considered opinion of the committee that schechita, or the Hebrew method of slaughter, was perfectly humane. Not only that, but it was considered it should come under the jurisdiction of the meat inspection branch and not under the Criminal Code, because members of the committee realized that if it were to come under the Criminal Code it could not be supervised effectively and the act could not be implemented as efficiently as it could if the responsibility were given to the meat inspection branch.

I might add that from the evidence given by the packinghouses and others it appeared that 80 per cent of the slaughtering across Canada would come under the jurisdiction of the meat inspection branch and that the other 20 per cent would come under the Criminal Code. Members of the humane societies are taking the responsibility of seeing to it that as far as possible any slaughtering which does not come under the meat inspection branch will be carried on in as humane a manner as possible.

I believe this bill is one that interests every individual across this country. I also believe the bill will meet the requests of those who have sponsored the cause of more humane slaughter of animals. It is my opinion that had some of the recommendations contained in the report of the committee presented to the house been spelled out specifically in this measure it would not have served a good cause. This bill is something new. We have not had legislation like it before. It may have been that had we spelled out a method of humane slaughter of animals in this measure, six months from now another way would have been discovered that would be far superior and with it spelled out specifically in the bill it would have been necessary to carry on the former way of slaughter until the next session of parliament when the legislation could be amended.

I think perhaps the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) is a little too suspicious. As I sat here this evening and listened to his remarks I concluded that he was taking the same position as had been taken by many hon. members on the opposition side from Newfoundland during the discussion of the bill concerning Newfoundland grants. They were suspicious of the government and it occurred to me that the hon. member for Cartier is also suspicious of the government and the Department of Agriculture. I assure the hon. gentleman that this government has the confidence of the people. I believe it was last Friday that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that the regulations would conform with recommendations of the committee as presented to this house. I can say to the hon. member for Cartier that I am satisfied that those regulations will conform to the recommendations of the committee.

My remarks are few because it has always been my considered opinion that one should not spend 35 minutes building up to what he could have said within the space of five minutes. That has been the way hon. members of this house, especially those on the opposition side, have conducted themselves during this session of parliament in that they have spent many hours of time in needless discussion. A great saving in time could have been made if they had come down to brass tacks and said right off the bat what they intended to say.

This bill will serve a good purpose. It is something for which the people have been asking for many years. This government is to be congratulated for having brought this bill before the house in this session.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I promise the house I will not answer the general remarks of the last speaker about the conduct of the opposition during this session of parliament. I do not know that this subject is germane to the bill now before us but in any event I can assure him a very effective answer could be given on that subject. I do not want the hon. gentleman to assume from my silence that I do not think such an answer could be given.

It has been assumed by hon. members who have been speaking on second reading that the principle of this bill is to provide for the humane slaughter of food animals. The bill is entitled "An Act to Provide for the Humane Slaughter of Food Animals" and the first clause of the bill reads:

> This act may be cited as the Humane Slaughter of Food Animals Act.

It is quite obvious that the purpose of the bill is to provide for the humane slaughter of food animals but it is interesting that when you seek to find the principle of the bill by the ordinary method of reading it you find nothing at all about the humane slaughter of food animals. Clause 1 gives the name of the bill. Clause 2 gives a number of definitions. Clause 3 provides for the prohibition on people exporting meat out of a province or out of Canada unless slaughtered in certain plants. Clause 4 gives arbitrary power to the governor in council to make regulations. Clause 5 deals with some penalties for people who break those regulations. Clause 6 deals with some powers of inspectors. The principle of the measure is not discernible from a reading of the bill. However, I assume that the principle is to provide for the humane slaughter of food animals and on that assumption I welcome and support the bill as I believe do hon. members in all quarters of the house.

The first problem the committee had to deal with was what method of legislating should be adopted. There were two methods possible. One was by further amending the Criminal Code which already contains one clause somewhat related to the subject. The other method was by legislating so as to control the operation within the slaughtering establishments over which the federal parliament has jurisdiction. It has to be borne in mind that ordinarily the slaughtering of animals would be a matter of provincial jurisdiction and the only method by which the federal parliament has jurisdiction is by controlling the establishments in which the slaughtering of animals which go into trade between the provinces or out of the country is carried out.

It was quite clear in the committee that such establishments handle something over 80 per cent of all food animals slaughtered in Canada. There are several reasons why I believe that the appropriate method to adopt was by dealing with this subject outside of the Criminal Code. I do not think I need elaborate on that point and I believe the committee was unanimous on it.

The best method is by controlling these establishments. I believe that we should not interfere with matters which are within the jurisdiction of the provinces. While I regret that it is not possible to provide proper legislation that would cover 100 per cent of the animals slaughtered, I believe the same results will in the end be accomplished by providing legislation governing the methods of slaughter used in the plants under federal regulation. I think the committee's recommendation on that point has been accepted. While it is true that technically we are not legislating by way of amendment to the Meat Inspection Act, certainly this bill is so closely related to it that no one could take objection on that point. It is so integrated with the Meat Inspection Act there could be no objection whatever on that point.

I believe the method of approaching the problem by a means other than amending the Criminal Code is the correct method in all the circumstances and I hope that as time goes on the provinces will bring forward appropriate legislation governing the plants that operate under their jurisdiction.

I am very much concerned with two main points in this legislation. Perhaps, in order to make myself clear on these two points, I should deal with the committee report which was presented to this house and which appeared in Votes and Proceedings of June 16. The first paragraph of the report deals with the reference; the second paragraph deals with the list of witnesses heard and it is indeed a very imposing list. The third paragraph deals merely with the evidence that the committee heard. The fourth paragraph deals with the submissions of suggestions made with respect to the methods of dealing with legislation on this subject. The fifth paragraph of the report notes that federal legislation under the Meat Inspection Act covers government inspected plants which perform approximately 80 per cent of the slaughtering of food animals in Canada. The sixth paragraph recommends this method of legislation on the subject. I want to draw the attention of the house to the seventh paragraph. It goes on to say:

> Your committee, after careful deliberation submits the following recommendations for incorporation into legislation to provide for the humane slaughter of food animals.

Then follows several subparagraphs to that seventh paragraph: (a) dealing with certain conditions in the plants; (b) with certain practices in handling the animals immediate to preslaughter; (c) dealing with certain things that should be considered humane methods of slaughter and included in that, incidentally, is the finding that the schechita, or the Hebrew method of slaughter, is humane. Then (d) deals with humane methods of preslaughter. Paragraph 8 suggests that the operation of the proposed law be postponed to give the persons affected the opportunity to equip themselves to carry out the legislation. I think the minister dealt with this last point in his opening remarks.

The points I wish to make are these. First of all, I regret very much that the bill does not define humane slaughter. We are supposed to be legislating to provide for humane slaughter of food animals, but in the bill we say nothing at all about what humane slaughter is or is not. There are two or three ways of defining humane slaughter. One is by a list including methods of slaughtering that are humane and excluding other methods that are not. There is no declaration or definition in the bill of what constitutes humane slaughter at all and in my judgment that is a defect in the bill. Indeed, on that point, the house is asked to turn over to the governor in council, if the purpose of the act is to be accomplished at all, the right to determine what is humane slaughter.

It is perfectly obvious that there must be regulations to provide what devices shall be used and shall not be used, and certain details of handling and equipment; but surely parliament ought in the legislation to declare or provide what is humane slaughter. Reference was made by the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken) to the legislation that was passed by the United States last year. I am very much interested to know that in the second section of that bill this very point is dealt with. In the first section there is a somewhat general reference, something analogous to what we would call a preamble, and the very first matter of substance dealt with is the point as to what is humane and what is not humane, the very thing that this legislation does not do. I am very critical of the government on this point because our legislation is defective in that it fails to do that. Then, there is the other objection to the failure to do that. We are turning over to the governor in council the right to do that, something that surely is the responsibility of parliament and properly belongs to parliament.

Finally, without extending the argument, I was most disappointed to hear my colleague, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker), use the argument he did about arbitrary powers by regulation. Surely that is not an answer to the point at all. Surely on matters of principle parliament should be the one to legislate. It is not good enough merely to say that an hon. member can mention the subject at some time in subsequent years in a general debate. That is not a good enough answer. This giving of arbitrary power is a wrong principle; it is quite unnecessary here in this aspect of this legislation and it is not to be defended.

I wish the minister would deal with the point because, so far as I am aware, all other legislation on the subject has dealt with that point. I could be wrong on that. Undoubtedly the minister has studied more extensively the subject than I have but certainly the United States does provide for it in the bill itself, and certainly it ought to be provided for here. I am aware of no practical reason why it is not provided for in this bill and indeed, particularly in view of the fact that the committee which I think I can can say fairly was remarkably objective in its work—I think that is a proper reference to my colleagues of the committee—did try to work out something that would be satisfactory and did definitely recommend for incorporation in the legislation certain matters that involved definition of humane slaughter.

I am a little mystified as to why the minister and the government did not follow the recommendations of the committee. I am rather of the impression that the government as a whole is of the opinion that in this legislation it followed the recommendations of the committee. I am reinforced in that view by the remark made by the house leader when he was indicating the legislation the other night when he said so in so many words, and by a reference made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when the bill was given first reading. I think they indicated quite clearly that the government was of the opinion that the bill did follow the recommendations of the committee. I regret very much that it does not.

The second point I want to make reference to with respect to this bill is that Canadians generally, and I think properly so, have taken pride in the fact that Canadians as a whole have attained and preserved in this country a very high degree of religious freedom. I think all Canadians, and all members of parliament on both sides of the house, hold that view. The slaughter of food animals is a religious ritual with certain religious groups. In this bill now before us we have not put in any provision to protect that principle that I think all hon. members of the house assert. It just is not in the bill but instead the bill as submitted authorizes the governor in council to make regulations which could—and I do not for a minute suggest that the governor in council would do it—and are capable of taking away the religous freedom of religious groups in our country.

That is something that I do not think hon. members wish to do. I am somewhat at a loss to understand why that principle was not protected in the bill submitted to the house. I take the strongest possible objection to the omission from the bill of these two very important matters if the bill is to have any purpose or meaning at all. The first is the failure to define humane slaughter by some method, and there are two or three methods that can be used. The second is the fact that the bill provides in its present form for the governor in council to make regulations which might take away the religious freedom of whole religious groups. There is no protection for them at all in the bill. I do not see why that was done, particularly in view of the finding in the committee report that schechita is humane.

In view of that finding in the report, and I believe the committee was unanimous on the point, it is my view that the government may be stumbling into doing something they did not intend to do by reason of their failure to adopt any definition of humane slaughter. They may have inadvertently stumbled into doing something that I really think they did not intend to do at all in the drafting of this legislation. I should like to ask the minister to consider these two points and to insert into the bill at the committee stage provisions that will cover them because I feel they are very important.

I will give the government credit. I very often hit them hard but I will give them credit for not having improper motives. I think their motives were probably of the very best and that it is a matter of inadvertence in the drafting. There may be some other reason but I am inclined to think that it was a case of inadvertence in the drafting and not appreciating these points. At least I am charitable enough to hope that was the case and to hope that they will be taken care of at the committee stage. If I interpret the principle of the bill correctly, as being to provide for the humane slaughter of food animals, I am certainly in accord with its purpose.

(Translation):

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I shall take two minutes of hon. members' time to say a few words in connection with this bill.

First of all, I must tell you that I know what slaughter means, in my own language, but I was not aware that one could slaughter humanely. I find I think it is a rather interesting title to give this legislation: "A humane way to slaughter animals". Of course, I agree with the principle of the bill if we want to introduce, in our methods of slaughtering animals, some form of euthanasia which would enable them to leave this world without too much suffering. However, what I find harder to agree with, Mr. Speaker, is the means of administering the legislation's aims as conceived by the government when introducing this bill.

I unconditionally support the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) when he says that it is unfortunate that the government did not have the intelligence to specify what is meant by the humane slaughter of animals.

We have been accustomed to hearing criticism from the former members of the opposition who, today, are cabinet ministers. We have become accustomed to their habit of including, in the various measures they bring down, quite arbitrary powers conferred upon the ministers. They were very critical of this sort of thing when we were in power, but now that they sit on the government benches, this principle does not seem in the least objectionable to them.

I don't know what methods the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) will decide upon in applying this legislation called "an act to provide for the humane slaughter of food animals" but I warn him of the heavy risk of doing much harm to small slaughter-houses and small industries.

Something which amused me—perhaps I should not say it amused me, because it has been going on since 1857—is that the committee of agriculture and colonization, before which all kinds of experts have appeared, had among its members my colleague, the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Brassard). Mr. Brassard owns a slaughter-house in Chicoutimi and the thought never occurred to anyone to invite him to give evidence before the committee in order to ask him to express his opinion about this bill. But, after all, he is but a member of parliament. Why should he have been called as a witness?

An hon. Member: He is not a Liberal.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): No, he is not a Liberal, but strange as it may seem he is a man with common sense.

Mr. Speaker, another provision which surprises me, is the six months' to a year's imprisonment provided for those who fail to comply with the law. There again, that surprises me enormously. I fully understand that a fine of $500 or $2,000 may be imposed on a man who breaks the regulations, but I hardly understand why a human being should be imprisoned for having broken regulations governing the slaughter of animals.

However, Mr. Speaker, the main point which I should like to emphasize before I resume my seat, is the possibility of harming the small industry in our province. I am not speaking on behalf of the other provinces—I don't know what conditions prevail there—but I would imagine they are largely the same as in our province. I am sure that if the government is not careful in drawing up its regulations—in keeping with its arbitrary way of doing things—it will cause great harm to our small industry. If the Minister of Agriculture has any idea of the regulations he is about to enact, I would ask him to tell me what he thinks about that danger.

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I must advise the house that if the Minister of Agriculture speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Be brief.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think most members of the house will agree—certainly I have never had any other idea in my mind—that the bill is a thoroughly non-partisan measure. As a matter of fact, the speeches which have been made from both sides of the house have indicated agreement with the principle of the bill and with the idea that there should be some legislation respecting humane slaughter. Therefore I think that demonstrates the fact that the bill is not a party matter in any way. It is a government bill because it is the responsibility of the government to deal with matters of this kind. Therefore I was somewhat sorry, shall I say, that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and other members of the Liberal party should introduce a partisan attitude in connection with the bill and start making accusations that the government was taking arbitrary power, that the government was attempting to rule by order in council under the provisions of the bill, and things of that sort.

As I see the bill, I have always considered it—and I think most other people have done the same—as an entirely non-partisan matter. Certainly there is no idea in any way to take arbitrary powers or to attempt to rule by order in council through this bill. The only criticisms there seem to be over the bill are two in number. One is that the bill should be in a somewhat different form from that in which it is. The Leader of the Opposition, I think it was, said that this is government by order in council and the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) said that this was arbitrary power being exercised and so on. As a matter of fact, I think everybody who has ever had anything to do with the matter of providing legislation to deal with humane slaughter recognizes the fact that it is an extremely difficult matter to deal with. I imagine that the reason that the previous government never got around to introducing a bill to deal with this matter was the very fact of the difficulties that it presented, including difficulties of definition, difficulties as to the way in which to do it, and in fact difficulties of all kinds.

We have been attempting to bring in a bill providing for humane slaughter since we first came into power some two years ago. Hon. members will perhaps recall that we introduced a bill in the first session in 1957. When it was introduced it was stated that it was introduced so that it could be studied and so that people concerned with and interested in the matter could make representations as to whether they thought it was a reasonable bill and a proper way in which to deal with the matter. The same bill was reintroduced in the next session which was the session prior to this one. Then all kinds of objections came about it. That bill was in the form of an amendment to the Criminal Code. It became quite apparent that there was no means at all of getting any sort of agreement on that particular bill or a bill like it. As a result of that discovery we sent this whole matter for study to the committee on agriculture and colonization. That committee studied the matter, as has been indicated, over a long period of time and with great care and they brought in certain recommendations. This bill is intended to carry into effect and it will carry into effect the recommendations of that committee.

The statement has been made many times today that it is not carrying into effect the recommendations of the committee. Everybody in this house knows that every bill dealing with matters that require any sort of detailed regulations have a provision that regulations may be made covering various points or covering the matter dealt with. Every bill has a provision of that sort. This particular bill provides that regulations may be made for the purpose of ensuring humane slaughtering of animals in establishments, regulations respecting the manner of slaughter and the methods and the devices to be employed in slaughtering food animals in establishments. I can assure the house now that the recommendations of the committee in connection with that matter and the opinions expressed in the committee will be followed out in as complete detail as possible in drawing up these regulations and ensuring that the findings of the committee or the opinions expressed by the committee are carried into effect.

The complaint was made by the hon. member for Ottawa West, the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl), and I think the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), although I am not sure of that, that in this act there is not a definition of humane slaughter. I have never yet seen a satisfactory definition of humane slaughter. Every definition which has been proposed has certainly met with considerable objection. It is a practical impossibility to give a definition of humane slaughter which you can put into legislative form in an act. The only practical way of dealing with that matter is to have a long list spelling out in detail the things which can be done and which are accepted as humane and the things which cannot be done and which are held to be inhumane. Things of that sort are things which can be covered in regulations. Those are things which regulations are meant to cover. They are not the sort of things which should fill up page after page of a bill of this kind. That is the reason why the bill is in this form.

In addition to that, I am given to understand that the committee paid some attention to a sort of model bill or draft bill to deal with this matter; and the type of bill which I believe the committee looked at, which they considered to be satisfactory, is exactly this type of bill. The whole purpose is, as I say, to carry into effect the recommendations of the committee and that is going to be done.

There is only one other point that I think I should mention. The hon. member for Cartier and I think the hon. member—

Mr. McIlraith: Will the minister permit a question before he leaves the subject of the draft bill before the committee?

Mr. Harkness: All right.

Mr. McIlraith: Would he give us some reference showing where that was dealt with? I want to get that point clarified. Would he not agree that no draft bill was dealt with by the committee, that one was submitted when his colleague was dealing with the type of legislation, that is whether by Criminal Code or by the control of slaughtering establishments under federal jurisdiction, and that bill was withdrawn from the consideration of the committee.

Mr. Harkness: I was not in the committee. I do not know exactly what went on in the committee. However, my understanding was that a bill very similar to this one was considered in the committee and that the committee was favourable to a bill of that kind. In any event the only practical type of bill which we found could be introduced is the type of bill that has been introduced.

As I have said, this is a matter on which there have been discussions for years; and up to the present time it has not been possible to find any type of legislation which it was thought would be practical and workable and which would deal with the matter. We think that this type of legislation will meet all those requirements and will ensure that humane slaughtering methods do prevail in this country.

The hon. member for Cartier and the hon. member for Ottawa West raised the question as to whether there might be some infringement of religious rights as far as this bill is concerned. Nothing is further from the minds of the government or anybody on this side of the house or, I would think, anybody in this chamber. I can see no way in which any religious rights will be infringed by this bill. As I have indicated, the regulations which will be drawn up will be in accordance with the recommendations made by the committee on agriculture and all rights as far as ritual slaughter is concerned will be preserved in accordance with the recommandations made, number 7 of which states:

Humane methods of slaughter shall be deemed to include—

(ii) schechita (the Hebrew term for slaughter) as practised in compliance with Hebrew religious requirements;

As I say, why any question should be raised on this matter is something I do not understand. There is absolutely no reason why any question along that line should be raised on this matter is something I do not is any question whatsoever that anybody's religious rights, liberties or anything else along that line are in danger in any way whatever by this bill.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) raised the question really as to how it could be that 80 per cent of the animals slaughtered will be covered by this bill. In any particular province that might not be 80 per cent. It might be more than 80 per cent in one province and in another province it might be less than 80 per cent. But in Canada as a whole at least 80 per cent of the animals slaughtered will be covered by this bill for the reason that all slaughtering establishments which come under the Meat Inspection Act—which takes in establishments which cover over 80 per cent of the animals slaughtered—will be covered by this legislation.

If one of these establishments does not meet the regulations laid down as provided in clause 3, that institution will not be eligible for meat inspection, and so forth, and therefore they will not be able to ship their products out, and will not be able to have them branded and certified for health purposes. As a matter of fact, that would mean they could not carry on operations, because every one of these plants ships meat to various places all over and has to have this meat inspection in order to stay in business. Therefore the only slaughter not covered by this is slaughtering done on farms by farmers themselves, and in small slaughter-houses where they have just a local trade, and things along that line, and some which have a trade over a small area within a province and therefore do not come under the Meat Inspection Act. But practically all institutions of any size whatever come under the Meat Inspection Act and will, therefore, be covered by this act.

The hon. member for Vancouver East also asked a question. He asked why the methods which have been used successfully in European countries cannot be introduced into this act. There is a considerable amount of argument over whether some of the methods used in European countries are humane and should be authorized or not. There was a committee jointly sponsored by the meat packers' council and the Canadian humane society—I am not sure whether it was the Canadian humane society, but it was some society for the prevention of cruelty to animals—which included one of the veterinarians from the Department of Agriculture, and that committee went over to Europe and visited all these various slaughtering plants, examined these devices and so forth, and their report on some of the methods was not too favourable. That is one of the reasons why we thought some of the methods used over there should not be specified.

As a matter of fact, although there are various methods which we do think are thoroughly humane at the present time, there is no doubt that many more will be added later. It may be that some of these might be considered, at some future time, not as humane as some others which develop. Therefore, in order to carry into effect and keep in effect a thoroughly humane system of slaughtering in this country, it is better not to have something bound down too firmly in the act. We can deal with the matter by regulation by which you are allowed a certain amount of flexibility to deal with new methods as they come along.

Mr. Speaker, there is just one other point which I thought perhaps I should mention. The hon. member for Ottawa West mentioned the United States bill. I would just like to point out to him, although I think perhaps he already knows it, that that bill has no comparison with this bill whatever because it deals only with meat purchased by government agencies.

Mr. McIlraith: That is because it is the only jurisdiction they have.

Mr. Harkness: It is not a bill of general application like this at all; it is a bill which deals only with the meat purchased by the government itself, and therefore there is no comparison between it and this bill. The example which the hon. member for Cartier gave with regard to that bill does not enter into it.

Mr. McIlraith: It is dealt with in clause 2.

Mr. Harkness: But for practical purposes it does not enter into it.

Mr. McIlraith: Will the hon. minister permit a question?

Mr Harkness: All right, go ahead.

Mr. McIlraith: Would he not agree that the United States bill dealt with all slaughtering done over which the federal authority there has jurisdiction, just as our bill here deals with that slaughtering done over which this federal authority has jurisdiction.

Mr. Harkness: I do not know about that. What I do know is that it deals with a very, very small proportion of the slaughtering done in the United States, whereas this bill deals with 80 per cent or more of the slaughtering done in Canada. Therefore the two bills, as I say, do not bear much comparison with one another.

Mr. Speaker, I think they are really all the points which were brought forward, and I would hope that we might go on and get this bill brought into effect without, shall I say, controversy over minor points, rather than the main thing which I think everybody has in mind, and that is to get into effect a practical means of humane slaughter.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I wonder if the minister would permit a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I am sorry; when the minister spoke he closed the debate, but we are going into committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

(Translation):

Mr. Ratelle: Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if it would not have been much better to include in the bill a definition of the word "cruelty", because in fact whenever a food animal is bled or slaughtered, some form of cruelty is inflicted. I would therefore like to know, because just about anybody could be doing this and thus lay himself open to prosecution. That, in my view, is why the bill should define what is understood by "cruelty" or "inhumane slaughter".

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, just a word or two; I was delayed on personal business. I am very pleased to see this legislation come before the house because it has been requested by numbers of organizations and individuals throughout the years. I remember bringing it up in 1956 when the then minister of justice insisted that it was a matter which came within provincial jurisdiction. I want to congratulate the humane societies across Canada for their persistence in seeking this legislation before this parliament, and for their representations before the agriculture and colonization committee. I also want to congratulate the committee. I have read their report and I thought it was a very succinct and purposeful report.

I am very pleased at this legislation. I have been interested in this subject throughout the years, and I am sure it will ensure the more humane slaughtering of animals in Canada than at the present time.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Definitions.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, this bill refers only to certain species of animals, such as cattle, swine, sheep, goats or horses. I must frankly admit I have not attended every meeting of the committee which dealt with the matter of the humane slaughter of animals; as a matter of fact, perhaps I should say that I was not too interested, because I do not believe that at the present time, animals are slaughtered by such inhumane methods.

I worked four years in slaughter-houses as a meat grader, and I am not prepared to say there was any cruelty in the slaughtering methods.

If it is claimed that such inhumane methods are used in the slaughtering of animals, particularly swine, why are not chickens, as well as dogs and cats, mentioned in the bill?

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: There are not many people who I know of living in this country who make a practice of eating cats and dogs. They are not included because they are not looked upon as food animals.

Mr. Boulanger: I asked the minister about chickens and turkeys.

Mr. Harkness: Chickens come under the category of birds rather than food animals and this bill was meant to deal specifically with the ordinary food animals—cattle, sheep, hogs and so forth, not with poultry.

Mr. McIlraith: Since this clause defines the word "establishment" it gives me the opportunity to say something which has not yet been said so far in this discussion and which, I think, ought to be said. It would be quite wrong to have the impression go out that the practices generally used in these establishments with which we are concerned are inhumane. There was considerable evidence that many of the plants and packing firms had a real concern about the subject and were trying to do everything possible to make their practices humane. I wanted to say that because persons reading this debate might otherwise assume that the committee found inhumane practices virtually universal in the plants. I think the minister would agree it is proper to say that.

Now I want to ask the minister one or two questions. First, in connection with the point I raised on second reading, there are two or three methods of dealing with it but one of them would be to define the term "humane slaughter" in this clause of the bill. Would the minister not consider including a definition in this clause? Does the hon. gentleman know of any other legislation in any jurisdiction in the western world where humane slaughter is not dealt within the legislation either by way of definition or in a special clause?

Mr. Harkness: Certainly as far as we in Canada are concerned I know of no definition of humane slaughter which is satisfactory to everybody concerned with this matter, and therefore I do not know of any definition which I could introduce into this bill.

Mr. McIlraith: But surely there are two ways of bringing in a definition. There is the exclusive method and there is the other method of determining certain practices which are deemed to be humane and others which are not. This is a non-exclusive definition but it has a great deal of virtue about it because it is a practical method of approaching the problem and accomplishing the purpose desired. I would point out to the minister that all the legislation I have seen on this subject in the western world provides in the enactment something which is a guide to what is considered by the legislative body as being humane slaughter. Having said that, I want to ask the minister why in the absence of anything better he did not use what the committee of which he has spoken so highly specifically recommended to this house.

Mr. Harkness: The committee did not recommend that any definition of humane slaughter should be written into the bill.

Mr. Small: Following on those lines, may I remind the committee that when this bill was first introduced it was placed on the order paper by the Minister of Justice in ample time for the sole purpose of enabling everyone interested in it to make representations and complaints or objections. One of the difficulties encountered by the committee was that the representatives of the humane societies, the packinghouses and others who appeared before us found it very hard to agree on precisely what did constitute humane methods of slaughter. Then we found that some of the larger packing stations did have effective machinery but its high price put it beyond the reach of the smaller concerns. In all the circumstances, we found it was almost impossible to define what humane slaughter is.

Nevertheless, the humane societies have been anxious for this legislation to be enacted, they have been demanding it for a long time and, finally, we have something we believe will be effective. If it is proven to be unsatisfactory, we can correct shortcomings as we go on. I would remind hon. members that this is not a partisan proposition. This is an effort to solve a problem which many people regard as extremely important and, as I say, amendments can always be made to improve the act in the light of experience gained.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the minister has completely missed the point of discussion on humane slaughter. We are not dealing with the question of devices because that obviously has to be handled by regulation. No one is suggesting otherwise, that I know of. The point which has been under consideration is that no guidance whatever on the principle of this bill is given by parliament, and everything is to be determined by the governor in council. That is wholly the wrong way to proceed and, as I have pointed out already, all the legislation I have seen on this subject—including, incidentally, the Criminal Code amendment which was put forward as a proposed amendment to section 387 of the Criminal Code by the government itself, and which was very specific in containing a partial definition—did attempt to make its purpose clear in the legislation itself. I admit that the definition cannot be exclusive, but surely one could be provided. Of course, there must be regulations in the act dealing with devices and so on. But there is this big gap to be filled. The subject of this legislation is mentioned in the name of the act; thereafter it is not dealt with in the legislation, but merely turned over to the governor in council. It is a thoroughly wrong principle and proceeding. The governor in council should be given power only to make regulations for the carrying out of the act, but the act should define what parliament was seeking to do.

Mr. Harkness: In response to these allegations that this is government by order in council I can only say that this bill is really on all fours with the Meat Inspection Act and numerous others dealing with agricultural matters passed by the former government which are very brief acts and which have appended to them a thick volume of regulations. These are complex matters that have to be gone into in great detail and the only practical way of dealing with these questions is by means of regulations.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I believe we should look at this bill as legislators at this point. We are legislating law. We admit we are legislating a law that is only 80 per cent applicable. I believe most lawyers would agree that as a theory in law that is bad. You cannot legislate for a section, portion or a certain classification of the community. The law is for everybody. I am somewhat disturbed by the fact that the bill leaves 20 per cent of the people free to slaughter by inhumane methods. They cannot be prosecuted under the terms of this bill for slaughtering inhumanely. I believe that is a bad philosophy and theory.

We can state in the regulations that slaughtering animals by certain inhumane methods is a contravention of the law but it is only a contravention for some and not for others. I would ask the minister to consider the matter carefully in an attempt to find a way of making the law applicable to everybody in Canada. I realize the difficulty and we discussed it in the committee but as lawmakers I believe we are in error when we try to legislate for 80 per cent of the people only.

I was looking at the offences outlined in the bill. It is an odd thing but a man can commit an offence as defined here and will not be prosecuted if the offence is not committed in an establishment as defined in the act. We debated that in committee, too. I urged the minister to attempt to devise legislation in some form that will be applicable to all Canadians.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I can only say that this great principle of law which the hon. member for Cartier has been trying to expound as being highly desirable has been noticeably absent in most of the legislation brought forward by the former government during its 22 years in office, the government of which he was a supporter. This is true of practically all agricultural acts. For example, the Meat Inspection Act to which we have just referred applies only to meat slaughtered in certain establishments taking in about 80 per cent of the total. The labour laws as far as the Canadian government is concerned apply only to those people working on railways, elevators and things of that sort which come under federal jurisdiction. As a matter of fact the Railway Act does not apply to the P.G.E. railway which is entirely within the province of British Columbia. The principle the hon. member is trying to establish applies to very few laws that are passed. The only law I know of to which it really applies is the Criminal Code.

Mr. Caron: I am always surprised to hear the minister refer to the conduct of the former administration as justification for the action taken by his government. I may point out to him that his government was elected to change everything that was done in the last 22 years but his government has not done so yet. There is not even a definition in the bill.

Before I proceed I wish to state I do not believe there is any real danger to the religious beliefs of anyone arising out of the bill as presently framed and we should rest at ease on that point but I feel it should be amended so it would be clearer and satisfy those who have reasonable grounds for suspicion on the subject.

The following paragraphs are taken from the report of the committee which dealt with this bill:

> Humane methods of slaughter shall be deemed to include
> (i) shooting,
> (ii) schechita (the Hebrew term for slaughter) as practised in compliance with Hebrew religious requirements;
> Humane methods of pre-slaughter shall be deemed to include
> (i) stunning with a mechanical stunner,
> (ii) certain electrical stunning methods,
> (iii) the use of anaesthetizing agents.

If this were included in the bill as a definition it would satisfy the fears of the people who are presently concerned about the matter. Both the Jewish and Mohammedan peoples have special methods of killing animals that are somewhat similar. The Mohammedans open the main artery in the throat and consider this to be a very good method of killing animals. The hon. member for Ottawa West asked if it was the intention to introduce an amendment to this effect and the minister did not seem prepared to propose such an amendment. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa West:

> That clause 2 be amended by adding thereto another subsection (d) to read as follows:
> Humane methods of slaughter shall be deemed to include:
> (1) shooting
> (2) schechita (the Hebrew term for slaughter) as practised in compliance with Hebrew religious requirements.
> Humane methods of pre-slaughter shall be deemed to include:
> (1) stunning with a mechanical stunner,
> (2) certain electrical stunning methods,
> (3) the use of anaesthetizing agents.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 19; nays, 57.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I was misunderstood or if I did not explain myself clearly when I mentioned poultry. What puzzles me is that this bill proposes to establish humane slaughtering methods for hogs, cattle, sheep, goats or horses, and does not cover poultry.

I suggest that if particular humane methods are to be employed in slaughtering animals, all of them should be covered.

Moreover, in considering the bill as a whole, we find that it makes no sense, practically speaking, for slaughter-houses in general.

As I said a moment ago, I am a little familiar with slaughtering methods because I have worked in many slaughtering-houses where I was an inspector, and I never felt that animals were being slaughtered inhumanely. Instead of taking up so much time as was done by the committee of agriculture and colonization in considering that question, consideration should have been given to ways of preventing animals from devouring humans.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, all I can say to that is that the committee which considered this matter did not recommend that poultry should be included because, as I understand it, they felt that the present methods, as far as poultry are concerned, are satisfactory.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Compliance with regulations prescribing manner of slaughter.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, section 3 reads:

> No person shall export out of Canada, or send or convey from one province to another, any meat product prepared in an establishment unless
> (a) the food animal from which the meat product was derived was slaughtered in the manner prescribed by the regulations—

Of course, Mr. Chairman, we do not know the regulations yet, and I think we are still far from being informed about them, for the good reason that nobody seems to know what they will be like. Reference has been made to new methods of slaughter but none has been suggested. I wonder if small local slaughter-houses, which have a capital of $25,000, $50,000 or $75,000 will be able to pay for the cost of new facilities when the new regulations are enforced. The hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken) mentioned some facilities in Toronto which had cost $250,000. If owners of small packing plants are forced to set up new devices for the slaughtering of animals, I am afraid the cost will be too high and their business will no longer pay.

Mr. Chairman, as we are considering the various sections of the bill, I find that there is no sense to it. I believe the minister should consider putting off the passing of this legislation until the next session, so that we may study and suggest appropriate methods for packing plants including the small local slaughter-houses.

Mr. Flynn: You could have voted against the bill on second reading.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say that the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska has just indicated he is against the legislation. He says it should not be passed; it should be held over. He has recited all the arguments which were made for years as to why it was impossible to bring in a humane slaughter bill. I think the time has passed for that. On second reading he had an opportunity to give the reasons why he was against the general principle of the bill. He did not do it on second reading. I do not think he should go on now to make the various arguments against the principle of the bill.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I have a feeling that the minister has not understood me. I did say at the beginning of my remarks that I was not opposed to the bill. I am not opposed to the principle of the bill, but to the lack of explanations with regard to the methods that will be applied.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. McIlraith: I have just one matter here. I think the minister would not want to leave a wrong impression. He said a moment ago the reason that the committee did not deal with the slaughter of poultry was that they found the present methods humane. That is not quite accurate. The reason they did not deal with that subject was that the reference to the committee dealt only with food animals and poultry are not animals; therefore the committee did not deal with the subject at all. I think I am stating that as a fact and I think the minister's remarks should be corrected for the record.

I want to point out as briefly as I can on clause 4 that what parliament is doing here is giving the governor in council power that would enable it to interfere with and take away certain religious freedoms practised in this country. I find that to be a repugnant thing to do. The reason that that can be done under this clause is that the minister has failed to delineate what is humane slaughter, or even to adopt the amendment which did provide that certain religious practices were found to be humane. I am not for a minute suggesting the government would take away religious freedom; far from it. But I am pointing out that this committee is giving the governor in council power to do that very thing and I am quite sure that that is repugnant to all members on all sides of the house who think about the subject.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that on this matter of regulations I am not particularly worried that governor in council will be making them. I am very interested not only in humane slaughtering of animals but in other matters. I think one of the major accomplishments of the committee in the work that it did was in bringing out some of the problems that were connected with packing plants. This was in relation to the fact that platforms are improper, ramps are not suitably built for the animals they are slaughtering. The matter of hoisting received a great deal of attention from the committee and the fact that the shackles being used on animals were probably more inhumane than the most brutal method of killing. They were more inhumane than some of the methods of handling these animals. I would have liked the minister to give more consideration to including some of these other factors as part and parcel of this bill and that would be against all the regulations.

If we leave it to interpretation, as usually happens with regulations, then the full wishes of the committee will not be realized because of the fact that these things will not be spelled out. There are many considerations which would make it difficult for some packing plants to put in the type of equipment required and they involve religious rites and all that sort of thing. From the evidence received from departmental officials I would say that the method of handling was more inhumane in most cases than the methods being used generally throughout the country with regard to slaughter.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I really do not like to see this kind of provision so far as the governor in council is concerned. Clause 4 reads:

> The governor in council may, for the purpose of ensuring humane slaughter of food animals in an establishment, make regulations respecting the manner of, and methods and devices to be employed in, the slaughter of food animals in an establishment.

I would rather see a provision like that in the slaughter of animals act of England, 1958, clause 9, where it is provided as follows:

> Any power to make regulations under this act shall be exercisable by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either house of parliament.

I think this would really protect the rights of parliament to decide upon the regulations which are to be made. There would be greater control over these regulations and I believe the minister should present an amendment to this effect before we decide about the bill. Everybody is in favour of the bill. Everybody knows that we have to do something about the inhumane slaughtering of animals, but I think that in preparing the bill thought should have been given to the fact that parliament should always be in control of everything that is decided on behalf of the people of this country. I would ask the minister to try to express this in a clearer way so that parliament may have something to say about it.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, the slaughter of animals act of England clearly gives the governor in council the authority to make regulations much as this bill does but the United Kingdom legislation controls the nature of the regulations that can be made. For example, section 1, subsection 2 reads as follows:

> Regulations under this section may make such incidental or consequential provision as may appear to the minister to be necessary or expedient for the purposes of the regulations—

They must be consequential provisions and they must be incidental to the measure itself. Section 1, subsection 1, paragraph (b) reads as follows:

> —by such other means as may, by regulations made by the minister after consultation with such organizations as appear to him to represent the interests concerned—

I simply point out that blanket authority is not given for legislation by order in council. It is an authority that allows these regulations to be made by order in council—

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member does not mind I should like to point out that the provision gives authority to the minister to go ahead and do these things rather than to the governor in council.

Mr. Crestohl: But it is controlled authority and, as the hon. member for Hull pointed out, it is always subject to annulment. I realize that the House of Commons cannot detail all the regulations as to how large a certain pen should be, how many cattle should be kept in a certain room or as to the incline of a certain ramp. These are details which can be worked out by the officials and put in the form of regulations but regulations which have to do with the very essence of the matter, which say what is a humane method, are the concern of parliament. We have gone over that a number of times already. I think the regulations should be restricted to the matter itself but unfortunately the minister has not given parliament any meat in this bill. Yes, that is a pun on the word "meat". I actually meant that. The minister has not taken anything into the bill that the committee has recommended after so many weeks of labour. If we had a basis in the bill indicating what humane slaughter is intended to be then we could give authority to make regulations with respect to that which was in the bill but since there is nothing in the bill then any type of legislation can be made, whether or not it is germane to the matter.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, toward the end of my remarks on second reading I asked the minister if he would be kind enough to indicate if he thought there was any danger of doing any harm to the small abattoirs or slaughter-houses as a result of regulations made by the governor in council in this connection. I am sure that the minister must know at this time what the main regulations are but if he does not know surely his officials should know something about it. I should like to have an assurance from the minister that these regulations will not endanger small industries.

Mr. Harkness: No, they will not Mr. Chairman. This is one of the things on which the committee heard a good deal of evidence, as I understood the matter. In fact, the only time I was there officials of the farm union and the federation of agriculture were giving evidence on this point. The idea is to draw up regulations which it will be possible for the smaller institutions to meet financially. There are now in existence humane methods of slaughter in the form of a new type of electrical stunner which is quite cheap to install and will probably be satisfactory. It has not received final approval but it probably will be satisfactory. I have no doubt that a type of humane killing which will be within the financial means of the smaller abattoirs will be laid down.

Mr. Peters: Does the minister have in mind giving consideration to the other matters I mentioned to which the committee gave a good deal of consideration?

Mr. Harkness: Certainly, Mr. Chairman. As I have stated several times, all the recommendations of the committee will be given full consideration and as far as possible made effective by means of the regulations which are drawn up.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Offences.

Mr. Crestohl: Subclause 2 deals with the nature of evidence. I speak of this matter because it concerns me not only as a member of the house but also as a lawyer. I should like to ask the minister to explain this subclause which states as follows:

> (2) In a prosecution for a violation of this act, it is sufficient proof of the offence to establish that it was committed by an employee or agent of the accused whether or not the employee or agent is identified or has been prosecuted for the offence.

I am concerned with the possibility of prosecuting someone and not identifying the person who committed the offence as being the agent of the man being prosecuted. Anyone can do something which is an offence under the act. It can be a passerby, a trespasser or a stranger who may commit an offence. It is found that an offence has been committed and then you proceed to prosecution. I think it is unfair to say that the man who committed the offence should not necessarily be identified as the agent of the accused. I think it is a fallacy in criminal law or criminal procedure not to be able to identify the man who committed the offence as being the agent of him whom you prosecute. I think that the theory of criminal law would certainly be exploded if that were made possible by any legislation of parliament.

Mr. Harkness: This is the ordinary provision really, that the employer is responsible for the actions of his agent or employee in matters of this kind. You have the same sort of thing in the Seeds Act which we amended here a little while ago. The same question was raised in connection with the Seeds Act. The only difference here is whether or not the employee or agent is identified. That is the only difference here at all. The reason that is so is this, as these animals go along on the rail there may be two or three people at fault and it may be impossible to identify exactly which one was at fault. The fault may be shared among four or five. For example, an animal might not have been sufficiently stunned. The interval between the time it was stunned and the time it was bled and thus finally completely dead might be too long. Who is responsible? It is impossible to determine whether it was the man who did the stunning who was responsible or whether it was the man who was supposed to do the next operation; he let too long go by and so on. You might have a series of three or four things along that line and it is impossible to say that A, B, C or D was the one who was responsible. This provision is to make it possible to prosecute when you have what is definitely a contravention of the act without having to say, "John Jones was the man who was responsible for the contravention".

Mr. Crestohl: I am glad the minister gave us that explanation. But did I understand the minister to say that in any event you would have to identify the individual as an employee? That would be a point of identification. That is some explanation but certainly not a satisfactory one from the criminal law point of view.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Inspectors.

Mr. McIlraith: I just want to draw the attention of the minister to one thing. I invite him to consider further, before dealing with it in the other place, whether or not this clause does what it was intended to do. I take it that what he is seeking to do is to provide the inspectors operating under this act with sufficient power to carry out the provisions of the act and in order to do that is seeking to give them powers which are given inspectors under the Meat Inspection Act. I invite his further technical consideration to the clause in order to see whether it does what he intends it to do and ask that it be looked at.

Mr. Harkness: I should be glad to have it looked at. The fact is, of course, that a large number of these inspectors will be the same men. We are not going to set up a duplicate set of inspectors. The inspectors under the Meat Inspection Act will also be inspectors under this act.

Mr. McIlraith: My point was really technical as to the reading of the clause. It does not seem to give the inspectors the power to carry out their duties under this act.

Mr. Crestohl: Certainly the committee is satisfied—and certainly I have the utmost confidence in the statement of the minister—that the safeguards will be provided for the preservation of religious freedom in the country. But at the same time I think that an assurance of that kind is far safer when it is made the law. Since this is legislation which might in some way, as the discussion has clearly disclosed, interfere with or invade or deprive certain people of rights which they now enjoy, I should like to see incorporated in the bill a clause to read as follows, and I move it as an amendment which is seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa West.

The Chairman: Before the hon. member reads it, may we pass clause 6?

Mr. Crestohl: Certainly.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Clause agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Cartier may continue.

Mr. Crestohl: I shall simply proceed from where I left off. I was about to read the proposed amendment. It reads as follows:

That the act be amended by adding thereto section 7 to read as follows:

"Nothing in this act shall invade or otherwise interfere with any religious rights and practices presently enjoyed by anyone in Canada."

I think that the minister, in taking the generous view that he took and in wanting to assure the country that these rights will be preserved, should accept this amendment. It certainly would give reassurance. The minister is here today. He may be in another office next year or two or three years from now. Yet we will not have the provision in the law. As I said, this amendment clearly safeguards those principles which I said during my address on second reading we do not want to disturb by legislating another worth-while principle.

Mr. Harkness: In connection with this amendment I would just say that one of the difficulties with it is that it is in such general terms. Owing to the fact that there is in the act no definition of religious rights and practices, I would be doubtful that this is good legislation.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 18; nays, 64.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General Administration—

380. Departmental administration, including fees for membership in the international organizations listed in the details of the estimates, $2,636,084.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Chairman, when we were considering this item on June 25 I agreed to answer those who had spoken when we next were on the estimates, and I think perhaps I might do that right now. We had a useful contribution to the debate on the opening item by hon. members on the other side of the house, and they raised some questions which are worthy of comment.

The Leader of the Opposition dealt chiefly with recent trade developments with the proposed Atlantic free trade community, and he mentioned trade with Japan and discussed the subject of uranium. I pointed out in my earlier remarks that the annual report of the department had been enlarged on this occasion in its earlier part in order to deal somewhat more comprehensively with general trade policy and trade activities, and some of the problems that were raised have been covered fairly fully in the annual report. But in answer to the Leader of the Opposition I would say that we are following very carefully developments in Europe. We have a clear appreciation of their significance, not only for our exports but for world trade generally. In the sessions of GATT in 1957 and 1958, when I was present at the meetings, we made the point that we hoped the development of the common market in Europe would not be restrictive in its nature and that barriers would not be raised against trade. It is important to recall that the members of the six nations who comprise that common market in Europe are all members of GATT and have obligations under that international arrangement.

The Leader of the Opposition drew attention this year, as he did last year and on other occasions, to the need, as he put it, to work out some special form of North American association with the European economic grouping in order—I think this is what was in his mind—to avoid having the world get into the position where trading blocs are established with barriers raised among them, whereas the policy pursued by Canada over the years has been to promote multilateral trade. That policy is being pursued at the present time and our trade is extensive throughout the world with most countries of the world.

His suggestion, however, is certainly worthy of consideration because the closer are the economic ties between the North American continent and western Europe the better for us all because of our other arrangements with those countries within NATO. When Dr. Hallstein, the president of the European economic commission, was in Ottawa two or three weeks ago the Canadian point of view was presented to him and he showed his appreciation of that point of view, namely that barriers should not be raised against trade between our country and the countries of the common market.

On the subject of Japan, the Leader of the Opposition quite rightly stressed the importance of our trade with that country. It is a trade which has been developing over the years and we share his view completely. In the forum of GATT we have expressed our interest in giving Japan the full arrangements which are available under GATT and have urged that other countries do the same as we are doing. It is important that the economy of Japan be strengthened and we are co-operating closely with Japan toward that end. It is one of the major trading countries of the world today. It is a country with whom we are developing quite a substantial trade, and we find that Japan is either second or third best customer for our Canadian wheat. The difficulties that we have been experiencing with Japan with some of her imports are being cleared away. Very useful discussions have been held with the Japanese looking toward a modification of their exports to this country, particularly in the field of textiles. Those conversations with the Japanese representatives have been, as I say, very useful, and I think results are being achieved.

I cannot deal at as great length as I might with all the matters raised in discussion with hon. members opposite, but I would like to discuss some of the problems raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West who has over the years been very much interested in Canada's trade. He asked several questions with regard to our trade with the West Indies, and of course last year in the house he raised this problem on another occasion when there was a rather extensive debate. The West Indies is an important area for Canadian trade and has been so for generations. We are attempting to maintain and strengthen our trade relations with the West Indies and from the experience I had there just over a year ago, visiting the West Indies, I received the impression that they were equally interested in enlarging their trade with Canada. It is an important market for us. In 1957, Canada provided about 10 per cent of the total imports of the West Indies and a much higher proportion of their purchases of certain individual products such as flour, potatoes, salt cod and pickled meats.

There has been some change in the pattern of trade with the West Indies of recent years. We have not increased our sale of fish and flour to the extent that we would like, but these products do not now represent as large a proportion of the import market as they did in the past. In machinery and equipment there has been a marked increase in the requirements of the West Indies. We find that our exports are generally competitive in the West Indies. In some products we have increased our share of the West Indian market and I mention specifically bacon and ham, leather, motor cars and clothing. The West Indies represents an important market for manufactured goods from Canada and there is scope for an expansion of Canadian sales in this field. Hon. members realize that there have been restrictions on West Indian trade because of balance of payments reasons but these restrictions are being relaxed and new opportunities are being opened up for Canadian exporters.

We had a visit last year from the minister of trade for Jamaica and I recall his remarks to Canadian businessmen urging them to be more active in visiting the West Indies and attempting to arrange business there. Last winter a strong contingent of Canadian businessmen did visit the West Indies and they explored the market for themselves. At the same time, under the auspices of the Canadian government, a Canadian trade fair was in operation, first at Kingston, Jamaica and subsequently at Port of Spain, Trinidad.

The West Indies is, of course, a competitive market and competition is felt from Britain, the United States and other countries. The hon. member for Ottawa West raised the question of our trade with the West Indies in its currency aspect. Last year at the commonwealth conference we had a discussion with the United Kingdom and the West Indian representatives on that very matter, and it was agreed, and I quote from the report of that conference:

> That joint consideration be given to all matters designed to improve and strengthen existing trade ties and ensure the closest possible trading relationship between the West Indies and Canada.

The removal of restrictions which has been taking place in the United Kingdom and in various countries of the commonwealth has also been taking place in the West Indies, and there is a relaxation of the restriction of imports from dollar countries.

With regard to the trade agreement with the West Indies which the hon. member for Ottawa West also mentioned we recognize —and it was recognized by the conference at Montreal—that a revision of the existing trade agreeement of 1926 between Canada and the West Indies would be necessary but it is dependent upon the establishment of a customs union in the West Indies Federation. The preparatory work for that has been under way for some time, and if it is advanced sufficiently by the latter part of this year we expect to hold trade discussions then with representatives of the West Indies to consider whether or not the trade agreement of 1926 might be extended.

The hon. member also raised the question of capital development in the West Indies and wondered whether or not Canada is playing her part in that. Canadian investment in the West Indies at the end of 1957 amounted to $130 million, exclusive of banks and insurance companies. That is a marked increase as compared with the figure for 1951 when Canadian investments stood at only $25 million. So there has been a five-fold increase in that period. That compares with the United States investment in the West Indies of $235 million at the end of 1956, the latest figure I have available. Canadian banks and insurance companies have been very active in the West Indies for years. Four Canadian banks have branches there and ten Canadian insurance companies are established. In addition, various Canadian companies are operating in the West Indies. Without making the list complete, I mention light and power companies, companies manufacturing food products, optical supplies and woollen textiles. There is also, of course, the activities of Aluminium Limited which has developed bauxite products and produces refined alumina for shipment to Canada. There are also stores, machine shops, coastal and river steamers and ships carrying the trade between Canada and the West Indies.

The hon. member for Ottawa West also dealt with our trade with Japan and indicated some concern about a drop in our export sales to Japan last year compared with 1957. There was a drop in our exports of barley but an increase in our wheat and flour exports which went up from $68.5 million in 1957 to $71 million in 1958. The drop in barley exports was due to the fact that there was a bumper rice crop in Japan, and barley in that country is a substitute food for rice, so the requirement was not as great. In the first five months of 1959, taking this as the period for which the latest figures are available, exports to Japan amounted to $44.9 million compared with $40.3 million for the same period in 1958. I have already mentioned our intention to develop as far as we can our trade with Japan.

There was some discussion with regard to our general trade, contributed to by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Ottawa West. They were dealing with one month whereas I had been dealing with the figures in my possession for the period of five months.

Of the first five months of the present year, only in January were Canada's exports to the United States lower than in the corresponding month of 1958. In each of the four succeeding months, that is, February, March, April and May, they were higher and in the five month period as a whole amounted to $1,186 million compared with $1,135 million in the same period of 1958, an increase of 4½ per cent.

There was some criticism of my remark to the effect that the increase in Canada's imports had been shared by all the major trading areas and some questions were raised in regard to that. My reference to imports was based, not upon particular selected months but upon all months in the year to date for which figures were available; that is, January to April inclusive. The totals for this period show an increase in imports from the United Kingdom, the commonwealth countries, the United States and all other countries considered together. Comparing imports for the first five months of 1959 with the corresponding period two years ago shows purchases from the United Kingdom up by 6 per cent and purchases from the United States down by 12 per cent. These figures indicate that the position of British relative to United States goods in the Canadian market remains substantially better than in the early part of 1957.

The hon. member for Ottawa West raised a number of questions concerning the exports of surplus farm products. This, if course, overlaps with the Department of Agriculture. I believe the hon. member was concerned as to whether the sale of some of these agricultural products abroad would interfere with our general trade picture. My understanding is that in all these sales care is taken so that there will be no interference with our trade in general and so there will be no accusation of practising anything in the way of an unfair method in trade. My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, of course, could give a more specific answer in this regard.

In selling our surpluses in export markets every effort is made to ensure that these sales will not give rise to repercussions in our international trade relations with other countries. Before a surplus product is released for export at a subsidized price the country of destination is carefully screened to make certain that we are not causing undue hardship to other suppliers to that market. With this careful screening of exports and through consultation with other governments concerned we have, in the main, been able to export these products without creating serious problems in our commercial relations with other countries.

The hon. member for Ottawa West raised a question with regard to our trade with Italy. It is important to note that a year ago Italy was greatly affected by the world recession. Industrial production levelled off and total imports declined by about 14 per cent. Imports of agricultural products also ran at a lower rate due to substantial improvements in local production. This year developments are more encouraging. Italy's foreign exchange reserves are now at a record level and with the introduction of external convertibility the country is in a position to remove many restrictions on dollar goods. There are also signs of a definite upswing in the Italian economy. We are expecting an improvement in our export sales to Italy as the year progresses.

The hon. member for Fort William asked a question or two with regard to whether or not we were making a study of international trade and what trips or trade missions were in contemplation by the department. We make a continuing and close study of international trade. Our trade commissioners are continually reporting to the home office. We have a very efficient trade commissioner service and we have an international branch which keeps closely in touch with all the aspects of international trade. We have an efficient service in so far as gaining information with regard to trade abroad is concerned and in passing that information on to our exporters here at home so that business opportunities are brought to the attention of Canadian businessmen. With regard to trade missions, I have nothing to announce at the moment. I believe the hon. member wanted to know about my own activities. I hope to visit some countries during the autumn months if it is at all possible but I am not in a position to indicate at the moment what visits I might undertake.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, may I draw your attention to the fact that it is after ten o'clock.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Where did you come from?

Mr. Churchill: I wonder if under the circumstances the committee would be prepared to sit for a few moments longer. I can bring to a conclusion my comments on the remarks that were made by hon. members on the first item of this department. Hon. members will recall that although we had an opportunity of passing this item on June 25 I agreed that it should stay open for the next period until it came again before the committee. I believe I could complete my comments within five minutes and then if we could pass this item it would speed us on our way quite a bit.

Mr. Pearson: I would agree that under the circumstances the minister should be given an opportunity to finish his statement although I am not at all sure that would mean the passing of the first item. We would be quite agreeable to going on after the minister finished his statement until, let us say, eleven o'clock.

Mr. Howard: I appreciate that I am in an unpopular position.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): That is true.

Mr. Howard: Within the last few days it has been the tenor of the house to proceed beyond ten o'clock to some indefinite period. If an individual for a valid reason objects to the proceedings going beyond ten o'clock he puts himself in an unfavourable position. If the house wishes to sit beyond ten o'clock

I submit the government on its own initiative should follow the proper procedure of introducing a motion to extend the hours to which the house could conform. I am not prepared to accept the minister's suggestion that we would pass this item but I would not object to giving him five minutes to finish his remarks. I would not go as far as the Leader of the Opposition and agree to sitting until eleven o'clock, unless the government wants to introduce a motion.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): It is evident that you do not want to co-operate.

Mr. Howard: We want to co-operate to the fullest possible extent.

Mr. Ricard: That is not very far.

Mr. Hellyer: Typical socialist flexibility.

Mr. Howard: If for a valid reason an hon. member objects to an extension of the proceedings beyond ten o'clock everyone is opposed to him. That is the position in which one is put who for a valid reason may object to an extension of the sittings.

Mr. Aiken: What is your reason?

Mr. Howard: Ten o'clock is the hour of closing under the rules. I submit it is most unfair to display an attitude of resentment to one who objects to an extension for a valid reason.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): And you just love it.

Mr. Howard: I am in an unfavourable position in taking this approach.

Mr. Morton: Is it fair for one member to hold up the entire house?

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has suggested that the government should take the initiative in introducing a motion to extend the hours of sitting. I should point out to the hon. gentleman and the house that a general agreement was made by the whips of the parties that we would deal day by day with the extension of the sittings past ten o'clock. I felt that this should be placed on the record. I believe the whip of the Liberal party will confirm my statement as will the hon. member for Kootenay West who sat in on the discussion.

Mr. Peters: This matter was discussed last night and the record will show what decision was reached. The minister was present when the suggestion was made at that time. We agreed to extend the hours, but we did not make any suggestion that the hours be extended beyond ten o'clock. Hon. members will notice that on today's order paper it says:

Hours of sitting this day: 7.00 p.m. to 10.00 p.m.

It does not say "7.00 p.m. to 11.00 p.m."

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I can read exactly what Hansard does say. At page 6019 of Hansard the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

The arrangement being that on Wednesday, and on subsequent days, the house assemble in the afternoon at 2.00 rather than 2.30 and assemble again at 7.00 o'clock rather than 8.00, and in addition continue on Wednesday evening from 7.00 to 10.00 or whatever time the house determines.

The suggestion has been made that the house should now determine to sit to 11.00 o'clock and I think my hon. friend does not agree with that.

Mr. Howard: No, I am afraid not.

The Deputy Chairman: Do I understand the suggestion is that the committee will give the Minister of Trade and Commerce unanimous consent to finish his short remarks which he says will take about five minutes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition has just said, as I heard him read, that we sit until ten o'clock or until such a time as the house will agree to. I see no reason why the house should not agree to sit to a later hour. I do not think it requires unanimous consent.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry, but it does require unanimous consent to do that.

Mr. Churchill: However, Mr. Chairman, I am thankful for the privilege of continuing and I shall restrict these remarks. I hope I do justice to those who raised the questions.

The hon. member for Vancouver East discussed the problem of the alleged control of United States firms over their subsidiaries in this country, and alleged restrictions in the trade of those subsidiaries. He wanted to know whether the department had any knowledge of the companies in Canada which are restricted in their exports by foreign companies abroad which control them. In the ordinary course of its trade activities the department has a continuing interest in knowing what are the export policies of the Canadian companies which seek assistance and where control of those policies lies. This information is requested in the questionnaire which must be completed before a company can be included in the department's confidential exporters' directory. Before we undertake assistance in promoting exports for the subsidiary of a foreign manufacturing company we have to seek an understanding, and readily obtain as a rule any needed assurance that the assistance which we extend will not be diverted to the benefit of production and employment in some other country, but only used for the benefit of Canadian industry.

This is a problem which is constantly under review, and by means such as I have suggested, and by the process of education and persuasion we are finding that more and more companies are moving in the right direction. That was the burden of two addresses which I made in the United States to United States businessmen in New York and in Chicago last year. I drew attention to the feeling that we have in Canada that there should be freedom for subsidiaries operating in this country and entering into export trade.

The hon. member for Port Arthur and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River raised questions with regard to small businesses which I think might more properly be answered when we come to the section later on in the general estimates.

The hon. member for Port Arthur dealt at some length with testimony which had been given to one of the committees concerning foreign trade and the lack of export credit assistance; but in the interval parliament has passed an amendment to the Export Credits Insurance Act which I think meets that objection.

He drew attention to the fact that our forest industries were having some difficulty, but I note that exports to the United States for the first five months of 1959 show a decided upward trend. Our lumber exports are $29 million above those of the corresponding period last year. Wood pulp exports for the same period are up by $11 million. Newsprint exports so far have not yet equalled the previous year's level but an increase is expected by the time the returns are in for the six months' period.

Those, Mr. Chairman, are the main matters which were raised by hon. members who spoke. There was a contribution made by the hon. member for Saskatoon who drew attention to the need for increased facilities at the port of Churchill. The hon. member for Vancouver South indicated and drew attention to an order which had been received by John Inglis company for a very substantial piece of work in the United States.

These, Mr. Chairman, I think are the comments that I would make at this stage, and as we consider other items in the estimates I will be prepared to answer further questions.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Mr. Churchill: Would it be convenient to pass this item, in view of the earlier remarks I made, or does the committee wish to discuss item 1 again?

Mr. Pearson: There are some general observations we would like to make. Perhaps it will not take very long tomorrow morning, but I would prefer to hold them over.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Let us go on.

Mr. Eudes: The C.C.F. will not consent.

Mr. Morton: Stopped by C.C.F. obstruction.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): If you want C.C.F. obstruction you can get it.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman who is leading the house confirm the order of business for tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: Yes. Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we will continue with the estimates of trade and commerce and those are to be followed immediately, of course, by the estimates of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the national research council for which I am responsible to the house. Then, the estimates of mines and technical surveys, fisheries, post office, northern affairs, secretary of state, privy council, national revenue and the C.B.C., legislation, health and welfare and finance.

I might point out, Mr. Speaker, that in the three days which are ahead of us, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, operating on the hours that we have agreed to, there are available almost the equivalent of five days of normal hours. Therefore, although the program may appear to be fairly large, the time available to the house is close to being that of a normal five days.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman what is proposed by the government about the legislative items sent over from the Senate and announced tonight? Then, there is the bill of the Minister of Justice, and some amendments to another bill.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, it depends on the progress that we make with estimates. What I have announced here will carry over definitely for Thursday and Friday. If by tomorrow night we have made considerable progress and if by Friday we appear to be quite close to the end, then we will be able to determine when the legislation will be fitted in.

Mr. Pickersgill: We can be sure that there will be no legislation tomorrow or Friday?

Mr. Churchill: That is right, for Thursday and Friday no legislation.

It being 22 minutes past ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

R.C.M.P. RIDING CROPS

Question No. 292—Mr. Peters:

1. Are members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police authoried to carry riding crops?
2. If so, of what material or materials are such riding crops composed and what is their weight, length and diameter?
3. Are members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police authorized to carry any form of stick other than riding crops?
4. If so, of what material or materials are such sticks composed and what is their weight, length and diameter?

Answer by: Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice):

1. Members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are issued with leather batons, commonly known as riding crops. They are authorized to carry these batons whilst walking out in uniform or on duty.

2. Tempered steel rod tapering from $\frac{1}{8}$" at hand to $\frac{3}{8}$" at outer end wrapped with insulating tape and covered with 3-ply of rubber cemented together. This rubber covered rod is encased for its entire length in 4-ounce case leather with a ferrule of leather in basket weave $2\frac{3}{4}$" long at the outer end—length $22\frac{1}{2}$"—outside diameter tapers from $\frac{3}{8}$" at the hand to $1\frac{1}{4}$" at the outer end.

Question

This diameter includes the leather ferrule—weight 12 ounces.

3. Yes, but only in special circumstances or when specifically ordered.

4. (a) Leather covered billets consisting of a steel spring to the outer end of which is fastened a lead weight, the spring and lead being covered with a brown leather covering in a basket weave producing a flexible billet weighted at the outer end and weighing approximately 10 ounces. The billet is also furnished with a leather loop or thong. Length, 8". Outside diameter tapers from $1\frac{1}{4}$" to $\frac{5}{8}$".

(b) Solid black rubber billet. This billet is $8\frac{1}{4}$" long and is made of solid rubber without the addition of any lead or other weighted material. Also equipped with loop or thong for wearing over the wrist and tapers from $\frac{3}{8}$" in diameter to approximately $1\frac{1}{8}$" at the outer end. Total weight, approximately 6 ounces.

(c) Night sticks—solid hardwood—14" long, tapering from 1" diameter at hand grip to $1\frac{3}{4}$" at outside end. Weight, 7 ounces. No metal core or weights.

(d) Truncheon (used when mounted) made of hardwood without metal core or weights —Overall length $35\frac{1}{2}$"—length from hilt to outer end $28\frac{1}{2}$" hardwood encased in fabric material. Truncheon is of uniform diameter, approximately $\frac{7}{8}$" and is fitted with leather wrist thong and small leather hand guard fitted approximately 6" from end. Weight 1 pound $3\frac{1}{8}$ ounces.

BROADCASTING

Second report of special committee on broadcasting—Mr. Halpenny.

(Translation):

PRIVILEGE

MR. TREMBLAY—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN MONTREAL "LA PRESSE"

Mr. J. N. Tremblay (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I want to protest against a report as published in the Montreal newspaper La Presse, of July 15, 1959 concerning the parliamentary committee on radio and television.

Headed "No orchids to C.B.C. witnesses" the item makes great ado about a meeting in camera which was called for the purpose of drafting the report that the parliamentary committee on radio and television was to submit to this house.

The article imputes to me certain actions, words and motives. I want to state here that what the report says about me is untrue.

I also protest against indiscretions that might have been made by one or more members of the committee. If this were so, such action would be a breach of parliamentary practice of the traditions of this house.

As to the action of the reporter involved, Mr. Speaker, I have no need to characterize it. It bespeaks a lack of professional ethics, contempt for the rights of parliament and for the privileges of hon. members of parliamentary committees. In my view, it is a blow to their freedom of opinion and of thought, and a serious abuse of the rights and privileges granted by parliament to members of the press gallery.

BRIDGES

AUTHORIZATION OF CONSTRUCTION ACROSS NIAGARA RIVER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-30 (from the Senate) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Niagara river between the province of Ontario and the state of New York.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AUTHORIZATION OF CONSTRUCTION ACROSS PIGEON RIVER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-31 (from the Senate) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pigeon river between the province of Ontario and the state of Minnesota.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPEAL OF CERTAIN LAWS RESPECTING EXPORTATION OF SALT FISH

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-32 (from the Senate), to repeal certain fisheries laws in force in the province of Newfoundland respecting the exportation of salt fish.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

STATEMENT BY MR. SPEAKER ON REFERENCES TO SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Speaker: Before orders of the day are called, may I refer to a matter which came up at this stage in yesterday's proceedings. I had taken exception to a reference to the proceedings before a committee of the other house with respect to finance under the impression that the committee was still sitting. The Leader of the Opposition raised the point that reports of such committees were a proper subject matter of discussion in this house, and as the matter was left in some uncertainty I should like to assure the house that that is the case and refer to Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, fourth edition, at page 357. I think I might read one paragraph dealing with references to the other place:

> It is also a part of the unwritten law of parliament that no allusion should be made in one house to the debates in the other chamber, a rule always enforced by the Speaker with the utmost strictness. Members sometimes attempt to evade this rule by resorting to ambiguous terms of expression—by referring, for instance, to what happened "in another place"; but all such evasions of a wholesome practice should be stopped by the Speaker, when it is evident to whom the allusions are made.

The next sentence is the important one:

It is perfectly regular, however, to refer to the official printed records of the other branch of the legislature, even though the document may not have been formally asked for and communicated to the house.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON WINTER WORK PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether, in view of the statement reported in last night's Ottawa papers and attributed to the mayor of Ottawa, the minister does not think it desirable before the conclusion of this session to formally announce the government's intentions with regard to a winter work program for next autumn and winter?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my position regarding the winter work program is still the same as I announced the other day.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, has the minister seen the statement made by the mayor of Ottawa?

Mr. Starr: No, I have not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the minister read it and reconsider his position?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would alter my position.

NORTHLAND NAVIGATION COMPANY

INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I pose a question to the Minister of Labour and ask what report he can give the house on the progress of negotiations with respect to the Northland Navigation Company?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, concerning the latest developments in the dispute involving Northland Navigation Company Limited, the Vancouver officer of my department has reported that the Canadian Labour Congress has sent a representative to the west coast to meet with the employer and representatives of the various trade unions concerned.

Meetings have been held and it is anticipated that further meetings will take place. My officer has not participated directly in these discussions, although he is closely in touch with the situation and will resume his mediation services if necessary and if these direct discussions are not concluded successfully.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I also understand that the parties have decided to withhold public statements while the talks proceed. In view of this fact I think it is not desirable to discuss the principal issue which now appears to stand in the way of settlement.

WATER RESOURCES

CHICAGO DIVERSION—CANADIAN ATTITUDE TO U.S. LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. L. Spencer (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of news reports that a Senate committee in Washington is considering amendments to a bill concerning diversion of water from lake Michigan at Chicago, would the Prime Minister indicate whether there has been any recent change in Canadian government policy?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman gave me notice of his question, and I can say unequivocally that the answer is in the negative. There has been no change in Canadian government policy as it was announced by me in the house on April 23, and as it is contained in the note to the United States dated April 9 last.

With regard to the proposals and suggestions that have been made in the committee of congress, I do not think it would be useful or proper to comment on those suggestions as they are put forward in the legislature of another country; but I do want to make it abundantly clear that whatever changes have been suggested in no way diminish or lessen the Canadian stand in opposition to the diversion proposed.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether in this connection he was encouraged by the observations of Senator Robert Kerr of Oklahoma that he was as interested in Canada as he would be in a sheik's harem?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the question asked by the hon. gentleman is answered by the very fact that it was asked. I have pointed out that no suggestions that have been made have in any way diminished the Canadian stand.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Has any consideration been given by the department or the government to referring this matter to the international joint commission, in the same manner as a portion of it was referred to the international joint commission to ascertain what would be the effect of the diversion on water power development as well as on navigation?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, with the experience the hon. gentleman has had in this matter I should think he would take it that there would be no necessity for such a course to be followed, for the general feeling among Canadians is that the effect of diverting even a thousand cubic feet per second could not but be detrimental.

Mr. Chevrier: May I just follow that up. The question I was putting to the Prime Minister was this. In view of the fact that the matter had already in part been referred to the international joint commission, would it not be advisable for the government to give consideration to referring the whole problem to the international joint commission for determination?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not concur in that view at the moment.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. The house will be grateful for the statement he has made today. Is he satisfied that the proposed proceedings to be taken to the supreme court of the United States with regard to this matter will not in any way affect Canadian rights?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as the proceedings being taken before the supreme court of the United States are concerned, the only observation I would make thereon is why in view of the fact that some of these matters are sub judice, consideration is being given at all to the measure before congress?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Does the Canadian government take the same view of a short term diversion of water at Chicago as it does of a long term diversion?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have heard nothing from Canadians as a whole that would indicate that a short term diversion would not ultimately lead to a long term one. It is because of that situation that we have taken so definite an attitude in respect of the present request.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY AS TO CO-OPERATION BETWEEN CANADIAN AND UNITED KINGDOM POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Justice. The question is based on a Canadian Press dispatch of July 14 concerning the shooting of a London policeman and the efforts of the London police to locate the person suspected of doing the shooting, who it was thought was a Canadian. The dispatch goes on to point out that a photograph and certain information had been sent by the Canadian police, the R.C.M.P., by air mail.

My question is this. Why, in the interests of efficient co-operation between the Canadian police and the United Kingdom police in a matter of such importance, was the relevant information not sent by telephone message or cable and the photograph by wire photo, rather than by the slower method of air mail?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Minister of Justice): I will make the proper inquiry and let the hon. member know.

AIRPORTS

MURRAY BAY, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Since 1954 the people of my riding have been anxious that the airport at Murray Bay be completed. Can the minister tell the house if his department intends to construct this air strip this year?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. During the past two years this matter has been under very active consideration by my department, and I am very pleased to be able to report that we are prepared to call for tenders for this construction immediately following receipt of a clear title to the land, which has been requested from the local authorities.

PRICE SPREADS

STATEMENT AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition asked me when the report of the royal commission on price spreads might be expected. I have had the chairman communicated with, and he advises that it will be mid-September.

FISHERIES

SALT COD—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CANCELLATION OF CULLING REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): May I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the great concern and anxiety over the recent decision of the government to cancel the enforcement of culling regulations in the salt cod fish industry in Newfoundland, will the Minister of Fisheries make a statement regarding this matter?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice so I may be sure of its full implications. I received notice just now, but I think there is something left out of the question. I might say that the culling regulations are the responsibility of the provincial government. I will take the question as notice and give a fuller answer tomorrow.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

INSPECTION OF INSTALLATIONS BY SUBGROUP OF HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the government giving consideration to action under the Inquiries Act to enable a subgroup of the mines, forests and waters committee to inspect northern installations before the winter season, as was recommended in that committee's report?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as yet no consideration has been given to the suggestion or proposal mentioned.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

CHIPPEWA INDIAN RESERVE, SARNIA—LAND DISPOSAL—SALE OF LAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Is the hon. lady yet in a position to bring down the return respecting the Chippewa Indian reserve at Sarnia?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is ready now, I believe, and will be tabled today.

DRUGS

INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSITION AND TREATMENT OF ADDICTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Justice, or perhaps the Minister of National Health and Welfare might be interested. I regret not having been able to give notice. Has the minister's attention been drawn to an article in this morning's Globe and Mail which indicates that an investigation sponsored by metropolitan Toronto will be undertaken in an attempt to deal with methods and facilities for the treatment of drug addicts? Will the Department of Justice or the Department of National Health and Welfare be able to participate in this investigation, and will they attempt to co-ordinate the studies so we may have a universally applicable treatment system across Canada?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have not seen the article referred to, but I will be glad to bring it to the attention of the Minister of Justice when he returns.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): As this is a matter that comes mainly under the Minister of National Health and Welfare, is it a fact that the government has decided on such a policy?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There has been no policy as such decided but, as I say, I would rather not give a direct answer to the question without seeing the article.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATISTICAL DATA ON FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO CERTAIN PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Finance if he is yet in a position to make available to the house the tables, precisely comparable to the ones that appear in Hansard for July 13 at page 5901, for the other Atlantic provinces and for the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think those tables are made up and available. I did not give any undertaking to table them, but my estimates will be coming up and if hon. members wish to ask for them they will be brought forward then. I shall endeavour to have them ready to table in the house at that time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would remind the minister that there was an implied understanding that these would be made available when consent was given to enable the minister to put this table on Hansard without being read. There are some of us who would like to have these tables available before the minister's estimates are considered.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have to take objection to the statement of the hon. gentleman. There was no such understanding before consent was given to have this table appear in Hansard. I pointed out at that time, when the hon. gentleman asked for the information to be tabled concerning the other provinces, that this information would have been irrelevant to the matter before the house. There was no suggestion of any implied undertaking in that respect.

Mr. Pickersgill: On this same point, I should like to draw your attention to the fact that this information was first requested immediately after April 20, when the Prime Minister made a television broadcast, and in one way or another the minister has evaded giving it ever since.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That statement is untrue, and the hon. member has enough knowledge to know that the statement is untrue. When this matter was raised first the hon. member was reminded that there are proper ways of obtaining information. A question was then put on the order paper by one of his colleagues and a return was brought down. The hon. gentleman has now decided he wants some refinement of the information that was brought down in reply to the question. This does not warrant his making the kind of untrue statement he has just made in the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a question of privilege. The minister says the statement I have made is untrue, and that is unparliamentary. It also happens that my statement is true, as the minister knows quite well, because I have mentioned this several times. I took exception to this order for return in the form in which it was given, because there was not comparable information for the other provinces.

Mr. Speaker: There is a way in which documents can be produced, and it is not appropriate to debate whether or not a minister will produce a document without the matter being properly before the house. On the point of privilege, the objection which the hon. member takes has been noted.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

380. Departmental administration, including fees for membership in the international organizations listed in the details of the estimates, $2,636,084.

Mr. Badanai: The report of the board of grain commissioners for Canada contains some valuable information and some intriguing figures, and I wish to make a few observations about the handling and marketing of grain. The board of grain commissioners came into being under the Canada Grain Act of 1912, and this board was established to provide general supervision over grain handling in Canada. Prior to 1912 a warehouse commission with jurisdiction over terminal grain elevators had been appointed in 1901. The act of 1912 also provided for the construction of public terminal elevators in order to provide storage facilities and inspection of grain for the protection of the farmers on the one hand and the guarantee of the various grades to the overseas purchasers on the other.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wonder if hon. members would please be quieter and lower their voices while they are talking. It is very hard for the Chair to hear the hon. member for Fort William.

Mr. Badanai: In 1913 the first public terminal grain elevator was constructed by the government at the lakehead with a storage capacity of 3½ million bushels. The storage facilities at the lakehead at the present time are in excess of 92 million bushels. The rapid expansion of the grain trade culminated in the establishment of a grain exchange building in Fort William, as well as the appointment of an assistant grain commissioner. Many revisions of the Canada Grain Act have been made from time to time, and the board has assumed wider responsibilities for enforcing the provisions of the act and for marketing; and when I say "marketing" I do not mean the actual selling.

The principal function of this board is to conduct investigations into any and all matters relating to the weighing and grading of grain, which includes the licensing and bonding of elevators and, of course, the important function of supervision over the recording of grain statistics. They also exercise some form of control over the distribution of grain cars at shipping points in the grain growing areas. It can be seen, therefore, that step by step the federal government has practically taken control of the grain trade, first by establishing legal weight measures, grades and market agencies, establishing a vast network of administrative offices, with the net result that the taxpayers of Canada are contributing a considerable sum of money to enable our western farmers to produce and prosper.

I would like to bring to the attention of the minister the report on revenue and expenditures, table J-4, page 65 of the annual report of the board of grain commissioners for the year 1958. In the first column, under "Inspection", the revenue is shown at $1,651,004. In the next column, under "Weighing", it shows a revenue of $825,459, making a total revenue of $2,476,453. In the next section, under "Expenditures", the amount shown under "Inspection" is $2,441,789, and under "Weighing" the amount is $1,143,373, making a grand total of $3,585,162. If we deduct the net revenue from the total expenditures under these two items alone, it will show a deficit or a loss of $1,108,709. While we all appreciate that services such as appeals, registrations, licensing, statistics, research and administration should be a government responsibility, I feel that services such as weighing and inspection should be made self-supporting by increasing the charges for these services to meet the costs of providing them.

Turning to pages 63 and 64 under table J-3, I would point out to the minister that under the revenue for inspection at Winnipeg it shows an amount of $322,483 and for weighing at the same point the revenue is $29,188, making a total revenue of $351,671. Under the same columns for Fort William we find the revenue for inspection to be $598,562 and for weighing the figure is $47,113, a total revenue of $1,045,675. Under the heading of expenditures at these two points we find that the inspections at Winnipeg cost $703,715 and weighing $69,046, a total of $772,761. At Fort William the cost of inspection was $850,561 and for weighing $666,067, a total of $1,516,629.

Mr. Chairman, these figures reveal—and this is the point—that it costs the government $772,761 to produce revenues of $351,672 at Winnipeg. By contrast, the cost at Fort William is $1,516,629 to secure a revenue of $1,045,675. In other words the ratio of costs at these two points favours Fort William by a margin of practically one third.

I trust that the minister will have an explanation of this discrepancy and be able to tell us whether it is necessary to have two inspections for grain destined for the lakehead elevators, one at Winnipeg and one at Fort William. I fail to see how the grade of grain would change in transit in the 400 miles which separate these two points. All grain must be inspected and weighed upon entering and leaving the terminal elevator. I feel, therefore, that this dual inspection is quite unnecessary, especially in view of the fact that in the very near future practically all exports via the Atlantic ocean will proceed directly from the lakehead.

I suggest that the board of grain commissioners and their staff should be permanently established at the lakehead, and that the only inspection and weighing for all grains consigned to lakehead elevators be carried out at this point. This would eliminate the costly practice of double inspection now being carried out. I would suggest that except for small staffs of government inspectors, and weighing at points where grain is taken into mills for processing, all government inspection and weighing should be performed at the terminal elevators, of which there are 45 in Ontario, 4 in Manitoba, 2 in Saskatchewan, 4 in Alberta, 9 in British Columbia and 12 in Quebec and the maritimes.

At this point I would remind hon. members that the lakehead is the largest grain port in the world. Is it not obvious that a great economy could be made by having the entire inspection and weighing operation performed at this point? Perhaps Vancouver should be established in the same manner for grain shipments via the Pacific, though I am confident that a lot of our exports now leaving from that port will be going via the St. Lawrence seaway and the Atlantic in the future.

Finally, I firmly believe that while there may have been good reasons in the past for the government to sustain the expense involved in these services in the interests of the economy of the nation, the time may be opportune to revise the whole set-up of the inspection and weighing of grain. The board of grain commissioners should be a self-sustaining body, and all services rendered by them such as the weighing and inspection of grain should be paid for by charges assessed to the country elevators, the terminal elevators and all others who demand this government service.

I also believe that an improvement could be made in the handling and marketing of grain, and I wish to offer a suggestion which, even upon a superficial study, would appear to have merit. At present all grain handlings by the government are done by the bushel measure. For example, wheat is 60 lbs to the bushel; oats 34 lbs to the bushel; barley 48 lbs to the bushel; flaxseed 56 lbs to the bushel and rye 56 lbs to the bushel. While these are the weights taken at all times for grain, it is obvious that under certain conditions they do not show a true picture. For example, these weights are for grain under normal conditions. If, however, the grain is damp, as sometimes happens, then because of the moisture it contains a bushel of grain weighs a great deal more. Under normal circumstances 60,000 lbs of wheat would represent 1,000 bushels. However, if a large part of the weight was represented by moisture then the actual number of bushels would be considerably less.

No scale upon which grain is weighed can possibly show a measure in bushels. It must therefore show the weight in pounds, and the measure must be worked out after the weight is determined. It is therefore impossible to obtain with any degree of accuracy the amount of grain in Canada under present conditions of accounting. It simply means that a shipment of grain heavy with moisture could be shipped and payment would be made on the basis of bushels. However, when this grain dried the weight would be considerably less, and as it was worked out from the weight, the number of bushels would also be less.

All exports of grain are made on the ton and hundredweight basis. It can therefore be seen what a tremendous amount of work is involved both by the government and the grain men because the government insists on this antiquated practice, namely the conversion from a measure to a weight, or rather from a weight to measure and back to a weight again.

The only solution would be to abandon the measure entirely and handle the grain all the way from farm to vessel on the weight system. The only reason that could be advanced for the present method of market quotations in bushels is because it is the method used in the United States and therefore Canada must string along with it. If I am wrong in this assumption then I stand to be corrected.

Mr. Cooper: Where did the hon. member get his information that a bushel of damp wheat weighs more than a bushel of dry wheat?

Mr. Badanai: If the hon. member would sit down for a moment he could make the calculation in the same way I made it, and he will arrive at the same conclusion. Market quotations can be quickly converted from price per bushel to price per hundredweight by means of a worked-out table such as the banks use for computing the rate of foreign currency.

By way of illustration, and for the benefit of the hon. member who just interrupted me, I wish to offer a table as follows:

Wheat at $1.50 per bushel equals $2.50 per hundredweight.

Oats at 75 cents per bushel equals $2.20 per hundredweight.

Barley at $1.00 per bushel equals $2.08 per hundredweight.

Flaxseed at $2.75 per bushel equals $4.91 per hundredweight.

Rye at $1.10 per bushel equals $1.96 per hundredweight.

These figures are approximate, but an amount to a fraction can be arrived at. I submit that such a method would greatly simplify the entire grain handling business and would present a much more accurate picture of the grain position in Canada. The adoption of a standardized method of grain measurement could probably lead to a universal adoption of the metric system. The change would be very desirable, because calculations would be concise; and, if Canada could prevail upon Britain and the United States to do likewise the Canadian government would be performing an important service which could be incalculable in the promotion of trade with all the other nations of the world.

Mr. Peters: One of the most important problems facing industry today is the sale of uranium to international markets. The minister has mentioned this on several occasions, and the other day the Leader of the Opposition asked a question on this important matter. His question was in regard to sales to the United States and the progress which is being made by Canada in negotiation with Washington for the sale of uranium after 1962.

In the answer the minister gave he pointed out that he was aware of the fact that there has been difficulty in negotiations with the United States and in sales to that country, but that there was some hope for a change after 1962. The Leader of the Opposition also asked if it was not true that uranium sales would quite likely increase in the years after 1970. I think that is probably the crux of the matter, and it is my impression that the problem has not been handled in a satisfactory manner to date.

We are all aware that the Canadian government has been vitally interested in the uranium development that took place at Elliot Lake and Blind River a few years ago. For years Canada was the major producer of uranium with mines in Yellowknife, Uranium City and other parts of northern Canada. With the development at Elliot Lake, Canada led the world in uranium production, but since that time other developments have taken place. Canada assisted in the development of the mines in many ways. As is pointed out in many publications, the cost of getting these mines into production ran as high as 30 per cent, which was much greater than was anticipated at the time the five year agreements with the mines were negotiated.

A much more important factor has now entered the picture. Uranium discoveries throughout the world have increased. The United States has increased production and is in a position now to supply nearly all the world's requirements for uranium. This has been reflected in the stock market. Stocks have dropped 55 per cent from the peak in 1957, and have decreased by 4 per cent in the last few months.

I am interested in what is happening in our mining communities. When I first came here early in 1957 I pointed out to the minister that the development in these areas did not appear to be in the best interests of the people in these communities. These people came from other settled mining fields and pioneered this development. They have built towns and communities and are now left holding the bag. They will be in dire straits by 1962 if the contracts cannot be renewed. The people who have put their life savings into homes or establishing stores or supplying other community services will be in disastrous straits if there is a widespread repetition of the lay-offs we have witnessed at one mine.

I know the hon. member for Algoma East will discuss this problem, as it affects his constituents but many of the people living there are not permanent residents. Their wives and families live in my area. These people are entitled to some stability, as are other people involved in production where the sale of the commodity is in the hands of the government and where the government is the sale agency and sole purchaser of the commodity. This is true of those who produce wheat, gold or uranium.

In the past we have approached this problem from the wrong direction. By 1962 we may not be selling uranium to the United States. We must examine what has happened across the world. United States scientists in recent years have developed a new process for the production of enriched uranium different from the natural uranium produced by Canada. Canadian scientists are to be congratulated for their diligence in tackling the problem of developing heavy water reactors, which are claimed by many scientists to be the most efficient, effective and by far the cheapest atomic reactors. The United States is already using atomic energy in plants and is producing atomic-powered submarines using enriched uranium. Natural uranium is treated with another great source of power such as coal or electricity to produce enriched uranium.

Canada must face several facts. We must recognize the development that has taken place and decide what to do. Many economists feel that Canada has neglected to do several things. We have spent large sums of money developing mines at Elliot Lake and Blind River, which is all to the good, but we have depended on international trade and the model agreement to too great an extent. The model agreement was worked out by the former government and taken over by the present one. According to Saturday Night it was designed by C.D. Howe, the former minister of defence production.

It is recognized by most people that Canada accepted the moral issues involved and believed that our country should sell sources of atomic energy only to nations that would use them for peaceful and industrial purposes. Inspection rights and other considerations were included in the agreements, and countries like Germany agreed to buy quantities of uranium. One high German official said, "We have had inspectors before and know how to deal with them." They thought they could look at the problem and decide what to do about it.

Saturday Night asked why the inspection clause was put in. I wish to read the article to which I have referred, because it explains what happened in the past and suggests what may happen in the future. The article, entitled "Canada should Abandon United States Uranium Market", was written by Robert Jamieson and appears in the February 28, 1959 issue. It reads:

> The origin of the inspection clause is admitted by Robert Winters, who was C. D. Howe's alternate in the Liberal cabinet, to have been a "gentleman's agreement" among the three partners in the combined development agency—Britain, the United States and Canada. Other information, however, indicates that it was entirely a United States concept and that the United Kingdom merely went along with it. Winters—and no doubt other Canadian ministers—honestly saw it as a moral issue: that it is wrong to place material which could be so dangerous to humanity in the hands of anyone without precautions to ensure it was used for peaceful purposes only.
> It is doubtful that the United States saw it this way. The evidence suggests that what they thought was possible, and what they sought in their own national interests, was a stranglehold control on all atomic energy development and supply sources in the western world. To the extent that this hypothesis is true, the Canadian ministers were taken in.
> But in any case such control is impossible. There are sources of uranium and other fissile material in many parts of the world. They differ only in their cost of development. And, as France showed when she developed her own high cost resources, some nations will pay any price to avoid what they regard as national humiliation.
> What has finally made nonsense of the Canadian stand is the sale by South Africa—its principal uranium competitor of the future—of a quantity of uranium without any restriction as to end use. This was a relatively small quantity sold to Japan, but it is reported from Johannesburg that the sale is expected to lead to a supply of some hundreds of tons a year.
> This news has been greeted by refusal to believe it. "It's not confirmed" said one prominent individual connected with the former administration. The report was carried by Reuters news agency on October 29, quoting the Transvalia company of Pretoria which negotiated the sale, and has been denied by none of the parties since.
> The uranium producers' brief submitted to the Canadian cabinet last month skirts this issue. Rio

Tinto, with both C. D. Howe and Robert Winters on its board, is the largest producer, and it is certainly in an awkward position to complain. The brief asks merely that more bilateral agreements be negotiated, or "other international machinery" be provided which would enable Canada to sell more uranium abroad.

This does not seem to me to be the whole story. In the United States they have been able to produce enriched uranium, and they have been able to sell it to the United Kingdom which is, with the exception of the United States, the largest market. They have been able to sell a small quantity of enriched uranium to the United Kingdom. I do not want to go into the methods of how to make enriched uranium, but this enriched uranium is in a concentrated form and is in a small package. You take a part of the energy which is already contained in the fissionable material and add to it another source of energy, and this can be contained in very small packages. This is necessary, Mr. Chairman, for such developments as atomic submarines, and it is also very valuable for other types of development, particularly in the undeveloped areas.

I point out, Mr. Chairman, that the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has also done some work in this field, because it is believed that in future in our northern development enriched uranium may be a boon to the small communities which are dependent entirely on outside sources of energy for the power they so vitally need for their development.

We have so far made no attempt to go into the field of enriched uranium, but we have one of the only sources of very cheap power in the world that is untapped today. It is admitted that the initial development of Hamilton falls in Labrador will produce 1 million horsepower at 3 mills a kilowatt. It was pointed out that in France the development of their projects cost something over 4 mills a kilowatt; while in Labrador enriched uranium could be produced at 3 mills a kilowatt in the initial development, and as the development is completed this cost would decrease with the increased output of that plant.

We can go into this field. If we do not go into it, it will mean that the United States, by controlling this mechanized form of uranium, will be able to control world trade in uranium although we and South Africa have by and large the biggest sources of uranium ore. We have to take a look at this particular problem, because it is going to be the only way in which to sell uranium in the years to come.

Canada is working on another project which is called CANDU. This project has been proceeded with very slowly. It is pointed out in the Financial Post of May 16 that our reactor wil be ready by 1964. The article goes on to say:

> Our Reactor Ready By '64.
> Uranium Sales Hang On It
> Canada's first big atomic-power reactor, CANDU, could be in operation by 1964 if the cabinet gave quick approval for a start on construction.
> It will produce 200,000 kilowatts of electrical energy.
> This would be a couple of years ahead of earlier programming, but a recommendation is before the cabinet from trade minister Churchill, the minister responsible for atomic energy.
> Total cost is not expected to be more than $60 million, but in the government's present tight financial position approval seems likely to be delayed for some time.

The reason for our going ahead with this is simply that through CANDU, which is a heavy water reactor, we can produce atomic energy efficiently, effectively and cheaply. It is admitted to be by far the cheapest way to produce this type of energy; but if we do not get it into production very shortly, and if we do not show to the rest of the world by our initial development that it is feasible and that we can do it and that we can show how much a kilowatt hour it is going to cost on the average to produce energy in this type of plant, even though other countries of the world know that this type of reactor is much more economical to operate they are going to go in for the small package unit which is being produced by the United States and which uses enriched uranium.

It is true, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, that it is expected that from 1970 on the needs for uranium for atomic energy will be increasing, and in the foreseeable future there will come a day when uranium again will be in great demand. But this is not going to help any of the people who are working in the mines at Elliot Lake at the present time. A number of the mines in that area are now producing 5,000 tons of uranium ore a day. Each of those mines could produce enough uranium to supply the needs of Canada in the foreseeable future. Therefore we can see immediately ahead an extensive lay-off in the uranium mining industry unless the minister gives some type of leadership in developing and pushing the completion of CANDU at the earliest possible date, so we can find out for ourselves and show the rest of the world that this type of heavy water reactor will be satisfactory for the production of power in other countries, and so other countries will be able to see a working model of a full-scale plant and decide for themselves whether they wish to buy a cheaper form of natural uranium or go into the field of enriched uranium.

This is very important. It again shows to me some of the lack of leadership that has taken place over the years in this parliament and some of the lack of leadership that is again taking place under this government. We should have known. We should have had advisers in Canada who could have told us this situation was going to develop. If we had been told we would not have developed the mines at Blind River and in the Elliot Lake area. We would have only developed those we knew we were going to be able to use. It seems odd to me that we should be spending money like a drunken sailor on such developments. Do not forget, Mr. Chairman, that dozens of my friends and your friends were killed in these mines simply because we were rushing to meet a deadline so the mines could go into production and take full advantage of the tax concessions granted by the government, and the sales contracts that expire in 1962 and 1963. We should have known.

This is in exactly the same situation as the Arrow project. We build something that probably surpasses anything built before in this field. We produce uranium as has never been done before, but we never decided what we were going to do with it when we produced it. If we had had a more far-sighted program we would now be building the Arrow and selling it to a number of countries.

Mr. Peters: Hon. members may laugh if they wish, but it seems to me that both this government and the former government have been guilty of this type of incompetent planning. We produce something and we do not decide where we are going to sell it. It is quite obvious this is true in the case of the Arrow, and I am suggesting that exactly the same situation is being repeated here with regard to the sale of uranium.

I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce realizes that we are in a wonderful position because, no matter what happens, if we have the initiative, foresight and willingness to work we are not going to be the losers so far as the production of uranium is concerned. At Hamilton falls, Labrador, we have a source of energy that will produce enriched uranium cheaper than it can be produced at the present time by the use of Kentucky coal. This can be done, and we should immediately start an investigation to see whether we should go ahead with this type of program. The United Kingdom is buying enriched uranium and wants enriched uranium, and that country will help us to finance the development of electrical power at Hamilton falls necessary for the production of enriched uranium. We can be the leader in the field of enriched uranium if we junk our model agreement and—junk our past trade policy and overcome our instability to decide what we are going to do for a period of any more than a year or two.

We can also remain in the natural uranium field. We can push the redevelopment of the $60 million CANDU reactor. We can go ahead with that and have it in production before 1964. In fact, if the minister will use a little ingenuity we might have it in operation by the time our sales contracts expire in 1962 and 1963. We have a wonderful opportunity, and if a little foresight is used the problem that has developed in the mining fields throughout the years will not become an important factor. We will be able to maintain our sales on a reasonable basis and remain in the uranium field.

We are fortunate in Canada that in our uranium resources we have an exceptionally large source of power. These resources are found not only in the Elliot Lake and Blind River areas but also, as I neglected to mention, not far from Ottawa in the Bancroft area, where there are a number of major producers. These producers and their workers are faced with exactly the same problem and it can be solved in exactly the same way as in the case of Blind River.

I suggest that the matter hinges completely on what the minister is going to do. If he is going to sit in a hotel room in Washington and negotiate with United States officials I can tell him right here and now that he cannot win. Their negotiators are going to have the interests of their own country at heart, which is as it should be, and their interests involve controlling the development of enriched uranium throughout the world. The fact is that the country that can bottleneck the production of uranium will control the development of the world in the next four or five decades.

Congressional committees have held hearings on this matter, and there has been terrific resentment against renewing the contracts with Canada. Arguments have been presented by their own industry, which is now very nearly large enough to supply the needs of the United States, and they have been very strongly opposed to the renewal of the Canadian contracts and the buying of uranium from Canada at a set price. The minister is going to engage in negotiation in that atmosphere, and I suggest that no matter how capable he is he is going to come out second best. But if we proceed to push the development of our own reactor so we can show the world that natural uranium can be used as an economic, efficient and effective source to produce atomic energy for industrial purposes, we will then be able to sell this much cheaper product to other countries of the world that are going to need it.

If we fail to go ahead with this project I suggest that there is an obligation to negotiate with the United Kingdom for financial assistance to develop power in Labrador so we can also get into the production of enriched uranium. I am familiar with some of the problems involved in this matter. I am not a scientist, but I know that Canada has spent pretty nearly all its resources in this field on the old type heavy water reactor. However, I am quite sure that with the co-operation we can get from the United Kingdom and the co-operation we have and will continue to receive from our Canadian scientists, Canada has a bright and effective future in the sale of uranium and will continue to be the leader in this field. But this demands that these two steps be taken immediately; that we investigate and get into the field of enriched uranium, and that we get into production with our CANDU reactor within the next year or two.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the wish of the committee to proceed with the estimates and other business of the house as rapidly as possible, but that does not preclude me from answering immediately some of the fantastic statements that have been made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I can assure him that I am not going to sit in the house and listen to these charges of incompetence and failure to foresee the future and take action on the part of the government without replying immediately. If the hon. member wishes to make more statements today, tomorrow or next week on the same basis as his statements of today I will be quite prepared to answer them.

Part of his statement today was sound and logical and the rest of it was completely illogical and fantastic. He has said that we should have known there would not be a demand for uranium after 1962. How in the world were we to know facts like that when, at the time Blind River was discovered and developed, there were no other known suitable sources of uranium in other parts of the world? Since that time uranium discoveries have been made equal in volume and perhaps greater in value per pound than some of the discoveries in Canada. How in the world could this government or its predecessor have foreseen these discoveries?

That is the type of statement to which I object. When the hon. member talks sensibly and produces plans that are reasonable I am prepared to listen to him, but I am not prepared to listen without objection to some statements he has made. It was just impossible to know a few years ago what was going to happen in the uranium field in the future when the only source of supply was the Belgian Congo and our mines in northern Canada. Pressure to discover and develop uranium then resulted in the amazing development at Blind River. That has been followed in recent years by the discovery that the tailings of the gold mines in South Africa contain uranium, and then the extensive discoveries of uranium in the United States.

Now, who could have foreseen that? Could my hon. friend? Certainly we make no claim to being able to see that far into the future. If there is, and I hope there will not be, a reduction in the export of uranium in the future, I hope my hon. friend will not blame this government or the preceding government for failure to foresee what was going to happen.

My hon. friend states we should be in the field of enriched uranium and should develop Hamilton falls so that enriched uranium could be produced. He understands from his reading that a vast amount of electric power is required to produce enriched uranium, hence the need for the development of Hamilton falls. He has no authority for his statement that the United Kingdom is prepared at this moment to co-operate with Canada in the development of Hamilton falls for that purpose. He has seized upon a sentence in some article he has read in some magazine or other. The cost of the development, which my hon. friend did not mention, runs into the hundreds of millions of dollars.

My hon. friend suggests that we should scrap our bilateral agreements with some countries because by so doing we would enlarge our sales of uranium abroad. These bilateral agreements are specifically designed so the importing country will agree that it will not use this uranium for anything but peaceful purposes. Does my hon. friend suggest we should carelessly sell this uranium to any country in the world which may develop an atomic bomb or a nuclear bomb? Is that how careless my hon. friend would be with the sales of uranium? He says, let us chuck these small agreements—

Mr. Peters: South Africa already has.

Mr. Churchill: There is an international agreement with regard to this whole matter. South Africa made a sale to Japan of a small quantity of uranium. My understanding is that it will not be repeated. My hon. friend says they are prepared to sell hundreds of tons of uranium to Japan without any safeguard whatever. I have been informed that this type of sale will not be repeated by South Africa. I do not know where my hon. friend gets his information, but I regret that he should suggest that we should scrap these bilateral arrangements whereby we are assured that uranium will be used only for peaceful purposes.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister permit a question? Is South Africa a party to the United Nations agreement for the control of atomic energy for peaceful purposes?

Mr. Churchill: I am not sure of that immediately, but I shall have that information later. The hon. member for Timiskaming went a little further. He suggested that if I would show leadership or something we would have CANDU completed next year or the following year.

Mr. Peters: No; 1964.

Mr. Churchill: I wish I could speak with the authority he does, with such little knowledge of these scientific processes. It is the advice of the scientists who have been engaged for years in the development of atomic power and its application that I accept; they are the ones who set the period during which a reactor may be built and brought into production. They have not informed me that the program can be accelerated in any way. What am I to do, march out with a flag and say "Let us get on with this program"? Then Mr. Chairman, the hon. member says if we can get this built within that time, we are assured of the sale of uranium abroad immediately afterwards.

Our program is based on sound scientific principles. The scientific work has been done already at Chalk River. The model plant, NPD, has been developed. It is on the basis of our scientists' observations there that they have recommended that CANDU be proceeded with. Last fall I made a suggestion to the atomic energy authorities that we should advance the program with regard to CANDU, if they could assure me that their scientific observations warranted proceeding with it before NPD was finally completed. They came back with the assurance and the program has been advanced, as the announcement was made just the other day. We are going ahead with this program using natural uranium and heavy water.

As I have said in the house before, the scientists of the world are looking with great interest to that development. They are showing greater interest in it than they did two years ago. They are in close touch with the work our scientists are doing in this country, and they are looking hopefully, as our people are, to the use of natural uranium and heavy water as the most economic method by which to produce electric power from uranium sources.

This is the situation with regard to our program and the situation with regard to CANDU. Now, after a few years have elapsed, if the demonstration, as we hope, indicates that this is an economic way of producing power from uranium, then the market for Canadian built reactors and the market for Canadian natural uranium may be assured. This is the target at which we are aiming, and we hope in time that it will support our uranium producing industry here at home.

I am quite in agreement with the hon. member in his sympathetic remarks concerning the people who are in the mining camps at Elliot Lake and elsewhere. They entered into those mines in good faith with the prospect of many years of livelihood ahead of them. They have purchased their homes or started to purchase their homes, and they are now in an insecure position. I have every sympathy for people who are thus placed. I met with a delegation from Elliot Lake just the other day and talked this over with them. I fully appreciate their situation. Anything we can do to help them I am sure will be done. I am sure the provincial government of Ontario and the mine management will be extremely careful to see that no serious harm comes to the people who are really doing the work in these mines.

The activity of the dominion government that may be helpful where uranium production is concerned is in connection with the arrangements with United States authorities concerning the purchase of our uranium, which arrangements may lapse on March 31, 1961. The hon. member for Timiskaming claims that we will not make any headway at all in dealing with United States authorities. Again he has no basis for that statement. We have established close relations with our opposite numbers in the United States. There is room for negotiation and there is a proper, friendly field for negotiations there in the United States,

I am not at this moment going to agree with the hon. member that we cannot accomplish anything. He seems to have all this decided, and he is so sure that we have made no plans, that nothing will be done, and that we are thoroughly incompetent. These are the steps which can be taken by the dominion government, and they are in process right now. A complete study is being made of the uranium situation in Canada with a forecast for the future for that industry, and we are taking into account that negotiations will have to be carried out and continued with the authorities in the United States. We cannot give an answer today, nor tomorrow, but this ranks with very high priority in the matters which are of concern to the dominion government.

I can assure my hon. friend, and I would like to assure the people in the uranium industry, that we are fully aware of the seriousness of the situation and we intend to take such steps as are open to us to ameliorate the conditions, if possible to guarantee the future of a stable uranium industry in Canada, and protect the livelihood of the people who are in those mining towns at the present time. That, Mr. Chairman, is all I want to say at this moment with regard to the problems raised by my hon. friend.

The Leader of the Opposition asked me whether or not South Africa is a member of the international agency, and that is true; South Africa is a member. The sale of uranium by South Africa to Japan, the one which was mentioned, was under a form of bilateral agreement, and safeguard conditions were written into the contract.

Mr. Peters: Before the minister sits down, he mentioned the fact that I could not estimate a few years ago that this was going to be the situation, but is the minister aware of the fact that Central Mortgage and Housing knew of this? Is he aware that Central Mortgage and Housing made a special contract with miners buying homes, and that they only guaranteed to underwrite mortgages for the years which were covered by the agreement, in other words up to 1962-63? Is he also aware that they will have to carry the mortgage themselves after that, which is an indication that it was known there would be trouble after 1962 in renewing these contracts, not in terms of a market but in terms of prices which they would get for uranium?

Mr. Churchill: I would say that is sound business prudence when you are dependent upon whether or not options will be taken up some time in the future.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I am in complete agreement with the hon. member for Timiskaming as well as the minister on the importance of the uranium industry and on the importance to Canada, indeed to the world, of atomic energy questions generally, and I will have something to say about that a little later in my remarks.

I agree with the hon. member that the development of this industry, so important to our country, requires energy, initiative and planning both on the part of government and on the part of private enterprise. I think the minister is correct when he says that it would have been difficult, if not impossible, a few years ago to estimate with any degree of accuracy the civilian, non-military consumption of atomic energy and of uranium after 1962, just as it would have been difficult, if not impossible, to forecast the dicovery of sources of uranium. There has been a great deal done in recent years in the United States in that regard which was certainly not expected, shall I say, five or six years ago. However, Mr. Chairman, as I say, I will come back to that a little later.

I would like to discuss now some of the more general questions of trade, especially export trade, that have arisen in the minister's earlier statement and in his statement last night, some of which I dealt with when the estimates were up the first time. I also express my appreciation to the minister for replying to some of the questions I raised at that time. The minister last night and earlier emphasized the strength of our export position, and of course I do not quarrel with him for doing that. In so far as our exports have held up during these difficult years I think we can take a great deal of satisfaction, because not only prosperity but the very economic stability of this country depends on exports not only holding up but increasing. As I said to the minister on this matter earlier, there are some difficulties and danger points, and it is our duty and our right to point them out.

I was glad he mentioned last night the importance of economic developments in Europe, the common market and the free trade area. He mentioned their importance not only to Europe, where they would have very great economic and political significance, but the important problem to Canada and indeed the whole of the Atlantic community. The inability, as the minister knows, of the common market to develop into a European free trade area has resulted in those European countries in O.E.E.C. who are not members of the European market forming themselves into, shall I call it, a group of seven, who certainly are not concerned with artistic endeavour. The outer seven, as I think they are called, include the United Kingdom and the Scandinavian countries.

This parallel development may result in a European free trade area, but if things do not go well it might have other and less desirable consequences, such as the division of Europe into two trading blocs. I was reading a very interesting dispatch on this matter from London, a Canadian Press dispatch of June 27, which I would like to quote from the Toronto Globe and Mail because it explains this development in terms which are of very great interest to this country. It deals with the relationship of this development to commonwealth trade, and the article has this to say:

To counter this—

That is, to counter the common market.

—negotiations to form a little free trade area were launched last month by countries outside the common market. British officials express the hope that the agreement among the seven will be signed by the end of the year and will be ratified early next year.

The little free trade area hopes to start operations July 1, 1960, with a 20 per cent tariff cut. This would correspond roughly to the tariff cuts expected to be made by the six members of the common market.

It is interesting to speculate what this kind of tariff cut may mean to Canadian and commonwealth trade. The minister told us last night that we can take assurance that all these countries are in GATT, and they have their responsibilities under GATT to carry out, which it is assumed they will maintain. A member of the British government, Paymaster General Maudling, who has had a great deal to do with this development on behalf of the British government, is quoted as saying that the principal aim of the outer seven is to prevent the further disintegration of economic unity in western Europe. Of course that is an aim which we naturally support in Canada. Then he went on to say:

The little free trade area should help pave the way for the establishment of a multilateral association on a non-discriminatory basis that will embrace all members of the O.E.E.C.

If that happens, that will be a desirable development provided it happens in such a way that barriers are not raised in this European area against other countries. The article concludes by saying:

British officials view the formation of the little free trade area as a move to facilitate development of a larger free trade area and to maintain the coherence of the O.E.E.C.

They concede, however, that some commonwealth countries "may be concerned" about whether formation of a second trading group is the right way to achieve greater European economic unity.

So while this new development, this second European group, may lead to a larger European development, it may not. If it does not it will be a move in the wrong direction. If it leads to that European free trade area it will be a move in the right direction, as I think Canada would see it, provided it is done without raising unnecessary trade barriers against the outside world.

Not long ago we had the pleasure of welcoming to Ottawa one of the men who has perhaps done more for European economic political integration than any man alive, Mr. Jean Monnet. I remember talking to him—and I have great respect for his experience and judgment in such matters—about the possible consequences of this development. He said nothing could be more important, in his opinion than the establishment of the right kind of economic co-operation beween those European countries and the United States and Canada.

I know I do not need to preach on this subject to the minister, because I know these are his own views as well as those of all hon. members who are interested in Canadian economic development. But nothing could be more important than beginning this work of association across the Atlantic at once, before this development hardens and proceeds so far that the arrangements are frozen.

I might mention in this connection, that meetings were held last month to consider arrangements for developing a Latin-American bloc, and if this process continues in other parts of the world then instead of having nationalist protection groups we shall, or we may, have bloc protectionist groups. That would be a more harmful thing for Canada than for any other single country in the world; harmful both economically and politically, because our bloc then, would be the North American bloc, and while we can take a good deal of pride in our North American association we do not want to be completely identified with it, either economically or politically.

One of the areas where such a bloc might develop would have, as its key nation, Japan. Mention was made by the hon. member for Ottawa West and others of the importance to Canada of increased trade with Japan, and the minister has acknowledged that importance. In 1956-57 Japan took more than one third of the quantity of wheat supplied to the United Kingdom, and in the next year 1957-58 Japan took 38 million bushels as against 104 million bushels which went to the United Kingdom. This has been an important trade development. Even though the figures for exports to Japan last year were down, wheat exports had increased. Perhaps there is no area in the world where the possibility of increasing our grain shipments is greater than Japan, because Japan and other eastern countries are switching from rice to wheat and barley and that presents very great opportunities for Canadian exports if we can exploit them.

This emphasizes, if emphasis is necessary, the great folly of taking action against Japanese exports to this country, action of a kind which would give the Japanese government perhaps no alternative, in view of public opinion in that country, but to take retaliatory action against our exports to Japan, which are already two or three times greater than our imports from that country. I know that certain circumstances have to be met, especially in the textile industry. I know there are special difficulties there, but I should like to underline once again that if we attempt to overcome these difficulties in a way which would provoke legitimate retaliation against us, we would suffer in this country far more than the textile industry could possibly be helped.

This mention of Japan as a possible market for larger quantities of our grain leads me to the consideration of the more general question of agricultural exports, especially the disposal of farm surpluses. In our country these are becoming burdensome, though not as burdensome as they are in the United States, a country whose economy is, however, better able to support such a burden. A little less than a year ago the United States government reduced its barter program by which it had sought to dispose of its agricultural surpluses, and we were encouraged by that move which was made because the Americans found that that kind of operation cut into cash sales. They were worried about that, and also they were getting complaints from their friends, and from Canada in particular, about the effect of these barter sales on their exports.

As I say, we were encouraged by that decision to reduce this barter program, but the minister will recall that last November the program was restored on account, I think, of congressional pressure, which is very difficult to resist and difficult for a foreign government to counteract. At that time Canada was assured that even though the barter program was to be restored there would be no interference with normal commercial markets.

I am not sure whether this was a formal assurance. In any event that assurance does not seem to have been realized, in the light of what has happened since that time. Last year, I am informed, United States barter deals amounted to about $65 million. This year the figures show that from January to March alone United States barter deals amount to $60 million, and the monthly figures are now running higher. During this year barter deals in agricultural products may amount to a figure as high as $300 million.

It may well be that any representations we make at Washington on that score would be prejudiced by our export policy with regard to agricultural products, necessitated by our own price support program in Canada. The minister will undoubtedly have seen the remarks of agricultural secretary Benson on July 13, when he was talking about Canadian-United States trade in agricultural products. He is reported by the Canadian Press as having said, "I believe that generally it would be in both our interests to remove restrictions and provide freedom in our trade."

I do not know whether this was a free trade offer from a member of the United States cabinet or not. I suspect that it was pretty loose, probably looser than the proposal made by the United Kingdom a year and a half ago. However, he made it clear that he was deeply concerned over what he described as a rather restricted attitude of the Canadian government on some farm products, particularly turkeys. He is reported in the Montreal Star of July 13 as having said that United States turkey growers were "quite upset" over what amounted to a virtual Canadian embargo on turkey imports. The United States are now trying to get Canada to relax the curbs, and he was hopeful something would be done soon, he added.

Probably Mr. Benson, who has been so upset about this, will now be more understanding with regard to Canadian protests over United States policy in these matters, which has been carried to a far greater length than anything which has been done by Canada in this direction. He was particularly alarmed not only about turkeys but about Canadian hog production and the export of hogs under what he described as subsidized prices. It is a little ironic, it seems to me, to have the United States Secretary of Agriculture expressing such alarm over this type of trade when we have been attempting to make an impact on their consciences in Washington for many years in respect of exactly the same type of thing carried to greater extremes on the part of their own authorities.

The minister has mentioned in the house that one way of dealing with our agricultural surpluses is by international arrangements for their disposal. I agree that if it can be done in that way, that is of course the right way to do it. We have been considering this matter with perhaps inadequate success for a great many years. In recent months we have perhaps been able to take some encouragement—we are not sure how it will work out in practice—over President Eisenhower's food for peace proposal and the wheat utilization committee which I think originated in the proposal of the President. The Minister of Trade and Commerce referring to this matter is quoted as saying that this committee is:

> —designed to avoid swamping the world's normal commercial markets with wheat give-aways.

But the Financial Post of May 16, to which my hon. friend referred in another connection, had this to say about the wheat utilization committee through its Washington correspondent:

> There is a shaky future ahead for the new international "food for peace" committee to coordinate wheat surplus disposals to hungry nations. Stripped of its flowery phraseology, the communiqué establishing the committee stands as a rather indecent skeleton with a few bones missing. Whether the missing bones and any flesh will be added depends entirely on United States attitudes.

That may well be the case. If the United States wishes to establish a committee for the purpose the minister and I have mentioned it may become an important agency in the resolving of the agricultural surplus problems. Otherwise it will not mean much and will be just another committee.

I do not want to be entirely pessimistic in this matter, but perhaps our previous experience gives us some cause for hesitation about the results of a committee of this kind set up by Washington. Indeed, the United States may conceivably use this committee as a screen behind which it can get rid of even more surplus agricultural products and stifle criticism through the committee by emphasizing that it is part of an international humanitarian policy. That is perhaps why it would have been more effective to have done this through the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations. I am not criticizing the government on this matter, because perhaps it could not have been done in this way; but if it could have been done through that organization it might have been more effective in that sense.

When the minister speaks again I should like him to give us a little more information about the work of this new committee. When it was announced in May there appeared to be some confusion and contradiction about its function, and the minister was reported in the Financial Post article of May 16 to which I have already referred, and which quotation I have already read, as having said:

> —the committee is designed to avoid swamping the world's normal commercial markets with wheat give-aways.

But Senator Humphrey, who was a strong proponent of the idea and perhaps one of its initiators, at that time saw in this committee a method of moving, by give-away and barter sales for local currency, some of the United States wheat surplus which this year according to Secretary Benson may reach the figure of 1,400 million bushels. He thought that through a committee of this kind the United States might be able to dispose of 2,500 million bushels in barter or for local currency over the course of five years. After that meeting in May the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture, who were in Washington, claimed that the new committee would ensure that the United States would not make any surplus disposal deals without consulting others on the committee. Presumably that is the main purpose of the committee, consultation before entertaining deals of that kind.

At that time, as the minister may remember, Secretary Benson did not accept the obligation of automatic consultation. If I remember his words correctly he restricted it to consultation only after a specific objection was made by a member to a proposed deal. I agree that later in June he was a little more forthright about the way the committee would work. I hope the minister will be able to reassure the committee in regard to the operations of this wheat utilization committee, and will tell us that it is not going to be used as a smokescreen behind which the United States will dump more and more wheat on world markets, especially by barter sale.

There was another development in recent months which was offered to us in the house as providing some encouragement in the disposition of our wheat surplus and that was the organization of a NATO food bank. This proposal was first made some time ago by the Prime Minister, but at that time—and I think it has been made pretty clear since—it was not taken very seriously at the NATO council. Indeed at that time I believe the United States rejected the idea, and certainly I have no information that there was a serious discussion on a political level of the desirability and possibility of a NATO food bank being established. I remember that the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Benson, was quoted in the Vancouver Sun of May 8, 1959, as having said:

> I never thought much of the idea. When you pin it right down most of the interest is in the United States providing the wheat and paying the storage.

That has certainly not been borne out by events. What is this new proposal? It is, I think, that $10 million should be used for wheat and flour for a NATO food bank, if and when that bank is set up, and that there should be $2,500,000 appropriated to reimburse the agricultural commodities stabilization account for dried skim milk donated to international relief agencies, organizations and governments. That was announced at that time

The reaction of some members to this proposal was pessimistic, and that pessimism is perhaps justified in view of the fact that we have made a contribution to a NATO food bank but we have no assurance—perhaps assurances could not have been expected at that time—but we have no reason to believe that the $10 million we have in our estimates for the NATO food bank can be used for that purpose by the setting up of such a food bank through NATO in Paris to which all of the members of NATO would subscribe.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it one o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair. May I remind hon. members that the committee will reconvene at two o'clock.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, at one o'clock I was discussing disposal of our agricultural surpluses, particularly in relation to United States policy in this matter, and had just begun to mention another mechanism which the government hopes will be of help in this direction, through the establishment of a NATO food bank. Of course at the present time this bank is nothing more than a proposal on the part of the government. Unless that proposal is accepted by the NATO members, and more particularly by the United States of America, it is not likely to be very effective for the purpose the government has in mind.

Up to the present, at least as far as I know, the United States has shown no disposition to be enthusiastic about this scheme. If the minister thinks I am being unduly pessimistic about the prospects in regard to the NATO food bank, perhaps I could quote a couple of sentences from an editorial in the Toronto Globe and Mail of June 5, which is not, I must say, too optimistic about this proposal. The editorial is entitled:

What Food Bank, Where?

It begins in this way:

There is probably no law against it, but it is certainly questionable procedure to ask parliament to vote money for non-existent institutions. Yet this is what Prime Minister Diefenbaker has done in explaining a $10 million item in the supplementary estimates for the storage of flour for a North Atlantic Treaty Organization food bank.

Perhaps I made a mistake earlier when I said $10 million for wheat and flour. The editorial ends in this way:

The proposal is hard to take seriously. Is it really anything more than an effort to dispose of an embarrassing surplus? If Canada's flour cannot be sold profitably in normal markets, it would be far better to make it into bread and give it away to the world's hungry. That, at least, would give some meaning to our money.

In the same paper, the day before, Mr. Duffy, the Ottawa correspondent of that paper, had this to say:

Until there is international agreement and the food bank is established, this is merely agricultural price support smelling as sweetly by another name, with the cost put on the account of external affairs, instead of the Department of Agriculture.

In so far as the milk powder operation is concerned, he described it as a straight bookkeeping transaction, with the debit again being dumped into the external affairs account or, in effect, as he said:

The agriculture department has sold external affairs a lot of milk.

In view of what the Minister of Agriculture has said earlier in this session, it may not be too easy for the Department of External Affairs to dispose of that milk, in spite of an optimistic statement by the Prime Minister in the house. The Minister of Agriculture said some weeks ago that though the Canadian government offered 30 million pounds of this powder as gifts to international relief agencies in January of 1958, to date only 18 million pounds has been taken. Perhaps we should not expect too much of this NATO food bank idea as an immediate means of disposing of our agricultural surpluses, valuable as the idea is and much as we hope it may be implemented as a truly effective NATO plan.

There is another point I would like to mention, which is an important one, or should be an increasingly important one in export trade. In this connection it is not a question of competing with the United States in world markets; it is a question of one of our products trying to get into the United States market, its natural and its important market. I am referring, of course, to oil. The government, and indeed the house and country generally, have taken satisfaction over the lifting of the mandatory restrictions which were imposed by the United States government on our exports of oil to that country some time ago. It is true that, whether as a result of that lifting or for other reasons, there was a 15.6 per cent increase in our exports of oil to the United States in the last month over the preceding one; but, as the financial editor of the Montreal Gazette said on June 30—and he has written a great deal and I think with intelligence and common sense on this matter—this increase in our exports of oil to the United States did not result in any production benefit in Canada, because it was more than offset by a drop in the demand for western oil in Ontario owing to an increase in imports in that part of Canada from the United States and from Venezuela. I quote a paragraph from his article on that point. He said:

The matching of sales to the United States by American sales to Canada strengthens the suspicion that there is not, and hasn't been for some time, a "natural market" for oil and petroleum products.

Perhaps it is difficult indeed to talk realistically about a natural market for a product of this kind which is under such complicated and important international corporation control. We all hope that our exports of oil to the United States will increase. Notwithstanding the difficulties of using the term "natural market", it would seem that this part of the United States, the northwest and the west, is or should be in a rational economic world the natural market for our oil. Yet there are important incentives to United States companies to import from other sources than from their Canadian subsidiaries, and those incentives are going to make it difficult, I think, notwithstanding the removal of restrictions, to increase our exports to that country.

One difficulty is that Canadian exports of oil to the United States market are prorated over all the Canadian companies. The United States subsidiary in Canada must therefore share its export business with competing companies, but that is not the case with the United States subsidiary in other parts of the world. Second, the margin of profit to a United States company is much greater in oil from other areas than from Canada, especially, I suppose, the mid-eastern oil fields. Then there is and will be heavy political pressure on United States companies in these foreign fields, especially the Middle Eastern fields, to take the maximum amount of oil from these fields for the United States, because the more oil the United States companies take the greater the royalties will be to the local governments or rulers, and any reduction of United States imports from these fields to the advantage, if you like, of Canada would mean, and indeed has meant in the not too distant past, threats of nationalization by these local potentates.

We must remember also in connection with this oil problem that paragraph C(2) of the presidential proclamation exempting Canadian oil from quota restrictions made it perfectly clear that the quotas would be re-established if Canadian oil began to compete with United States oil through large volumes of imports. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, perhaps the Calgary Herald was being quite realistic when it said in an editorial on May 4, 1959:

> It is quite possible that the lifting of the United States import quotas will do Canadian independence and Canadian control of its resources a great deal of harm. . . . Keeping the trade lines flowing west to east and vice versa is Canada's age old problem. It may soon be clear that the United States import decision, which will probably bring only slight economic relief, will exact a greater price from Canadian independence.

[Mr. Pearson.]

No doubt what the newspaper meant is that if because of the removal of these restrictions we assume that our oil is now going to move easily across the border into the United States and production can go up for that purpose, and we lose the interest in the eastern Canadian market that has been created in the past because of restrictions, perhaps in the long run we will suffer by this removal.

The minister is quite as aware as any member of the house that notwithstanding this action taken by the United States government, the long range problem remains of ensuring a market for our Canadian oil to take care of increased production and that if that market, through one method or another and in spite of United States governmental action which may seem to benefit us, becomes impossible in the northwestern states or is limited to that area, one day the question of marketing that oil in eastern Canada will have to be faced seriously.

I know, as the minister knows, the difficulty that will involve, the governmental intervention and governmental interference that might involve, and I know that the lines of this trade at this time at least should be moving north and south across the border. But if that cannot be done, and if it becomes clear that even without restrictions that is not going to be done, then any government in Canada faced with that problem will have to give serious consideration to the action required to market the oil in eastern Canada.

There is one other commodity I want to mention. I have already indicated to the minister that I would be talking about it. It is the problem mentioned this morning by the hon. member for Timiskaming with respect to uranium and the development of atomic energy. I know the Canadian government has made certain bilateral agreements to facilitate and increase the marketing of this essential commodity, which has now become such an important factor in our export trade that this year the figure may reach $300 million or more. This puts it right up in the top half dozen commodities.

I believe, and the minister will correct me if I am wrong, that agreements have now been reached, apart from our agreements with the United States and the United Kingdom, with Pakistan, West Germany, Japan and I think with Switzerland. If there are any additional agreements perhaps he will inform the committee. I wonder whether under these agreements, apart from the United Kingdom and the United States, any contracts have been signed for the supply of uranium itself.

I am also anxious to know—the minister mentioned this matter this morning, and gave us some assurance in this regard—whether the stipulations we are observing because we signed a United Nations convention to this effect—and it would have been impossible for us not to have done so—in respect of guarantees for the non-military use of uranium are being observed by other exporters. I think the minister has set at rest some of the doubts we may have had from press reports on that score, but it would not be a very happy position for Canada if, having scrupulously observed the provisions of an international agreement in this regard which do bind our hands in some respects, we found that competing countries were not taking the same scrupulous attitude toward these agreements.

The other day the minister announced in the house the signing of an agreement with Japan; but that agreement, important as it may become, is not of the same type as the agreement which the United States signed with Japan a year or two ago and in which were included provisions for the actual supply of uranium. In the agreement of June, 1958 the United States makes available over a term of ten years a net amount of 2,700 kilograms of uranium 235 sold or leased to Japan for use in research and experimental work with power reactors. But I understand that our agreement with Japan is merely an enabling agreement, that there is no assurance that any uranium will be sold under that agreement, and that there are negotiations proceeding at the present time with Japan for the implementing of this agreement by an actual contract for the sale of uranium. If the minister can inform us about that matter it would be interesting information for the committee to receive.

There is no doubt, as the hon. member for Timiskaming pointed out, that we are going to be subjected to the stiffest kind of competition from the United States and perhaps also from the United Kingdom in the supply of uranium, and I am not sure that the kind of competition we are facing from the United States is equal competition any more than it has been in the case of some agricultural products.

The United States certainly have the jump on us in this matter. They made their agreement with Japan a year and a half ago; I understand they have now made 17 other bilateral agreements, and that a part of most of their agreements, which I do not think is included in our agreements, deals with the sale by the United States government on easy terms of reactors which are, as was pointed out this morning, designed to use only enriched uranium, the kind we do not produce but which is produced in the United States.

For instance, in the agreement the United States have made with the European atomic agency, EURATOM, they have included provision for a long term loan of $135 million and a ten year guarantee with respect to the supply of enriched uranium. Therefore this is going to mean very stiff competition indeed for our uranium producers even if we are able to make agreements with all these countries.

The United Kingdom is also entering this field in a big way. The United Kingdom as I have said, has made a ten year agreement with EURATOM. I do not know whether as part of that agreement or as part of the negotiations United Kingdom reactors are to be supplied to these European countries, but I have read that the United Kingdom Dragon reactor is the choice of 12 of them. If these European countries do use that kind of reactor we may find we have again been left behind in what is becoming a highly competitive field.

I hope that will not happen as much as the minister does, but while I do not go as far as the hon. member for Timiskaming in condemning the lack of arrangements and the lack of planning in this regard, I say it would be unfortunate indeed if the Canadian type reactor, which we are led to believe is as modern, as advanced and as efficient as any in the world, is going to be pushed aside for United Kingdom and United States reactors which use enriched uranium because of financial and other advantages in the agreements made by the United Kingdom and the United States.

It is therefore of the greatest possible importance, as was emphasized this morning, to get our CANDU reactor built soon in Canada, to show what it can do and to try to make the maximum progress possible in providing Canadian reactors and Canadian uranium in the world market. I know the minister has announced that the first Canadian power reactor should be in operation in 1964 or 1965. I know that plans have been made to that end. I should like to ask the minister whether any other provinces have shown any interest in this project and have requested reactors for power purposes, and whether the government is in touch with the provinces for the purpose of encouraging that kind of development. It certainly is necessary, as I pointed out in the beginning of my remarks, that both industry and government at the provincial and federal levels show initiative, drive and planning so we will not be left behind, not only in the international market but perhaps at home.

The importance of this matter in terms of the future was stressed by the chairman of the Ontario hydroelectric commission, Mr.

Duncan, in an interview on June 12, when he said that once the first big nuclear plant is built, relatively rapid progress would take place, and by 1980 about one-third of the total Ontario power production may come from nuclear energy. However, about a day later in the same newspaper there was an article by the same writer, Mr. Anderson, pointing out the fact that Canadian industry is not showing boldness, initiative and drive but is leaving too much to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. If this is related to what Mr. Duncan has said, if we are, as he has suggested to get one third of Ontario power resources from nuclear energy by 1980, then industry, according to this article, will have to show more drive and initiative than has been the case in the past.

I do not need to dwell on the importance of this matter. The minister knows its importance. It is important not only to export trade to build these reactors and develop power from atomic energy, but it is important also from the point of view of domestic development in this connection. We have a particular situation at Elliot Lake, which is the world's largest uranium producing area, I suppose, at the present time. That whole community, as the minister mentioned this morning, is uneasy about the future and has a feeling of insecurity because the contract with the United States, which takes practically all the uranium from the area, will expire in 1962.

The minister pointed out that five or six years ago it was impossible to foresee future production. But we know now that there has been a great increase in United States production of uranium. While the markets of the world around 1970 or 1972 may require all the uranium that can be produced in the world, if some steps are not taken between 1962 when this contract expires and those years when the peaceful uses of atomic energy will have developed to bridge that gap, then this community may disappear.

Elliot Lake has been constructed to last. It is a thriving, progressive community whose people have pride in it. But it might suffer to the point where it would become like the ghost towns of the thirties. This is a problem that weighs on everybody's mind in that particular community. The sooner, therefore, the government can make some announcement of the intention of the United States to renew the option which expires in 1962, the better it will be not only for that area but for our whole uranium trade.

I suggest to the minister that if the United States government is to be prevailed upon to renew these options it will require diplomatic pressure at the highest possible level. It may even require, and perhaps it should, intervention by the Prime Minister with the President. This is a matter of major importance. I remember that a few months ago the director of the division of raw materials of the United States atomic energy commission speaking in Wyoming made a very gloomy prediction from our point of view concerning the future markets for uranium in the United States. He said at that time that it was expected the United States government's uranium procurement program would be based primarily on the utilization of its own resources.

But he also said at that time that in the latter part of 1948 they had an urgent military requirement for uranium. As one who was in the government at that time I know how urgent that requirement was. I know the pressure that was brought to bear on the Canadian government to make every possible effort to get this field going, and that was done. We were told that in doing so it was not only important from the point of view of commercial development in Canada, but it was a great service to the defence of the free world that this vital strategic material should be in abundant supply in time for the United States to build up its atomic weapons as a deterrent against war.

As I have said before in this house and perhaps I can repeat now that after having done that, after having built this community in Elliot Lake—not a community of shacks which could be torn down, with the people stealing away to find other jobs when the uranium mines were out of commission, but a community which has been carefully planned and built, that having done this and the United States now having found uranium in their own country, are they going to come to Canada and say, we now have uranium of our own; thanks very much, and good bye? This would be an intolerable situation.

I can only express the strong hope, which I am sure the minister and every member of this house shares, that the United States government will not take that position but will renew the options and thereby ensure that there will be full activity in this area from 1962 until the time comes, as it certainly will come, when this district and other uranium districts will not have to depend on atomic weapons because of the development of atomic energy for non-military purposes.

I suggest also to the minister that a very good place to locate that reactor would be in the Elliot Lake, Blind River, Thessalon area, not only because it is suited for that purpose with a good rock foundation and an abundance of water as well as a great supply of uranium, but because in this period from 1962 to 1970, a period which may be difficult for these people, this would give them a feeling of security. The construction of this plant would help out and would help remove this fear which is hanging over them now. I am sure the minister knows all about it, because he had a visit from the chamber of commerce the other day, and I am sure they made an impression on him.

It seems to me that I have detained the committee for a long time, but I do not apologize because the matters I have brought before the committee are important. I have tried to deal with them in a constructive way, and I hope the government might give consideration to these suggestions.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay the passing of the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), but at the request of farmers and grain merchants in the district of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, I want to say a few words on their behalf. It is about the grain elevator, at Sorel, where dealers in my riding are now barred from fetching their grain by truck. The elevator operators refuse to load the trucks of dealers of my district and also refuse to store their grain for domestic consumption.

Five ridings to the north of Sorel, and six to the south, have been taking their grain from the North American Elevator at Sorel for the past 40 years. As you probably know, the Sorel elevator is closest to our farms and, consequently, dealers could get their grain at much more favourable transport rates and subsidies than if they had to fetch it from other ports.

Mr. Chairman, that information has been given me by a number of dealers in my district, and more particularly by Mr. Brissette, owner of the firm J. W. Brissette Registered at St. Felix de Valois, in the riding of Joliette, who wrote to me about this.

The Sorel elevator is managed by Mr. Robert Campbell, who is also president of two important shipping firms. Last spring, he flatly refused to stock grain for the domestic market giving as a reason that he makes much more money with less trouble by stocking, loading and unloading only grain for export, which he receives from the wheat board and other Winnipeg exporters.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am asking that this gentleman, who is licensed by the wheat board, conform to the terms of that licence. If my information is accurate, the owner of the Sorel elevator has no right to refuse district dealers to go and fetch their grain by truck and, in addition, has to let them store their grain for local consumption.

At present, dealers in my district have to go and fetch their grain in other ports, in Montreal for instance. Transport costs are consequently much higher, and the farmers have to foot the bill.

Would the hon. minister please draw the wheat board's attention to that situation, so that this citizen of Sorel might be requested to conform to the terms of his licence, if he wants to keep it.

Therefore, this gentleman should first be asked to store enough grain for domestic consumption, and second, to allow dealers in my riding to go and fetch their grain by truck.

Those, Mr. Chairman, were the few remarks I wanted to make in the interest of the farmers and dealers in my district.

(Text):

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, our fisheries are one of the most important industries in the Dominion of Canada, and are contributing more and more to the wealth of our great country. The fisheries are undoubtedly one of our mainstays and one of the chief factors in the wealth of our great dominion which stretches from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We may spend huge sums of money on mineral products and open newly discovered mines; we may spend millions on agriculture and give every assistance possible to our farmers, yet we will not have an industry any greater or more helpful to the economy of Canada than our fish industry.

It was Lord Bacon who said that the fisheries of Newfoundland alone were richer than the mines of Mexico and Peru. Every year thousands of dollars worth of codfish, herring, lobster, salmon, squid, caplin, turbot, halibut, sole, mackerel, shrimp, scallops and many other species of fish are caught. To minimize the importance of any part of the industry, or to neglect a facet or problem pertaining to any province could, in my opinion, have a drastic effect. I now refer particularly to Newfoundland and the cancellation of the NAFEL licence as of June 15, so they would no longer have the sole right to export Newfoundland salt codfish to foreign markets.

There was no mention, or for that matter any intimation, of concern by the government of Canada as to how this would affect the general economy of the Newfoundland fishery. There were therefore many questions left hanging unanswered with respect to this announcement, because of which there are many who are now asking these questions and are showing great concern.

Will the Newfoundland exporters be protected? Can the price level be maintained? To whom should we look for these answers? While there may have been some dissatisfaction or misunderstanding with the Newfoundland Associate Fish Exporters Limited, mainly because the organization was composed of exporters only, and though it may have been looked upon as a combine, it constituted a protection to the industry, a protection which at the present time we do not have.

A combine of any type which solely involves private enterprise is not always favoured, either at home or in the markets, and we look to the government of Canada for something to take its place. We want a control that will give protection and at the same time concern itself not only with exports but with the welfare of the industry as a whole, and of course we need a set-up that will establish better relations in our foreign markets. For ten years since confederation the life of NAFEL had been repeatedly extended while something else was being sought to take its place. The solution to this problem was always considered the prime responsibility of the government. Why all of a sudden was it dropped, leaving the industry with no protection at all?

There seems to be a tendency to overlook some of Newfoundland's problems or to treat them with a "who cares" or a "so what" attitude. The announcement of the cancellation of NAFEL came at a time when other actions concerning Newfoundland, bearing much the same stigma, were taking the limelight. NAFEL's licence has been cancelled by the government, but as far as this house or Newfoundland is concerned it has not been replaced by anything better.

In conclusion I would stress the importance of increased and concentrated effort on our behalf in research and investment in the fishery industry here in Canada. It can be concluded that a greater part of the future world economy must and will stem from the products of the sea, and there is no reason why Canada should not be prominent in such a picture. It is therefore hoped, Mr. Chairman, that those responsible will not overlook the role that Canada can and must play.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I should like to take no more than five minutes of the committee's time to put forward to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) a request concerning his department's general policy, which in fact has hardly changed since the Conservative party took office. Without discussing his department's general policy at any great length, I merely wish to mention a point about which many discussions took place and promises were made in the last two election campaigns. I refer to the wheat question.

I read in a paper, not so long ago, perhaps two or three weeks, that the Canadian government will have to pay $40 million in storage fees alone for Canada's surplus wheat. That is quite a contrast with all the promises we had heard in this regard.

Another point I wanted to discuss is the lack of small industries in my constituency and area. As my colleagues know, I come from Lake St. John, where tremendous water resources are being used by companies which, I must say, have been of great benefit to the area. Unfortunately, the Aluminum Company has lost a large part of its foreign markets, particularly in the United Kingdom and France and, as a result, there have been lay-offs in Arvida that are causing great hardship to the citizens of my constituency and to those of the neighbouring constituency of Chicoutimi.

The same thing happened to the Price Brothers company, which operates two mills, one at Jonquiere and the other at Kenogami, in my riding. Many workers at the Price Brothers mills are now putting in only 28, 30 or 32 hours a week. I am sure it is no fault of the company because, there again, foreign markets play their part and heaven knows that Price Brothers have a very long and creditable record in the development of natural resources in the Saguenay-Lake St. John district.

Here is what I should like to ask the minister: about six or eight weeks ago, the mayors of municipalities in the four constituencies of our area came here to meet the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). The Minister of Labour, after having considered the brief submitted by the committee of our district, did not hesitate to tell us, in all frankness, that what we needed most was small industry. We have aluminum and pulpwood, but if foreign markets fall off, and men are laid off, hardship results.

I am not trying to play politics with this, Mr. Chairman, but I say that my constituency, at the present time, is one of the hardest hit by unemployment. That is why I ask the minister whether it would not be possible next fall, to send out into our area some experts from the federal Department of Trade and Commerce, perhaps from the division of industrial development, to consider the possibility of developing some use for by-products of our aluminum or pulpwood.

I know that the aluminum company itself has done research in that direction but, on the other hand, I also know that the chief concern of the aluminum company is to market its own products.

It seems to me that our people, municipal authorities in Chicoutimi, Jonquiere, Arvida and Kenogami, should set up a bureau, some sort of industrial development office which, with the help of federal government experts, could perhaps find ways to help us set up small industries that would absorb some of the men who were laid off because of declining world markets.

I therefore ask the minister to be kind enough to say a few words on this matter when he replies to the other members who expressed their views on the first item.

(Text):

Mr. Carter: I was interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Timiskaming this morning. As my leader has pointed out, the leading demand for uranium in the future will be through its purchase for use in reactors for the production of electric power. The industries of Europe are power hungry, and as they expand they will have to rely on other sources of power. Just as coal is giving place to oil, I think in the future we can look forward to a time when oil itself will be displaced by electrical energy produced from nuclear reactors.

Both the United Kingdom and the United States have pioneered the development of reactors for this purpose, the United States using one kind of uranium and the United Kingdom using another. The United States has already taken steps by an aggressive trade policy to safeguard her position in the world market and, possibly, to secure control of it. The competition, therefore, is between the United States and the United Kingdom, and it will be a competition between the pocketbook of the United States treasury and the skill and experience of United Kingdom scientists and engineers, who will have to offset their dollar disadvantage by increased efficiency in their plants and by reduced costs of production and operation.

It seems to me that here is an opportunity for Canada to assist the United Kingdom and to help herself at the same time. I have been told that one of the problems with regard to producing uranium is the disposal of the heat generated in the process and, as the hon. member for Timiskaming has pointed out, at Hamilton falls in Labrador we not only have an abundance of energy but we also have cold water, a refrigerant which would take care of the heat problem. I do not pretend to know enough about the economics of the industry to be able to say whether it is cheaper to bring the Hamilton falls power to the ore or carry the ore to the power, or whether the advantage of having this cold water is enough to offset the shipping costs, but it seems to me we should try to overcome these difficulties and arrange an agreement in co-operation with the United Kingdom by means of which we could help Britain to meet the competition from the United States. By doing so we should be not only improving the position of the United Kingdom but advancing and safeguarding our own interests as well.

My real reason for rising at this time is to ask the minister whether any effort has been made by Canadian companies with or without federal assistance, to establish flour mills in Nigeria. Nigeria is a large country with a population of 50 million people, three times that of Canada, and next year she is going to have an independent government and will become one of the leading nations of Africa. I am told that the Nigerians consume a considerable quantity of flour which is milled in the United States. It seems to me that we should try to have Canadian mills established in Nigeria so we can ship over the wheat and they can take advantage of their low labour costs to supply themselves with food at a fairly cheap price. I am sure if we do not take this step the United States will. In my opinion this is the kind of action we should be taking in these new countries to ensure future markets to take care of our surpluses.

I would hope that something like this could be done not only with respect to surplus wheat but with respect to surplus fish. In Newfoundland at this time of year we produce a large surplus of small trap fish a great deal of which cannot be economically processed either by salting or by freezing. I should like to see the Department of Trade and Commerce get together with the Department of Fisheries to see if some way cannot be worked out to can this fish so it could be made available to countries like Nigeria and other African countries at a price which they could afford and which would not require them to go to the expense of setting up expensive refrigeration facilities. I am sure if we can do something like that we will not only be securing markets for future surpluses, but we will be putting our surpluses to a good ideological use.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to say a word or two in support of the representations that have been made to the Ontario hydroelectric power commission and to the minister in connection with the possible location of the nuclear power plant in the Sturgeon Falls area. I recognize that on this point I have a friendly difference of opinion with my leader.

Mr. Pearson: I urge the minister to pay no attention to the hon. member.

Mr. Churchill: That lets me out.

Mr. Garland: However, I am sure the minister will be able to give my request appropriate consideration. This is the first opportunity I have had to mention this to the minister.

I received communications only yesterday to substantiate the representations that have been made over the past year by the municipality. I quite recognize the role the Ontario hydroelectric power commission plays in the choice of these sites and I would point out that on August 7, 1958 the town of Sturgeon Falls wrote the commission requesting that consideration be given to that town as a possible site for Ontario's first full scale nuclear power plant. On August 10 there was an acknowledgement from Mr. Duncan, chairman of the board, advising the municipality that Sturgeon Falls was the first municipality in the province of Ontario to make application for this plant.

Those who are living in the district of Nipissing and particularly the people in Sturgeon Falls feel that the area is well suited as a location and is capable of taking care of this development. There are large areas of land available and all the water that is necessary. There are transportation facilities and good communications in the area. Sturgeon Falls is strategically located in northern Ontario. I would appeal to the minister at this time to give the request from the municipality of Sturgeon Falls the fullest possible consideration.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to interpose myself between my leader and the hon. member for Nipissing, but if the minister does have any difficulty in that regard I am sure he will recognize the value of the invitation that I now extend to him to see that this plant is situated in Essex county.

I rise at this time simply to point out something which I believe is of great importance particularly to southwestern Ontario, and as well to the agricultural community in Canada generally. I realize there is an overlapping between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce, but as this is a matter of international trade it will be of primary concern to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I believe there is some apprehension felt in Canada—and I am sure the minister is aware of this—concerning action on the part of some agricultural organizations in the United States, among them, the American farm bureau federation, and the suggestion that their representations to the government of the United States be accepted for countervailing duties against certain agricultural products from Canada. This is a matter of very great importance. When one looks at the statistics of Canadian exports of hogs and cattle, he will appreciate the significance of this trade to Canada.

For instance, I note that in 1958 Canadian exports to the United States were estimated at 62 million pounds of pork, along with 54 million pounds of beef and veal and 636,862 head of dutiable cattle. This represents a 126 per cent increase over 1957 for pork, a 13 per cent increase over 1957 for beef and veal and a 74 per cent increase over 1957 for dutiable cattle. If there were any serious interference with these exports to the United States it would be a matter of great concern for the Canadian hog producer and cattle dealer.

As the minister knows much better than I do, Canadian hog marketings have increased sharply in the last six months, and were 33 per cent greater during the first quarter of 1959 than in the same period in 1958. Whatever has been the cause of this increase, I am sure we will all recognize that the government price support program has had some effect in this situation.

We have had reverse situations in Canada with regard to United States exports of certain agricultural products during the past year. We have not taken serious retaliatory action, and it would be a matter of the greatest regret if the United States acted on the strong lobby that is now under way in that country for the imposition of countervailing duties. I merely rise to indicate what I am sure is in the minister's mind, and to emphasize on behalf of farmers in southwestern Ontario in particular their very deep concern about the possibility of action being taken in the United States with respect to this matter.

There is just one other matter I would like to mention on these estimates, a matter I brought to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture the other day but which primarily concerns the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That is an interview given by the secretary of agriculture for the United States on Saturday last to Mr. Harold Morrison of the Canadian Press in Washington, when the former suggested the desirability of free trade, particularly, he said, in farm products, between the United States and Canada. He then amended his statement and said that it would also apply, of course, to trade in general.

I do not want to engage in a theoretical discussion of the desirability of free trade, but desirable as that is as an objective, I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce would agree that one would want to examine why the secretary of agriculture put forward this proposal at this time.

The other day when we were discussing the international wheat agreement, which will start to run from August 1, the minister pointed out that under the new treaty the agricultural surplus disposal policy of the United States, or of any other country, would come under annual scrutiny of the wheat council provided for under article 21 of that treaty. The minister had indicated that as a result of such scrutiny, while there would be no legal prohibition in respect of non-commercial transactions that offended certain countries in the matter of surplus farm products disposal policy, nevertheless there would be a curative effect. It might well be that this statement by the Secretary of Agriculture the other day was intended to provide another way out for the disposal of United States farm products in a manner which would be very damaging to this country.

I come, of course, from the great corn belt in Canada. The counties of Kent and Essex grow 65 per cent of the corn grown in our country. In the United States there is a surplus of 1,500 million bushels of corn, valued at $2,470 million. I associate these figures with the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture. I would hope that if we are going to consider free trade—and I hope we will—it will be done on such terms and in such a manner as not to prejudice the interests of Canadian agriculture and industry generally. The prospect this year in the United States is for a record corn crop of 4,209 million bushels. While much of this may go for need this year, nevertheless it will present the United States with a serious problem. That will be so not only for the government of the United States. If this corn is shipped to Canada there would be the most serious consequences for the corn growers in southwest Ontario.

The same is true with regard to wheat. As of July 1 the wheat surplus in the United States I believe was 1,300 million bushels. That represents $3,500 million of the United States taxpayers' money, and I can very well understand why Mr. Benson should be anxious to find ways and means of getting rid of this surplus. If the minister feels that he has some corrective mechanism through the wheat council under the international wheat agreement, I hope he is aware, as I am sure he is, of the great dangers now implicit in this statement of the Secretary of Agriculture who undoubtedly has in mind seeking to find in Canada a market for some of this surplus corn in particular.

I would not be doing my duty even at this late date in the session if I did not raise this matter on the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, together with the great concern which farmers generally have for the campaign now under way in the United States for the imposition of countervailing duties that could have such a very serious effect on Canadian hog marketings.

Mr. Winch: Madam Chairman, I also would like to say a few words on trade, but I am after some information. I would like the minister to give us an explanation, if he will, as to the policy and activities of his department in relation to the extension of Canadian trade, in particular as it relates to the United Kingdom. I ask for that information, Madam Chairman, because I find it most difficult to reconcile the statements of the minister with his actions. They seem completely contradictory in some circumstances.

I would refer the committee to the statement that was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this house on Thursday, May 28 of this year. He was making a policy statement which followed the removal of restrictions on certain United Kingdom dollar imports. The minister really waxed enthusiastic about the meaning of this to Canada and the opportunities that would be opened up for further exports of our Canadian goods. I should like to quote just two sentences of the statement made by the minister at that time. They will be found on page 4103 of Hansard, in the second column.

The minister had this to say, and he was speaking of the removal of certain restrictions in the United Kingdom:

> This will open up new opportunities for the expansion of Canada's export trade, and will contribute to the desirable strengthening of trade relations between Canada and the United Kingdom.

Further on he said:

> ...but we hope it will not be too long before we shall see the end of the restrictions against dollar goods which the United Kingdom and other sterling area countries have felt obliged to maintain throughout the post-war period.

I think the minister made it clear as to what he felt could be the probable results of the policy actions that were taken in the United Kingdom at that time. But, as I think we all know, you cannot expect to sell goods unless you put on a selling campaign. I have always thought the minister understood that; therefore I was very surprised when, only a few days later, I read a report from one of the best-known columnists of Canada, namely Jack Scott, who is now stationed in the United Kingdom. Under date of June 6 the Sunday Sun and a great many of the papers in Canada carried a long column dealing with how this government, how Canada, has approached the opportunity of extending its sales in the United Kingdom. I would like to read the entire column. I will not take up the time of the committee doing that, but I do want to quote a couple of paragraphs. This happens to be a dispatch from London, and it says:

> A pathetic little mound of packaged cheese from Ontario; a single case of canned sockeye salmon from British Columbia; and that was it.
> That was the grand total of Canada's contribution to the first exhibition of commonwealth food and drinks which ended here this week and now goes on tour of the British isles, a travelling indictment of Canadian lack of initiative in seeking world markets.
> If I were a Canadian in the business of selling any kind of food or drink—or, for that matter, any other exportable product with a potential market in the United Kingdom—I'd be hollering to Ottawa to demand the reason why.
>
> More than a quarter of a million Londoners, it is estimated, have ogled and sampled the goodies from the far-flung corners of what was once the empire.
> Now the display is off for Newcastle, Edinburgh, Glasgow and other points as yet undecided—"a howling success" in the words of its sponsors, the commonwealth union of trade, and all too clearly a howling flop for Canada.
> Canada, in fact, was the invited guest who not only failed to show, but sent no apology.

Having regard to the statement made on the floor of the house on Thursday, May 28, and the opportunity that was opened up, even if all the restrictions were not immediately removed I think there is something wrong when we have a report from London by one of our best-known Canadian columnists who tells us that this exhibition, the first of its kind, was completely ignored except for a pathetically small amount of packaged cheese from Ontario and a single case of sockeye salmon from British Columbia. Even if there was no market immediately available, surely having the products of Canada and the trade names of Canada on display there would have been a good start for when the remaining restrictions were removed.

I am given to understand that around this very time there was a substantial removal of restrictions. I should like to ask what is going on in the minister's department, because I am told that although the matter was put to headquarters in London the answer was that it was up to the federal government, and the federal department took no action whatsoever. All I am asking is one thing. Will the minister please explain his statement and the contradiction of no action? Will he not agree that if we want to sell we have to do a selling job, and that we cannot do it by sitting on our fannies and waiting for orders to come in automatically?

Mr. Churchill: I will answer the question right now. Again here is the hon. member trying to cry down Canada and make it appear that Canada is not active and alert.

Mr. Winch: We are trying to build it, not cry it down.

Mr. Churchill: We are trying to build but my hon. friend is trying to cry it down. He takes an article, and I do not care how important the correspondent is, aimed at casting a slur on Canadian businessmen and Canadian enterprise because we did not enter a food display in London. I have the article. I know the facts concerning this matter, and the article is overemphasized criticism which in my opinion was uncalled for. I am surprised at the hon. member putting the article on the record in the House of Commons, trying to make out that Canada is not alert and that the Department of Trade and Commerce has no policy with regard to trade matters.

My hon. friend reads my statement in Hansard, as found on page 4103, and he says, "There is the statement of the minister; here is the lack of action on the part of the department." He does so on the basis of one article by one correspondent with regard to a retail trade exhibition in the city of London. My hon. friend condemns the government, the department and Canada for not being alert in matters of trade when we are the fourth greatest trading nation in the world. I am surprised that my hon. friend who normally is objective in his comments, would not have seen through this article.

I will say this to him. No information concerning this matter was forwarded to Ottawa in time for us to do anything about it. Until the import liberalizations were announced early in June by the United Kingdom government—my hon. friend recognized this fact—food products of Canadian origin could only enter the British Isles subject to quota. If you are subject to a quota there is not much incentive to advertise your products. There was a limit on the products that might go from Canada to the United Kingdom. My hon. friend, coming from British Columbia, knows what happened to the salmon catch last fall. The minute the quota was removed the catch was snapped up right away. There was certainly no need to advertise British Columbia salmon in the United Kingdom. I have been over there. I know what the people think of British Columbia salmon. It is a luxury to them, and the minute they see any British Columbia salmon it is purchased.

But now, thanks to the action of the United Kingdom authorities, the opportunity is wide open to Canadian businessmen to enter again the United Kingdom market with the food products of Canada and display their wares. It is not the sole responsibility of the government to display these wares, and I am sure that our active and alert Canadian businessmen, who have kept Canada's position as a world trader well to the fore, will be in the United Kingdom market with alacrity now that the opportunity has been opened to them.

I regret that this article should have received such prominence. I regret there should be this condemnation of Canada by a Canadian, and that it should then be elevated to the prominence which things are given by being mentioned in the House of Commons. Let me say this about the exhibition in question, an exhibition of commonwealth food and drinks. It has a good idea behind it, but it is only one of dozens of similar small shows staged annually in the United Kingdom. It is impractical for us to enter them all. We think it is much more productive for us to take part in the periodic shows sponsored by a particular trade for the benefit of the businessmen concerned rather than in exhibitions primarily attended by the public. In other words this was a retail exhibition, and now that the United Kingdom market has been reopened there is an opportunity for our Canadian food exporters and our trade representatives in Great Britain, who are very active people and who work hard to exploit new opportunities.

May I point out to my hon. friend that the department will be participating in the major United Kingdom food exhibition, the British food fair, at Olympia, London, when it takes place next year. When we come to the next item in the estimates I can give my hon. friend and others who are interested a list of the trade fairs in which Canada is going to take part this year. It is a very important list, and shows the activity of the department and of Canadian businessmen. But for my hon. friend to take this article concerning this exhibition and the fact that there were not a large number of Canadian food products displayed there as an indication and evidence that Canada's trade policy is ineffective is, in my opinion, stretching the argument very, very far indeed.

Mr. Winch: On the same subject may I say that I do not think the minister adds to his status one bit, when he is touched a little on a sore spot, by trying to bluster his way out of it, by attacking the motives of a member of this house and by casting aspersions on the person who happened to write the article. I think I know the reason. It is simply that the person who wrote the article, Jack Scott, knew exactly what he was saying, and the proof that he was not simply engaging in wild guessing or trying to hurt Canada is the fact that identical information is on the files of the minister and is contained in an answer given by the minister in reply to a question on June 30 of this year. The questions and answers read as follows:

1. Was the Canadian government invited to participate in a recent exhibition of commonwealth food and drinks in the United Kingdom, sponsored by the commonwealth union of trade?

2. If so, what was the reply of the government?

Answer: No invitation was received in Ottawa. Officials in Canada house, London, were approached about participation but declined because it is not policy to take part in shows that do not offer hope of trade promotion benefit.

In this instance, with import quotas for most Canadian foods already filled, inquiries evoked by a departmental display could not have been satisfied—and might have done more harm than good where relations with potential new buyers were concerned.

Question 3. What Canadian products were shown at this exhibition?

Answer: Some Ontario cheese and B.C. canned salmon was shown privately.

The answer the minister has given does not hold water at all. Canada cannot possibly expand her export trade on a basis of doing it perhaps some day, some month or some year. Surely this is good publicity, and it is good public relations to let your products, your brand names, be known, because we know the import restrictions and monetary situation are not going to remain as they are forever. Advantage should have been taken of this opportunity strictly for exhibition purposes, in my opinion, because that is good business.

This was not just a small exhibition according to all the reports I have received, and I have more than just this one by Jack Scott. This exhibition is going all over the United Kingdom and has already been seen by millions of the buying public. These are the people who will eventually have to be reached by the importers of these goods from Canada, because they have to sell to the buying public. Surely it is good sense to try to have something from Canada in an exhibition of that nature.

I just do not follow the argument of the minister. As a matter of fact, whenever he does not like what a member of the opposition says he accuses that member of trying to run down Canada. We have just the same love for Canada that the minister has, and just as much interest, if not more, in the development of the country and seeing trade expanded, because we represent the working people of this country. We know they have to have jobs in order to eat, and in order to provide jobs you have to be able to sell your products.

I can tell you that we are never going to do anything that is going to hurt the working people of this country. Whenever we think there is something that can be done or should be done, we feel it is our responsibility to point it out right on the floor of the House of Commons or in a committee, and ask whether something more cannot be done that has been done in the past. I will not take second place to the minister or anybody else in my desire to build Canada, because I know that is the way to preserve jobs for the workingmen.

Mr. Churchill: I just want to say one or two words here. I am not going to allow the earlier remarks of my hon. friend to pass. I implied no motives to him; I cast no aspersions on that article or the author. He is quite entitled to write any article that he sees fit to write. There is no contest here as to who is the greater patriot.

Mr. Winch: You are the one who started it.

Mr. Churchill: It is just nonsense to talk that way. Let me tell my hon. friend that very often he takes some very small item and blows it up into a major issue; that is the point I was making.

Mr. Chevrier: There are two matters I should like to discuss very briefly, if I may, and which on their face may not appear to be germane to the minister's estimates, but on consideration and reflection I am sure it will be quite clear to the committee that they do fall within the ambit of the estimates now before us. I refer to two publications that are produced by the minister's department. One is from the dominion bureau of statistics, published under the authority of Hon. Gordon Churchill, Minister of Trade and Commerce, entitled "Railway Operating Statistics", and is for March, 1959. The other is published by the same bureau, under the authority and jurisdiction of the minister, and is entitled "Employment and Payrolls, March, 1959".

My purpose in bringing up this matter at this time is that on a number of occasions we on this side of the house have been attempting to get information concerning layoffs on the Canadian National Railways. We have been unable to obtain this information either here or in the committee. However, there is very revealing information contained in these publications, and I should like to put just a short paragraph or two on Hansard and then ask the minister one or two pertinent questions.

The point I should like to make is this; that on page 6 of the March issue of "Railway Operating Statistics", which I now hold in my hand, it will be found that railway employment as of February, 1958 on Canadian National Railways stood at 87,554 employees, whereas in February, 1959 it was down to 82,427, making a decrease for that railway of 5,127. On the same page it will be found that railway employment on the Canadian Pacific Railway as of February, 1958 stood at 62,938 as compared to 59,084 employees in February, 1959, a decrease in that case of 3,854 employees.

Still quoting from the same publication, the total for 22 railways in Canada for February, 1958 appears to be 160,938 employees as compared with 151,086 in February, 1959, a decrease of 9,852. It will be seen from this that in the case of the Canadian Pacific the decrease is slightly over 6 per cent of the number employed in February, 1958, whereas in the case of the Canadian National the decrease represents a little less than 6 per cent. It seems to me it is significant that this information appears in a publication under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is significant, too, that this information appears to be so clear and definite.

I should like to proceed to a consideration of the other publication entitled "Employment and Payrolls". The figures here concern steam railways and I—

Mr. Lambert: While this information may be important from the point of view of the Department of Transport, with respect I wonder what the purpose is, other than getting it on the record at this time, in reading these figures? It is true this publication is issued by the dominion bureau of statistics, and the minister is responsible for that bureau, but again with all due respect I wonder what the relevancy is?

Mr. Chevrier: The relevancy is this. I have already put certain figures concerning railway employment on the record, and I should like to put certain other figures concerning employment and payrolls on the record as well. Then I should like to ask the minister, as I indicated earlier, two pertinent questions on this material, because these are publications under his jurisdiction and the information contained therein has not been obtainable by us on this side of the house from the other department concerned.

Now, then, going to the publication "Employment and Payrolls" it appears that as of March, 1957 there were employed by the railways 170,014 men and women, as compared with March, 1958 when there were 158,041 employees and March, 1959 when there were 151,844 workers. For maintenance of equipment there were 24,604; 21,358; 19,927 for March 1957, 1958 and 1959 respectively. In so far as maintenance of ways and structures are concerned the figures are 32,830; 34,520; 32,934, for March, 1957, 1958 and 1959 respectively. In so far as transportation is concerned the figures are 102,744; 92,271; 89,317, for March 1957, 1958 and 1959 respectively.

Now, having put that information on the record, I would ask the minister these two questions; first, whether this compilation which is prepared by his department in these two series of statistics is done on a sampling basis; next, if not, whether it is done by an actual count. I think it makes a great deal of difference whether they are done in one way rather than the other, as I am sure the minister will realize this at once.

The other matter which occurs to me is this. Can the minister indicate to the house how it is that this information, which appears on the face of it to be quite simple, was not given by the Department of Transport in the first instance, or the other departments concerned? After all, there is no subject which is of more interest to all members of the House of Commons than these figures concerning employment on the various railways in Canada. There are few members in the House of Commons from one part of the country or another, who have not a divisional point of either one or other of the railways in their constituencies.

Now, sir, having dealt with that matter I would now like to deal with another matter which also concerns the Department of Trade and Commerce. That matter has to do with the commerce, the trade, and the business of the textile industry in Canada. As the minister knows the textile industry, in so far as its business and commerce is affected, has been very seriously hit and its operations very greatly curtailed within the last few years. I had the opportunity of putting certain figures on the record before. I shall not abuse the time of the house, but in order to deal with the matter rapidly would the minister allow me just to give some indication of what has happened to the trade in that field, particularly as it affects Canadian Cottons Limited. I am perhaps more conversant with that company than with any of the other companies, because for 19 years I represented a constituency in the house here where the cotton industry was very vital both to it and to eastern Ontario. In an article appearing in the Cornwall Standard-Freeholder of May 29, 1959 there appears this statement by the president of Canadian Cottons Limited, Mr. L. C. Bonnycastle. He stated:

> Substantial reductions in operations, including the closing of some mills, are planned by Canadian Cottons Limited.
> Total volume of sales was almost exactly the same last year as during the previous year.

That is 1958 as compared with 1957.

> However, business has become increasingly competitive, prices have been low and the flow of imports from the U.S. and low wage countries have increased in volume.
> Operations in Hamilton will be discontinued.

A little later on Mr. Bonnycastle states, dealing still with Hamilton:

> The yarn mill will be closed and all activity in Hamilton will be discontinued by the end of the year.
> The small yarn mill at Saint John, N.B., has been closed, and the Rosamond woollen mill at Almonte, Ontario, has been sold. There will be reductions in certain lines of products now made in Cornwall.

A little further on in the article it is stated:

> "This means a substantial reduction in the work force in Cornwall within the next three months," a spokesman for Canadian Cottons Limited said this morning. He was commenting on the company's annual report, released today, which said the company was closing some of its mills and curtailing certain lines made in Cornwall.
> But it was clear that a substantial number, perhaps close to half, of the 1,400 hourly rated and salaried employees of the Cornwall mills would be laid off by the end of the summer.
> Canadian Cottons Limited has been operating in difficult circumstances for several years, due principally to competition in piece goods from U.S. mills, and more recently, made-up goods from Hong Kong and Japan.

Then follows an editorial, which I shall not read, which appeared in the same paper of June 11 of 1959, the Cornwall Standard-Freeholder. This paragraph only I would like to quote:

> Exactly a year ago the Canadian cotton textile industry was undergoing an exhaustive review at the hands of the tariff board. After three months of hearings the board did not challenge the industry's contention that it was modern, efficient and well-managed. Instead, the board suggested a complete reorganization of existing schedules covering imports.

Then it goes on to say that nothing was done to follow up recommendations of the tariff board.

During the last week I have obtained additional information as to the position in the Cornwall area, and I find that the mill is closing down completely as of tomorrow, July 17. Nine hundred and fifty men and women who make a variety of piece goods, flannelettes, saxonies, eiderdown ticking and the like, will be laid off tomorrow. I understand these lay-offs started some time ago, and they will be entirely completed with the mill closing down tomorrow.

To sum up, as recently as 1956 there were over 2000 employees actively employed in Canadian Cottons Limited in Cornwall, and after tomorrow, I am informed by a very authoritative source, there will be between 450 and 500 men employed. There are people in those mills who have spent their whole lives in the manufacture of textile goods, who are able to do very little else, some of whom have been there for years. In fact I was informed this week that in February 1959, 191 employees actively at work in the cotton mills of Cornwall had 25 years' service, and some of them averaged 33½ years' service.

I know these are not problems which have arisen overnight. I know full well, because I was close to the problem, that difficulties have been encountered over a number of years. But what I want to bring to the attention of the minister is this, that those who sit on that side of the house were quite clear, not only in 1957 but in 1958, that this would be put a stop to, and no one made more vigorous statements in that respect than the Prime Minister himself. I just want to put on record the statement he made in Cornwall on February 24, 1958, when he was quoted as follows:

Prime Minister Diefenbaker last night—

Mr. Churchill: What is my hon. friend reading from, please?

Mr. Chevrier: I am reading from a statement appearing in the Cornwall Standard-Freeholder dated February 24, 1958.

Prime Minister Diefenbaker last night promised that a Progressive Conservative government will bring in legislation to halt the "dumping" of textiles and other products in Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker, speaking to an audience of more than 2,300 in the armouries of this textile centre, said Canada could not afford this and similar industries to be destroyed by dumping.

"We acted to protect the farmers of this nation against the dumping into Canada of agricultural products through the establishment of import controls", the Prime Minister asserted.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

"Canada cannot exist without the textile industry. Following the representations to the tariff commission and on the basis of the recommendations of the tariff board, such action will have to be taken as is necessary to ensure that no industry will be subject to dumping," he added, bringing a burst of applause from the audience.

I wonder how that audience feels today when, a little more than a year after that statement was made, a whole mill has been closed putting 950 men and women out of work. Here was a definite promise to take action in this very vital field of trade and commerce, which actually was not taken. Then a little later on the following appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of February 25:

Mr. Diefenbaker followed the announcement about farm price supports with a promise his government will take whatever steps are necessary to protect the textile and other essential Canadian industries from competition from cut-rate foreign goods—an important issue in this textile manufacturing centre.

And a little further on:

Calling the textile industry "one of the great industries of our country", he said that in a foreword to one of the industry's publications last year, he has said the industry "had been subject too long to the innuendo of inefficiency" whenever it asked for better treatment.

And still further on in this article in the Montreal Daily Star appeared the following paragraph:

The tariff board was studying tariffs on the importation of textiles, and there was no reason why the government, after receiving its report, should not take action to assure no vital industry would be subject to dumping of foreign goods—the importation of goods for sale at prices below that in the country in which they were produced.

That is clear-cut evidence in 1958 which I have placed on the record, and there is evidence in 1957 as well, that no matter what had been done in previous years this government now in power would take the necessary action to prevent the curtailment of the textile industry. I say here without fear of contradiction that the position of the textile industry is worse today than it has ever been in its history, and the statement of Mr. Bonnycastle with respect to a whole mill closing down in Hamilton and another in Cornwall is evidence of that fact together with what I have put on the record.

I submit to the minister and to members of the government that now is the time to take action in this field. I do not want to be a demagogue and recall the promise made that no one should suffer because of unemployment. That promise was made by the Prime Minister, but I will not belabour it. I will merely say that there were specific promises made by the Prime Minister in the constituency of Stormont and in the city of Cornwall in so far as the textile industry is concerned. Those promises have not been carried out.

It is true that legislation was brought in by the government concerning the dumping of certain of these products on the Canadian market. We made our position quite clear at that time. What has been the effect of that legislation? The effect of that legislation in so far as the Canadian cotton industry is concerned has been absolutely nil, because instead of the position being better it is far worse than it was before. I could go on. I have citations here which indicate the present state of employment in the textile industry, particularly in Canadian cotton production, but I do not wish to labour the matter unduly.

Mr. Anderson: May I be permitted to ask a question? I come from a sizeable textile district, and I wonder if the hon. gentleman is aware, as he goes back over the years, that the unemployment situation in my textile riding on December 31, 1957 can be judged by the fact that there was 3,386 applications for benefits, whereas two weeks ago applications numbered 699.

Mr. Chevrier: No, Mr. Chairman, I was not aware of that, and I am very happy to learn that the position is such in the riding the hon. member represents. But I am aware of the position in the city of Cornwall, where I was last week, and I am aware of the statement which was made by the president of Canadian Cottons so far as the city of Hamilton is concerned, where 1,000 men and women will be without employment, and I think that is serious in the light of the promises that were made.

I would be only too happy if I could rise and make a statement similar to that just made by the hon. member. Unfortunately that is not the case, and here is the city of Cornwall, a community which has lived and thrived for many years because of the cotton mills. There were three cotton mills in that area. They are now reduced to one mill, employing between 350 and 500 men, and I think the time is now ripe for the government to live up to the promises and assurances they gave to that textile community in 1958 and in 1957.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to say this in answer to the hon. member for Laurier. In the first instance, with regard to his question concerning publications by the dominion bureau of statistics and whether or not the figures were on a sampling basis or by actual count, may I say that the figures to which he referred in the publications he mentioned are actual counts and are not on a sampling basis. There may be minor differences in coverage for all railways owing to the inclusion in the railway statistics of United States branch lines in Canada.

On the second subject with which the hon. member dealt, the textile industry in Canada, we are not by any means unaware of the difficulties facing that industry. I have received many representations from and held conversations with many people actively connected with that industry with regard to its problems. I do not wish to avoid any responsibility as a member of the government with regard to the problems which face the textile industry, but I think here, on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the hon. member for Laurier has raised a problem which goes somewhat beyond the departmental estimates. Some of the matters he dealt with are more properly under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue, and I would have thought that the hon. member for Laurier, if he were going to quote statements which he alleges were made by the Prime Minister, would do that in the presence of the Prime Minister instead of easing in these suggestions about promises which have been made and not fulfilled.

Let us keep the record straight. This constant needling about the failure of the government to keep promises is going to boomerang on hon. gentlemen opposite, because the record is there and the record is very clear. The promises that were made are being kept. They cannot all be completed within such a short space of time, but every single one is being met and will be honoured. Let the hon. gentleman not carry on these suggestions or insinuations that promises are made and there is no intention of keeping them.

Various steps have been taken. Even with regard to the textile industry, references have been made to the tariff board by the Minister of Finance. As the hon. member recognized, certain changes in the law were made which tend to ameliorate some of the conditions about which he spoke. The problem is being tackled and is being actively considered. As my friend the hon. member for Waterloo has just pointed out, the effect of the present policy is being shown to be advantageous in some areas of the country. It may be that there is a peculiar and difficult circumstance in the city of Cornwall. We sympathize with people who are placed in an awkward position or thrown out of work, but let not the impression be created that this is general across Canada.

The policy of the government is firm and sound. Those measures that could reasonably have been taken in the time that has been at our disposal since March 31, 1958 have been taken, and we will pursue constructive policies leading toward full employment and the betterment of the condition of people not only in the textile industry but in all other industries.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister to give the committee an indication as to what has been done to meet the position as I outlined it in respect to the Canadian cotton industry?

Mr. Churchill: Here again we have a question which should more properly have been raised with the Minister of Finance, who has referred some of these problems to the tariff board. This is not the primary responsibility of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words to brighten up the history outlined by the hon. member for Laurier. I also come from a textile city, and I am very glad to report that in this line of work business is much better than it was two years ago. The Goodyear Cotton company at St. Hyacinthe, in recent weeks has hired or rehired about 125 hands, and since last year I would say at least 200 persons have been hired or rehired there. At the Yamaska Shirt company they are busier than they have been for a long time. At Penmans Limited the same situation exists and they are enjoying increased activity. At Consolidated Textiles Limited they are so busy they cannot give two weeks' vacation to their employees, and have to limit them to one week only.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make some comments concerning what I thought were the rather unfair remarks made by the hon. member for Laurier. In the light of information that has come forward from other centres I am wondering if perhaps his statement, the validity of which I am not denying—

Mr. Chevrier: It is undeniable. It is a fact.

Mr. Lambert: Quite right. I am wondering, however, if the hon. member's statement perhaps concealed the true nature of the market. My hon. friend is quite aware of the changes that have taken place as a result of the introduction of new synthetic fabrics. For instance, in the men's shirting field there are entirely new products available, and perhaps garments made from them are not manufactured in the city of Cornwall. Every time someone buys a terrylene shirt it means that a certain amount of standard Canadian cotton material has not been used. My hon. friend has only to go into a men's haberdashery shop or a department store to see how many shirts of that type of material are available. I refer to garments manufactured of finer quality, non-wrinkle, no-iron fabrics. These are appearing on the market in vast quantities. I have referred to only a narrow segment of the industry.

I have no knowledge of the type of materials that are produced in Cornwall, but if they are manufactured of the more staple type of cottons or the standard type of shirtings I believe it is conceivable that the diminished markets may be the result of a change in the public taste as well. I think the hon. member should put all the facts on the record, and then determine whether all the decline in the market for these materials is necessarily the result of government policy.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed to reply briefly to what the hon. member has said. It may be that the suggestion advanced by the hon. member for Edmonton West is correct, and I am not denying the fact that the introduction of new materials has been detrimental to the demand for standard products. But the point is this. Has the hon. member forgotten 1957? If he has, I have not. In that year we were told in no uncertain terms that we were responsible for that situation. That was said by Conservative candidates who spoke in ridings where there are textile mills. Not only was it said by candidates but by cabinet ministers who came into the ridings, as well as by the Prime Minister himself, as I have indicated.

The point I am making now is this. Having said those things and having put the Liberal party in the impossible position of being expected to take the blame for a condition for which we were in no way to blame—the hon. member must admit that we made no promises in those years and the statement made by the Prime Minister was clear cut—I say it is now up to those who sit on the other side of this chamber to make the situation good in so far as the textile industry, at least in eastern Ontario, is concerned.

Mr. Lambert: But you did not have the same situation at all.

Mr. Noble: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak for a moment about the subject mentioned a while ago. Now that a bid has been made by several hon. members in respect to the locating of the atomic energy plant for the development of hydro in their areas, I feel I should go on record as mentioning the action I have taken in respect to this matter.

Early last June I engaged in correspondence with Mr. Smith, assistant general manager in charge of engineering for the Ontario hydroelectric power commission with respect to the possibility of locating the plant in my riding. I am happy to report that although the selection of a site has not been definitely made, testing is now under way in Bruce, and it is expected that other sites in our immediate area will be tested. I, of course, am still hopeful that it may be located in Grey North. I feel that we have one of the best locations in the province of Ontario. Already reports have appeared in the press concerning the possibility of it being located there.

I urge the minister to give consideration to the possibility of locating the plant in this area. I feel that my riding of Grey North has much to offer for this kind of project. We have solid rock and an ample supply of good cold water. Indeed, in Georgian bay I believe we have the coldest water available in the province. We have a sparsely settled area that is in close proximity to highly industrialized parts of Ontario and the area is served by good highways. I understand that these are some of the requirements for a site. I hope the minister will give my appeal the fullest possible consideration.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have risen to speak on these estimates, and I shall detain the committee but briefly while I outline the plight of tomato growers and the tomato canning industry in British Columbia. I might say this industry commenced over 50 years ago because it is an ideal country for growing tomatoes, with warm summer months and ample water for irrigation. I remember when the first tomato plants were planted something over 50 years ago. The industry developed because its natural market—

Mr. McIlraith: They must be pretty old plants by now.

Mr. Herridge: I may say, Mr. Chairman, that we do not think in those terms. We have a revival every year. I may say that the industry developed consistently over a long period of years, owing to the fact that it is a natural place for the growing of tomatoes and western Canada was the natural market. Until toward the end of the late 1940's they were processing some 26,000 or 30,000 tons of fresh tomatoes a year received from 500 to 600 primary producers, and some 1,500 to 2,000 persons were directly or indirectly employed in the growing of the tomatoes or in the canning industry. I think the peak value of the crop at one time was around $5 million; that is the total crop, those used for selling in the domestic market, largely in western Canada, and the remainder used in the canning industry.

However, Mr. Chairman, the industry suffered from some severe disabilities, as I think the minister knows. I am bringing this to his attention because I have been asked to do it. First of all, the industry suffered from serious disabilities with respect to transportation. It may be interesting to know that the rate on canned goods from San Francisco and Los Angeles to Vancouver, about 1,000 miles, is almost identical with the rate from Kelowna to Vancouver or from Nelson to Vancouver. The rate from San Francisco and Los Angeles to Winnipeg, approximately 2,300 miles, is $1.80 compared with a rate from Kelowna or Kootenay points to Winnipeg, approximately 1,200 miles, of $2. These preferential rates on imported products were and still are prejudicial to the interests of the tomato industry in Canada, particularly in British Columbia. I mention it as one of the disabilities. I am not for a moment suggesting that this is a matter that can be solved quickly or overnight. It is one of those problems in which a number of factors are having an adverse effect on the industry.

Then there is the question of the higher production costs that we suffer because of the 25 per cent to 50 per cent higher costs for machinery and equipment; the 20 per cent to 30 per cent higher cost for cans; and the 50 per cent to 100 per cent higher costs for cartons, and a much shorter operating period for the industry in the interior of British Columbia. I may mention at this time that in the last two years five canning plants have been closed in the southern interior of British Columbia.

Then there is the question of tariffs. I do urge as a matter of consideration what appears to be certain inequalities which have developed as a result of the rigid operation of GATT which gives certain advantages to other countries because of their higher tariff rates and things of that sort. In that connection I am just going to quote briefly from this memo which was handed to me:

> The American tariff of 21 per cent against canned tomatoes is approximately equivalent to the Canadian tariff of two cents per pound. The American tariff of 21 per cent on tomato paste is at least double the Canadian tariff on the same product and, when high concentrations of paste are taken into consideration, the American tariff rate of 21 per cent is over seven times as high as the Canadian rate. When the Canadian tariff rate on tomato paste was reduced in 1956 from two cents a pound to 1½ cents a pound, tomato paste was being concentrated to a much lower percentage of solids, and the 1½ cents per pound was equivalent to an ad valorem tariff of about 10 per cent. At the same time, United States had a 23½ per cent tariff. Now, tomato paste is being produced to a consistency of 45 per cent—46 per cent solids, and the current California quotation is $21 per case of 45 pounds f.o.b. shipping points. The Canadian duty on a case of this products would be 66 cents, or 3.1 per cent, against the present American tariff on the same product of 21 per cent ad valorem. If the United States tariff rate were applied to the American price, the duty would be $4.61.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, there is very unfair competition for our tomato producers and tomato canners in British Columbia developing from Italy and increasing over the years. The memo goes on to say:

> We are aware of some imports of Italian tomatoes into western Canada, the total Canadian imports are heavy and increasing. With the low labour rates and other low production costs which processors in that country enjoy, along with low water-rates to the eastern seaboard and subsidized rail transportation costs from Canadian maritime ports, coupled with our extremely low tariff protection and unfavourable exchange situation, it is not surprising that many Canadian tomato processors are going out of business.

When they go out of business the producers of tomatoes will go out of business. Then, there is a very substantial loss of the export market. I am sure the minister is aware that prior to world war II the Canadian processors of tomatoes in British Columbia built up a considerable and substantial export market for tomatoes and tomato products. They have almost completely lost this market, together with substantially reduced tariff protection in Canada.

I am not going to deal at further length with this, Mr. Chairman. The minister must know the several disabilities that are being suffered by the growers and the industry in general. As a matter of fact, to show the committee the circumstances under which the industry operates at the present time, with all the increased freight costs and increased competition from the United States and other costs that I have mentioned, a 28-ounce can of choice tomatoes is selling today at 23 cents, which is less than the price was in 1948. It is impossible for the industry to carry on in these circumstances. I mention these facts and bring them briefly to the attention of the committee and the minister on behalf of the growers and canners of these products. I should like to know what the government intends to do in an endeavour to meet this situation and make it possible for these people to continue growing tomatoes and the canners to continue in business.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I want to add a few words to the remarks made a few moments ago about the textile industry. It has been suggested that the position of that industry had greatly improved in the last year, but recently I gathered figures proving the contrary.

As regards woollens, according to the report published by the wool and knitting manufacturers' association, Canadian industries produced 17,054,000 linear yards of material, whereas they had produced 18,751,000 yards last year, which means a decrease of 1,700,000 yards.

Mr. Chairman, I shall ask the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) to listen closely to the remarks I have to make, for they are of a serious nature and of particular concern to him. With regard to employment in woollen mills, I find that the number of employees has decreased from 13,030 in 1957, to 10,890 in 1958, a drop of 2,140 workers within a single year.

In cotton mills, production has fallen to an all-time low. With a Canadian potential market for 538 million yards, our industries produced 245 million yards in 1958, whereas they had produced 264 million in 1957. Therefore Canadian mills produced only 42 per cent of domestic cotton requirements. That is the lowest percentage ever recorded, or at least until the end of 1958.

Employment in the cotton industry has fallen from 20,900 in 1957 to 18,900 in 1958, that is a decrease of 2,000 workers.

This decline in the cotton industry has been due to growing imports of cotton goods.

Mr. Chairman, the picture of our cotton imports is as follows: 227 million yards from the United States in 1958, against no more than 219 million yards in 1957. In 1958, we also bought 25 million yards of cotton from India, whereas in 1957, we had imported no more than 18 million yards. In 1958 we purchased 18 million yards of cotton from Japan, compared to 15 million yards in 1957. Our imports from Great Britain decreased by 4 million yards, i.e. from 10 million to 6 million yards. It is the only country from which imports have decreased.

The third sector of the textile industry I want to deal with is the production of synthetic fibre (silk and rayon). As in other sectors, production has fallen alarmingly. Canadian production, which reached 86 million yards in 1957, dropped to 76 million yards in 1958.

Now, I should like to emphasize that in 1956 it had amounted to 96 million yards.

Lower production has meant fewer jobs. Employment in that sector fell from 15,300 in 1957 to 14,100 in 1958, that is a decrease of 1,200 employees.

This, Mr. Chairman, was the situation in the textile industry at the end of 1958.

I would have much more to say about that industry, but I shall limit myself to those details. However I should like to add a word about the promises made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in our district on March 23, 1958. According to a dispatch published by the Toronto Telegram of March 24, the Prime Minister is reported to have said, in Sherbrooke, in the eastern townships:

(Text):

Sherbrooke, a textile manufacturing centre of 70,000, has been seriously hit by United States dumping of textiles and Mr. Diefenbaker made it plain this situation will not be permitted to continue. "The textile industry has not always been treated fairly in the past", he declared in a searching denunciation of the former Liberal government. "Its request for better treatment had much too long been neglected. The textile industry is a major employer in Sherbrooke and in other cities", he said flatly, "and the government has no intention of letting it be sacrificed by United States dumping. Within the purview of GATT an injustice that might have been will be rectified."

(Translation):

Those, Mr. Chairman, were the promises made in 1958 by the Prime Minister himself in our district, where textile manufacturing is the major industry.

Mr. Chairman, I could likewise quote many promises made by the Conservative candidates, especially by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. In fact, in the circular letter which he distributed in the city of St. Hyacinthe just before election day, the hon. member said:

I shall demand tariff barriers adequately protecting our textile industry. It is those imports of Japanese and U.S. textiles that are ruining our workers.

Mr. Ricard: I have kept the promise I had made. I have asked for higher tariffs.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, imports of Japanese textiles have never been higher than since the Conservative party came to power. I have already quoted figures, and I shall quote them again, for the information of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. Last year, we imported 18 million yards of cotton from Japan, while we had imported only 15 million yards in 1957. This represents an increase of 3 million yards, whereas we had been promised lower imports from Japan. We have also imported more from the United States, 7 million yards more; our imports from India increased by 3 million yards, and 5,000 Canadian textile workers have lost their jobs since last year. I have no figures relating to 1956, but I shall be pleased to submit them to the house on another occasion.

I would suggest that when the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot makes his remarks to the house, he give us figures in support of his claims. Moreover, if the hon. member wishes certain information about the promises and statements he made on behalf of the textile unions of St. Hyacinthe, I shall quote for him an article which appeared recently concerning some statements he made—

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

Mr. Boulanger: The hon. member has stated—

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, the subject raised by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska is completely out of order.

Mr. Denis: In order.

Mr. Ricard: Out of order. His subject has nothing whatever to do with the matter under review. Not that I am afraid or ashamed of what I said, but in the article referred to by the hon. member, my statement was distorted, for political purposes, by the friends of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, the opposition's self-appointed spokesman in matters of agriculture.

Mr. Denis: Listen to the new parliamentary secretary to all the ministers!

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: I do not think that what another member has said has anything to do with the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I hope the hon. member will stick to this item.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I had not started to quote that article. I fail to see why the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) should raise a point of order. I shall now quote a few lines of that article.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, in spite of your decision, the hon. member is preparing to go on reading the article.

(Text):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, at least before the hon. member is declared out of order we have to listen to what he has to say. He has not said it yet but the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot seems to be ashamed of what he said before.

Mr. Ricard: No, I said I was not ashamed.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska indicated he was going to read an article written by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot.

Mr. Caron: About.

The Deputy Chairman: About the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. I cannot see what that has to do with the administration of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Caron: It is on textiles.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, here is what the article said—

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, again I rise on a point of order. The hon. member—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: I ask the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska not to read the article but to proceed with the other part of his speech.

Mr. Ricard: He cannot do that. Ask him to take his seat.

Mr. Caron: If it is on textiles it concerns the present debate, and it is a declaration about textiles.

The Deputy Chairman: If it is on textiles, but it rather appeared to me as if it were going to be an election speech.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: I accept your decision, Mr. Chairman. However, I reserve the right to take up this matter in due course.

Coming back to the matter of textiles, I say the situation is worse than it has ever been. I would ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) to do something for our textile industry and workers.

There is unemployment in the eastern townships and there will be even more unemployment next winter, because little attention is being paid to the textile industry. In 1958, we enacted legislation to protect the Canadian textile industry against dumping; we even appointed inspectors, but so far there have been no satisfactory results.

I therefore ask the hon. minister to kindly consider the case of textile workers.

(Text):

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, the minister was good enough when these estimates were brought before the committee last night to deal with many of the questions raised when the discussion took place on these estimates in the committee on June 25. He attempted to deal with the points I had raised in my remarks, but there are one or two aspects of these subjects on which I desire some clarification. Perhaps we now have come to the stage in the discussion where I can put specific questions to him and get specific answers.

I ought, first, to thank him for his remarks regarding trade with Japan. I had raised this subject, as had my leader, when the estimates were first before the committee on June 25. I was somewhat shocked last night when he was dealing with this subject to find, in looking at my own remarks on the earlier date, I was reported in Hansard at page 5812 as having said that barley exports to Japan for 1958 amounted to $62 million in value. This, of course, is the value of wheat exports to that country in that year, as I assume everyone who is really interested in this subject would know. I did not notice the mistake I had made until I was listening to the minister's remarks last night.

The question I want to ask him now is supplementary to the remarks on the subject of trade with Japan. There was a drop of some $35 million in our exports to Japan from 1957 to 1958, and in view of the importance of that market would the minister care to say or is he in a position to give us any indication as to what he expects our exports to that market will be this year? Will we have a chance to recover that loss?

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Ottawa West drew attention to the drop in exports to Japan last year and I think he will find the figures in the annual report on pages 26 and 27. I am reading from the report now:

> The major decline in exports to Japan was in primary iron and steel products, particularly pig iron. This was the result both of expansion in domestic Japanese capacity and lower industrial output there. Sales of flaxseed which were unusually high in 1957 fell back to average annual levels. There was also a decline in Japanese demand for Canadian wood products, asbestos and aluminum. On the other hand the Japanese market for drugs and chemicals continued to expand.

In so far as the expectation for 1959 is concerned, the dominion bureau of statistics publishes "Canada, domestic exports" and the issue for May, 1959 on page 4 indicates the value in the period January to May of our exports in 1958 was $40,251,000. This value has gone up in 1959 in the same period to $44,924,000. Consequently I would say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that we will regain our position with regard to exports to Japan.

Mr. McIlraith: I just want to express the hope, and I think the minister concurs with me in this, that the market can be built up in that area. In his remarks last night I think the minister indicated the importance he attached to that market. I perhaps do not need to elaborate on the subject here but I think the market for barley could be extended throughout that whole area.

There was another question I wanted to clarify arising out of an answer the minister had given to some of the earlier remarks I made about the West Indies. In the course of the minister's statement he made the remark that we have not increased our sale of fish and flour to the extent we would like. I presume he was referring to the sale of cured fish. I wanted to ask him, first, is that restriction in Jamaica on price still in force or has it been removed? Is there any prospect for increasing the export of that type of fish, not only to the West Indies but to the larger market that is to be found in the other Caribbean countries, Cuba, Haiti, the Dominican Republic, Puerto Rico and so on? Would he care to develop that subject a little?

Mr. Churchill: With regard to the price of fish and the situation in Jamaica, we are carrying on consultations with the authorities there. We hope to have a satisfactory answer in the near future. Prospects for the enlargement for the sale of our fish in the Caribbean and elsewhere are not unreasonable at the present time. We have, through our commercial counsellors stationed in those countries and through normal trade connections of our people engaged in the export of fish in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and so on, been able to maintain the trade. You will recall that a year ago we had some success with a very substantial order from Brazil. We are of the opinion that we can maintain our trade in fish with the West Indies and Caribbean region generally. The Department of Fisheries is taking active steps to make sure that the standard is maintained and that the method of processing the fish is improved. When the estimates of the Department of Fisheries are before the committee perhaps questions along that line will be raised.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I can pursue the subject on the fisheries estimates. I wanted to raise another matter that concerns me and which I had mentioned earlier. It is from the policy aspect of the disposal of surplus farm products that I intend to attack the question. I obtained information by way of questions on the order paper and orders for returns tabled in the house on February 18 covering purchases by the government of agricultural products which were sold abroad by the Canadian government other than through the agency of the wheat board. One answer dealt at considerable length with skim milk powder and the export of that product to a great number of countries. I think there were some twelve or fifteen countries listed to which we had sold milk powder and the sale prices ran from about 20 per cent to about 75 per cent of the cost.

I asked another question about the export of eggs which were bought under the prices support program and sold to Venezuela. The price at which they were sold was again below the price at which the Canadian taxpayers bought them and there was a loss on that transaction. If I remember correctly, the price was something of the order of 65 per cent of the cost, although I could be out in that percentage.

Then I asked a question on the orders of the day on the subject of the export of surplus pork, and my question concerned the sale of surplus pork to Czechoslovakia. I received an answer from the Minister of Agriculture to which I shall make reference in a moment. Then I put a further question on the order paper and the answer was provided today and will appear in today's Hansard. The question concerned the sale of surplus pork, and it becomes apparent from the answer that we have so far been able to sell some of this surplus pork which the government purchased to three countries, namely Mexico, Italy and Czechoslovakia, and there appears to be a wide range of price from 16 cents to 30 cents per pound. However, it appears from the answer that it was again sold at a considerable loss below what we paid for it.

The point I am seeking to make on this matter has to do with the trade policy of the government. It will be seen from those three answers that we have sold surplus farm products at very substantial reductions below their cost to some 18 or 20 countries. In some cases we are selling them as little as 25 per cent of what the Canadian taxpayers pay for them. That, I suppose in any other country, certainly in Canada, would be termed as dumping.

The point I wish to make here is this. Does the minister consider that that is an appropriate permanent policy for the disposal of agricultural products from this country? What is its effect going to be on our trade generally? What damage does it do to the trade practices which we built up over the years? I think generally speaking our trade practices are regarded rather highly. Does it take away from us any argument we might have against other countries for dumping products on the world markets and thereby hurting our sales?

Then I want this one further aspect of the matter clarified. In answer to the question I asked on June 21, as appears on page 4993 of Hansard, concerning the sale of surplus pork to Czechoslovakia, the Minister of Agriculture said, and I only want to quote part of his answer:

> This is to some extent in the nature of what you might call a trial shipment and we hope that as a result—we are quite sure the pork will be found satisfactory—we shall be able to sell in constantly increasing quantities pork and other agricultural products in the European market.

What I would like to have specifically clarified is this. Am I to interpret that answer of the Minister of Agriculture as meaning that the Canadian government has now embarked upon a policy of seeking to increase exports of pork and other agricultural products to the European market by the direct subsidy method, as was done in the disposal of this surplus pork which had been acquired under our price support legislation? I think this point should be clarified because of its significance in the trade world.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member's final question as to whether the Canadian government has now embarked on a policy of increasing our trade by direct subsidy, the answer is no. This is not launching out into a new policy aimed at the expansion of trade through this particular method. It is, I would say, an ad hoc arrangement in a time of surplus, which is something that is not new. It has been tried in other years, the selling abroad of some surplus products from this country.

In answer to his general statement, I did to a certain extent deal with this last night, and I would say that the hon. member has laid his finger on the problem involved here. He asked, is there a danger of damaging the trade relations which have been built up in the past? Is there a danger that we may be accused of dumping surplus products abroad, and things of that nature? That is the nub of the matter indeed, but I would say as a general answer that we are very much aware of the effects on international trade of practices which deviate a bit from the normal and we are being very careful to do nothing which will interfere with the good relations that we have established with trading partners. We have been able to consult readily and effectively with countries which might be concerned with activities on the part of Canada with regard to surplus disposal.

As an example of that, I might say that in the gifts of wheat and flour that we have made to India and Ceylon we have been very, very careful to consult in advance Australia before taking any action whatsoever. The reason we have consulted with Australia is that those countries are the normal market countries for the sale of Australian wheat and flour, and the policy of the department is that no surplus disposal of wheat or flour shall take place in markets such as that without consulting with the countries primarily concerned, in this case Australia. Similar situations prevail elsewhere, and the activities to which my hon. friend has referred with regard to skim milk, the sale of eggs and the sale of pork are conducted very carefully so that our general trade is not damaged.

I might put on the record one or two further statements to make it quite clear. My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, outlined to the House of Commons on April 23 the problems arising out of the accumulated surplus of dry skim milk and the steps that had been taken to reduce this surplus. Excess stocks have now been reduced to manageable proportions by sales of older stocks of skim milk powder for feed purposes and the stabilization board has withdrawn offers for export as feed although some quantities are still being made available for human consumption to international relief agencies and to governments for relief purposes. By offering this surplus product for export as feed the stabilization board was able to move large quantities of the older powder into export markets quickly in order to avoid deterioration of the product, and at the same time we were able to satisfy other exporting countries that these sales at concessional prices were not seriously interfering with their normal markets which are primarily for powder for human consumption.

With regard to pork, pork products are not among the items on which restrictions have been eased up to the present time—that is, with regard to the United Kingdom—although a number of countries have shown interest in obtaining supplies from Canada, in particular Czechoslovakia. A recent sale has been made at or very near to the world price, and it will represent the first time in many years that Canadian pork other than canned pork has appeared in the European market. Then the hope was expressed that this trial shipment might lead to further orders, which is the normal hope under circumstances such as these. If this food is found acceptable in Czechoslovakia, perhaps the market there may be developed.

Mr. McIlraith: I thank the minister for his statement, because I attach considerable importance to the clarification of this matter in view of the fact that since the first of the year we have exported these surplus farm products to more than 20 countries. That, coupled with the statement of the Minister of Agriculture in answer to questions on the orders of the day, was capable of an interpretation which would be damaging to our trade, certainly if it was the policy of the government.

I have just two more questions with which I want to deal. One has to do with the statement made by the minister regarding the increase in our exports to the United States. I think the minister should have followed his own D.B.S. statistics more completely in the statement he made with regard to exports to the United States, and given the committee the whole story as to our exports. He told us that exports in the period between January and May of 1959 amounted to $1,186 million as compared with last year's total of $1,135 million. If the minister had gone on and given all the exports, the committee would have seen that exports to the United Kingdom were down a bit, that to the other commonwealth countries they were down some 25 per cent and that to all other countries, excluding the United States, the United Kingdom and commonwealth countries, they were down a bit, and that the total exports for those five months are down from last year. All I want to do in indicating that is to try to give a complete picture, because it shows the problems which do exist in this whole matter of export trade and the importance of this subject. We must keep pressing for markets as best we can all over the world and be very careful not to do anything which will interfere with those markets by any action or policy we may take.

I want to ask the minister for an explanation on another subject altogether. The estimates for this year fall, really, under six items apart from the board of grain commissioners, whereas last year the number of items was 15—I may be wrong about that number. In any event, there is a very sharp reduction in the number of items and there is a corresponding abbreviation in the details given in the latter part of the blue book. I want to ask the minister what was the reason for this change, because it seems to me that change is not an improvement but tends, rather, to make it more difficult to find the type of information which members of the House of Commons would wish to have when dealing with the estimates. In this one year it does, of course, make the comparison much more difficult and it does seem to me that the detail given in the present form is considerably less; practically all the departmental matters are shown under one item, that of departmental administration, and detail which we had expected to find is no longer there. Could the minister tell us why the change has been made?

Mr. Churchill: That is a fair question. There has been a change. This change was brought about at the suggestion of officers of the Department of Finance who are concerned with drawing up and publishing the estimates. A number of separate accounts have been eliminated and the bookkeeping has been simplified, but there is no intention to withhold any information whatever, and I find that the detail in the book of estimates does not differ very much from what was given in past years. The annual report covers the territory completely, and the combination of the two, studied by anyone who is interested in the subject matter, does, I think, give a full and complete picture of the department.

Mr. McIlraith: I hope the minister will practise some determination and stubbornness when he is dealing with the other department on this matter, because while the Department of Finance may wish to have them in a certain form for its own purposes I think, after all, it is the House of Commons which must be satisfied.

Mr. Churchill: I do not want to put the blame on the Department of Finance. Our own officials were in agreement about this change; indeed, they might have been the ones who proposed it. I will take the full blame for the change, anyway.

Mr. McIlraith: In any event, I merely want to point out that changes should not be made merely for the sake of administrative convenience. It is the House of Commons which must exercise control over expenditure, which requires this information and it must always be borne in mind that this is the criterion which should be followed in setting these estimates out.

Mr. Churchill: I am in full agreement. After all, this is information for the House of Commons, but I must, in fairness to the officials, say that I discussed this matter with them some time ago and I agreed to this modification.

Mr. Garland: Following along the same lines, I have been wondering whether the minister would say where the details are to be found with regard to assistance to small business. A specific amount was shown last year.

Mr. Churchill: It is not specifically set out. It is embodied in the general item 380.

Mr. Garland: I notice that in the annual report of last year the following appeared at page 72:

> By the end of October an assistant director and three research officers had been appointed to determine a program based upon these terms of reference and to make recommendations concerning the staff requirements for such a program.

It goes on to say that the branch's initial functions have been concerned with a review of studies relating to the problems of small business in Canada and in other countries.

I should like to know what is being done, and what action the government intends taking this year. I hope the minister will not be too sensitive if I refer to election promises. There were definite election promises made, and one of these promises was reported in a Canadian Press dispatch which appeared in the Montreal Star of March 18, 1958. The Prime Minister, speaking in the minister's own province of Manitoba, said the government would set up a special branch to help small business to obtain a fair share of government contracts and—these are the important words for my purpose this afternoon—financial aid to expand.

All of those who have anything to do with business are aware of the increasing costs with which small businessmen are being faced at the present time. Some of this is due to government action and government policy. The increase in taxes, the increase in contributions to the unemployment insurance fund, the higher interest rates which make borrowing more difficult and of course more expensive, all contribute to the problems of the small business man. I say this only to lead into the question I wish to put to the minister. Does the government intend to make long term capital loans available to small business this year or in the foreseeable future? Could I have an answer to this question?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I want to deal with this same subject. I raised this subject on June 21 and last evening as reported at page 6096 of Hansard the minister was good enough to say that this point had been raised and he thought it might be more properly answered when we came to examine the item in the general estimates.

Like my friend the hon. member for Nipissing I could find no item other than the administrative item that would justify the minister for making the statement about this new branch about which there is real concern. I am all the more concerned about it because if a statement is to be made I think it should be made to this committee at this time while these estimates are available for debate. Following our first discussion of the minister's estimates on June 21, an article in the Financial Post commented on the fact that the program of assistance to small business had not been examined by the cabinet. That was a couple of weeks ago when the newspaper felt justified in making a comment with respect to lack of progress following the setting up of the small business branch.

I hope we are not going to find that just as soon as these estimates are disposed of, as has happened too often recently, we will receive from the department a statement as to what their plans are and the House of Commons having prorogued we will be deprived of an opportunity of making any comment to the minister concerning what he has in mind and what has developed since the branch was set up.

I am sure the minister is aware that the Retail Merchants' Association of Canada, Incorporated, has been making representations along this line. I wish to quote from a letter sent to me by the general manager of this association which reads in part as follows:

> This association has made the suggestion that a retail business capital loans act be set up for the purpose of enabling retailers to borrow money for rehabilitation and expansion. We have suggested that the mechanics of such an act be similar to those of the Homes Improvement Loans Act, i.e. that the individual loans be made through the chartered banks, with a government guarantee.
> This could be done by authorizing the bank to advance 50 per cent to 75 per cent of the cost of the proposed improvement or extension of buildings, equipment, parking facilities, etc. The loans would be repayable over a period of years.
> As we pointed out previously such a plan would not introduce any new principle into Canadian finance. Similar assistance has already been extended to fishermen, farmers, manufacturers, homeowners and home repairs, food processors, etc.

That is one medium through which something might be done. One recognizes immediately that perhaps the vehicle of the international development bank might be used by expanding the terms of the act.

One of the industries that has been making representations along these lines is the tourist industry. We know that Canada's position with respect to income from tourists abroad has been deteriorating in relation to the spending of Canadian tourists abroad. We have a substantial deficit at this time. The tourist association at its annual conference indicated that one of the reasons for this situation is that the tourist operator is simply not able to find money in this era of tight money that would enable him to improve his business in a way to attract a large number of foreign visitors, particularly from the United States.

The minister well knows that in addition to the promises we heard at election time to which reference was made by the hon. member for Nipissing, following the government taking office the Minister of Justice addressed the annual meeting of the Retail Merchants' Association in Vancouver and they got the impression, as did the newspapers, that this government intended to do something along these lines. That, Mr. Chairman, was more than a year ago.

In addition to that we know we have just gone through a winter of extreme unemployment. If some expeditious action were taken along the lines my hon. friends opposite were urging, I think it would have been of tremendous advantage last winter in the matter of the creation of employment if loans similar to home improvement loans had been made available to small business for the improvement of business premises and the improvement of other establishments such as I referred to in respect of the tourist industry.

This is not a matter of not having sufficient notice of this. Last June and July a conference sponsored by the Department of Labour was held on the question of winter employment. Of the five or six recommendations made by that conference only one was adopted by the federal government. The only recommendation made by that representative gathering of employees, employers and government officials adopted by the government was the recommendation of contributing to certain types of work carried on in the wintertime by municipalities.

Another recommendation not adopted was that encouragement should be given to small businessmen to improve their plants by accelerated depreciation, and some assistance in the matter of finance for construction in the winter months. Nothing was done in this respect.

On August 30, 1958 the Financial Post took notice of this matter and published an editorial entitled "What Help for Small Business" which reads in part as follows:

> The Ottawa government has done some vague talking about special help for small business.

Then it went on to say:

> The United States small business administration (established in 1953) has been made a permanent federal agency, authorized to grant individual loans up to $350,000 at interest rates which have been cut from 6 per cent to 5¼ per cent.

In the minds of most of us, that is not considered assistance to small business. I referred to this general question the other day without going into detail. I continue:

> In addition, $250 million has been provided for loans by the SBA to investment corporations formed to provide long-term equity capital for small business.

I suggest to the minister that this has been worthy of attention long before now. Many people who had some expectations of the fulfilment of promises in this area were rather disappointed to find that the small business section was set up in the Department of Trade and Commerce. It was expected that if anything more than some free and gratuitous advice was to be offered to business across the country, and if something tangible in the nature of financial assistance was likely to be provided, this section would probably have been assigned to the Minister of Finance. In any event, we have this new branch which has been in existence since last autumn. If the minister has some views in this respect he should convey them now to the committee so that we will not find next week after the house prorogues that, as the Financial Post hints, the country then and only then will get some of the minister's views.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River expresses himself in a singularly un-operative way in suggesting that I have nothing to say with regard to small business, and that if I am going to say anything I will say it next week after the house has prorogued and then at the same time expects me to get up and answer his questions. Before doing so, I would like to say this. Last night I noted that questions with regard to small business had been raised and my intention last evening was to go ahead with a statement concerning small business because I thought it was a proper question to come up in the committee. The committee will recall that because we could not continue after ten o'clock without unanimous consent and one hon. member refused that consent we therefore had to discontinue.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Incidentally, that member is not in the house now.

Mr. Peters: I object to this statement.

Mr. Churchill: It was the member for Skeena who refused unanimous consent. Had we gone on a little longer I intended to say something about small business.

Mr. Peters: I object to the reference made by the minister to something that happened here in a previous sitting.

The Deputy Chairman: Can the hon. member point to any unparliamentary remark about the hon. member?

Mr. Churchill: I was simply explaining to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River why I did not give a report on the small business branch of the department. I had intended fully to do that last night. In an attempt to terminate my remarks within five minutes I inadvertently—and I hope the hon. member will appreciate this fact—said that I would deal with it when we came to the item in the estimates overlooking the fact that I would have to deal with it under item 380. I thank the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River for drawing my attention to this oversight but I hope he was not suggesting that I was attempting to evade making a comment on this particular matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister would want to mention not only the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River but also the hon. member for Nipissing, who also spoke on this matter.

Mr. Churchill: I was just coming to the hon. member for Nipissing. I noted his remarks this afternoon. I was intending to ask him whether he would give me the reference from which he was quoting concerning the statement alleged to have been made by the Prime Minister. I did not get the reference; I was not sure.

Mr. Garland: I will be delighted to do that. I said I was not going to use the reference until I saw the Prime Minister in the house. It was a Canadian Press dispatch of March 18 and carried from coast to coast.

Mr. Churchill: Reported in what paper?

Mr. Garland: The Montreal Star.

Mr. Churchill: That is the information I wanted. I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Nipissing on making this reference in the presence of the Prime Minister; whereas some of his colleagues over there this afternoon took advantage of the Prime Minister's temporary absence from the chamber to make remarks with regard to alleged promises. However, in this particular instance the hon. member for Nipissing I think recognized that the promise to set up a branch to deal with small business was kept, as were other promises that were made during the course of election campaigns.

Mr. Benidickson: You promised to make loans.

Mr. Chevrier: On a question of privilege, I am the member who made statements concerning a matter dealing with the Department of Trade and Commerce in which I outlined some of the statements made by the Prime Minister at the city of Cornwall. I was accused by the Minister of Trade and Commerce earlier and again now that I did not make those statements in the presence of the Prime Minister. I am not accustomed to making statements in the house dealing with any member when that member is not here. Unfortunately, I am sure the Prime Minister was out on other important business and was not able to be in the house; but surely I should not be charged with any irregularity because I made statements concerning the Prime Minister in his absence which are quoted in newspaper reports. It is a perfectly proper thing to do even if the member is not in his seat.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I was not suggesting any irregularity. In passing I was simply commenting upon the fact—

Mr. Chevrier: You mentioned it twice.

Mr. Churchill: —that the Prime Minister would like to have this information. He is interested in all that goes on in the House of Commons, and the remarks of my hon. friends, particularly the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier.

Let me get back to the question of small business. The branch was set up after the house prorogued last summer and extensive studies were carried out along the lines that I have indicated in the terms of reference that were given to the House of Commons on September 3, 1958. Those terms of reference were:

1. To act as a clearing house in referring inquiries of small business to the appropriate departments of the Canadian government or provincial and municipal governments and to various other organizations and institutions;
2. To compile and distribute bulletins and reports on topics of general interest to small business including information on government procurement;
3. To assist small business on request to obtain statistical, technical and other information on management, production and marketing problems;
4. To undertake studies concerning small business, particularly for guidance of the government in developing new policies in this field and as background material for dealing more effectively with the problems of small business;
5. In the course of its work, to consult and cooperate with educational institutions, representative business association and other private organizations.

That was quite a program of work for the branch. At the present time the branch has seven employees, including an assistant director and three research officers. The size of the staff has been kept small purposely during the initial stage of the branch's development until it is able to assemble information and make a report. The most important duties of the officers of the branch have been to advise on a program based upon the branch's terms of reference and the staff requirements for such a program. An important part of the work of the branch has been a review of studies relating to the problems of small business in Canada and other countries and with the collection of quantitative and qualitative material on the position of small business in the Canadian economy.

I will not read all of the information I have here but I will summarize it in this way, that is co-operation with the dominion bureau of statistics, and through liaison with provincial governments a great deal of information has been assembled. Liaison was also established with the United States small business administration. Officials of the department visited Washington in March of this year and a very great deal of work has been done in this connection and, I think, a satisfactory piece of work in the space of less than 12 months since the branch was established.

My hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River dealt with the need for financial assistance to small business and drew attention to the assistance given by a similar organization in the United States which, of course, is much larger in size than anything we have in mind at the present time. Then he pressed us for rather more rapid action and again talked about what the United States has done. But the United States program of lending instituted in 1953 was preceded by a number of years of investigation of the subject and by the previous extensive experience of lending to small business by other agencies of the United States government. It was not something that was done just overnight. The United States drew upon the experience of many years before going further with its assistance program to small business.

Surely it is only reasonable to give us some time to assess the problem, assemble the facts and establish liaison with various organizations and governments throughout the country before we go further with regard to what is an important sector of our economy. We would not have set up a small business branch under the Department of Trade and Commerce unless we were interested and concerned with the problems affecting small business.

I give at this time a progress report. The branch has been set up. It is being efficiently managed. I think it has done everything possible in the course of the nine months which have elapsed since it was established, and in due course the branch will reach conclusions and draw to the attention of the government various things that might be done for small business. We decided that small business needed a certain amount of assistance and this is the way in which we are going about it. To date I think it has been very satisfactory.

The problems of small business will be analysed and a comprehensive statement will be assembled with regard to small business throughout Canada. At that stage, through the Department of Trade and Commerce, representations will be made to the government as to future policy concerning small business. Small business constitutes the greater part of the business of Canada. Of that we are quite conscious and within our means and within reason we want to do what we can to assist.

Mr. Garland: I wonder whether the minister would answer my question. It covers only one small respect of aid to small business. It was in that spirit that I quoted the reference of the Prime Minister to "financial aid to expand" which literally means capital assistance. Does the government intend to make long term capital loans available to small business this year or in the foreseeable future?

Mr. Churchill: Before a complete answer can be given to my hon. friend, as I stated last year when this was under consideration, we have to have the facts. It is the assembling of the facts and information that is the duty and responsibility of the small business branch and the senior officials to whom the branch reports, who subsequently report to me. I pointed out that in the United States financial aid to small business was only undertaken after years of investigation and experience in other bodies, and the same thing is going to be true in Canada. We have not said either yes or no with regard to this particular problem and are not going to give an answer one way or another until we have the facts before us. That is why I have given the house an outline of the investigation to be undertaken by the small business branch and covering the five points to which I have referred. I have indicated that within the nine months that have elapsed since the branch was set up and the officials assigned to their task they have made effective liaison and assembled a mass of information from the business world. In due course this will be drawn together and future policy will be announced.

Mr. Garland: I do not wish to pursue the matter unduly nor do I want to be offensive in any way but when the minister says that the government does not want to act until it has the facts is he suggesting that these promises and statements were made without the facts? What is one to conclude from what the minister has said?

Mr. Churchill: My hon. friend is one of the most genial members of the House of Commons. I realize that he has never said anything in the house that could be considered offensive and I do not take his remarks as such. However, I do not quite understand the hon. member's question.

Mr. Garland: I will be glad to restate it.

Mr. Churchill: Will he restate it and expand it?

Mr. Garland: Perhaps I can restate it without expanding it. The minister has maintained throughout his comments on assistance to small business that the government does not want to move until it has all the facts and finds out precisely what the problem is. By saying that is the minister suggesting that the promises to assist small business to which I have referred and which were made from coast to coast—I do not want to delay the committee by quoting them—were made without knowing the problems that small businessmen have?

Mr. Churchill: On the contrary, the problems that have been facing small business over the years were known to us at the time of the election campaign to which my hon. friend refers. They were known to other people in the country too but no action was taken by those who had the responsibility of government at that time. It was because no action had been taken that we suggested that when returned to power we would take immediate steps to investigate—

Mr. Benidickson: To make loans.

Mr. Churchill: —to get the facts and after the facts had been assembled would then take action.

Mr. Benidickson: No, no.

Mr. Churchill: I think that is a sensible and sound course. I am sure that my hon. friend, who is a very sensible man, will agree that you must have all the facts at your disposal before you can develop a plan. There was considerable knowledge throughout the country of the problems affecting small business and it was the lack of action on the part of the previous government that caused us to bring about this improvement. We have set up this small business branch within the department, are studying the problem in an intensive manner and will have a very good solution to offer in due course.

Mr. Garland: I have one final question and the answer can be yes or no. Does the government intend to make long term loans available to small business this year or in the foreseeable future?

Mr. Churchill: I thought I had answered that in the course of my remarks by saying that when all the facts are at the disposal of the small business branch and they have reported to me the matter will then be considered by the government. That is the situation.

Mr. Pearson: The minister does not seem to have thrown very much light on the situation. The facts are that on March 18, 1958 the Prime Minister is reported as having stated that a special branch would be set up so that small business could obtain financial aid to expand.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask what you are reading from?

Mr. Pearson: I am reading from Hansard for July 17, 1958, page 2341 where there is reference to a Canadian Press dispatch in the Montreal Star of March 18, 1958, quoting the promise made by the Prime Minister that this branch would be set up so that small business could get financial aid.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask, is the sentence in the Star in quotation marks?

Mr. Pearson: If the Prime Minister says he did not say it, perhaps he will deny it now. It has been repeated many times since March in this house and it has not been denied before. The minister now says the branch has been set up so it can accumulate enough facts to enable the government to decide whether or not the Prime Minister's promise will be carried out.

Mr. Howard: I think the Leader of the Opposition will find that this promise will be fulfilled in 1962. Unfortunately, I was called out for a few moments and I understand that in my absence the minister made a comment about some of the events of last evening. I say with regret that I was not here so I could hear them and I am not in a position to make any reply unless the minister, of course, wants to repeat the references he made since he chose a time when I was out of the house to make them.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is rather inferring that I was passing some remarks. I simply stated facts, that is all, and I think they are recorded in Hansard.

Mr. Howard: The minister says he stated facts. I shall look in Hansard to find out what they were and then we will be in a position to determine whether they were facts or only half facts.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Howard: About a year and a half ago an announcement was made by the minister with respect to the trade commission in Hong Kong going to the mainland of China for the purpose, as I recall it, of studying the needs of the Chinese people in so far as imports and exports were concerned. I am sure the minister realizes the special interest that exists in British Columbia in the lumber industry and other industries concerning the possibility of extending our export sales in China. I wonder whether the minister would be able to give any detailed information to the committee concerning what the trade commissioner in Hong Kong discovered about the possibilities of exporting to the mainland of China and any other relevant data covering the question of trade with China.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Skeena has drawn attention to a visit made to China by our trade commissioner in Hong Kong. Subsequently, he was back in Canada and gave a full report of his findings on that occasion which appeared in our publication, "Foreign Trade". This report contained a complete account of his investigation of the trade possibilities in China. I recall that he urged that visits should be made by Canadian businessmen to China if they wanted to enlarge their trade. He pointed out that China operates under a state trading arrangement. There are, I think, sixteen state trading corporations in China, and it is through those state trading corporations that foreign businessmen have to make their arrangements.

The prospects for enlarging Canada's trade with China are not too good. In 1958 we sold 8 cargoes of wheat to China which was a welcome addition to the sales of our wheat during the course of that year. Our total exports in 1958 were just under $8 million, and most of that was wheat. The figures for 1959, therefore, will drop back to what they were before those wheat cargoes were sold. Nevertheless, through the activities of our trade commissioners and through visits of Canadian businessmen and visits of representatives of China to Canada, increasing trade may result. We have had other reports from our trade commissioners indicating interest in China with regard to enlarging its trade with Canada. Several prominent businessmen have recently, within the last year or so, been to China and have written extensive reports in our newspapers concerning their experiences. That is the situation concerning Canada's trade with China.

Mr. Herridge: I just have one question to ask the minister. Could he tell the committee what the government can do to assist the tomato growers of British Columbia and the tomato canning industry?

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Kootenay West gave us a dissertation with regard to the tomato crops in British Columbia and indicated some of the troubles facing the growers there. I think we are aware, and we have taken note of their problem. The hon. member drew attention to the freight charges from the United States to Vancouver and from points in Canada, and also drew attention to the tariff regulations. I would point out to the hon. member that although I listened to him with a great deal of interest and although I appreciate the difficulties facing the tomato growers of British Columbia, this is a matter which is not the prime responsibility of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I shall be glad to discuss this with my colleague the Minister of Finance and representatives from British Columbia to see what assistance might be given, but trade and commerce has not prime responsibility in this area.

Mr. Fisher: I have been sitting here for a couple of hours shouting carried, and I have finally been carried away to the extent of wanting to ask the minister a couple of questions. I wondered, first, whether he had received a report tabled in this house by the committee on mines, forests and waters and whether he had any comments to make on one of the recommendations which was as follows:

> Your committee feels that Canada cannot afford to ignore a potential so great for lumber and pulp sales as is offered in the Orient and, therefore, it recommends that these markets be approached on an open-minded basis.

I imagine they feel an open-minded basis would be that no concern would ever be given to the ideology of the particular regime there. I wonder if the minister has any comment to make on that particular recommendation?

Mr. Churchill: We have no inhibitions with regard to trading anywhere in the world. We do not set up any barriers. I have already drawn attention to the activities of our trade commissioners in, I think it is, 59 countries of the world. This proposal with regard to the Orient is very good. Our trade commissioners in that area will advise our exporters at home of the opportunities that may be open to them. I cannot add anything to what our trade commissioner from Hong Kong said, that if Canadian businessmen will visit the countries in the Orient he is of the opinion they will be enabled to enlarge their trade.

Mr. Fisher: The minister does not feel that the fact that we do not recognize Red China has anything to do with the possibilities of trade?

Mr. Churchill: That question has been raised on many occasions here and my answer has always been that we are prepared to trade with any country in the world that recognizes fair trading practices. We have not been experiencing any particular difficulty with China over the years. It is not as if our trade with China has stopped and been restarted. It has been going on over the years with no questions asked.

Mr. Howard: May I raise one point on the answer the minister was kind enough to give me. I understood him to say that our possibilities of trading with China were not too good. Did I get it correctly?

Mr. Churchill: I would say our trade with China has not been large. For example, in 1955 our exports to China were over $1 million; in 1956 they were close to $2½ million; in 1957 a little over $1¼ million. Then it jumped up in 1958 to almost $8 million, and that was because of the sale of almost $7 million worth of wheat. That gives you an idea of the extent of our trade with China. There are not too many products and I might just run down the list. Phosphate fertilizer, ammonium sulphate, acids, sulphate kraft paper, pulp sulphite, kraft paper, wheat, flour, fine nickel, magnesium, electrical apparatus, scientific apparatus, dental and hospital equipment, piano parts, drugs and chemicals. They are the products which have been sold in the past to China and give an idea of the type of export trade.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, since there seems to be some doubt in the minister's mind about what was said in connection with this financial assistance, I did raise one matter this afternoon. I would like to remind him of a story in the Globe and Mail of February 10, 1958, which indicates that the Prime Minister planned to aid small businesses. Minor tax concessions had been made, but he indicated there would be greater assistance.

Then in a Canadian Press report in the Regina Leader-Post, he is reported to have said the government would also establish a small business advisory committee to provide a liaison between small business and the government, and provide financial aid to enable their expansion. Then according to the Toronto Star of February 26, the Prime Minister said this:

> Small business was the principal victim of the tight money policy. In order to assist this part of the economy, "the back-bone of every community", a business advisory committee will be set up to provide it with a "share of national government business and provide"—

I am coming to the only point I was referring to.

> "—the financial assistance which will allow for expansion and development."

I can go on but I do not wish to delay the house; I just wanted to make sure that what I said can be substantiated in fact.

Mr. Churchill: I thank the hon. member for drawing attention to those articles, and he does not need to express any regret with regard to delay. I am not in any hurry with regard to these matters and the department is a large department. I have no objection to discussing thoroughly all the business with which it is concerned.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I remind the minister that a year ago tomorrow this matter was discussed in the house and the subject was referred to in Hansard, volume 3, for 1958. Some of his own words will be found on page 2357 and earlier, and while I appreciate the position which the minister is in—he did not make these promises; the Minister of Justice had some part in these assurances—nevertheless the minister is charged with this particular matter. A year from the time that this matter was discussed on his own estimates we are given practically the same answers today. The only conclusion we can draw from all of this is that no progress whatsoever has been made in the implementation of the assurance given to the Canadian people.

Mr. Churchill: I regret my hon. friend is unable to draw a better conclusion than that from the facts which I placed before him this afternoon. A year ago today there was no small business branch, no employees in that branch, no investigation had been undertaken such as has since been undertaken, no liaison had been effected with people in the United States and people in the provincial governments. These are substantial measures of progress as I am sure my hon. friend will recognize.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not. There has been no progress.

Item agreed to.

385. Dominion bureau of statistics, including the fee for membership in the inter-American statistical institute and a contribution of $500 to the international statistical institute, $8,565,609.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if I might ask for some information from the minister with respect to the people who I understand are referred to as enumerators in the compilation of the dominion bureau of statistics figures on those persons unemployed and seeking employment. Could the minister indicate the manner in which these enumerators are selected, how often they make a survey, and what is the degree of concentration they apply in making it? That is to say, how many houses per street, and things of that nature?

Mr. Churchill: I wonder if the hon. member would just restate one part of that question. Is the question with regard to taking a census, when he is asking about enumerators?

Mr. Howard: No. I understand the people who conduct the dominion bureau of statistics surveys of people out of work and seeking employment are called enumerators, and they are the ones I referred to.

Mr. Churchill: What we term the labour force survey?

Mr. Howard: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: That is a sample survey conducted in, I think, 139 areas across Canada. Sample data is collected from 35,000 households, and this is done to provide current and up to date estimates of the employment characteristics of the Canadian population. The survey is carried out on a monthly basis. The people who take the survey are selected by officials of the dominion bureau of statistics.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 385 carry?

Mr. Howard: No. I thought the minister was looking for additional information which he was going to give.

Mr. Churchill: Has the hon. member another question?

Mr. Howard: I thought the minister was seeking additional answers through his officials in front of him and that is why I hesitated to rise. I would like to know the payment basis for the enumerators. I pose that as the first question. Are they paid so much a day, or what?

Mr. Churchill: The dominion statistician is on his way down and he will be able to supply that information; I have not got it in front of me.

Mr. Howard: In the meantime I could make a comment or two about the survey itself. This has to do with a dual set of figures, one compiled by the minister's departmental staff, and the other compiled through the Department of Labour. I also have a third set of figures which are not the responsibility of the government, so I do not imagine I could raise them under this particular item.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member has indicated that he is going to discuss two different sets of figures. We are dealing now just with the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Howard: No, I did not indicate I was going to discuss two separate sets of statistics. I said there are two sets of statistics required —one by the minister's department and one by the Department of Labour—and there is often confusion as far as these two sets of figures are concerned. I appreciate we shall be dealing with statistics compiled by the dominion bureau of statistics and I shall not enter into those compiled by the Department of Labour, but it appears that what is necessary is the establishment of statistics which are more reliable than the ones we have at the moment.

I was able to get some information with respect to the constituencies in Canada where there were no enumerators as of April of this year. Earlier I had attempted both at home and through the department here to discover the names of the people who conducted this enumeration of the labour force in the constituency of Skeena. I had difficulty in finding out who those people were, and I discovered later on that the reason why I was not able to find out who they were was because there was no survey conducted in the constituency of Skeena, neither was a survey carried out in Cariboo, and neither was one carried out in Nanaimo. I also discovered that in every province, except Prince Edward Island, there are a number of constituencies which do not have enumerators engaged in compiling this set of statistics which the minister has. In fact, as of April, 1959, no less than 54 ridings in Canada had no such persons compiling statistics. I know the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will be pleased to know that he was denied this sort of service, as well as other constituencies in Canada.

These 54 constituencies covered a very very large area and a wide diversity of labour forces subject to unemployment from time to time, and it seems to me we are getting nowhere near the correct set of figures in so far as the number of people unemployed and seeking work is concerned. I wonder whether we could have some indication from the minister as to why the areas I have mentioned are not or were not at that date adequately covered by enumerators and whether he has any intention of making this survey applicable universally, or when we may get a better picture of what the unemployment situation is.

Mr. Churchill: The answer is this: the hon. member used the phrase "denial of service" with regard to certain areas. This is not a service to certain areas. This is a sample survey concerning questions of employment. The service is not permanently in the 139 areas I mentioned earlier. These areas are changed and in time the areas which the hon. member mentioned may be made the object of this labour force survey. This has nothing to do with a service to a community such as the hon. member mentioned. There is no discrimination between one area and another. It is a sample survey worked out by competent statisticians. If every constituency had this survey taken every month we would be conducting a continual census and that is not the intention in any way. His mathematical friends will assure the hon. member that by this method of sampling the population one is able to arrive at a reasonable accurate figure as to the state of employment and unemployment.

Mr. Howard: I understand, then, from the minister that with reference to the areas he mentioned—he mentioned 139 areas—those areas are not on a constituency basis.

Mr. Churchill: It has nothing at all to do with a constituency basis.

Mr. Howard: How is it possible to list, the constituencies in which there are no surveys being taken at a particular time?

Mr. Churchill: Because surveys are not being taken in those constituencies.

Mr. Howard: There is a connection then. I gather it may be a political one. I do not know.

Mr. Churchill: I object to that reference. There is nothing political about it at all. If the hon. member is—

Mr. Howard: Unless the minister is rising on a point of order—

Mr. Churchill: I am rising on a question of privilege and I will state right now what my point of privilege is. The hon. member is attempting to suggest that this is being done on a political basis, and I say that his statement is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. Howard: I understood also from what the minister said that there is a rotating process and that all areas in Canada are covered, or will be covered by this labour force survey.

Mr. Churchill: That is right. They will be in time.

Mr. Howard: Could the minister tell me whether there has ever been such a survey or group of enumerators in Skeena?

Mr. Churchill: We shall look up the record and convey that information to the hon. member. We have not got it in front of us now.

Mr. Howard: Following up that question, I have here as of April 25, 1959 a list of the constituencies in Canada where as of that date there were no enumerators, and rather than read the name of each constituency I ask that it be recorded in Hansard at this point so that I may inquire of the minister whether there has ever been a labour force survey in each one of those constituencies, and during what period of time that survey was made.

Mr. Churchill: I suggest that that is the type of question which would resolve itself into an order for return and which, if placed on the order paper, would be dealt with accordingly. I think it would be unwise during a discussion on the estimates to interpose in Hansard a list of the length which the hon. member has suggested. The information not being readily available, this would involve a considerable amount of investigation by members of the dominion bureau. I think that is the way it should be dealt with.

Mr. Howard: That will be fine. If it will involve an excessive amount of work I am not so concerned about it, but I wonder if I could have this table included at this place in Hansard as indicating which constituencies did not have labour surveys as of April 25.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member the permission of the committee to have this table printed in Hansard?

Mr. Churchill: No, Mr. Chairman, I object to it on several grounds. I think it is unwise to place tables of this nature directly in Hansard and I think, too, it would be confusing if the hon. member is attempting to imply that these labour force surveys are carried out in particular constituencies. They bear no relationship to those divisions and overlap one constituency and another. This would only confuse the issue.

Mr. Howard: I wish to place this information on the record in tabulated form, as follows:

Mr. Fisher: Has the minister received any complaints in connection with the questions to be asked of ladies in the forthcoming census which are designed to determine fertility status? I know I have.

Mr. Churchill: Before I reply to the hon. member for Port Arthur I should like to say that I deprecate the apparent attempt of the hon. member for Skeena to relate an objective labour force survey to political constituencies. I believe he has left the impression on the record that this objective survey carried on by the dominion bureau of statistics is affected some way by political considerations. I want to state clearly and emphatically that there is nothing of that kind whatever in the organization of the labour force survey. It is done according to statistical compilations and, as I said, the survey areas shift about the country from time to time. In the course of the years every area of Canada will be covered.

With respect to the question raised by the hon. member for Port Arthur I have had no complaints or comments whatever with regard to that point.

Mr. Peters: Is it possible to ascertain who these people are that are working for the dominion bureau of statistics compiling these figures? The minister did not reply to the question about how much they were paid and on what basis.

Mr. Churchill: The information as to who these people are would be readily available from the dominion bureau of statistics. I am sorry I overlooked the question about payment. These are part time employees who work one week per month. The rate of pay depending on experience is on an hourly basis varying from $1.45 to $1.60 per hour.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I, of course, accept the minister's word about alleged political influence in the appointment of these enumerators but I would like to know what is the general policy of the dominion bureau of statistics with regard to the hiring and dismissing of them. I ask this question because I have in my riding one man who devoted himself to this work for a number of years and, by pure co-incidence I am sure, he was replaced by my opponent in the last federal election. I am very glad for my opponent but on the other hand I feel sorry for the man who lost this source of revenue for himself and his family.

Mr. Churchill: These positions are part time positions and are not permanent appointments by any means.

Mr. Hellyer: Party-time?

Board of grain commissioners (Canada Grain Act)—

387. Inspection and weighing of grain, and related services, $4,427,169.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, could the minister indicate why it is necessary on grain assigned to Fort William to have an inspection at Winnipeg and another at Fort William? Why could that not be eliminated?

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member raised this point this morning and I did not have an opportunity to reply to him at that time. The grain inspection at Winnipeg was discontinued this year. The inspection at Winnipeg is now only on special request.

Mr. Benidickson: I know there is another administrative item under which I might raise this question and although it may not be relevant I intend to be brief. Could the minister bring us up to date on export figures with respect to grain? It has been my experience that while some of us receive the Wheat Review from the dominion bureau of statistics the information it contains is three or four weeks behind the information available to the minister.

Would the minister also give us some specific figures on the export of grain out of the lakehead this year compared with last year? Could he also give us figures with respect to exports from Vancouver? I understand that exports out of the lakehead are especially low this year. I think it has something to do with competition for ships vis-à-vis the iron ore trade. Would the minister indicate whether or not the iron ore trade is more remunerative and tell us what the situation is?

Mr. Churchill: Would my hon. friend change his question and not say "exports" from the lakehead but "shipment"?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, of course. It could go to a Canadian port.

Mr. Churchill: I will make that information available at seven o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7 p.m.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can answer immediately the questions raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. He asked about the shipment of grain from the lakehead, indicating that the quantity shipped this year had been below that of last year. This is a matter of very considerable importance.

From the opening of navigation to July 13, the latest figure that I have available, the movement of grain by water from the lakehead amounted to 105,570,000 bushels. This compares with 161,318,000 bushels shipped from the lakehead during the same period a year ago.

The grain movement during the first 60 days of the 1959 shipping season on the great lakes was disappointing. The reasons for this small grain movement were discussed before the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, and the representatives of the wheat board who were present summed up the situation as follows, and I quote their statement as it appears in the report of that committee:

> There are reasons for the delayed movement of grain from the lakehead. The seaway was a new experience for all concerned and in the early part of the navigation season there were unavoidable delays in the movement of vessels. Beyond this, however, a new pattern of inland shipping was being worked out both for grain and other commodities. For example, lake vessels were making the long trip to St. Lawrence ports rather than the short trip to Georgian bay ports. In many cases, grain and ore were moved in combination. No one could anticipate to what extent ocean vessels would utilize the seaway to move grain directly from the lakehead. All these problems are sorting themselves out and there is every indication that the 1959 shipping season will see an adequate movement of grain from the lakehead.
> In the meantime, the board has had, and will continue to have, sufficient wheat in eastern positions to meet all export commitments.

Another factor was the early and continuing heavy demand for ore shipments. During the first week of July, however, lakehead grain shipments exceeded those of the same week a year ago and I hope we shall have the same results for the remaining weeks of the crop year.

It is obvious that the delay in the grain movement out of the lakehead will affect the final quota position in Manitoba and in parts of Saskatchewan. There are still over 20 million bushels of space available in eastern Canada and I hope that the vessel movements out of the lakehead will be sufficiently large to fill the greater part of this space, at least by the end of the crop year.

The wheat board said at that meeting of the committee that I mentioned, and they have reaffirmed subsequent to that committee meeting, that they think the crop year will end with delivery quotas of seven and eight bushels per specified acre. That, of course, as hon. members realize, depends upon steady grain loading until the end of the crop year and that steady grain loading is still going on. With two weeks still to go I think we may reach that quota position.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River also wanted to be brought up to date with regard to the export position concerning the principal grains. I hold in my hand the Wheat Review for June, 1959, which has just come off the press and which gives the figures for August 1 of last year to June 18 of this year. The export of wheat as of that date for the 1958-59 crop year to June 18 was 221,703,933 bushels; for oats, 5,423,824 bushels; for barley, 47,855,011 bushels; and for rye, 1,099,477 bushels; flaxseed, 12,572,616 bushels.

Mr. Fisher: I have one question in regard to the wheat situation at the lakehead. There were a number of difficulties that the minister may be aware of in the early part of the season with respect to the facilities at the elevators for handling foreign ships. I believe this does not come properly as a direct responsibility under this particular vote and this particular agency but I wondered whether the board has made any study of the matter, and feels that there needs to be a re-assessment by the elevators of their loading facilities, so that these foreign ships of larger draft and greater size and with different types of hatches could be accommodated better at the lakehead elevators than at present?

Mr. Churchill: That has been a matter of study during the course of the present shipping season and alterations have been made at some of the loading points already to accommodate foreign ships. I think that with the experience of this year all the necessary changes for loading of foreign ships will be made before the next shipping season commences. It has been a bit of a problem but the people concerned are fully aware of it and in some instances have already made the necessary alterations.

Mr. Fisher: One point that has bothered me is that when this problem first arose at the lakehead there was an immediate demand that the government do something about it and a lot of the responsibility was laid upon the government. I felt at the time that perhaps this was being too kind to the government and that this really should not be a government responsibility at all. It seemed to me that the government's role would be one of advice and perhaps suggestion and leadership. Could the minister outline just what the government's responsibility would be and, so far as these changes are concerned, are we to expect that the government is going to pay anything toward the changes or contribute anything in the form of a subsidy or anything like that?

Mr. Churchill: That question has not arisen. The government's responsibility would be considerable at a government owned elevator but, as my hon. friend is aware, these elevators are mostly owned by other parties and any alterations would be the responsibility of the elevator company.

Item agreed to.

General administration—

582. Departmental administration, including fees for membership in the international organizations listed in the details of the estimates—further amount required, $700.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I asked the minister this morning what the government had decided to do with respect to sales of uranium. I understand that while I was out a number of other hon. members were very interested in getting the reactor established in their ridings. It was said that it should be in Algoma East, Essex East, Nipissing and several of the Newfoundland ridings. I am not speaking on behalf of these people who want the reactor as I think there are factors that will decide where it is going to be established, but I am interested in ascertaining from the minister what he or the cabinet have decided to do with respect to the matter of building CANDU.

The minister may disagree or agree but it has been suggested by newspapers that if we are going to continue the sale of natural uranium we are going to have to give some leadership in the construction of the reactor that will work with this type of fuel. There are several interesting things in the annual report of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and I should like to read one or two paragraphs.

> The preliminary design study, which was completed in 1957, estimated that CANDU could be built for approximately $60 million. The development costs were not included in this total, as it was not thought reasonable to load the cost of the first large station with all the costs incurred in development.

Stopping there, I think this raises an interesting point. I used the example this morning of the Arrow program having some similarity to the handling of our nuclear program, and it will be noted that there is a difference here. Maybe we have learned something and are not now including the development costs in the cost of the first CANDU unit. We are not told in the report what the development costs for CANDU were. The report continues:

> The study also concluded that if the station were incorporated in a public utility system, and operated with an annual load factor of 80 per cent, the cost of power produced would be under six mills per kilowatt hour. In other words, the target in Canada for a station of this size might well be reached.
> As a result of the considerable effort which has gone into the design and the associated development of CANDU, and the success to date of the NPD-2 program, there is now great confidence that the preliminary estimates on CANDU are realistic. Work will continue on the present design and development phase until this is completed. The construction of CANDU will then be considered. The station would take about four and a half years to build.

I suggested this morning that if we got at the program of building CANDU and established the first natural uranium nuclear plant of commercial value we would be able to produce power by 1964 from this type of plant. The minister disagreed with my statement. I said that if he got cracking on it we might do it in less time and that it might be done by 1963. I do not think an answer has been given whether or not we have gone ahead. The Financial Post has speculated that if we go ahead with this type of program we will be in the international uranium market but if we do not go ahead with it then the United Kingdom and other countries are going to make use of enriched uranium and our natural uranium will not be useable in the type of reactor designed to use that kind of fuel. I think the cabinet or whoever makes the decision for Atomic Energy of Canada Limited should indicate if we are going ahead with the program, if we have not already done so, and I think the people of Canada should know the decision.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo stated today that it would be of great advantage for Canada to co-operate with England in an atomic development program. While I did not think of this idea myself, I believe it merits a great deal of consideration because it seems to me that we in Canada are faced with the expenditure of large sums of money for development when we are having a great deal of difficulty financing the development of our natural resources without going into industrial development as well. England, a country that is faced with a lack of power and energy in all forms, is in vital need of this type of plant. I can see the advantages, both political and economic, in Canada and the United Kingdom joining together to produce a form of reactor that will be satisfactory to both countries. I think the minister should tell the Canadian people now if he has any new thoughts on the matter and if and when he is going to do something about it. I should like to suggest to the minister that if I were he I would try to reshuffle some of these departments he has under his jurisdiction.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. While I have allowed the hon. member to go on, I should like to point out that we have not come to the energy board yet. This is a supplementary item under the heading "general administration" dealing with departmental administration. I have checked the item in the details and I find that it refers only to an amount of $700 for a fee paid to the international coffee study group. Therefore that would not open up the department.

Mr. Churchill: May I say that I will give the answer when we come to the item dealing with atomic energy because the questions raised by the hon. member are good questions.

Mr. Benidickson: Under this new supplementary administration item I should like to ask the minister about the likely timing of the supplementary report on private and public investment that is usually issued by his department. Will that be available fairly soon?

Mr. Churchill: That report was issued today. I am glad the hon. member had drawn attention to it. He will be very pleased with it, as I am, because it indicates that the revised figures in 1959 will be more than $200 million above the estimate which was presented early this spring and will exceed the total capital expenditure of the year 1958. The revised figure for 1959 is $8,555 million whereas for 1958 the capital expenditure was $8,417 million.

That represents a significant increase and plans for social capital spending have been little changed from those outlined at the beginning of the year and still involve outlays about 4 per cent above those of last year. On the whole, the results of the mid-year survey of investment intentions reflect increasing business confidence. More new projects are being initiated than was the case in 1958. Where business establishments have revised their investment plans these revisions have been preponderantly in an upward direction. Respondents in the mid-year survey were asked to outline the reasons for any changes in investment plans. The most frequent reason given for expanding a capital program was that the longer run sales outlook had improved.

In summary, the accomplishment of present investment plans will mean that construction activity will reach record heights in 1959 and that spending for machinery and equipment will reverse the downward trend evident last year. While the year-over-year increase planned in capital spending is fairly modest the realization of the program outlined will involve a substantial increase over the rate of activity in the first quarter. It may be expected that capital expenditures will exert a strong expansive influence on the economy in the latter part of the year.

Mr. Benidickson: May I just say that I rather expected this information would be available about now. I had inquired and found that just about this time, and some times earlier, the mid-term estimate was available. I believe this is an illustration of how this government is prepared to avoid giving to parliament the proper information before we are discussing estimates. If this question had not been asked I doubt that we would have got this information today. We would have obtained it after the estimates of the minister had been passed. He would have had this data released and the people in his department would have put out a good mimeographed publication assigned to three hundred or four hundred people and sent to the press.

The minister knows that he went a little far in March when he tabled the original public investment report and he was challenged on that report on both March 10 and 11. He blazoned to the press the thought that there had been an increase in the new year of $100 million in the aggregate of public investment. He ignored the fact that as a result of population growth and G.N.P. growth, everything else would be up beyond that percentage figure. On March 10 I asked a question of the minister. The record is there, and I am not going to belabour the committee with it. On March 11 the hon. member for Ottawa West asked a subsequent question, a factual question, and you will find that the minister in his reply evaded the essence of the question asked.

The point is that $200 million, with reference to that report which involves $8.4 billion, is just about a one-fortieth increase and everybody knows that with population growth the G.N.P. should rise, the Minister of Finance says, 7 per cent this year. This particular increase, which is a very important integral factor in the G.N.P., is up only one-fortieth. I think we should have had this interim report tabled in this house at the opening of the sitting this morning. It was available, and we were going to question the minister about it because I knew he would have a typewritten report even if he had not a printed copy. We would have obtained this information on the floor of the house only if questions were asked.

The point is it was available for publication, but only as a result of questioning do we get this information. These growth rates are so much under what is happening in the United States at the present time that they naturally cause a great deal of alarm to a great many Canadians. I hope the minister will indicate the segments in the economy in which this growth has taken place. I recall when he tabled his report on private and public investment in Canada for 1959 it actually showed the prospect of a decrease of $100 million. It was indicated that in the social field there was going to be an increase having regard to provincial and municipal investments, but in so far as federal responsibility was concerned there would be an expected decrease, particularly in the area of housing. I think the minister might give us a little more information about this because, as I pointed out in my question on March 10, there was a decline of $100 million notwithstanding a rise in population and a general expectation of the average growth from year to year. We can only regard this as a defeat, so I hope the minister will indicate from what segment of the economy he expects the $100 million which he forecast as a reduction will be overtaken. We now have a $200 million increase beyond his original forecast, and where does it occur?

The Deputy Chairman: I must bring to the committee's attention the fact that this item 582 refers only to a vote of $700 to the international coffee study group. Of course, I am in the hands of the committee and whatever the committee wants to do it can do by unanimous consent, but in my position I must draw the fact to the attention of the committee that these matters are not relevant to this item.

Mr. Pearson: I think probably, strictly speaking, you are quite correct, but the fact remains that the minister, now that his main estimates have been passed, has answered a question about this very important mid-summer report of investment intentions, one of the most important documents we could obtain, particularly in relation to the Department of Trade and Commerce. Now when these main estimates are completed we learn about this document. Perhaps there may be another item under which we could discuss it, but in view of the circumstances in which this document could become public I would think we should be permitted to ask some questions about it. Perhaps the first question would be to ask the minister why we did not have an opportunity to have this information before us when discussing the main estimates?

Mr. Churchill: I think we might as well discuss this problem right now. I do not mind in the least.

The Deputy Chairman: To keep the record straight, will the committee give unanimous consent to the minister discussing this particular matter which has been brought up?

Mr. Benidickson: On that point, I would not think it needs unanimous consent. I think you should not try to invoke a precedent. My experience is that when we have had supplementary estimates we have always had a great deal of freedom in discussion of departmental policies which may have developed from the time we discussed a similar item on previous occasion in the same session. I think in fairness, Mr. Chairman, you should just see whether you get any protests or further debate.

The Deputy Chairman: I must point out that I stopped the hon. member for Timiskaming who was going on to another matter, and in fairness to him, of course, I had to draw the matter again to the attention of the committee.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I think you were quite right, and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is just hair-splitting as he was doing earlier when talking about this report, and trying to create the impression that there was some concealment. It is that I object to, because on June 25, as reported at page 5170 of Hansard, when the estimates of this department were introduced, I said this:

> The customary mid-year review of spending plans is now under way. Although the final figures will not be available for another two weeks or so the results to date indicate upward revisions in anticipated outlays sufficient to raise total projected spending for the year up to and probably a little above the actual outlays in 1958.

My hon. friends had that information placed at their disposal on June 25, and now they get up and say that I attempted to conceal some information from them. It was all there, and furthermore it is a good report which was released by the dominion bureau of statistics today. My hon. friends just do not like to receive good news. This disappoints them. They asked the question in the hope they could show that things were getting worse, but things are getting better, and they were a bit non-plussed. I would have come to this thing eventually.

Mr. Pearson: When? The next session?

Mr. Churchill: We had to be asked the question. I draw to the attention of my hon. friends that things are improving in Canada, and for that improvement business and government can take some of the responsibility and the credit. My hon. friends do not like good news, and that is why they raise this objection now.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, one point arising out of the minister's remarks which I think he owes it to the house to clarify is why he did not table the document today if it was available as he indicated it was, and available to him throughout the day. Why was it not made available to members of parliament dealing with the estimates of his department?

Mr. Pearson: The minister said that on June 25 he told the house that this report was not yet completed, but the information when it was completed would likely indicate a very favourable situation, and that in a couple of weeks or so it would be completed. On the basis of that statement two weeks ago that the report might show something we are expected to accept now from the minister a final report at the end of his estimates, a report which has an important bearing on those estimates, and expected not to complain but to assume that two weeks ago he was speaking correctly when he said that the report might show that. The minister also said a moment ago that he would have come to this report eventually. When would he have come to the report? We are on the supplementary estimates now. On what item of the estimates would we discuss this? It is an important report which has not been shown to the House of Commons. I do not know whether it was given to the press or not.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, it was by sheer accident that the Department of Trade and Commerce estimates were not completed in June. I was prepared to go ahead with them but there was a change of program. By now they would have been completed, before this report was even printed and published. Then my hon. friends would have cried blue ruin again. The economy is expanding and they do not like to hear about that.

Mr. McIlraith: Let me clear up one point. The minister obviously has had this printed report today. Why did he withhold it from the house? I ask him the question, why was it not tabled and distributed in the proper way?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I am not withholding anything.

Mr. McIlraith: Why do you not table the document, then?

Mr. Churchill: For all I know it has been tabled.

Mr. McIlraith: It is your duty to know.

Mr. Benidickson: It is tabled under the minister's name.

Mr. Churchill: If my hon. friends want copies I think we can have copies made available to them.

Mr. McIlraith: Not as a concession at the end of the estimates, but as a matter of right.

Mr. Churchill: Certainly as a matter of right. You are entitled to the document.

Mr. Chevrier: Then produce it.

Mr. Churchill: My hon. friends will be here for some time and we will have documents for everybody in the chamber, I hope.

Mr. Pickersgill: Even for the press.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister say when he first saw the printed report such as would be tabled in this house?

Mr. Churchill: I think it was at one o'clock, and I did not have a chance to read it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Could the minister kindly tell me if the report has been already released to the press?

Mr. Churchill: I would have to ask about that.

Mr. Pearson: It is easy to find out.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Am I not correct in saying that the report was printed over a week ago?

Mr. Churchill: Of that I am not aware.

Mr. Pearson: Could the minister find that out, because his officials will undoubtedly know? If it is the case, it has been in printed form for the minister, and if it has been released to the press it is an extraordinary thing that while we have been on these estimates for two days we in the committee have not had the advantage of this report and information.

Mr. Churchill: I must correct one statement of the Leader of the Opposition. This has not been in the possession of the minister for two weeks.

Mr. Pearson: I did not say two weeks.

Mr. Churchill: Or several days. It is only seconds ago that I stated I first saw it in printed form at one o'clock today.

Mr. Benidickson: Does the economic division of the minister's department produce for the minister prior to an order for printing a copy of such report and, if so, when did they produce a manuscript of this report?

Mr. Churchill: I did not receive a manuscript of this report from the economics branch.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was printed then without the minister ever having read it?

ATOMIC ENERGY

Atomic energy control board—

37. Administration expenses of the Atomic Energy Control Board, $62,800.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, we have been going quite fast in the last few minutes, but I think this item deals with the atomic energy control board.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, shall I make a statement first? I did not realize we had reached vote No. 37 with such dispatch, but I have a statement to make about the atomic energy control board, which is item No. 37 and is distinct, of course, from Atomic Energy of Canada Limited itself. It is a very short statement on this control board.

With the uranium producing industry in full operation, and with most of the information relating to peaceful uses of atomic energy declassified, the board's duties in connection with prospecting and mining and with security matters have been lightened considerably. Its responsibilities in health and safety matters, however, have increased, partly because of the increasing use of radioactive isotopes in industry and medicine, but mostly because of nuclear reactor projects outside of Chalk River.

Three of these have been dealt with; the nuclear power demonstration plants, a 20,000 kilowatt nuclear electric power plant at Des Joachims on the Ottawa river, a one megawatt swimming pool research reactor at McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario, and a sub-critical reactor—or more properly, assembly—at the University of Toronto. The board has set up the reactor safety advisory committee to advise it on the health and safety aspects of reactors, and on the advice of this committee, given after intensive study of each project, has issued a construction permit for the first, and construction and operating permits for the other two.

In connection with CANDU, the 200,000 kilowatt power reactor referred to in my statement to the house on June 18 last, the selection of the site will be made by Ontario hydro subject to approval by the various other bodies concerned and by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, and the committee will review the health and safety aspects of any proposed site before a construction permit is issued.

Another matter that is growing in importance is the export of uranium under the arrangements announced last year for export of sample quantities, under bilateral agreements with friendly nations, or through the international atomic energy agency. Under the act and regulations the board has to give final approval for these exports and must in this connection keep closely in touch with the other agencies concerned, particularly external affairs, trade and commerce and Eldorado.

That the board with its very small staff has been able to deal effectively with the matters in its charge is, of course, very largely due to the co-operation it has received from other government authorities, federal and provincial, and from the public.

Mr. Pearson: I have already spoken about this particular matter, to which I think great importance should be attached, and there is not very much I would add to what I said this morning, but I should like to pay my tribute to the scientists and the engineers who are responsible for this nuclear reactor CANDU and to express the hope which has been expressed by the hon. member for Timiskaming that the nuclear power plant will be put into operation as quickly as possible, indeed if that is not done we shall be left behind, since the United States and the United Kingdom are making great progress in this field and in the export of their reactors and their knowledge to other countries. I think we must admit that they have some advantages over us, particularly the United States, because of the terms they can offer.

I was reading only the other day that nuclear power development in the United Kingdom had been carried so far that another station was about to be built, I think, in Dungeness. I also understand that our particular reactor is as efficient, as economical and as advanced, if not more so, than any other in the United States or the United Kingdom. We have, if I may put it this way, a good product and it is very important to get that product into the markets of the world, and in doing so to assist those who are concerned with uranium in general.

The minister has mentioned that the site for the nuclear power plant has not yet been decided. He has received a good deal of advice this evening as to where it should be erected, but I take it from what he has said that the federal government is only one of the agencies which will determine the site of this establishment; Ontario hydro and Atomic Energy Limited will also have something to say about it. I would only repeat, as the hon. member for Nipissing is not here tonight, that there are very definite advantages attached to a site near Elliot Lake not only technically and from the point of view of the availability of material but because this is a community which is living now in conditions of insecurity arising from the possibility that contracts with the United States will end in 1962. During this intervening period of uncertainty it would really mean a great deal to that community, which is the centre of the uranium district in this country, to have the plant in that area. But that is, of course, something which the minister and the other levels of government together with the Ontario hydroelectric commission will have to decide.

We are now on the verge of great developments in this field, not only in the military but in the non-military uses of nuclear energy. We in Canada have certain advantages, not only as to the material used but because of the skill and knowledge of our scientists and engineers who have developed a plant which is second to none in the world. I am sure that the government as well as all Canadians will wish everything possible to be done to ensure that our country remains in the forefront of this development which is fraught with such great possibilities not only for ourselves but for the rest of the world.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to follow up what the Leader of the Opposition has said by asking the minister what the position is with regard to the development of power from atomic energy. He made a short statement on this subject a moment ago, but I should like to know exactly how far we have advanced in development of power in this field. What is the cost of the reactor? How much will be contributed by the federal government, how much by Ontario and how much by the hydroelectric power commission. Further, I should like to know—and this may be a question that cannot be answered at this time—how the cost of the development of one horsepower from atomic energy compares with that of developing an equal amount of energy from water power.

Mr. Churchill: I made a short statement on the atomic energy control board which is the item we are now considering. Item 39 deals with Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. I do not think it is material whether we restrict our discussions to the control board. I think that last year we ranged the field and then passed the four items one after the other, so I will now proceed to make a statement concerning item 39, namely, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. Then perhaps I will answer some of the questions which have already been asked, and subsequently I will endeavour to answer some other questions.

I think there was a misunderstanding earlier as to the program. The hon. member for Skeena was reading from the annual report of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited which came out in May, and the program for proceeding immediately with CANDU was announced in the House of Commons on June 19, and I think this led to a measure of misunderstanding as to what was being done. But with regard to the program of atomic energy development generally in Canada I would like to say a few things.

The present Canadian power reactors being built and designed are a direct evolution of the work at Chalk River, starting with the original zero energy reactor in 1945. This was a heavy water moderated experimental facility and it is still used for basic reactor research. It was followed in 1947 by the very successful NRX reactor which is heavy water moderated and cooled with ordinary water. This reactor has proven to be one of the best research and engineering test reactors in the world. The NRU reactor followed in 1957, with five times the power of NRX, accomplished primarily by arranging for cooling with heavy water. It has been working very well for the last six months, following a period of start-up problems. It is the first reactor in the world to change fuel under power, now a routine operation.

The prototype power reactor NPD-2 which is under construction and due for operation in 1961 is heavy water moderated and cooled, as will be the first full-scale plant, the 200 megawatt CANDU recently approved for construction. All of these reactors are fuelled with natural uranium.

Concentrating on one basic system has allowed our scientists and engineers to become thoroughly familiar with all the detailed advantages and disadvantages of the system.

They are recognized throughout the world as being the best qualified group in this particular field. It is to our advantage that we have stayed with one line and it is not because we have refused to look at other reactor systems. There is nothing mysterious, to the scientist, about the other systems such as the graphite moderated reactors so well developed by the United Kingdom, or the light water enriched reactors developed mainly in the United States. Although our knowledge of these systems is not as intimate as it is with the heavy water systems, through our associations with scientists and engineers in the United Kingdom and in the United States we have a good understanding of what is involved and can make reasonably valid comparisons between the Canadian approach and that of other scientific groups. The technical staff at Chalk River are continually reviewing new and promising reactor concepts and to date have seen no reason why we should change our present approach.

Having established a position as one of the five leading nations in atomic energy development and having become particularly well qualified in the heavy water field has had its effect on the interest of other nations in the Canadian program and in the Canadian establishments as a training base. The advanced countries such as the United Kingdom and the United States are interested in joint programs of basic research or fuel development or even reactor designs, whereas the lesser developed countries are more in need of general training for their scientific staff.

The program of co-operation with the United Kingdom and the United States is extremely close and fruitful. Both countries have about fifteen personnel stationed at Chalk River. We have a long history of excellent co-operation with the United Kingdom, particularly in the research field where there has been a continual exchange of staff between Harwell and Chalk River for a number of years. More recently much closer collaboration has been agreed upon in the applied programs of reactor development in both countries. Technical staff from the United Kingdom atomic energy authority industrial group are working closely with their opposite numbers at Chalk River. A joint project associated with the design and development of steam cooling a heavy water moderated reactor has been inaugurated. The United Kingdom reactor designers recognize the merits of heavy water as a moderator and are active in design studies using this material. Chalk River have two experienced professional staff assisting on this work at the United Kingdom industrial group design office. The UKAEA are quite cognizant of Canada's advanced position in heavy water reactor development and are relying to a considerable extent on some of our experience, particularly that related to fuel development and the general problems associated with handling heavy water.

The co-operation with the United States has been very close and very broad from the start of the program in Canada. The whole of the uranium oxide fuel development work which is an essential part of the power reactor program has been closely allied with projects of the USAEC. The Chalk River reactors NRX and NRU are ideal test beds for fuel development and the NRX reactor, particularly, has been used to a maximum degree. The United States atomic energy commission has co-operated to the extent of supplying major pieces of equipment and a steady flow of special fuel specimens. The results of all the work are shared, regardless of where the project originates, which has undoubtedly assisted in reaching the present advanced stage of the oxide fuel development.

The USAEC has recently shown special interest in the power reactor development program in Canada. They are placing engineers on the design teams on both the organic cooled heavy water moderated study, as well as the CANDU project. This is in addition to the staff normally located at Chalk River and is indicative of their interest in the heavy water system for nuclear power. Although the USAEC has pioneered the work on organic coolants and will have much to offer the Canadian project, they have not, to date, proposed a reactor project coupling organic coolant with heavy water moderation. The Canadian project will be a very important link in the over-all development of the organic reactor systems. The USAEC will be developing two other systems utilizing organics and the heavy water moderated system fills an obvious and very promising gap. A full exchange of information on each of these projects has been arranged.

Co-operation with India needs special mention. As is well known, Canada is providing India with a large research reactor known as the CIR—Canada-India reactor—under the Colombo plan. This reactor, similar to the NRX reactor at Chalk River, is scheduled to go into operation next spring or early summer. Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is providing extensive technical assistance in connection with this project, including the training of the Indian operating and maintenance staffs and in the preparation of the necessary handbooks and manuals. Thirteen engineers are now at Chalk River receiving training of this kind.

Owing to the shortage of working accommodation at Chalk River, AECL has had to limit the number of staff from other countries attached to Chalk River, but during the past year it has been possible to accept one or two scientists and engineers from about twelve of these other countries to stay at Chalk River for extended periods. To meet the need for training larger numbers of qualified staff from Canada and abroad, a reactor school is being established at Chalk River. The first course will be given early in 1960. An announcement about the reactor school will be made shortly by AECL and a prospectus will be issued to all organizations likely to be interested.

While atomic power will no doubt become the most important peaceful application of atomic energy, the uses of radioisotopes in medicine, agriculture, industry and research are also very important and far-reaching advances are steadily being made. The commercial products division of AECL processes and sells the radioisotopes produced in the Chalk River reactors and designs and develops equipments using these radioisotopes.

The principal source of revenue of the division continues to be the sale of Cobalt-60 and Cobalt-60 beam therapy machines. There are now six models available and 147 have been sold to 27 countries. A new Caesium-137 unit is also now being made on a production line basis. This machine is of special benefit in the therapy treatment of growths close to the skin. Another new item of equipment being marketed by the commercial products division is the Gammacell 220. This is a completely shielded semi-mobile unit containing a very high activity Cobalt-60 source for use as a development tool or an industrial radiation source.

Revenues of the division were down slightly during 1958 owing to a decline of foreign orders, but in recent months new orders have shown a definite improvement. As a result, it appears that the volume and value of sales will continue at the rate of about $2,500,000 per annum.

As I announced in the House of Commons on June 17, the success to date of the work on the small power reactor coupled with the results of further experiments by the scientists at Chalk River and the design work of the engineers in the nuclear power plant division located in Toronto, has been such that a decision has been taken to proceed with the final design and construction of a full-scale nuclear power plant. This rounds out Canada's nuclear power program which may be summarized as follows:

The 20,000 kilowatt NPD-2 project is expected to be in operation in 1961 and will give Canada an early demonstration unit and will be particularly useful in the development of fuel cycles and the general development of reactors of this type.

The 200,000 kilowatt CANDU is scheduled for completion in 1964 and will be our first full scale power reactor. This design will rely heavily on the design of NPD-2 and, exclusive of design and development costs, it could prove to be an economically competitive unit if it is operated in the Ontario hydro system as a base load station and is competing with imported coal.

The OCDRE, organic cooled deuterium reactor experiment, design study fills several roles in the program. It may be considered as a "back-up" to the NPD and CANDU type of design where an organic material replaces the heavy water as the coolant. One of the specifications covering the design is that the steam produced from the reactor is of a quality which could be used at a northern site with Frobisher Bay as the preference. It is quite possible that this system would produce the most economical plant of all for small stations fueled with natural uranium. It is quite reasonable to expect this design to produce the best natural uranium fueled plants in sizes up to about 150,000 kilowatts, electric.

A project to study the enriched systems for application in very small sizes at remote Canadian sites is under way. This project consists of a study contract relating Canadian load and site conditions to the reactor designs and prototype plants which have been thoroughly investigated in the United States. The Canadian contractor is obtaining full cooperation from the relevant United States sources. This study should give us the answer as to which system would be most economic for application to remote sites. The project is jointly sponsored by AECL and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Although these power reactor projects are a major portion of Canada's program we should not lose sight of the importance of the work at Chalk River associated with the general research and development program. This is really the hard core of all atomic energy development in Canada and without this large fund of knowledge and experience the power reactor designers would soon find themselves faced with problems beyond their experience and competence. This establishment is costing the government of Canada from $25 million to $30 million a year. Part of this could be assigned to the specific task of developing nuclear power but there is also a large part which is needed to keep Canada in the forefront of nuclear development. I think that all will agree that the money is being well spent and certainly those who have had an opportunity of visiting Chalk River will approve of this expenditure.

The staff is generally quite young: they are vigorous and competent and measure up well with any similar group anywhere in the world. Canada gained the enviable position of a leading nuclear nation during and immediately following the war. It is the scientific and technical personnel and the support they are getting which is keeping us in this position.

The estimates for 1959-60 follow right along with the program outlined in my policy statement of February 1, 1958, and my statement of September 3, 1958 on last year's estimates. The total of $31,379,500 consists of $7 million for the NPD-2 project and the design and development work on CANDU and approximately $24.4 million for Chalk River. The effect on the estimates of the approval of the CANDU project will not be seen to any extent this year other than through commitments.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise a couple of points. With the blessings of the coming of industry, and particularly the mining industry, we have always had dangers in certain mines such as occupational hazards or illnesses pertaining to that particular mining industry. For example, there is the illness caused by gas and the danger of explosions, and so forth, in the coal mining industry. We have always had the scourge of silicosis in the hard rock mining industry. A great number of people from my riding have left there to work in the uranium mines in various places such as Bancroft, Blind River and elsewhere. Many of them have left their families there and they come home from time to time; they move back and forth. There is always a lot of talk. I do not know how much of it is true, and how much of it is embellished, about the dangers involved in radiation, and so forth, in the uranium mining industry. Can the minister inform the committee as to what has been the experience to date, just what hazards peculiar to this mining industry have developed and what steps the government has taken to combat those hazards?

Mr. Churchill: I am informed that there is no special hazard attached to the mining of uranium that differs from other mining activities. There is the question of control of dust, and the mining authorities institute the proper control systems and the provincial governments exercise supervision over those precautionary measures.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Does that apply as well to the processing? In other words, from experience there has been no instances of radiation poisoning or anything of that nature in the mining process or in the processing of the ore afterwards?

Mr. Churchill: There is no radiation hazard in the processing operations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister tell me whether he has any information at hand with respect to this matter? He mentioned that 167 cobalt bombs were sold to 37 countries. Can he tell me how many of those cobalt bombs were purchased out of funds provided by health and welfare for use in Canada?

Mr. Churchill: That is important information which should be made available and will be made available to the hon. member but not immediately. We will send word to him tomorrow.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The former secretary of state for external affairs, who should know about the number of countries, informs me that I was not correct when I said 168 countries. I should have said 37.

Mr. Herridge: I just have one question and it is related to the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Japan for co-operation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. Clause 3 of that agreement reads as follows:

> It being the intention of the contracting parties to avail themselves, as soon as practicable, of the safeguard facilities created by the international atomic energy agency, the contracting parties may, in respect of this agreement, request the said agency to apply, in such respects and to such extent as the contracting parties may from time to time agree, safeguards in accordance with article XII of the statute of the said agency. Consultations looking to such agreement shall take place upon the request of either contracting party.

My question is: In view of the great dangers from the disposal of atomic wastes in the oceans of the world and in other places, can the minister inform the committee what check the government of Canada makes with respect to clause 3 of this agreement? Does our atomic energy board advise the government as to the safeguards that are required and check to see that the agreement is being kept in that respect?

Mr. Churchill: Matters affecting health or that may affect health in Canada come under the supervision of the atomic energy control board.

Mr. Herridge: I am referring to the disposal of wastes as a result of the use of this uranium in Japan. This article provides for certain safeguards and I am wondering how Canada would check and who advised the government with respect to the application of this clause.

Mr. Churchill: The safeguards that are introduced into these agreements are to make certain that the material will not be used for military purposes. When a country using this uranium for peaceful purposes has a problem, just as we have in Canada or in the United States or in the United Kingdom, with regard to the disposal of waste products that is their own special problem because the people affected are their own people.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to ask the minister to deal with two questions I asked earlier. Has any other province than Ontario shown any interest in co-operating with the federal government in the construction of a nuclear power plant? Second, are there any negotiations under the Japanese-Canadian treaty for the actual sale of uranium to Japan? I understand that the treaty is really just an enabling treaty.

Mr. Churchill: All provinces are aware of the development going on at Chalk River. They are all kept informed and they have representatives in attendance from time to time to consult with the authorities of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and with our scientists at Chalk River so that they know what is ahead in the way of the development of these power reactors. But at the present time, for the erection and use of CANDU, Ontario is the only province which is in a position to take advantage of that development and in a position to pay for it at the time. The amount of electric power that will be produced by CANDU could only be utilized by a grid system as large as the present one in Ontario.

With regard to the bilateral agreement with Japan, it does not require Japan to purchase any given quantity of uranium but it does provide a method by which the sale of uranium to Japan may be made. In the case of countries who have no bilateral agreements sales can be made through private agencies provided they are limited. Where there is a bilateral agreement there is no limitation provided the safeguards are utilized.

Mr. Pearson: Are any negotiations going on under the bilateral treaty at present for the actual sale of uranium to Japan.

Mr. Churchill: My information is that there are some negotiations going on for the sale of Canadian uranium to Japan.

Mr. Pearson: Thank you.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Peters: Would the minister inform us if any consideration has been given to the matter of co-operation with the United Kingdom? I think the minister questioned my statement that there had been some discussion of this question but the Financial Post points out that the United Kingdom is in a serious position in this field because of the lack of power and that it could prove advantageous both to Canada and the United Kingdom if they were to develop jointly an enriched uranium program that probably could be implemented through the building of a dam and power project at Hamilton falls in Labrador. Would the minister and the department take a look at that type of development as opposed to the one the minister has outlined in which we are now engaged? It would seem that we are pretty well putting all our eggs in one basket and concentrating on the development of natural uranium when at not too much cost we might be able to co-operate with the United Kingdom in the development of enriched uranium using this power source to which I have referred.

Mr. Churchill: I think I asked the hon. member if he had any authority for saying that the United Kingdom was prepared to co-operate with Canada in the development of Hamilton falls for the eventual production of enriched uranium. I have heard of this proposal and have read the article to which the hon. member has referred. We are quite prepared to consider any reasonable proposal that is within the financial reach of our country. I understand that the production of enriched uranium is a very expensive process indeed. If the requirements are such that further enriched uranium should be produced and that this could be done in Canada with the co-operation of the United Kingdom we would certainly be interested in considering the proposition, but at the present time I am not sure that it is feasible or that we have the money available, even jointly with the United Kingdom, to embark upon it. Nor am I certain that there is at present a need for the supplies of enriched uranium which would result from that development.

Item agreed to.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

252. Salaries and other expenses, $26,192,170.

Mr. Noble: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a request to the minister in respect of the development of a more suitable substance for treatment of our highways for winter driving. Under existing conditions and with the materials now used car and truck owners are suffering tremendous damage to their vehicles from rusting. Furthermore, the salt induces rapid deterioration of cement surfaced walks and roadways. With our researchers doing such remarkable work in other fields, would it not be within the realm of possibility that a non-rusting material for use on our roads could be developed?

Mr. Churchill: I will have to draw to the attention of the national research council the suggestion put forward by my hon. friend. I do not think I can answer offhand but it will be directed to them for consideration. I thought that at this time the committee would perhaps like to have a short statement on the national research council.

The Research Council Act gives the national research council very broad powers in the scientific field, setting it up as an agency to assist and promote scientific research throughout the country. The council discharges its responsibilities in three main ways. First, by providing assistance for the graduate schools of Canadian universities from which come the supply of scientists; second, by giving scholarships to graduate students; and, third, in its laboratories where research of national interest not being done elsewhere is carried out.

The national research council's university support has been continuous for forty-two years and has been increasing rapidly through the last few years. Without minimizing the contributions from other sources, it has been the national research council that has provided the main financial support for university scientific research in Canada. The current expansion of the universities together with the need for increased emphasis on science in the western world has made the financial problem of university research very difficult. The challenge to the council is to increase its university support to meet the accelerated requirements for post-graduate scholarships and research grants. The present status of science in the universities is largely due to financial support from the national research council. Recognizing the present need, the government last year increased national research council support to universities by 70 per cent, that is $2.5 million. It is now proposed to provide a further increase of $2 million, that is 33 per cent, for 1959-60, of which $500,000 applies to medical research. This brings the total national research council support for university research in 1959-60 to approximately $8 million.

The laboratories of the national research council carry out fundamental and applied research in science and engineering that is of national importance and also assist and encourage research in Canadian secondary industries. The more research industry does the more interested it is in seeking advice and assistance from the national research council. This leads to the non-obvious conclusion that the more research industry does, the greater the need for the national research council laboratories to expand.

Expenditures by industry on scientific research in Canada have increased from less than $5 million before world war II to $130 million in 1957 and $140 million in 1958. This is an encouraging increase but the total amount is still very low and in some industries no research is being carried out in Canada. In some cases the problem is one of awakening an industry to the need for research; in others, a Canadian firm is a branch only and the parent company does all research and development outside Canada. Industrial research in Canada is directed almost entirely towards development which leaves the council laboratories almost alone in the field of basic industrial research.

The laboratories have undergone a steady growth since 1939 when the staff was about 300 until today, in spite of having split off defence research and atomic energy, the staff numbers about 2,400. During this expansion every effort has been made to maintain a steady and effective expansion of the laboratories as manpower considerations permitted. This steady increase is being continued and the present estimates provide for an increase of staff to 2,511 by March 31, 1960. There is nothing spectacular in the estimates for the laboratories.

The highlight of these estimates are as follows: the total increase of $4,141,376 brings the total requirement of the council to $30,-133,580. Vote No. 252, the operating vote, is increased by $3,531,441. The main items in this increase are: first, scholarships and grants for university research, $2,300,750; salaries, $961,787.

Research agreements with several universities for increased research in oceanography amount to $200,000. The present oceanographic effort, centred around the resources and interest of the fisheries research board, the Royal Canadian Navy and the hydrographic survey, is not considered to be adequate to meet the requirement for fundamental research nor for the increasing demands of wider national and international interests. The council feels that it should give special support to work in this field. To take care of immediate problems it is proposed to make funds available to establish or assist oceanographic research departments in two or three universities which have demonstrated interest and ability in this field.

These three items I have mentioned account for $3.1 million out of the total increase of $3.5 million. A large part of the remaining $370,000 is required for supplies and equipment for the laboratories.

I might mention, with regard to vote 253, construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, that the increase in the vote for capital expenditures is $609,935. This increase is caused by the anticipated acceleration of three construction projects started in 1958-59 without benefit of the compensating completion of any large project. These three projects are a new communications branch building on Riverside drive, a high speed wind tunnel laboratory at Uplands, and a new laboratory for the division of applied physics at the Montreal road site.

Mr. McIlraith: Can the minister tell us when it is expected these three major buildings he has mentioned will be completed?

Mr. Churchill: It appears to be 1961 for two of the buildings, the communications branch and the high speed wind tunnel laboratory and later for the applied physics building.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I have one question to ask of the minister. On the first item I asked him if he would consider the possibility of sending to the Saguenay-Lake St. John region one or two experts from the national research council to meet with officials from the Aluminum company and Price Brothers to study the possibility of establishing some minor industries in my riding in connection with the by-products of aluminum and pulp and paper.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, the representatives from the technical information branch of the national research council will accede to your request.

Item agreed to.

549. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required, $600,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Before we complete these estimates, may I ask the minister if he would not reply to those questions I asked about the cost of developing power from atomic energy. I had to leave the house for a moment, otherwise I would have asked the minister earlier.

Mr. Churchill: I am sorry; things moved rather quickly. Would the hon. member like an answer now or subsequently?

Mr. Chevrier: I think if the minister gets the information later I would be satisfied.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of Trade and Commerce. Item 280.

[Mr. Churchill.]

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

280. Contributions to the provinces to assist in the development of roads leading to resources in accordance with agreements entered into by Canada and the provinces, $9,000,000.

Mr. Pearson: This is not in accordance with the procedure announced last evening. I wonder if we could get some explanation as to why this change was made. We had assumed that mines and technical surveys, then fisheries and post office would come up.

Mr. Churchill: This is a change in the announced program. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is expected in Victoria tomorrow morning in order to meet Her Majesty, the Queen. For that reason we are asking the indulgence of the house to proceed with his estimates tonight. I must accept some responsibility for the error. I did not realize his departure had to be made tomorrow. If the house is agreeable we will proceed with the balance of the estimates of that department.

Mr. Pearson: Does that imply that if the minister's estimates are not completed by ten o'clock we shall go on until they are finished? Otherwise, of course, there would be no particular purpose served in going on until ten o'clock and having the minister come back tomorrow, because in that event he would miss his appointment anyway.

Mr. Churchill: Let us see what progress has been made by ten o'clock, and then if the house is in an agreeable mood we might continue for some time after that hour. I think everything will work out for the best.

Mr. Fisher: I would like to know if we could have what word the minister got from Old Man Ontario?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I contacted the provincial treasurer of the province of Ontario on Monday morning and he had no reason at all to oppose publication of the announcement of these roads. I think I should just read the list of roads off and then I will say a word about the program itself.

The program is as follows: The first road is from Savant Lake south to Ignace, approximately 90 miles. The second road is from Foleyet to Chapleau south, approximately 60 miles. The third road is from Minaki south, approximately 15 miles. With this road there is the condition that they may go further north, subject to my approval in writing. The fourth road is from Nakina northerly, approximately 50 miles. The fifth is from Goldpines to Uchi Lake, approximately 50 miles. The sixth is from Port Arthur north, approximately 70 miles. The seventh is from Campbell Red Lake mine to H. G. Young mine, approximately 2 miles. I will read the general description of the eighth road to make it clear:

Resources development roads in the northwesterly part of the province: To facilitate the exploration and development of timber, mineral and commercial fishing resources. The location of these roads will be determined by the provincial minister, subject to the approval in writing of the minister. The decision of the provincial minister will be based on information that will be supplied from a photoraphic and magnetometer survey along with geological reconnaissance to be carried out in the area north of the Canadian National Railways from Nakina westerly to the Manitoba boundary.

The last road, No. 9, is as follows:

Resources development roads in the northerly part of the province: To facilitate the exploration and development of timber, mineral and commercial fishing resources. The location will be determined by the provincial minister subject to the approval in writing of the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the total mileage?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I cannot give the hon. member the total including the last two roads, because the routes and mileages have not yet been ascertained; but the total mileage for the first seven roads is 335. That does not include the mileage of the ones in the northwesterly part of the province or the ones in the northerly part of the province which are contemplated.

I would like to say a word on the roads to resources program. This is not a new concept. It was first debated in this house in 1911. It was a proposal of the government of the day led by the Right Hon. Mr. Borden, and it was supported by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The original proposal of 1911 was turned down by the Senate, and the next we heard of this proposal was in the province of Ontario in the thirties. It was a very fine idea, first of all, to open up access to mines, and then it was gradually evolved into a program to include all types of roads.

I should like to make this point about the road program in general and its development, as I see it, across Canada. I should like to make very clear to the house that of our over-all expenditure on national develpoment, northern development takes only about 10 per cent. I should like to suggest that already dividends have appeared. This summer over 50 oil and gas exploration parties in the north are using over 400 scientists and men in the first stages of the development program. To point out to the house the significance of this to the people of Canada, three years ago oil and gas revenues totalled about $300,000. This last year ending March 31 it was close to $9 million, which was a sizeable increase. Last year it was $900,000, and that is a tenfold increase in one year. If our experience in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon is the same as in Alberta, we can expect eventual revenues of between $100 million and $250 million a year from this source.

I noticed in the discussion here on Saturday that it was mentioned that road costs have been revised upwards. This is true. I could give the committee an example of one road which was mentioned in the debate, the Flat Creek-Eagle Plain road. On the advice of men who helped to build the Alaska highway and who had built roads in the territories, both public and private, I told the committee on mines, forests and waters last year that I expected this first section of the road to cost between $5 million and $8 million. The estimates now are that it will be over $10 million. But when I told the committee that the estimated amount of money which would be spent by the oil and gas companies along the route, mostly on this road but to a lesser degree on roads to the south, will total in the next few years some $200 million, the proportion of money being put into this program by the government as compared with private enterprise is small indeed. I think there is a good example of how you can trigger off expenditures of private enterprise in opening up our resources.

Finally, the purpose of the roads to resources is to open up new country. It is not a winter works proposal. Forest access roads may be. It was designed as one of the first proposals we put forward on winter works, but the roads to resources program is a program of opening up virgin resource areas. The way it works is simple. The province makes the proposals to the federal government and we examine these proposals to see if the criteria we have set up are met. That is to say, whether they open up resources of timber, fish, minerals, tourist wealth and so on. In the case of the province of Nova Scotia and the province of Prince Edward Island where they have not virgin resource areas to open up, we allow them to use roads and open up areas for the tourist industry. This last provision also applies to a small degree to the province of New Brunswick.

I believe, and I believe almost all Canadians will support me in this, that this is a good type of program and it is worthy of support, and if ever a program was evolved with less politics in it or suggestion of politics I would like to know, because I do not think any government, Liberal, Social Credit, C.C.F. or Conservative have intimated in any way to the federal government that these roads should be used for political purposes. These roads are built in areas where there are very few people. The roads that serve the settled areas of our provinces are purely a provincial responsibility, and this is an innovation only in the sense that the federal government has come into the provincial arena of road building in those areas where you want to open up new resources.

Many people over the years have spoken in favour of these access roads or, as we now call them, roads to resources. It is a policy which, I think, is for the good of the country and quite frankly I do not think the program was helped too much by the suggestions that were made here on Saturday. As far as I am concerned I hope hon. members will support me in what I am trying to do to persuade the provinces to help their own future by opening up areas which will benefit from these access roads and, in the west, giving me access, as minister in charge of this department, to the north. That is the theory and the substance of the roads to resources program, and that is how it works.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has seen fit to criticize the attitude taken by the opposition in this house the other night. We on this side have been very patient with the minister and, of course, we should be because of his inexperience in parliamentary affairs, but I think the time has now come to ask him why it is necessary for the federal government to get permission from the government of Ontario by telephone before the minister can give information to this house as to how a federal appropriation is being spent or, indeed, as is likely, has been spent. Perhaps that is the first question the minister would like to answer.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think that is a reasonable question, and one that the committee should be informed about. In the first instance, when you are working out a roads program with the province there is a good deal of discussion and negotiation which goes on about various roads. I think hon. members here are experienced enough to know that if word gets out in an area of any province, regardless of the politics of that province, that there is a possibility of a road starting from a town and heading north, naturally the people of that town are strongly in support of it. It is also obvious that the people in other districts would like to put forward arguments that their town should be the starting point.

This choice of starting place is purely a provincial responsibility. We are not very much concerned about the starting place of the road. We are concerned that it should open up resources. But if this became a matter of public discussion, the province, no matter what its political complexion, would be subjected to such pressures that it would become very difficult for the two governments to work out a program bearing in mind only the resource development of this country. I would like to pay a compliment to the governments across this country for maintaining silence while these roads were being negotiated. Even though there were differences between the two governments on points of detail as to what resources were going to be opened up and whether or not it was worth while, these discussions were carried on in a most harmonious fashion. Looking back over the last year and a half of negotiations I can say that my department, the officials particularly, have a right to be proud that all these negotiations were carried on without any acrimony between the governments concerned.

To keep this thing at this level, the government in each case exchanged letters agreeing that there should be no discussion on which roads were being decided upon until an agreement had been completed. In fact, the letter said, until an agreement was signed. In the last five or six months we have been discussing what might be called legal points. Some of the roads have been decided upon in most cases for months, but the legal points of the agreements are still under consideration. That is the reason why there has been this long delay in making announcements.

I think hon. members will appreciate that if I had my way, from my point of view, I would have liked nothing better than to be able to announce progress of this program as the roads were decided upon between ourselves and provincial governments, and not wait until all the legal work was completed. But that was the agreement we made, and that was the agreement I kept to. And as far as the legality of the vote was concerned, I think that the vote last year contained the words "roads that will be built and may be built", and we got authority from that; and this year the words "may be" are left out because I am positive that all the agreements will have been signed within a month or so.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, this has been a pious explanation, but if I can be impious I should like to say that the minister's explanation is satisfactory except that it does not cover this point: the minister has known for some time that one party to the agreement, in the particular case with which I am concerned the province of Ontario, has been releasing details all along the line. We watched Premier Frost for 18 minutes on television one pre-election night while he was extolling his government for carrying out this access road program in Ontario, and all the roads to which the minister has referred were mentioned. We heard all about this magnificent road he was building between Savant Lake and Ignace, and how this was going to open up the centre of the northwestern Ontario area. We were told about this marvellous road from Nakina to the Anoconda property which would provide access to the iron ore deposits, and we even got the details about this road from Port Arthur, part of the cost of which would be borne by the Abitibi company and part by the provincial government.

The point which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister—and I do not think it was answered directly, though I think it deserves an explanation—is that if someone is breaking an agreement hon. members of this house should have some protection. I think that is a modest request, and if the minister suggests to us that the province of Ontario and the representatives of northwestern Ontario have not made political hay out of this particular program, then he is naive. Maybe he is naive—I hear that he is—but the hon. gentleman is very naive if he is unaware that political capital has been made out of these projects.

After all, this is what the Frost government fought the election on. The minister may make the excuse that there are not very many people up there, but Premier Frost has made a good deal of play with the vision passed on to him by the Prime Minister. People like the idea that we are booming, and they like the idea that we are developing the north country. This is a good program, on the whole, and some of these roads are good, though there are a couple about which I am doubtful. But for the minister to refuse to give the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and other hon. members here information month after month while all the time the provincial people were making political capital out of it was just unfair to members of parliament. After all, we have some interest in this thing. Perhaps if we had a Conservative member in northwestern Ontario we would have been given this information by the government, but it just happens that northwestern Ontario is a bloc which has no Conservative representation in this house. I am very suspicious that despite the minister's assurances he has been not so much naive as willing to play along the party line in order to support his provincial confrere.

I have said enough about this, but I should like to know the purpose of the road from Goldpines to Uchi Lake and the reason why the province wants to put in that particular road. I want to know why the province wants to put in that road. What are the arrangements with Abitibi on sharing the cost of the road from Port Arthur? I should also very much like to know if any of the roads listed under 9 and 10 are going to go into the area west of Wren lake which is suffering from a budworm epidemic at the present time.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Port Arthur has referred to the fact which I think should be noticeable by now that no minister to my knowledge has so postponed the giving of information to which any hon. member of the committee is entitled as has the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. The hon. member referred to questions I raised last session about roads to resources in Ontario. Hon. members will recall that there was a delay in answering starred questions and they were carried over for months. No other minister followed such a course. I do not want to be a bad boy in this respect and I know the minister has some obligations to perform and I want him to be able to perform his duties. On the other hand because of his conduct in the last two years with respect to members from northern Ontario he has not deserved any consideration when he is in the jam he is in tonight.

The record speaks for itself. Ignoring last session altogether, if one looks at page 5648 of Hansard for this session, the appendix that was prepared by the Secretary of State showing unfulfilled requisitions which are normal requisitions—things which I think anyone on the government side would admit were within the competence of any member of parliament to ask—he will observe that there are more items unanswered for which the minister is responsible than there are items with respect to any other department.

I think there is something wrong on the part of the minister in his attempt to ignore requests from an area that has a natural interest in these matters. On three different occasions during the 1958 session I asked the minister questions about a road with which he is perfectly familiar, the prospective road from Kenora to Minaki. On every possible opportunity the minister avoided a direct reply. I want to inform my colleagues in this committee on both sides of the chamber who know something about these things and are, I think, sympathetic, that in 1957 a road was started from Kenora to Minaki for election purposes and the day after the Conservative candidate was defeated work was stopped on that road. The very same thing happened in 1958. I believe the minister owes us an explanation. If we were participating in politics in days gone by that would perhaps be a typical and natural way of doing things at the time but I want to tell the minister he is 25 or 50 years out of date and this issue is registering in the county.

The same road between Kenora and Minaki was announced by the prospective provincial candidate for election in May as something that was going ahead. He of course was Conservative. The funny part of it is that work started just as it did in 1957. They started to spend money. I want to ask the minister if the federal government contributed to the construction of this road in both the campaign in 1957 and in the pre-election campaign in 1958. The federal government did contribute in 1957 as proved by the minister's return to me and yet the minister comes before this committee and says that among his best friends, the province of Ontario and the federal government, they have in two plus years in office been unable to form an understanding or agreement with respect to this desirable road program if it was carried on, on a civil service basis. They have not done so.

I want the minister to tell me what road programs have gone on with respect to the Kenora-Minaki road in two consecutive years contributed to by the federal government as evidenced by a return the minister gave to me. I think this committee was responsible for contributing $54,000 in 1957 and it started all over again in 1958. As soon as the election was over there was no work for anybody because the present incumbent was elected. I believe that should be explained by the minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before the minister goes into detail about this, may I say there is a question of principle involved here which is far more than a refusal on the part of the minister to answer questions asked by the hon. members for Port Arthur and Kenora-Rainy River. The House of Commons votes the money for this program. This program has been going on for two years without these agreements being concluded in a formal legal sense with any province except British Columbia. The money has been voted and a good deal of it has been spent.

The minister had the effrontery the other day to suggest that it was McCarthyism for us, who have to vote the money, to ask for information about it. And then in a last minute effort to get his estimates through he said he would telephone the premier of a province to see if the premier would give his consent to his telling the sovereign parliament of Canada what it has a perfect right to know without the consent of any provincial premier.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Now, that is the real point. I say it is not good enough just to give these projects for Ontario.

The hon. member for Timiskaming the other afternoon was very reasonable about this matter. He said if there were some of these roads or routes that had not been agreed upon between any provincial government and the federal government he would not press the minister about those. That is a reasonable attitude because some would not have been agreed upon and might have to be changed. But the hon. member felt we were entitled—and I contend that the House of Commons is entitled—to be told about all those roads concerning which there is no difference of opinion any longer between the provinces and the federal government. Any private arrangement that the minister made with a provincial government to keep this information secret from parliament should not be binding in any way. The minister should either get himself out of such an agreement or parliament should not vote the money. That is the situation.

We should not be voting this money blindly with provincial premiers and provincial ministers of highways going around the country exploiting the grants for political purposes, or even not exploiting for political purposes. Whenever we vote money, except possibly in a few cases to the Department of National Defence, we are entitled to be told what the money is going to be used for before we vote it. It seems to me there is a question of principle here and the minister should do what he has done in the case of Ontario. Of course, there can be no difficulty in British Columbia because the agreement is signed. He should get up and give us the name and description of all these routes in the other provinces about which there is no longer any dispute between the provincial government and the government of Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: It is Tammany hall.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, I feel there is a very important principle involved in this point that has just been raised. It seems to me that the matter of highways comes within the jurisdiction of the provinces, not of this parliament, and where money is voted by this parliament to build highways in any province, then it should be a matter under the jurisdiction of the government of that province to decide just how those highways will be built, when they will be built and where. It also seems to me as a corollary to that, if any announcement is to be made in regard to a highway being built in any province, that announcement should be made by the minister of highways in that province or certainly, if in this house, only with the consent of that province. As far as I am concerned, in Nova Scotia we feel that highways is a matter that comes under the jurisdiction of our local government, and personally I would think it would be a breach of our provincial autonomy if the minister rose in this house and gave information about the building of a highway in the province of Nova Scotia without the agreement of the government of Nova Scotia. I think it would be an invasion of provincial autonomy if an announcement of that kind were made in this house without the agreement of the minister of highways of any province.

Mr. Pearson: In reply to what the last hon. gentleman just said, he will undoubtedly realize that the Minister of Public Works has been breaching provincial autonomy now for two years because he has—indeed he has the duty to do it—constantly given us information in this house on appropriate occasions about the trans-Canada highway. It is a joint project between federal and provincial governments. It is under provincial jurisdiction and the routes are chosen by the provinces. The minister said just a few minutes ago that as the federal government makes a contribution to it, naturally the Minister of Public Works tells us how that money is being spent. That is exactly the position that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources should be in in respect of those highways. Are we in this house not to know how the federal share of this expenditure is to be made? Are we to vote those appropriations without getting the necessary details? Is that a breach of provincial autonomy to ask the minister how federal money is being spent? That is all we are doing.

The minister has said that one of the difficulties about giving information on this matter is that there is always controversy over where a road will go. If you tell where a particular road is going to go, then you get in trouble with neighbouring communities. They would like the road to go through their communities. Of course, that is quite true. We have not been asking the minister about that. We have been asking the minister about roads that have been agreed upon. I do not see how the minister can have any embarrassment in giving that kind of information in respect of roads that have been agreed upon, even if there was any difficulty in any other respect. I am going to quote what the minister said the other night. I am quoting from page 5883 of Hansard:

> I can say this, that in Ontario there are seven roads upon which agreements have been made.

These were the roads concerning which information was being asked, and he was pressed on this. Then, a few minutes later he said:

> I feel that as long as I keep my part of the bargain I have done my duty.

Apparently there was some bargain he had made with the provincial government not to give this information and presumably it was a bargain that was supposed to work both ways but did not. The minister said: As long as I keep my part of the bargain, if the province wants to give out all the information, I have done my duty. Then, a little later at page 5884 he had this to say:

> Just because there is an information leak at the provincial level—

By the premier of the province over television during the election campaign.

> Just because there is an information leak at the provincial level he stands up here and asks me to break my written word in letters to the governments of these provinces that no information would be put out from the federal level.

Is that the obligation the minister undertook, meaning that no information will be put out at the federal level? It was a mutual obligation. Does the minister not think he was relieved from any such obligation, real or imaginary, when the premier of a province gave out the information during an election campaign? Nevertheless, the minister said as long as I keep my part of the bargain, and Premier Frost tells everybody all about it over the television, I am not going to say anything. Then, further, after a good deal of questioning and pressure, the minister said at page 5887 of Hansard:

> If the hon. member will take my word for it, I will call the premier and ask permission to forget this mutual understanding—

He was replying to the hon. member for Port Arthur. The premier had forgotten about it weeks ago. I continue:

> I will call the premier and ask permission to forget this mutual understanding of the two governments, though, no doubt, that will cause some embarrassment in other provinces.

Apparently he phoned the provincial treasurer, I think he said tonight. I continue:

> I will certainly phone the premier, and I am quite certain that if it is correct that the information is around the province he would agree that there is no reason to keep it quiet. The election is over.

And it certainly is correct.

Mr. Pickersgill: The election.

Mr. Pearson: "The election is over". Then, a few moments later the minister had this to say:

> I am speaking on a point of order. I gave an answer to the hon. member and in giving that answer I stated quite candidly that I could not see there was any reason whatever of a political nature—there was no election in the offing—for not giving this information and immediately this stampede starts.

The minister is naive indeed if he is surprised at the stampede starting. We would like the minister to explain, if he has not yet explained, why it is necessary to phone the premier of Ontario to get information as to how federal money is to be spent, or has been spent, under an agreement, money which we are being asked to appropriate tonight.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, this matter is of such importance from the point of view of the rights of this parliament that I am sure the matter cannot be allowed to rest with the statements that have been made thus far by hon. members. I believe there is a duty on each member of this house, no matter where he sits, to address himself to the right of parliament in respect of a proposal made by the government for moneys for a particular purpose, to insist on the right to know all the circumstances connected with that request.

I have before me the observations of the leader of the opposition in 1938, the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett, who stated what I think is not only a matter of privilege for members of this house, but what at the same time involves a duty in the case of any member who feels a particular situation needs elucidation, particularly a matter that has to do with a proposal by a minister for the expenditure of public money. Mr. Bennett, at page 3834 of Hansard for 1938, volume 4, said the following:

One of the duties of that branch of the House of Commons known as the opposition is to investigate the expenditure of public moneys. Unfortunately the present opposition is small in numbers, so there falls upon me a much larger obligation than I like to contemplate, but one which as long as I occupy this position and am paid a salary for it under the provisions of the Public Service Act I shall continue to discharge to the best of my ability.

That statement surely justifies the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition and others in the remarks they have made this evening, and some of the remarks that were made by some other hon. members in this committee on Saturday last. Mr. Bennett goes on and at the same page he said:

When public finance is involved it is the duty of every member of the opposition to endeavour to show whether the country got the greatest value possible for its money.

How can that possibly be done unless we are given all of the information, information which the minister, mistaking his function, I believe, felt on Saturday and apparently feels tonight he cannot properly and completely give to the house? This is surely a matter going to the very roots of this institution which we call a free parliament. If there can be any doubt about the words of Mr. Bennett I would refer the house to the commentary in that authorative book by Professor Dawson entitled, "The Government of Canada". At page 439 Professor Dawson says:

Inasmuch as virtually all government activities entail expenditures, and as most of these expenditures must be authorized by the approval of estimates, it follows that sooner or later the house must pass on most of these activities of the government in committee of supply. Each item—

I ask the minister to pay attention to these words; I ask the minister who is leading the house to pay attention to these words, because these are the kind of words we were reminded about when hon. gentlemen sat on this side and said that the former administration continuously disregarded the rights of parliament.

Mr. Walker: May I ask what page that is?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Page 439. I will read it again because I do not believe that the two ministers associated with this particular matter at this time were free to appreciate the full implications of what I had begun to read.

An hon. Member: Dispense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Someone says "dispense". That is typical of the attitude of the government as now constituted. They do not want to be reminded of our obligations to parliament. Dispense with reminding us. Dispense with calling in an authority that will establish the necessity of the government observing the well-known traditions of parliament, traditions which the Prime Minister hopes at some time or other to embody in a memorable document that will enshrine the rights of free citizens in this country. Dispense! This government is one of those governments in the history of Canada that requires to be reminded continually of the obligation of the government to the people and to parliament itself. Professor Dawson wrote on page 439:

Inasmuch as virtually all government activities entail expenditures, and as most of these expenditures must be authorized by the approval of estimates, it follows that sooner or later the house must pass on most of these activities of the government in committee of supply.

Then he goes on:

Each item in the estimates is debatable—

Each item. How can each item be debatable if the minister refuses to give us information on which to base an argument for debate?

Each item of the estimates is debatable, and any member may move to have it reduced or struck out.

Then he quotes Mr. Bennett:

"When public finance is involved it is the duty of every member of the opposition to endeavour to show whether the country got the greatest value possible for its money."

How can we possibly do that? How can that duty possibly be discharged unless we are given the right of scrutinizing to the fullest extent in accordance with the wishes of any particular member? The minister says, in exercising his best judgment, this is something he could not do. We shall analyse the reasons for that in a few moments. Then the author goes on to say:

Members may demand information in great detail, and can hold up the estimates until the desired material is produced. Thus . . . Mr. M. J. Coldwell, the C.C.F. leader, has stated the position of the private member in strong but not exaggerated terms.

These are the words of Mr. Coldwell.

"There is one place and one place only in this parliament where private members are supreme, namely, in supply when discussing the estimates. This is His Majesty's purse, and the age old right of members of parliament is to decide to what extent His Majesty's purse shall be filled. That is what we are doing now, and I certainly wish to protest against any precedent being established that would curtail the right of this parliament to discuss any matters in connection with the administration of the minister's department."

Surely if hon. gentlemen have forgotten this principle this recital from Mr. Bennett, a distinguished Conservative prime minister—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am glad hon. members applauded. I hope they will applaud and pay tribute to his memory by observing the precepts of parliamentary practice which he laid down. If these words are truly representative of the concepts applicable to this deliberative assembly, surely the minister was in error on Saturday last when he refused to give information which he said he was honour bound not to disclose to this house because of an agreement that he had made with the premier of Ontario.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or with any other premier.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Or with any other premier. Surely if such an agreement was made the minister must recognize by this time how invalid and improper such an agreement was. The minister could have said to Premier Frost, "I will do my best not to add to your own particular difficulties but I can go no farther than that. I must tell you, Mr. Premier, that if any member of the House of Commons asks me for information as to what is to be done with moneys that I am asking parliament to vote I will have no alternative, indeed, I have the duty to tell parliament why I am asking for moneys in this particular instance."

Surely that is the correct situation. I felt rather concerned tonight when I realized the position in which the minister found himself, and I am sure that the house, generous as it always is, fully appreciates the situation confronting the minister in respect of other obligations. But we have a duty to perform. The minister came to the house tonight and gave no evidence whatsoever of appreciation of the elementary principle involved in refusing parliament this information.

First of all, he criticized parliament for its conduct on Saturday. He began his statement by saying that he had spoken over the telephone to the provincial treasurer of Ontario and as a result of having had that telephone conversation, not with the head of the government of Ontario but with the provincial treasurer who, by the way, comes from northern Ontario where some of these roads are, he tells us as a minister of this government that he has received from an Ontario minister his consent to give the parliament of Canada some of the particulars behind a matter involving a vote which the House of Commons is asked to consider.

If ever there has been a failure to appreciate the function of this kind of deliberative assembly, surely we have had it tonight. I am not commenting on the merits of the proposal. Undoubtedly this program has much to commend it. But there can be no justification for not giving the information in the absence of a decision of parliament itself either not to ask for the information or to accept that there are special reasons why it should not be given. First of all, the minister did not even explain that there were difficulties in the way of his acceding readily to what undoubtedly he would have had to admit he must do. This was not done. He simply said, I cannot do this; I am in honour bound not to do it. I have an agreement with the heads of provincial governments and I respect my agreement with provincial governments, he might as well have gone on to say, more than I respect the rights and privileges of this free parliament.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Someone says "nonsense", and that is typical of the penetrating, pregnant answer we receive from government benches when they find themselves in an embarrassing position as they obviously do at this very moment.

The reason why we must insist on this is because, as in 1938 when Mr. Bennett spoke as leader of the opposition, leading a small group, he had to realize that there might be other similar situations confronting parliament. He wanted to see that the principles which he fully recognized as sacrosanct would be observed. This is exactly the position we must take tonight, so that no other minister of this government on some other occasion will come in here and say, I cannot give this information because I have made an arrangement with some provincial premier.

I am not discussing this matter from the point of view of its connection with circumstances which led to members of a provincial parliament, in the course of an election, being given information which is being denied to the members of this house. I am not placing my case on that ground. I am placing my case on the elementary principle that a minister must fully answer any question put to him from any section of the house; that is elementary.

Mr. Nesbitt: Will the hon. member permit a question? In view of what the hon. gentleman is saying, is it the policy of his party that the details of every sort of financial grant to all the provinces be carefully examined and controlled by this house?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have stated that it is the duty of any minister, I do not care to what party he belongs, in a parliament such as this to disclose information which is asked by any hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If my hon. friend is not satisfied, he can get up after I have finished my statement—

Some hon Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and he can give us this new concept of a bill of rights if he wishes.

I want to say this; so long as I am in this house no member of the government is going to say to me that I am not entitled, as a representative of a part of the people of this country and with a wider responsibility like other members to all the people in this country, to elicit from the government the kind of details which will enable me to decide whether a request made for further moneys should be approved. That is an elementary principle. Let there be no doubt about this: the right hon. gentleman who now leads this government had no hesitation in affirming this principle when, as in so many places, on April 26 he said:

> Parliament has been treated with shocking contempt, sorely wounded and robbed of its rights.

I say not only has the minister treated parliament with shocking contempt, sorely wounded it and robbed it of its rights, but the hon. gentlemen who sit behind him, by their support of him in this particular instance are guilty of the same breach of the rights of parliament.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I should like to say to the committee that after listening to the hon. member for Essex East intoning unctuously, with all the pomposity at his command about the rights of parliament, I am very pleased indeed to find that after twenty-two years in the government and two years in the opposition he has finally learned to appreciate the fundamental principles which he read to us just a moment ago. I think that all people who are interested in results in this country will recognize that these roads to resources agreements to be concluded are presently under negotiation.

Mr. Pearson: That is not what you said the other night.

Mr. Denis: Quebec is excluded.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The province of British Columbia has signed an agreement. Eight other provinces have agreements under negotiation. I made it very clear to the committee that in the interest of developing resources instead of developing votes—which is the only thing the opposition knows about —we agreed, not in any personal deal between myself and the other governments but as a matter of ethics between sovereign administrations in this country. The Leader of the Opposition, with no experience in domestic matters—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —stands up in this house—

Mr. Pearson: How many elections did you lose?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): These interruptions from hon. gentlemen opposite show how unaccustomed they are, after years of living in idleness on the back benches of this house, to being on the other side of the house.

I was just saying a word about the Leader of the Opposition. He was good enough to say I was inexperienced in my task. I would say that is, to a large extent, true. I am doing my level best to learn my job and do it well. I hope that the Leader of the Opposition will also grow in stature as a leader of the opposition knowledgeable in domestic affairs. If he goes back and remembers his own statements made over the years, some of the things he has held up as examples of how negotiations should be carried on between governments; if he would recall the number of times when as secretary of state for external affairs he condemned secret diplomacy but stressed the importance of secrecy when negotiations were being conducted, he would not say, I think, that the public should have all the information and that parliament should have all the information, while negotiations were under way. However, these are phrases he will remember: negotiations should not be prejudiced by the spotlight of publicity. Now, he asks me as the minister of a department to break these very tenets that he has espoused. He asks me while negotiations are going on with eight of the nine provinces to divulge every little detail.

I tried to be helpful to the committee in the case of Ontario. Last week the provincial authorities in Ontario finally met, so far as we were concerned in the department, all the proposals that we had put forward in connection with this agreement from a legal standpoint. It was for this reason I was ready on Saturday, in the interest of co-operation with members of the C.C.F. party who were raising these questions, to give them the information they asked, knowing that the negotiations at least at the department level for the province of Ontario were now concluded. They are still not through the cabinet yet.

In the case of Manitoba only today did we receive an answer to the last letter I wrote debating one of the terms in the agreement. The letter has come in although I have not actually seen it myself. I still am a little concerned over my own actions in agreeing to give this information on Ontario. I felt honestly bound to give that information to the committee, because I believe as strongly as I can that this committee has a right to all the information it can get on the spending of money by this parliament.

Mr. Hellyer: Just the information we can get?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This information that I would like to provide would be as detailed as it comes in to me. The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond suggested the opposition was asking the government to go a bit far into the affairs of a province than is ordinarily expected. It may be all right for a government that believes in centralization and taking over control of a province and eventually the municipalities; but I do not think there are serious minded members of this house who would say about the trans-Canada agreement, for instance, that before the money is voted each year every detail of every contract in every province must be laid before this house. I would suggest that hon. members would have the right to ask for all this information as soon as it was available, but if they held up their votes until the province had completed all its arrangements for the whole year it would be impossible in practice to get the trans-Canada highway built.

This program is clear. I gave to the committee in the estimates last year a clear outline of this program. For each province there is a maximum of $15 million. Last year I told the house there was a term of five years. This year I told the house that starting last fall we had changed the firm commitment of a five-year limit and made a term in each agreement suitable to the province concerned. The agreements vary from five to eleven years.

I have made this information clear, but I would like to put forward this proposition, that the province has the right to choose the location of the roads and has the right to let the contracts. We are expected to protect the spending of public money, and we have the right to examine and see if those roads meet the criteria parliament accepted last year when first voting this item, namely whether they open up resources. We also have the right to examine and see if the money is well spent. Personally, if I were a provincial cabinet minister I would resent any federal government, which was making, in effect, a conditional grant, coming in and saying, "We want all the information before you spend a dollar and before we vote the money." As I say, we have the right as the federal government to make certain that before the federal government pays any money we have looked into it to see that the money will be well spent.

I told the house on Saturday that with one exception no money has been spent under this vote because no agreement has been signed. The exception is British Columbia. I do not know how much more I would have to say, Mr. Chairman, to make it clear to hon. members that this program is a good program. I have had tremendous co-operation from all the provinces in working it out.

Mr. Denis: What about Quebec?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think as the years roll by it will rank as one of the most imaginative and constructive proposals ever put forward by a federal government.

Mr. Denis: What about Quebec?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have the temerity to believe that as these roads are built and new resource areas open up the new wealth discovered will more than make up for any money we put into these roads. I think also as the years go on and we try to assess this roads program in relation to other great projects in Canada's history, this roads to resources concept, first put forward in this house in 1911 and brought into effect in 1958, will rank with the significance of the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. Pearson: I will not detain the committee very long at this point. The minister, speaking from the depths of his experience as an elder statesman, has been good enough to wish me well and to hope that I will grow in stature. Perhaps eventually I may be successful in reaching his heights, but I quite admit I have not got the minister's broad and deep experience in these matters, that is true. He has been working on roads now for a couple of years and ought to know something about them, but apparently he has not learned in two years the difference between the trans-Canada highway which is built, as far as federal government participation is concerned, through a statutory grant, and these highways which are in appropriations each year as part of the minister's department. But no doubt the minister will pick up these details as he goes along and eventually he may learn something about diplomacy.

I was not sure when the minister first spoke whether he was condemning secret diplomacy or open diplomacy. He reminded me of the number of times I had condemned secret diplomacy at the United Nations. That is what I am condemning now, secret diplomacy between the government of Ontario and the minister, so secret that while the premier of Ontario can tell everything over television, no member of this House of Commons can find out from the minister how this federal money is to be spent, or at least, he admits in one case has been spent.

Then the minister said, "No agreements have been made, so how can you expect me to talk about these things before an agreement had been made?" The minister said on page 5883 of Hansard for July 11:

> I can say this, that in Ontario there are seven roads upon which agreements have been made.

The minister is getting into his usual difficulty of saying one thing on one occasion and something else on another occasion, and when we point that out he accuses us of inexperience or quibbling with words.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or McCarthyism.

Mr. Pearson: Or McCarthyism. The minister said the other night that there were seven agreements about roads, but we will not know about them because he said at the same time, "As long as I keep my share of the bargain, I feel my conscience is clear;" no matter what the premier of Ontario may do during an election period, he does not want to do anything after an election period. Every time the minister speaks on these matters he gets himself in more deeply, and I would advise him to say as little as possible if he wants to get his estimates through in time to get to Saskatchewan.

Then the minister said, repeating what has been said by an hon. member, "We would be prejudicing provincial rights if we got this information in the house." There is going to be spent $9 million of federal money. I think he said, "We would be going a bit far and prejudicing provincial rights." That is a strange doctrine of provincial rights and federal authority that a member of this parliament is not to be told by the minister how the money that this parliament is being asked to vote is to be spent, or in one case has been spent, and no amount of unctuous sophistry on the part of the minister will explain away the fact that last Saturday he refused to give this committee the information to which it was entitled. The reason he gave us was that we should not really worry about it because the election was over. The election in Ontario was over; why should we want to know about it any more? Then the minister gets up tonight and says twice that there is no politics in this matter; "I am doing my duty as well as I can."

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): May I ask the hon. Leader of the Opposition, if we had announced these roads before the election would he have complained then?

Mr. Pearson: I am sorry, would you repeat that?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I was just suggesting that if the government of Ontario had announced these roads before the election—

An hon. Member: They did.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —the hon. member would have some reason to complain.

Mr. Pearson: The minister must know, because he was politically interested in this election, that every night during the provincial election, before the election, information was being given by the candidates from northern Ontario about these roads. It was being used for election purposes. Candidates could do that over the air, but a member of parliament could not get that information in this house even after the election.

Mr. Fisher: The thing that bothers me about the minister's replies and which, I should like to suggest, amounts to evasion, is this: he knows that I came to him many months ago in this house and told him and his executive assistant that these representatives were announcing these roads in our region, that details were being given, and that in one case even the contractor who was going to get the job was being named. I felt it was unfair because we could not get that information and the minister agreed to give me the information in confidence.

But my point is this: why should someone on the other side of the agreement be able to go around blatting it all over the place while members of parliament should have to keep silent? I might say that the provincial government has taken all of the credit for this project. Why, the minister is not even known as a visionary up in northern Ontario. It is all Old Man Ontario and his good friends George and Clare. I should like to think that the minister and the government might get a bit of credit for this, but no. All the credit is going to Old Man Ontario. I should like to think that this deal with Ontario is being worked out in equal partnership, but it seems to me that, as in some of the divorce cases, one partner is pure and above reproach and the other is going around committing adultery all over the place.

We have an example here which I hope the minister will not follow in the future. If any evidence comes forward that someone is not keeping the agreement, I think we deserve to have the information here and I think the minister should give us that assurance before we go any further into this topic and into the detail. I think he should give us an assurance that in future we should have this information as soon as one scrap of it is revealed by the other party. I, certainly, could have provided the minister with concrete proof if he had wanted it, but I would have assumed he would take my word for it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not want this discussion to be confined to the province of Ontario. I make a request to the minister that he should give to this committee, and give to the committee now, the names of all the roads in the eight provinces with regard to which agreement in principle had been reached. Otherwise we shall be asked to vote this money blind wtihout even knowing how it is to be used. It will be a blank cheque to the minister, and he will be able to change this around in any way he likes. I should also like to ask the minister if he would tell us how much of the $9 million voted last year was spent in each province and for what projects in each province.

Mr. MacLellan: When I heard the hon. member for Essex East making the argument he did I was able to understand the fear which some people have regarding invasions of provincial autonomy. What the hon. member said was that when money is granted to a province, this federal parliament has the right to examine in detail how that money is spent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): So far as the federal account is concerned.

Mr. MacLellan: These funds are granted in respect to roads to be built by the provinces, and only the provincial government has the right to decide how the money is to be spent. As far as this house is concerned, I do not think that under our constitutional system we are entitled to discuss anything other than whether or not the grant has actually been made to the province. If we were to adopt the principle advanced by the hon. member for Essex East it would mean that every grant made to a provincial government in respect of education, hospitals or for any other purpose could be debated as to the detailed expenditure in this chamber. We have the right to question expenditures, but the expenditure here before us concerns only the writing of a cheque to a provincial government. The details of how that money is spent are a matter for that government. I say, further, that the only right we have in regard to that money is as provided under the agreement with the province to whom the money is passed over.

In this case, where an agreement is made for the building of highways according to certain specifications, this house has the right to see to it that the agreement is kept, but we have no right to say where a road will go or anything of that nature, and certainly in a case such as the present one I do not think constitutionally we have the right to ask the minister of northern affairs to give out information except that which he is entitled to give under the agreement, and under the terms of the agreement in this case he has quite properly checked with the provincial government concerned before he has released information.

If we were to say anything else in this committee, the detailed expenditure of every cent we gave to a province from now on would be a matter which could be debated in this chamber even though the money had been spent by the province for matters within provincial jurisdiction only and our part had only been to make a grant.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether he agrees with this doctrine of federal-provincial financial relationship which has just been expounded by the hon. member.

An hon. Member: He is asking you.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If the Leader of the Opposition had been listening a moment ago he would have heard me lay down what I thought. In answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate with regard to the money spent in each province of the $9 million voted last year, the information is as follows: British Columbia, $1,000,732.39; Saskatchewan, $750,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is all that was spent. And were there agreements with these two provinces?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There was an agreement with British Columbia since November 4, 1958. No agreement was signed with the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, the minister is telling us that money was spent in Saskatchewan without there being any agreement whatsoever.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That point was raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West on Saturday and I was about to remind the hon. member for Ottawa West that this matter was fully explained in the standing committee on mines, forests and waters as reported on page 951 of the proceedings in evidence No. 32 for June 5, 1959.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister read the explanation?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes. If the committee does not object I will read from this statement because there was a series of questions and answers in the evidence. I might just add that the payment for Saskatchewan was made in February of 1959 and was charged to appropriations for 1958-59 and not to the estimates which are now before the house, those for 1959-60. In last year's estimates, a vote similar to item 280 appeared as item 289, but there was one significant difference in this wording from the wording of the vote this year. It referred to contributions "in accordance with agreements that have been or may be entered into by Canada and the provinces."

The explanation is as follows:

Saskatchewan was one of the first provinces to get work under way on the roads to resources program. Before the end of the fiscal year 1958-59 the government of Saskatchewan represented to us that they had made very substantial expenditures and had recovered no money from the federal government, with the result that the province was suffering financial hardship. Saskatchewan had been ready to sign the formal agreement, but the decision to make the construction schedule more flexible had caused some delay. In the circumstances, the government of Saskatchewan asked that a payment might be made covering somewhat less than half the money the province had already spent on the program.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Even though the wording of the vote referred to agreements that have been or may be entered into between Canada and the provinces, I consulted with my own legal officers and asked them to take the matter up with the solicitor to the treasury to make sure beyond doubt of the propriety of such a payment. After careful consideration it was the concensus of the various legal officers that no payment should be charged to the vote unless an agreement had been entered into but that the agreement need not necessarily be of a formal nature. There was no question but that we had reached agreement with the province of Saskatchewan, which was embodied in the exchange of letters between the two governments. I therefore made a submission to the treasury board in which I stated that agreement had been reached through correspondence with the province of Saskatchewan on the roads to be constructed under the roads to resources program, the standards and specifications to which they are to be built, and the terms and conditions governing Canada's contribution to the province in respect to the cost of constructing such roads. In these circumstances I recommended that I be given authority to make a payment in the amount of $750,000 to the province of Saskatchewan. This recommendation was approved by treasury board on February 5, 1959 under authority of treasury board minute 544145 and a cheque for $750,000 was sent to the province the same day.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that this explanation will make it clear to the hon. member that there was no impropriety in making that payment to the province of Saskatchewan. As I said before, we have a formal agreement signed with British Columbia and there is no necessity to explain that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister two factual questions. First, will he tell us what was the road in Saskatchewan to which this matter referred? Second, will he tell us whether or not the agreement with British Columbia requires federal auditing of the expenditures before the money is paid?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, the agreement with British Columbia is that the provincial auditors will present these figures and we will accept them on the assumption that the provincial auditor is an accredited business firm.

With respect to the other question, there are three roads in the Saskatchewan roads program. These are the Otosquen road, the Hanson lake road and the Uranium City road. As I understand it they have completed the Otosquen and are working on the Hanson lake road and part of the Uranium City road.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, in his answer about British Columbia I believe the minister has answered completely the fallacious argument of the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond. In other words the minister says he does not pay out any money under this agreement until he is satisfied that the money has been spent for the purpose for which parliament voted it. So the extraordinary doctrine we listened to a few moments ago from the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond is not, according to the minister's own evidence, followed by the government which the hon. member was trying to support by his argument.

In the same context, of course, the minister is, I am sure, well aware that no money is paid under the trans-Canada highway arrangements until there has been a proper audit and a very distinguished former member of this house from Nova Scotia withheld the payment in one province for a very considerable time until there was some further investigation into some aspects of the roads program in that province. So there can be no question whatever that parliament has a perfect right to know and the Auditor General in the end has to certify that this money has been properly spent for the purpose for which parliament is voting it.

The purpose the minister is asking us to vote this for is to spend money for roads leading to resources in accordance with agreements entered into between Canada and the provinces. The minister said that a certain sum had already been spent in one province—$250,000 or something like that.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The sum of $750,000 in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the only case?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: There has been no money spent of the $9 million we are being asked to vote?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Not one cent of the present $9 million has been spent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister in a position to give us the names of the roads in the other eight provinces?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am afraid I cannot, Mr. Chairman. Whenever I have been able to I have done so. I cannot give that information because these agreement have not gone through cabinet yet and in several of the provinces a great deal depends on the negotiations we are carrying on with them.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to make it clear again that I am only asking about those roads concerning which there is no dispute with the provinces. This was the information asked for the other day by the hon. member for Timiskaming. I can understand the minister's hesitation in giving information concerning roads about which negotiations are in process, but surely if there is complete agreement there cannot be any reason for secrecy, not the faintest reason.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I am informed by my officials who are looking for this information that outside of Saskatchewan and British Columbia there are points of discussion still going on with them all. I understand that ten days ago Ontario came along with its answer to my last letter. I will have to bring this to cabinet and if it is acceptable it will be approved. If these points are under discussion I cannot possibly mention the roads in question.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, why did the minister himself say last Saturday as reported at page 5883 of Hansard:

> I can say this, that in Ontario there are seven roads upon which agreements have been made.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Because, Mr. Chairman, we were that far advanced in Ontario that I felt free to give that information to the committee.

Mr. Pearson: I am very inexperienced in these matters, Mr. Chairman, but an agreement has been made or it has not been made. No matter how far you may be on the road to an agreement there comes a time when you make it and then the agreement is finished in so far as negotiation is concerned. At least, that is the way we conduct affairs internationally. I suppose the minister follows the same pirnciples of negotiation. On Saturday he said that there were seven roads upon which agreements had been made. Have they been made or have they not been made? If they are not yet completed, why did he say they had been made when he spoke on Saturday?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think this is a question of a misunderstanding, Mr. Chairman. In the case of Ontario the negotiations on the actual physical location of the roads and standards are completed but a formal agreement has not yet been signed.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister told us the other day—perhaps some one could look it up—that $3 million had been spent on this program in the province of Prince Edward Island. I was astonished at that figure and I must say I am still astonished at it. Can the minister explain it?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In the province of Prince Edward Island the estimated total expenditures up to the end of March 31, 1959, totalled $2,500,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: But the minister said no money was spent of last year's vote except in Saskatchewan and British Columbia. Now he tells us that $2,500,000 was spent in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I made the mistake of assuming that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was smart enough to realize that it was provincial money that was spent. The federal government has not spent any money.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think with the hon. gentleman's experience this would sound like another vision. We in this committee are not interested in what the provincial government is spending. What the minister said the other day—I could look it up in a moment—was that $3 million had been spent as a part of this program. I expressed the view that $1,500,000 was the maximum for each province. He said that it was, but that the $3 million was the total expenditure of which we were to share half. Now he says these are provincial expenditures. Where does the federal government come into the item at all?

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I should read what the minister said last Saturday on this point.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that it is ten o'clock the established time for adjournment. The chairman should ask if it is the desire of the committee to sit beyond the hour. Before he does that perhaps I can express our attitude in that regard and say that this evening there are extremely special circumstances which would warrant proceeding beyond ten o'clock which we think could have been overcome, of course, if the house leader had been able to keep the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources closer to his itinerary. Nevertheless, there are special circumstances which will cause the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to be away tomorrow. Because of that we will be certainly most co-operative in extending the sitting beyond ten o'clock this evening. It is hoped that this will be no indication of any future action.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to continue?

Mr. Henderson: No. Hon. gentlemen have made no move tonight to get the estimates through. If they want to sit here, I do not.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I was going to say that in view of the circumstances which were announced by the acting house leader earlier, and in view of what has been said by the hon. member for Skeena, we on this side of the house would be prepared to carry on for some time longer in the hope that the desire of the house leader would be accomplished. I cannot assure the committee that that will be so, but I can assure the committee of this. If the minister will show more co-operation in connection with the questions that were asked perhaps we could get on much faster.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the committee give unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard: Before we do that I wonder whether I could have any indication from the government or the house leader as to the time? I would suggest at this stage that we sit until eleven o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearson: Would it be possible to carry on until we get at least this department through so that the minister will be able to carry on tomorrow where he wishes to be? It will not take all night.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps if we leave it wide open like that we will have more co-operation.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearson: In a spirit of co-operation I would like to clear up this difficulty about expenditures in Prince Edward Island. A moment ago the minister said there were no such expenditures, but at page 5885 of Hansard the minister is reported as follows:

> In Prince Edward Island, 343 miles of road—on that little island—and they spent $2,500,000 last year.
> Mr. Pickersgill: Did I understand the minister to say that they spent $2,500,000 in Prince Edward Island? I thought the limit for each province was $1,500,000.
> Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The limit each year in a province is $3 million, of which we pay one-half, $1,500,000.
> Mr. Pickersgill: And $2,500,000 was spent in Prince Edward Island last year?
> Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That is the figure I have here.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Chairman, the quotation read by the Leader of the Opposition is absolutely correct. The amount spent by the province of Prince Edward Island was $2,500,000, and it was spent entirely out of provincial funds. If the agreement is signed we will have to pay one-half of that. In no year may there be more than $3 million spent in a province, and therefore our maximum in any one year in any one province is $1,500,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister mean by that that he is now negotiating with Prince Edward Island about roads that have already been built and that there is no agreement about those roads, and yet we cannot be told about them?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Chairman, we are still negotiating.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely, Mr. Chairman, that is more preposterous than anything we have yet been told about this whole preposterous business. Here are those roads that have already been built, that every human being in Prince Edward Island, the whole 100,000, must know about and yet we cannot be told here in this house. It really is beyond anything that we have heard yet.

Mr. Howard: In one of his earlier remarks the minister made reference to the fact that he hoped hon. members would help him to persuade the various provincial governments that they should participate in this so-called roads to resources program. I wonder what he means by asking for assistance in helping to persuade provinces to participate; for certainly, in so far as British Columbia is concerned, the agreement has been signed, the road has been established and that is the end of it in so far as federal participation is concerned. That was the indication given by the minister on Saturday last when we were discussing the question of bridges 150 miles from a road, that in so far as British Columbia was concerned it was out of the question because the agreement had been signed. What does he mean by asking members to help him to persuade provincial governments to participate when he has in fact closed the door to any further participation, especially with those provinces that have already signed agreements and almost closed the door with provinces that are on the verge of having signed agreements?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I had a certain amount of difficulty in hearing the hon. member for Skeena but I think I got most of it. The agreement with British Columbia, as the hon. member knows, was signed early in the fall of 1957. Since that time—

Mr. Howard: Signed when?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): November 4, 1958. I used the wrong year. In that agreement there were no bridges; therefore, I suggested to the hon. member who is questioning me that he should not get too enthusiastic that he was going to get a bridge under the British Columbia agreement because the agreement had already been signed and they had used up their full amount of $15 million, which is the limit of which we can share 50 per cent of under this agreement.

Mr. Howard: The minister is right in so far as bridges are concerned. The minister said he hoped hon. members here would give their endorsation to the program and assist him in persuading the provincial governments to participate. Which provincial governments need persuading to participate in this program?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There are nine governments in agreement with this program and one that is not.

Mr. Howard: Is the minister suggesting that hon. members in this house assist him in persuading one government to participate?

An hon. Member: On to Quebec!

Mr. Howard: I do not know what he means by that.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am only suggesting that I am very proud of this agreement. I hope all provinces will eventually be in it.

Mr. Fisher: I am still not getting anywhere, Mr. Chairman, in my endeavours to protect the dignity and the right of a federal member of parliament to know in relationship to a provincial member of parliament. I told the minister on Saturday that we have an incomparable sunshine blowhard up at the lakehead who every week has some sort of road or road contract to announce. It is a bridge or it is a culvert, or it is some granular base, or road of some kind. And most of the roads that he has been announcing in the last five or six months have been tied in with this particular program.

He has even given to the newspapers the details of a most unusual contract. I want to know about it right now, and it is this arrangement between the provincial government, Abitibi and the federal government for this road to resources out of Port Arthur. I would like to know something about this particular road and why this gentleman is able to make these announcements and we cannot even confirm whether they are right or not. I still feel that the minister has not answered that point.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): On the score of holding me responsible for what is done by provincial M.L.A.'s, I cannot do anything about that. My job is here and that is what I try to do. As for the question about information on the road, I am always glad to oblige if I can do it. There is a clause in the Ontario agreements, for example, which reads as follows:

> If the minister approves in writing Ontario may enter into an agreement with a mining, lumber or other resource development company, providing for the construction by the company of a part of the project which will be primarily for the benefit of the company and that the province will pay to the company two-thirds of the cost of construction.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say what document he is reading from?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This is one of the drafts of one of the agreements.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the road being built on a draft?

Mr. Fisher: The road is almost completed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): May I go back and say that over the years there have been precedents established in old agreements whereby the federal government has participated with a province and a private company in regard to these mining access roads. At various times the department, which had other names than northern affairs, used to enter into this type of deal, and I think that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has the same type of program. This $\frac{1}{3}$-$\frac{1}{3}$-$\frac{1}{3}$ rule was also made available to the provinces under the roads to resources program and several of the provinces have taken advantage of it. This road from Port Arthur north has that provision. I am informed with respect to that road that the Abitibi company has agreed to pay up to one-third of the cost of the road up to a standard that was agreed upon between the provincial government and Abitibi and the other two-thirds will be paid by the province and ourselves. If the road is built to a higher standard then the additional amount required to build it to that higher standard is paid 50 per cent by the federal government and 50 per cent by the provincial government. I think that is all the information on that road.

Mr. Fisher: I might point out to the minister that when Mr. Ambridge was here several weeks ago he told us about that road. Here is another example where the minister would not give us information. When a road is in a member's constituency I think he is entitled to the information. Here is a case where a private corporation had the information and was revealing it and where the provincial member was also revealing it. The minister says that we cannot hold them responsible. What kind of an agreement is this if you cannot hold the other person responsible for divulging information? It is not an agreement at all. It is a farce. I should like to suggest to the minister that if he is going to have these peculiar three-sided agreements in which the other two sides seem to have all the leeway and he is squeezed right out then it is about time that he had a talk with these people and tried to remind them that an agreement is an agreement instead of reminding us.

I should like to know about the road from Nakina to the Anaconda deposits, whether it is under the same kind of agreement and, if not, why not.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I do not have very much to add to what I have already said with regard to the point made by the hon. member for Port Arthur. I telephoned the government of Ontario when I heard last fall that there had been this leak and received the assurance of the Ontario government that there had not been any leak from sources close to them, and there was nothing else for me to do but to take that as their attitude on the matter. When they assured me that nothing of that sort was being done and they were honouring their agreement I had no other choice but to accept their statement. Another province apparently made an announcement, the province of Prince Edward Island, and I received many complaints in that regard. I took the same stand as I took in the house, that I could not break what was a signed statement on my part in a letter that there should not be any announcement made until there was common agreement to make an announcement.

Mr. Fisher: All I can say is that the Conservative members in northwestern Ontario made the minister a liar in jig-quick time and repeatedly. In these highway programs where the federal government is paying up to 50 per cent of the cost and where there are programs with agreements with private companies, I think the members from the areas concerned deserve the information. I am not going to labour the point further but I think they deserve the information. I should like to know whether you have another three-sided agreement with respect to the road from Nakina north to the Anaconda deposits and, if not, why not.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): As far as we know in the department there is no definite information as to a third interest. I believe that it is sometimes the policy of the provincial government, if they think a company might be interested in an area, to build a road through that area to encourage their interest, but there is no third party in this agreement.

Mr. Fisher: This is a case where I think there should be. I see no reason why Abitibi should be taken for a road that is going to open up resources and Anaconda should not be paying a contribution of some kind although in the case of Anaconda the resource is in the exploration stage. The Abitibi road and the other roads that are involved bring up the whole question of the relationship of funds of the federal government going to the provinces for forest access roads because in effect, whether you call it a forest access road or a road to a resource it is a forest access road.

The road south from Savant Lake to Ignace also goes across some crown lands held by the provincial government that are under licence to companies. I want to know what is the relationship here. We can get into most uneven and unfair development if certain companies are going to have to put up part of the cost of a road running through or tapping their limits and other companies are going to get these roads without having to make a contribution. What was the idea in mind in this regard in so far as the federal government is concerned?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think I can put it this way, that where there is an operation already in effect and a road going in that will be of direct benefit to them there is a $\frac{1}{3}$-$\frac{1}{3}$-$\frac{1}{3}$ split but where you are going into a virgin area in the hope of attracting companies to develop that area there is usually a 50-50 split. The discrimination to which the hon. member refers is happening all the time. I have these complaints come to me about the roads we are building in the Northwest Territories. Companies have gone in there in the past and pioneered their own winter roads. They say, "Why did you not come along and build us a road?" The fact is that they were ahead of our development program and they paid the cost. We obviously feel sorry for them, and the companies that come later get all the benefit of the work done by the pioneering companies or by the government in a particular case. But that is the way it works out. You cannot have such a thing as a perfect set-up whereby everything would go in all at once.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to know about the road from Goldpines to Uchi Lake. As I remember that country, it must run through the tentative limit that is going to the Anglo-Newfoundland Development Company. I understand that under the terms of the contract between Anglo-Newfoundland and the provincial government they have undertaken to spend so much money on road and water developments. Will this road become part of their limit to be set up there? What is the purpose of it?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): According to the information we have, and this has been checked with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, it is for the opening up of mining areas.

Mr. Fisher: I hope there is something in that. I worked at Uchi Lake in 1939 before the mine closed down and I have had the impression since then, along with people who have lost money in the mines up there, that the prospects are not too good. In this particular case I am sure we thought the road would be of benefit to that particular pulp and paper company. This confirms the points the minister mentioned about discrimination. This road from Goldpines to Uchi Lake runs through what pulp and paper company's limit, and is the company involved in the deal in any way?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): We have not any information here concerning what pulp and paper company has crown lands in that area.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to know, in connection with this particular program, what the situation is so far as the road south from Hornepayne to hook up with the Ontario Paper Company's limits is concerned and which I believe is under the roads to resources program.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It is not on the roads to resources program. It may come under the forests access roads program.

Mr. Fisher: It does not make sense that it would come under the forests access roads program in connection with the Ontario Paper Company because they already have limit roads up into that particular region. I cannot see why that road would be of any particular benefit to them, but it would be of benefit to the town of Hornepayne. I understood it was coming under this particular roads to resources program.

I should like an explanation of the road from Nakina northwest. What route has finally been decided upon? Is it the route that runs along the railroad track and then north, or is it going to be the original route that was bothering the people of Nakina?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It follows the railway track and then goes north.

Mr. Pearson: I am not sure if the minister included this information in the beginning of his statement, but I should like to know whether the program includes a road from Foleyet to Chapleau?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, this was the second road on the program, Foleyet to Chapleau south approximately 60 miles. This work consists of new construction for the entire length commencing at the end of secondary highway No. 624 at Foleyet and proceeding in a southwesterly direction to connect with highway 129 in the vicinity of Chapleau.

Mr. Pearson: Is the road to continue through Chapleau and will it hook up with the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Not under this agreement.

Mr. Fisher: The more I think of this question of these agreements with pulp and paper companies the more worried I become about the difficulties into which this government can get in that regard. I can think of so many paper companies throughout that area such as the Ontario Paper Company, Kimberly-Clark, St. Lawrence Corporation, Abitibi Power & Paper Co., Great Lakes Paper Co., Ontario-Minnesota Paper Co. and Dryden Paper Co. going from west to east, who all need forest road development. They would all have huge limits, and I suppose the average size is some fifteen hundred to two thousand square miles. Almost any of these companies could put forward a roads program that would be comparable to the Abitibi program. I can see the danger there.

I should like the minister to go into this in some detail with his provincial confreres because I can think of Marathon, especially, which still has not a road north from its mills into its limits. It has been working on a plan for a number of years and each year they plan to move a little bit further. However, I am sure that now with Abitibi getting this kind of program, which is in effect a high grade road, this kind of prospect must be very intriguing to a company like Marathon. I think it could, as I say, get the government into a great many problems in road construction. I would hope the minister would try to work out a fair policy in this regard and make sure that the provincial government has a fair policy so that no company is discriminated against in opening up its limits under this program.

There is another question I wanted to ask dealing with the two roads the minister mentioned north of the Canadian National. He said he could not give us the details but they were to open up various resources. One of the points that has bothered quite a number of foresters about that timber lying north of the Canadian National, especially the northwest corner near the Manitoba boundary, is the fact there is a budworm infestation that promises to increase considerably because of the state of maturity of the trees. Is this one of the regions in which this particular program is going? The minister knows the country well, and would the road take off from the O and M northern limit and go towards the Indian reservation along the Manitoba boundary?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): We have no knowledge where the road will start or where it will go. Actually the primary purpose of this road is to get at some promising mineral prospects that lie in a belt right up to the Manitoba boundary. I read into the record the fact that the location of these roads will be determined on the basis of photographic and magnetometer surveys and geological reconnaissance of this area.

Mr. Fisher: Who is making that survey? Is it being done by private firms for some of the big entrepreneurs or is it a federal responsibility?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The ground survey is being done by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys entirely. The air survey is being let out by contract under the direction of the mines and technical surveys department of the federal government.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I have been waiting to make a few remarks about the announcement the minister made tonight, a very welcome announcement for the region I represent, of the construction of this road from Foleyet to Chapleau. It is something about which my people have been anxious for the last ten years. It is welcome news that the agreement has been reached with the Ontario government in regard to this road. As I have mentioned before, this possibly means more to this area, especially when the road is completed, than even the gold mining assistance act during the last ten years. The completion of this road could mean a bigger boom to the Porcupine camp than the last increase they had in the price of gold. I was wondering if the minister could give any indication how soon they expect this road will be completed. Will it be this year or a matter of two years.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I cannot give the hon. member the precise information. There is no priority on this list of roads whatever. The agreement simply states that these roads shall be finished in eight years. I would imagine most of these roads I have mentioned will be finished long before that.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister has just referred to an agreement and the hon. member has asked a question in which he has referred to an agreement, yet we were told earlier by the minister that there are no agreements except one with British Columbia. The question immediately arises, when is an agreement an agreement and when is it not an agreement? The minister has told us that in the case of Saskatchewan funds were paid up last year on the basis of an exchange of letters, and that this rather unusual procedure was cleared up through a treasury board minute. The question immediately arises, was the letter from Saskatchewan binding on that province? It is just a few weeks since there was a case to which reference was made and which a learned judge of the exchequer court said an agreement, even if it had been made by a minister of the crown, unless there was a treasury board minute in addition, would not be binding on the crown. What assurance do we have from the minister that the letter from Saskatchewan is indeed binding on the province.

Is this just a case of the minister passing out funds without any formal agreement? He tells us that in view of the circumstances there was no impropriety. We have not claimed that there was, but what we would suggest is that this is sloppy business. No reasonable businessman would pass out funds without a signed agreement, yet the minister tells us he does not have that. All he has is an exchange of letters. Would the minister tell us what assurance he has that the correspondence is binding on the province of Saskatchewan, as it has been on the crown in the right of Canada?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I do not know whether the hon. member was in his place when I read the document, but I stated the legal opinions on this, and in the case of Saskatchewan the road had been completed. The auditors' accounts had been received, and I think everyone was satisfied the work had been done and therefore there was nothing to hold Saskatchewan to. They had completed their part of—I do not want to use the word "agreement" because it has been used in three or four senses in this debate—but their part of the bargain.

Mr. Hellyer: How soon does the minister think a formal agreement will be reached, or is it the intention to supplement the existing exchange of letters with a formal agreement?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I cannot give a precise answer to that because the matter has to go before cabinet, and I have a feeling that it will not be going before cabinet for at least two weeks.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us if the Prince Albert bridge has been completed?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister tell us if any part of the funds which were passed to the province of Saskatchewan are earmarked as part of the expense for that bridge?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If I understand the hon. gentleman correctly, he is asking me if any part of the $750,000 advanced went to pay for the bridge?

Mr. Hellyer: That is right.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The answer is no.

Mr. Hellyer: Then is it correct to assume that any expenditure on that bridge will be included in the present vote 280 if agreement is subsequently reached?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would like to ask the minister if there are any provincial governments which have been pressing the federal government to conclude these agreements?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The federal government and provincial governments are anxious to conclude the agreements, but I can honestly say that no government is pressing because these debates on these legal points in the contracts, as well as over the physical condition of the roads sometimes, have been going on in a friendly manner although we have had sharp differences. But we see each other's viewpoint, and I do not think any province is pressing the federal government.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say in how many provinces work is now in progress on roads which are contemplated for inclusion in these agreements? That is, leaving out British Columbia where there is an agreement.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): All of them are.

Mr. Pickersgill: The actual work is proceeding on all of them in default of agreement?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes; always leaving out Quebec, of course. In every one of the other nine provinces work was done by various dates which we agreed upon up to the end of March 31, 1959, and is still continuing in this fiscal year.

Mr. Pickersgill: No money has been paid to any province except Saskatchewan and British Columbia?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That is correct.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would like to ask the minister if there are many projects actually completed?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I do not think there are any, Mr. Chairman, except the one at Otosquen in Saskatchewan. My officials do not know of any more.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister tell us briefly what these legal difficulties are holding up these agreements?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The first difficulty we ran into was what they called the time payment clause. This was proposed as a difficulty by Saskatchewan last November or December, if my memory serves me correctly. Then Saskatchewan proposed a new type of paragraph to cover this, and we finally agreed, as the federal government, to accept it. We said we would not accept it until we had spoken to all other provinces, and this led to a renegotiation of the time clause. When the time factor was changed, all the programs had to be re-examined and spread over the program, so that each province has a different amount planned for all the years of the program. This is not precise because in some provinces we have not fully concluded what the exact roads will be.

Then there is another legal difficulty about covenanting beyond the amount of $15 million if a road program costs more than $15 million. There is debate as to whether they should covenant themselves to complete the road when we do not know what the final cost will be. They were the same difficulties in the trans-Canada agreements.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister explain why it was possible to conclude the agreement with British Columbia? Surely the same difficulty arose there as with the other provinces.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This was done before I came into the department. As I understood it, it was a kind of quick deal on the part of the provincial and federal governments, and the province was not fully aware of what they had committed themselves to.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister has really let the cat out of the bag now. The one agreement which was concluded was concluded before this very experienced minister came into the department. It really is a very sorry chapter of fumbling and bumbling that we have been listening to all last Saturday and all this evening. All the time this minister has been in this department, with all his vast experience of domestic affairs, and in all those years he was losing elections in Saskatchewan when the Leader of the Opposition was sitting in the government of Canada helping to carry on the affairs of this country; during all that period when he was getting that experience, he was learning how to conclude agreements with his own province; secret agreements, agreements about matters so secret that the public could not be told. I suggest to the minister, and I will not do anything more to hold up his estimates now, that he get rid of all this secrecy nonsense. If the minister had been able to get elected to any riding anywhere before 1957 he would have heard in this house, and probably joined in, the most terrific denunciation from his present leader about secrecy, orders in council, and things concealed from the public. Yet here this minister boasts day after day of how he is keeping things secret from parliament which are parliament's business. It seems to me that the sooner this ridiculous practice ends the better.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I had something to do with this matter days ago and I am still a bit confused about what has happened. The minister did give some information, but I suggest to the minister that this information has been kicking around in various forms for some time. The hon. member for Timmins will tell you that the Chapleau-Foleyet road has been in the process of being built for many, many years; and also at the present time the minister of mines and forests in that area announces every week that another ten miles has been built. So there have been politics playing a part here, whether the minister knows it or not, and I suggest he has heard enough in this debate to realize that a great many of the problems would have been eliminated if he had brought in a report on the progress of these access roads. There is no secret about them. You may even find that some of the hon. members representing these areas know more than the minister's officials. Many of them have worked for the company involved and know considerable about them. I do not think there need be anything undercover about it. I think there needs to be a contract which will bind all parties with regard to these particular roads.

One of the minister's supporters the other day told me of his particular riding where this program is being used where they were fencing along the side of the road and they dug the fence posts the day before the provincial election, and the day after the election he informed me they went around and did not put posts in the holes but put the dirt back in, and that was the end of the program.

These things are happening. The minister can ask his backbenchers in the 26 seconds that each of them has in caucus, and they will tell him about these things. In any case, I suggest that he should set forth an account of how this money which we vote towards these roads is spent, in the same way as details of other projects are outlined in the estimates. We should be told what progress is being made in the construction of these roads, where they are going, how they are being financed, and who is going to control them. I am very interested in these access roads. Many have been put in by the companies for fire protection and other reasons; they are fine, big, wide roads and there is often a gate on them. I recall in particular the road from Gowganda to Ramsey or to Sultan a few miles down the railway track. This road has been built for some time and is travelled by a number of people on permit. It could be made into a suitable highway, and I suggest this is one of the roads about which something could be done. But an agreement is going to be necessary or one of these days we will be told in this house that a road toward which federal grants have been contributed has a gate on it. The Abitibi company or the Marathon company will say it is not a public road and that the public has no right to travel over it. I suggest that some of these roads might with advantage be taken over by negotiation.

With regard to the other question, I do not think it is necessary to write a letter and take several weeks to consider these matters. I think these are decisions which would be made public at a time when tenders are called, as is the case with other jobs. We know of cases where roads have approached completion, yet the people in the area have never been informed where they are going or who is financing the project. I suggest the minister should take a lesson from this discussion which has, I believe, contained constructive criticism. The money which is spent by the federal government on this program gives us a complete right to know the details of these contracts, and I suggest that there must be contracts or we are not handling our finances in a satisfactory manner. If we give this money out in the form of grants, we should consider, say, $15 million to be a grant and give the money to a province to do with it what it likes. But as long as we are exercising some control we should give serious consideration to a better accounting system and to reaching a signed agreement in each case.

We in northern Ontario appreciate this program but we are losing a good deal of faith in it because we are always hearing some politician saying he has been given the latest word from the provincial parliament and the next road is going to be built for four miles in this or that direction to open up resources. I am sure that is not what the minister contemplated when he began to administer this program, and I say to him that it is within his power to end this type of speculation and give the people a much better understanding of the developments which are going to take place, and where the development roads are going to lead.

Mr. Caron: Did I hear well when the minister answered the hon. member for Trinity by saying that the bridge in Prince Albert was under a special agreement. Was that what the minister said?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes. The bridge in Prince Albert is governed by an agreement with the province of Saskatchewan and the agreement calls for the federal government to pay 50 per cent, the province looking after the other 50 per cent, but I think they have an agreement with the city of Prince Albert to pay 12½ per cent.

Mr. Caron: That is 50-50-12½?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No. We are paying 50 per cent and the province is paying 50 per cent but out of the province's share the city of Prince Albert is paying 12½ per cent.

Mr. Caron: Was that included in the $9 million?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, it will come out of this vote.

Mr. Hellyer: Which definition of agreement is the minister using here? Which of the three or four definitions which he has been using all the afternoon?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The total amount of the estimated cost of the bridge is $2,500,000 but under our agreement we cannot pay any more than $1,250,000.

Mr. Caron: And over and above that there is an amount of $780,000 for the roads to resources program?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): $750,000 last year.

Mr. Caron: That makes almost $2 million.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member is lumping the total cost of the bridge into one year, if I understand him correctly, and the advance we pay to Saskatchewan.

Mr. Caron: According to that program a maximum of $1,500,000 can be spent in a year. If there has been an expenditure of $1,250,000 plus $750,000 that makes $2 million spent in one year, which would be $500,000 over the amount which it is possible to spend on that item.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The $750,000 was spent last year. Then as progress is reported on the bridge we shall pay certain parts of our share of the $1,250,000. I imagine it would last over at least two years.

Mr. Caron: Could we have the figures for the money spent in the same year on the bridge and on the road?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There has been no money spent by the federal government on the bridge yet out of this vote for $9 million.

Mr. Caron: If no money has been paid it will be paid in a lump sum and so, for the one year, the government will pay over $1 million when it should not spend more than $1,500,000.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think the phrase which should be used is "not more than half of $3 million can be spent in respect of any one year." If there are delays in payment and overlapping the actual amount paid out could, I suppose, be more than $1,500,000, but in respect of one year the moneys we could pay to a province would be $1,500,000.

Item agreed to.

Forestry branch—

285. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $36,330.

Mr. Fisher: I think I can bring up under this particular vote something that I think needs underlining because in my opinion it was one of the most regrettable bits of evidence that came before the committee looking into the affairs of the forestry branch. I refer to the evidence that this branch let some of its best silvicultural projects that had been in effect for some 30 years, and some of the best sample plots they had, go to the Department of National Defence because that department wanted a bit larger tank proving ground or manoeuvring ground for their troops. This to me is almost laughable when one considers the importance of silviculture in relation to the need of the army for an increased training ground. I know that national defence controlled this property at Petawawa and perhaps the forestry branch was there on sufferage.

I ask the minister this question. Why did he ever O.K. the wiping out of almost 50 per cent of the research areas for silviculture at Petawawa? Why did he not make some attempt to acquire that particular land on a permanent basis so these experimental areas could have been kept going? To me it was one of the most grievous blows silviculture has suffered. I understand that Major General Young was instrumental in bulling this through from the point of view of national defence. Someone bulled it through, anyway. To me it was a bad and stupid decision. I would like an explanation as to why the forestry branch and the minister gave in so easily on this point.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I share and appreciate the feelings of the hon. member concerning the loss of the silvicultural experimental areas at Petawawa. Every member of the forestry branch of my department would agree with me. The exigencies of the training program for national defence made it imperative for them to ask for this territory. I can assure the committee that the department has been reasonable with us. They are delaying the taking over of the property for defence purposes until we can get the maximum information available before the area is taken over.

Mr. Fisher: With sample plots it is not a question of 15 or 20 years to get results. You sometimes have to go through a whole cycle of up to 70 or 75 years. If there is any way the minister can salvage any of the regions that have been turned over I think he should give us his assurance that he will try to do so. When we consider that the Department of National Defence has that big camp at Gagetown and large areas at Camp Borden, and so on, to carry out manoeuvres, we fail to see any reason either in terms of economics or in terms of the defence needs of this country for the areas being allowed to go as a camp training ground or something of the kind. I do not think national defence is that important that in the light of the other areas national defence has silvicultural areas should be jettisoned. I hope the minister will try to save any of the plots that have not been already damaged by the military. In other words, I am suggesting to the minister that he try to renegotiate the matter if it is at all possible.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think the hon. member may have that assurance. First of all they have agreed to delay. Second, we are seeing what we can do to make the best of the situation. I think what the hon. member really wants is a statement of policy which I feel I can give him.

As far as the department is concerned we would like to have experimental areas entirely our own. As hon. members know the use of forest areas in the military reservations was just the start of the program but now that everybody accepts the task of the federal government in these vital research programs we do not want our programs hurt or interrupted by changes of policy on the part of the military who have a prior interest in the reservations. I will certainly take what the hon. member said into the most careful consideration.

Item agreed to.

286. Contributions to the provinces for assistance in forest inventory, reforestation and forest fire protection in accordance with agreements entered into by Canada and the provinces, $2,200,000.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to get the minister's view on the recommendation in the committee's report in so far as money for reforestation is concerned going to crown lands that are under licence to companies. At the present time I understand that is not possible. I wonder what course of action is likely to be taken in this regard?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The report of the committee is very recent, as the hon. member knows. We will have to take a very good look at the renegotiation of these agreements. I think the hon. member is aware that most of the provinces are finishing up their inventories. There may be a possibility of arriving at some type of rolling inventory to keep it up to date. Is that what the hon. member is referring to?

Mr. Fisher: No, it is the question of artificial reforestation and the fact that at the present these funds cannot be spent on crown lands that are under licence to pulp and paper companies. We have a real problem in Ontario. In our cutovers almost half of the regions are not regenerated. It is the policy of some companies to plant and others do not bother. There are a number of ways you can try to bring a site back especially if it is a good one. One of the best is to plant good spruce or pine stock on the best sites. At the present time there is encouragement to the provincial forest service to do this kind of thing because they get financial support but the pulp and paper companies or the department of lands and forests working in co-operation with the companies do not get any support for the lands that are already under licence. This is something that should be changed at once. I think it would give a real impetus to some of the forestry departments of some of the larger companies, and give a sort of raison d'être for getting into a much larger plan of artificial regeneration than the companies are involved in at present.

I know that the difficult factor is that the question has not been settled as to whose responsibility it is to undertake regeneration measures. As long as this government gives any money for artificial regeneration for any crown lands I fail to see why other crown lands should be discriminated against.

Mr. Herridge: I suggest that Ontario make its agreements in the fashion in which they are made in British Columbia where the companies concerned are entirely responsible—

Mr. Pickersgill: And where the ministers go to jail.

Mr. Herridge: The policy I am speaking about was initiated by the former Liberal government of British Columbia—or rather the former coalition government—so both get some credit. I am pleased at the increase in this vote. I intended to say a great deal about this but I will be brief to facilitate the passage of these estimates.

It is important to continue forest inventory work but the most urgent thing is adequate fire protection. I urge the minister to give consideration to the excellent suggestions of the committee with respect to increased financial contributions on the part of the federal government toward forest fire protection.

Mr. Peters: I wish to endorse what the hon. member for Kootenay West has said. Forest inventory is vitally important but it must be tied in with another fact. Some of our companies such as Spruce Falls Pulp and Paper Company have done a fairly good job on reforestation. Abitibi, which holds immense limits, have done practically no work at all in this field. We suggest that before any assistance is given that this requirement be made mandatory. It is of vital importance in my particular part of the country. In discussing this matter with some of the companies I have learned that where virgin stands of white pine existed previously there is no reforestation taking place in that particular area. Hon. members need only to go a few miles out of Ottawa to learn that where there were vast timber stands of white pine before, there is no regeneration at all of white pine. White pine in the Ottawa valley is almost extinct. We suggest that the federal government could expend their money in no better way than to increase this vote to encourage the reforestation of those areas that are suitable only for the white pine industry and where regeneration under natural conditions has not taken place to any extent.

Mr. Caron: I have just one question. With respect to the program of reforestation and fire protection, is there any agreement in this field for the province of Quebec?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

287. Contributions to the provinces pursuant to agreements entered into with the approval of the governor in council, by Canada with the provinces, of amounts equal to one-half of the amounts confirmed by the provinces as having been spent by them in establishing forest access roads and trails for the attainment of adequate fire protection as well as other aspects of forest management, $1,000,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the minister would like to tell us how many provinces he has agreements with under this item?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Eight, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Have the agreements all been concluded and signed?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Caron: Is the province of Quebec the only province that has no agreement?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Quebec and Prince Edward Island.

Item agreed to.

Forest products laboratories division—
288. Operation and maintenance, $820,097.

Mr. Peters: On this matter of forest products laboratories division, I should like to ask the minister whether any consideration is being given to helping small companies which are interested in establishing in those areas where the lumberng industry has been very hard hit? Are they giving any consideration to research into new methods of increasing production, either in the lumber field or in the secondary industries which are connected with the lumbering industry? I have a particular case in mind where a company has been interested in manufacturing or using a new process of making fibreboard on patents from Sweden. They have been attempting to get permission for some time now. I believe that assistance in such methods as that would affect them in that particular area. If reseach were done into the secondary products it would be of great advantage in establishing this type of secondary industry. Many of these plants are small, their resources are limited, and yet they have shown initiative in a desire to re-establish themselves in secondary products. I know that the manager of this company has made a trip to Sweden on two occasions at his own expense. I am wondering whether any work has been done in this particular field. The program that he is interested in is a type of excelsior and cement fibre board. It is manufactured, or would be manufactured, under international patents. But there are other types of processes that are taking place, including the use of sawdust and shavings, and things of that nature, which could be advantageous to small companies if the research was done for them.

I know that some of this work has been done by the larger companies into such things as patent lumber, plywood, or bondwood—it is a kind of board, anyway, that is being manufactured by Abitibi at Sturgeon Falls. These programs take a great deal of money to develop. If some of the knowledge or information was available to much smaller companies they could probably go into production and thereby establish secondary industries.

I also think that some research should be done into handling the reforestation of a different kind of tree from what we are now growing. I am thinking of the United States where in the southern states they have developed a type of weed tree which, instead of taking 80 or 90 years to grow, as the white pine does, grows to a usable size in about 12 years. Some type of development along these lines would be very advantageous in northern Ontario and would help establish secondary industries.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I think I can answer very briefly the first part of the hon. gentleman's remarks about the helping of the small lumber operators. There is a great interest in the department in how we can shift our forest products research in helping the small operator. I have a few notes that I think would be of help to the committee.

The utilization of sawmill waste for the manufacture of wood pulp continues to show encouraging progress. Our laboratories continue to carry out research in barking, chipping and transportation of mill residues. Field studies of logging operations and of manufacturing plants include investigation into the effect of tree size on lumber manufacture, the influence of log defects on lumber quality, and the effect of prebarking on sawmill operations. Before we can speed up this help for the small operator we have to build up our research staff. This year we made a small start on what I look on as a five-year program. This year we put into the forest products research staff three additional professional officers and four technicians. I hope that by the end of about five years it will have the effect of doubling our efforts.

I would like to tell the committee about something else that has not been mentioned. What we are very proud of is a series of two-day courses on improved sawmilling techniques conducted by the Ottawa laboratories. This series was commenced last year and courses were given in April, 1959, at La Sarre, Quebec, and at Timmins, Ontario, each course being arranged in co-operation with the provincial department concerned and with the Canadian Lumbermen's Association. Further courses are to be given in British Columbia and in Saskatchewan this autumn. These courses have been attended by practical sawmill operators and have given rise to most favourable comments.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to put a question to the minister in regard to the recommendation for the setting up of a marketing section. I could not say whether it should be dealt with by the forest products laboratory set-up or whether it should be a section that would be outside of that and work sort of generally in liaison with the Department of Trade and Commerce. I just wonder whether the minister has any news or any ideas as to whether that particular section has been gone ahead with as recommended and how it would fit into the department's scheme of things?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that I have not had time even to consider that report. I saw it there and thought about it once or twice, but I have not had time to discuss it with anyone, or consider it, but I will promise the hon. member that I will take a good look at it.

Item agreed to.

National museum of Canada—

292. Administration, operation and maintenance, $675,776.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like an answer from the minister on the remarks I made on the first item in connection with the museum. What are his plans to end the trouble with Canadians in this particular field of specialization? What arrangements does he think his department could make with the universities to bring along people and enable us to get rid of persons like MacNeish who have been with the museum for years and have not bothered to become Canadian citizens?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have discussed the matter of qualified Canadian personnel for the museum with several university presidents and some of the reactions have been most favourable. I have informed the university presidents that if they can supply qualified senior and graduate students we will provide them with summer employment to keep them coming along and give them in-service training within the museum.

Mr. Fisher: I should like the minister to comment on two other things. What are his views on the way in which the recently departed head of one of the branches of the museum was recruited? Does he think that recruitment was done fairly and without any political considerations? The other matter I should like him to comment upon is the need and how, if he sees a need, he is going to act with regard to controlling archaeological artifacts in so far as moving outside the borders of the country is concerned.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I hope the hon. member will accept my statement on the recruitment of the past head of the human history branch of the museum. It will be a simple statement. It was an example of positive recruitment that did not turn out too well, and this is no reflection on the man's ability as a scientist at all. As to the second part of his question, I am very keenly interested in the protection of archaeological artifacts. We have amendments in both the Yukon Act and the Northwest Territories Act in order to look after that region and we are now studying what is being done in each of the provinces with the intention of holding discussions with them in the hope that they will set up protection for artifacts found within their boundaries.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder whether the minister would consider this request. If it is at all possible and if the minister discovers within the government service any possible post that the recent director of one section of the museum could fill because of his undoubted scientific abilities, will he try to do his best in that regard? I feel that here is a gentleman who through a number of most unfortunate circumstances has had what appeared two years ago to be a most bright and promising future disappear through factors which were to quite an extent beyond his control. I should like to ask the minister to retain his interest and to seize the opportunity if he can ever make a recommendation or sees a spot where the man's undoubted scientific abilities can be used.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I did go to some length in making a job offer to the director before I asked him to resign and if I do hear of a job suited to his particular abilities I will certainly do everything I can to bring him in touch with it.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have had a number of letters and inquiries about this senior civil servant, the director of the archaeology branch, who has held this position for 10 years, I understand, and is still not a Canadian citizen. Has this civil servant been asked to take out his citizenship or asked why he does not want to become a citizen of Canada when he holds a senior position?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): We had a pretty thorough discussion of this matter in the standing committee. One of the members of the C.C.F. party was there and questioned me about it, and I think I made my position as clear as I could. I said that I would never make a request or exercise any form of pressure to force a person engaged in scientific work at the museum to take out Canadian citizenship. I would be very happy, of course, if they would. I would be very proud to have them. But you must remember also that in the world of science we do not want to close off scientific information coming into this country in the form of personnel of other nationalities and at the same time we do not want to close off scientific knowledge going from this country to other countries. I pointed out in the committee that all over the world and particularly in the United States many bright Canadian scientists are making their contribution even though they maintain their Canadian citizenship. There are only four or five people in a division of 76 who are not Canadian citizens and I do not think this is causing any great danger to the institution at all. I know that they are very highly qualified and I certainly would never think of asking them or putting any form of pressure on them.

Item agreed to.

Canadian government travel bureau—

293. To assist in promoting the tourist business in Canada, including grant of $5,000 to the Canadian tourist association, $2,319,342.

Mr. Garland: Would the minister care to comment on the activities of the bureau and its effect on this important Canadian industry?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Under its terms of reference the Canadian government travel bureau operates primarily to advertise Canada in the United States. Its purpose is to make as many Americans as possible conscious of the possibilities of Canada as a tourist spot and to draw them to this country. The bureau does not advertise in Canada. That is left to the provincial governments. There was a very thorough discussion of this matter in the standing committee, and I gave evidence there to the effect that I did think that selective advertising of the right sort, of a discriminatory sort to achieve the ends you wanted, would be wise. I said that in addition to advertising, some attention should be paid to what we call the tourist plant. In other words, there is very little use in advertising the beauty of an area if there are not facilities to handle the tourists going into that area.

We have tried to help out, as far as my department has been able to go so far, by the provision of the camp and picnic ground program which has been very successful. I think total expenditures amount to $6 million to date and in the next year or so expenditures will reach $10 million. The purpose of the program is to provide camp grounds and picnic sites along the highways of the provinces and the trans-Canada highway.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

There are two separate types of agreements. There are many other things that have to be done.

This afternoon the house was discussing credit for small business. The tourist industry is largely a small business industry, and this is one of the things the government has been considering very seriously ever since the new government was formed. The problem has many complexities and one is the tourist business. The additional complexity affecting the department has to do with the national parks. The national parks do not give ownership of the land or property to a person building any type of plant and therefore it is very difficult for that person to get credit. There is a great need for credit in the tourist industry, which is mainly a small business industry. It is also an industry that we can use to attract many more people into Canada and equalize our balance of trade and develop the country. There is much to be done.

There is one other thing I have not mentioned. I have received a number of letters from various people across Canada saying that our forest access roads and roads to resources are being received with considerable satisfaction because tourists are very keen about finding their way into new areas. These roads are yielding revenues and benefits to the communities even before the forest areas or mineral resources are developed. I think that covers the activities of the travel bureau with the probable exception of the film activities which I think are well known.

Mr. Garland: Can the minister tell the house the volume of the tourist business to date this year compared to the same period last year?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It is a little above last year, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Garland: I wonder if the minister could say what measures are being taken by the government through the travel bureau to offset the loss of business resulting from United States promotion urging their citizens to see their own country first, and what effect it has had?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The tourist business today is highly competitive. We have Europe, the West Indies, Mexico and even Asia now moving into competition in this tourist industry. Canada has to gear itself to meet this new competition because this is big business all over the world. Every year the dominion government and the provinces meet in a dominion-provincial conference. This year it will be in the latter part of November. In this meeting each of the eleven governments tries to lay down a plan that will build up our operations, both at the provincial level and at the federal level. Both levels of government are always subject to the fact they have the fiscal conditions to meet.

I can assure hon. members that there is no activity between the federal government and the provinces in which I think there is more enthusiasm more awareness that much has to be done to help this tourist industry take advantage of the opportunities that are here and help meet this increasing competition.

Mr. Garland: I was asking what precisely is being done to offset this United States promotion this year; I am not talking about generally.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): We have spent a little more money, not very much I know. We have a little more enticing advertising. We had openings in Chicago and New York of new offices and we are hoping to get enough money to get offices in the west coast of the United States, as well as other places.

Then again, we have been looking at the advertising and trying to get it into broader fields. Let me put it this way. One assumption we have been making in our advertising is that the people who are primarily interested are those who are close to Canada. I am not sure that is true. There is a large amount of evidence collecting that people who are getting information from away out in San Francisco are not interested in just going across the border, they are interested in the more distant parts. There has been a tremendous increase in long distance travel in both Canada and United States. We are trying to reach those United States citizens who are farther away from the Canadian border.

Then, some of us have the feeling that we could put on a special type of hot weather advertising in the southern states, advertising how cool it is in Canada while they are suffering from the heat.

Mr. Garland: Of this vote of $2,319,000, the largest single item is one of $1,468,000 for advertising in United States newspapers and magazines. I was wondering if the minister would be kind enough to give me the number and names of the agencies that place this advertising.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There were three Canadian advertising agencies handling the business in 1958. They were Locke-Johnson Company Limited who handled the general magazine campaign; Harold F. Stanfield Limited, who handled the newspaper campaign and Hayhurst who handled the special Atlantic provinces campaign.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to discuss this very important subject at some length, but in view of the disposition of this committee this evening, and in view of the fact my remarks will probably be equally appropriate a year from now, with the indulgence of the committee I shall leave it to a later date.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I know that the members of the committee have enjoyed the estimates of this department and I want to assure them that I have enjoyed them as much as anyone. Quite sincerely, I want to thank everyone for taking a keen interest in the department. It is always an interesting occasion when I have a chance to defend my program.

Mr. Chevrier: Before the minister leaves, I think the house should take cognizance of the fact that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys has been waiting here for several days to pass his estimates. I suggest that we continue with his estimates at this time.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I think the agreement was quite well understood. I sympathize with the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, but he has been in this position several times, and I suggest we call it ten o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Will the acting house leader tell us what we will do tomorrow and Saturday?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to express a word of appreciation to the committee for its co-operative attitude tonight and, I think, a word of appreciation to the staff of the House of Commons because they are working long hours under difficult conditions. The general plan appears to be to complete the business as expeditiously as possible with the most careful scrutiny. Tomorrow, we will carry on with mines and technical surveys, followed by fisheries and post office. I shall list the others in the order in which I gave them the other day, subject to perhaps a change if we run over to Saturday: Secretary of state, privy council, national revenue, C.B.C., legislation, health and welfare and finance. There are obviously nine departments to consider, but four of them have been through the various committees of the house.

I am not in a position to announce the business for Saturday until we see what progress we make with the estimates. It is possible, I think, to complete the business of the house if we sit Saturday night because of the eight items on the order paper of a legislative nature, five are of a very minor character. We will see what progress we make tomorrow.

It being 11.31 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

PORK SHIPMENTS ABROAD

Question No. 472—Mr. McIlraith:

1. Has the Canadian government since January 1, 1959, sold pork for shipment out of Canada?

2. If so, (a) in what quantities; (b) to what countries; (c) at what price?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture):

1. Yes.

2. (a) 3,918,550 pounds of frozen products.

(b) Mexico, Italy and Czechoslovakia.

(c) Prices ranged from 16 to 30 cents per pound, ex warehouse, depending on type of frozen product and place of sale.

DELAYS AND NON-DELIVERIES OF MAIL

Question No. 494—Mr. Denis:

For each of the fiscal years 1955-56, 1956-57 and 1957-58, how many inquiries have been received by the Post Office Department, concerning delays or non-delivery of mail matter?

Answer by: Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General):

	Delays	Non-delivery
x1955-56	62,561	145,279
1956-57	29,966	36,118
1957-58	26,595	41,840

xPrior to 1955-56 there was some duplication of recording statistics due to the fact that many inquiries had to be investigated in more than one postal district. To improve the accuracy of the statistics a change in recording was made in 1956. This explains the variance in figures for 1955-56 when compared to the succeeding years.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

380. Departmental administration including fees for membership in the international organizations listed in the details of the estimates, $2,636,084.

383. Exhibitions branch, $790,592.

384. Standards branch, $2,383,690.

385. Dominion bureau of statistics, including the fee for membership in the inter-American statistical institute and a contribution of $500 to the international statistical institute, $8,565,609.

287. Contributions to the provinces pursuant to agreements entered into with the approval of the governor in council, by Canada with the provinces, of amounts equal to one-half of the amounts confirmed by the provinces as having been spent by them in establishing forest access roads and trails for the attainment of adequate fire protection as well as other aspects of forest management, $1,000,000.

Forest products laboratories division—

288. Operation and maintenance, $820,097.

289. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $68,190.

290. Grant to Canadian forestry association, $20,000.

291. Eastern Rockies forest conservation board—remuneration and expenses of the federal member of the board, $5,575.

National museum of Canada—

292. Administration, operation and maintenance, $675,776.

Canadian government travel bureau—

293. To assist in promoting the tourist business in Canada, including grant of $5,000 to the Canadian tourist association, $2,319,342.

Loans, investments and advances—

476. Advances to the northern Canada power commission for the purpose of capital expenditures in accordance with sub-section (1) of section 15 of the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, $6,050,000.

477. Advances in accordance with agreements entered into pursuant to the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act, $11,627,000.

National parks branch—

National parks and historic sites services—

551. Administration, operation and maintenance—further amount required, $358,463.

552. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land equipment—further amount required, $500,000.

Water resources branch—

553. Saint John river—federal expenditures in connection with investigations to be carried out by the Saint John river board, $70,000.

554. Fraser river—federal expenditures in connection with investigations to be carried out by the Fraser river board, $150,000.

555. Construction of a fishway on the Yukon river at the site of the hydro-electric power development being constructed by the northern Canada power commission for the Whitehorse area (revote), $525,000.

Northern administration and lands branch—

Northwest Territories and other field services—

556. Operation and maintenance—to extend the purposes of vote 278 of the main estimates for 1959-60 to include the contributions detailed in these estimates, $1.

557. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required, $306,000.

Forestry branch—

Forest research division—

558. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required, $12,000.

Forest products laboratories division—

559. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required, $19,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, July 17, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ADVISORY COMMITTEE—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would comment on a Canadian Press report of this morning to the effect that there was a meeting between the Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour and Canadian Labour Congress officers early this month to discuss labour representation on the unemployment insurance advisory committee, and that at that meeting the Canadian Labour Congress received certain assurances regarding future Canadian Labour Congress recommendations for such appointments.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there was a meeting as stated. The stand taken by the government was that under the law as it exists there shall be consultation with labour organizations in respect of appointments to be made. It was made very clear that in the future, as in the past, this government will at all times consult labour organizations with a view to having from those organizations the names suggested by them as worthy of appointment. But consultation does not mean determination. Consultation means that the names submitted will receive the attention of the governor in council. Consultation means consideration of the suggestions made, but does not imply a determination of the issue by reason of the names suggested.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour a supplementary question based upon the interesting observations of the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the government has now decided to consult labour with regard to its appointments—

Mr. Diefenbaker: And we have done so regularly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister says that the government has done so regularly. May I ask if it is a fact that George Burt, a former member of the unemployment insurance advisory committee, has declined reappointment; and can the minister say what progress is being made with regard to the appointment of representatives of the congress and the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour on the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance committee representing labour?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, I have no comments to make nor have I any information with respect to the first part of his question.

Concerning the second part of his question, all nominations have been made for appointment to the unemployment insurance commission including those made by representatives of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour and those made by the Canadian Labour Congress.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Does that mean that the united automobile workers, through Mr. George Burt, will not be represented?

Mr. Starr: Mr. George Burt's name was not submitted by the Canadian Labour Congress.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My question was that the united automobile workers will not be represented.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, there is no particular segment of representation. All workers are represented by those who are on this commission.

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF BENEFITS FOR UNEMPLOYED MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister considered, and reached a decision on, the matter of extending unemployment insurance benefits for unemployed miners in Nova Scotia?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The only indication of anything of this nature from Nova Scotia was a few weeks ago, when I received notification that certain miners were laid off for two days because of a breakdown. Of course those who were eligible under the act received unemployment insurance.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NORTHLAND NAVIGATION COMPANY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SETTLEMENT OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is he in a position to confirm the newspaper dispatch in this morning's Globe and Mail about a settlement of the strike of Northland Navigation Company Limited? Is he in a position to give any indications as to when the service might be resumed?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, hon. members of the house will be pleased to learn that the dispute which has halted the west coast shipping operations of Northland Navigation Company Limited has been settled. Yesterday evening I was advised by Mr. G. R. Currie of the Vancouver office of my department, who was appointed to mediate the dispute, that representatives of the company and the national association of marine engineers had signed a collective agreement, and that the marine engineers, deck officers and longshoremen were resuming work immediately.

The final meeting at which the settlement was reached was under the chairmanship of Mr. Currie, and throughout the negotiations my officer had the co-operation of representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress, the British Columbia federation of labour and other trade union organizations.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO SALARY INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of a letter I received just a few moments ago from the letter carriers' association in my constituency. Will the minister inform the house whether the government intends to put into effect an adjustment of the salaries of civil servants in the immediate future, especially in view of the fact that income tax increases came into effect on July 1?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question in the house some days ago. There has been no change in the situation since.

Mr. Badanai: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the government intend to take this matter into consideration in the foreseeable future, if not in the immediate future?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance has received a report from the civil service commission, and this matter is under discussion between the civil service commission and the minister. The submission of that report to the minister follows the terms of the statute.

TRADE

TEXTILES—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING IMPORTS FROM JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he would comment on a Reuters' dispatch of this morning from Tokyo to the effect that the Japanese trade minister announced today that the Canadian government had informed the Japanese government that it could not agree to the Japanese plans for resuming exports of spun rayon made-up goods to Canada shortly.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think probably I am familiar with that matter. It will be recalled that I made an announcement in the house some days ago concerning the decision of the Japanese government to issue no more permits for the time being for export to Canada of certain articles of clothing of spun rayon and similar materials. The matter has been in that position since, and one of the purposes in suspending the issuance of further export permits by the Japanese government was to allow time for discussion between the representatives of the two governments in relation to over-all ceilings and quotas to be applied by the Japanese government to their exports, with a view to assuring that the marketings in Canada would proceed on an orderly basis. It was clear at that time that exports to Canada of articles of this type had gone beyond what could be regarded by any person as orderly. These discussions have been proceeding in the meantime and are still continuing.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware that two plants of Canadian Cottons have closed, one in Hamilton and one in Cornwall, putting 2,000 people out of work?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a fact that in some lines of the textile industry, because after all the textile industry really is a group of industries, there has been some further decline in production. As against that, there are some lines of domestic textile production that have been rising. I will say this, that this government has done a good deal for the textile industry in all its aspects which, if it had been done earlier, would have been more effective in helping the industry meet its problems.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister if he remembers the statements he made in this house and that his supporters made during the campaign, that they would put an end to this stoppage of work in the textile industry?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, any resemblance between the words just now ascribed by the hon. member for Laurier to myself or, I am sure, to any other person on this side of the house and the statements that were made is, in the language of the movies, purely coincidental. This is what was said by us when in opposition. We drew the attention of the former government to the increasingly serious plight of the textile industry. We asked that government what it was going to do, and we could never find out.

Mr. Chevrier: You said you would put a stop to it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Finally they got to the point of referring to the tariff board for examination—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not like to interrupt the minister, but I remind him he is going beyond the question, which related purely to something which he said when he was in opposition, and which was a question that was not in order in any event. I should not like to see a debate develop at this stage.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I thought the question was of a very general nature, but if you think the answer I was giving was too broad I shall confine my answer to saying that what members on this side of the house—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —who are now members of the government, said on the occasions referred to by the hon. member in his question, has been carried out fully and is still being carried out fully.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order. I point out to Your Honour that you made a ruling and gave a direction to the Minister of Finance, who has set a very bad example for all of us this morning by disregarding that ruling.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, you indicated to me—

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister speaking to the point of order?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker. You indicated to me that you thought my answer should be more confined. I proceeded to give a more confined answer, and I do not see why my hon. friend should raise a point of order when I am adhering so strictly to the direction of the Chair. As far as giving an example is concerned, I do not flatter myself that I could set an example that the hon. member for Essex East would follow.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, out of deference to you I will abide by your ruling, but I shall reserve discussion of this matter for another occasion.

STATEMENT ON REPORTED REMARKS BY U.S. SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on Monday morning last, July 13, the hon. member for Essex East asked me to comment on a press interview given by Mr. Ezra Benson, Secretary of Agriculture for the United States. The Canadian Press dispatch covering this first appeared, to my knowledge, in the Montreal Star of Monday evening. I have a copy of that report here, and I was surprised at some of the statements attributed to Mr. Benson in this dispatch. I communicated with him by telephone on Wednesday last in order to find out whether the report was accurate, and to find out exactly what he did say, as well as to discuss matters which were covered in the press dispatch.

Perhaps I had better read what the dispatch says:

> However, he made it clear that he was deeply concerned over what he described as a rather restrictive attitude by the Canadian government in some farm products, particularly turkeys.
> American turkey growers were "quite upset" over what amounted to a virtual Canadian embargo on turkey imports, he said. The U.S. now are trying to get Canada to relax curbs and Mr. Benson was hopeful something would be done soon.

On the telephone Mr. Benson said that he had not used the word "embargo" at any time, and did not think he had used the word "upset". What he did say was that he had just returned from Europe, he had told the reporter, and on his return had found some reports from United States turkey growers who were concerned about exports to Canada. I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that the United States and ourselves have had some discussions on the subject of the turkey import control we have in effect in Canada, and I think that the United States is now reasonably happy with this situation.

In connection with our proposed deficiency payments on hogs the newspaper report states as follows, and this is as though it were quoting Mr. Benson:

> The U.S. also was concerned over reports that the Canadian government was in the midst of turning its price support on hogs into a system of deficiency payments, covering farmers on their losses but letting them do all their own marketing.
> Benson said this deficiency payments system may "greatly stimulate" Canadian hog production and provide a "real threat" to American hog producers competing against Canadian hogs in the American market.
> "These Canadian hogs could depress our own markets," he said, adding that the U.S. had a heavy hog surplus of its own. American prices had been falling and the U.S. Agriculture Department had issued "warnings" to producers to limit production.

Mr. Benson told me that these were not his statements but that they were statements of farm organizations in the United States, particularly the American farm bureau, which had made representations to this effect to him; but that he did not make the statements to the reporter and that they should not be attributed to him. I explained to Mr. Benson that our deficiency payment plan, rather than stimulating hog production, would be likely to have the opposite effect and that it was designed to bring production and consumption more into balance in Canada.

The only other matter that was dealt with in this report was in connection with wheat, and the newspaper report ends by quoting Mr. Benson to this effect:

> "I still think that Canadian production is too high," he said.

I pointed out to Mr. Benson that Canadian reduction in acreage was greater than United States reduction, taking any five-year period such as 1935-39 or 1940-45 and comparing it with the last four to five years and that as a result of our reduction in acreage the figure had come down from 28,726,000 acres in 1940 to 20,899,000 acres last year.

I think there is no question but that the Americans are in grave difficulties, as Mr. Benson has said on many occasions, over the amount of wheat that is being produced there. Of course we have had, as everyone knows, a considerable amount of difficulty over the production of wheat in this country. However, I do not think there is any serious difficulty between us in that regard. The report on the meeting which was held in Washington in May, which the Minister of Trade and Commerce made to the house, indicated that with regard to the disposal of these surplus stocks of wheat we are now in a very much better position than has ever been the case as far as consultation and co-ordination of the disposal programs are concerned.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Will the minister indicate to the house whether, in his telephone conversation with Mr. Benson, he was able to ascertain whether the representations made by the American farm bureau for countervailing duties against Canadian pork products would likely succeed?

Mr. Harkness: Naturally we did not go into that matter, but I think there would be no reason for any countervailing duties. Therefore I do not anticipate that any will be put into effect.

AIRPORTS

SHERBROOKE, QUE.—STATEMENT ON CONSTRUCTION OF RUNWAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It is a fact that the government has decided to build one 5,000 foot runway for the Sherbrooke airport, when the plans made by the former government provided for two runways 6,000 feet long?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is partly right. I explained the plans to a very large, serious and constructively-minded delegation that met with me in my office yesterday, together with six members of parliament from the surrounding area. I told them that present plans call for one 5,000-foot runway, but that the department is making a submission to treasury board recommending that the runway be extended to 6,000 feet. I am very hopeful that treasury board will pass that recommendation.

Regarding the matter of the former government's promise to build two runways, I explained to the delegation that it is the policy of this government when we build our airports to build one runway at a time, and as soon as it is demonstrated that one runway will be inadequate to handle the traffic which offers at the airport, then we are only too glad to build a second runway. This delegation agreed this was a very sensible point of view and method of procedure. I have assured them that just as soon as it is indicated that this one runway will not handle the traffic that offers at the airport, we will be very glad to build a second runway.

I was interested also to learn in studying this matter that the promise made by the former government to build two runways at this airport was made just prior to the 1957 election, when the former government were making lavish promises in an attempt to avert the landslide which eventually overtook them.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There seems to me to be a tendency to go into debate that properly should take place on the estimates. If members wish to get on with the estimates they had better observe the appropriate procedure at this stage.

Mr. Chevrier: I was looking for a little clarification but the minister's answer, while it clarifies certain things, was highly political in nature.

THREE RIVERS, QUE.—STATEMENT ON CONSTRUCTION OF RUNWAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct another question to the minister on another matter. Following an announcement on the French television network on Wednesday evening that the government has decided to build an airport at Three Rivers, will the minister tell the house the nature of the airport that is to be built, whether plans and specifications are ready and when it will be completed?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The plans are for one 6,000-foot runway. We expect to call for tenders for the construction of that runway in the very near future, and hope to complete it next year.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

PACIFIC PRESS LIMITED—INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I hope notice of it reached him in sufficient time. Can the minister inform the house as to the progress of the investigation by the combines investigation branch into the operations of Pacific Press Limited in Vancouver?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I appreciate the hon. gentleman's courtesy in giving me notice of this question. In answer I can only say that the matter is still under inquiry. I refer him to the answer I gave on April 30 of this year, which appears at page 3183 of Hansard, in which I said that I was not in a position to give the house any information regarding the state of the investigation except that I had not yet received any report from the restrictive trade practices commission, but that if and when I received such a report it would be published, as required by the act, in the usual way.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

STATEMENT AS TO CO-OPERATION BETWEEN CANADIAN AND UNITED KINGDOM POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yesterday the hon. member for Ottawa West, as reported at page 6101 of Hansard, inquired why the R.C.M.P. did not send relevant information regarding a person about whom the United Kingdom authorities had made inquiries by cable or wire photo instead of by air mail.

I have made inquiries of the R.C.M.P., and I am advised by them as follows. After receiving a cable from the United Kingdom authories giving them four different names and asking for whatever assistance the R.C.M.P. could supply, the R.C.M.P. supplied the name of Podola as a possible suspect and advised London immediately by cable of a description of this man. On the same day a copy of Podola's fingerprints and a photograph were forwarded by air mail. The authorities of the R.C.M.P. point out that, as can be readily understood, one cannot always depend upon a photograph transmitted by wire to be sufficiently good for police identification in a case such as this, as it cannot be guaranteed that a picture transmitted in such a manner will be free of distortion. For this reason the R.C.M.P. followed their usual practice in forwarding the picture and fingerprints by air mail.

INDUSTRY

FORD MOTOR COMPANY OF CANADA—REPORTED PURCHASE OF CONTROL BY U.S. COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): In view of his well known interest in this matter may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he has any comment to make on the report that the Ford Motor Company has now obtained control of the Ford Motor Company of Canada through stock purchase?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not seen that report as yet, but I will look into it.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that some 140 employees of the C.N.R. have been laid off at the shops in Quebec, Charny and Chicoutimi during the last 12 months, and that employees with as much as 39 years of service were among them?

Has he taken cognizance of an undertaking which he gave last year that these employees who had lost their jobs would be taken back, which commitment was communicated to the employees by the Conservative members of parliament of the area in a letter dated June 18, 1958.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I will be glad to look into the matter.

FISHERIES

SALT COD—STATEMENT ON CANCELLATION OF CULLING REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Trinity-Conception asked me a question relative to the regulations governing the culling of salted cod fish in Newfoundland. In reply to the hon. member's question I said that as I understood the question the culling of salted cod in Newfoundland was the responsibility of the provincial government, but that I would make a further reply later.

The situation, Mr. Speaker, is that cullers or graders of salted cod in Newfoundland are employees of the buyers of the product. Under the Newfoundland culling regulations originally promulgated by the commission of government, cullers are licensed. The system had been carried on by the federal Department of Fisheries following union, but the Department of Fisheries had no real supervision over their activities in the culling of salted cod.

During the past number of years the department has been concerned about the legality of its functions relative to the culling regulations. Accordingly, in consultation with the provincial government authorities it was established that the legal responsibility for enforcement of the Newfoundland culling regulations belonged to the province.

The federal department therefore is unable to assume further responsibility with respect to the Newfoundland culling regulations. The federal Department of Fisheries is, of course, continuing its responsibilities with respect to the inspection for export of Newfoundland salted cod, and has no intention of withdrawing from this legal responsibility. In the case of the first culling or grading, however, this is a matter between seller and buyer and comes, as I have said, within the authority of the province.

The provincial authorities asked the federal Department of Fisheries recently if we would administer the culling regulations on their behalf. After careful examination the provincial authorities were informed that to enforce the regulations properly and legally would require a large staff, and with the present organization of the federal Department of Fisheries in Newfoundland we could not undertake to administer the culling regulations on behalf of the province and at the same time carry out our responsibilities for the inspection and grading of salted cod for export.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. MARTIN, ESSEX EAST—CLARIFICATION OF REMARK IN DEBATE ON JULY 16

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for York South, who has pointed out that last night I referred to the provincial treasurer in Ontario as one who came from northern Ontario, and did not properly identify him as coming from the constituency in which is situated the town of Dunnville. In fairness to the provincial treasurer I want to make that clear.

TRANSPORT

ALLEGED REFUSAL TO CO-OPERATE IN SUPPLYING WEATHER DATA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Transport if he intends to "stop trampling on crops and gardens"?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I have never started trampling on crops and gardens.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister's attention not been drawn to an editorial in the Calgary Albertan of Wednesday, July 15 entitled "Hees Tramples on Crops and Gardens"? I will send it to the minister.

Mr. Hees: I have seen it. I have had a great deal of correspondance with the editor of that paper and explained in detail the stand taken by the department on this matter which I consider to be very fair. But in this democracy, thank heaven, there can always be a difference of opinion, and one exists in this particular case.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONTROL OF TRAFFIC ENTERING LAFONTAINE PARK, MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Ratelle (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I gave him notice of it on the 15th instant. I should like to know why no signs have been posted around Lafontaine park, between Gauthier, Sherbrooke, Papineau and Marquette streets, stating that entrance may be restricted or prohibited in accordance with regulations governing national defence property.

Ever since June 3, Mr. Speaker, I have been trying to get that information from all departments; but I now find that I have to inquire from the Minister of National Defence.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): I shall take the question as a notice.

Mr. Ratelle: Could the minister supply me with full information about this before the end of the current session?

Mr. Balcer: I shall do my best, Mr. Speaker.

RESEARCH

GREAT LAKES—REPORTED REFUSAL OF FEDERAL GRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether this question should be directed to the Minister of Transport, the Minister of National Defence or someone else. Could any minister tell me the circumstances in which it is alleged that research grants to support the great lakes research vessel, Port Dauphine, have been turned down by Ottawa?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Administration services—

186. Departmental administration, $697,289.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Does the minister intend to make a statement, even a short one?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Chairman, I should like at this time, before we proceed with consideration of the estimates of my department, to make a few remarks, first in relation to the department itself and to matters bearing on its services to industry, and second in relation to our mineral industry.

By now all hon. members have had an opportunity to peruse the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the standing committee on mines, forests and waters in connection with our estimates for the current fiscal year. Votes and Proceedings No. 87 of May 26 last contains the standing committee's summing up of the evidence they heard and their conclusions and recommendations.

It is not my intention to quote at length from this report but I should like to direct attention in particular to a paragraph which appears under its general section. This paragraph reads, and I quote:

> "In almost all fields of national scientific endeavour, this department should have led and should lead the way . . . Both the people and those responsible for policy in Canada have been slow to realize the urgent need for expenditure and leadership in this field. The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, your committee insists, must be recognized as a vitally important one, not one of inferior significance. The scientific function of the department cannot any longer be circumscribed by caution, hesitancy and lack of support. It is imperative that all branches of the department embark on an accelerated program of expansion, and planning for expansion; and that the provision of the needed money, staff and facilities be an immediate consideration of the government."

(Text):

May I also quote the last paragraph of the general section which reads:

> Geography forces Canada to take a leading part in any northern matter, whether civil or military. This is an obligation which we cannot evade, but which we cannot fufil effectively without adequate research. For the effective development of the north a major expansion of research is essential. Without thorough and continuing research any development in the north is certain to be much more costly and may easily be misdirected.

I may state at this point that I am very pleased with the interest the members of the standing committee have shown in the activities of our department. It is abundantly clear from the tabled report from which I have just quoted that they put much time and earnest thought into the drafting of their conclusions. It is clear also that in its tasks in hand and possibly more so in those that lie ahead, my department has and will have an integral part to play in keeping Canada to the forefront in those important fields of science and engineering that bear particularly on resources development.

The standing committee places the greatest importance on the need for the activities in which the department is engaged. This need, it states in effect, is becoming so great and in some respects so urgent as to call for a major expansion of staff and facilities to cope with the requirements.

In the evidence we gave to the standing committee we stated that over the next five years we shall need an additional staff of 1,440 including 305 seasonal employees to handle our assignments. We now have a staff of 3,785 including seasonals; thus the increase would bring the total up to 5,225 by the end of five years. By far the largest increase would be in our surveys and mapping branch, that for the Canadian hydrographic service alone being 490 continuing and 40 seasonal employees. The geological survey of Canada would be next with an estimated increase of 200 continuing and 175 seasonal employees. Our estimate of the additional staff that will be required is strongly endorsed by the standing committee; in fact they have recommended even larger increases in some cases, and most of these projections, I may state, seem more likely to be subject to upward rather than downward revision.

In a rapidly expanding economy such as we have in Canada the need for research is going to increase, and at an accelerated rate, according to present indications. As we look back over the 14 years that have passed since the war we marvel at the growth of the Canadian economy; yet if I were given to the use of trite expressions I would say, "We haven't seen anything yet". This, translated into more decorous phraseology, means that so far we have had little more than a glimpse of our growth potential.

(Translation):

Some of the major new projects we are undertaking this year will bear out what I have said concerning the role we have to play. Quite apart from their importance in other respects, they point up the urgency of much of our efforts—urgency in the sense that they are being undertaken to keep ahead of the requirements of industry or other urgent national demands and with the attention other countries are giving to scientific investigations.

One such project is the work we are undertaking on our polar continental shelf, which this year is simply exploratory to obtain an idea of the general character of the shelf, the equipment needed for such a project and the best type of transportation. Even though it is exploratory in character, it has already provided us with information that has caused us to revise our concepts of the area. The work to date appears to confirm the potentialities of the area as a source of petroleum, and further investigation will be aimed, in part, to determine whether these favourable conditions extend out over the shelf.

[Mr. Comtois.]

Another recent project is the construction, now well advanced, at Penticton, British Columbia, of a radio telescope 84 feet in diameter, which we expect will be ready for testing this coming September and for continuous operation in November. In exploring outer space, the radio telescope has the same advantage over the optical telescope as radar has over optical vision in a fog. Many of the most significant objects in outer space are forever concealed from us by clouds of dust that the eye and the photographic telescope cannot penetrate. These can be revealed to us by the radio telescope just as definitely as the radar-scope of a naval vessel can detect the approach of a friendly or hostile craft on a foggy night.

We are planning to locate a research establishment in the Bedford Basin near Halifax, where we shall conduct studies into physical oceanography and submarine geology. These subjects have been long neglected. Knowledge of the oceans adjacent to our coasts and of the geology of the continental shelves is needed to develop our resources properly and to furnish information needed for continental defence.

In northwestern Ontario, we are making a start this year on a project that is designed, in part, to provide information that is needed in connection with the government's Ontario portion of the roads to resources program. The 60,000-square-mile region concerned lies roughly between longitudes 86° and 94° and latitudes 50½° and 53°. Comparatively little is known of the resource potential of much of the region, and this information is needed in order to decide on the best locations for the roads. To this end, we are making a pilot geological survey this year in the Trout lake portion of the region to acquire information that we will need for much more extensive geological operations in 1960 and 1961. The results of these operations will provide the information needed in deciding on suitable locations for the roads. An airborne magnetometer survey of the region is now underway, the results of which will be used as an aid in the geological mapping. The Ontario government will bear most of the cost of this survey and the federal government the remainder, and, in addition, the cost of all the geological work.

We are also undertaking two quite sizeable geological projects in the Northwest Territories and one in Yukon. One of these is a geological reconnaissance of Banks and Victoria islands; the other in the Northwest Territories is a reconnaissance of a large area lying mainly west and south of Coppermine in a project we have named Operation Coppermine. In the Yukon project, we are commencing work this year in Operation Pelly, which is a reconnaissance of the southeastern portion of the territory.

I should explain here that in our geological work we have been giving top priority to reconnaissance projects since 1952, and we have already covered a total area of approximately half a million square miles, mainly in Northwest Territories and British Columbia. This is exclusive of the work in hand this year. The decision to give such projects top priority was mainly in an endeavour to complete the reconnaissance mapping of Canada in the foreseeable future and to keep abreast of the requirements of industry. A very important side aim of the work has been to develop low cost and efficient methods of mapping the areas concerned. By the use of helicopters and supporting fixed-wing aircraft, we have been able to cover as much ground in one season on these projects as would have required 20 to 25 years by the former methods and at a much lower cost.

In furtherance of our endeavours to reduce the cost and increase the efficiency, we made a test last year of the use of Piper Super Cub planes, equipped with wheels designed for landing on unprepared terrain. The tests proved so successful that the planes will be put to more extensive use this year on our geological reconnaissance of Banks and Victoria islands. The geologists will be able to make their observations from the planes and to land within easy walking distances of the places where samples or detailed observations are needed. We now have some reason to believe that, where this specially equipped plane can be used, the work can be done much more cheaply and efficiently than by use of the helicopter.

As the hon. members are probably aware, Mr. Chairman, my department has been given considerable attention to land-use mapping. The importance of such work in a rapidly growing country like Canada need not be stressed. The projects are being carried out in co-operation with the provinces concerned, our work this year being in Ontario, Saskatchewan, and British Columbia. In another project, our geographical branch is working with the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources on several resources surveys connected with that department's services to the Eskimos. The work this year is in the Mackenzie river delta and in the Great Whale river area on the east coast of Hudson bay.

In the field of metallurgical research, we have undertaken work recently on several interesting projects. One of these affords a typical example of our aid to industry.

It concerns the recent announcement by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited of its plans to proceed with the construction of an electric smelter for the production of pig iron. This is part of a long-range plan to set up an integrated steel industry in western Canada. The company has been accumulating large tonnages of iron oxide as a by-product from its roasting operations. For years it was felt that the impurities in the oxide would be harmful to steel made from it. Research in our laboratories showed that a satisfactory steel meeting all the requirements for structural steel could, in fact, be produced and the company was thus in a position to proceed with the project.

In quite a separate project, we have commenced basic research on nickel-alloy systems in order to increase our knowledge of these types of alloys which are essential to the efficient design of missile components and also of modern thermo power plants.

(Text):

In reference to these and other research projects in the mines branch I should like to direct your attention to certain of the conclusions reached by the standing committee on mines, forests and waters, and I quote:

> The research in this branch should be concentrated on the long range projects. The many and varied problems requiring immediate research should not continue to engage 90 per cent, as it does now, of the resources of this branch. This "first-aid" research should be assumed by private industry. This would free branch resources to deal with such important problems, requiring much research, as developing new alloys to meet the needs, for instance, of supersonic flight, extraction of heavy oils (tar sands) etc.

Speaking at the annual convention of the prospectors and developers association in Toronto on March 3 last Dr. van Steenburgh, our director general of scientific services, stated:

> If a change of emphasis is made—

From applied to basic research, that is.

—it will mean that industry will need to either undertake more of its own applied research or to have it done by provincial research councils or by private research organizations. What is needed is a strengthening of the provincial research councils; that and the establishment of a few research institutes similar in nature to those organized in the United States.

Quoting further from his remarks, he stated:

—to do this would require sizeable funds to provide the initial buildings and equipment. In the United States, memorial bequests from wealthy patrons have been largely instrumental in solving the problem. In other countries it is being solved by co-operative arrangements between government and industry, a policy similar in some respects to that followed in establishing the provincial research councils.

Actually the choice seems to be between doing more and more basic and long term research at the government level and in the universities, or allowing Canada to lag in these fields of research to a dangerous degree. And here I should explain that I am not thinking simply in terms of research as it relates to the activities of my department, but of research in general.

We cannot, of course, allow our basic and long term research to lag to a dangerous degree. That, as I am sure hon. members will agree, could prove to be costly indeed, and not in terms of money alone. The only alternative appears to be for a much greater concentration of effort on basic and long term research at the government level. The question is, how can this be brought about?

Excellent research is being done by some of the large mining companies in Canada, but this is far from enough. To me the answer, in part at least, is for industry to give serious thought to the establishment of a research organization similar, for instance, to the Battelle institute in the United States. My suggestion is that industry provide the funds to establish such institutions, and perhaps also to finance the initial stages of their operations. The funds could be provided in different ways; possibly, for instance, in the form of contributions by individual companies or through such organizations as the Canadian metal mining association or the prospectors and developers association. If industry were to take such action it is possible that the federal government, with the consent of parliament, would be willing to either match the contributions from industry or at least contribute substantially to the establishment of such research institutions.

In so far as my own department is concerned, Mr. Chairman, their establishment, coupled with any enlargement of the facilities of the provincial research councils, would mean that we could devote a much greater proportion of our effort to basic and long term research, say 60 to 70 per cent of it or more. It would not mean, nor indeed would it be desirable, that we would discontinue research on problems of immediate interest to industry. Continuity of effort is an essential factor in work on these problems, and there could be no guarantee of such continuity in a research institute concerned not only with investigations bearing on mineral development but with the whole broad field of industrial research. Besides, much of our work is of benefit chiefly to small enterprises that are unable to finance or undertake their own research, and it is in the interests of the country as a whole that our facilities be used to aid them. It is important also that we continue our work on problems that are of concern to industry as a whole or to major segments of it. An example of this is the work of our mines branch on the economic processing of low grade ores. Usually the results of such work are of benefit to a number of companies rather than to a single company.

However, there are many time-consuming tests and investigations and numerous research problems that I am sure could be handled efficiently by organizations like the research institutes I have suggested should be established. We would then be free to devote a much greater proportion of our time to basic and long term research, and at the same time maintain the essential services to industry.

Turning now to our mineral industry, let us take a brief look at the status of the industry today in the Canadian economy and at the prospects it has in store. First, Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw your attention to the almost meteoric growth of our mineral industry during these post-war years. We are all aware that the industry has recorded remarkable expansion, but I venture to say that few of us realize that it has outstripped even the Canadian economy in rate of growth.

In its recent report the standing committee on mines, forests and waters drew attention to this fact. It pointed out that between 1947 and 1957 the index of physical volume of mineral production increased by 173 per cent while that of industry as a whole increased by 51 per cent.

We can gain an even better picture by using as our yardstick our gross national product at market prices. In 1946 it stood at $12 billion. By 1957 it has soared to $30 billion, an increase of 150 per cent.

At the same time the value of our mineral production quadrupled from $500 million to $2 billion, an increase of 300 per cent. And even more astonishing is the fact, Mr. Chairman, that not only has the mineral industry outstripped the Canadian economy in rate of growth but, with the exception of construction, it has recorded a relative growth greater than that of any of Canada's other productive industries, including manufacturing, agriculture and lumbering.

Let me pause to illustrate this. Using 1946 as a base, we find that construction heads the list with a remarkable increase of 800 per cent. The mineral industry is second with a 320 per cent increase. Manufacturing, by far the greatest in volume, shows a rate of expansion of 177 per cent, and agriculture increased only 10 per cent.

Last year the mineral industry suffered its first setback since the close of world war II, but even at that the value of our mineral production at $2.1 billion was only 3 per cent below the all-time record of the preceding year. Our mineral industry is, as hon. members know, a major world supplier of metals and minerals and, as such, it felt the full impact of the weakening of world mineral markets and the twin evils of overproduction and price declines. Consequently the value of output of our principal base metals, copper, nickel, lead and zinc, as well as of iron ore, asbestos and crude petroleum, declined sharply.

Contributing to this setback were the discontinuation of the stockpiling program in the United States and the subsequent release of additional supplies of metals for industrial use; the imposition by that country of import quotas on lead and zinc, and of voluntary, followed by mandatory import restrictions on crude oil entering the mid-continent and western United States. These restrictions on oil, as you know, have since been lifted.

Over and above these difficulties, our mineral industry has faced increasing competition for world markets from Russia, particularly in asbestos, which is our chief industrial mineral. Partly as a result of this competition, our output of asbestos dropped off 10 per cent last year from the all-time high of over a million tons recorded in 1957.

You can readily see then, Mr. Chairman, that the over-all situation has not been conducive to the expenditure of large sums of money on exploration. Consequently in the past year or so there has been less activity in diamond drilling, less geophysical work, fewer claims staked, and less surface prospecting than in many a year. Lately, however, the picture has brightened. The general industrial pick-up, particularly in the United States, has already had a stimulating effect on the mining industry. Demand is strengthening, prices are improving and a general feeling of optimism pervades the industry.

A development of great significance to the industry and to the whole Canadian economy is the increasing trend toward the processing of ores and their products here in Canada. This is seen in recent company announcements which include the proposed construction of a $20 million to $25 million nickel refinery in northern Manitoba and an iron smelter at Kimberley, British Columbia. The construction of the iron smelter is the first stage in a $20 million project planned to produce pig iron, steel ingots, and rolled steel products to serve the rapidly growing markets of our western provinces. Industry is also considering again the construction of a zinc refinery in eastern Canada. At present we are shipping the zinc concentrates that we produce in eastern Canada to the United States and to European countries for refining, but mostly to the central and northeastern states.

Looking ahead, the prospects for our mineral industry are good. The effect of the general industrial pick-up, which has already made itself felt on the industry, gives every indication of continuing. Unemployment has dropped. Construction activity is reaching new levels, and markets show signs of continuing to strengthen. Moreover, populations round the world continue to grow, steadily increasing the potential consumption of metals.

(Translation):

That we in Canada possess huge mineral resources is well known. On the more immediate mineral horizon, we have several good prospects. These are, for instance, the rich copper and zinc deposits which have come to light in the Mattagami-Frotet lake area of western Quebec; the largely undeveloped copper and gold Chibougamau area; the great reserves of iron ore in Quebec and in Ontario, especially, either under development or awaiting development; and the extensive lead-zinc deposits of northeastern New Brunswick and at Pine Point in Northwest Territories.

These are only a few. Consider, too, the great unexplored areas of our northland where a handful of discoveries has even now indicated the richness of resources there, awaiting exploration and development.

Truly, we in Canada, have the wealth and the opportunities. It is up to us to make the most of both.

(Text):

I am certain, Mr. Chairman, the hon. members will agree that my department has a vital role to play in the development of this wealth and in providing these opportunities. I am, therefore, confident that the committee will see fit to approve the $4,511,783 increase we are requesting for 1959-60, over the amount of $32,560,842 that we asked for in 1958-59.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys for this fiscal year were given a searching consideration at the standing committee of mines, forests and waters. Thirteen sittings of the committee were devoted to the study of this department's estimates. The directors of the various divisions of the department as well as the officials of the dominion coal board graciously answered the questions put to them by the members of the committee and they provided us with a lot of most useful information.

In our inquiries into all the items under this department we were able to appreciate that it is one of the best organized departments and that its staff is most competent. And at this time I would like to congratulate warmly all the directors, their assistants, their help, in short all those who belong to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys for the good work they are performing in the interest of the increasing development of our natural resources.

Since we have already devoted quite a long time to the consideration of these estimates in the standing committee of mines, forests and waters, and in view also of the fact that we have obtained in that committee all the information required, I assume that this committee does not intend to review each item in all its details. As far as I am concerned, I intend to be as brief as possible. My remarks will be along the line followed by the minister, that is to say I intend to speak firstly about the report which was tabled in the house on May 26 last, and then I would like to say a few words about the mining industry itself and point out, as did the minister, the problems and difficulties prevailing in this industry at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, while the report from the committee includes perhaps a few comments which might seem a little too strong, it contains many useful recommendations, and I feel that they will meet with the approval of all hon. members who sat on that committee. I was delighted to hear the minister say this morning that most of those recommendations would be carried out. Personally, I support most of them for I have always urged that something be done to step up the work of the department, and that it be voted all the funds it requires.

[Mr. Comtois.]

The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, with its present branches, was set up in the late fall of 1949 and put in operation some weeks later, on the 18th of January 1950, to be exact.

It has kept growing ever since. Each year it has taken on more staff and its budget allotment has increased considerably. In fact its net total estimated expenditure for the current fiscal year runs over $48 million.

Mr. Chairman, as a result, first, of mining activities in areas of known economic importance, especially since world war II, second, of the increased development rate of mineral resources throughout the country, especially during the period 1950 to 1958, and finally, of expanded prospecting and exploration in the northern regions of the provinces and in the territories, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has had so much to do that, while it provided for all the immediate needs of industry, it found it practically impossible to spearhead development in all fields and throughout the country.

If we want to step up the economic development of Canadian mineral ressources and to provide more efficient services to the mining industry, we shall clearly have to attach more and more importance to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

For that purpose, the report of the committee on mines, forests and waters includes several useful recommendations which, in my opinion, the government should not fail to act upon.

Thus, it is obvious that the department should take on more staff. From 1950 to 1959, the number of employees rose from 1725 to 3761, or rather 3785, as the minister indicated this morning; that represents an increase of 118 per cent in ten years, or an average annual increase of 11.8 per cent. Considering the amount of work to be done, and if we want the department at least to maintain the high standards of efficiency it has reached in the last decade, the committee's recommendation that the number of employees be increased from 3761 or 3885 to 5200, in the next five years, is certainly not unrealistic, for it represents an annual increase of only 7.6 per cent.

But increased staff also means increased expenditures and, there again, I repeat—if the government wishes to follow up that recommendation of the committee, and I believe it is bound to do so—it will have to agree to substantially higher appropriations.

I said a moment ago that the department's total estimated expenditures for this year were about $48 million. If we deduct the amounts earmarked for gold mining assistance under the act, and those provided under various items for the dominion coal board, total expenditures, which reached $11 million in 1950, have now reached $24.5 million, i.e. an increase of 123 per cent in the last ten years. This is an average yearly increase of 12.3 per cent. I imagine that if the committee's recommendations are followed up, the department's total estimates will reach at least $60 million in 1964.

Another important recommendation contained in the report of the committee deals with research activity. On that point again I was very happy to hear, or rather to notice this morning, that a good part of the minister's statement dealt with research undertaken by his department and told us of his intention to introduce a bill which might meet the approval of all concerned.

The mines branch of the department was established in 1907 under the Geology and Mines Act. It was meant as a research organization, and indeed, since its establishment, it has kept dealing especially with technical and scientific studies more particularly related to the development and the efficient and economic use of our considerable mineral resources. Those are the terms of reference of this branch, as defined in the report of the department for the year 1957.

According to the evidence given by high officials of the mines branch, it is essential that basic research take a more prominent place in Canada's mining industry. We were told that specialized research with regard to the treatment of complex ore were to be intensified, as such research would be of benefit to the country five or ten years hence. Lastly, we were told that the need or necessity of basic research was conditioned by several factors. There was reference, among other things, to the requirements of up-to-date development methods which make for increased production and better quality, and of the ever growing mining of low-grade, complex or refractory ore, etc.

It was as a result of this evidence that the committee recommended that the mines branch research should concentrate on long term development, that preliminary research be made by private industry and, finally, that private industry should take on a substantial share of the research now carried out by the mines branch.

In theory, Mr. Chairman, those recommendations may seem logical but, to my mind, in practice they are not. It is true that some Canadian mining concerns may conduct research work to satisfy the greater part of their needs; the fact remains that most Canadian mining companies simply cannot undertake large scale research. In the first place, they lack the necessary funds and, more important, they lack and are unable to obtain a competent staff to conduct this work.

I think that the solution suggested this morning by the hon. minister should be seriously considered. I for my part, think his proposal is logical and I am sure that, if it were put into practice, the research division of his department and private companies, might be satisfied because the Canadian mining industry is aware of existing conditions, and intends to co-operate as far as possible with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. This has been clearly established in the committee by the branch director, Dr. Convey, when he was giving evidence, and I hope the committee will bear with me if I quote some of the information that Dr. Convey has been kind enough to give us and which can be found on page 296 of the English text, no. 12. This is what Dr. Convey said:

> I will say this, that over the past 10 years Canadian industry has attempted to do some of their own research, but they seem to reach a stage in which they lack the personnel they are wanting, and the facilities, and that is when we come into co-operation with them. However, there are quite a few firms who are attempting to solve a lot of their own problems.

And Dr. Convey went on to say as follows:

> Once we undertake a problem the company becomes more interested, and eventually what happens is that they go back home and do a lot of their own homework; and we co-ordinate this program in such a fashion that we literally demand that they become more than a sleeping participant.

Mr. Chairman, let the staff of this division be increased, let the division recruit the scientists and technicians it may require, and here I am referring to the mines division of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, let it get the necessary equipment, let it have the necessary sampling plants and laboratories. That is basic, and I am all for it.

However it is definitely necessary that this division keep co-operating with industry and help industry solve the many and various problems which call for immediate research. Of course, Mr. Chairman, we must encourage private industry by every means possible to undertake a much greater share of preliminary research here in Canada.

Personally, I would be very happy if the department, in co-operation with mining companies, were to set up a laboratory such as the one operated in the United States, by the Battelle research institution, which the minister has mentioned. In my view, this would be a great step forward. However, it is imperative that in the meantime, the mines branch should go on supplying all the data that most of our mining companies cannot get for themselves. If we want our industry to keep expanding, it is essential that the department give continued help to mining companies.

At this point, I should like to put on the record the remarks, made by Dr. Convey at a meeting of the standing committee on mines, forests and waters, about research and the possibility of setting the pace. Here is what Dr. Convey said, as recorded on page 298 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the standing committee on mines, forests and waters, and I quote:

> Through our efforts, we hope to stimulate our own industry to look after themselves, and our hope is that we can look to the day when we in the government laboratories can attend to those long-term research propositions which will be of benefit to the whole industry, and not to a particular part of industry.

I fully agree with these remarks of Dr. Convey. A little farther down, he added:

> I have no doubt in my mind that if we can set the pace, industry will follow along.

Mr. Chairman, about this matter of giving leadership, I strongly urge the minister to carry out the recommendation put forward by the mines branch to the effect that an annual grant be established under his department, to encourage some bright university graduates—and here I am quoting the exact words used by Dr. Convey in the committee on mines, forests and waters:

> —in order to try and encourage, at least in one field, some bright university graduates to enter the field of mining research.

Mr. Chairman, summing up my remarks concerning the report that was published following the discussions in the standing committee on mines, forests and waters, may I point out that I am in full agreement with those who hope the department will play a leading role in the development of our natural resources. If the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is to retain the prestige it has acquired since it came into being, the government will of course have to give serious consideration to the provision of necessary funds, as well as of staff and facilities.

While the mining industry has developed tremendously since world war II—and I do not propose to go over the history of the development of that industry since then, because that I am sure that the minister has given a true and satisfactory summary this morning—mining is now facing certain difficulties. I do not want to magnify those difficulties, as I don't want to be pessimistic. I am rather optimistic as far as that industry is concerned. However, mining naturally feels the effects of the present slowdown in all branches of the Canadian economy. Metal prices have deteriorated, there has been overproduction, our friends to the south have clamped export restrictions on us, the industry is feeling the effects of inflation, and the rate of the exchange of the Canadian dollar is much too high, I believe.

In 1958 for the first time in many years, the total value of mineral production in Canada has declined. By the end of 1957, and at the beginning of 1958, prices of certain metals like copper, zinc and lead took such a drop that we wondered for a time, and rightly so, whether many mines would not be forced to close down. In fact, there has been a rather marked slow-down in development, prospecting and exploration.

The average price of copper in 1958 was 25.7 cents a pound, 13 per cent less than in 1957. Quite recently—and we are quite happy about it—the average price reached 31.5 cents a pound, but unfortunately, those last few weeks, it has dropped again to about 30 cents a pound. I hope we can look forward to the time when it will be possible to get a firm price for that metal, as well as for the others.

Prices of lead and zinc are low, and it is quite possible that they will stay low for quite a while yet.

Another very important problem with which the industry is now faced—the minister dealt with the matter a few moments ago—is that of American stockpiling of strategic metals. The possible liquidation even of a small part of those stocks, is a continuing threat to the industry. Let us hope that the United States government will transfer those reserves to stockpiles already considered as national reserves, and will give us the assurance that those reserves will not be marketed, except in case of extreme urgency.

It is probably the marketing of certain quantities, however small, of those stocks of strategic metals, which is causing fluctuations on the copper market. The price of copper is up one day and down the next. I hope that this matter will be settled once and for all, for the benefit of the industry.

The mining industry, in common with our whole economy, feels the continued inflationary pressures, which are a serious danger to them. Competition for world markets is keener than it ever was. As I mentioned on a previous occasion several ore-producing countries where wages and production costs are often merely a fraction of those in Canada, are developing their own resources at a great pace.

Again, Mr. Chairman—and it would be well to consider this—we must always remember that the Canadian mining industry depends on our export trade, and that our mineral resources are an asset only to the extent that they are developed, produced and marketed. Otherwise, they are only worthless rock. This self-evident truth should not be ignored.

Another problem which must never be overlooked is that of uranium. I do not intend to dwell on this subject, since it was dealt with yesterday, and I believe the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) spelled out what has to be done in that regard. I only hope the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) will see to it that the Leader of the Opposition's recommendations made in the house yesterday will be followed up.

If the mining industry is now labouring under certain difficulties, as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce indicated, I believe future possibilities are rather encouraging.

In the last decade—and that is very interesting—world consumption of metals has increased considerably. In that same period, world consumption of copper, for instance, has increased by a million tons, or 35 per cent. As the standard of living rises in under-developed countries, it will certainly promote increased use of base metals.

Therefore, Canada is bound to get a growing share of the expanding world demand for metals, and Canadian producers can look with confidence to the long term market prospects.

Canadian mining concerns hope and expect to remain the main suppliers of metals of all kinds on the United States market, for generations to come, and in ever increasing volumes.

However, in the meantime, we have some responsibilities. Everything should be done to keep the industry in top condition. Steps should be taken to ensure the highest possible level of employment in the mines, and we must see that Canadian producers are not forced to beneficiate their ore, and thus reduce the life of their mines. This is a most important point. If companies are forced to mine higher grade ores, it could shorten the life of the mines.

We must encourage prospecting and exploration by all possible means. We have the technical know-how and I cannot see why our country could not be at the forefront in that field. It is a branch of our economy which must remain sound and strong.

Mr. Chairman, I have taken quite an interest in the comments that the minister made this morning. His statement, while somewhat long, was genuinely interesting and contained several very practical ideas. Personally, I am interested in mining industry, I want it to keep on growing and, with the help of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, I am sure that we will reach that goal.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: While I can agree with the previous speaker that the committee on mines, forests and waters went through the estimates of this department very thoroughly, I do not take exactly the same view of the report that either he or the minister has taken.

I certainly do not intend, and I do not think anyone else in our party intends, to go into very much detail, because I think we all appreciate that the review made by the committee was very complete. But I should like to point out that unlike the work done on forestry later, in which the concentration was upon outside witnesses rather than anything else to bring us information, the information we had on the main estimates of the department came largely from the officials, and I must give those officials credit for being so frank and forthright.

The report presented represents a stunning indictment of government policy and lack of ministerial leadership in the last number of years. I do not know that we can absolve even the present minister. I wish to read what is perhaps the most critical section of the committee report, which refers to the mines branch:

> 83. The information elicited on the mines branch was depressing. The branch does not have the funds for the staff it needs to carry out the work it should do and wants to do.

About ten points are listed concerning the mines branch, which indicate the situation has not been good. There is no use labouring the point. We should watch this department perhaps more closely than any other department of government in the next year or two.

Parliamentary committees have now reviewed most departments of government, and no department to my knowledge was raked over the coals to the extent this department was in terms of not fulfilling the functions it was designed to fulfil. This is a more critical report even than that tabled yesterday on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, in some respects, and I hope the minister and his deputy appreciate the seriousness of the criticisms contained therein. You cannot find much flattering in the report about the work the department has done. As I said, the information that led to the criticism came from the officials themselves, which is a great mark in their favour. It is an indication that they know what they would like to do and where they would like to go. It seemed to me to suggest a genuine lack of ministerial leadership.

In the little game that is played in this chamber it is customary for questions of this kind to be tossed back and forth between the government and the opposition, each disclaiming responsibility. I helped prepare the report, and it is clear that most of the responsibility rests with the previous government for letting this department fall behind in the obligations it should have been pursuing.

One recommendation not mentioned by the previous speaker refers to the work of the geographical branch in paragraph 93, referring to land use. A big conservation conference is planned for 1960. If we are going to go in for more and better forestry and land use this branch of the department is going to have to make provision for greater and more detailed surveys.

I am always pleased when I can compliment someone in Ontario, and we have in this province a group very much interested in land use. Last year they held a conference in the Niagara peninsula and went into the whole question of cost benefit studies and land use in this region, where some of the finest agricultural soil in the country is going out of crop production because of industrial expansion. Soil experts, geographers, foresters, engineers and people interested in the natural topography of Canada in its many facets agree that we have to come to grips with this problem. We look forward to this forthcoming conference and hope the department and especially the geographical branch will plan on making a vital contribution to its success. Perhaps later the minister will give us an indication of the contribution that will be made.

I wish now to refer to gold mining assistance. Following remarks I made on this subject last year the Northern Miner, a puff sheet well known in the mining trade, which exploits stocks and gives the latest gossip in the trade, severely took me to task for calling into question the integrity of mining companies. They stated that I was completely wrong in my understanding of the situation with respect to gold mining assistance. The paper is entitled to its views, and I mention it only because I propose to bring up the same points now.

Under section 6 (a) of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act inspectors of the department have the right to go and inspect mine workings. Last February 3 the minister filed an answer to questions of mine as reported at page 666 of Hansard of that date. The questions were as follows:

> 1. How many times and in what years before 1958 did inspection engineers of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys use the powers given under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act (R.S. 1952; c. 95) section 6, subsection (a) "to enter upon and examine the mine from which the gold in respect of which the payment is to be made is produced" in so far as the following mines are concerned—

A list then appeared of Ontario mines in receipt of assistance. I continue:

> 2. On any of such kind of inspections were drawings and plans of the workings checked with the actual workings?
> 3. If so, on what occasions?

The answers read as follows:

1. An inspection engineer from the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys carried out an annual inspection, under the provisions of section 6 of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, of the mines listed, for each of the years from 1948 to 1957 inclusive. In general, the inspections did not include an examination of the underground workings.

2. No.

3. Not applicable.

We have been sitting in the broadcasting committee where the Conservative members in particular have expressed themselves as terribly keen on getting at the roots of all these subsidies. We have to make sure the C.B.C. is not wasting our money; we are really going to go into the thing thoroughly. In this instance we are giving millions of dollars to private corporations under federal legislation, and the inspectors of this department do not even bother to examine the underground workings of the mines. They go into the offices, that is all.

This is not a case of my raising questions about the integrity of corporations. If we believe that the spending of public money should be checked to see that we get value for it, then it is up to those inspectors to do something more than just to walk into the mine office. I also understand from the information I received from the department that these inspectors are on the property for maybe half a day; they just visit around.

How in the name of all that is sane can you have any kind of check of millions spent in that way if you just have a fellow drop in for a day? Surely if the Conservative members of this house are going to be suspicious at all times of government subsidies that are going out to crown corporations, then I think they have, and I think the minister needs, to adopt a bit of suspicion toward companies that are receiving this money. It seems to me this is the kind of consistency we should have.

I should like to know from the minister why these inspectors do not do much more checking of those companies. We gave them examples last year of a couple of mines that we were suspicious of in one particular field. The miners with whom I happen to have a fair amount of contact tell me that stopes are cemented up, that various rich veins are just passed by while the company goes on to mine something of a lower grade. I know in this whole question of mining different grades there is a great deal of leeway left open to the mine officials. It is a complicated procedure. But I would feel much better about these millions being poured into these gold mines if we knew the inspectors were going to run a real check on them. A man who spends half a day on a property and does not even go underground is not an inspector; he is just a travelling salesman handing out money. I suggest to the minister that there should be a more thorough inspection.

There is another aspect of the emergency gold mining assistance that bothers me and perhaps some other members of the house, and that is the trend in the gold mining industry to consolidate and move toward monopoly. For example there is one syndicate, the Little Long Lac syndicate, that in the last couple of years has been gobbling up a whole group of mines. Among the mines, as an example, was MacLeod-Cockshutt. A number of people in my particular region were small share holders in that mine, which was a fairly sound one, a low-cost producer. It had no tremendous future, but it was paying regular dividends, and the actual share value of the stock was not particularly high.

Here were people—and I can give some other instances—who had very low incomes, people who were pensioned off, who were counting on these dividends. What has happened with this monopoly trend type of thing? We know this is financed by big men in the market who are able to play the thing, but for the little person it is pretty tough. They took over without having to go to the trouble of purchasing all the shares; they took over many of these smaller companies, and consolidated the operations. I suppose they may be making them more efficient; they certainly have more money to provide for further exploration and maybe to develop this particular mine's properties. But what has happened in these particular cases is that the dividends almost always stop.

In so far as Little Long Lac is concerned, that is so. The smaller shareholder has no protection; he, of course, has no real voice in the shareholders' meetings. This is one of the laughs about the democracy of a company set-up; the small shareholder is just a joke. He can only say this. He had shares in this mine which were bringing him some dividends. All of a sudden the mine is taken over by a bigger corporation and the dividends stop, but the emergency gold mining assistance goes right on.

In the MacLeod-Cockshutt case, as I remember it, the dividend that was paid for a number of years almost equalled what that mine was getting from the government. Well, the dividend stops but the emergency gold mining assistance goes right along. How can you blame the small stockholder, the small investor, for feeling that in effect in these circumstances the government is subsidizing with emergency gold mining assistance a group that is extending its tentacles to cover a great deal of the mining world.

I am neither an expert nor a critic of the building up of these large corporations that control a number of mines. I tend to distrust them, though I know there are a number of socialist economists who say it is nothing more than a natural trend that is going to lead to a new corporate structure that is largely going to be in government hands. But without getting into the inevitability of those developments, here is a case where a government subsidy is going to mines and those mines are in this position. It looks as though in the years ahead they will not be paying any dividends, but that the increment value will come to the people who own large blocks of stock in the holding group as a whole.

Last year my hon. friend from Timiskaming raised a point. He wanted to make a change in the act which would force the mines to give a certain percentage of the emergency gold mining assistance to their employees. I still think there is something valid in that point, but I would like to ask the minister a question on this other point. Does he consider it fair, or does he think he can do anything about this situation, where several hundred thousands of dollars will go to a mine that should be a going operation with that assistance, and nothing ever gets to the shareholders? I think it is a most questionable operation. If those mines are kept going only in terms of emergency gold mining assistance I think we need to re-examine the monopoly conditions that are developing in that gold mining industry.

I know the minister will probably say that this is something for the Minister of Justice and the combines investigation branch, but I suggest to him that it is also something for him, because it certainly is an irony that millions of dollars of the government's money are spent in keeping those gold mines going. The communities are all behind it. This is one of the ironies. You have the community people, the unions, the service clubs and everybody else out beating the drum for the mining companies because they want to keep the mines going, they want to keep them alive; but what is actually happening to the money in some of these cases, and especially in the Little Long Lac case?

That, Mr. Chairman, covers what I wanted to say on emergency gold mining assistance, the question of inspection and the question of the failure of some of these companies to carry on the practices of the past. That is the real point of the monopoly of the big holding company structure. I hope that next year when the minister appears with his estimates we will be able to say, he has put on an excellent show in carrying out the recommendations that were made by the committee. I certainly hope that if the committee sits again the officials of the department will display the same candour and honesty they displayed this year.

I do not mean to say there was anything odd about their candour and honesty, but I certainly feel that, much more than any other government officials I have ever heard giving evidence, they tried to be as frank and as blunt as possible, and for that they are surely to be commended. I hope the minister will remember that the past policy of the department can be much criticized for creating a despondent state throughout the department, and that he will make sure that such criticisms will never need to be made again, at least in his time in this particular department.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why do we not go right on through the lunch hour?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, it is one o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): I remind hon. members that the committee meets again at two o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Southam: I should like to ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys if he would mind outlining the ground-water survey program that his department is conducting for Saskatchewan. It is generally recognized that Saskatchewan on the average is one of the most arid regions in Canada and there is a pressing need for water for industrial and domestic uses in our province, particularly in the rural areas. I feel there is definitely an urgent need to expand and accelerate this ground-water survey program. Government policy in the matter is of particular interest to many of our hundreds of towns and villages in Saskatchewan which are looking for a source of water for waterworks and sewage disposal systems. I should like to have a comment on this particular problem, if I may.

Mr. Comtois: In answer to the question of the hon. member for Moose Mountain may I say that beginning this year the geological survey is fielding a two-man ground-water survey party in the Saskatoon area. This year's survey will consist largely of groundwater inventory work under the direction of Mr. A. Toth. The area of operation will be expanded to cover that part of the populated plains region not already covered by groundwater surveys. This will eventually involve mapping an area of roughly 25,000 square miles. This work has been specifically requested by the provincial authorities. It is hoped that this inventory survey work can be expanded as additional survey positions become available. The provincial authorities are willing to supply the summer assistants or additional labour to aid the work of the geological survey, provided the survey can and will supply the geologists to supervise the work. I hope this answer satisfies the hon. member.

Mr. Martel: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a few words. I do not want to take up too much of the committee's time, but before the first vote of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is carried, I would like to make a few remarks. They will be very brief, because in his remark this morning the minister covered the subject very well indeed.

I am taking this opportunity of congratulating the minister for the marked interest he has taken, since he took office, in problems of special concern to his department.

I also support the remarks of the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) with regard to departmental senior officials who, unquestionably, are very conscientious, deeply interested in mining and particularly anxious to assist that industry and prospectors of new mineral deposits throughout Canada.

I would also like to tell the minister how much we appreciated his visit, in our district last autumn, when he came to look at the mines in western Quebec, to gather first-hand information on the conditions and future requirements of the mines. I therefore take this opportunity to tell him that we all have pleasant memories of his visit and I hope that he too will remember with pleasure the proverbial hospitality of people in western Quebec.

And now, I should like to offer to the minister a suggestion with regard to geological surveys in my area, more particularly in the riding of Chapleau, which I have the honour to represent in this house.

I know, for instance, that a good many aeromagnetic surveys have been carried out through his department in western Quebec for the past few years, and they are very important, indeed. They supply very useful information not only to mining companies but to prospectors and to anyone interested in mining development, either in western Quebec—an area of particular interest to me personally—or anywhere else in this country where such surveys are taking place.

The minister told us this morning that similar surveys are being carried out in some districts of northern Ontario, near the Manitoba boundary, and in various other places in this country. However, in addition to those aeromagnetic surveys, I think it would be well to undertake other and more detailed geological surveys in various areas and, more particularly in the district of lakes Kitchigama, Mattagami, Waswanipi, Bachelor and Opawica, to mention a few names that occur to me. Those lakes are located along what is called a mineralized zone, a mining zone, in the central area of the constituency of Chapleau, about midway between the present settlements along the railway line, and James bay, farther north. No geological survey has been made along that mineralized zone for at least 20 years.

As I said earlier, certain aeromagnetic surveys were made there, but no detailed geological survey. In my opinion, those geological surveys would be quite useful, not only to prospectors, but to mining companies. I believe very useful data could be got from the mining companies now operating in that area. Some of them have gone in for diamond-drilling on a rather large scale, especially in the last couple of years. Those borings are uncovering geological data which would indeed be worth compiling for use in drawing more detailed maps for prospectors and mining companies. To my knowledge, the last detailed geological maps of that region which have been published are known as the maps of Mattagami and eastern and western Chibougamau region. More detailed maps of that region have not been made for more than 20 years.

The provincial department of mines has made a few, but I believe the federal government would do well to consider the matter, so as to promote development of Canada's mining resources. The government should also undertake to have more detailed geological maps published, not only of the regions I just referred to, but also of new mining regions where necessary.

Mr. Chairman, before closing my remarks, may I point out to the house that the mining region to which I have just referred is a promising one, as pointed out by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys in his statement this morning. Again, quite recently, a new discovery was made at Opawica lake, along that mineralized zone located between Mattagami lake and the Chibougamau region. I am convinced that the region is one of the most important in this country.

(Text):

Mr. Peters: Before lunch the hon. member for Port Arthur again raised this problem of emergency gold mining assistance and some of the charges and countercharges that have been made in regard to this matter over the past number of years. It might have been brought to the attention of the committee that last year when this question of emergency gold mining assistance was raised, several of us who represent mining areas had unkind things to say about some of the activities of some of the mines. I am quite satisfied with some of the reports that appeared at that time, one of which was carried in the Northern Miner, which is a mine publication, and we know what to expect from such publications.

This newspaper went on to say that I have had some experience in mines and I should not be allowed to make these statements, that these statements should not go unchallenged. They said I should not take advantage of the fact I am a member of parliament to make these charges. Well, Mr. Chairman, I agree with what was said. I agree with what the Northern Miner said, that I should not make these charges without being able to do something about them. I therefore telephoned at my own expense to Timmins, where I worked before, and communicated with several people in the mining industry with whom I had worked and whose word I could accept. I asked them to make inquiries and give me the numbers and levels of the stopes of two of the major mines in this area that were closed off and used only on rare occasions to supplement the grade of ore from that mine. I received a telegram containing this information which I communicated to the department. I was informed at that time that the department did not have any inspectors who had checked the stopes; they did not know whether they were operating or not operating, so they were not in a position to check this information.

Personally I do not intend to make a fuss about it this year. Unfortunately we are faced with a situation where we are working against a deadline. Everybody is very anxious to go home, so I would not want to go into this matter at great length at this time. I am convinced also that the department has not done anything about it as yet, and I am only referring to this matter again so the department will have a look at this particular problem. Then next year, when we have these estimates before us, I should like to know exactly what stopes are being mined in the various mines; what is the condition of the reserves; where the reserves are, and we would like to have not only the blueprints of those particular stopes but we would like to have an inspector go into the mine on regular occasions and inspect the workings to see if, in fact, these operations are being conducted. Then if I give information to the minister that number such and such a stope in such and such a level is not being operated because of the high grade ore in that stope, the minister will be in a position to send an inspector there immediately to check on the situation and take action under the powers the minister is given by the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

I believe that in so far as every department is concerned, the Canadian National Railways, T.C.A., C.B.C. and all the other departments this government controls, we must—I agree with the Conservative members who have been crying very loudly—have some check on these organizations that come under the control of parliament. I believe also that hon. members would support me in saying that we must have some control over these large mining companies that have been using unsatisfactory methods in operating their mines.

At the time I made these complaints the department told me that this was good housekeeping practice. It may be from the mine's point of view very good housekeeping practice. I can see the reason for it. As was pointed out to me not long ago, there are no great fluctuations in most of these mines. I think any person who has knowledge of mining operations knows that this does not happen; it is a condition that is created. Normally you would find probably three really good veins, and if at the same time you were mining a low grade vein your millheads might go away up. In most of the mines this does not happen. It does not happen because they sweeten up the low grade ore with high grade ore.

I suggest this may be very good housekeeping practice but, Mr. Chairman, this was not the purpose in raising the matter.

We made charges and I repeat them, that some of these mines have been low grading certain stopes, and this is contrary to the effective operation and the avowed purpose of emergency gold mining assistance.

I have the largest gold mine in America in my riding and, incidentally, it gets no assistance whatever from the government. On behalf of those people who depend on mines that are getting emergency gold mining assistance, we thank the minister for having increased the subsidy to the mines. Obviously this assistance must be reflected in the wages that are paid and in the conditions that exist in these communities, because these communities are entirely dependent upon this industry for their support.

We have asked in the past, at least some of us in this group—this may not come within the purview of the minister—that consideration be given to using some emergency gold mining assistance to help those areas that are completely dependent on gold mines in establishing secondary industries. No matter how long we continue to pay this form of subsidy to these gold mines, there will come a day when they will be completely mined out.

While it is true, from Canada's point of view, that new mining fields will be found and new mines opened up, the people in the existing gold mining communities depend on this government, now through emergency gold mining assistance and in future through some other form of assistance, to help them transfer their economy from total dependence on gold mining to secondary industry. Some of these communities have existed for 30 or 40 years, and it seems to me the time has now come when we should be looking very carefully at what is going to happen in the future.

This is all the more important when we remember that this act still has the word "emergency" in its title. It is not considered to be a permanent measure. We used to pass it every year until we gave it these additional three years of life. We are going to be faced again, the day it expires, with having to do something in that field. I suggest that the minister give very serious consideration to devising some other use for the amount of money the government is paying so we may be able, through this assistance, to eliminate the need for emergency gold mining assistance. In my opinion this can only be accomplished if we can introduce secondary industries into those areas.

Perhaps this point does not come within the jurisdiction of the minister, but if the minister could convince his colleagues that we should have an increase in the price of gold I think a great deal of argument could be put forward for this proposition. It has not been, in the past, my practice to argue for an increase in the price of gold, for one or two very good reasons, the first being that Canada has supported the international monetary fund which has supported the sale of gold at a fixed price. I am aware also of the fact that the United States is one of the largest consumers of gold because, although we are not on the gold standard, gold is used to back our currency, its use in currency is endorsed by congress, and the amount of gold is set by the constitution.

Despite all these things, it also has a relationship to the price of real estate and the value of commodities. As inflation continues to increase, the arguments grow, and they are dramatized for an increase in the price of gold and a return to solid the backing of our currency by gold. This is a matter to which the minister can give consideration. I think he can urge the Minister of Finance to again put forward the argument in the international monetary fund and in our negotiations with the United States, pushing and working toward a higher price for gold.

This, I should like to point out, will not only solve the problem of emergency gold mining assistance, but it will solve the problem of expanding our production of gold very rapidly. I think there are few members here who have not at one time or another received a piece of information from one or more mining companies or mining promoters that has pointed out that if certain conditions are met—and one of them in an increase in the price of gold—the property they are offerring to you at 2 or 3 cents a share will be worth $15 or $20. I think it is quite obvious to everyone that an increase in the price of gold will stimulate a vast increase in our production of gold and in the search for that extremely valuable commodity.

There is another problem to which I should like to refer. It has been raised in Blind River. It covers the matter of another type of subsidy. I refer to the subsidy paid under the uranium clause to the mines in that area. I think the minister should give us some information on just how this subsidy from the government to the various mines is worked out. In negotiations to obtain more money for workers in a particular mine we are often told that if the wage factor goes up, then of course the amount of money the company will receive is going to be that much less. But we are told in this particular case in Elliot Lake, in the uranium industry, that the amount of money is tied to dominion bureau of statistics figures and has no relationship to the wages that are paid in that particular industry. This publication goes on to say:

> Here's how it is done. The yearly average hourly wage figure for Canadian mining other than gold is multiplied by $1.25 and then divided by $1.858 (both of these latter figures are fixed in the uranium contracts). The difference between the resulting figure and $1.25 (23 cents in 1958) is then paid to each uranium mining company on every pound of uranium oxide shipped to Eldorado. Depending on changes in the Canada-wide survey of average hourly earnings, the figure for 1959 and succeeding years may be greater than 23 cents per pound.
> Here according to our calculations is what some of the local mines creamed off in 1958 as a result of the "joker" clause:

Algom	$1,074,330.00
Denison	975,145.03
Northspan	968,332.89
Milliken	264,040.00
Stanleigh	256,092.35

This contract that has been worked out for the uranium has been a very hush-hush type of agreement as far as publication is concerned. I should like to ask the minister whether he has any information he would like to give on this matter, and how this type of clause was arrived at. This has been subsidized by the taxpayers, and is not in anything like as understandable form as the emergency gold mining assistance. I would suggest that if this type of subsidy is going to be employed, we should have an act that will cover it in the same way as is done under emergency gold mining assistance, and which will be administered by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

In closing I should just like to suggest to the minister that some consideration again be given to this matter of inspectors in the mines. I think the federal department could do a great deal of good if they were to give consideration to some of the conditions that have resulted from the present system.

While this matter is not at the present time under the minister's department, I suggest that more consideration should be given through his research department to some of the diseases and some of the working hazards of mining. I am thinking of the fact that in many of the provinces we have different mining regulations governing such matters as silicosis, bursitis, pneumococcus and some of the dermatitis problems that are raised by these various types of ore, and also this problem of uranium mining and some of the hazards that go with it. While, as I say, it has not been a problem with which the federal department of mines has been concerned, I think it is becoming increasingly necessary for them to give consideration to these matters.

[Mr. Peters.]

I should like to refer only to this particular case that I think has been repeated hundreds and hundreds of times across the country. I know it is true in my own area and I am certain it is true in the riding of the hon. member for Timmins, as well as in others. I refer to silicosis and how it has been treated in various provinces. I would recommend to all hon. members that they read and article that appeared in Liberty in November, 1958 entitled "My Husband Had to Die to Get Workmen's Compensation".

I think this article highlights one of the problems. This man and his wife for eight years conducted a battle with the compensation board in British Columbia. Then the wife sat on the doorsteps of the parliament buildings for some weeks and finally brought this matter to the attenton of many of the citizens of that province. When an autopsy was performed it was established that this man had silicosis and she was awarded a pension.

I agree that at the present time this is not a federal matter, but as technocracy advances and as the various forms of technical advance take place, I think we should be more and more willing to bring equality to workers, no matter in what province they live, where it is possible to do so through the federal department. I suggest that the minister give consideration to some of these diseases which are not even recognized by some of the provincial compensation boards. I am not suggesting that we interfere with the rights that have been given to the provinces, but there are fields of research that could be undertaken and some standardization of this research that I am sure would be beneficial to all workers throughout the country.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 186 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Dumas: Maybe the minister wants to answer the hon. member for Timiskaming.

(Translation):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I have a few comments to make. Let me begin by saying a few words about the remarks of the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) whom I must congratulate on his excellent contribution to the debate. He twitted me, albeit quite pleasantly too long. However, I clocked his speech, as I had my own, and found that both were of exactly the same length.

If my remarks were a bit too long, so were his. But I don't mean this as a reproach; indeed I want to thank him for his very constructive contribution. Naturally, as a member of the opposition, he had to say a bit of something about present conditions and, of course, he could not—on pain of high treason—say that conditions are better than they were at the time he used to sit on this side of the house. I can understand that.

However, he referred in particular to the price of copper, saying that the price in 1958 was 25 cents, that in 1959 it went up to 31½ cents, but that it is now 30 cents.

When, last year, I visited the area represented by the hon. member for Villeneuve, I was told by company officials that if the price remained at 30 cents a pound everybody would be happy. I do think that if it remains at that level and if the prospects hold, there will be no decline in mining operations. Besides, according to papers like the Northern Miner—which at times is perhaps a bit optimistic—the general situation is good. It is clear that progress is being made, and that the outlook is favourable.

(Translation):

And now I think I should say a few words about what was said by the hon. member for Port Arthur. He mentioned that there was a lot of criticism in the report of the committee on mines, forests and waters. Well, the recommendations made by that committee will surely help me to convince the government that more should be done in research and improvements in our department. Mr. Chairman, when I was appointed to be in charge of the department, things were as they were, and I must say that we are moving as fast as we can in that regard.

Another point was raised by the hon. member for Port Arthur, who has quite properly shown interest in the proper administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. I wish to assure him that my department and the Department of Finance are vigilant in ensuring that moneys are paid only after a thorough investigation of the cost of operation of every gold mining company which is eligible for assistance.

In answer to a question by the hon. member from Port Arthur, it was stated that the drawings and plans of the underground workings of every gold mine were not checked with the actual workings. I should like to point out that a limited underground visit would produce only superficial checks on the completeness of the mine plans. Such an inspection would be of no benefit unless a check survey of the underground workings were made and the grades and quantities of ore mined from the various working places were substantiated. Such a procedure would duplicate the work of the engineering staff at each mine, and would require a duplication of their number as inspectors. It is for this reason that direct examination of underground workings is undertaken only where unusual conditions exist. Far more effective checks on the operation and mining practices followed by a mine are obtained by the examination and correlation of mine plans from the engineering department, and the costs applicable to the various categories of mining operations from the accounting department.

It is in the interest of a gold mine operator to include in the costs which he submits for approval all the mining costs which have been incurred during the period. Unless he does so the amount of assistance he receives will be reduced. If a section of the underground workings is included in the costs but not shown on the plans, our usual examination of the plans of the work done and the costs attributable thereto would show at some point an abnormal and unsupported increase, thus calling for a further investigation of the matter. A comparison of the information submitted in applications for assistance is made with the details contained in the annual report to the shareholders of the company and other sources of information such as provincial reports.

The cost submitted by a company in each application, on which the calculation of the amount of assistance is based, are thoroughly examined. Final payment is made with respect to any designated year only after a complete audit has been made of the company's books of account at the mine and at the head office by the auditors of the comptroller of the treasury, Department of Finance.

I would like to assure the hon. member that the inspection and examination of mine accounts and plans submitted by companies applying for assistance payments are thorough, and that payments are made only in conformity with the provisions and intent of the act.

The hon. member for Timiskaming raised the same point, and I think this answers both hon. members. But if it were reported that some special investigation was desirable, we would be happy to do anything we could to find out if there is a nigger in the woodpile, as one might say.

An hon. Member: An Ethiopian in the woodpile.

Mr. Comtois: What was that?

An hon. Member: An Ethiopian in the woodpile.

An hon. Member: I object to that.

An hon. Member: We all do.

Mr. Comtois: As to the remarks made by the hon. member for Timiskaming, I thank him for his comments and suggestions, to which we shall give serious consideration.

Mr. Dumas: Two points were raised by the hon. member for Port Arthur, and one of those points was mentioned by the hon. member for Timiskaming. I do not wish at this time to enter into a controversy with these hon. members, who are good friends of mine, but I will say something which may throw some light on this question of low grading as mentioned by the hon. members for Port Arthur and Timiskaming. A gold mine, to qualify for assistance, must first of all produce a minimum of 50 ounces of gold in a year, and at least 70 per cent of the value of production must be from gold. The rate of assistance, where the cost of production must be from gold. The rate of assistance, where the cost of producing an ounce of gold exceeds $26.50 an ounce, is two thirds of the difference between the cost and $26.50 applied to two thirds of the number of ounces produced. The ceiling is a payment of $12.33 per ounce on the assistance ounces or $8.22 (⅔ of $12.33) per ounce for all production ounces. This assistance has been increased by 25 per cent since January 1, 1958.

I have prepared a table showing the cost, the assistance, and the profits on an ounce of gold, taking as a basis $35 U.S., and with the permission of the committee I should like to put it on record because it will facilitate an understanding of what I shall have to say later with regard to it.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the committee to put this table on Hansard?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, there is just one weakness in a suggestion like that. I understood the hon. member to say that he had prepared the figures himself. If they were official figures from the dominion bureau of statistics it would be a different matter, but I am not so sure about this practice.

Mr. Dumas: These figures were taken from the report on emergency gold mining assistance which was published by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, if I may, it has been the practice to accept these figures on previous occasions. I do not know why we should not do so today.

Mr. Dumas: They are profferred merely to facilitate discussion.

Mr. Churchill: If they are official figures I suppose it would be all right.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent he seeks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The table referred to above follows:]

PRODUCTION OF GOLD

Cost—Assistance—Profits at $35 U.S.

Cost to produce one ounce of gold	Assistance payable per ounce of gold produced	Cost to produce one ounce of gold less assistance	Gross profit per ounce of gold produced U.S. dollars
$15.00	0	$15.00	$20.00
20.00	0	20.00	15.00
25.00	0	25.00	10.00
26.50	0	26.50	8.50
30.00	$ 1.94	28.06	6.94
35.00	4.72	30.28	4.72
40.00	7.50	32.50	2.50
45.00	10.28	34.72	.28

Rate in effect to which the 25 per cent recent increase has been added.

Mr. Dumas: The table the minister was good enough to permit me to have reproduced in the record illustrates over a wide range of costs the effect on profit where assistance is paid and where assistance plus 25 per cent is paid. As costs increase beyond $25.20 an ounce the effect of assistance is to slow down the declining profit rate rather than to provide for its maintenance. For instance, with assistance the break-even point on costs is extended from $35 to $45 an ounce.

The table also shows that the greatest profit is won with low costs and that, as the cost of producing an ounce of gold increases, profits drop off very sharply. For instance, a profit of $20 an ounce can be made with a cost of $15 an ounce, but this drops to $10 with costs of $25, to $8.50 with costs of $26.50 and to $6.94 with costs of $30, to $4.72 with costs of $35, to $2.50 with costs of $40 and to zero with costs of over $45.

The veins in an average gold mine have a wide range in grade from probably less than one-twentieth of an ounce to several ounces to the ton of ore. Usually the number of tons of high grade ore is quite limited, and as the grade decreases the number of tons increases. A picture of it could appropriately be shown in the form of a pyramid with a small peak of high grade ore and a large base of low grade ore.

Mines like to have a three year supply of ore available at all times for the mill, and one of the tasks of management is to determine that mixture of the various grades from which a maximum profit can be won. Only by earning a maximum profit is the best use made of the resource itself and of the labour and capital provided for its development and production.

I should now like to cite an example. Assume we have an oreshoot ten feet wide by 480 feet long. This would yield 400 tons per vertical foot. Assume the recoverable grade to be 0.20 ounces or $7 with gold at $35. Assume cost per ton at $6. The cost per ounce would be $30. The cost aid would work out to $1.94 per ounce or 39 cents per ton. The income would be calculated on the following basis:

Income:	400 tons × $7	$2,800
	Cost aid 400 × 39¢	156
		$2,956
	Less cost (400 × $6)	2,400
	Profit	$ 556
	Profit per ton $1.39

Now assume that a 2.5 foot width on each side grading 0.10 ounces recoverable or $3.50 per ton is mined as well. This would yield 600 tons per vertical foot. The combined average recoverable grade would be 0.167 ounces or $5.84 with gold at $35. The cost per ounce would be $36. The cost aid would work out to $5.27 per ounce or 88 cents per ton. The income would be calculated on the following basis:

Income:	600 tons × $5.84	$3,504
	Cost aid—600 × 88¢	528
		$4,032
	Less cost—600 × $6	3,600
	Profit	$ 432
	Profit per ton $0.72

It would be bad practice to try low grading, because you have to make a profit. You have to mine the ore you have. It is good practice to try to keep an average grade. This was done by the responsible management of many gold mines in an effort to lengthen the life of the mines. We have many examples where companies tried to mine only high grade. The hon. member for Port Arthur complained about some of these.

Some mines do this in order to pay high dividends to their shareholders. One mine in Quebec paid 15 per cent on the money invested in the mine, but the mine had only a short life. Management was not wise enough to establish an average grade and a fair profit. The mine is not now in existence. It was giving employment to 300 or 400 men but now it is closed, though it could have been in operation for another 25 or 30 years. This is an example of the result of high grading. If you do low grading you achieve the same result, because if you do not make a profit on a mine it has to be closed down.

Another question was raised by the hon. member for Port Arthur regarding the amalgamation of some companies. He may have good reason to complain in the case of MacLeod-Cockshutt; I do not know. In Malartic one company acquired three mines previously under separate management, one of which was going to be closed down with salvage operations about to begin. The previous management was discouraged. I will not say there was bad management, but it appears that they did not have the courage to undertake additional exploration in order to find more ore in the mine.

These mines were taken over by a certain company through shares bought at a cost higher than the market cost. They acquired control of the mines and because of good management found an ore body which prolonged the life of the mine for another 20 to 25 years.

When I talk about this question and about the operation of Little Long Lac, I am not talking in favour of any person or group of persons owning Little Long Lac; I am talking for the electors of my constituency, for the people of my own home town who know the situation. Today that mine would be closed if it had not been taken over by a group of people who are interested in mining. They found an ore body, and the life of that mine has been extended for another 20 or 25 years.

I have another example. Little Long Lac took over another mine, Malartic Goldfields Limited. It was claimed that there was no more ore in this mine and they were to enter into a salvage operation. Well, they did not find any ore there; maybe they found some, perhaps 200,000 or 300,000 tons, which is lengthening the life of the mine for maybe a year or two. But what else did they do? They acquired two small prospects near that mine. They bought those prospects, and again they bought the stock at a higher price than they would have paid on the market. They bought those two prospects; they did the exploration work. They are doing the development work in such a way that Malartic Goldfields, which employs 600 men, instead of closing in one or two years from now, will be able to operate for another 15 or 20 years.

This is the result of the coming of Little Long Lac to my home town of Malartic. The people of Malartic are very happy today because people with some vision came there and did something to prolong the life of those mines. That is the situation. Maybe it is different somewhere else, I do not know; but I feel that if a group of people get together and are ready to take a chance and buy a gold mine or a copper mine—you do not buy those by just bidding a certain price; you have to buy control. You have to buy shares. You have to buy them on the market, or you have to buy them from a group of people who have those shares. What did Little Long Lac do? They went to the people who had control of the company and said, "We will pay you 15 cents or 20 cents more a share than the price of those shares on the stock market, because we are interested".

That is the situation, and that is the story of Little Long Lac in my home town of Malartic. I did not want to allow this matter to go unchallenged because the life of my constituency, which depends on gold mining and base metal mining, was at stake, and we want this industry to be as healthy as possible.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member who has just spoken has given one side of the story, and there are two. He presented a large number of figures, but in those figures there were certain weaknesses. His description of mining conditions in his home town sounded very much like conditions in my own home town, where there is much more mining done elsewhere than in the mine. The hon. member spoke as if he was doing actual work in the mining of ore, and I expected to see it piled over in the corner some place.

With respect to these charges of low grading and high grading, there are cases which have come to my knowledge. I have talked with people who know exactly where those stopes are or they would not make the charges. The men who work in the mines do not do this because the grade of ore fluctuates; they do it to obtain a particular level, which is quite a low level. There is something to be said for maintaining ore at a particular level that the hon. member did not mention, and that is that the mills are designed to function with a certain millhead and a certain rate of recovery. If you dump in a large quantity of high grade ore or if you dilute your ore with a large amount of waste, then your mill will not operate satisfactorily. Either high grade ore or very low grade ore or waste will upset the millhead and the mill will not work as satisfactorily as it will with the range of ore for which it was built.

In pointing out how gold mining assistance operates the hon. member used the figures that are in the book and I have no quarrel with those figures, but I think he realizes that what he was really saying was that he does not disagree with this system of high grading or low grading, that this is a good housekeeping proposition. I am suggesting that again he has forgotten something else that is prevalent throughout the whole gold mining industry and that is that the operators of the gold mining industry—and they are not very many in number—are eternal optimists. As the hon. member pointed out, in his area a number of the mines are controlled by one company. It is true that in each of the areas the people who are running and controlling the gold mining industry are eternal optimists when it comes to an increase in the price of gold. They operate for the day when the price of gold will go up. These people have been very surprised, because they were sure that when some of the present members of parliament who used to be outspoken champions of the gold mining industry when they were in opposition became supporters of a government they would continue to be champions of an increase in the price of gold. Now that they have become cabinet ministers, and some of them potential cabinet ministers they have not had the same desire to continually talk about an increase in the price of gold. Those people who are operating gold mines, being eternal optimists, are holding—and I am sure it is a fact—many sections of the well-known mines for the day when gold will be $70 an ounce.

While it is true that gold mining has to be maintained at the range for which the mill is designed to operate most efficiently, I still think some consideration should be given to this fact. There are people holding for themselves underground gold reserves against the day when the price of gold will rise. This is all we are asking the minister to check. We are not disagreeing that gold mines should be operated under what are called good housekeeping conditions, because we certainly support that. We agree entirely with what the hon. member has said. High grading is more detrimental to the country and to the mining communities than low grading would be, but we think consideration must be given to some of the companies which are not totally dependent on emergency gold mining assistance, to see that they use the assistance to the best advantage of the communities.

Many of the smaller companies are in such a position that if emergency gold mining assistance were cut off or would require to be increased to an amount which the government would not see fit to recommend to maintain the small companies, they would be unable to operate. All we are suggesting is that the department of mines maintain continual surveillance of this problem so the money that is being paid to them in the form of a subsidy is used to the best advantage of the communities that are depending on this particular industry. When we make these charges in specific cases we are quite willing to give the names and the numbers of the stopes to the minister if he will give us some assurance that this information will not be neglected and that there will be an investigation. If we are wrong we shall be quite happy to get up in the House of Commons and say we were wrong in that particular instance.

Mr. Comtois: I can assure the hon. member that every bit of information, specific names and so forth, that is submitted to us will be given the best consideration, and we will investigate each case.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, there is no need for many of us to speak at length on these estimates, in view of the very thorough study made by the committee. I rise for two purposes. In the first instance, I would not wish to hurt the minister's feelings by failing to say a few words on his estimates. Second, I have a point or two I wish to make with respect to the consideration of the committee report.

I have read the report carefully, and on the whole it is an excellent one. It does show some traces of, shall I say, parliamentary youthfulness and some tinges of overenthusiasm, but it is the result of a lot of hard work and study. It does indicate clearly that we would not have such a comprehensive and critical report if the estimates of the department had been going before the committee throughout the years. I am one of a good number of members who year after year urged the government of the day to refer the estimates of this department to the committee on mines, forests and waters. It is because of the fact that this was not done for 25 years that the committee had to make such an exhaustive and lengthy study and has brought forward a somewhat critical report.

So far as the work of the committee is concerned, like the other committee members I appreciate very much the frankness of the evidence given by the officials called before the committee. But I should like to have seen representatives of industry called before the committee as well, as was done by the forestry section of the committee studying the estimates of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I think their evidence would have assisted the committee to attain more balance and a wider perspective.

I also want to emphasize that we must not fail, because of the critical nature of the report, to recognize the excellent work that has been done by the staff throughout the years, a tremendous amount of work to anyone who understands the various branches of the department and the importance of the work that is being done. As far as my constituency is concerned, I know the great importance of the excellent work done in connection with the Columbia basin survey since 1945. I do want to emphasize this, because I have received some comments from correspondents and I am afraid that through misunderstanding the nature of the report there may be a tendency to suggest that the staff has not been up to snuff. They have done excellent work while lacking the funds to provide a full staff and the buildings and equipment necessary.

I have one or two suggestions to make before I sit down. The report suggests the expenditure of a good many millions of dollars, and I am a bit cautious when it comes to spending money. What little I have managed to gather here and there has been the result of hard labour. I was brought up in a home where my mother and father emphasized three things. They were opposed to injustice, opposed to dishonesty, and against waste. It is on that last point that I wish to speak. When the government is giving consideration to the recommendations in the report I suggest that there should be a survey of the work being undertaken in the mining, mapping and other branches of the various provincial governments and also in private industry, to make sure that in extending the staff there is no unnecessary duplication of effort and waste of funds.

I think we are approaching a most appropriate time to give that matter very careful consideration in relation to the committee's report. I understand that the national conference on conservation is expected to meet some time next year, and I think that will be an appropriate time at which to go into this matter with the provincial governments and private industry to make sure there is no overlapping, no duplication, no waste of effort and no waste of public funds. I think that would be an excellent time to make a study of the allocation of the various fields of effort and activity, because on occasion I have noticed the federal government and provincial governments publishing similar maps and doing similar research work and so on, though I have noticed that this has lessened a great deal in recent years. I do suggest that the coming conference on conservation would provide a good opportunity to survey the whole situation, allocate the various fields of effort and, as I said before, avoid any unnecessary expenditure of public funds.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I should like to add a word to this very interesting debate. Different points of view have been put forward, and I was quite interested in the point raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming because last year I had occasion to take up this very matter with some of the departmental officials. The information given me at that time was that the department does no inspecting as such on the mining properties themselves, that the department's control is maintained solely through auditing and through the plans submitted by the various mines when they apply for gold mining assistance.

That is scarcely good enough, and is possibly one of the reasons there is so much misunderstanding and distrust on both sides regarding this problem. At this time I should like to renew the request we have made before in the house that a committee be set up to look into the matter in all its aspects. The federal government are involved because they pay the subsidy. The provincial governments are involved because they administer their mining acts, and the municipal governments are certainly involved because they are very keenly and vitally interested in the life and health of these mining operations. The mine operators are involved, of course, and so are the workers in the mines who could be represented by the union certified to represent them.

In the best interests of all concerned I think this matter should be looked into, and in my opinion there is no better time to start than right now. The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was amended last year and is in force until the end of next year. At that time it will be coming up again for renewal or amendment or whatever action may be deemed advisable. If such a study were made it could possibly do away with a lot of the misunderstanding apparent at the present time, and hon. members would be much better advised and better able to take the necessary action at that time.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I do not like to take too much of the time of the committee, but I wish to say something on the price of gold. The price of gold is now based on the United States dollar, and over the past few years the government has been paying for an ounce of gold prices varying from $33.25 to $34, much lower than the price of $35 in Canadian money. This makes for a difficult situation.

Of course the previous and present governments have been very generous toward the industry and with good reason. The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act has done a lot of good for the gold mines. Last year the act was extended and the benefits to the gold mines increased by 25 per cent. However, in view of the fact that today gold is sold on the free market and people can hold gold here in Canada, which is a good thing because it has given some encouragement to the industry, the government is buying less gold. I think the government is buying very little gold produced by those mines which cannot benefit under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

For this reason I believe the government would be wise to buy all gold produced in this country, and for it should pay $35 Canadian to the producers, whether they are base metal mines or gold mines. Of course, they should continue the assistance to gold mines which can qualify under the act.

Now, if the government were to pay $35 an ounce in Canadian dollars they would encourage the base metal mines, and they would encourage mining in Canada. I would suggest that the government raise the price of gold, but this is a difficult problem; I understand that. This is an international question. Of course if the government of Canada were to raise the price of gold, let us say to $50, they would be paying a subsidy of $15 because all we could get for that gold if we were to sell it would be $35 in United States currency. However, I think the time will come when it will be a good thing for the government to raise the price of gold. If we were to raise the price of gold I am sure South Africa would follow our example and raise the price as well. In the meantime, I suggest we pay $35 in Canadian currency for the gold produced in this country, and that we continue the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act as it is.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF CANADA

200. Administration, operation and maintenance, including Canada's share of the cost of the geological liaison office, British commonwealth scientific conference, London, England, and $50,000 for grants in aid of geological research in Canadian universities, $3,299,108.

Mr. Dumas: I wonder if under this item the minister could tell us how many parties are doing geological survey work across the country, and how many are in each of the provinces?

Mr. Comtois: In the Yukon Territory we have 2 parties; in British Columbia, 16; in Alberta, 4; Northwest Territories, 7; Saskatchewan, 4; Manitoba, 3; Ontario, 9; Quebec, 3; new Quebec and Labrador, 5; New Brunswick, 5; Prince Edward Island, 2; Nova Scotia, 4; and Newfoundland, 3.

Mr. Dumas: Will the minister tell the committee whether the Fort George operations will be completed in 1959?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, it will.

Mr. Chevrier: This is a matter in which the minister knows I have had some interest for several years. It has to do with the boundary line which separates the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec in lake St. Francis. I wonder whether the minister would tell the house what progress has been made in defining that boundary. I realize that this matter does not come directly under his control, but at the same time I know he has made representations to both provinces in an effort to determine the boundary and perhaps he can tell us if some progress has been made.

It is a problem which is of interest to those who live on the southern boundary of the province of Ontario and the northern boundary of the province of Quebec in lake St. Francis. This boundary between these two provinces has never been delineated, and because of the work which still remains to be done in lake St. Francis by way of dredging, and also because of the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway, it would appear to me that the time is now ripe for a determination of that boundary. Will the minister tell the committee if any progress has been made?

(Translation):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), I must say, to my regret, that I have little progress to report on that count. I understand he is personally very interested, and in all respects, in the delineation of that boundary line. I know also that the matter is far from being directly under the federal jurisdiction; indeed it is the exclusive concern of the two provinces in question, and of course we cannot force the province of Ontario or the province of Quebec to draw a boundary line between them.

In the ordinary course of things and officially speaking, I am unable to report any progress. On the other hand, now that the St. Lawrence seaway is completed, I have another argument available. Therefore, I do believe that we will be able to achieve that result in which I am also interested. I can also appreciate the interest of the hon. member for Laurier in the matter. I hope that, next year, I will be in a position to bring better news.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for his intervention and for what he has just said. However, may I make a further remark? There is also, in that matter, a legal question concerning the islands in lake St. Francis, a legal question arising out of some works that may be done and of many other activities which may take place in that lake. It becomes increasingly imperative that that boundary line be drawn up.

I am convinced that the minister could talk it over with his friend, the hon. premier of the province of Quebec, and in this way do much to help this project along.

The project is of personal interest to me, it is even more so to people who live on either side of the boundary line, and I do not believe it is fair that a boundary between two large provinces like Ontario and Quebec should not be determined under the constitution.

I accept the minister's statement, knowing that the matter is not directly under his jurisdiction, but a provincial matter. However, I repeat my hope that, thanks to his good offices with both governments, it may be possible before long to define that boundary line, which is of great importance to both provinces.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister a question about the boundary line between Quebec and Newfoundland.

(Text):

Has the minister had any opportunity to take up this question with his friend, the premier of Quebec? It might be that the minister, in seeking to solve this problem, could exercise his diplomatic functions in a somewhat wider field or, if he felt it ought to be done by secret diplomacy, perhaps he could get the minister of northern affairs engaged in it. What I should really like to know is whether any progress has been made in defining the border between Quebec and Newfoundland.

(Translation):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) were sitting on this side of the house, and I on the other side, I could ask him the same question: "Has he discussed the matter with his friend Mr. Smallwood?"

In any case, it is the first time I am being asked a question about that border between Newfoundland and Quebec, and that I am being told it has not been defined. The matter was never submitted to me.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister can assure me that his friend, the premier of Quebec is ready to discuss this matter I think I can give him an assurance right now that the premier of Newfoundland would be agreeable to discussing it.

Item agreed to.

MINES BRANCH

202. Administration, operation and maintenance, $3,527,130.

Mr. Peters: I should like to ask the minister how many officials he has capable of doing factual inspections in mines.

Mr. Comtois: If it is proved that we have factual inspections to be made, we have engineers to do the job.

Mr. Peters: Are they listed under this vote in the details at page 275?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Chairman. If we do that work we have to take them out of some other field, but the answer is yes.

Mr. Peters: I should think it would take a practical as well as a competent engineer to do the underground surveys that are necessary if you were checking a particular place. I am interested to know in what part of the mines division you have these mine inspectors. The minister has said that some inspection has been done in the past. Which of these officials have done that inspection?

Mr. Comtois: Up to now when some inspection was to be made we had engineers from the mineral resources division. We have another group of engineers in the mines branch. We can have some available for any purpose for which we need them.

Mr. Peters: Is the minister saying that under this mines branch there are no inspectors at the present time?

Mr. Comtois: No, I did not mean that.

Mr. Peters: Would the minister indicate to me what section they are under, or where they appear on the list?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Comtois: Maybe I misunderstood the question. We have no engineers or inspectors for that purpose at the mines branch at the present time. However, if they were needed in the mines branch we could divert some inspectors from the mineral resources branch to the mines branch in order to make some reports or some inspections.

Mr. Peters: Is the minister saying that in the years we have had emergency gold mining assistance we have never had attached to this branch any inpectors for checking? If not, maybe he would explain to me where the auditors under this division come? As I understood it, there were two checks. One was an auditor's check that was done in the offices of the mining companies, using the books and data available in the offices. Then if there was any question with regard to this check they did the actual check or the visual resurvey. I would assume that this matter comes under this particular department.

Mr. Comtois: I am told that the staff necessary for the inspections is taken from the mineral resources division; that is item No. 188. As far as accountants are concerned, they come from the Department of Finance.

Mr. Peters: Does this not seem to be an odd way of handling a branch? This assistance is costing the Canadian people some $12,500,000 a year. In view of what was said in the report of the committee—unfortunately I was not a member of the standing committee—where they mentioned that many more officials were necessary in this department, that they have not expanded in the fields where expansion was necessary, may I ask the minister this question. Is this one of the fields in which increased personnel is necessary?

Mr. Comtois: No. We did not make any such provision this year in that division.

Mr. Peters: Does this not seem rather unusual? We have this large sum of money to supervise and we have nobody doing it. I was wondering whether perhaps the requirement was for men who were trained by some of the mining schools in surveying and geology and who were also familiar with underground operations, and that probably that was the department's requirement. But I see there are a number of them. I think that is quite an admission, that we have no full time inspectors to inspect the handling of this large sum of money.

Mr. Comtois: I think the hon. member is wrong. We are on item 202 under the mines branch. There is no connection with the mineral resources as far as inspections are concerned. That matter comes under vote 188.

Mr. Peters: Then what is the mines branch? I would assume that the mines branch handled mines. I would not expect to look for it under surveys or geology or something. I would expect it to come under the mines branch. If this department is as out of date as this, and if the mines branch does not cover the mines department, then I think we ought to take another close look at it now, not next year.

Mr. Comtois: I do not know how I can explain the matter to the hon. member. Emergency gold mining assistance comes under the mineral resources division, item 188. There is no connection with the mines branch. That is another division. The mines branch is for research only.

Mr. Peters: I think the mines branch must also handle this matter of inspectors. If the minister were to say that he keeps inspectors to do the surveying work, the factual and manual check that is necessary on the work the auditors do, and it comes under some other department, I would accept that answer. But I am of the opinion that the only place it could come would be in the mines branch, and that the only logical place to put your inspectors of mines would be in the mines division. I do not see how they could come under something else.

I am of the opinion that there just are not any such animals. I am also of the opinion that after I gave the minister information last year, the reason the minister's department could not check the information was that they had not the inspectors to do this job. I called and gave the information to the minister's department last year. I think the reason the checking has not been done and cannot be done is that we do not have any inspectors. If that is the answer, then I think that is the answer the minister should give.

The Chairman: Shall vote 202 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Peters: No. I think this $12,500,000 that we are spending in a subsidy deserves much more control than this. I do not feel that I am doing my duty if we do not insist on there being some inspection for infractions of this act. I have been accused by some of the mining publications, as has the hon. member for Port Arthur. In both cases we have been to the department and have given them information that I think they should and could have investigated if they had the personnel with which to do it. I am of the opinion that they do not have the necessary personnel.

I do not see any place in this mines branch where we have inspectors for this type of mine inspection. If we have not, I think the Canadian people should know that fact and that the Canadian people should demand that the expenditure of that amount of money is given the protection and the supervision of one, two or three inspectors who can do a competent job. They are going to have to be very highly skilled men. We shall have to go into the mines and do a resurvey job on some of these operations. I think we shall need at least one inspector; I do not think we have that inspector now, and I should like an assurance before this vote carries that the government is willing to provide one.

Mr. Aiken: Why should he?

Mr. Peters: What was that?

Mr. Aiken: Why should the hon. member tell the minister what to do? I do not see why he should give you any assurance.

Mr. Peters: Maybe the minister does not have to give the Canadian public any assurance that the $12,500,000 which he is paying every year is properly administered, but there is no point in passing this estimate if there are going to be no safeguards at all over the expenditure of this money. If that is the opinion of the hon. member who has just spoken, and if that is accepted by the government, then I think it is the answer. And if that is the answer, I am quite satisfied by it.

(Translation):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I am under the impression that the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) does not want to understand, obstinately refuses to do so, or is ill-disposed. I am doing my best to explain to him that the inspectors who supervise assistance to gold mines, under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, must be under the authority of the mineral resources division.

Even if we hired additional inspectors or engineers to do the inspection work he mentions, we could not take them from the mines branch but from the mineral resources division. Nothing has been changed in that matter. If more inspectors are required, we will take them on. I don't see any objection to adding one or two inspectors, if necessary, to the staff of that branch and to give them that supervisory work to do, but the hon. member may be assured that if we hire additional staff, the addition would have to be made to the mineral resources division not to the mines branch.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: I think note should be taken of the intervention of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, who seems to be typical of certain backbenchers supporting this government in maintaining that the opposition and the Canadian public have no right to information about the way in which public money is being spent.

Mr. Aiken: Since the point of order has been raised, may I speak to it?

Mr. Pickersgill: It was not a point of order; I just made an observation.

Mr. Aiken: My point was this. The hon. member for Timiskaming has been threatening to hold up the committee on these estimates unless the minister does something he wishes him to do. It is not the first occasion on which the hon. member has done this. He just finished saying that he would not allow this item to pass unless the minister gave him certain assurances. I see no reason why any hon. member should be in the position of saying "I shall not let this item pass unless the minister gives me certain assurances." Nor should any hon. member be in the position of saying "I am not letting this item pass unless the government does something."

The Chairman: I appreciate the explanations given by hon. members both to my right and to my left, but I believe it would be preferable at this time if we came back to our consideration of the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. It would be out of order to engage in a debate such as the one which seems to be starting at present.

Mr. Fisher: There is just one question I should like to ask the minister at this point. If I brought in an amendment to this particular act next session which would delete the particular subsection which gives inspectors the right to enter and examine mines in respect of whose production this subsidy is paid, would the minister support that amendment, or would he see no good in an amendment to this particular section of the act?

Mr. Comtois: I will consider and study the matter.

Item agreed to.

Dominion observatories—

208. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $67,975.

Mr. Fisher: I just wanted to say one word about this, and I will be very brief. I was most impressed, as one who has checked over the publications of the various parts of this department, to see what has been accomplished by the staff of the dominion observatory, with a very limited establishment in comparison with some of the other branches. Though they are working in an esoteric field in comparison to some of the other divisions, they are turning out some excellent papers and seem to have a real conception of the duty of scientists to publish material on topics which are current and also on general theory. I would just like to compliment this particular branch on that achievement.

Item agreed to.

210. Polar continental shelf project, $567,849.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like the minister to tell us briefly what this project is.

Mr. Comtois: This is a program which is part of a larger program of Canadian research. There is a very long explanation, and if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate wants the whole story I will try to give it to him. It is up to him.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could simply indicate to the minister what I would be interested in knowing. Has this project anything to do with explorations for oil?

Mr. Comtois: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: And the minister knows nothing about the applications for permits in relation to the polar continental shelf?

Mr. Comtois: No, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Coal Board—

211. Administration and investigations of the dominion coal board, $121,925.

Mr. Pickersgill: Normally there would, I think, be a very long debate on this subject, but as the minister knows the question of coal has been debated a good many times this session. However, I would not want it to be thought that we in the opposition, especially those of us who represent the Atlantic area, were overlooking the interests of the people engaged in this industry which is having such a hard time.

I think if the minister could tell us briefly what the prospects of the industry are for 1960—whether he thinks production in 1960 and the possibility of marketing that production will exceed what was experienced in 1959—the committee would be indebted to him; and if the hon. gentleman could also tell us how soon this coal inquiry which has been promised by the government is likely to be started, I am sure he will get his estimates through very quickly.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, would it not be better to consider the supplementary estimates of the department at this time before dealing with the coal board?

Mr. Chevrier: That would be satisfactory to us.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall item 211 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought it was understood that we would stand this item and take the supplementary items first.

Item stands.

Administration services—

537. Departmental administration—further amount required, $49,005.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, how many people are involved with respect to the salaries under this item?

Mr. Comtois: Six, Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: I have noticed that the explanatory text on geographical and topographical maps is in one language only. Could the minister consider the possibility of having maps printed with bilingual legends and captions?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question of the hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Moncalm (Mr. Pigeon), I might tell him that the legends and text on topographical and geographical maps, etc., prepared by the department, have always been printed in English, except on maps published for the province of Quebec. That anomaly has been pointed out to me, and I have given instructions that, henceforth all topographical and geographical maps carry legends in both French and English. I cannot tell the hon. member if that work has already started, but instructions have gone out that in future those maps show bilingual legends.

Item agreed to.

Geological survey of Canada—

542. Administration, operation and maintenance—further amount required, $112,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, in these geological surveys, and indeed in other surveys where students are employed, is an effort made to employ students from all parts of Canada? Could the minister tell us how many students from Memorial University have been employed?

Mr. Comtois: I can obtain that information for the hon. gentleman, but I do not have it here. I can only say that this summer approximately 200 students, in round figures, were employed during the holidays.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am particularly interested in the number employed from Memorial University. Many of these surveys are done in Newfoundland, and I am wondering if any effort was made to employ students from Memorial University?

Mr. Comtois: I shall obtain that information with pleasure and give it to the hon. gentleman.

Item agreed to.

Mines branch—

543. Administration, operation and maintenance—further amount required, $157,825.

Mr. Dumas: Does this cover increases in salaries and wages or salaries and wages of new employees?

Mr. Comtois: The amount last autumn was underestimated. It is for the general staff.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Coal Board—

211. Administration and investigations of the dominion coal board, $121,925.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in support of the lignite coal industry of Saskatchewan, and especially on behalf of the Great West Coal Company and the Saskatchewan Coal Company Limited, operating in the Estevan area in my constituency of Moose Mountain. The problem to which I am about to refer arises as a result of the 17 per cent freight rate increase last December. I feel that I should protest against the exclusion of lignite coal from the subsidy relief proposed by Bill No. C-38, and ask for relief against the increase in rates of 22 cents per ton on lignite coal authorized by order No. 96300 of the board of transport commissioners for the following reasons.

First, the lignite industry is faced with fierce competition from the new natural gas industry in its principal markets, and its very existence is threatened by the drastic price increases and anticipated loss of business to natural gas resulting from the freight rate increase.

Second, the lignite industry has not received any benefit from subventions comparable with that conferred on other branches of the Canadian coal industry.

In the third instance, lignite coal is a low value commodity subject to a comparatively short haul, but has received no relief from any of the successive flat per ton increases imposed on all coal in post-war years.

I should like to give a brief description of this industry in our area. Lignite coal is strip mined near Bienfait, Saskatchewan. A fairly constant production of slightly over 2,200,000 tons has been maintained since 1950. The principal markets are for industrial uses in the Winnipeg area. More than 70 per cent of the coal sold in the Winnipeg area is lignite. Other markets are in the Regina and Brandon areas, and certain pulp and paper plants at Kenora, Dryden and Fort Frances in Ontario. Lignite coal possesses a substantial market advantage as a low cost fuel located near its principal markets, only 280 miles from Winnipeg and 155 miles from Brandon.

In the post-war years the domestic house heating market has been pre-empted by fuel oil and latterly, to some extent, by natural gas. The industry by vigorous salesmanship, which included assistance to industrial users in the installation of proper heating plants, was able to develop an industrial market more than replacing the lost domestic market.

Concurrently the companies have invested more than $5 million in new equipment since the war. As a result of mechanization and technological improvements, the industry has been able to absorb successive wage increases, and has raised the mine price of coal by only 10 cents per ton since 1948. The present mine price averages $2 per ton.

I wish to compliment the minister, who I believe visited my constituency not too long ago and addressed an organization representing the coal industry there. The reports I received from the constituency indicate that the minister left a very good impression with them. I trust that he came away from that area in Saskatchewan with a favourable impression of it. While there I believe he inspected the operation of the machine known as Mr. Klimax, one of the largest strip mining machines on the North American continent, which is of assistance in rendering more economical the mining done there to have the product compete with other competitive fuels.

The lignite industry by its vigorous salesmanship and technological initiative has been able to maintain its position notwithstanding the competition of premium fuels in the post-war years. Its existence is now threatened by drastic increases in transportation expenses which it is powerless to control.

Another interesting sidelight in the lignite picture is that its position is good and will continue that way as long as industry survives. Expert studies such as the Gordon commission report agree that the outlook for Saskatchewan lignite is satisfactory. It is a low cost fuel located near industrial markets. Of particular importance is the growing demand for thermal power. Saskatchewan lignite is in a position to satisfy the demands of large thermal power stations erected or to be erected by Manitoba hydro at Brandon and Selkirk. If transportation costs can be held in check, lignite could supply the thermal power in these installations in preference to natural gas. On the other hand, even though the long term demand for lignite might be assumed to be satisfactory, it will avail little if the producing companies are not able to maintain their present markets and survive to enjoy it.

However, with reference to natural gas, which has sprung up in the area just in the last two years, since the greater part of the lignite market is industrial it is extremely vulnerable to the competition of natural gas. It is a well known feature of the natural gas industry that gas is offered for sale to industrial users at low prices in order to build up volume in a new natural gas pipe line or distributing system. As and when higher prices in the domestic markets are developed, low priced gas ceases to be available for industrial users. All proper steps should be taken to prevent the lignite industry from being destroyed by the initial competition of natural gas so it can survive to enjoy the brighter future which expert opinion predicts is in store for it.

Already some large accounts have switched from lignite coal to natural gas. As an example, one paper mill representing something like 5 per cent of the industry's total production has been lost. The industry could not survive many losses of this order. While the lignite industry is fighting to maintain its position, its competitive strength is gravely weakened by uncontrollable increases in transportation costs. The last 22 cents per ton increase is the equivalent of almost 2 cents per m.f.c. of natural gas. The failure of the lignite industry at this critical stage to obtain any relief from the recent increases will, it is feared, have an adverse effect on its customers and further strengthen natural gas competition.

Subventions do not apply to major lignite coal movements. This is something I was surprised to find out. While the lignite industry supports the aid extended to other branches of the coal industry in the form of subventions, it receives little assistance itself. In round figures, only 275,000 tons out of the total of 2,200,000 tons produced by the lignite industry benefit from subventions. The amount paid to the lignite industry was $247,000, or less than 85 cents per ton, subject to subvention. This is the tonnage delivered to pulp and paper mills in northwestern Ontario. The bulk of the industry's sales, which occur in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, do not qualify for subvention.

The substantial subventions paid to other branches of the coal industry have been referred to as one reason for not extending the benefit of the freight rate subsidy act to coal. The Minister of Transport on April 9, 1959, referred to subventions as follows, at page 2394 of Hansard:

> Assistance to coal and coke is given in the form of subventions, and to show how those subventions have been increased, for instance, during the past two years, I will give the comparative figures for the years 1956 and 1958. In 1956 the average subvention paid per ton was $2.67. In 1958, the average subvention per ton was $3.15. This shows that there has been an increase of 48 cents per ton during those two years, or an increase of 18 per cent.

Subventions paid during the calendar year 1958, by regions were as follows: In the maritime regions, that is in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the amount was $8,546,041. In the western region, that is the province of Alberta and the Crowsnest area of British Columbia, the amount was $667,000.

On March 17 last the Prime Minister announced in the house that the federal government would pay an additional $500,000 in the form of subsidies to maritime coal this year. The government also recently announced the payment of an additional 50 cents per ton on 100,000 tons of Alberta coal which was being shipped to Japan, and this additional subvention was paid to make possible the sale of that quantity of coal.

The extent of present and future subsidies payable for maritime, Alberta and British Columbia coal overshadows the small subventions paid on lignite coal. In addition, the average subvention paid per ton is more than three times greater than the subvention paid on the small tonnage of lignite coal subject to subvention.

It would seem unfair to deny one branch of the coal industry relief from freight rate increases because of the special subventions paid to another branch. Moreover, it might appear advisable in the national interest to attempt to maintain the lignite industry in a reasonably sound economic position by the extension of the general freight rate subsidy to it. This alternative would appear more attractive than attempting later to shore up a near broken industry by subventions and other measures of special relief.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the last freight rate increase may be the straw that will break the camel's back in that particular part of the coal industry, and I am quite familiar with the problem because I have been working on it. I would strongly urge the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to give the problem of the Saskatchewan lignite coal industry very serious consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister in a position to answer the questions I put to him?

Mr. Comtois: Will the hon. member repeat his questions?

Mr. Pickersgill: I asked two questions. The first one was, what did the minister think the prospects were for next year in the coal industry in Nova Scotia? Does he think production will be greater next year than this year, and do the marketing prospects look better and also the employment prospects? Can the minister assure us that there are not likely to be any lay-offs? The second question was, can the minister tell us how soon the inquiry promised by the government is actually going to be set up?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, the production for 1958 was 11,687,000 tons. For 1959 we estimate that the production will be around 11 million tons. I cannot give an estimate for 1960, of course, but I do not think there will be an increase.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister think there is any hope of maintaining that figure?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, there is hope of maintaining that figure.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say anything about when this inquiry will be set up?

Mr. Comtois: I cannot tell but I might say that we had a meeting very recently and the whole matter is under study. I think action will be taken on the matter very shortly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Soon after prorogation?

Mr. Comtois: It depends on prorogation.

Mr. Pickersgill: One other question for the minister. Has he any figure—I am not going to press him if he has not—for coal production in Nova Scotia in the last 10 years or thereabouts? If so, can he make it available?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, I have them here. I might table them now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could we have them inserted in Hansard?

The Deputy Chairman: Has the minister unanimous consent of the committee to place these figures in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The figures referred to above follows:]

Output of coal in Nova Scotia mines—figures given in net tons (as published by the dominion bureau of statistics).

1950	6,478,405
1951	6,307,629
1952	5,905,265
1953	5,787,026
1954	5,842,896
1955	5,731,026
1956	5,775,025
1957	5,685,770
1958	5,269,879

N.B.—The total given for 1956 does not include 802 tons recovered from dredging operations.

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks on this matter. Like the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, members on this side of the house are certainly not overlooking the coal industry which is so important to our province and the Atlantic area. It cannot be said that the members on this side are overlooking it, as I have said. We have support from the government members from Cape Breton North and Victoria, Cape Breton South, Inverness-Richmond, and others, and we are pleased with the steps taken by this government in this matter, which are the result of the submissions of the members on this side of the house.

I would like to congratulate the minister and the government on the increases in subventions which they have made possible, as shown by the estimates, and which have come at an important time to assist in the gaining of additional markets in upper Canada; also the payments, as shown in the estimates, to be made under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act.

Coal, as we all know, is fighting for its life, but it will come into its own, as was stated a short time ago by the chairman of the dominion coal board. But what is necessary is for the largest producer in the area, the Dominion Coal Company, to lessen its costs so as to be competitive in the market for fuels which exists today. We hope this will be carried out by this company, and that with the co-operation of all those upper Canadian markets, particularly the thermal plant in those areas, will be covered. I submit that we need a long range program to assist in keeping our present markets and achieving new markets. I understand that an announcement will be made in due course by the government as to a royal commission or inquiry of some type into the coal industry and I would suggest that in that inquiry attention be paid not only to the largest producer but to the independent producers in Nova Scotia, the Atlantic region generally and my own county of Pictou.

In the county of Pictou we have three mines in operation now, whereas several years ago we had six or seven. One thing I should like to see in the future, if possible, is the sending of more of the production of Acadia coal owned by Dosco from the MacBain mine at Thorburn for use in the upper Canadian markets with the help of the subventions which are possible under the estimates. These subventions are paid only on certain types of coal, of course, and part of the production from this particular mine could come under these subventions.

Announcement has been made that a new mill will be started in the Canso strait area and it is hoped that it will be completed within the next two years. It is hoped that the construction of this mill will assist in increased consumption of power from the thermal power plant at Trenton which is in my constituency. I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the committee on mines, forests and waters for their recommendation to increase the amount payable under the Act to assist producers of coal in Canada. There may be need of a change in the act in order to provide for assistance before too long if a responsible company or party in my own county should come forward with the idea of opening a mine in the Westville area. If the company is a responsible one I believe that the government of Nova Scotia will help in the endeavour.

I have gone over the act providing for assistance to producers of coal in Canada and have looked into the matter as a lawyer, but I am not quite sure whether or not it covers new mines, in any event, if a competent company comes forward I believe that this government, on the basis of the submission of the government of Nova Scotia and the submission of the company, will certainly amend the act to make it possible for the company to obtain money to carry out this project. A new mine in the Westville area has been talked about for a long time and submissions have been made by the industrial committee within the area which includes representatives of business, labour and various other groups. At the last convention of the United Mine workers of America held in Truro a recommendation was made that a new mine be established in Pictou county.

A submission was made by the Canadian Labour Congress, accompanied by officers of the independent unions at Greenwood in Pictou county and the Drummond mine at Westville for the opening of a new mine. I recall that I spoke on this matter at I believe the first session of parliament which I attended which commenced in October, 1957. I repeat that any commission or investigation must look into the matter of coal mining particularly in the Atlantic area by considering a long range program and also looking into the situation of the independent producers in Pictou county and throughout the province of Nova Scotia. I would point out that formerly we had roughly 2,000 employees working in the coal industry in our county and today we have approximately 500 employed in three mines.

I should like to state that we appreciate very much the help given by the federal government as shown in the estimates for the Atlantic provinces thermal power plan, and a large extension of the thermal plant at Trenton in Pictou county has been in progress for some time. I notice in the press that the grid system between the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick is now being completed and I hope that as more power is used more coal will be used, particularly in the thermal plant in my own area. The idea when the legislation was passed at the first session in 1957 was to provide cheaper power for new industry and thus help the coal industry.

Other industries are being introduced in our area and at various other places in the province of Nova Scotia but it will take time and effort to attain the necessary objectives of the plan. I would submit and recommend that the coal industry must be preserved for the sake of the families and the communities of those areas where coal mining has decreased over a number of years. We must preserve our present industries as well as introduce new ones.

Finally, the minister visited my area and the province of Nova Scotia generally last year. He travelled around and saw the bankheads although he did not go down in the mines. He spoke to officials and labour in Pictou county and has first-hand information about the problem. I know that he will give every consideration to the recommendations and suggestions I have made.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say one more word. While no one on this side objected and, indeed, we supported the increase in the subventions to help meet the crisis in the coal industry, it does seem to me that the constructive way to deal with the long term coal problem is certainly not to pay large sums out of the treasury to transport coal to central Canada in order to build up industry in central Canada. If these large sums of public money are going to require to be spent over any long period, and I am sure they will be over quite a period, in order to maintain and ultimately to improve this industry, it seems to me there are two much better channels into which the money could be directed and I hope that the inquiry will look into this matter.

The first is the use of coal right at the pithead to develop power so that more industry can be located in these Atlantic provinces. The second is to accelerate research as I think we should have done when we were in office. I say that quite openly, but the fact that it was not done is no excuse for not getting ahead with it now. We should accelerate research on a very large scale into new uses for coal because, if I may raise a very contentious point, I think if anybody will read fairly and objectively Mr. St. Laurent's famous speech—perhaps I should say "notorious"—at Fredericton in 1957 he will see that Mr. St. Laurent was absolutely right and that he had a real vision about this matter when he said that coal was going to be very much more valuable for its chemical properties before too long than as a fuel.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

General services—

127. Departmental administration, $398,000.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Chairman, I want to say that this is a time I have been looking forward to for many weeks and I am very pleased that it has eventually arrived. It is not my intention, however, to make a long statement because the committee on marine and fisheries made quite an extensive and exhaustive examination of the estimates of the Department of Fisheries and of the administration of the department. For those members of this committee who are not familiar with the membership of the standing committee on marine and fisheries, I want to assure them that all parties were represented on that committee by men who are thoroughly familiar with some phase or other of the fishing industry and between them had a very large and comprehensive knowledge of the fishing industry on both coasts and the inland lakes in all its phases. I must say their activities in that committee were most constructive. I should like, however, at this time to make a few general comments on the state of fishing in this country over the last year or so.

Last year was a highly profitable one for the British Columbia fishermen and also produced satisfactory results for most sectors of the Atlantic coast industry. The brightest feature of the Pacific coast industry was the near record catch of sockeye salmon. This came to 74 million pounds, worth $20 million. There had been high hopes for the dominant Adams river run, but even the most optimistic predictions of the scientists were surpassed. The total pack of canned sockeye was 1,100,000 48-pound cases and this was just short of the all-time record made in 1905. It came to more than half the pack of all species of salmon which reached 1,900,000 cases. However, the average prices paid to fishermen for sockeye and the reduced supply of pinks were slightly below 1957 levels. However, the total of all salmon landed, 181,300,000 pounds, represented an increase of 49,400,000 pounds over the 1957 catch and brought a record landed value of $37,100,000.

The 1958 Pacific halibut fishery also showed an improvement over 1957, both in quantity and value. Canadian fishermen landed 28,900,000 pounds, 5,100,000 pounds of this in United States ports. The catch was 3,800,000 pounds higher than that of 1957. The average prices received by fishermen also were considerably better. The west coast herring industry resumed normal operations in June, 1958, after a month long strike had been settled. To sum up the British Columbia operations, the total landed value of all seafish and shellfish taken there in 1958 reached $52,300,000, $21½ million more than in 1957.

Atlantic coast fishermen as a whole had a satisfactory year in 1958, their total landed value reaching $51,400,000. This was roughly an increase of $1 million over the previous year. The total value of the east coast catch comprised roughly 50 per cent of the total for our sea fisheries.

However, although results on the whole were satisfactory, the results achieved by fishermen in the Atlantic provinces were mixed, especially in the principal groundfish species, cod and haddock. The main cause of disappointment was the Newfoundland trap net fishery, which came to an end at an unusually early date when the feeding cod left inshore waters. The supplies of fish for salting and drying were affected by an acute shortage of squid for bait, which imposed limitations on line fishing. My department was able to alleviate this shortage to some extent by purchasing supplies of bait from outside Newfoundland. These were handled by the department's bait service.

In Newfoundland, the production of frozen fillets was not substantially affected by the failure of the inshore cod fishery. The offshore catches of cod and haddock in all the Atlantic area were lower than in 1957 but some cod supplies were diverted from the salting industry to the freezing plants. There were increased quantities of redfish, pollock, plaice and mixed flounders in all five Atlantic provinces for processing into fillets, blocks and slabs, and frozen fish production for last year rose by six million pounds to a total of 149 million pounds.

Lobster fishermen in the maritime provinces, Quebec and Newfoundland took 42,800,000 pounds of this valuable species, which was a drop of 1,900,000 pounds from 1957. However, prices were generally higher in 1958, and rose even more sharply during the early months of this year when stormy weather reduced the catch. The landed value of lobster last year came to $15,900,000, which was 31 per cent of the total for all species.

On both coasts, the primary fishery made further advances last year in securing more efficient catching equipment. There were improved versions of the well proven gill netters, seiners, draggers, longliners and other types of vessel, and in addition there were more combination or multipurpose fishing boats brought into service. The construction of processing facilities in certain areas, whose fishery resources had been underexploited before, helped to stimulate vessel construction.

There were some minor marketing problems last year but in general it was a good year from the standpoint of sales. Stocks were normal when the important summer fishing season began and there were good export sales throughout the year. These, together with moderate levels of production in most sectors, maintained a satisfactory balance in the industry. Canned salmon and salted cod, however, presented temporary problems.

The tremendous catch of sockeye that I have already mentioned was a bonanza for the canning industry as well as the fishermen. The packers, nevertheless, faced the prospects of heavy carrying charges on their investment. Fortunately, the government of the United Kingdom was able to announce at the commonwealth conference last September that canned salmon was to be placed on open general licence. Importers in the United Kingdom immediately contracted for the greater part of the sockeye pack, about $26 million worth, leaving 300,000 cases to be sold in Canada.

Moderate stocks of salted cod had been carried over from the 1957 production into the 1958-59 marketing year, but these were soon disposed of, and the drop in last year's production compelled Canadian saltfish exporters to ration their traditional customers in the Caribbean area and southern Europe. Increases in the controlled prices for salted cod were granted by the governments of Puerto Rico and Jamaica toward the end of 1957. This fact, together with the short supply position which existed in most saltfish producing nations last year, led exporters to ask for higher prices on the 1958 production also. Some markets accepted moderate price increases but others, notably Jamaica, did not.

The United States market for frozen fish strengthened from the spring of 1958 on, partly because of a further recovery in fishstick production and the rapid growth in popularity of the fish portion, TV dinners and modern packs of that sort. The strong demand, coupled with the moderate level of frozen fish production and stocks in Canada and the United States last year, brought higher prices which meant increased returns to Canadian fishermen.

Taken altogether the total value of Canada's exports of fish and fishery products achieved a new high in 1958, $155 million, an increase of $22½ million over 1957. Canned salmon contributed the major part of the increase.

I might say in closing that prosperity in the Canadian commercial fishing industry in 1959 will depend to an important degree on the competition in the foreign countries where roughly two-thirds of our production is marketed.

While it is difficult to forecast the future, certain trends appear to be developing. There are indications, from what information is available on the winter cod fisheries of Iceland and Norway, that those countries are reducing their production of salted cod this year. The trawler fishermen of France, Portugal and Spain also are known to be less than optimistic thus far about their 1959 production. There is reason, therefore, to expect that the Canadian salt fish industry will be able to market a normal season's production during the coming year at ruling prices.

On the other hand, Portugal and Spain are increasing and modernizing their fishing fleets and gradually are reducing their requirements for imported salt cod. In Latin America, Cuban interests, after several years of uncertainty, established a small salt fish industry last year, with the hope of reducing their country's dependence on foreign supplies. Efforts to regain a reliable market for salted cod in Brazil continue to face substantial obstacles.

However, I might say that in the long view there is almost inevitably going to be an increasing demand for fish products. As the population on this continent especially increases people will of necessity and through choice, when they learn of the benefits of including more protein from the sea in their diet, create an ever increasing market for the products of the sea. I feel that in the years to come these products will take a place of ever increasing importance in our general economy.

Mr. McWilliam: Mr. Chairman, the committee thanks the minister for his statement which presented a very good over-all picture of the Canadian fishing industry last year and what the department hopes for in the year to come. The minister's statement to the committee once again, in my opinion, left the members with the view that the minister is trying to do the best job possible for the fisheries.

On the whole, the administration of the fisheries department is considered to be very good. The Newfoundland bait service left something to be desired this year and last year and the matter of the availability of lobster bait this year in many parts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick caused concern at the start of the season. The loss of fish export markets, particularly for Newfoundland, has had adverse effects on the fisheries of that province. I feel that I should state here, however, that markets are primarily the responsibility of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Nevertheless, that fact should not lessen the efforts of the Department of Fisheries in respect of markets for fish.

The minister's statement before the marine and fisheries committee gave a resumé of existing conditions which assisted materially in the discussions of that committee. In passing, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I wonder why the word "marine" appears in the title of the committee on fisheries. Having regard to the many and varied problems that face the Department of Fisheries, both new ones and continuing ones—some which require negotiation with other countries, others that are complicated as between provinces; also problems within local fishing areas—the minister and his officials both here in Ottawa and in the field are, I am sure, deserving of appreciation and credit for their efforts and their desire to bring about the best possible solution under existing circumstances and in many cases complex aspects.

My opening remarks prompt me to state once again—and this is a personal view—that the status of the Department of Fisheries should be raised. The departmental estimates should be increased toward accelerating and expanding this most important department of government. As conditions and markets change in other industries, so do conditions and markets change in the primary industry of fisheries. These changes demand more research, better methods of processing and marketing, better methods of production, if we are to produce a product that will warrant higher prices to the trade and at the same time mean a saving to the consumer and a better price to the primary producer.

While efforts to cut down costs in the departmental estimates are commendable and pleasing I am sure to the Minister of Finance in this period of deficit financing, costs should not be cut down on phases of the department's work that require expansion to improve the industry. As the Atlantic provinces' outlook as an industrial area does not appear to hold very bright prospects, emphasis should be placed on fishing and farming in order to help stabilize the economy of these provinces. I trust that the minister will be able to convince his cabinet colleagues, particularly the Minister of Finance, that there is a vital necessity and expediency for an increased share of public moneys to do the complete job for fisheries that is necessary as a safeguard for the industry's future.

It does not take a northern vision to realize what is necessary for the future of the fishing industry. Canada's oldest primary producer has not kept pace with rapid advances throughout the years to the same extent as other industries particularly in terms of financial income to the primary producers and the methods of production and marketing.

In this year's main estimates the total vote for the Department of Fisheries is $19,544,777, a decrease of approximately $269,554 from last year's main estimates. The supplementary estimates recently tabled include further items in the amount of $1,788,090. It is encouraging to note that further moneys will be provided for economics services, industrial development and for conservation services. I trust that there is no sizeable decrease in moneys for essential services this year. If there has been a decrease in any of these votes, outside the major projects mentioned by the minister in the marine and fisheries committee, I ask the minister if he will advise the committee where decreases were made and why.

There is a phase of the department's work about which I wish to make some remarks. The many reports heard from maritime sources—reports heard from reliable fishermen with long experience in both commercial and sport fishing—leave the impression that an exhaustive survey should be made towards instituting a better program of protection and conservation. I am sure the department is aware of this situation and probably has considered plans to extend the present program but is not able to do so because sufficient moneys are not voted by parliament.

The additional information gathered by an exhaustive survey, together with information now in the possession of the department, could be the basis for a comprehensive study of an adequate conservation and protective system. In this connection I make particular reference to conservation and protection for the propagation of salmon and lobster.

The department's staff in the field directed by officials at Ottawa is doing a good job in so far as a good job can be done by a staff inadequate in number. There are many miles of water to patrol, many spawning areas to protect, which cannot be adequately patrolled and protected by a staff that is too few in numbers.

Mr. Chairman, at this time may I make brief reference to the plans of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources for very large additions to its staff for expansion in Canada's northland. It is my firm conviction that the development of Canada's oldest industry—fisheries—should hold priority over the development of a part of our country which is sparsely inhabited, and that the inherent rights of those Canadians and their ancestors who have made a great contribution to the building up of this country should not be disregarded when consideration is given to the financial assistance necessary to place the fishing industry on the highest possible plane. The development of Canada's northland is essential. However, it should be developed in accordance with a long range plan to be brought about when the ills of our populated areas have been solved, not at the expense of other parts of the country.

These last remarks, Mr. Chairman, bring me back to something which I have been promoting for years—the need for an expansion in all branches of the Department of Fisheries. The assistance given by governments to western wheat and grain farmers is well known and, may I add, not always understood by people in other parts of Canada. It has been criticized on the basis that similar assistance in a comparable degree is not provided for other primary producers.

I stated previously that the total amount to be voted for the Department of Fisheries in the main estimates for the year 1959-60 is $19,544,777. In comparison it will be noted that according to the figures in the estimates book there are 20 other departments of government which will be voted more moneys than the Department of Fisheries. These votes range from $21 million to $1,750 million. For example, the estimates of the Department of Agriculture amount to $106 million, and here are some other figures: Atomic Energy $32 million; Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, $70 million; national research council, $30 million; northern affairs and national resources, $85 million. As I say, the expenditure is topped by the Department of National Defence with a vote of $1,750 million.

Mr. Chairman, if the members of this house representing constituencies which have fishing interests would join together in an attempt to raise the status of the Department of Fisheries to its proper level and ensure that moneys were made available to do all the things which could and should be done to improve our fishing industry, then a notable service would be performed in the best interests of our country and in the interest of an industry which is essential not only to our national economy but also to the health of our nation.

There are three matters I wish to draw to the attention of the minister at this time. They do not come completely within the jurisdiction of the minister, but they are of direct concern to the fishing industry and in consequence I judge my references to them to be in order under the general item now under discussion. On June 5, when the estimates of the Public Works Department were before the committee. I requested the Minister of Public Works to have a complete survey made of Miramichi waters in preparation for the construction of small landings and improved facilities, in addition to dredging, to assist the Miramichi fishing industry. At that time I urged the minister to seek the co-operation of the Minister of Fisheries in this task, and I now ask the Minister of Fisheries to make representations with a view to having this survey made. May I suggest, also, that the survey be a physical, on the spot survey, and that information be obtained from fishermen actively engaged in the industry as to the need for facilities. I suggest, also, that the economic branch of the Department of Public Works should not look on these suggested small projects with a jaundiced eye of a hard-shell banker, but that other factors be considered besides the actual dollar return on the costs, because these small landings and other improved facilities will increase the over-all volume and value of the fishery and in a short time results will prove that the expenditures were warranted, to say nothing of the fact that the hard task of the fisherman will in some measure have been alleviated.

Another subject that I wish to raise concerns loans under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. Earlier this session when the bill to extend the life of this act was before the house suggestions were made that more extensive advertising should be undertaken in order to acquaint fishermen of the provisions of this measure. I trust that the officials of the fisheries department have urged the Department of Finance to conduct a wider advertising campaign in this regard. I hold in my hand a pamphlet issued under the imprint of the Queen's printer. It outlines the procedure to be followed in making application for the loan, and the last subheading in the pamphlet reads: "See the manager of your local bank or credit union". I had personal experience in this connection in the course of efforts to assist certain fishermen with their applications for loans, and I found that local bank managers had very little knowledge of the act and still less of the regulations, for the reason that they had never been furnished with pamphlets or other data. As a result valuable time was spent in securing clarification from the Department of Finance and from federal fisheries officials.

On the basis of this experience I judge that the same situation exists in many localities, or that it did exist, and I strongly urge that steps be taken, if they have not already been taken since the recent request was made, to forward to banks and credit unions in fishing areas complete information in both official languages about this act.

I wish also to solicit the minister's support of amendments at the next session to increase the repayment period permissible for loans under this act for the purchase or construction of fishing equipment, and I urge the hon. gentleman to make representations along these lines to the Minister of Finance. I hope the act may be amended so that instead of the present three-year repayment term we may be able to take advantage of a graduated plan of repayments over a period up to eight years depending upon the amount of the loan requested. This period of up to eight years is suggested because certain other loans under this act are linked with an eight-year repayment period.

It is not my intention to discuss at this time local aspects of Miramichi fisheries. In the past I have placed certain views on the record. I have discussed local matters with the officials of the departments and I shall have further discussions and correspondence as representations reach me from Miramichi fishermen's association and other interested groups. However, there are two questions about which I wish to make a comment at this time in regard to telegrams which I have received. On July 15 I received the following telegram from the chairman of the fishermen's association:

> Miramichi salmon drift net fishermen are disappointed that after recent disaster lift period was not eliminated but just rotated which is no direct assistance. Drifters now request they be allowed to fish through to August 15 as requested by prior representation from this association. Copy of this wire sent to Hon. Angus MacLean and Hon. R. Pichette. Sgd. H. G. Crocker, chairman.

I also received a telegram this afternoon in this connection. It is dated July 17, and reads as follows:

> Drifters would like you to remind minister setting back of lift period was suggestion of private individual and not their request or that of Hon. Mr. Pichette. With mackerel a failure next two weeks looks grim for these men. Sgd. H. G. Crocker.

I wish now to make reference to the representations recently made by the Miramichi commercial fishermen's association for the advancement of the opening date of the Miramichi smelt fishing season to October 15 from the present date of October 30. I know the minister will give sympathetic consideration to these matters. I appreciate the problems he faces in the conservation of the fisheries. We realize that conservation is of prime importance. I know that the fishermen of Miramichi have an understanding of his difficulties and they know that whatever decision the minister reaches will be arrived at on sound grounds.

I trust that the future holds a general improvement in the fishing industry and that the Department of Fisheries will get a larger share of the public purse next year to carry out the improvements that are needed and that our lost fish export markets will be regained and new ones promoted.

I wish now to comment on the tragic storm of June 20 that took the lives of 35 Miramichi salmon fishermen and caused extensive damage including the loss of boats and nets and considerable damage to lobster traps. Of the 35 men and boys who lost their lives 13 are accounted for and 22 are still missing. There were several family groups among the fatalities including fathers, sons and brothers. Eighty-three children have been left fatherless. Twenty widows with 83 children have been left with no means of livelihood. Four mothers who were previously dependent on their sons are now left without support. They face a bleak future until their children come of age and can provide support.

A disaster fund is being raised from subscriptions. On behalf of the families and the district I wish to express appreciation for the donations that have been made. The care of the widows and their children will be a continuing problem for many years to come and it is hoped that the disaster fund will reach the required amount.

With regard to assistance for the replacement of boats, salmon nets and lobster traps, I believe this assistance should be provided by the federal and provincial governments at the earliest possible time so the fishermen can get back into the industry at the former level of production.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs, New Brunswick's representative in the federal cabinet, when expressing his sympathy over the tragic storm, said in part as reported at page 4988 of Hansard of June 22:

> —everything possible will be done to see that help is given these needy families in the way of restoring equipment and gear.

These were most welcome words which helped to ease the feeling of the stricken families that all was lost.

On June 30, as reported at page 5269 of Hansard of that date, I asked the Minister of Fisheries if any plans had been formulated to date toward rendering assistance to Miramichi salmon drifters and lobster fishermen. In reply the minister stated in part that the department provides a subsidized insurance system for fishermen with regard to boats and lobster traps. The minister also stated that in many cases he believed insurance was carried and that in cases where insurance was not carried, that in the event of a disaster of this type the first responsibility rested with the provincial level of government. The minister qualified this statement by saying:

> I am sure that any requests which may come through that channel for assistance would be very sympathetically considered by this government.

It therefore appears that the federal government will assess damages and make payments where insurance was carried and will give consideration to assistance for loss and damage where no insurance coverage was carried upon request from the government of the province of New Brunswick. It is my contention that both levels of government should provide assistance for losses suffered as has been done in other cases and that the disaster fund raised by public subscriptions should not have to be used to replace boats, nets and lobster traps.

The present situation among the salmon drift net and lobster fishermen of the south shore of the Miramichi bay is grim and bleak. Most of the fishermen were in debt for their boats and nets prior to the storm and if assistance is not forthcoming they will be burdened with larger debt and in many cases may not be able to secure the credit to purchase new equipment. Most of the boats, nets and lobster traps that were salvaged are in need of extensive repairs which add to the burden of debt.

If no request has been received to date from the provincial government I appeal to the minister to take immediate steps to contact the provincial government with respect to working out a plan of assistance, as it is vital that no time be lost in deciding what joint action will be taken. These primary producers should be rendered assistance in their hour of need. Hon. members of this committee and Canadians generally are familiar with other forms of assistance granted by the federal government on a great number of occasions in cases where the need was not as great and without attendant tragic circumstances as in this instance.

Preliminary reports disclose that out of 53 boats lost in the Miramichi bay-Northumberland strait area, 23 were covered by insurance under the fishermen's indemnity plan. At this time I do not have the actual number of boats of the Escuminac fleet that were lost and were not covered by insurance but I feel safe in assuming that more than half would not have been covered.

A greater loss in terms of dollar value was suffered in the loss and damage of lobster traps on which, unfortunately, no insurance was carried. As nets were not insurable under the indemnity plan, a complete loss was suffered on this type of gear. The nets that were salvaged sustained a 50 per cent loss of value and subsequent length of time of usage over and above the cost of repairs.

A temporary formula to provide for the immediate needs of the stricken families has been set up and disbursements are being made from the publicly subscribed relief fund. A permanent formula will be drafted when the total amount of the fund is known. Much more money is needed and further appeals are being made to provide the necessities of life for the widows and children, both for the immediate future and in the years ahead. On their behalf I appeal to the generosity of all who can make contributions, large or small, to do so. Donations will be accepted at any branch of the Royal Bank of Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: I am very sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to tell him that his time has expired.

Mr. McWilliam: I have only two or three more sentences, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee to give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McWilliam: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate the indulgence of the committee. Since the tragic storm, requests have been made for adequate aids to navigation and for an improved system of reporting the weather and in particular advancing storms. The Minister of Transport has given me assurance that he will look into this matter immediately. Many such improvements can be made in the fishing area of Miramichi bay, improvements that would prevent loss of life, the lack of which was brought out so dramatically on June 20.

It is also pleasing to note that the provincial government officials have taken action toward gaining recognition for the acts of heroism that were performed by the fishermen. The acting premier of New Brunswick, the Hon. Mr. Skaling, has already made efforts in this direction.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I again wish to express my deepest heartfelt sympathy to the bereaved families, and I trust divine providence and sympathetic support in some measure will help them in their time of great sorrow, not only in a spiritual way but also in a material way.

I also wish once again on behalf of the constituents I represent to express appreciation to all those who assisted in the search and rescue and to all those who made contributions to the disaster fund; also a special word of appreciation to Her Majesty the Queen and Prince Philip for the gift they made to this fund. It is pleasing to note that arrangements are being made to transport the widows an dtheir children to Pointe du Chene, New Brunswick, to meet the Queen. At that time she can add a personal note of expression to her previous message of condolence.

I wish to end, Mr. Chairman, on a note expressing the hope that nothing will be left undone in the humanitarian efforts that must be put forth by both governments and all others who are able to assist, so that efforts will not be found wanting, efforts that will forever have the deepest appreciation of the bereaved families and all the people of the stricken area.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, first on behalf of the C.C.F. representation in the house—I am sure I am speaking with a unanimous voice on this occasion, anyway—I would like to express our appreciation not only of the manner in which the minister has been able to grasp the vastly complex problems within the department but of the genial and sincere way in which he always discusses the questions relating to his department. I have the greatest admiration for the minister in this regard. In his spare moments I think he might be able to find some extra curricular occupation by giving some guidance in this matter to such gentlemen as the Minister of Finance and other cabinet ministers. I should also like to express our appreciation of the attitude and of the work conducted by the members of the minister's staff, the scientists, biologists and others who work unceasingly for the promotion of fisheries questions and for the development of our fisheries in Canada and for the consumption of fish by Canadians and others.

As the minister said, these departmental estimates were dealt with rather extensively in the committee, but as I mentioned to the minister when I met him in the corridor one day, he should have arranged to bring his estimates before the house as soon as the committee was over and he would have got them through right away. The longer the delay the more problems arise that require additional discussion.

I should like to make reference to two or three specific matters, and in the process pose some questions to the minister. In the committee's proceedings, if I can make reference to one or two pages as a preface, on Friday, April 10, at page 45, following some discussion about the knowledge of trawlers and other fishing vessels from the Soviet union which were sighted out in the Pacific and so on, the minister had this comment to make:

> Mr. Chairman, the department has some information regarding Russian trawlers that are now fishing in the Bering sea. Reports indicate that there are about 42 trawlers, six refrigeration ships, a tug and a transport.

Farther on he said:

> As yet, we have no indication that this Russian fleet is fishing any types of fish that are covered by any treaties now in effect.

I have some special interest here in so far as the salmon fisheries are concerned, because it is known there is an intermingling area out in that particular area where the Soviet trawlers were noticed. Can the minister give us any additional information about the activities of those particular Soviet ships that were sighted out in the Bering sea and in other parts? Can he give us the information he has at the moment which might be additional to that which he gave to the committee on April 10? However, there is a problem which might arise out of the activities of fishing vessels in so far as our salmon fisheries on the west coast are concerned? A problem might arise out of fishing vessels which belong to countries which are not signatories to the north Pacific fisheries treaty, such as are Japan, the United States and Canada, if the Soviet union is fishing in waters far from its own shores. Even though at the moment it may not be fishing for fish that we in British Columbia are concerned with; nevertheless the possibility is there because of technological changes and the size of the fish that the Soviet fishermen can take out in the fishing areas which are now restricted to fishing by the Pacific fisheries commission. It is five o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15, to leave the chair to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private bills, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I understood there was agreement among the parties that we would proceed with the estimates this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreeable to waive the hour for private and public bills?

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Pickersgill: So far as we are concerned, sir.

Mr. Howard: Do you see how co-operative we are?

Mr. Speaker: By unanimous consent, the period provided by standing order 15, section 3, for the consideration of private and public bills is waived and the house will revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

127. Departmental administration, $398,000.

Mr. Howard: There is a problem, Mr. Chairman, that could arise not only from the soviet fishing boats but, as indicated in the committee, from fishing boats that might come from the mainland of China which could be fishing in the intermingling area where salmon from the British Columbia coast and the British Columbia rivers spend a great deal of the time of their younger and maturing life. The only thing now which prevents Canada, the United States and Japan from fishing in that particular area, as was pointed out in the committee, is that we have no jurisdiction over the area nor does any other country. It is the high seas and they are completely open. I believe it would be well worth while for the department in conjunction with the Department of External Affairs, if they have not already done so, to start laying the ground work for discussions and consultations with other nations on the Pacific who might be engaged in the salmon fishing industry in order to protect as much as we can our own fisheries in the province of British Columbia. I am sure that other countries would be equally as interested.

However, if the Soviet union and the Chinese get to the stage of having boats of the required size, become interested in fishing in this area and are allowed to move in there and fish and catch immature salmon, British Columbia salmon spawned in the rivers of that province, we may find it will have a very detrimental affect upon the development of the fishery and increasing the numbers of salmon. I will not say that it will ruin our salmon fishery completely on the west coast but it could have a very detrimental effect.

I hope that discussions of this nature are under way at the international level to ensure that the conservation methods we have practised in conjunction with the United States and Japan under the north Pacific fisheries commission will be followed by other countries who may be interested in fishing there and so that these countries will be able to participate in a new treaty or an expanded treaty providing that conservation practices will be followed by all countries that may want to fish in that particular area.

We had some discussion in the committee with respect to transferring part of the jurisdiction now in the hands of the Minister of Agriculture with respect to the administration of the Cold Storage Act with the idea of the Minister of Fisheries having under his jurisdiction that part of the administration having to do with the provision of cold storage facilities for fish or, on the other hand, the introduction of new legislation to give him that jurisdiction. There might then be a little more consideration given to fisheries cold storage facilities than is now being given under the Department of Agriculture. In this regard I should like to remind the minister of what he said in the standing committee. I want to place his remarks on Hansard as close as possible to the remarks which I hope he will make in this connection. As found in the proceedings of the standing committee on marine and fisheries, page 68, the minister had this to say. I will not read all of his comment but only the latter part having to do with cold storage for fish. He said:

> However, I can say that it certainly will be considered. I appreciate the members of the committee raising this question because it appears to have merit which at least makes it worthy of consideration.

The minister was dealing with the cold storage question. It will be recalled that the same matter was raised on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture and the Minister of Agriculture said he would take it under advisement and engage in some sort of consultation with the Minister of Fisheries. I would appreciate some indication from the minister as to the progress of these consultations and when we may expect the transfer to take place in order that those engaged in the provision of cold storage facilities for the fishing industry will receive better consideration of their applications for subsidies than they have had from the Department of Agriculture since the minister now in charge took office.

I should also like to comment on one other specific matter connected particularly with the Fraser river which is the most important fish river in British Columbia. Quite a controversy has raged in the past few years which is erroneously referred to as the fish versus power controversy. There are interests in British Columbia who want to develop the Fraser river for power purposes and have wanted to do so far quite a number of years. So far the fisheries department has been able to convince those interested in developing the Fraser that if they do develop it for power purposes they will ruin the river so far as fishing is concerned and the results will be far more detrimental than beneficial.

In this regard a couple of articles have come to my attention which have appeared in various publications. One appeared in the October, 1958 issue of The B.C. Professional Engineer. The article is entitled, "Multiple Purpose Development of the Fraser River Basin". It is written by Mr. Val Gwyther, professional engineer, who refers to himself as a member of the Fraser river multiple use committee. That is a very imposing title. One would think that it was a rather responsible committee but the Fraser river multiple use committee is financed by the B.C. Electric Company which is primarily interested in developing hydroelectric power and not too interested in fish.

I submit that Mr. Gwyther, who is a civil engineer, may know his civil engineering but he knows relatively little about fish biology. It is unfortunate that this type of erroneous propaganda which is being disseminated by Mr. Gwyther and the left arm of the B.C. Electric Company, the Fraser river multiple use committee, is receiving the publicity that it is. These are not my own thoughts on the matter. Comments were made about this particular article in a letter written to Mr. Gwyther by Mr. Milo Moore, director of fisheries at Washington. Part of that letter is reproduced in the publication of the fisheries association of British Columbia for March, 1959. With regard to Mr. Val Gwyther's attempt to promote the interests of the B.C. Electric Company, Mr. Moore says:

> The statements you made in your recent speech regarding the fish handling facilities are not correct when you state . . . high survival; in fact, no mortality.

Then there is this quotation from Mr. Moore's letter as reproduced here:

> If we are to receive the full confidence of the general public for our program, the above type of publicity must be curtailed as much as possible.

These are not my words. They are the words of a person who has spent quite a number of years in fisheries work. The B.C. Professional Engineer, which published this article by Val Gwyther, also published another article which appeared in the March, 1959 edition, by Mr. C. H. Clay and Dr. P. A. Larkin, both of whom have been engaged in fisheries projects with the Department of Fisheries and with the University of British Columbia. Their article contradicted the erroneous information given by Mr. Gwyther. It is unfortunate that the editorial board of the University of British Columbia alumni Chronicle should have been sucked in by this Mr. Gwyther and carried in a recent edition of their publication an article by the same gentleman setting forth the same type of false ideas which, if accepted, would lead to the ruination of the Fraser as a fish river.

In this regard I inquired of the minister in the house a few days ago whether this had been drawn to his attention and I discovered afterwards that some people had interpreted my remarks to mean that the minister should engage in some sort of censorship and be in a position to direct the U.B.C. alumni Chronicle as to what they should or should not publish. This, of course, was not my intention. I read the words over again and I still could not read that interpretation into them. All I was attempting to do then was to wonder whether or not the minister could arrange to request the U.B.C. alumni Chronicle to make a similar amount of space available for an article similar to that written in the B.C. Professional Engineer, Dr. Larkin and Mr. Scott, in order to get the side of the picture across which supports the thought that fisheries are more use than hydroelectric development.

It is unfortunate, too, that a publication of the stature, and a responsible one at that, of the U.B.C. alumni Chronicle could be used for the purpose of publishing an article by a person who, judging by the comments made, has relatively little knowledge of the biology of fish. I understand that the U.B.C. alumni Chronicle will agree to publishing an additional article later setting forth the point of view that supports the fishery. I am not the only one who was upset over these articles which appeared in the U.B.C. alumni Chronicle. Mr. James Sinclair, who was formerly minister of fisheries and who is now president of the fish association of British Columbia, has also indicated his displeasure at this particular article, as has Senator Tom Reid, who is chairman of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission. These are two very responsible and respected members of society in public life who have taken a large interest in the fisheries question for a number of years. I hope that through their efforts and through the efforts of the Department of Fisheries, such misleading, erroneous and incorrect articles as Mr. Val Gwyther has written under the auspices of the Fraser river multiple use committee, which is nothing more than an organization financed by the B.C. Electric Company, will be counteracted. I hope we will be able to get across to the general public a more correct impression of the fish and power question.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, now that consideration is being given to fisheries I can avail myself of this opportunity to study the over-all picture in connection with this subject. The particular consideration we give to this matter must be applied more specifically to those provinces wherein the fisheries play such an important part in their economy and way of life. I refer primarily to the Atlantic provinces, and in particular to the province of Newfoundland.

The encouragement and assistance given to the fisheries of Newfoundland over the past 10 years have been all too inadequate to keep abreast of the times and to make returns profitable for those engaged therein. The establishment of much needed bait depots and freezing plants has been too long delayed, and they have not been established in the proportion required by the fishing population. Give us the tools and we will do the job is a phrase that could be aptly applied to the fisheries of Newfoundland. The government of Canada has not supplied the necessary tools.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that unemployment insurance as it applies to fishermen should be reconsidered and a new scheme should be developed. At present, under the Unemployment Insurance Act the benefits to fishermen are uncertain and artificial because in years when the fishery is good the fishermen can qualify for good benefits but in poor seasons when the fishermen need help the most unemployment insurance benefits are small. Unemployment insurance should be supplemented by some provision like the prairie farm assistance to meet failures in the fishery.

Newfoundland will always be in the fishing industry and all the new processes for offering this fish for sale in the markets of the world still depend primarily on the fish being caught and made. This catching and making of the fish is the point at which new methods and new approaches are required. This problem should receive early consideration from the federal government because we cannot have a prosperous Canada without having a sound and practical means for having a good fishery each year.

The fisheries of Canada need help in finding methods that are practical and cheap for catching and curing the fish. The methods used in Canada today are too expensive, and we need to produce the finished product much cheaper. Canadian fish are sold in the markets of the world, and these markets should be explored and expanded and new outlets for the sale of our fish should be secured. In short, our fisheries need a complete overhaul in order to place them on a sound commercial basis so that extra Canadian capital could be encouraged to invest in our fisheries.

Unless and until the federal government shoulders its responsibility and shows the way, private interests will not take the lead in investing the capital that is needed to help expand this most important aspect of our economy. The fisheries, therefore, will always remain with us as a very uncertain means of livelihood for so many of our people. I would suggest that the federal government give early and earnest consideration to further assistance to the fisheries, and that a full investigation into our fisheries be made forthwith with a view to making our Canadian fisheries a more worth-while part of our Canadian economy.

I should like to speak for a few minutes about the sealing industry in Newfoundland, the seal fishery. In 1857 approximately 13,000 men prosecuted the seal fishery in 400 sealing ships from Newfoundland. Last spring only two ships participated from Newfoundland, and while the industry is diminishing in Newfoundland it has increased in Nova Scotia where, last spring, eight ships took part in the hunt, as a result of the enterprise of Norwegians who became Canadians after the war, and two private firms, the Sea Traders and George Shaw Limited. In addition to the ships from Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, each year Norwegian ships take part in the seal fishery off the coast of Newfoundland which is known as the front. These Norwegian ships have been coming to Newfoundland for years, and it is not understandable how these ships can come from Norway and make a profitable voyage while we in Canada do not seem to be able to do much about it. At one time, even when the value of the dollar was very low, the industry had a value of more than $1.75 million. In my opinion, this industry should be given serious consideration. The killing date should be deferred until March 10 and the killing of old seals should be prohibited. No ship should be allowed to make a second trip.

A couple of months ago the entire crew of the fishing boat Blue Wave, who were fishing off the coast of Newfoundland, were drowned. A few weeks ago a storm occurred off the coast of New Brunswick and took the lives of 35 fishermen, leaving 20 women husbandless and 83 children fatherless. Immediately appeals were made on their behalf. While the general public responded generously, as it always does, I feel that the time is long past when we should have statutory provisions with respect to help and care for the wives and children of those brave men whose lot it is to go to the sea in ships and do their business in great waters. Instead of leaving the families to uncertainty, a national policy should be established.

Mr. Winch: Are you in favour of a disaster fund?

Mr. Tucker: Yes.

Mr. Winch: That is good.

Mr. Tucker: I hope the present minister will continue his keen interest in the workings of his department and will continue community stages, bait depots and other benefits as long as they are proving beneficial to the fishermen in Newfoundland.

Mr. Carter: The various items of these estimates were gone over very carefully in the standing committee on fisheries. I think perhaps it would be advisable to make comments of a general nature on the first item rather than having comments on each item separately. The committee was greatly impressed by the frank and honest manner in which the minister replied to our questions in committee and by the industry which he has shown in tackling the problems of his department. I should like to pay my personal tribute to the minister for his sincerity of purpose and for the non-partisan approach which he has made to all the problems that we have brought to his attention. I should also like to express my appreciation of the sympathetic consideration which we have always received from the deputy minister and his various officials in connection with the various matters which we have had to bring before them. While I am expressing appreciation I want to include also my appreciation for the dinner which the minister's department tendered to the fisheries committee. It was a special occasion of rejoicing for me because it was the first time in my recollection that the lowly salt cod has ever been elevated beyond soup chowder, the first dish on the menu.

I should like to make a few remarks about the community stage program. In my opinion the community stage program is an excellent idea and one that offers great promise in the development, particularly of our shore fisheries in Newfoundland. I think it was unfortunate that it should have been introduced as part of a winter works program because I believe that fact to some degree reduced the benefits that such a program is capable of producing.

Several handicaps have resulted from the way in which this program was worked out in my own riding. In the first place these stages were placed in communities in which perhaps they were not most needed from the standpoint of the fishery but in which there was the most need for work. There was therefore a clash between the two purposes. There was some dissatisfaction in my own riding also owing to the fact that there seemed to be two different kinds of community stage program. There was one kind of program in which the fishermen received pay for their labour in building the stages and there was another program in which the fishermen were compelled to provide free labour. When two communities a few miles apart find that they are being treated differently, this fact is bound to lead to some dissatisfaction. However, that consideration should not be permitted to detract from the program itself which I think should be improved and extended.

There is a great need for this type of program in my own riding for two reasons. One is that more people are being forced to return to the fisheries after a great many years and because they have been away from the fisheries for so long their private fishing premises have all deteriorated and fallen apart; and they are not in a position to rebuild. This is a situation which could be turned to good account because I think it will make for much better control of the quality of production if we can have the fish in a settlement processed and taken care of in one building or at one spot, instead of at numerous different spots scattered around the harbour.

Another advantage resulting from the community stage is that it affords the fisherman a protection which normally should be provided by competition. In Newfoundland there is not very much competition in the purchase of fresh fish or of salt fish. The various salt fish processing plants offer much the same price and it is a very low one, ranging perhaps from one and a quarter cents to two and three-quarter cents a pound. The same is true of people who buy salt fish. They all offer practically the same price too. The protection for the fisherman against this kind of situation is that he, through a community stage such as this, has a choice of either selling his fish fresh or putting it under salt. That is a great advantage.

I hope it will not be too long before a third advantage will be tried out. Yesterday I brought to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who I see is still in his seat, the possibility of getting together with the Minister of Fisheries in order to see whether an experiment cannot be carried out whereby small cod fish which is perhaps too small to be processed by a salt fish plant or to be put under salt might be put up in tins. I think we should try this out and see if we can find a market for this tinned fish in some of the countries of Africa and Asia. I do not think it is something that can be done on a big scale but I think it is worth while looking into. If the experiment proved to be successful, perhaps the fishermen's stages might also be extended to include small canneries.

The next point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister is that the production of light salted fish is still going down while the production of heavy salted fish is going up. It was the light salted fish that made Newfoundland famous and which originally created the demand for Newfoundland's salt fish in the markets of the world. Light salted fish production declined from 66,418 quintals in the first six months of last year to 46,610 quintals for the first six months of this year, but heavy salted products went up from 94,000 quintals during the same period last year to 115,000 this year. It is in the interest of the Newfoundland fisheries to encourage the production of light salted fish. The Prime Minister, during the election campaign, I think, promised that a floor price would be established under salt fish. That is something which the fishermen have always wanted, but it is something that is not easy to accomplish. I think it would be much easier to work out some plan whereby more emphasis might be placed on and more encouragement given to the production of light salted fish for which there is always a good market.

The bait service has during the past two years encountered some very unfortunate handicaps in that bait has been scarce when we needed it most. The minister told us in committee that the portable bait depots have proved successful and that a number of new ones are planned for this year and, I hope, for succeeding years. I want to plead with the minister to make sure the south coast riding gets its fair share of these portable depots. We feel we were a little on the short end of the community stage program because we only got two out of 20 stages for Newfoundland. We hope that this position will be corrected as time goes on. I mention this now so that the minister will make sure that the same thing does not happen with respect to the portable bait depots.

As the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi has mentioned, we were all shocked by the disaster which happened to the New Brunswick fishermen in the storm on June 20, and our sympathy and the sympathy of my constituents goes out to the dependants of those men. This is a reminder of a similar tragedy which occurred in my own riding last February when, as the hon. member for Trinity-Conception recalled, the dragger Blue Wave was lost with all hands. As a result of that disaster, 16 men were lost, leaving behind them 15 widows and 40 children. So we know what the people of New Brunswick are going through, because that has been our sad lot many times in our history. In fact, I have no hesitation in saying that there are more fishermen's widows in my riding than there are in all the rest of Newfoundland.

I mention that to emphasize to the minister and his officials that the south coast riding which I represent is one part of Newfoundland where fishermen can and do fish all the year around. I think that fact should be given a little more consideration than it has been given in the past, particularly when programs such as community stage programs are being drawn up. Very often these programs are shared out on a basis of population or some other basis, but while we may not produce as much fish as the northeast coast, the need is still very great, and we must recognize and utilize to the fullest extent the fact that the south coast is the one part of Newfoundland where the fishery can be prosecuted throughout the whole year.

Finally, I wish to bring to the minister's attention the need for a bounty on draggers over 65 feet in length. Unless something is done to enable our fishing companies to secure new draggers, modern and up to date, the fishery in Newfoundland will not survive. At present these draggers cost so much that our fishing firms cannot afford to purchase them and as a second choice they are compelled to go to the United States and purchase second-hand draggers which are to a large extent worn out and obsolete. Moreover, because they are old and obsolete the fishery cannot be operated so economically as it should be. There is a great need here, and I hope the minister will find some way of meeting it.

The other point I wish to make is that the regulations governing the inspection of draggers might well be revised. The loss of the Blue Wave which I mentioned a few minutes ago recalled to the minds of our fishermen the fact that several boats of this type have met with similar accidents and have only narrowly survived, sometimes merely by chance, and there is some question in the minds of our people about the stability characteristics of these draggers, because they were not designed for fishing in waters where such severe icing conditions obtain as are experienced as in Newfoundland. Thus we have been wondering whether something might not be done by way of some regulation to safeguard fishermen by deterring them from overloading their vessels in winter or by introducing more rigid tests of stability during steamship inspections than those which obtain at present. I point out that although this vessel went down, there were other vessels of smaller and of different design which were out in exactly the same conditions, and which were able to survive and, in one case, even to render assistance to the Blue Wave. This is something which we feel should be looked into a little further to see whether or not some regulation cannot be established to make sure that these vessels are not only sound in construction and fitted with proper equipment and engines, but that their stability characteristics as such will stand up to the conditions under which they operate.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, I think it would save time if I were to reply to some of the questions that have been asked at this time rather than doing so under the individual items. The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi spoke of the problem of lobster bait in the maritimes. We have made several adjustments to try to accommodate that situation such as extending the season for alewives and things of that sort which we could do. I am grateful for the kind remarks made by various hon. members regarding the department and the efforts we are extending to further the interests of the industry for the benefit of the country as a whole.

In that connection I would like the committee to know that I believe it is recognized generally throughout the world that in Canada we have some of the finest fishery scientists and administrators in the world.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi mentioned a number of other points. I have made a note of these and will certainly take them into consideration. Some are to be brought to the attention of my colleagues, including the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Public Works and others, and that will certainly be done. I hesitate to admit it, but at the moment I also happen to be the acting Minister of Public Works. I will undertake to see that the questions relating to that department are brought to the attention of the regular minister.

The hon. member mentioned the possibility of eliminating the lift season for salmon fishing in Miramichi. That is still under consideration and no final decision has been reached. I think I may say the prospects for doing that are not very good. It is necessary to allow a reasonable escapement of the salmon so that they may carry on the propagation of the species for future years. After all, we do not want to kill the goose that lays the golden egg, as it were, for a short term advantage. I might also say that this year the catch of salmon by drifters in this area has been better than for the last ten years and that is encouraging.

Several hon. members referred to the tragedy that took place in the constituency of the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi. It is the worst disaster for fishing vessels in that area for well over 100 years; indeed, since the tragic Yankee storm took place in 1851 when approximately 150 lost their lives. Another tragic disaster was that of the Blue Wave. I regret that I am not in a position to make any definite statement about a contribution by this government to the disaster fund but, as my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs has said, it is receiving sympathetic consideration and I trust that an announcement will be made within a short time.

The hon. member for Skeena raised the question of Russian trawlers operating in the Bering sea. There is a considerable fleet operating there. The number varies and has gone as high as 80 vessels. Included in that number are transports, tugs and supply ships. They are not all fishing vessels but it is a large and comprehensive fleet. The information we have is that they are not operating for either salmon or halibut at the present time but are confining their efforts to such species as flounders, Pacific cod and pollock. This is something in which we are keenly interested and we will watch developments there very closely.

With respect to the transfer of some sections of the Cold Storage Act to my department, that has been considered to some extent by my officials. They have examined the question to determine what would be involved, what benefits might accrue, what increase in personnel would be required in the department, and so on. In the near future I hope to be in a position to take it up intelligently with my colleague the Minister of Agriculture to see whether any advantage would be gained by any change. I do not intend to suggest that the change will not be made but in the event it is not I wish to assure the hon. member that I appreciate the basic problem and I intend to follow it up with my colleague even if the administration remains with him.

The hon. members for Burin-Burgeo and Trinity-Conception mentioned several other points including the question of unemployment insurance for fishermen and the fact that in some cases it has not been satisfactory because it tends to give benefit to those fishermen who are not the worst off. Taking Newfoundland as a whole the situation is not as black as it has been painted in this last year, relative to the previous year in any case.

I realize there are still many problems and small areas where the situation is much worse than others. There are no figures breaking it down in that way. However, I should like to put on record the fact that seasonal benefits to fishermen in the province of Newfoundland during 1958 totalled $2,515,974 and during 1959, totalled $2,570,482, approximately $340 and $280 per man respectively. This would indicate that although more fishermen qualified for benefits in 1958, relatively as well as absolutely their claims on the average were smaller, and the total aggregate paid was larger by a considerable amount. Approximately 30 per cent of the fishermen achieved part of their benefits from other types of employment.

I have taken careful note of the remarks made about community stage programs. We have eight additional portable bait depots on order and we will put them into spots where they seem to be most required. I am always very happy to receive representations from any hon. members concerned because we recognize that members of parliament are thoroughly familiar with the ground and any information they can give us is very welcome indeed.

The location of the community stages was based not only on the unemployment situation but also on the amount of fish and the number of fishermen and the potential in the area and on many other considerations. I might say that in all of the stages carried out under that program by this government all labour was paid for by us.

I think I have covered the most important points. If there are any others that I have not answered it is not because I am ignoring them. I will take careful note of everything that is said and see that the suggestions will be applied to the administration of the department where possible.

Mr. Carter: I would like to clarify one point the minister made about those seasonal benefits. I think he read out the figure of $2,520,000 for the previous year and $2,280,000 this year.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): No. The figures for the first year are $2,515,974, and for this year up to April, $2,570,482.

Mr. Carter: This year is more than last year?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): The aggregate is more but the average per man is less, because there were approximately 18,000 fishermen operating in Newfoundland last year as compared with 16,000 and some odd the year before.

Mr. Carter: The minister cannot tell the committee how much of those seasonal benefits went to fishermen, because it might be assumed by other hon. members that fishermen received all of these benefits, which I am sure is not the case. I am sure that is not what the minister wants to say.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, this is unemployment insurance for fishermen.

Mr. Carter: For fishermen only?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): For fishermen alone, but I might say that some of their stamps were acquired by other part-time seasonal work. They are the ones whose predominant employment was fishing.

Mr. Carter: Can the minister give us the number of fishermen who received benefits?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I do not think I have those exact figures. The total number qualified for benefits in the season just ended was 9,263; the year before, the number was 7,403.

Item agreed to.

130. Industrial development service, $746,365.

Mr. Pickersgill: In view of the fact that the experimental salt fish plant at Valleyfield never had an official opening, would the minister consider this summer arranging to have some kind of meeting there so that the people interested in this work would have an opportunity to see what is going on?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, I shall be very pleased to give that consideration. I am afraid that plans for this summer have been in a state of suspended animation owing to the fact that no one has been able to predict accurately when prorogation might take place. Now, especially since there is a road to Valleyfield and other conveniences, consideration will be given to the matter.

Fisheries research board of Canada—

144. Operation and maintenance, including an amount of $50,000 for contributions toward fisheries research and for scholarships, $3,950,565.

Mr. Noble: Mr. Chairman, being one of the few members of the fisheries committee representing the great lakes area, I feel it is my responsibility to make a few observations and suggestions in respect of the welfare of the industry in these, the most expansive and at one time the most productive bodies of fresh water in the world.

At the outset I would like to join other members who have spoken in this debate and voice my appreciation of the tolerance and friendly attitude shown the members of the marine and fisheries committee by the minister and other officials of his department when they appeared at our deliberations. I would be remiss in my duty if I did not comment on the opportunity that was afforded all on the committee to gain a knowledge of the fishing industry as it related to all areas concerned. Since I came to this committee from the vicinity of the great lakes my knowledge of the fisheries in coastal regions was vague indeed but I now know something of their problems. It was also true that the members of the committee from the coastal waters were interested in becoming better informed on matters concerning the great lakes. With this thought in mind, an exploration trip to lake Erie was arranged for the purpose of viewing and studying the operations of the largest fresh water fish processing plant in the world. The location of this plant is Wheatley, and it is owned and operated by Olmstead Brothers. This enterprise has continued to expand in times when many fishermen on the great lakes were finding it impossible to carry on. Of course, there was a very good reason for this. These people faced the same problem as all other fishermen on the lakes; when fish they have been accustomed to taking in quantities became progressively more scarce each year, their income shrank to a point of non-existence.

The speculation is that this circumstance was contributed to by the lamprey eel and the smelt, both of which were multiplying at a rapid pace and are rated as predators. The lamprey is known to attack and kill lake trout and possibly other species as well. The smelt may be the bigger killer of the two, as it is now the belief that they prey on the very young fish and perhaps on the eggs of several species such as lake trout, whitefish, pickerel and herring. Recently, while conversing on this problem with some of the fishermen, another point was mentioned that may have some bearing on the matter. It was stated that when lake trout left the shoals after spawning, immediately suckers would move in and it seemed this was for the sole purpose of feeding on the spawn. In fact, the stomachs of the suckers were found to contain trout spawn. Would it not be good business to create some incentive to make it worth while for the fishermen to fish as many as possible of these rough fish from the lakes?

No measures have ever been taken to exercise any control on smelts. However, in 1956, an international great lakes fishery commission was established to direct sea lamprey control and to conduct fishery research which in the opinion of the fishermen should have been under way at least five years previously. Canada's contribution to this international commission for the last two years has been as follows: in 1957-58, $420,000; in 1958-59, $408,104; and for 1959-60, it will be approximately $620,000. This represents about 31 per cent of the commission's spending; the remainder is paid by the United States government. This international commission hopes to achieve maximum sustained productivity in the great lakes.

The most of this money has been spent on lamprey destruction programs and it appears that some progress is being made. But, I am concerned about the continued infestation from the ocean. No action has been taken by the commission to remedy this situation. I would suggest the conservation commission consider the possibility of establishing an electric fish barrier somewhere below lake Ontario to stop further migration of lamprey to the great lakes system. Then, it seems to me, the destruction of the lamprey in the lakes would really mean something.

There is one other possible contribution to the disappearance of our trout and whitefish and that has been excessive fishing and the taking of fish on their spawning grounds. Perhaps the nylon net could also be at fault as it captures smaller fish than the conventional cord net.

After making these observations, Mr. Chairman, I will come back to the problem in respect of the area which the committee had under study. Lake Erie has been a highly productive body of water and the fishermen have enjoyed fairly prosperous times. However, a change has been taking place in the fish population. The lake Erie fishermen were equipped to take whitefish and pickerel as these two types had been available in commercial quantities over the years. However, of late the whitefish have become almost as scarce in lake Erie as lake trout are in the Georgian bay and lake Huron. Pickerel are not available in quantity. Smelts and perch have taken over and are available in large quantities.

Olmstead Brothers did not waste any time lamenting about the situation. Rather, they proceeded to establish a market for smelts and perch. As soon as they were assured these types could be handled profitably, they secured the proper gear to fish these small types. This was the initial step, but the processing of such small fish, especially smelts, would have to be done by machinery.

Olmstead's designed a machine and manufactured it in their own machine shop which cleans a smelt inside and out and cuts the head off in one operation. At the time of our visit many of these machines were in use. Their catches of smelts have been as high as 50 tons a day and so it is evident their plant must be highly mechanized to handle such a production. Furthermore, cold storage had to be provided for hundreds of tons of finished product.

At the time of our visit 600 people were on the payroll. However, when the heavy run on smelt was over the staff would be greatly reduced. The operations would then be confined to yellow perch—

The Chairman: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member and advise him that it is six o'clock. The committee will reconvene at seven o'clock.

Mr. Noble: I can finish in a very short time.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee that we permit the hon. member to finish his remarks?

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we are sitting pretty long hours, and if it was just a matter of a question and answer in a minute or two to get through the department I think we would agree but if we are going to have long speeches similar to those on the address I think we should recess.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7 p.m.

Mr. Noble: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I was at this point in my speech. At the time of our visit 600 people were on the payroll; however, when the heavy run on smelts was over, the staff would be greatly reduced. The operations would then be confined to yellow perch and what pickerel would be available along with all rough fish that would be suitable for mink food.

The greater part of the production of this plant is marketed in the United States and delivery is made by their own transports. They related to us that they were unable to supply the demand for their smelts and were hoping to devise means of taking them throughout the fishing season. At present their equipment is designed to take them in their opening run when they congregate in schools.

This expedition was a revelation to the whole committee. Expressions of satisfaction and appreciation were much in evidence. The members from the coastal regions gained a knowledge of our inland waters that will be advantageous at future deliberations on our great lakes fisheries problems. Furthermore, they will carry back to the coastal fisheries some new ideas in respect to modern processing equipment developed at the Olmstead plant. The opportunity to make such observations and to exchange views on biology and conservation with experts, who were included in our party, was invaluable to all concerned. A good representation of the fisheries of lake Erie met with the committee and their spokesman graciously expressed the gratitude of his colleagues for our efforts and interest in their welfare.

The absence on this trip of all of our committee members from the opposition parties appeared to be intentional. Especially was this indicated when the hon. member from Ottawa West, in hope of gaining some political advantage, on the following day questioned the Minister of Fisheries as to what department supplied the transportation and who paid for the trip. The members of the committee who failed to avail themselves of the opportunity to see some of the most modern fish processing equipment in the world, did the fishermen they represent a real injustice. They could have been in a position to pass on to them valuable knowledge.

My immediate concern in speaking to these estimates is, of course, the Georgian bay and lake Huron. This has been a great fish producing body of water, where many of my constituents operated commercially and prospered; however, for reasons stated earlier in these observations, commercial and game fish cease to exist in quantities that make it worth while for fishermen to continue in the industry, and the lake trout, as a tourist attraction, has been nullified. My foremost purpose on the marine and fisheries committee is to use my influence in promoting the early restoration of lake trout and whitefish or other suitable fish to the Georgian bay and lake Huron. In their productive years, the three largest great lakes, Superior, Michigan and Huron, produced 15 million pounds of lake trout annually. Now this is dwindling toward zero.

It has been ascertained that lamprey seldom kill fish under 20 inches in length; therefore, I suggest that more emphasis be placed on the production of splake, a cross between lake and speckled trout, which reaches maturity and would start a reproductive cycle before attaining the size which is suitable for attack by lamprey. Many of the now idle fish hatcheries could help in speeding up this restocking program in respect to splake and perhaps on other suitable species.

On the week end, I made a survey of fish hatcheries in my district and two out of three have been idle for four years. The third one, the Wiarton hatchery, is operating at only 30 per cent of its capacity, producing lake trout for stocking lake Simcoe. This situation would perhaps apply to other hatcheries as well. I am aware that these hatcheries are provincial property, but I feel sure the federal Department of Fisheries or the conservation commission would be permitted to make use of all available facilities. We in the great lakes area would most certainly like to see a restoration of lake trout and whitefish; nevertheless, a lot of time should not be lost while we entertain a wait and see attitude; therefore, I submit the following information for further consideration. It has been demonstrated on several occasions that fish could be transferred to new surroundings successfully.

In checking over reports of the researchers, I note that in 1929 Dymond, Hart and Pritchard report the establishment of sea-run populations of spring salmon in the St. John river in New Brunswick and Port Credit river in Ontario. These salmon have been taken in the St. John river by the hundreds and vary in weight up to eight pounds. Fish up to 30 pounds have been taken from the Port Credit river. The streams and coastal regions of Maine, New Brunswick and Ontario are the only foreign waters on the North American continent in which natural populations of Pacific salmon have been established; however, it appears now that these salmon have disappeared from lake Ontario.

I think the researchers would agree that lake Ontario was not an ideal body of water for this experiment. The lake lacked a good depth of water and many of the streams flowing into it could not be considered much more than open sewers. In recent years this condition has been cleared up to a large extent with the development of sewage and waste disposal plants. Georgian bay and lake Huron, with their cold deep water, continually replenished from scores of clean streams, offer ideal conditions for the introduction of Pacific salmon. At this point I will make some further observations in respect to the introduction of Pacific salmon south of the equator.

The Tasmania fisheries commission in 1933 stated that, in the confined water of their great lake, spring salmon thrive and grow rapidly to support a flourishing sport fishery. Sockeye salmon introduced to lake Ohau in New Zealand have acquired a landlocked habit. These fish run up creeks at the head of the lake and spawn there every year in March and April.

The sea-run population of Pacific salmon that have been successfully established in both Chile and New Zealand have adjusted their life cycle to the change in occurrence of the seasons in the southern hemisphere. The spawning migrations of these salmon occur in January, February and March, which are seasonal equivalents of July, August and September in the northern hemisphere.

Much progress and many improvements have been made in fish cultural methods in recent years which should help in securing desired results in transplanting of sockeye or spring salmon to the great lakes. I make these observations to support my conviction that salmon can be successfully reared and propagated in the upper lakes.

I suggest to the minister that an experiment to introduce some of the coastal waters salmon to the upper great lakes be conducted at the earliest convenience and that some of the money paid to the international conservation commission be designated for this purpose. The sockeye salmon from the west coast and spring salmon from the east coast have been able to reproduce and live with the sea lamprey and smelts. Would it not be reasonable to assume they could continue to live in this environment in the great lakes? Should this prove to be true, and the lamprey and smelts prove to be uncontrollable, this could be the solution to our problem. The introduction of fish to new environment may be very important to ensuring suitable production for sport and commercial fishing in our great lakes in the years ahead.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I emphasize that fishery conditions in lake Huron and Georgian bay have created a serious situation for all the fishermen depending on these waters for a livelihood. Their life earnings are tied up in fishing boats, docks and other gear, none of which is saleable. The tourist industry has suffered to lesser extent, yet worthy of note. Many tourist operators who had depended on the lake trout for an attraction just do not have anything to offer. For instance, Cape Croker on the Bruce peninsula was a location for ideal lake trout trolling. It brought thousands of dollars to the Indians on the Cape Croker reserve who rented their boats and acted as guides. It also meant much to camp operators who supplied the other accommodation necessary.

In the town of Meaford lake trout trolling was considered one of their best industries. At one time they had a fleet of forty or more pleasure craft built and designed for the purpose of trolling for lake trout. Today not a single boat leaves the harbour for the purpose of trolling for trout. The chamber of commerce of this town estimate that this tourist business was worth one quarter of a million dollars to them. I have cited the experience of these localities with which I am familiar, but it applies to the whole lake Huron and Georgian bay area.

I am aware of the fact that some of the problems I mention are partly provincial responsibilities; however, I am anxious to see federal funds and influence work in full co-ordination with provincial effort to bring about the desired results and with some expediency.

Mr. Stewart: I have no intention of holding up the estimates of the department nor do I intend to burden the committee with a history of the fishing industry and the woes and tribulations of the fishermen of my constituency. Those problems can be solved in co-operation with the minister and the officials of his department. But I think I would be most ungrateful if I did not bring to the attention of the committee the importance of this item as far as my constituency is concerned. We have in my constituency the largest sardine cannery in the British empire and the largest lobster pound in the world. These are the two important items of our fisheries. You can therefore see that investigation and research through the biological gation and research through the biological portant to the fishermen of my riding and also to the general economy of the constituency.

In June, 1959 the Minister of Fisheries opened a new wing to the biological station and commemorated 50 years of the service in biological research to the constituency. There is employed by the Department of Fisheries, according to the last report, that for 1957-58, a total of 25 boats in the province of New Brunswick with a crew of 106. There was spent on the biological boats alone $105,000 and there was spent on the boats engaged in protection in New Brunswick $150,000. In connection with work at the biological station there was spent during 1957-58, $475,000 and in the province of New Brunswick roughly $1,750,000. You can therefore see that this item is extremely important. I think that I would be very remiss if I did not express the appreciation of the fishermen of my constituency to the Minister of Fisheries and to his staff for their work in this regard.

Mr. Nixon: Back in May I asked the minister if he would make a statement on the department's program dealing with the lamprey situation in the great lakes, especially in lake Superior. At that time he said that he would make a statement on the matter when his estimates were before the house. I wonder whether he would do it now.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes. As all hon. members know, this is a very vast problem. Due to the invasion of lamprey in the great lakes or the infestation of the great lakes by the lamprey as a result of the man-made canals to the great lakes, the whole ichthyology of the lakes has been upset. The lamprey, which are a parasite, thrived in these waters where they never had existed in previously and where there are no natural predators on them.

This is a problem which we have been working at for a number of years now in co-operation with the United States and our agency that does the work under the international great lakes fishery commission, is the fisheries research board of Canada.

First this problem was attacked by trying to control the migration of the lamprey to streams up which they go to spawn by means of electrical barriers. Another approach that was tried concurrently was to find a specific poison for lampreys; and a break-through in this matter has been made in recent months. Two chemicals have been discovered which proved lethal or proved to be a selective poison for lampreys. In other words, in certain concentration it will destroy the lamprey and their larvae, which is important, but will not affect other forms of fish life. This year we are doing a trial project on a reasonably large scale poisoning certain of the streams. It is too early yet to judge what the result will be but it seems encouraging. I do not think there is any more I can say at the moment at this late point. But if there is any other information the hon. member for Algoma West or any other hon. member would like to have, I should be delighted to supply all details.

Item agree to.

515. Industrial development service — further amount required, $800,000.

Mr. Howard: This vote shows a fairly substantial amount of money. I wonder whether we could have from the minister an indication of what is entailed in this particular vote.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): This is really a transfer from the Department of Public Works to the Department of Fisheries for the community stage program in Newfoundland which was introduced last fall partly as a winter work program.

Item agreed to.

519. Newfoundland bait service—further amount required, $101,000.

Mr. Granger: The matter of bait supply seems to be an annual problem. I certainly should like to mention my appreciation of the interest that the minister's department is taking in this problem in Newfoundland. What I want to mention now is the possibility of using artificial bait as a supplement to frozen bait. I mention this matter because the type of artificial lure which is used in sports fishing has been used with considerable success in catching cod. As a matter of fact, one man that I know who used the type of lure which is used, as I say, in sports fishing, in fishing side by side with fishermen using the ordinary type of jigger, was much more successful in landing his fish. I would suggest that perhaps the minister's department might look into the possibility of developing types of lures for cod fish similar to what the sports industry has for sports fishermen.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I am highly appreciative of the hon. member's suggestion. I can say that the fisheries research board has been doing some work on artificial baits of various kinds. In addition to that our industrial development branch has been doing trials on various types of lures. We are hoping that some solution to this problem may be found, because it would be a great relief not only to the department but also to a large number of fishermen who have difficulty in making sure there is a constant supply of bait. I must say, with reference to bait, that squid are in very short supply. They have not appeared as yet. But as an insurance measure we have fairly large holdings of other types of bait, so that we will not be destitute, as it were, if the squid fail to appear. We have some 1,750,000 pounds of bait in storage at the moment.

521. Destruction of dogfish and other predators, $250,000.

Mr. Howard: This item relates to the destruction of dogfish and other predators. A similar amount was voted for this purpose in the supplementary estimates last session for the last fiscal year but I understand the program did not work out too well mostly because it was started too late in the season. I would certainly appreciate it if the minister could indicate whether this dogfish destruction program will start immediately and also on what basis they are going to use the fund. Perhaps the minister would indicate whether he hopes to use the entire vote this year instead of the small amount of this vote which was actually used last year.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Last year when this amount was voted it took a considerable length of time before we were able to reach agreement with everyone concerned as to a satisfactory program, and it was late in the season before the program got under way. It began at a time of the year which was perhaps not the best time for the catching of dogfish. But we will be in the position to announce the program immediately this vote is passed and this year we are paying a bounty, one might call it, of ten cents a pound on dogfish liver and we hope this will prove successful.

Mr. Howard: Is this money to be used solely for dogfish destruction or are there plans to deal with sea lions and so on?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): There was a possibility when this vote was drawn that a small amount might be used for sea lion control but we have found a method of doing that under another vote, and this entire amount will be used against dogfish.

Mr. Batten: I may not be quite in order in asking this question on this item but I should like to know from the minister if land for the site of the bait unit at Bonne Bay and Woody Point has been secured?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): As the hon. member knows, we had some difficulty in finding a suitable location for the bait unit at Bonne Bay but I believe I am correct in saying that recently we obtained a suitable site at Woody Point, and the unit was transferred there, or it is in the process of being transferred.

Mr. Batten: May I ask the minister whether sites have been chosen on the west coast of Newfoundland for any of the seven units which are being provided for in the present year?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): There has been no final decision with regard to the eight units which are being provided for in this year's estimates. As the hon. member knows, there have been a large number of demands from a great number of areas, and we have to study the relative needs of all those areas, the possibility of other sources of supply and so forth. No final decisions have as yet been made as to the areas in which they will be set up.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Howard.]

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, if I may say so, I want first to correct one impression I may have left inadvertently with the committee. I may have sounded as if I believed that everything was rosy in the garden and that there were no problems as far as fishermen were concerned. That is not the case. There are areas, especially in connection with certain types of fish production, where the economics of the industry are not very good because the production is going to a low price market. I do not want to labour the point, but I have in mind such things as salt cod in Newfoundland and smoked herring—bloaters—in places such as the Magdalen islands. I want to assure the committee that these problems are under constant review, and we hope to find some way of improving the situation.

That is all I want to say at the moment, except to express my appreciation for the high degree of co-operation that the committee has shown to me and to my officials.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

294. Departmental administration, including Canada's share of the upkeep of the international bureaux at Berne and Montevideo, $1,915,483.

Mr. Denis: I suppose that the Postmaster General has something very interesting to tell us. I will ask him now, very respectfully, to say something about this first item.

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I thank the hon. member for St. Denis for inferring that this was going to be very interesting. I was hopeful, for a moment, that he might even accept the estimates of this department without hearing any comment whatsoever from the minister. But I am delighted to review briefly our operations over the past year and tell the committee something of what we are doing.

At the outset, I should like to pay my tribute to the people who operate the postal service, the department's 50,000 employees. Their quiet spirit of dedication, their sincerity and devotion to the job they do and their untiring labours are the foundation of Canada's postal service, and it is a strong, sure foundation of which Canadians may well be proud.

Because of this government's belief that the public is best served when its employees feel that there is an interest in their morale, their welfare and their working conditions, I am particularly encouraged by the general improvement in the morale of our service and in the bettered relationships between our employee organizations and the administration which has occurred during the past two years.

Nowhere is this better illustrated than in the April editorial in the Postal Tribune, the official organ of the Canadian Postal Employees' Association, which dealing generally with changes and improvements we have introduced says in part:

> While the change has been gradual, there is ample evidence that all changes have been to the benefit of the service (to the public) and the employees. . . . Another change quite evident to officers and members of our organization is the present attitude of senior officials both at headquarters and in the field. In the past organizations were tolerated and in many cases co-operation was a one way street. The new era has made it more evident that problems presented by postal organization organizations should and will receive serious consideration in view of how such problems affect morale and staff efficiency.

With such a spirit it is easy to understand why the past fiscal year, and the months since then to the present, have been a period of further progress and achievement for the Post Office Department; a period during which we have made desirable improvements in service to the public which I shall detail in a few moments; during which we have introduced changes of benefit to our employees; and during which we have made plans and taken the initial steps which will be increasingly reflected in the months to come in further advances.

In this respect no single change is of greater importance than that introduced a few months ago with the establishment of our new engineering and development branch on a level equal in all respects with those other five branches into which postal service has traditionally been divided.

Before this new division of reponsibility, engineering and development was but one part of the work of the operations branch of the department. Faced with the multitudinous problems of directing the day to day operation of the postal service, and the pressing and immediate difficulties which continually arise when 10 million pieces of mail must be handled daily, that work which is the foundation of present and future postal improvements in Canada had often to be delayed and neglected in favour of the more immediate problems.

Now, headed by one of our most experienced postal officials and a man who has a particular capacity for this work, engineering and development has attained its proper status in our organization and this has already been reflected in the acceleration of many of our projects. The new branch has as its primary functions research in mechanization and postal techniques, examination of new ideas in postal operations developed in other areas; testing of new machines and techniques; a continual review of all standard postal equipment in order to improve its design; provision of mail handling equipment to post offices, and arrangements for buildings, space and facilities for carrying out all postal operations.

In the field of modernization, probably the most important single project is the development of an electro-mechanical mail sorting machine. This project, as many of you know, has been under research and development for some years and has now reached the stage where a contract has been awarded to Canadair Limited in Montreal for the construction of the first complete machine to be tested under operating conditions in a post office.

We also expect during the first half of 1960 to install and begin testing a machine which has been developed by the British post office for automatically culling and facing up letters, cancelling their stamps and separating them into local and out of town groups.

These two machines together provide for the mechanization of letter handling in a post office from the time the mail bag is opened until the letter is ready for forwarding to another city or a letter carrier for delivery. I have no doubt that a decade hence we shall look back on them as primitive—just as we now consider the model T Ford to have been a primitive form of automobile transportation—but the fact remains that we are breaking through that barrier which has made the postal service, not only of Canada but generally throughout the world, one of the least mechanized of all mass handling operations.

I should remind hon. members again, as I have in the past, that while such developments are likely to enable us to reduce our part-time staff—people who work three or four hours a day at peak periods in the post office—they are not likely to represent reductions in our present full time staff. Primarily we are seeking not a decrease in manpower but an improvement in our efficiency to allow us to deal without delay with our ever-increasing mail volume.

In addition to these devices we have forged ahead with other new technological innovations, many of which are now operating in our newer and larger post offices. We have developed numerous intricate and effective conveyor systems which speed up the handling of mail at our bigger offices and which reduce the number of man hours required to handle a piece of mail.

We have also developed in several cities experimental models of curbside mailing boxes for the use of the motoring public.

These are redesigned parcel receptacles fitted with a funnel-shaped snorkel facing the street side. They may be used by a motorist without leaving his car. Generally speaking, these boxes have proved popular. The need for them was dictated by increasing city traffic and by a shortage of parking space in downtown areas.

I suppose it is a commentary on our way of life to report that having designed and installed boxes of this kind we are now being pressed to put them only on one-way streets so that a man may drive up and deposit mail in the box from the driver's side of the vehicle. If we put them on two-way streets there is the possibility that the driver may have to slide across the seat of the automobile in order to deposit the mail and in some cases people find that even that is too much.

I want to pay this tribute. We have had fine co-operation from civic authorities where we have set them up and 26 of the newly designed receptacles have been placed in service in various cities across the country. This type of installation will be expanded as suitable sites are determined.

In recent years the department has purchased and installed 1,500 new type stamp vending machines and purchase is planned of a further 500 during the next year. The machines are being installed at railway terminals, bus depots, hotel lobbies and outside post office buildings. They serve a dual purpose in that they tend to take some of the pressure off the regular wicket sale of stamps at peak hours and, more important, they are available to the mailing public 24 hours a day. These machines, you will note, give full face value in stamps for the money deposited.

We have undertaken a study of mail boxes and receptacles in use throughout the country with a view to reducing the variety of types in service. We expect to be able to effect substantial savings in the procurement and distribution of these boxes by standardizing sizes and types to a greater degree than in the past.

In our continuing program to streamline administrative operations we have installed an electronic punch card calculator at headquarters. This complex device will save thousands of man hours in processing post office savings bank accounts and in calculating salary payments to revenue postmasters. In addition, we are investigating other uses to which this device can be put which will materially reduce the costs in time and money of routine clerical operations.

We are also making extensive studies in the handling of money orders with a view to developing a system based on electronic accounting machines similar to those being developed for use by financial institutions which should considerably streamline our operations in this field.

Some evidence of the interest being taken in Canadian postal achievements is found in the continuing series of visits we have by experts from other countries who come to study our service. During the past year I was pleased, as were senior officials, at the opportunity of welcoming officials from Australia, Ethiopia, the Netherlands, India, the United States and Great Britain.

I might mention that we are co-operating with the government of the West Indies federation by providing the services of a Canadian postal official to act as postal services adviser in the survey being made of the postal service systems functioning under the West Indies federation.

Because members have had before them for some months the report of my department for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1958 I will not repeat the information which it contains but I will now attempt to review for you a number of happenings and developments of the past year.

In general, the service has continued to grow at a steady pace. During the year 37 new revenue post offices were opened in rural areas and two staff post offices, two postal stations and 75 sub-post offices were opened in our larger cities. During the period from April 1, 1958 to March 31, 1959, 65 federal buildings were occupied by post offices, including our two major buildings in Winnipeg and Vancouver which contain some of the most modern postal equipment anywhere in the world.

The annual report of the Postmaster General for 1957-58 showed that our mail revenues for that year had reached a new high of $177,492,000, and that expenditures had also reached a record level of $177,893,000. During the fiscal year just completed, the one which succeeded that whose figures I have just quoted, even those record levels were surpassed as departmental revenues, revenue climbing to $183,381,000, and operating costs rose to $183,554,000. Taking the total disbursements from the total revenues you will find an excess of cost over revenues of $173,142. While it is a deficit that figure is not as large as we had presumed might be the case, and I think it reflects prudent management and careful and effective administration of the department. I might say, too, that we have succeeded in achieving this despite very substantial increases in some of the costs of our operations, and despite important improvements in our service to the public.

I should now like to speak about some of those improvements to the public. Last year, in presenting the post office estimates, I indicated that we had been concentrating on providing letter carrier service to small and medium towns which had not previously had it. We are now well on with this type of program and are increasingly turning our attention to the problem of more effective mail delivery to the sprawling suburban developments that are springing up around those large cities. Many of those new communities are separated from the nearest letter carrier areas by large tracts of undeveloped land, and hitherto they did not qualify for letter carrier service. We have decided to relax our requirements with the result that door to door service will be provided immediately to many more thousands of suburban households.

A completely new approach to the problem of providing service in scattered suburban areas is being tried through the use of a three-wheeled vehicle we call the mailmobile; my hon. friend from St. Denis calls it the scooter. Those of you who were present on parliament hill a few weeks ago when I demonstrated this versatile little machine will understand something of the high hopes we have for its use in outlying urban areas. It will enable the letter carrier to deliver not only letters but bulky mail such as parcels and newspaper bundles which now require special handling by truck. It will eliminate the need for frequent visits to relay boxes for bundles of mail deposited by truck for later pick-up and delivery by the carrier. I may say that the experiment with this new vehicle is being carried out in a suburb of Vancouver, and if successful the service will be extended to other parts of the country wherever terrain and climate permit.

In all, our carrier service during the year ended March 31, 1959 expanded with the addition of some 292 walks. Through the establishing of these walks and the revision of existing walks a total of 126,377 points of call were provided with letter carrier service. This compares with 108,036 points of call to which I referred last year when I presented my estimates. We have also taken steps to improve the service given to patrons in the fringe areas of cities and along rural routes. Requirements for group box service in suburban areas were eased, and the number of patrons required—and this will be of particular interest to our rural members—to establish a new rural route was decreased from four to three per mile. This year 865 existing routes were extended and a total of some 16,400 new patrons were brought into service along our rural routes.

It is surprising the little things that the Post Office Department does that sometimes antagonizes the public. One of the sources of irritation to quite a few people who have spoken to me has been the lack of an official receipt requested by many patrons when they bought postage stamps in quantity at the wicket. That problem has been remedied by the development of a new receipt form we are providing to our post offices across the country so that they can provide a receipt on request to any purchaser of stamps.

Last year, to speed up service to the public, we experimented with the sale of specially packaged two and five cent stamps during the Christmas rush. That project was widely successful and we are going to improve and extend the program based on the findings of the experiment in 1958.

I have not been entirely satisfied, Mr. Chairman, with the service given our patrons under the special delivery service and we have introduced a number of modifications designed to speed up the delivery service, particularly in the larger cities. These changes, which make use of special couriers and wider use of special couriers, and less of letter carriers for special delivery mail, have speeded up this service considerably and have won general approval from postal patrons, particularly business firms.

We have been working too, to strengthen and improve our public relations division, and we hope to extend our program in this field to include a wider coverage of the smaller centres, in line with the suggestions so ably outlined last year at estimates time by the hon. member for Kootenay West. We do this because one very important aspect of our service is obtaining public co-operation, and we desire that the public shall know about what we are doing and our problems and how they themselves can work with us to obtain better mail service. We desire that as much as possible of this be done.

During the year we undertook a review of our program of annual examinations carried out for each employee of our department. I do not know how many people in this house know that postal employees, unlike most workers in many fields, are required to undergo an annual examination in the work they are doing. While the results of those examinations are not yet complete, we expect that they will determine future action with regard to our examination program which, however, in essence we feel is sound and worth while.

We have kept a close check—and the committee will be interested in this as a measure of our effectiveness—on the number of inquiries about service difficulties and investigations of irregularities, two indicators of potential problems within the service. I am pleased to note that inquiries have dropped from 414,332 in 1957-58 to 404,265 in 1958-59. This is a reduction of more than 10,000 over the year, and it is even more remarkable when you consider that in that same year there was a tremendous increase in the volume of mail actually handled.

In the field of security and losses, Mr. Chairman, due to continuing improvement in our methods of inspection, losses to the post office through account shortages have shown a steady decline. In the year 1957-58 there were 461 cases of shortages involving $39,184. In 1958-59 this number had dropped to 395 cases involving $22,385. These figures represent a trend which over the last two years has seen the number of cases drop by 24 per cent and the net amounts involved by 57 per cent.

We are also moving forward in our attempts to defeat break-ins and thefts from post offices. Because of improved security there was no loss in one-third of the post office break-ins last year and the average cash loss, where such occurred, has been reduced from $96 two years ago to $85 last year.

In coming to my conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say that in preparing for these estimates I reviewed my address to the house last year on the same subject. It contains much of the basic philosophy which has guided my decisions and also much additional information on this department which I will not repeat here. I mention this merely so that hon. members who may have some particular point of interest, no matter how minor it may be, which has not been covered will not feel that it has been overlooked but merely that I have tried to give them as much information as possible in a comparatively limited time. Certainly I will be delighted to explore anything anyone wants to bring up.

I should like to express a special word of appreciation to my hon. friend, the member for St. Denis, who has taken a particularly active interest in my department. While I am not sure I approve or can approve of the stockpiling of gasoline even at premium prices in Toronto for scooters that are out in Vancouver or mail delivery by Bomarc missile—

Mr. Benidickson: But you have advocated twice a day mail delivery.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am being rather pleasant at the moment and I am sorry that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has to introduce a sour note. The interest of the hon. member for St. Denis in the department, his constant concern over post office matters and, I think above all, his humour and his unfailing good nature have really endeared him to me, and I want to say again how much I appreciate it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You may be disarming him.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I derive a certain satisfaction in finding pleasant people in the opposition and marking them out.

Mr. Hellyer: That is a very pleasant change from the situation which existed before.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Perhaps there is a more pleasant Postmaster General on this side of the house.

Mr. Hellyer: I am thinking of the reverse.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): At the outset of my remarks I paid a tribute to our postal employees generally and I want to emphasize again the excellent job they are doing. Because so many of us think in terms of postal employees as the ones we see, letter carriers, rural mail couriers, postmasters and those who work under them in post offices, we tend to forget that credit is due also to the administrative staff of the post office because in our department, as in all government work, administrative ability of a very high order is required.

The deputy postmaster general, our six branch heads, our regional and district directors and our area superintendents together with their staffs are all involved in this work. The great majority of them have long years of service for this is a department which must largely produce its top officials from within its own ranks, a policy with which I am firmly in accord wherever it is possible to implement it. The changes and developments we are instituting would be impossible without their co-operation and, in most cases, without their production of the actual ideas. I should like to congratulate them on the outstanding job they are doing along with our other employees.

I can speak of the post office and its operations with some feeling, for in the past two years I have become involved in its activities at all levels, from such things as the weaknesses in a stamp vending machine outside the Saint John, New Brunswick, post office, the need for name plates on the wickets at Edmonton, the leaky roof on the post office at Stephenville, Newfoundland, and the slow delivery of letter carrier shirts in Kelowna, B.C.—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And the telephone at Tecumseh.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): —the matter of a telephone in the Tecumseh post office, as the hon. member for Essex East points out; to such things as the location of major new post offices, the mechanization of mail handling processes and the introduction of the most modern electronic forms of equipment. Being always concerned beyond all else with the primary function of the department, which is to provide the best possible mail service to the Canadian public, I say without hesitation that my remarks tonight might well be summarized in the statement that the Canada post office is continually improving its service to the Canadian public and will continue that improvement in line with its very famous motto, servire populo, to serve the people.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: On hearing the words of praise directed to me by the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) I felt that he was practically asking me to refrain from criticizing his department. Well, I don't deserve that beautiful apple green paper which has just been awarded to me. It just happens that I am in good health. And, if my questions were to the point, it was because there was ample scope for criticism.

The minister having praised me, I must necessarily return the compliment. I must say that he is a hard worker, that he is affable, likeable; he is also crafty, and intelligent.

Mr. Ricard: And, above all, a Conservative.

Mr. Denis: But what I consider unfortunate is that he makes such bad use of all those fine qualities. He pays compliments. He offers the people of Canada, and hon. members in this house, all sorts of projects—but we never know whether those projects, compliments and gifts will materialize. In my college days I was taught a latin saying:

Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes (I distrust the Greeks, even when they bring gifts.)

People with less education, perhaps, like the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard), would have said: "I distrust the Danes with their iron teeth".

Mr. Ricard: You can't be beat for pettiness; you're certainly an expert at it.

Mr. Denis: When the frogs have finished croaking, we shall carry on.

Because the hon. Postmaster General as I said, is very crafty and clever, for we "knew him when", we have known him as a minister, and have also known him when he was in the opposition. Therefore the bouquets he's throwing at me now make me rather wary of what might happen if I trust his sincerity or his sweet words, because many a minister and many a Canadian citizen have had a taste of them in the past.

When he was in the opposition, he also said complimentary things, and said what he would do if he were in office. One of my friends here reminds me of La Fontaine's fable, the one I think, about the Crow and the Fox:

Si votre ramage se rapporte à votre plumage,
Vous êtes le phénix des hôtes de ces bois.

What happened was that the Postmaster General paid the compliments, but gobbled the cheese— The crow swore, but just a little too late, that he would never be taken in again. Let me say, to be kind to the hon. Postmaster General, that as far as the party in power is concerned, he is a genius. He is the prototype and the symbol of all the present cabinet. Certain ministers have certain shortcomings, others have other shortcomings, and they share the shortcomings between them; but the hon. Postmaster General has all the faults and shortcomings of all the present ministers. We must also admit that he has rare qualities: he is affable, friendly, etc., etc.; but he is a genius in the matter of promises, he is a genius in the matter of contradiction; he is a genius in the matter of confusion. He is also a genius in the matter of visions.

(Text):

Mr. Benidickson: Two deliveries a day.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: He is a genius in nonsense.

Mr. Ricard: You, you are a genius in stupidity.

Mr. Denis: He is a genius in the matter of suggestions, suggestions of the kind that we must not forget.

He has told us about his department, the things that suited him, but left unsaid the things that were more or less to his credit. He has made a fine speech, graced with flowers of rhetoric, but he omitted all mention of the weeds concealed beneath the flowers of rhetoric that he graciously bestowed upon us.

Mr. Chairman, in order to see whether the present incumbent is a good Postmaster General, we must know of the changes that have taken place since he took over his department. We have to know if we shall close the fiscal year with a deficit or a surplus. We have to find out whether promised improvements have been carried out.

I would ask the minister not to slouch out of sight in his chair because we are going to talk a bit about his past, and his present too. As for his future, I think the people of Canada will see about it, and I am sorry for the minister, because he is a good natured, most affable and likeable man. It would be too bad not to see him around any more in the house and to miss his smile and his shrewdness which we highly appreciate. Unfortunately, as I just said his shrewdness is being used in a bad cause, whereas it should be serving a good one.

Mr. Chairman, I now want to say a word about the Postmaster General's estimates. The minister said nothing about them—he who, in the past, upbraided the former postmasters general for dealing with insignifiant matters, for making hollow speeches, for not comparing the Canadian Post Office Department with those of other countries, so as to show whether our own postal service was well managed. Of all this the present incumbent has spoken not a word. He merely referred to improvements that were made, or to events which took place, under departmental regulations.

Mr. Chairman, the Postmaster General can in no wise claim credit for the improvements he mentioned, because even if he had not been there, yea, even if he had vetoed them, they would have been proceeded with. Besides, the growth of those services is merely a result of a growth in the population. Those improvements existed at the time of his predecessor, and will continue to exist. However, he used to claim that such improvements could not be credited to the then minister and that if he ever got into the saddle, he would bring in drastic changes.

An hon. Member: The improvements were made in spite of him.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, when the hon. minister was sitting on this side of the house, he used to berate us for waste and extravagance. He used to say that the Liberal party had no regard for economy, that the postal service was slow and that the experiments the government was conducting at the time were childishness and nonsense. Now, his outlook is altogether different. The things he used to call bad have now become his personal handiwork, he who was so anxious to put a stop to waste and to balance the budget.

Let us see how well he has done. Just as last year, each item of his credits shows an increase. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in the matter of extravagance, which he used to ascribe to the former government, the hon. minister now has to eat his words.

At that time, the minister used to say he was against surpluses. He would claim that the government of the time was not running things in a business-like way. In his book, business-like administration means showing deficits. In his view, bankrupt government is prosperous government. He even referred to Conservative prosperity, to past deficits and surpluses in the Post Office Department. To him, the most interesting part of the estimates is the part which concerns deficits.

How many times did he not say here that he wanted to "break even"? He was not looking for profits, but he didn't say he didn't want any deficits. The way I see it he "broke even" a little late, because since he has been running the department, there has been deficit upon deficit.

Since the minister used to advocate economy and to war against waste, there must have been waste at that time. However, his departmental estimates for this year total $163.5 million, as against $162 million last year. Such is the amount of money the minister is asking us to vote, though at the time he used to call us wastrels and spendthrifts; in 1957-58, the budget was $150 million, and in 1956-57, $132 million. Where was the waste, and where the savings, that the minister should have told us about?

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, the minister went even farther than that. In 1954, he listed the years of budget surpluses and those of budget deficits; and most years under the Liberal administration were years of surplus budgets.

He also said:

(Text):

In 1961 a deficit, somebody made a mistake and there was a deficit of $1 million.

(Translation):

So, Mr. Chairman, if the minister claims that under the Liberals a deficit was a mistake, I think he is doing very well in the matter of mistakes, because ever since he has been heading the Post Office Department he has been going from deficit to deficit, and there is no need to look at the comparative statement of receipts and expenditures. Since his appointment to the Post Office Department deficits have been piling up.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer again to the criticisms which the minister used to make when he was sitting on this side of the house, or to the concrete suggestions he offered, or indeed to the proposals he put forward. For instance he would charge former Postmasters General with poor management. He even said:

(Text):

—slow moving as the department may be.

(Translation):

He remembers those words of his.

He even called former postmasters general stupid. He even went so far as to say:

(Text):

We should examine the minister.

(Translation):

He was less handy with bouquets then than he is now. He used to beef about the service in the department, about officials who are still here today nevertheless. He used to say:

(Text):

Across the board; we did not have any satisfaction from the Post Office Department.

(Translation):

The hon. minister will no doubt remember saying that the P.O.D. accounting system was not up to business standards.

He also said:

I can't understand why the various departments should not pay postage on their mailings, as does the general public.

He wanted the Post Office Department to take away from other departments franking and free privileges.

What has the minister done about it in the meantime? When the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche) wants to write to someone, does he have to put a stamp—unattractive though it might be—on his letter? Does he have to use postage on letters he sends out here and there in Canada? Do not all federal departments still enjoy franking privileges?

The hon. Postmaster General has not kept the promise he then made to force other departments to pay postage on their mailings. He used to complain of the fact the postmaster general at the time was operating in the black because he didn't have to pay any rent for the accommodation, space and equipment provided by the Minister of Public Works. Is the hon. Postmaster General now paying anything to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) for the premises he occupies? Nothing has been done since that time. Yet the hon. Postmaster General used to say it was bad business practice. When his party came to power, he said:

(Text):

It is a doubtful legacy we have inherited from the Liberal government.

(Translation):

He must recall his statement:

(Text):

I criticize in the very strongest terms the Postmaster General for his administration of the department.

That was the minister in 1954. It was again the minister in 1956 who said:

Slow moving as the department is and slow moving as the minister may be—

It was again the same minister who was complaining about the minister of the time. There has been no change since then. There has been no change at all. He was very concise.

(Translation):

He was very explicit in 1954 when he said this to the minister. And he now maintains he is against surpluses. Does it mean he is in favour of deficits?

For instance, he used to lash into the minister for giving grants to Trans-Canada Air Lines. Has his department stopped paying those subsidies to the company?

Is the Postmaster General still sending mail by air? He maintains that he does. At the time he was so critical of the former government, our mail services were costing no more than $9 million, whereas today, according to the Postmaster General's report, they are costing $13 million.

At the time, he was complaining that we were paying one dollar and twenty cents a ton to send our mail. Have air mail rates changed since then? I would like the Postmaster General to answer those questions.

Moreover, he used to say that the Post Office Department had a monopoly over various air lines, and that everything was being done in secret. Have we heard of any changes in that regard? Absolutely nothing.

Did he say that a change was to take place, that the department would pay less for air transport of ordinary matter or goods marked "business papers"? We would like some details about that.

The house will recall that he was opposed to the increase in letter rates from 4 to 5 cents. That was two years ago. His party has now been running the country for two years, but has the Postmaster General reduced that rate? He even stated that first class mail was being paid for by third class mail, and that the deficit of third class mail was made up by the consolidated revenue fund. Have those changes taken place in the two years while his party has been in power? Those were promises made to the Canadian people and which, in my opinion, have not been kept.

Does he recall having asked the appointment of a minister of provincial affairs? Does he recall making such a statement? His party has been in power for two years, and he has been Postmaster General for two years; is there a minister of provincial affairs now?

We are still waiting for him, just as our friends are probably still waiting to be appointed parliamentary secretaries.

Well, Mr. Chairman, he made all those statements, and nothing has been done since. What has he done? He has been travelling. He has boasted travelling some 25,000 to 30,000 miles within a year or a year and a half. He has figured out the mileage covered by mail carriers in a year's time. He has figured out the total mileage of all mail carriers in Canada in a one-year period. Thus he has indicated that in a year, mail travels a distance equivalent to 55 trips to the moon, or 240 trips around the world, while postal employees cover 6 million miles.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, how many officials in the division have been working on all these calculations? But wherefore and to what purpose? What good can it be for Canadians to know whether these mail carriers have been making the equivalent of 55 round trips to the moon? Of course they've done plenty of walking, but even if they had circled the globe, they still would not beat the record held by the ministers of the present cabinet. They still hold the record. Only the sputniks can do better. Mr. Chairman, the minister boasts that he travelled 25,000 to 30,000 miles. To what effect? From the standpoint of improvement for the Post Office Department, the result is nil. Indeed, he said himself when he travelled out to Sydney:

(Text):

I have come here just to say hello!

(Translation):

Well, it is a rather expensive hello. Imagine covering a distance of 25,000 to 30,000 miles to say a pleasant hello to postal workers. And I presume he met officials.

When things are going smoothly, it is easy to travel; but when the going is rough, it is not so easy. But when postal workers held a meeting to complain of inadequate pay and poor working conditions, the hon. minister failed to show up in Sydney, or in Winnipeg, or in Ottawa. The workers met in Ottawa so that the honourable minister would not have too far to go. In addition they gathered by the thousands in Montreal to complain about working conditions, and they invited the hon. Postmaster General. It seems to me that he should have attended those meetings where thousands of people got together—to save him time—in order to voice their complaints and their criticisms concerning the department. No, the hon. minister did not choose to accept their invitation.

Why travel all over the country, spending money, using private cars, that he so disliked at the time he was in the opposition? He recalls having criticized certain ministers who had used those cars; he even accused them of taking the advice of waiters and sleeping car porters. I believe that, before he monopolizes the Canadian National or Canadian Pacific to travel and just say hello, the minister should at least receive the thousands of his employees who had complaints to make. He could not see them, naturally, because of previous appointments, and if I recall correctly—

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Before the hon. gentleman continues in that vein would he read, say, 15 or 20 words more of that quotation relating to the address I gave to the postmasters there, the inspection I made of the city post office and my comments on the service generally?

Mr. Denis: With great pleasure. The hon. gentleman said more about electronic sorters, and predicted the introduction of mechanization which would, he said, virtually eliminate the hand sorting of mail.

(Translation):

Whereas last year he said that it would in no way prejudice the staff and that the present employees would keep their jobs; but, he was not speaking of departmental re-organization and of any resulting decrease in staff. I therefore wonder—and this is a change of mind on his part—why he is taking a trip to the Sydney post office, merely—

(Text):

"Bill" Hamilton gave his secret for getting to know the business: "I never drive by a post office".

He never drives by a post office, yet he wants to go to Sydney, Winnipeg, Vancouver. But he will not attend a meeting when there is complaining by employees.

(Translation):

However, during his first weeks as Postmaster General, he swallowed the criticisms he had aimed at the government of the day and stated that his attacks had been prompted by wrong information and that, after all, he held no grudge against employees, but only against the minister.

Mr. Chairman, is it possible for a department to be well run if the minister is mismanaging it? Moreover, he used to tell everybody who would listen that the Post Office Department was "second to none". Consequently, all those improvements he mentioned earlier in the day are not due to him; they are only a continuation of progress, a continuation of experiments made before his time. He spoke of electronic instruments; he should be honest enough to admit that those tests had begun before he was appointed to his present post. He then complained that the tests were expensive. Today they cost three times as much. At the time, he said the electronic sorter was a monster —and I have his statement here—a monster costing a million dollars and he wanted to know how soon it would be put to use.

Mr. Chairman, today that monster is costing not only a million but three million, and it has not been put to use yet. Now, instead of calling it a monster, he calls it his great project.

I have here before me a report of the public accounts committee where it is said that, to date, the cost of those electronic machines has reached the figure of $2,383,000. And Mr. Watson Sellar adds:

(Text):

In addition, during the fall of 1958, the department made an installation in its financial branch. Included is a UNIVAC 120 electronic calculator and the rental for this installation is $1,885 a month.

(Translation):

Well, it is time to say that this million dollar monster is now a three million monster and has become the grand project of the hon. Postmaster General. It is a machine rented from the British, an electronic machine of unknown efficiency. Moreover, the P.O.D. does not know what they are going to do with it.

Well that is the symbol of the government, of its so-called vision, to claim all the credit for all that goes well, while anything that goes awry is blamed on the staff. And when things go wrong because of the government's own mistakes, nothing is said about it.

Another matter which greatly concerned the Postmaster General when he was in the opposition, is the P.O. savings banks. The minister, in this connection, had criticized day in and day out, throughout the year. The record is there, page upon page of it in Hansard. I have here some quotations. I have about twenty of them, showing that he was opposed to the P.O. savings banks because they competed with chartered banks.

Now do you know what happens today?

Mr. Parizeau: Quote them.

Mr. Denis: Do you know—if I did not want to keep my hon. friend from Lake St. John (Mr. Parizeau) too late, I would quote them. I have them right here. Do you know what the hon. Postmaster General did with savings banks? Do you think he abolished them? Not at all. He multiplied them. There are now 26 more of them, than there were last year. He went even further. In fact, do you know what he says in the report of the Postmaster General? Here is what he says, to encourage savings banks, and I quote from page 28:

As from November 1, 1956, the Savings Bank increased the rate of interest paid on deposits, in order to bring it in line with that paid by other public savings institutions; this helped put a stop to the decline in deposits.

Not only did he make that statement in 1958, but also in 1957. In 1957, he says, and I quote:

Effective November 1, 1957, the rate of interest paid on deposits was increased from 2 per cent to 2½ per cent a year.

Is that a way of discouraging people from making deposits in savings banks? Was he right in saying that, while he was in the opposition, savings banks were a bad thing? And when he criticized the then minister, do you know that that report of the Postmaster General of 1957 came out a few days before the minister took office? Do you know what he was saying then? He was reviewing the background of the savings banks and he was praising their usefulness, But if you compare the 1957 report with the 1958 one—

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis), but his time has expired.

(Text):

Shall the hon. member be permitted to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: I thank the house, and particularly the hon. Postmaster General, for their kindness. In allowing me to complete the few remarks I had to make on this matter, I am sure the passing of the other items will be speeded up. Therefore, I shall only say a few words more.

I said a word about the civil service commission, and I shall say, in closing, that while the minister used to criticize the government for its failure to deal with the matter of salaries and working conditions, his answer now is that everything is the responsibility of the Civil Service Commission. However, if the matter of salaries is the responsibility of the Civil Service Commission today, the situation was the same at the time, and the Postmaster General knew it. However, he claimed that the then minister should intervene and that he should look after postal employees and mail carriers. But the present minister has hardly done better, because he has not even taken the trouble to attend meetings to which he has been invited.

The Postmaster General has submitted increased travel expenses, after blaming former ministers for allowing travel expenses to go beyond $100 thousand. Now we find that travel expenses have reached the half million dollar mark. What has happened to his sense of thrift? Where is the minister's logic? And where was the waste at the time? And what corrective measures has he applied? A little earlier, I referred to travel expenses. I think the minister must have had his share of such expenditures.

I will not ask him the amount of his travelling expenses but I feel that 25,000 or 30,000 miles to say hello to his friends in the various post offices across the country must represent a rather heavy expenditure. Even though the minister should spend 40 years visiting the various post offices, he could not tour them all; so, he just provokes emulation, rivalry and jealousy among his colleagues of the cabinet.

From now on, when complaints will be made to the department and when thousands of persons will gather to make him representations, I hope he will attend such meetings instead of presiding over a jewellers' banquet—a thing which is very important and very legitimate, I agree—but when he has to choose between two festivities, two receptions, I would suggest that he select the one which is more related to the department in his charge.

The minister used to refer to the slowness of postal delivery. I have here a whole series of articles lambasting the present government for the sluggishness of postal delivery. Naturally it is not the minister's fault. However, I have here a report from a paper which I would call a "yellow paper,"—which is certainly not Liberal, because it is Montreal-Matin,—in which it is said that the special delivery service is rotten. Consequently, I do not think the minister could very well take pride in such a statement, and boast of having improved the situation.

I even have editorials referring to the same situation. The newspaper Le Soleil, which is not over friendly towards the Liberal party, stated that even during conferences, there are complaints that letters take three days to reach their destination. Our friend, Mr. Austin Cross—whom the minister knows very well—has complained that a letter posted by him had been delivered to parliament three days later.

Such occurrences were infrequent before, but in order to criticize the slowness of postal delivery, when the Liberal party was in power, the present ministers, who were then sitting on this side of the house, used to write themselves letters and got together in attempts to put the department on the spot.

The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), who was then sitting in the opposition, used to write himself letters in 1954, to complain later on that his own letters were arriving a little late. I am convinced that the Postmaster General well remembers that.

And only recently, I was telling the hon. minister of a citizen of Montreal who complained that a letter addressed to him had reached him only six days later, while it should have been delivered to him three days before. Are we back to twice a day mail deliveries? When are we going to have twice-daily delivery in Notre Dame de Grace? Does the hon. minister recall the time when he used to claim that twice-daily deliveries would not cost more? Today, he has had a change of mind. However, he considered one-a-day delivery as absurd. Today the hon. minister says the opposite. He says people are satisfied. Why does the minister not admit that he did not have the necessary information at the time, or that he was talking through his hat? But no, we are still waiting for the twice-daily deliveries.

About publicity, the hon. minister professes to be in favour of it. Little wonder, for he has just been named the advertising man of the year. I even have his picture here; and I must say that we see it quite often in the newspapers. He has been named "the advertising man of the year". Consequently, he must not share the view of the present prime minister who used to criticize the government of the day, claiming they were spending too much on advertising.

Earlier tonight, the hon. minister dealt quite briefly with his scooters. We would like to have some information about that. Is the scooter of American manufacture? Can it be manufactured in Canada? The hon. minister knows we have unemployment in Canada. In fact, the city of Windsor, in the constituency of my hon. friend the member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), has thousands of unemployed; yet, they are experienced in that kind of work and they could very well manufacture scooters. Would it not be possible, at least to manufacture those scooters in Canada, in order to give employment to Canadians?

It would be interesting also to know the results of this experience. How many scooters have been tried? Are they left outside at night, or are they put in a garage? How many miles a gallon do you get out of them? We should be told how much they cost to operate? We should be told also if mail carriers will require a driving licence to operate those scooters.

In city, mail carriers have to carry their bags on their back, take them along wherever they go, and must not leave them unattended anywhere. When they have to walk up two or three flights of stairs, they are not allowed to let go of them. Does the same rule apply to scooter drivers or do they have to take the key up with them, and leave the scooters down in the street?

Those are questions that we would like the minister to answer . . .

Mr. Chairman, those are all points on which we would appreciate a reply.

There has been talk, too, about postage stamps. Everyone knows what kind of stamps have been issued, considered from the standpoint of style, art and beauty. We also know how people have reacted to those famous stamps. The minister used to claim there were too many stamp issues; and he promised to improve the situation. I should like to know how many stamps were issued under the present government. Judging from newspaper reports, it seems the minister is issuing two new stamps a day, instead of having two mail deliveries a day. I should like to know what representations should be made with regard to stamps. Only this morning I was reading a suggestion contained in a dispatch from Dublin, which said:

(Text):

Dublin—A special postage stamp will appear here next week to commemorate the first Arthur Guiness, who 200 years ago started brewing the stout that still bears his name.

(Translation):

It might be a good suggestion for the Posmaster General, but then I feel he should consult the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and find out whether he favours that type of publicity, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister gives receptions where nothing stronger than tea and coffee is served. However, if he wants to go ahead on his own and get results, I suggest that he take the Secretary of State along with him, for the Secretary of State claims a reception without a man's drink is just unheard of among civilized people.

Those, Mr. Chairman, are suggestions I wish to leave with the minister.

Before ending my remarks, I would ask the minister to give us some information concerning thefts. Have there been fewer thefts than previously? I should think there have been as many, if not more. Last year, the minister gave a childish reply to a question on this point when he said: "Yes, there have been more thefts, but the amounts involved have been smaller." Such a situation is quite understandable. We are under a Conservative government, and of course, the 500,000 unemployed have no money at all to send through the mails. Moreover, those who still have jobs are earning only half as much money; therefore, money orders are only half as large. I think the minister's explanation is childish.

Furthermore, the minister was to have the R.C.M.P. keep an eye on post offices. What has been done on that score? Is the R.C.M.P. now working for the Postmaster General? Are R.C.M.P. officers assigned exclusively to the Post Office Department? Is that the reason why they could not be sent to Newfoundland at the time of the strike?

Those, Mr. Chairman, are things we should like to know.

I shall now close my remarks, not especially to please the hon. Postmaster General, but to please the hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Parizeau) who would like to leave tonight to join his family—his wife is quite charming, you know—and I would ask the Postmaster General to answer our questions and the objections we have raised. In other words, we want to know why things that used to be black are now considered white.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, if ever we have had an opportunity—

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Ricard: I rose a while ago, Mr. Chairman; I think I should have the floor now.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, if ever this House of Commons was witness to a farce, it was just now. It was doubtlessly due to the lack of judgment which is a characteristic of the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis). It was really disgusting to hear the hon. member for St. Denis holding forth tonight. I think all of us in this House of Commons, should unite in apologizing to the nation for such a silly and senseless speech as the one we have just heard.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe did not understand, because, when I was speaking of silly matters, I was talking about what his minister had been doing.

Mr. Ricard: The contribution just made by the hon. member for St. Denis neither adds anything to nor subtracts anything from the fact that tonight we heard the most nonsensical speech ever uttered in this august house, and, as I said, we should all unite in apologizing to the nation for such nonsensical remarks, for a speech so utterly lacking in reason.

I do not want to waste more of the time of this house by describing the character of the hon. member for St. Denis, because Le Devoir has already sung his praises: The paper called him a puppet, stating that he is absolutely ridiculous.

(Text):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): This has nothing to do with estimates.

Mr. Ricard: Probably; but these are the facts, anyway.

(Translation):

Mr. Johnson: This is an accurate estimation of the hon. member.

Mr. Ricard: It is the most accurate estimation of the hon. member for St. Denis.

Mr. Chairman, we are now considering the estimates of the Postmaster General. Everybody will agree with me when I say that, since the Conservative party came to power, the postal system has been administered with foresight by a wise man, and, more than that, by a just man. At this point, I might recall, Mr. Chairman, that when the Liberal government came to power in 1935, 325 postmasters who had been appointed by the former government were dismissed from their jobs. It was because the Liberal government, which had come back into power, thought that those people were obstructing their activities. We of the Conservative party, may rejoice that we considered matters at their true value and we may boast that we have not dismissed any postmaster except if such action was fully justified.

Mr. Chairman, the few remarks I just made are enough to refute the foolish remarks of the hon. member for St. Denis, and I would now ask to be allowed to deal with a more serious matter.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Postmaster General to give serious consideration to the possibility of erecting as soon as convenient a post office building for the villages of St. Denis and St. Damase. Both villages are progressive communities and I believe that a post office, built in one or the other of those villages, would justify the expense incurred to this end.

I ask the Postmaster General to study carefully the possibility of introducing mail carrier service in the Boisjoli and Hertel districts, in the beautiful and progressive city of St. Hyacinthe. And I would like also to thank the Postmaster General for his understanding of the problems of our rural people, for, in many cases, he has authorized the mail delivery by carrier to relieve to some extent the route of rural carriers, a request that had been refused during many years by the former administration. I urge the minister to continue to understand our population and I am sure that it will help the re-election of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec for many decades to come.

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I think the member who has just taken his seat completely missed the point of the speech made by the hon. member for St. Denis. We in this corner looked upon it as an interesting interlude in humorous pessimism and satire. Mixed with his humorous pessimism and satire were his criticisms and some of his suggestions. I must say before proceeding that we all recognize by this date in the session that the front bench of the remnants of the Liberal party—I think if I put it that way I will not get in trouble—contains a high percentage of persons with dramatic talent.

I am going to be quite parsimonious in the use of language this evening knowing the attitude of the committee and the hopes of everyone to conclude the business at as early a date as possible. I listened with great care and interest to the report made by the Postmaster General concerning his department and certain improvements in various branches. When I was listening I could not help thinking what a contrast there was between the mellow and genial exposition of the activities of the postal service of Canada by the Postmaster General this evening and the fire and brimstone that were breathed by the same person about two years ago when he was a member of the opposition. I remember that on one occasion it went on for a period of over two days. I sat very close to the hon. gentleman at that time and I could almost feel the heat on occasion.

However, regardless of the criticisms and to some extent the pessimism of the member for St. Denis, I think the post office service of Canada is a credit to the nation. It is an enterprise in socialism that has been successful throughout the years and has been carried on not only by Progressive Conservatives but, as far as my constituency is concerned, has been carried on by people who are supporters of all parties in the house, people who are rural postmasters, rural mail couriers, postmen and so on. I think that is very splendid indeed. This service goes on night and day and when we consider the geographical extent of Canada, the physical features of our country and the many difficulties that have to be overcome compared with the provision of postal service in more densely populated countries, I think that our postal service is something to be proud of.

At this time I wish to express my appreciation of the courtesies I have received from the minister. When I write the minister letters he replies very promptly and fully and on a number of occasions he has gone into matters I have brought to his attention. I appreciate that. I think it is quite correct to say that the minister does his homework and works at his job. That is important to me. It is also true that the senior officials in Ottawa, the employees generally throughout the country, the postmasters, the rural postmasters and rural mail deliverers are a credit to the service we have in Canada at this time.

Having said that, I think we can best show our appreciation of the service rendered by the employees by giving some consideration to their representations to the government and the civil service commission for an increase in salaries. If there is one department that deserves serious consideration, the representations of the employees of the Post Office Department certainly do, the postmen who tramp the streets of the cities, villages and small towns, the rural mail carriers and postmasters in the smaller districts. In that connection I have thought for some time that serious consideration should be given to increasing the salaries of the rural postmasters. In fact, in some cases the remuneration is so unattractive that I know the department is having increasing difficulties under some circumstances in getting persons to take these positions.

With respect to the increase in salaries that has been sought by the civil service generally and by the employees of the Post Office Department, I recently read an article entitled, "Pay Boost Justified", by Mr. J. A. Norton in the C.S.A.C. Journal, March issue. I thought that Mr. Norton presented a very good case for consideration of the pay boost sought by the civil service. In the article he draws attention to the fact that the last general pay increase given to the civil service was in May, 1957, although there have been special increases for deputy ministers, commissioners and a few others. Since that time there has been an average increase of 9.5 per cent in the wages or salaries of employees in private industry and in some cases in provincial governments.

In addition, generally speaking the pay received by postmen, particularly the lower paid employees of the post office department, is considerably below the prevailing rates for similar services performed by persons in private industry in the districts concerned. I suggest that the employees of the post office department and the rural postmasters should receive consideration at the earliest possible time.

I want to say a word or two about postmasters over 70. I understand there is a new regulation which provides for the retirement of rural postmasters over 70. I can understand that having some general application but I do think that the regulations should provide for certain elasticity to meet special circumstances. I am quite sure that in very small places the department will find some difficulty in getting persons to replace the present postmasters. In my constituency there are a number of very estimable people who have performed this service for 30 or 40 years. There is one man to whom I might refer by way of illustration. He is a splendid old gentleman. The Postmaster General knows of the case. He is one of the few living monuments to Victorian Toryism in my constituency. He is loved by everybody. As a sentimental old revolutionary I want to say right here that I protest very much against the unfair treatment of some of these ancient Conservatives in my riding who have rendered such long and faithful service. I hope that the government will reconsider these cases, particularly where it is going to be very difficult to find someone to replace them.

I should like to say a word or two about the new post offices that are being built across the country. I think that the building of permanent, attractive, small post offices in the smaller villages and towns of Canada to a greater extent than has been carried on in the past is an excellent policy. I like the policy of the Department of Public Works, to build these post offices at a time when it will do the greatest good in relieving local unemployment. I am sure that the local people are quite willing to have the building of these post offices delayed for three, four, five or six months if it is going to serve that excellent purpose when they are being built and not have them built when there is plenty of activity going on in the construction field and so on. These small post offices are very much appreciated by the people in the smaller towns and villages. I have had a number of people write me about them and say they add to the local morale and pride. I hope that the government will continue this program.

I want to say a word or two about the ventilation and air conditioning in two of our larger post offices. I mentioned it on the public works estimates but I bring it to the minister's attention so that we will have the problem approached from both angles. Owing to the location of the city of Trail and the surrounding hills, which are not covered to date with a very heavy forest growth, there are at times very high temperatures in the summer months, and I think that some consideration should be given to air conditioning there during the two or three very hot summer months.

The next condition about which I complain is one from which the employees in both the Nelson and Trail post offices suffer. I was in the Nelson post office and watched the unloading of the postal bags. Lint seems to come off the bags and get into the air as a result of the handling of hundreds of bags and the ventilation in both post offices is such that the lint is not carried away by the ventilating system.

It hangs in the atmosphere above the sorting tables, shelves and bins. I told the local employees of both post offices I would bring the matter to the attention of the Postmaster General on his estimates and I have kept my word in that respect.

Now, before I conclude I do want to say a word with reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for St. Denis. He spoke with rather subtle humour, but with an element of congratulation very cleverly concealed, and said that there had been an improvement in the design of the stamps since the present Postmaster General took office. I recall that the present Postmaster General used to criticize the stamps issued by the former administration, and he was then the fire and brimstone member as far as the Post Office Department was concerned. However, I think he has done something to improve them.

If I remember correctly, during the last session he said he would enlarge the number of people with whom he would consult in this connection. I presume he has done that because I think there has been a decided improvement, and I have heard other people say that there has been a slow but progressive improvement in the design of Canadian stamps. Mind you, we have a long way to go yet when we look at the beautiful stamps issued by some of the very small South American countries, the small South Sea islands, Borneo, and places like that. I think we have a long way to go yet, but I do think there has been improvement.

I want to refer to the stamp that the Postmaster General issued to commemorate the associated countrywomen of the world, at the suggestion of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada. I like the idea of having co-operation with such organizations, and I suggest that approach should be continued. In this case, the women's institutes commemorative stamp committee was composed of Mrs. T. H. Howes, Mrs. James Haggerty, and Mrs. E. J. Roylance, who is a postmistress at the present time. These ladies did a very effective job in connection with the distribution of these stamps. I think this practice ought to be continued, whether it is in connection with, shall I say, occupations such as agriculture or mining or lumbering, forestry or certain trades and crafts, or whether it is commemorating a historical event that may occur at any place across this country from time to time, or historical persons. I trust the time will not be far distant when the Postmaster General will be introducing a stamp, the central figure of which will be the Mica creek dam on the Columbia river.

I like the idea of getting the co-operation of public organizations, because I am one who believes that if democracy is to function in the days ahead we have to get an increasing number of people in Canada to accept some personal responsibility and interest in all levels of government, whether it be federal or provincial. We also have to get larger numbers of people co-operating in advising on committees such as this, so that we have a greater enmeshing of those who govern with those who are being governed. This is the type of administrative twine, I should say, that will build a strong democracy.

I look forward to continued improvement in the design of stamps and, on the part of the minister, continued co-operation with various groups in Canada who by working with the department or other government organizations feel themselves to be a part of the government of Canada instead of something separate and aside. That is all I have to say at this time.

Mr. Weichel: My remarks concerning the post office estimates will be brief. We all agree that post office business is big business and requires constant action on the part of the Postmaster General, his deputy, the officials in the department and all the employees in order that this improved service cannot but go on to greater things from day to day.

As a former postmaster I was very pleased to read an article which appeared in the postal Tribune, which is published in Montreal, on April 19, 1959. I am going to ask our Postmaster General if he would be good enough to read that article later on in the evening. It refers especially to some of the visits he has made. I was impressed with these remarks, as I can well remember that in my 35 years as a postmaster and supervising postmaster I never had the privilege of receiving a visit from any postmaster general until our present minister visited my office and others in my constituency. I should like to commend the Postmaster General for this most appreciated change in policy. This is a step in the right direction and his personal contact with the employees has given these civil servants the feeling that they are an important part of a great organization working for the good of the Canadian people. I hope he may continue the practice for many years.

I understand that improvements in the Post Office Department have been gradual, but there is ample evidence that all changes have been to the benefit of the service and of the employees who have been loyal in their daily duties. This loyalty is recognized by the Postmaster General and I feel certain that he will be ready to assist these fine employees with all their problems. On one of my recent trips to my constituency I was privileged to visit the Kitchener post office. This city has grown to such an extent that I found the present space in this building inadequate. In presenting this condition to the Post Office Department I suggested that a new post office should be built in the near future in order that the postmaster and his staff could continue the same excellent service that has been provided in the past. My recommendation is being investigated by the department, and I do appreciate the fine co-operation that has been extended to me in regard to this urgent matter.

In closing my remarks, Mr. Chairman, as a former employee, I should like to extend the appreciation of all employees to the Canadian postmasters association and its affiliates in each of the provinces. These associations have done splendid work and are grateful to the Post Office Department for their kind assistance and co-operation.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I should like at the outset to congratulate the minister on his performance this evening. I am sure that everybody will agree that his performance tonight was second to none which he used to put up when he sat on the opposition benches.

Mr. Chairman I listened very carefully to the very clear and elegantly phrased remarks of the hon. member—is it for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard)—about the speech made tonight by the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis). I am in complete agreement with the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) about what he said in his very first sentence, i.e., that the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot had completely missed the boat, when listening to the hon. member for St. Denis.

The hon. member for St. Denis was perhaps ironic, sarcastic and humorous, and I am not too much surprised that the hon. member who followed him should have failed to grasp fully what he meant. Besides, I took the trouble of looking up the definition of the word "humour" in order to make its meaning clear to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot.

The Quillet dictionary, page 2826, says:

Humour is actually something which cannot be defined: it is a form of pleasant irony, particular to the British turn of mind—

But I must admit here that the French have improved on it...

—which is both satirical and sentimental; a mixture of gaiety and sadness, of sensibility and bluntness, of deep philosophy and charming levity.

After reading the definition of the word humour in Quillet dictionary, Mr. Chairman, we are not surprised that the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot did not understand the gist of the speech made by the hon. member for St. Denis.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a few minutes to put two or three requests to the hon. Postmaster General. I hear one of my hon. friends say that they also have some requests to put to him. I hope they will do so.

First, I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) for having appointed the hon. member for Notre-Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) as Postmaster General. He is the only one, in fact, who, while in the opposition, was dead set against one department, and who got it once the Conservatives took office. The Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) for his part, was dead set against the C.B.C., and he was appointed Minister of Finance. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green), who was dead set against the merchant marine, was appointed to the position I just mentioned, as well as Minister of Public Works. There is also... I feel, Mr.

Chairman, that I should come back to the subject under study before you ask me to do so.

Mr. Chairman, I would ask the Postmaster General to kindly consider the representations of mail carriers in my constituency, and, I think, in other constituencies in my area. Mail carriers in the city of Jonquiere each have to serve from 600 to 625 homes. Carriers in the city of Alma, which is located in the riding of my hon. friend from Lake St. John (Mr. Parizeau) each serve from 450 to 470 homes.

An hon. Member: Is this a matter of politics?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): No, I do not think any politics are involved. However, I should like the Postmaster General to investigate and see whether it is not asking too much to have mail carriers serve between 600 and 625 homes. I know the minister showed great concern for people when sitting on this side, and I am sure he is still concerned. I therefore ask him to kindly have this matter looked into by his officials, to determine whether something might be done in this regard.

There is another problem arising in Jonquiere and Kenogami, and I refer to the distribution of circulars. Within a period of three months, at Jonquiere—I cannot give the exact figure—but mail carriers had to deliver thousands of circulars for which the post office charges 1½ cent postage. I think it has often been requested, particularly by the postal employees association, that a ½ cent bonus be paid to give some encouragement to mail carriers when they have to deliver such circulars, because this involves a great deal of extra work, and with the 600 or 615 or 625 homes they have to serve, I think it is really asking too much.

I therefore urge the minister to give serious consideration to this matter and to see whether some way could be found to meet the problem.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Chairman, I would also point out to the minister that part of Jonquiere, which is called Jonquiere-North, with a population of close to 7,000 people, has no post office. To be frank, I must say there once was a sub-post office there, but some irregularities occurred, and the office had to be closed. However, nothing further was done. Perhaps the minister could send an inspector in the area to meet the people concerned, and find out whether the situation might be corrected. People living across the Sable river, which runs through Jonquiere, have to cross the river into St. Dominique parish to have a money-order made up, or to register a letter. There have been many complaints, and people have been writing to the Post Office Department in this connection. I therefore ask the minister to investigate the matter and to send someone in my constituency to work out a solution to this problem, which is really urgent.

[Mr. Brassard (Lapointe).]

Mr. Deschatelets: I just want to make a few brief remarks. First, I want to congratulate my colleague the member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) for his remarkable account of the errors and the unkept promises that the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) has made since he has left this side of the house.

Now, if the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) is interested in reading silly speeches, ridiculous suggestions, destructive criticisms, unfair insinuations, I invite him to read the speeches that the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace made between 1953 and 1957.

(Text):

I should like to say, Mr. Chairman, at this stage that we are worried over the fact that the costs of this department are increasing steadily year after year, especially because the services are not improving at the same pace. In fact, according to the latest statistics furnished by the minister himself on June 24 we have evidence that non-delivered letters have increased from 36,000 to nearly 42,000 during the period from 1956-57 to 1957-58. This continuous increase in the cost—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Would you give the figure for the delays I gave in that same report?

Mr. Deschatelets: I will leave this matter to the minister himself. I am speaking now just of non-delivered letters. I am sorry if in his statement the minister forgot to mention so many important items such as this one. Then I will continue my remarks. This continuous increase in the cost gives us the opportunity tonight to salute the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace as the most expensive Postmaster General Canada has ever had since confederation.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Good value comes high.

Mr. Deschatelets: These increases in cost are really surprising when we have at the head of the administration a man who so often professed a philosophy favouring public savings. We on this side of the house of course are not against an increase in the cost but we want the services to improve at the same pace. We do not want to have promises; we do not want to have words. We want to have improvements for the Canadian citizens especially—and I repeat this—when we have at the head of the administration a minister who when he was on this side of the chamber was distinguished much more by his imagination than by his judgment. I do not hesitate to use these words because I know I am dealing with a man who can take a well-deserved punch on the chin and come back for more. I have a few other questions that I intend to ask when we reach further items.

Mr. Benidickson: I wish to associate myself not only with the hon. member for St. Denis but with the hon. member for Kootenay West in respect to the comments they have made on the minister's estimates.

The previous speaker indicated that he was disappointed because some of the things which seemed to be very prominent in the intentions of the minister when he was sitting on this side have not been fulfilled. The hon. member for Kootenay West indicated that he thought, as I do, that the minister is a hard-working member of the government who pays great attention to his department. I want to endorse that view.

The other point I want to make is this. I want the minister's guidance—I do not think he will be minister for very long; maybe just another two years—I want to know for the next two years what principles he feels are proper in his department. I, myself, know something about being on the government side and during that period I always wanted to be relieved of personal correspondence if it was of a routine nature and if it did not require ministerial or personal judgment. Now I want to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that having that in mind I thought I was sparing him from correspondence which would require his attention, unnecessarily as it seemed to me, although it involved something in my constituency which was very important. I refer to the extension of a letter carrier service to a section of the town of Kenora.

I have made an analysis of my file and of my diary and it involves as many as 40 items in the last two years during the time the minister has been in charge of the Post Office Department. It involves letters, telephone calls and other approaches to his officials. The minister and I are friends, and if I had wanted to utilize that friendship I could have called the minister, but instead, with regard to these 40 items, I communicated with senior officials of his department. Now I simply want to ask the minister whether or not it will continue to be his policy that when a decision is made which is of interest to a member of parliament who has been operating in this fashion and making 40-odd contacts with his department, he proposes, henceforth, to advise the defeated candidate in the constituency of the member concerned ten days before he advises the member of parliament who has taken an interest in the matter all along.

The alternative course which I could have pursued during those two years would have been to ask the minister questions on the orders of the day about the progress which was being made, or to bother him by personal correspondence. I should like to have an indication of whether or not it is going to be the standard policy to pull out the rug from under a member of parliament who has been active with regard to a matter which is of concern to his people. As I say, my diary indicates 40 separate contacts with the hon. gentleman's officials. I thought I was sparing the minister a good deal of trouble. I like the minister, and I could have bothered him if I had chosen to do so.

Mr. Carter: I should like to associate myself with those who have paid compliments to the Postmaster General and I should also like to voice my appreciation of the consideration which I have received from the officials of his department both here in Ottawa and in the district office at St. John's. I should also like to support the plea which was made by the hon. member for Kootenay West for an increase in the salaries of the postmasters and mail carriers. The complaint which I have to bring before the Postmaster General at this time is that the salaries of a great many of the postmasters in Newfoundland have decreased during the past year.

Hon. members may not be aware of this, but before confederation the postal and telegraph services of Newfoundland were combined under a department of the government and the employees had the status of civil servants. After confederation the job was split up and the people engaged in it acquired two masters. As to their postal duties, they are responsible to the Postmaster General in Ottawa, and with regard to their telegraphic duties they were responsible to the superintendent of Canadian National Telegraphs. But they still carried on exactly as before, keeping the same hours and doing the same job and in their own minds they still regarded themselves as civil servants. The important thing to remember about these people is that they have no opportunity to supplement their income in other ways, because their C.N.T. duties require them to be at their posts at all hours of the day.

Last year I brought before the house a vigorous complaint that Canadian National Telegraphs had made a decision to change the instruments which these people were using from what were called wireless sets to radio telephones. My complaint was based on two grounds. The first was that this change resulted in a lower standard of service and the second was that it resulted in a drastic reduction in the salaries of these postmaster-telegraphers as we call them now. That was bad enough, but I have recently received several letters informing me that another hardship has been imposed upon them in that their annual leave has been taken from them. Because they are no longer using wireless instruments, it is said that they now have a different status and are no longer eligible for annual leave. But they are doing exactly the same work as before. As I have said, their salaries have already been reduced and in some cases almost to a bare existence level, therefore these people cannot afford to have holidays at their own expense. If they cannot get holidays with pay, they cannot have holidays at all. It seems to me that somewhere we have on our statute books legislation which requires all federal employees to be given two weeks holiday with pay.

I want to ask the Postmaster General to look into this matter because I attribute a certain amount of the responsibility to him since it was the post office which originally made this agreement with Canadian National Telegraphs. Therefore they have a responsibility to see that these people are treated humanely and justly.

The other point I want to bring to the minister's attention is the matter of the small rural post offices which were also referred to by the hon. member for Kootenay West. In my own province and in my riding we have what amounts to discrimination in the establishment of these post offices because it all depends on whether a settlement had a post office building before confederation. There are lots of settlements that have sprung up since confederation which still cannot be provided with a post office building under the present policy of the federal government although this same government does provide many smaller settlements with post office buildings.

A settlement that has 70 or 80 families is too large a settlement to be served from a room in somebody's residence and that is what is happening in a great many cases. I urge the minister to look into the situation and to revise the policy so that post office buildings will be provided on the basis of need and not on the basis of revenue or on the basis of a building having existed prior to confederation.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, my remarks at this time will be brief. I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the matter of summer uniforms for the letter carriers. During the last two or three weeks I have received several complaints from letter carriers in my community stating that the uniform they have to wear in the summer months is too heavy. I made some inquiries into the matter and as far as I can determine there is no distinctive summer uniform for letter carriers. I feel that this is a matter to which the Postmaster General might give serious consideration because our policemen, firemen and other public servants do have light weight uniforms for summer wear.

I also wish to concur in what has been said in connection with small post offices. In the riding I represent we still have a number of small rural post offices that certainly are not a credit to the department. I feel that in the years to come everything possible should be done to eliminate those post offices that have inadequate space. I am sure the minister will give that his serious attention.

Item agreed to.

295. Operations—including salaries and other expenses of staff post offices, district offices, railway mail service staffs, and supplies, equipment and other items for revenue post offices, including administration, $103,037,621.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I have a question to ask the minister which I hope comes under this item. I am interested in knowing who holds the contract for parcel post service in the city of Three Rivers. Would the minister have that information?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, my officers are on the way down. I might be able to get the information for the hon. member in a moment.

Mr. Deschatelets: I should like to know who is the holder of the contract for parcel post for the city of Three Rivers at this time. Also, were tenders asked for by the department before the granting of this contract? Could the minister give me the names of those who tendered and also the amounts of the respective tenders? I should also like to know who was the previous holder of this contract and the reason for its termination.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, since we have approximately 8,000 transportation contracts of one sort and another in existence in Canada I think it unlikely that the details of each one of the tenders would be available here this evening. If the hon. gentleman would be satisfied, though, I would be delighted to send to the department for the information which I could give him in approximately 15 or 20 minutes or I could give it to him in the morning. We certainly could acquire it for him.

Mr. Benidickson: As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, the minister has not replied to my question. Would he hope that hon. members on this side would address their correspondence particularly to him in order that he could reply personally on something that perhaps we did not regard as controversial or political?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, before replying I was waiting until we had collected all the questions but if the committee wishes it I could perhaps answer those questions that have been raised up to this point before going any further.

I might deal first with the remarks of the hon. member for St. Denis who rehashed, as he did last year, my speeches of the last four or five years and threw in a few new newspaper quotations. One of the main themes of his remarks was that these things were visionary, these things were not actually coming into being, these things were looking to the future. The hon. gentleman has only to ask the additional 125,000 householders who are now having mail delivered to their doors this year, the 16,400 people on rural routes who are getting mail delivered to their homes for the first time. The hon. gentleman can go and look at the new machinery, particularly in the Vancouver and Winnipeg post offices, which is more modern perhaps than any other parcel handling machinery in the world. The hon. gentleman can ask those people who for the first time—to cite one of a dozen examples—are now receiving receipts at post offices without having to bring them in themselves. The hon. gentleman could go out to Vancouver and look at the new scooters which are under test out there. The hon. gentleman may not like our new stamp designs but he can read the publications of the philatelic world and find credit being given to the department for improvements in Canadian stamp design. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that these are very real and present improvements and achievements in the department.

The hon. member made reference somewhat critically to our budgetary situation, suggesting that I had looked forward to a break-even point as far as the departmental operation was concerned and that I felt the department should be operated on a break-even basis. We are operating on a break-even basis. This year we have a deficit of $173,000 on a total expenditure of $180 million-odd. I suggest to the hon. member for St. Denis that if there is any possibility of coming closer to a break-even point than $173,000 on an expenditure of $180 million-odd, I should be very much surprised.

Mr. Benidickson: And your premises are charged to the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Yes, very definitely. On the other hand, of course, we give a great deal of free mail service including that given to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and all other hon. members of this committee.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not use it very much.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): There are a number of other areas in which we give service which to some extent would offset that.

The hon. member for St. Denis in talking about our new equipment referred to possible reductions in staff and the worries of the staff with respect to automation. I wish to assure him that the staff themselves—and this is the important consideration—are not worried about the automation referred to. They are forward looking people. In their postal Tribune for April, 1958, which is their own official organ, they had this to say in their editorial:

> Postal employees need not fear automation providing the authorities and the workers use the benefits of automation for the improvement of working conditions as well as the service. While machine may replace much manual sortation, it will create many higher technical positions. Some employees now manually sorting mail must be prepared to change over to new duties. It must also follow that employees will expect to receive higher compensation for assuming higher technical responsibilities. This we hope will be settled around the bargaining table.

This, we hope will be settled around the bargaining table, and will be a part of the responsibility which their association will assume in this connection. I want to assure the committee that our own employees are looking forward to these improvements with the same anticipation and with the same interest as the administration of the department.

The hon. member for St. Denis was somewhat critical of something which is frankly quite close to my heart, and this is my practice of travelling across this country in order to keep in touch with postal operations and with postal employees, because I have made it very clear, Mr. Chairman, that I believe the foundation of any successful operation of the magnitude and size of the post office is people, people at all levels, and nothing else, and that there is a responsibility on the part of the minister of this department to know what is going on in the department at every level and in every part of the country.

I had a quotation in my notes but I had not intended to deal with it or quote it, and I am doing so only because of the point which the hon. member raised because it proves the value of these constant contacts. I find in the association's magazine for April, 1959, the following editorial:

> It is well known that our Postmaster General when visiting a city, makes it his business to go through the post office. He talks to as many employees as possible and asks very frank questions to which he expects a frank reply. His attitude is friendly and he seems determined to find out all he can about the service and the problems of the employees. This is a radical change from the policy of former postmasters general and gives the employees the feeling that they are not just a number.

The hon. member for St. Denis can laugh all he likes, but when I get that kind of appreciation from the staff I intend to continue that policy.

Mr. Benidickson: Are they going to get an increase in pay?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That, Mr. Chairman, is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course; but my primary concern is in those fields where I have some responsibility.

Mr. Benidickson: I approve your travels.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I think that reasonably deals with the hon. member for St. Denis.

I might give another quotation from this employees' publication which in the past has not been very complimentary at times to the department. This is from the April, 1959, issue:

> While the change has been gradual, there is ample evidence that all changes have been to the benefit of the service and the employees.

There, they mean the public service. This is what they said in their news magazine about the relationship with our senior officials of the department.

I will be very glad to take up the points raised by the hon. members for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, Waterloo North, Lapointe, and Maisonneuve-Rosemont. Because the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont put a very misleading figure on the record, I might just point out that he referred only to non-delivery of mail when he quoted the figure of 6,000 and 41,000-odd. I think he should also put on the record information which was given in the same return to show the delays were down from 30,000, to 26,500, and he might also have kept in mind that the over-all picture showed a general reduction of 10,000 in those inquiries this year specifically since—

Mr. Deschatelets: A few moments ago when the minister referred to the non-delivery was he quoting delays?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Delays are down from 29,966.

Mr. Deschatelets: Was the minister comparing the period 1955 to 1957-58?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No; I was comparing the year 1957-58 to 1956-57.

Mr. Deschatelets: Because the figures I gave were for the period 1955-56. The 1957-58 figures cannot be accurate enough to quote.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I understand. As far as the member for Kenora-Rainy River is concerned, I will be very glad to look into the point which he raised and see what can be done about it, but I want to assure him that any time he wants information, either in this house or outside, I will be delighted to give it to him just as promptly as possible.

Mr. Benidickson: I know that, but I had used the other method.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I think that covers the situation generally. The member for Burin-Burgeo raised the same point he raised last year.

Mr. Benidickson: May I interrupt the minister at this point; I think it is a pertinent point. I think the betterment that was made available that pertains to my town of Kenora was as a result of a conference with postal people last autumn where certain regulations were made more agreeable. Would the minister have available that new information because it would apply to a great number of other ridings, or would he prefer to give that information at a later time?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace: Basically, what the hon. member is referring to, I think, is the practice we have developed of bringing in our senior officials from all over Canada for a discussion on their operating problems, and out of that arose last year a proposal to change our regulations in the letter carrier service to allow us to include many of those suburban areas that previously had been excluded. While I cannot be certain, because we do not have the information here—again we can get it for the hon. member—I believe that this service which was instituted in Kenora arose out of our new regulations.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes; but, Mr. Chairman, is it now in the form of a regulation, something in writing, that would be available to all of us?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Oh, yes, very definitely, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: Because previously my understanding was that there were certain limitations as to the number of calls that would have to be made, according to the elevation of the land, and whether or not it was possible for the carrier to find a convenient location for his call, and that kind or thing. If that has been changed, is it available to the public?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Yes, Mr. Chairman, and I will be very glad to see that tomorrow the hon. member gets an outline of the existing regulation covering our extensions.

Mr. Nixon: Before this item passes, Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of points that I would like to bring to the minister's attention. The first one is the remuneration paid to postmasters in rural post offices, which I believe is worthy of some consideration and survey. I have in mind one instance in particular, that of the Echo Bay post office in my riding, where the remuneration was cut from $2,400 to $2,000 since the present postmaster was appointed in July, 1957. In the meantime, this man has provided a new post office quarters, centrally located, light, heat, telephone, insurance and so on, and new postal boxes have been installed for the convenience of the public. A request to the district office for an increase to $2,700 was refused. The postal authorities claim that his is a part-time job but the post office is open from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m., Monday through Friday, and from 8.30 a.m. to 12.30 p.m. Saturdays. I am sure that many other rural post offices are probably working under the same or similar difficulties, and in view of the fact that since the close of the fiscal year 1956-57 to the end of the year 1958-59 post office expenses have risen by over $30 million and estimates for the current year will add more than $1 million, it is not fair that small economies should be practised to the extent of reducing remuneration where increasingly good service is being rendered. I would suggest to the minister that he have a survey made and see if this abuse, if it is in order to call it that, cannot be corrected.

I have another matter which I should like to draw to the attention of the minister having to do with the rural directories which are produced yearly. I do not believe that they are receiving proper attention when being compiled because in many instances they do not provide an accurate record of people living in the community. For instance, I have found that people who have lived in certain areas for years have been omitted, occupations listed are incorrect and the names of new residents are not being added. It would appear that the same list is just reprinted from year to year, which I hope is not the case. I would ask the minister to make a personal note of this matter with a view to having more accurate listings in the next issue.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to echo the words of the hon. member for Algoma West on both points. The rural directory is of very great advantage now but it could be of very much greater advantage if it were kept a little more up to date. I made a suggestion to the minister privately that I think would make it very much more effective. I suggested that he might indicate by an asterisk whether persons listed are married or unmarried. For some purposes it would make the document very much more valuable and it might be that the minister could raise the price a little. The hon. member for Essex East has some ideas on the subject which I do not think I will repeat to the committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Constructive ideas.

Mr. Pickersgill: Very constructive ideas, I might add. I should also like to echo what the hon. member for Algoma West has said about revenue post offices which in fact, whether or not the department says they are part-time, have to be kept open every day. That is particularly true in the province of Newfoundland where the telegraph systems are also in the same offices, and for many of these postmasters their remuneration is ridiculously low in this day and age. The minister knows, of course, that he spends a great deal less in Newfoundland than he does in other provinces because he only has five rural mail carriers in the whole province compared with 177 in Prince Edward Island, 391 in New Brunswick and 355 in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): In fairness would the hon. member read the second part of the answer which indicates that there are more post offices in Newfoundland than three out of four of the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, there is a slight difference. In Nova Scotia there are 914 revenue post offices, in New Brunswick 533, in Prince Edward Island 91 and in Newfoundland 605. Considering that the area of Newfoundland is about three times that of New Brunswick and about four times that of Nova Scotia, there does not seem to be any great disparity there. The figures are not out at all when you compare five rural mail carriers to 355, 391 and even 177 in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I listened carefully to the answer the minister gave a moment ago to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River with reference to government policy as to salary increases. I do not want to go into the matter at length other than to tell the minister that I have received from the constituency I represent a number of letters concerning the salaries that are being paid to mail carriers and others at the present time. I should like to know from the minister whether there are several categories of mail carriers across the country. Are carriers in cities, for instance, paid more than carriers in towns or are they all paid a uniform rate? If they are all paid a uniform rate, can the minister indicate when they may expect to get an increase in salary because I am sure that the commission and the department have taken into consideration the fact that the cost of living has gone up from the time the last increase took place. Without giving away any secrets, I wonder whether the minister could give some indication whether or not a salary increase is in mind for these carriers?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): In answer to the hon. member for Laurier, all our letter carriers across Canada are paid the same basic salary with the normal civil service increases. As far as an increase or change in their salary is concerned, that is one of the matters which I presume is under consideration at the present time by the civil service commission and about which we have had a number of questions in the house recently. It is something which is not directly the responsibility or concern of the department although we are very interested in the matter generally.

Mr. Chevrier: Are the minister and the department concerned to the extent of making representations to the civil service commission about increases for the various employees of his department?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): From time to time the commission will discuss matters with us but I think I can say that remarkably effective representations have been made both by the letter carriers association and the Canadian postal employees association and I doubt whether there is anything we can add to their representations.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

With respect to the matter of revenue postmasters, their remuneration is based essentially on a measurement of the work going through their offices. The particular case which was referred to a little while ago probably arises because when the work drops in an office we hesitate, as long as the existing postmaster is there, to reduce his stipend, but when the postmaster changes we then bring the stipend in line with the current volume of work. These are rate and work measurements which apply right across the country and which generally prove to be pretty fair.

Mr. Nixon: Does the minister not think that another look should be taken at this arrangement?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I should have said that I certainly will look into the particular case which the hon. member drew to our attention to see if, as occasionally happens, there is something here which is unusual that deserves consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: The whole formula needs to be looked at again.

Mr. Carter: The Postmaster General indicated in his reply that I was repeating something which I raised last year. In case he may have misunderstood me, I want to make it perfectly clear that the situation which I have described with respect to postmaster-telegraphers is a new development which has taken place within the last three of four weeks, and one which also represents a further deterioration in their financial position.

Mr. Herridge: I should like very briefly to support the complaint raised by the hon. member for Algoma West with respect to the post office directory. I have felt, at times, it is not very frequently revised. In looking over my list a few days ago I saw one man's name and his occupation was listed as labourer. He was a labourer 40 years ago, but he has gone a long way since then. It is apparent the directory is not kept up to date.

Mr. Tucker: I am sure the Postmaster General will agree with me that the hon. member for Trinity-Conception has not given him or his officials any unnecessary work this session. I shall not now delay the passage of his estimates unduly. However, there are one or two matters I should like to bring to his attention.

A short time ago I wrote the Postmaster General on behalf of the residents of Goose Cove, Trinity Bay, who wanted better postal service. An investigation was made and a proper reply was received from the Postmaster General but the application was turned down. In view of the fact the residents of Goose Cove have to go to the post office at Trinity, I should be grateful if the Postmaster General would give consideration to the placing of a letterbox at Trinity Junction where letters could be mailed, thus avoiding a trip to the nearest post office at Trinity. I understand that before the Canadian National station at Trinity Junction was burned, there was a place in which these letters could be placed. I should like also to know why some of the new post offices in Newfoundland have lock boxes to which practically everyone has access.

For instance, the post office at Bell Island has about 1,000 boxes, and it is a known fact that any person who has hired a box and possesses a key can open from two to twenty other boxes with the same key. This has no doubt caused much embarrassment and concern to the postmaster at that settlement, as well as to the R.C.M.P. and the holders of post office box keys. I understand also that pilfering has taken place there, but of this I am not sure.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact the stamp vending machine at the general post office in St. John's is so often out of order, I wonder if the minister would give consideration to supplying a second machine.

Mr. Howard: This seems to be the appropriate time in the evening to raise a particular matter. It has to do with the rural directory to which reference was made. I have just one question to pose to the minister. The directory I have, which is for the constituency of Skeena, in the abbreviated indications for occupation of the individuals listed has, in a number of places, the initials, "ind." without any indication in the table as to what "ind." means. I wonder if the minister could explain to me for what the initials stand?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I must admit that both the officials who are with me and I are stumped, but we shall see if we can get the information in a moment or two. We shall certainly look into the matters in Newfoundland which were raised by the hon. member who spoke a few moments ago.

For the benefit of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, who asked me a question a few moments ago about parcel post service, I may say that the former contractor was Mr. Clement Carignan, who held a contract which expired on June 30, 1959, on the basis of 9 cents per item delivered. As a result of tenders the contract was passed to Mr. Albert Desaulniers, who tendered on the basis of 8 cents per item. You will see, therefore, as a result of these tenders there was a substantial reduction in our cost.

Mr. Deschatelets: Was he the only tenderer?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): As I said, this is the only information I have here. I shall get the other information as quickly as I can.

Mr. Benidickson: Does the Postmaster General select the designs for stamps? We have heard criticism not only of the current stamps but of the stamps selected by his predecessors. What is the process in connection with the selection of a design for a stamp?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am afraid I am the guilty one in that connection. I noticed in looking over the designs for a number of years under my predecessors that they were all authorized by the deputy postmaster general until I came into the picture. Apparently, the ministers had nothing to do with them. I must say I have taken an interest in these stamp designs. The practice which is followed is that, having decided on the subject, we ask one or more artists to prepare a design which is then reviewed, not only by myself but by various other people.

Mr. Benidickson: Is this a patronage matter?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Very definitely, no. Then the design is approved and goes through the normal processes of production. In order to give the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River some idea how difficult this situation can be, I may say we are currently working on a new air letter, aerogram design. We had some seven different designs and I took them with me the other day when I was speaking to a stamp club. I think there were about 20 people around at the end of the meeting, and I asked each one of them to choose his favourite design. Then, I tabulated the results. There were five people who chose one design; four people who chose another; three people who chose another; three people who chose another, and two other designs were selected by one person each. What I am saying is that out of about 17 people their choices were spread amongst six out of seven designs.

Mr. Benidickson: But the minister will decide.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Therefore somebody has to accept responsibility for deciding, and that happens to be me. I would remind him that if he did not like the associated countrywomen of the world stamp, which is possible because some people did not, I think he will find the St. Lawrence seaway stamp and the one commemorating the Queen's visit to Canada, very good ones indeed.

Mr. Granger: I should like to make one or two remarks about the salaries of postmasters in the small communities in Newfoundland which are quite low. I believe these salaries include a small amount for rent, out of which must come the cost of repairs and maintenance of the post office quarters. I would just ask the minister to keep this matter under review, as I believe he has.

Mr. Bourque: I should like to ask a couple of questions of the minister, but before doing so I should like to say that I differ slightly from the remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for St. Denis. He said the minister had gone all the way to Sydney to say hello to the people of Sydney. I have known the minister for some 25 years, ever since he was a little lad, and I am sure that he is too good a politician to go to Sydney just to say hello. While there he would take advantage of saying a long goodbye, so we can divide the cost of that trip by two and make it only 50 per cent because I am sure he took advantage of that opportunity.

I should like to ask the minister a question. Last year he told us that in carrying preferential rate mail there was a deficit of $18 million. What was the deficit this year?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Actually, Mr. Chairman, we make an analysis of our mail once every three years and on that analysis we base an estimate which carries for three years. These figures are in the course of preparation at the present time. We would expect to have them in October of this year which would then give us our comparison for October 1956 or thereabouts when the last estimates were prepared.

Mr. Bourque: When the minister gets those figures, will he be able to give us a breakdown of what the loss is for carrying United States periodicals, etc. and what the loss is for the Canadian periodicals?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No, unfortunately because one periodical is classed with another. Many of these United States periodicals are mailed right here in Canada and we will not be able to differentiate between Canadian and United States periodicals.

Mr. Benidickson: But it is millions.

Mr. Bourque: But as my colleague the hon. member for St. Denis has said, you get statistics on the number of miles travelled to deliver mail and how many pounds went across in the year. You get statistics for practically everything. I think it is of the utmost importance that we should know what the cost is for carrying the United States mail—that is for periodicals, newspapers, et cetera—and what the cost is for Canadian mail. When an increase is put into effect, it is the Canadian editor that pays. Therefore we should know definitely what the breakdown is between the cost of United States periodicals and Canadian periodicals. Does the minister think it would be possible to get that information?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Of course, Mr. Chairman, I think there are two points here to be dealt with without debating the matter overly long. One is that it is not necessarily the Canadian publication that pays. The great majority of United States periodicals which are carried in the Canadian mail are deposited in the mail here in Canada. Therefore we enjoy revenue from them in our Canadian postal services.

The second thing is that it would be an extremely costly business to perform further studies to separate these costs. But I want to suggest to the hon. member for Outremont that if we arrive at a general figure for the cost of these periodicals we can also come down to a unit cost. Then, from other sources which will be easily available to him, we would know the number of these United States publications generally circulating in Canada so we could come to a very close estimate of the expense.

Mr. Bourque: I think it is of the utmost importance that we get that information. Our Canadian periodicals, magazines and newspapers are being strangled at the present time by the United States periodicals. I think the time has come when we should know definitely what the cost is to bring these magazines in and to charge accordingly so that our magazines in Canada will have a fair chance of existing.

Another question that I should like to ask the minister is this. The hon. member for St. Denis has already referred to this matter. As will be recalled when the minister was on this side of the house, he was extremely critical of the one a day mail delivery. Many times—possibly a hundred times and more —one can read in Hansard that he asks the question as to when the twice a day mail delivery would be re-established. Last year I asked the minister for figures and he told me that if the twice a day mail delivery were re-established for five days a week the cost would run between $3,750,000 and $4,340,000 and that if you had a twice a day five days a week delivery with one delivery on Saturday the cost would run from $4,700,000 to possibly $5,925,000 a year. Just to come down to a figure, I shall make a very high estimate. Suppose the cost to be $10 million a year. That would represent approximately 59 cents based on a population of 17 million people. I was just wondering if the minister had in mind re-establishing this twice a day delivery. The present system is causing a great hardship among the businessmen and merchants and a certain amount of hardship in the home. I should like to remind him that the 59 cents per person would not be the cost; that would be more than the cost because if you employ say 11,000 people who are not working at the present time but are drawing unemployment insurance these people would be paying in instead of taking out. I am therefore reasonably assured that we could cut the figure down to about 29 or 30 cents a year per person. I was just wondering if the minister had in mind re-establishing in the near future the twice a day delivery.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No, Mr. Chairman. In fairness, I should point out that most businesses in Canada enjoy two a day mail delivery and that the one a day delivery is primarily restricted to the residential areas.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): I should just like to ask the Postmaster General whether he would care to comment on my remarks about a summer uniform for letter carriers. If he would like to take that matter under consideration and reply at a later date, that would be all right.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No, Mr. Chairman. As a matter of fact, I should reply to that question. I am sorry I did not do so. We have a summer uniform, a lighter type of uniform for letter carriers. There has been some delay in delivery. It was drawn to my attention definitely when I was out in the field and called on these letter carriers. I came back and deliveries are being very definitely speeded up. I think you will find now that most of our people across the country have obtained their summer uniforms.

For the benefit of the other hon. member may I say that "Ind". in the rural directories means independent or no occupation listed.

Mr. Howard: I have a brief comment on that matter, if I may be allowed to make it. I am glad the minister has cleared up this point. I have noticed that abbreviation "Ind". alongside the names of people who I know are Indians. I am pleased to hear that it is not a designation of the race to which the person belongs. In order to make the situation even clearer perhaps the minister could put that in the index section with the word "independent" and "Ind." alongside it.

Mr. Deschatelets: I should like to inquire about the procedure followed in cases of appointments in dealing with semi-staff offices which are semi-urban and semi-rural. It is clear that the nominees of the postmaster in the semi-staff offices come under the civil service commission. I am not dealing with that matter. I am dealing with the appointment of assistants. Under the previous administration appointments were made by the Postmaster General. But according to my information these appointments were made after the positions were advertised and after the applications were screened by treasury officers. May I ask the minister whether this procedure followed by the previous administration is still followed.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Yes, Mr. Chairman, exactly the same procedure is being followed at the present time.

Mr. Deschatelets: Will the minister now be kind enough to explain why this procedure was not followed last October at the post office staff at H.M.C.S. Cornwallis at Nova Scotia where two assistants were appointed. No competition was held for these posts. No advertising at all was done. Can the minister give me at least one good reason why the usual procedure has not been followed?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I could not be certain in this particular case. I would be glad to go into the matter. It is quite possible that this is a navy establishment as the hon. member has already pointed out. Very often, where you have a national defence establishment special conditions arise. But I will be glad to find out and let the hon. member know.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Although I was in my place when the minister spoke on the first item, I did not hear what he said about the three points which I raised. I wonder if he would be good enough to repeat what he had to say about them.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Briefly, I said I would look into the matter and see what we could do. The hon. member referred to the difference in the burden on letter carriers between Jonquiere and Alma. Alma is a comparatively new installation and in order to get it in, very often—in fact, in most cases—the burden is light. We have to have a given number of letter carriers and when we put service in we do not have, as a rule, any great number of residents. That burden will grow. Moreover, our letter carriers are not asked to cover a certain number of homes but to work eight hours a day. If they work longer than that period, an adjustment is made. I may say that this applies to the hon. member's point on the circulars as well. If the load of circulars is so heavy that a postman must work overtime to deliver them, then overtime is paid or time off is given and an adjustment is subsequently reached.

We shall certainly look into his question to see whether we can have a new sub-post office in Jonquiere.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Do these people have any lunch break, or any coffee break?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): They have no coffee break, but they certainly have a lunch period.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I might point out that in practically all modern business establishments it is the practice to provide a five-minute coffee break in the morning and, in some instances, in the afternoon as well.

Mr. Benidickson: I am sure the minister has observed, as I have, that post offices in the United States can, by and large, be quickly identified because they fly the national flag. I know that we have many small post offices which have been rented for use by the department but none the less I think there is a great deal to be said for the flying of the national flag whenever possible and I wonder if the minister has given any consideration to this being done even in the case of some of the smaller premises which are not necessarily premises belonging to the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): We will be glad to do what we can to encourage our postmasters to do that. I think it is a commendable idea, but I must say that some of the post offices I have visited on occasion which combine a store business with their post office function would probably find it inconvenient to fly a flag outside the premises.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the minister be good enough to tell me who is the postmaster at Ste. Sabine in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): We have 12,000 postmasters and I do not have all their names here. But I will look this up for the hon. member and let him know.

Mr. Deschatelets: Perhaps, with regard to the basis of this question I should ask whether the minister is following very closely the procedure adopted by the previous administration when he has as a candidate for one of these positions a veteran who has served overseas. Has he always given preference to veterans as had been done over the years?

[Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace).]

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): One of the most important considerations we bear in mind in the appointment of our postmasters from top to bottom is veterans' preference, and a veteran, if he applies for such a position, and if he is otherwise suitable, goes to the head of the list and gets the appointment. Periodically we have such situations as that in which we must turn down a veteran because a bilingual postmaster is required and the veteran is not bilingual, but I believe in the last report I had, out of 700 postmasterships filled, 100 veterans applied and in those 100 cases we were able to appoint veterans in 92.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That concludes the estimates of the Post Office Department.

PRIVY COUNCIL

National Capital Commission—

305. Administration, and operation and maintenance of parks, parkways and grounds adjoining government buildings at Ottawa and Hull, $1,795,795.

Mr. Caron: I have only one question to put to the Prime Minister, and it does not apply to the present year because it is too late. But next year can he see that a few million dollars more are voted to the national capital commission so that we may start building a new bridge across the Ottawa river?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Item agreed to.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to hold up my own estimates, but might we revert for a brief period to item 303?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

303. Preparatory work, not within the fields of particular departments, on emergency defence measures, $175,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Perhaps I may be allowed to deal with this matter at this point. I appreciate very much the attitude taken by the committee. This is, however, a matter to which some reference must be made at this time, namely the emergency organization. As I stated on the last occasion on which the estimates were before this committee and, later on, on two occasions, it is necessary now to prepare in advance the measures which would have to be taken if a major war were to commence suddenly in all the fury of a nuclear onslaught. I have already set out something with regard to the emergency organization which has been established, and given details in connection therewith. However, in the last few months further planning and organization has taken place to preserve some degree of governmental and economic organization and continuity throughout the initial period of a nuclear war. The purpose we have had in mind has been to decentralize as far as possible.

I do not propose to review what I said on March 23 in that connection as to the course to be taken to provide for the continuance of government and governmental activities in the event of war. The whole problem was discussed in detail on April 24 by several of my colleagues with ministers representing the provinces.

On May 28 an order in council was passed under the Public Service Re-arrangement and Transfer of Duties Act, redistributing civil defence functions, some to national defence, some to national health and welfare, some to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and some to the emergency measures organization of the privy council office. These changes will go into effect on September 1 and the various groups concerned are now making ready to undertake their several responsibilities in this field. The main purpose of the changes in distribution of civil defence duties has been to closely integrate them with the general government organization for war purposes.

My purpose in rising is to announce a decision which the cabinet has made within the last three days relating to wartime organization. As hon. gentlemen opposite who were members of the former government realize, general plans in this connection were considered by the former government and those plans have been considered and advanced in the last two years. Direction has been given to the Department of Defence Production to plan now in peacetime a war supplies agency to be established immediately on the outbreak of war. This agency would have full responsibility and authority for all aspects of control over the production, distribution and pricing of both civil and military supplies other than production on farms and the catching and landing of fish, during the early part of a nuclear war, at least.

Study of the probable economic situation arising from conditions of nuclear attack indicates that the problem of providing and distributing essential commodities for both military and civilian purposes would be critical and complicated. Decisions would have to be taken promptly and any doubt as to where authority lay could result in serious delay and confusion. It would be necessary to have not only an organization with clear, unified control over supplies of all types, but one that could be decentralized not only to regional, but if necessary to local areas.

Those who recall the organization in the last war might visualize the agency as combining most of the responsibilities of the department of munitions and supply and of the wartime prices and trade board. The problems of allocation and distribution in the beginnings of a nuclear war would be vital. As time goes on, should the war continue, we would expect to see circumstances change considerably and it might then be desirable to vary the type of organization now proposed.

It has been decided that the necessary preparations for establishing this agency should be put in the hands of a single unit with assistance from others as required. A review of the functions and responsibilities of the several departments in legislation and in practice led to the conclusion that the Department of Defence Production would be the most suitable one to undertake this task, but requiring the assistance of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture.

It will be noted that the establishment of this new agency will change somewhat the distribution between departments of wartime duties and the preparations for them which I outlined to the house last year. The war supplies agency will require a considerable regional and local organization ready to swing into action on short notice. We would expect it to utilize the field staff of government departments that are qualified to assist it in emergency such, for example, as the numerous officers of the Department of Agriculture in meeting the demand of food supplies.

The agency will require the help of many people throughout the country if it is to be ready for a wartime emergency. In due course we shall therefore have to call for the voluntary service of many competent executives, both from private and public life, to prepare themselves to assume responsibilities on short notice should war occur. We shall also have to obtain for the use of this organization the fullest information on local supplies, facilities and requirements.

Another area which will demand detailed attention in the near future is that of preparations to make the most effective use of motor transport under conditions of nuclear war. The officials are being asked to initiate discussions of this subject both with provincial authorities and with representatives of those engaged in the motor transport industry. In the uncertain and inevitably confused conditions to be expected as a result of nuclear attack it is considered that the flexibility and widespread distribution of motor transport facilities would be of major importance in helping Canadians to survive and reorganize the economy.

I am able to inform the committee—and I think it is important that the committee should know this—that we now have ready facilities from which a central core of the dominion government can carry on outside of Ottawa under conditions of nuclear war, even if there is serious radioactive fallout in this area. Emergency communications facilities have been or are being established to be used if the regular channels of communications are interrupted. We propose to amplify and improve these emergency communications facilities, for such communications will be of vital importance in maintaining the country as a going concern.

We are now in the course of planning the arrangements for emergency regional centres from which the various federal organizations will be able to operate in each province under war conditions, and tie in with both the provincial and military authorities in the area. The local arrangements will have to be reviewed in considerable detail with each of the provinces as soon as that is possible, relating them to the needs and plans of the various agencies concerned as these are developed.

The main expenditures involved in these arrangements are not covered in this Privy Council office vote but under the appropriations of the other departments co-operating in these general matters.

Mr. Benidickson: To what vote is the Prime Minister referring?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Vote No. 303, Mr. Chairman.

These are closely related to the regular duties of those departments and it seems best to leave them there for reasons of security. I point that circumstance out and underline it. In the various departments, naturally, there will not be full detail as to the measures taken but only the general outline being given by myself on this question.

The staff and expenses of the small central unit in the Privy Council office which this vote is intended to cover will have to be increased to carry the larger load involved by the transfer of civil defence duties. For this year, these increased costs will be borne by transfers of funds from the civil defence vote in accordance with the practice when duties are transferred under the Public Service Re-arrangement and Transfer of Duties Act. The increase in staff shown in the figures in the blue book on page 403 covers the five regional officers that have been appointed. Offices are now being opened in Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver. As soon as possible five more will be opened so that we will have one in each province. This has been made necessary by the burden of work that will arise out of the new civil defence duties.

In placing this plan before the committee in some detail I want to emphasize that the taking of this course of action is not in any way to be construed as evidence of any increase in international tension or added fears in recent months, but simply as a course of action in which care and caution must be exercised by those with responsibilities to the end that should nuclear war take place the necessary preparations would have been made to assure the continuance of the government and to maintain Canada in a position of strength and stability. I want to make that abundantly clear because some might interpret what I said as indicative of a greater fear as to the immediate future internationally and I want to underline that. That is not the reason for this very extensive plan to assure the maintenance of government and security should nuclear war take place.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, it is, of course, wise and well that government should take precautionary plans of this kind. I think at the same time the Prime Minister was well advised to emphasize that the announcement of the advancement of those plans now does not mean in any way, shape or form that the contingency which they are designed to meet is any closer than it was a year ago. Indeed, perhaps we may hope—there does not always seem to be very much ground for hope, but we must hope—that that contingency will recede. Nevertheless, any government has an obligation of this kind to plan and it is satisfactory to know that the government is discharging that obligation.

The Prime Minister in his announcement, however, dealt with a very important subject, the subject of emergency powers, the basis for such emergency powers and the circumstances under which those emergency powers might come into effect. I am going to ask the Prime Minister whether he would let this particular item stand until tomorrow so that we can have an opportunity to study the statement which he made tonight? I can assure him we do not do this with any desire to hold up the estimates but it is such an important statement that perhaps he would give us the opportunity to study it. Perhaps he might even let us have a copy of it tonight and we would have some time even tonight to look at it so that we can with a minimum of delay deal with it tomorrow. I am going to ask, therefore, whether the Prime Minister would agree to let this particular item stand until tomorrow?

Mr. Herridge: I want to endorse the remarks of the Leader of the Official Opposition with respect to the Prime Minister's announcement of those precautionary measures. I was going to ask exactly the same thing as the Leader of the Official Opposition asked because it was a long statement and it was very difficult for us to follow. I hope the Prime Minister will agree to the request of the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would like to say a word before the Prime Minister speaks. I think the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition is a wise one. I understand the next department is the Department of the Secretary of State; then we take up the estimates of the Minister of National Health and Welfare under whose jurisdiction comes the main civil defence vote under the distribution of powers referred to by the Prime Minister tonight and announced some time ago to be made effective on September 1.

Now, if this matter is going to stand, as I think it should, until tomorrow there ought to be some arrangement made whereby it can be discussed in relation to the civil defence item, because this is an overlapping subject. The questions that one would ask of the Prime Minister on item 303 would be of concern to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Defence Production and the Minister of National Defence. When the Prime Minister makes arrangements with regard to tomorrow this suggestion ought to be borne in mind.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I, too, of course, am quite in accord with the suggestions that have been made. We all appreciate the willingness of the Prime Minister to allow this matter to stand, but we all know the capability of the Prime Minister in the field of law. I would hope that tomorrow he would explain to the committee the difference between the powers that were, shall we say, lost as a result of the failure to reinstate the emergency powers legislation a few days ago in contrast with what is asked for here. I am sure the Prime Minister would be able to give us concrete examples tomorrow of the rights of the executive under this item 303 in contrast with the lapsing of the emergency powers legislation which was so advertised a few days ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think I can answer that at once, even though I am going entirely to accede to the request as particularly amplified by the member for Essex East. In the event that war should come, then immediately reliance would be placed on the terms of the War Measures Act and the extraordinary powers therein provided would immediately become applicable.

The hon. member refers to the fact that in so far as the Defence Production Act is concerned, certain extraordinary powers will be allowed to lapse as of July 31. That is so, but there is no contradiction in the action taken here and the allowing of those powers to lapse under the Defence Production Act.

What I have placed before the committee is simply a plan for the assurance of the continuance of government and government itself, the provision of the security measures should war break out. If there was an emergency threat of war, or the actual outbreak of hostilities then, of course, the hon. gentleman knows the War Measures Act provides for those extraordinary powers that cover every facet of Canadian life.

Now, with respect to the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition and amplified and given greater particularity by the member for Essex East, may I say this. In so far as this item is concerned, it might be allowed to stand as part of the subject to be discussed when the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare come before the committee and it could be discussed at the same time as the general problem of civil defence, if that is satisfactory to hon. gentlemen who made the suggestions as well as to the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Item 303 stands.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Leader of the Opposition asked the Prime Minister whether copies of his statement were available. If they were, it would be very convenient because Hansard will not be out until tomorrow.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have to admit that they are not. I have a habit of having a statement prepared and then making interlineations which make the original statement bear little resemblance to that which is placed before the house. I will see that one copy, the copy in question, after use by Hansard, is made available to the Leader of the Opposition and in turn to the hon. member for Kootenay West for the C.C.F. group.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that item 303 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Mr. Chevrier: What about item 563?

The Chairman: That was carried.

Supply—Secretary of State

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

372. Departmental administration, $303,040.

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, since the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State were presented to the standing committee on estimates and there discussed at length I do not propose, in introducing them to the committee, to embark on a lengthy statement on the functions and operations of the department. The proceedings and the report of the committee are in the hands of hon. members at this time. With respect to the committee's report, I may say that the recommendations advanced therein are being given serious and careful consideration by me and by my undersecretary.

Hon. members are aware that the Secretary of State, as well as being responsible for the administration of the Department of the Secretary of State, including in his capacity of custodian of enemy property the office of the custodian of enemy property, for which there is no parliamentary appropriation, is also responsible for the administration of the department of public printing and stationery. He also acts as spokesman in this house for the civil service commission and the chief electoral officer. I might mention in concluding that the estimates of the civil service commission were also considered by the standing committee.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, is the Secretary of State contemplating changes in the organization of his department? I recall that during a sitting of the estimates committee, we have discussed the amalgamation of certain divisions. Does the Secretary of State intend to make those changes this year or at the next session?

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, the committee has opposed those changes, and accordingly, they will not be made.

Item agreed to.

Special—

379. Special expenditure in connection with a commission under the Inquiries Act to inquire into the workings of the Patent Act, the Copyright Act, the Industrial Designs Act, and other related legislation, $11,900.

Mr. Peters: What is the progress with respect to submitting the report of this commission?

Mr. Courtemanche: I am told that it will be ready by the end of August, in the fall.

Item agreed to.

Office of the Chief Electoral Officer—

47. Salaries and the expenses of office, $79,420.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, does the Secretary of State intend to propose certain amendments to the Canada Elections Act, following the recommendations made by the committee which studied the matter?

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, I might say to the hon. member for Hull that next session, certain changes will be made to the Canada Elections Act, following the recommendations made by the committee.

Mr. Caron: According to the recommendations of the committee?

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

Civil Service Commission—

67. Salaries and contingencies of the commission, $3,661,089.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a brief comment on this item regarding the civil service and the employment of any person by any branch or any department of the government service anywhere in Canada. We are constantly reminded of unemployment in this country. The civil service of Canada is the largest employer of labour in Canada. The unemployed in Canada are in the main men under the age of 50 years with the responsibilities of men of that age group.

Civil service regulations demand that preference for employment be given to Canada's veterans. Surely this preference should also be maintained in other branches of the government not under regulations governing the civil service and particularly in the service of the House of Commons itself.

In addition, civil service regulations set the statutory age of retirement at 65. With some unemployment in Canada, with many men well below the age of 65 unemployed, surely the public service of Canada should be the first to set an example to employers and should retire employees over the age of 65 to make way for entry into the service of Canada of these younger men now unemployed. The argument may be used that only certain men and women are retained beyond this age because of knowledge and experience but, this argument is not valid when it is used to break a statutory provision affecting the public service of Canada. No man or woman is irreplaceable and I strongly urge on the government that it should fulfil the self-imposed obligation of retirement of its employees at 65 and so ease the present burden of unemployment.

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, before asking the house to consider the estimates of the civil service commission I should like to present the new chairman of the civil service commission, Mr. Samuel Hughes, Q.C., formerly a judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario. He has assumed a very important responsibility. An effective, independent civil service commission is, in many respects, the key to an efficient public service. The civil service commission may become even more important in the near future. As you know, the government expects to introduce legislation at the next session which may have a significant bearing on the commission in particular and the public service in general.

The government was pleased, therefore, to be able to appoint to the post of chairman a man with so many qualifications and proven capacity in so many fields. Mr. Hughes has a bachelor of arts degree from the university of Toronto and a master of arts degree from Oxford university, and is a member of the Ontario bar. He has had wide experience as a teacher, lawyer, judge, administrator and military officer. His legal training will be a special asset when the Civil Service Act goes before parliament for review. Fortunately, he is also a young man who should be able to cope for many years to come with his numerous responsibilities. I am sure the house will join with me in wishing him well.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the Leader of the Opposition I think I should perhaps say a word in connection with what the Secretary of State has just said. I would not for a moment want what I am about to say to be considered as disrespectful in the slightest degree. I have been a member of the house now for a great many years and this is the first time that I have heard a statement such as that just made by the Secretary of State. Civil servants, no matter how high an office they hold and how respectful they are, are anonymous and have been so in the House of Commons.

Having said that, I repeat that I would not want the gentleman to whom the minister has referred in such eulogistic terms to believe that we on this side of the house do not hesitate to hope that he will fulfil the office to which he has been appointed in the manner in which such offices are generally fulfilled in the civil service of Canada. But I did think, I should bring to the attention of the house the rather unusual procedure of the minister which I hope, in the future, will not be followed as a precedent.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, in spite of the restrictions just now suggested by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), may I also be allowed to congratulate the new chairman. I hope he will continue the good work of his predecessors. I also want to congratulate the two other members of the commission, Miss Addison and Mr. Pelletier for the considerable amount of work they have taken upon themselves since the departure of the former chairman who went back to his diplomatic career. They appeared before the committee and proved themselves equal to the situation. They certainly deserve to be warmly commended.

The civil service of Canada is an organization which, since its very beginning, certainly has been very deserving. It has rendered great services, but there are some things which might be improved; indeed, the commission has often asked for those improvements.

I have here the annual report of the civil service commission for the year 1958. This is what it says on page 6:

> Personnel selection
>
> It has been difficult to supply government hospitals with all the required staff. There is, in particular, a lack of nurses, physiotherapists, rehabilitation therapists and laboratory technicians. There is also a lack of ship inspectors for the Department of Transport. After having satisfied itself that Canadian resources in that field were about exhausted, the commission made some offers of employment in the United Kingdom, which have led to a number of appointments.

And further on, on the same page we see the following:

> At higher levels than that of admission, it has been difficult to find good candidates among science graduates who left university a few years ago. Quite naturally, a good number of the best university graduates have interesting positions in other fields, so that a real problem obtained when the commission had to fill the needs of the various departments.

And, on page 7, we find the following paragraph:

> For instance, it has been impossible for some time to find enough graduates specialized in mathematics, physics or physical engineering and who could become meteorologists, nor a sufficient number of commerce graduates who might become income tax assessors. The problem is due to the fact that the number of graduates in those fields is comparatively small, whereas demand, by government services as well as private industry, remains high.

Well, Mr. Chairman, there is a reason for such conditions and it is an absolutely simple one. They are due to the fact that salaries offered in the civil service for such positions are entirely inadequate.

Accountants were required and, on many occasions, I sent out those forms we get from the civil service commission to all the accountants I know. Not one of them wanted any of those positions, because the salaries they get in private industry are much higher than those offered by the civil service comsission. I am not blaming the civil service commission, since it cannot fix the salaries; that has to be done by the government, and the civil service commission has but to comply with government orders in that respect.

This morning I received posters asking for information officers. Let us have a look at the qualifications required:

High school degree, additional credits for further academic training.

Several years' experience in publicity work.

Good knowledge of publicity media and methods.

Ability to draft and prepare, for publication, publicity texts, etc.

And for that, a salary of $5,700 to $6,180, is being offered, when it is known that in private industry, those people earn $7,000 to start with, and can obtain higher salaries later. How can you expect them to leave a $7,000, $8,000 or $9,000 job to accept one at $5,700?

I have here a poster asking for technical officers, at a salary ranging from $3,420 to $4,020; the required qualifications are as follows:

Degree from a recognized university or good general education, acquired after good and adequate training or experience, and a good many years of experience in the field of public relations.

Demonstrated ability to perform the duties involved in the field of external relations.

Personal suitability; satisfactory physical condition, etc.

For all this, we offer to a university graduate a salary ranging from $3,420 to $4,020. Is it reasonable to think that a university graduate who could get a much higher salary in private industry would accept to sacrifice his life to work for the public service?

And further on, we ask for lawyers. The salary that is offered is $4,740. If a lawyer is not worth more than that, he does not deserve to be a member of the Bar.

It is for those reasons that the government cannot get lawyers, because they all earn more than that, especially during these years when money has lost its value and when people have a good deal of it to spend.

Then, we ask for economics or commerce graduates from a Canadian university. How much do we offer them? Imagine! $4,560 a year! It is utterly ridiculous. How can we expect people who have made serious studies, who have followed a classical course for eight years, or a university course of three, four or five years, to accept to work for such low salaries.

Well, I cannot understand it. One of these days, the government will have to decide to revise the salaries which continue to dwindle, because of the cost of living continuing to rise. As I said earlier, those salaries are ridiculously low for professionals who have made serious studies. Well, as long as those salaries are not increased, it will be difficult for the commission to find civil servants.

In that field, as I was saying, the civil service commission has no jurisdiction, because the money is voted by the government or rather by parliament at the government's request. Now, the Civil Service Commission is asking for it. The government has received the civil service commission's report dealing with salary increases. Now we ask the minister what he proposes to do, and his reply is that "we are not ready". After two years of consideration the minister tells us: "We are not ready to act, and we must still discuss the matter."

Mr. Chairman, as long as discussions go on and no action is taken, I am sure the civil service commission despite all its efforts, and despite the high calibre of its commissioners and of the new chairman, will be unable to recruit the required staff.

While providing an appropriate salary for professional people, one must not be unmindful especially of the small civil servant, the one who earns hardly $2,000 or $3,000 a year, who, like the others, has a family to feed and children to educate. In my opinion, the civil servant is in a worse predicament, because the government is taking no action in the matter.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the Secretary of State to be kind enough to use his authority, if he has any and I hope he has—they are not all members for Three Rivers in the cabinet—I hope, as I said, that he will use his authority to urge the other cabinet ministers to take action in favour of the lower paid employees who are in need.

I know people who have a hard time making both ends meet and who are obliged to reduce their standard of living substantially in the way of clothing and food. These civil servants are obliged to come to Ottawa to work. They are not satisfied with the clothes they wear, but they cannot afford to buy any other because their wages are insufficient, due to the increase in the cost of clothing and food.

We have read in the French newspapers as well as in the English ones, the dissatisfaction expressed by the federal civil servants. In fact, here is what Le Droit of July 16, had to say about it:

Civil servants dissatisfied with all those delays.

The National Joint Council of Canada has expressed to the Hon. Donald Fleming its dissatisfaction regarding the delays of the government to accept the civil service commission's recommendations about the salaries of the civil servants.

The council, 120,000 member strong, would like to know the reasons for these delays and has asked Mr. Fleming for a meeting. The letter answered that he could not set a time for a meeting because, due to the late stage of the session, he was overworked.

It follows then that the civil servants are running the risk of seeing the matter postponed until the next session.

Mr. Fleming said in the house that the government and the civil service commission had to study this matter further before the recommendations of the commission could be taken as final.

Mr. Chairman, we understand the dissatisfaction of the civil servants. But what we, on this side, do not understand is that after a two year study of this report of the civil service commission, which had also produced interim reports, it is, I repeat, that after studying a complete report for two years, this government cannot see its way clear to examining it in order to give justice to those who need it.

I know very well that the Secretary of State is going to say that his job is only to submit the estimates of the civil service commission to parliament and that he has nothing to do with an independent Commission. I am not asking him to interfere in the administration of the civil service commission or to tell the commissioners: "You will do this or that". I am just asking him to use his authority—and I hope he has some—to urge the Minister of Finance, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and all his colleagues of the government so that they may decide at last to do something in order that we should have something positive in that field.

Mr. Chairman, I find also that mention was made of an independent outside commission which would be required to inquire into the civil service commission. I am definitely against such a suggestion. I know that we have here the agencies capable of doing that job and I submit that we do not have to go out to find so-called efficiency experts who have failed pitifully wherever they went. They would probably prove a failure in the civil service commission as elsewhere. We have the experts we need. The civil service commission has conducted a serious study of the whole situation. The only thing it needs to act and to carry out its plans is additional staff. With its present staff, the civil service commission is unable, in some departments, to carry out direct supervision of departmental promotion competitions. That is why I ask the Secretary of State to kindly give in to the civil service commission, so that the commission may better do its job for the government.

(Text):

Mr. McIlraith: The civil service of Canada, as I think all hon. members will agree, has enjoyed an extremely high reputation over the past number of years. A considerable part of the credit for that high reputation must, I think, properly go to the civil service commission for their competence and impartiality in selecting persons to fill the vacant positions. I can only express the wish that that credit can continue to go to the comission over the years that lie ahead of us. I perhaps do not need to elaborate on that subject unduly here tonight. However, it is of the utmost importance in the administration of the country's business that the commission or the hiring agent of government preserve its competent method of hiring and, above all, its impartiality in hiring.

Therefore, as the new chairman of the commission takes over his duties, I want to express the hope that this record of impartiality is continued in the future. There are some persons who are greatly concerned on this subject and there are bits and pieces of evidence that support their concern. However, I do not need to elaborate on that matter either, other than to warn the government that if the minister, in the legislation which he forecasts for the next session of parliament, in the changes in the civil service act and in the other legislation concerning the public service, does anything that would in any way weaken the position that has been built up over the years of administering promotions and the selection of civil servants on an impartial basis, he will have done a great disservice to his own government and to the country at large. I want to leave that note of warning to him on record so that, as he considers the legislation proposed for introduction at the next session of parliament, he will have it in mind.

There is one particular matter that I want to raise, and I think I can deal with it briefly. It is this, and I would ask the minister to make a note of it. In connection with a position of caretaker, grade 5, at Brantford, Ontario, competition number 59-J-685, the competition was held in the ordinary way by the commission. The results of the competition were published in the Canada Gazette of July 11, 1959 at page 2460. The winner of the competition was notified in the ordinary way of his appointment to the position and he took over his duties in the position. Incidentally, I may say that the position carries with it certain housing accommodation. He purchased certain equipment for the housing quarters, moved in and so on. Then after occupying the position for a short time he was moved out of it and the man who came third in the competition was placed in the position.

Those are the facts as I have them. I want to add only one other detail. The man who came first in the position—and I hope the hon. member for Wetaskiwin will bear this in mind because I want to support part of his remarks on this point—is a man entitled to the veterans overseas preference. The man who came third did not have any overseas preference. In the filling of that position something happened that is not in accordance with the civil service procedure as laid down by the civil service commission. There appears to be some irregularity that should be looked into immediately and corrected. In addition to that irregularity of the man who came first in the competition not getting the position or being moved out of it after he had moved from his former position at considerable expense to himself, he incurred a financial loss, because of the nature of the position, in having to buy certain equipment. I do not expect the Secretary of State to have the details of these positions here in order to discuss them on these estimates but I would ask him to undertake to have that matter examined thoroughly, to see that justice is done and to see that the regulations of the commission are adhered to and that correct procedure is followed in all respects in that matter.

Mr. Howard: I rise on this item to say again, as I said last session, that I think the term civil servant is a rather degrading one to apply to people who are employed by the government of Canada. I, personally, would like to see some other title applied to them, rather than the one which is used now. However, I understand that the minister does not agree with that approach or, at least, he did not last session. He thought that the term "civil servant" degrading as it is was good enough for the people who are working in the public employ.

I listened with interest to the impassioned remarks of the hon. member for Hull with respect to salary adjustments and the salary scale of people in the employ of the government of Canada. I think this government and the government which preceded it have been tackling this question from the wrong end. I think a much more sensible arrangement would be to treat the employees of the government in a manner different from that in which they are treated at present. In other words, they should not be treated as people in a class not quite the same as other employees in the country. They should not, in fact, be treated as second class citizens when it comes to wages, hours and working conditions. Instead, they should be placed on precisely the same basis as other workers and treated in the same way as we expect other employers in Canada to treat their staffs, though, of course, I do not suggest that exactly the same machinery need be used for reaching conclusions on wages, conditions, and hours of work. I do suggest, however, that these employees should be treated in the same way as employees of the C.N.R., Trans-Canada Air Lines, or any other of the crown corporations which report to parliament through various ministers.

I believe that if a group of employees decides to get together and form a bargaining unit, as has been done in a number of cases or, probably in all cases, I think that organization should have the right to ask its employer—the federal government—to sit down and bargain with it in good faith. This cap in hand attitude, this pleading with the government for favourable consideration of improvements in wages, hours and working conditions should become a thing of the past. Now it is only too easy for the Minister of Finance or some other minister to put them off for reasons which, in my opinion, are not adequate. I believe that the federal government should be prepared to sit down and bargain over working conditions and so on just as other employers are bound to do. As it is, government employees have to wait expectantly hoping for the benevolence of the government to reach such proportions that an increase is granted. I do not think that should be our attitude in so far as the wage and salary structure of civil servants is concerned.

We would be far better off if they had bargaining rights and established arrangements under which they, like other employees in Canada who are represented by a union or an agency could sit down and discuss the question of wage increases, wage adjustments, hours of work and all the other things over which unions bargain. I do not think that these employees in the public service want the right to strike as do other employees working for other employers. I do not think they would be agreeable to go that far. But we should, I think, provide some machinery which would make it possible to reach a conclusive agreement in so far as their wages, hours and working conditions are concerned.

If such an agreement cannot be reached directly with the federal government, they should have the right to proceed to an outside tribunal or to an arbitration board to settle these problems in precisely the same way as do the firefighters who work for municipalities. These firefighters do not have the right to strike. In fact many years ago they wrote into their constitution that they should not, because they felt that their work was of such importance to the community that they did not believe they should even think in terms of withholding their services. But this example shows that there is a group of employees, working for municipalities in many cases, which has the right to proceed to arbitration, if necessary, to settle any differences as to wages and conditions which may arise with their employers and this, I suggest, is the attitude which the federal government should take as far as its employees are concerned.

May I say this to the committee. Let the government cease participating any further in this patronizing attitude towards its employees in the public service. Let it place them on the same level as the employees of other organizations, whether crown companies or public companies, and let them be given the right which is justly theirs to make a collective determination as far as negotiations are concerned instead of treating them as being second class citizens, because they are not.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like for one moment to re-echo the views expressed here by the hon. member for Ottawa West. I think it is vital that the minister should realize the significance of impartiality in the civil service commission. No one I am sure is more conversant with the situation than the minister himself and I am sure that no one would want a situation of impartiality to obtain more so than does the Prime Minister himself.

Over the years that I have been in the house there have been many chairmen of the civil service commission, beginning, first of all, when I arrived here in 1935, with Mr. C. H. Bland, who for many years occupied that position, and occupied it with distinction. He was a man who was not only devoted to the position which he held, but one who succeeded in instituting in the civil service commission many improvements and innovations.

He was there for many years and I think that representatives of both sides of this house would vouch for the fact that he fulfilled his duties with efficiency and distinction. I think that applies, also, to the man who succeeded him, though for a short period of time —Mr. Nelson. It certainly could be said of the last man who occupied the post prior to the appointment of Mr. Justice Hughes, and I speak, of course, of Ambassador Heeney. The fact that he was appointed by the former government and retained by this government indicates, I believe, the confidence which both administrations had in the man who had held that high office. I have not the slightest doubt that the incumbent of the office at present will wish to follow in the footsteps of these three distinguished civil servants.

It seems to me that the attention of the minister and the committee should be directed again to the points which the hon. member for Ottawa West made. It is of extreme importance to the country, to the government and to the civil service commission that there should be in that great and important body impartiality so that there be selected for the service of the government the best candidates that are available.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Just one question, Mr. Chairman, to ask the minister whether the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson), who is now sitting by his side, has been appointed his parliamentary secretary?

Mr. Courtemanche: I am sure the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) does not expect an affirmative answer.

Item agreed to.

Public Printing and Stationery—

311. Department administration, $656,595.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, we shall now deal with the national printing bureau. If you will allow me, I should like, first of all, to read a few pages from the Senate and House of Commons Act, Revised Statues, 1952, chapter 249. Section 15 reads as follows:

> No person, directly or indirectly, alone or with any other, by himself or by the interposition of any trustee or third party, holding or enjoying, undertaking or executing any contract or agreement, expressed or implied, with or for the government of Canada on behalf of the crown, or with or for any of the officers of the government of Canada, for which any public money of Canada is to be paid, is eligible as a member of the House of Commons, or shall sit or vote in the said House.

And the last eight lines of section 16, read as follows:

> ...or performs any service for the government of Canada, or for any of the officers of the government of Canada, for which any public money of Canada is paid or to be paid, whether such contract, agreement or sale is expressed or implied, and whether the transaction is single or continuous, the seat of such member shall thereby be vacated, and his election shall thenceforth be null and void.

And section 19 reads as follows:

> (1) In every contract, agreement or commission to be made, entered into or accepted by any person with the government of Canada, or any of the departments or officers of the government of Canada, there shall be inserted an express condition, that no member of the House of Commons shall be admitted to any share or part of such contract, agreement or commissions, or to any benefit to arise therefrom.

(2) In case any person, who has entered into or accepted, or who shall enter into or accept any such contract, agreement or commission, admits any member or members of the House of Commons, to any part or share thereof, or to receive any benefit thereby, every such person shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of two thousand dollars, recoverable with costs in any court of competent jurisdiction by any person who sues for the same.

And section 20 says:

This Act does not extend to disqualify any person as a member of the House of Commons by reason of his being

(a) a shareholder in any incorporated company.

There is just a mention of a shareholder. I have quoted that section not to make any accusation, but to ask the minister to investigate a case which seems to me quite extraordinary. I find, in the answers given to questions I asked, that the Monitor Publishing Company of Montreal was awarded four contracts, one for $10,416, another for $255, a third one for $128 and the last one for $128, for a grand total of $10,922. And I was told,—which seems to be confirmed,—that a member of the board of directors of the Monitor Publishing Company of Montreal is the member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken). If that is clearly established, I am not judging anything nor making any direct accusation, but I want things to be cleared up.

This is what the law says:

This Act does not extend to disqualify any person as a member of the House of Commons by reason of his being

(a) a shareholder in any incorporated company.

Mention is not made anywhere of a director or a president or a member of the management of a company. It was then the intent of the legislator to exclude only the shareholder who generally has his say only once a year at the general meeting while the director, a lady director, a president of a vice president are continually looking after the business of the company and are directing its policy.

Thus the director, president or vice president of a company is so much closer to the administration and his position is a lot more advantageous than that of the shareholder. Therefore I urge the minister to consider making an inquiry in that with a view to finding if what happened in the case of the member for York-Humber places her definitely in the situation of a member who cannot sit in this house for having a contract with the government or for having been involved in it directly or indirectly when that Montreal publishing company got contracts for $10,922 during the year. If the act is not sufficiently clear to necessitate definitely the re-election of the member, then I say that the time has come for the government to undertake a revision of that Senate and House of Commons act in order to clarify the situation. This might be the first occurrence of such a case; it might be that the member for York-Humber does not know about that section, she might be acting in good faith, but it is very dangerous for a member to be a director in a company dealing with the government.

Therefore I urge the hon. minister to make an extensive inquiry because this is a serious case. I am not laying any charge, but the situation ought to be clarified as much in the interest of the member for York-Humber as of all the other members in this house. It is important that people know what are the duties, obligations and privileges of members, arising out of their election to the House of Commons.

Now I find here, on page 19, that a certain Mont-Laurier firm, namely Le Flambeau, has received an amount of $2,019.75 under a contract. This firm, I am informed, was started on February 24, 1959, and according to the court records, Le Flambeau is registered under the ownership of a Mr. Paquette. It is even claimed—I have no proof, but I am merely reporting what is commonly said on the street—

Mr. Pigeon: The House of Commons is no place for jokes.

Mr. Caron: The minister can deny it if he wishes. I say that this is being mentioned on the street, and it is better to bring it out in the open right now rather than to let the rumour run wild. There is talk about a Mr. Lesage, a former secretary of the former Minister of Health in the Quebec government, who is the Secretary of State's father-in-law, and gossips say the minister also has some interest in the business. Now I should like to know whether that is a fact. I am prepared to accept the minister's word, but I would hate to see people here get into habits that are apparently matter of course in a provincial government, where business deals are often made in favour of relatives.

For instance, there is a certain Mr. Pouliot, Minister of Fisheries, who gives aircraft—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Caron: There is another one who gives telephone lines to his brother.

Mr. Pigeon: The hon. member for Hull does not comply with the rules of this House.

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The hon. member for Hull has the floor.

Mr. Lambert: With all due respect, I think the hon. member for Hull should tend to matters of the Secretary of State and not deal with sort of rumours and scuttlebutt and smear in other jurisdictions.

Mr. Nesbitt: Political smearing.

Mr. Lambert: Unless he is prepared to stand up and prove it.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order that has been raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West, we had a similar matter discussed in the house before and the rules and regulations were laid down quite clearly. The hon. member is quite within his rights in proceeding to deal with this matter in the way in which he has. The minister can, if he wishes, rise and deny it and then it would be up to the hon. member to accept the minister's statement. It has been clearly established in this house, not only in other debates but in the precedents that were cited in the house during the discussion of another case, both by hon. members on this side of the house and by the Speaker himself, so that I think—

Mr. Nesbitt: Give us the citations.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; I can give the Schell case as one; another case was the Boothby case in the United Kingdom which I put on the record and three or four others which leave my mind at the moment; but the circumstances and the procedure were quite clearly laid down and I submit to you with deference that the hon. member is within the rules in proceeding as he has.

Mr. Lambert: On the point of order, I am not referring to the direct questions that the hon. member is asking of the minister; I am referring to the scuttlebutt and rumours he is making about other jurisdictions.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): On the point of order—

Mr. Caron: I am speaking on the point of order. The hon. member who just rose and raised a point of order is completely wrong. I did not make any accusations; I just stated the rumours which were going around. The minister can rise and say it is not true and I will accept his word that it is wrong.

Mr. Nesbitt: Legalized slander.

Mr. Lambert: What about the other things the hon. member said?

Mr. Caron: I asked the minister a fair question. He has the right to answer yes or no. It is up to the minister to do that and not for a backbencher over there to raise a point of order when he has no interest in the matter at all.

Mr. Bigg: You are also a backbencher; what are you talking about?

Mr. Caron: I know the hon. member; I have learned a lot about him this session, especially in committees. He ought to be out of this house.

(Translation):

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, I would like to kill those rumours and say immediately to the hon. member for Hull that since 1945, Mr. Gilbert Paquette owns a newspaper called Le Flambeau, I do not believe there is a Mr. Lesage or any other person associated with him, except that an old printer who worked in another printing plant in Mont-Laurier has gone into business with him.

Mr. Caron: I fully accept the explanation of the minister, and to prove that I accept them quite well, I leave the matter at that.

Mr. Chairman, there is another rather delicate matter, with which I want to deal and for which I do not blame the minister directly. I know that the minister cannot supervise by himself 25,000, 30,000 or 35,000 contracts which are granted annually.

I know that the minister does not have, in the Printing Bureau division, the necessary staff which could help him as it should be. I know that the minister should have had for a long time a Queen's Printer who is, after all, his deputy minister. It is unfortunate for the minister that this appointment has not been made, since the situation I am referring to might not have occurred.

I asked a question regarding the binders, and I notice among the answers I was given and bearing the minister's signature, that in some cases there were three bidders. Wilson Jones Limited, E. G. Thomas & Son, Copeland-Chatterson Ltd. Wilson Jones' bid was for $5,516, E. G. Thomas & Son's was for $5,900, and that of Copeland-Chatterson Ltd. was for $8,910. And in that particular case, it was the highest bidder, Copeland-Chatterson Ltd., with $8,910 who got the contract.

In the second case, there were five bidders: Wilson Jones Limited, Toronto, $5,590; E. G. Thomas & Son Ltd., $6,260; Brown Bros. Ltd., Toronto, $6,370, Copeland-Chatterson Ltd., from Brampton, $8,910, and Chas. Chapman Co. Ltd., from London, $8,090. The contract was again awarded to the highest bidder who was Copeland-Chatterson Ltd., from Brampton, for $8,910.

In the third case, which is different from the others, there were only two bidders: Wilson Jones Limited, $13,680, and Copeland-Chatterson Ltd., $17,820. In that case, the contract was awarded to the lowest bidder, which was Wilson Jones, for an amount of $13,680.

As far as the fourth case is concerned, there were two bidders; Wilson Jones Limited, $7,040, and Copeland-Chatterson Ltd., $7,-840. In this case the contract was awarded to the hihest bidder, that is to Copeland-Chatterson Ltd., for an amount of $7,840.

And we have the fifth case where there is only one bidder, and where only one bid was made, that of Copeland-Chatterson Ltd., for an amount of $21,330.

I admit that following this information, there is an explanatory letter which says among other things—and if I am wrong in my explanation I wish to be corrected—that Copeland and Chatterson Ltd. is mode competent than other firms for the type of binders requested by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. However, I read this on page 3:

(Text):

A requisition dated May 1, 1959 for 2,000 binders was received. Copeland-Chatterson was asked to quote for 2,000 English and 1,000 French. Prices of Copeland-Chatterson, $21,330 ($7.11 each).

On June 3, a submission was made to treasury board which requested that authority be given to enter into contract with Copeland-Chatterson. The remarks on the submission were as follows:

"Tenders were not invited from other firms in this case as our experience indicates that no other firm has been able to demonstrate that they can meet the exact specifications."

(Translation):

As you see, Mr. Chairman, the explanation is given that Copeland-Chatterson Ltd. were the only firm qualified to do this work. However, in one of these tenders, the contract was awarded to the lowest bidder, namely Wilson Jones Limited. Therefore there is certainly something which is definitely not justifiable, and I am wondering how they went about to determine the qualifications of the others, or their lack of qualifications, of whether they just relied on Copeland-Chatterson Ltd. to establish what they wanted.

I believe that the other firms should have been given the same opportunity of carrying out this project. I understand that the request had been made by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, and that tenders had been called by the printing and stationery division. Well, I submit that if we had given the other firms the same opportunity of going ahead and building binders, it would certainly have been possible to find the means to enable them to make something comparable to the work performed by Copeland-Chatterson Ltd.

I wonder if that question should not be submitted to the public accounts committee next year, so that we might hear the representatives of those other firms, that is Wilson Jones Limited, E. G. Thomas & Son Ltd., Brown Bros. Ltd. and Chas. Chapman Co. Ltd. They might explain their side of the story and we could ask them to produce the samples submitted by those companies, in order to see whether the difference was such to justify, when submissions were asked for in every case except one, awarding the contract to the highest tenderer.

I ask the Secretary of State to see to it that this situation be examined by the public accounts committee next year, so that we may get this thing cleared off and see if it was really impossible to do otherwise.

Mr. Chairman, I said it was easy to find objections, particularly where senior officials of a department are concerned. However, as I said a moment ago, I would not like to lay the blame directly on the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, (Mr. Comtois). However, we might perhaps lay the blame, to some extent, on some officials who are responsible for the distribution. As I say, it is easy to raise objections when it is a case of proving that a firm is better than another, especially when it is perhaps inferior to the first one, and that simply because it does not please a particular official of some department.

That is why, Mr. Chairman, I would ask that the matter be referred to the public accounts committee, next year, in order that the minister, as well as we, may be quite clear on that. He would also be in a better position than he is tonight to give us an answer, because he has with him just an explanatory letter, which was not written by himself, but which he received from his under-secretary or some other official, without having had time to examine it carefully.

If the committee were asked to look into that matter, it would enable us to get information from the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys in order to ascertain for whom that work has been done. I appreciate that he is not in a position to give us an answer, because it is the officials of the printing bureau who, in letting the contract, have asked in this way.

I want to know if it would be possible to establish that the contract could have been given to the lowest bidder. In doing so, the government would have paid less, and at the same time the system of this division of the printing bureau would have been kept impeccable, as it has been done rather frequently in the past.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: I have one question to put to the minister. He will remember that last year he gave the assurance that his officials were going to try their best to spread these printing contracts beyond the Ontario-Quebec triangle. I should like him to give us an indication how this spread has been effected in the last financial year by giving some figures that will show how many more contracts have gone to the western provinces and the eastern provinces than in the year before in terms of their value. How successful has the minister been in spreading these contracts across the country? There is no real reason why they should go as a matter of right to printing firms in the Ottawa, Toronto or Montreal areas.

Mr. Courtemanche: I am able to give some figures to the hon. member that will indicate that we are increasing the amount of contracts outside of Ontario and Quebec. In Alberta the amount spent this year from April 1 to June 30 was $8,330 compared with $7,746 for the whole of 1958. In British Columbia the amount from April 1 to June 30 this year is $5,156 compared with $3,075 in 1958. In Manitoba the figures are $14,849 and $10,463 in 1958. In other provinces the increases are similar.

Mr. Fisher: I am very pleased that there have been these increases, but while the percentage increase may be great I think the minister will admit that the amounts are still minor in total compared with the rather huge sums that are dispensed in this particular region. I know there are advantages in this particular region but printers beyond the triangle tell me that they would like the opportunity to get in on some of this business. I should like the minister to carry on this policy and push it further. I would not like him to get lost in the printing backwoods in this area.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister not going to answer some of the statements made by the hon. member for Hull particularly in connection with the contracts involving these higher tenders? Does the minister not think he should tell the committee how it was that in four of these five contracts which were awarded it appears that the contract went to the highest tenderer in each case?

(Translation):

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to give certain information contained in one of the letters which have been tabled early in July. It is to be noticed that as detailed specifications were requested, Wilson Jones Limited and Copeland-Chatterson Ltd., to compare only the two companies involved, were bidding different prices. It will be noted also that the price was adjusted as certain specifications were required. In fact, item 4 of the said letter reads as follows:

(Text):

Under date of March 9, 1959, a requisition for 1,000 binders French was received. Tenders were invited as hereunder.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, this information is taken from a letter sent to me on July 2, 1959, which was part of an order for return. Looking at the bottom of the page, we find that the difference in prices quoted by the two companies was small. In fact, Wilson Jones Limited tried to conform as closely as possible to the specifications of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, and we find that the difference was slight, because its initial price, which was $5.56 per binder, was raised to $7.04, whereas Copeland-Chatterson submitted a price of $7.84.

However, Mr. Chairman, I should hope that the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron), who spoke at great length after the letter was tabled in the house, would have read this paragraph in the letter that was produced in early July and which reads as follows.

(Text):

The order was placed with Wilson Jones Company Limited on the basis that a made-up sample would be accepted by the department prior to production. While the order still stands, the company has not yet been able to satisfy the department that the exact specifications have been met.

(Translation):

Another paragraph reads.

(Text):

As the department of public printing and stationery has 2,500 paidup back orders on hand, some received as far back as January, from schools, companies, libraries, etc., and in view of the urgent requirement in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, it is recommended that authority be given to place an order with Copeland-Chatterson Limited.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, this does not alter what I have said to any extent. I said it was easy for the head of a department, as he is placed so as to be informed, to find all sorts of faults and to explain them as he thinks fit in a letter. That is why I said that it is not so much the minister who is responsible.

If the department was not satisfied with the work of Wilson Jones Limited, it would ask the firm to produce something else to the department's satisfaction. And the minister knows that it is always easy to find a reason for dissatisfaction. That is why I am asking for an investigation so that not only the person who signed the letter but also those who sent in a tender are given an opportunity to state their case, in order to know the difference between the various samples produced for the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. So that does not alter what I said. That is what I said. It may be that officials from the department have a feeling of hatred with regard to some firms and find all sorts of faults. An investigation by the public accounts committee would either justify the government or condemn those responsible.

Mr. Chevrier: If the minister prefers, I will speak in French. The minister read two paragraphs from the letter of July 2, 1959. But in reading those two paragraphs I feel the minister has not given sufficient explanation to the house to justify the awarding of a contract such as this one, of four contracts I should say, to the highest bidder. The minister has no doubt other reasons than those mentioned in the letter. He is aware of the situation. He did not himself explain to the house how it is that these four contracts went to the highest bidder.

Mr. Courtemanche: I would point out to the hon. member for Laurier that the discussions about those binders began in 1956, under another administration. And it is the continuation of those discussions which resulted in what we now see under item 4. As specifications were given—and there again I rely on what I have myself—it is to be noted that Wilson Jones Limited, was quoting a price comparable to that of the firm to which the contract was awarded.

[Mr. Courtemanche.]

Mr. Chevrier: I am not satisfied with the minister's reply. He said the negotiations for the binders started under a former gorvernment. The minister has been asked to indicate when the contracts were let, and the reply given in the minister's return to the house shows that the contracts were let in December 1958, and therefore not under another administration. Also, the other replies indicate that six contracts were let, four of which went to the highest tenderer. I think the minister owes the committee some explanations as to the circumstances.

Mr. Courtemanche: I can only transmit the information given to me. I have the letter here, and it clearly shows that tenders were called, and certain specifications were given as to the type of binder required. Unfortunately, no bids were made by other companies than Wilson Jones Limited.

Mr. Caron: The minister has just indicated that in October 1956, authority had been granted to look into the matter with Copeland-Chatterson Ltd. That is a fact.

(Text):

In October 1956, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys was authorized by this department to work with Copeland-Chatterson Limited in the development of a binder for the Atlas of Canada.

(Translation):

And even if I were to read it all, I could not establish anything else. We are forced to work out the model with Copeland-Chatterson Ltd., they say, on account of the ability of that firm. That does not exclude the right to ask other firms to submit a plan. The proof of that is that when a plan had been established, tenders were called from several firms; in fact, five firms sent in a tender: Wilson Jones Limited; E. G. Thomas; Brown Bros. Limited; Charles Chapman Company; Copeland-Chatterson Ltd. That shows clearly that the department had no intention to do business with one firm but to call for tenders and to grant the contracts, as far as possible, to the lowest tenderer. The explanation that has been given does not justify the awarding of the contract to the highest tenderer. The only way that we could justify the granting of a contract to the highest tenderer would be to call before the public accounts committee the departmental officials involved.

We should call the firms which were invited to tender on the various contracts and have the models produced before the committee so that we could see for ourselves whether any particular model was so different that it could not have served the purpose.

Therefore I suggest that the only way to satisfy the hon. members and the Canadian public is to call before the committee the highest bidder who was awarded the contract and to submit to the public accounts committee the reasons for that choice. If the authorities were justified it would be easy for them to prove it and if they were not justified I know that the minister and the government would want to tell them exactly how they should proceed in future.

Mr. Courtemanche: I admit we would get more detailed information from an investigation by the Public Accounts committee. On the other hand I remind the committee that in 1956 Copeland-Chatterson Ltd. were asked to make a model. You then considered that firm to be better qualified than any other to make a model. After that, tenders were invited from other firms, and other firms were asked to make a binder of the most satisfactory model, that is the one proposed in 1956 by the Chatterson firm. That is what I gather from this letter. As tenders were received, it was noted that prices kept getting closer to those of the Copeland-Chatterson firm.

Mr. Caron: Does the minister admit that it would be more satisfactory to review all this matter? We do not want to blame any one, but there is something wrong somewhere. In fact, the investigating committee found that the highest tender was not the best one. But until then, I am not satisfied, and most of the members, even those who sit on the government side are not either. However, if this whole matter were reviewed, I think everybody would be satisfied.

Mr. Chevrier: May I make a suggestion to the minister to help him in the solution of this matter?

Does the minister not think that because of the suggestions made by the member for Hull (Mr. Caron), it would be better for him to make a statement, to-morrow perhaps, on the way the contracts were awarded and on the reasons why they were awarded to the highest tenderer?

Of course, if the hon. member insists on the holding of an inquiry about that, the decision remains with him. I do not want to dictate to him, but I think that to reach a practical conclusion, since it is late now, it would be better if the hon. minister were to make a statement tomorrow about that.

Now, I would like to ask another question of the minister, and this in all sincerity. Does he frankly think that he has given an adequate answer to the hon. member a while ago about Le Flambeau printing establishment?

Mr. Courtemanche: Oh yes.

Mr. Chevrier: Then I ask him this question: Is it a fact that the owner of that printing establishment is the brother-in-law of the minister?

Mr. Courtemanche: I did not deny that Mr. Gilbert Paquette owned that establishment.

Mr. Chevrier: No; the question I asked was this. Is the owner of Le Flambeau printing shop, the brother-in-law of the minister?

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister believe that it is appropriate for a contract from the printing bureau...

Mr. Tremblay: Let us hear about the construction of the printing bureau.

Mr. Chevrier: —and this for an amount, I do not know how much, because it would be necessary to add it up—in any case, does the minister think that it is in order for a contract of that importance to be awarded by the hon. minister to such a close relative as the owner of the Flambeau?

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, I would not like to see the good name of a Mont Laurier printer tarnished because he is my brother-in-law.

Mr. Chevrier: One moment. On a question of privilege. I did not try to tarnish the good name of the minister's brother-in-law. I simply asked a question as tactfully as possible. I am allowed to do so, I am allowed to ask the minister to answer me in the same fashion.

Mr. Courtemanche: I answer the hon. member for Laurier as tactfully, as respectably and as kindly as he did, and I must tell him that as a printer, whether from Mont Laurier or from anywhere, anybody is allowed, provided he meets the prices established by the printing bureau or the conditions laid down, to put in a bid; he is also allowed to enter into contracts, and I fail to see why

Mr. Paquette, the owner of the printing concern Le Flambeau, who is my brother-in-law, would not have the right to get contracts to the amount of $2,000.

In addition, I must say that I did not put any pressure; I must tell him that I never told anybody at the printing bureau that Mr. Paquette was my brother-in-law.

I was not aware of the contracts he could get. Last year, 35,000 contracts were awarded. Four people are authorized to sign contracts at the printing bureau and those contracts never come into the hands of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no doubt that what the minister just said is true, that the contract has been awarded under normal circumstances, but what I asked him was simply this to which he did not answer: does he feel it is right, under such circumstances, that a contract be awarded to such a close relative of the minister?

Mr. Courtemanche: I just answered, perhaps not directly, but I just said to the hon. member for Laurier that I was not even aware that this contract had been granted to Le Flambeau in Mont Laurier.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, if the minister had known, would he have opposed it?

Mr. Courtemanche: I would have asked that a close eye be kept on the situation.

(Text):

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Secretary of State. We then come to legislation, vote No. 174—

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay anything but, if I may, I should like to suggest that this might be an appropriate time to cease and to start again tomorrow.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Let us finish legislation.

Mr. Howard: I understood the general understanding to be that we would proceed this far. As a consequence of that understanding I took upstairs a number of the notes that I had for the purpose of dealing with the items under legislation. I did that as a consequence of the general appreciation we had that we would proceed to the end of the estimates of the Secretary of State.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Ten o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

[Mr. Courtemanche.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Will the acting house leader indicate what the government proposes to do tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: I think we have had a very good day and a fine spirit of co-operation throughout. We have covered a considerable amount of business with the same care that the house has shown throughout the session. This is the business left for completion. On estimates we have left national revenue and C.B.C.; legislation; health and welfare; finance; a scattered few supplementary estimates for agriculture, citizenship and immigration and labour which were not passed at the time those estimates were before the committee; and also the item which was allowed to stand in the privy council estimates this evening, namely item 303.

Then I will list the legislative matters in the order in which they will be taken up when we reach them. No. 1 would be No. 7 on today's order paper, the bill with respect to a bridge across the Niagara river; No. 2, the bill with respect to the bridge across the Pigeon river; No. 3, the amendments to the bill with respect to a national energy board; No. 4, second reading of bill No. S-32, to repeal certain fishery laws.

Mr. Chevrier: That is not No. 4.

Mr. Churchill: It is No. 4 in the order in which I am giving them. It is No. 9 on today's order paper.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry for the interruption.

Mr. Churchill: Next would be No. 1 on the order paper, consideration of amendments to the Income Tax Act. The next will be the amendment to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act; that is item No. 2 on the order paper. No. 3 on my list would be No. 4 on the order paper with reference to the Criminal Code, and then would come No. 6 on today's order paper which is Bill No. C-70 to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code. That is the business before the house for completion.

Mr. Chevrier: Before the minister goes any further, what will be the order in which this legislation would be taken? Will it be the order which the minister has given, or will the legislation come first?

Mr. Churchill: Of the estimates?

Mr. Chevrier: No. I was asking—

Mr. Churchill: We shall continue with the estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: In the order given?

Mr. Churchill: In the order given and then when we reach the legislation that is the order I suggest. It is for the house to determine how we shall proceed. I make this suggestion for consideration, that we assemble tomorrow at 9.30.

An hon. Member: Oh.

Mr. Churchill: Let me make the suggestion, and we can discuss it for a minute or two. I suggest we assemble at 9.30, sit through the meal hour at noon and do the same at the supper hour. I suggest that during the course of the day we might confer, as we did today, to see what progress can be made and how long the sitting might be for Saturday. If that is agreeable to the house, that is what I would suggest as the procedure.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I think that in so far as the general aspect of that program is concerned it would appeal to us on this side of the house, but there is one matter with which we are particularly concerned, as the minister knows, and it is the last item but one which he has mentioned, Bill No. C-70, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code. I wonder if the minister could give some indication as to whether or not it is the intention to proceed with this bill as it is.

Mr. Churchill: I should be in a position to let hon. members know when we assemble tomorrow morning.

Mr. Chevrier: That is satisfactory.

Mr. Howard: I think it would be better if we were to meet at the regular hour of 11 o'clock, and proceed from there to the determination of the hours of sitting for the rest of the day—whether or not we should sit through the lunch hour and through the supper hour—rather than sit at 9.30 which I think is a bit early in view of the indeterminate state of things in so far as one particular piece of legislation is concerned.

Mr. Churchill: If 9.30 is a shade early in view of the lateness of the hour at present, what about 10 o'clock? I suggest we should leave it open to some extent during the course of the day and confer to see what progress the house is making and make, as we did today, sensible arrangements for the completion of the business in an orderly fashion. But I think an early start would be helpful.

Mr. Chevrier: We on this side of the house would be prepared to sit at 10.00 o'clock or 9.30 o'clock.

Mr. Howard: Eleven o'clock is the established hour, and we could proceed from that point.

Mr. Churchill: Beginning at 9.30 and going right through you would have a clear run of 12 hours to 9.30 in the evening. This is not unusual for the House of Commons. If we continued to 1.30 a.m. we would have a clear run of 14 hours, which is the equivalent of three normal days. There is nothing unusual about this. It has happened since I have been here, and reading the records of the past I know that our forefathers were able to endure all night sessions. I suggest that if we made an early start we would be able to be clear and definite as to the termination of the session during the course of the afternoon after we had conferred.

Mr. Chevrier: May I make this suggestion. I think, perhaps, there is something in what the hon. member for Skeena says. We have been very co-operative and have sat for quite a long time. May I make this compromise suggestion—that in order to meet the hon. member half way, or almost half way, with regard to his suggestion, we should sit at 10 o'clock. Then, I think, we shall be meeting both the suggestion made by the acting leader of the house and by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard: That is precisely the suggestion which the Minister of Trade and Commerce made. That was the second suggestion and one with which I feel we should not agree.

At 12.28 a.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, July 18, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BILL OF RIGHTS—SUBMISSION TO JOINT COMMITTEE NEXT SESSION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house I would like to say a few words in respect of one portion of the legislative program, and in particular to answer the question asked a few days ago by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard).

This has been a long and, I think, very productive session. There have been more committees sitting than was the case at any time during the years I have been here. I think it would be generally admitted by members in all parts of the house that the work done by those committees has been comprehensive and helpful. The membership of the various committees have been most diligent in the discharge of their responsibilities.

I am not one of those who through the years have advocated the extension of the committee system, but I do feel, while maintaining to the strictest degree our parliamentary system and in no way adopting the system in effect in the United States of America, which meets the needs of that country, this session has shown the benefits that flow from the mobilization of the help of private members everywhere in the house.

I say that as a preface to my remarks in respect of the bill of rights. I am in no way changed in my view as to the necessity of a bill of rights being passed by parliament, and the experience in government in no way has lessened my feelings as to the necessity of such a bill.

As hon. members know, a draft bill was introduced in the concluding days of the last session with a view to assuring that the fullest possible representations might be made by interested bodies, groups and individuals. In that respect there have been many such representations made by private individuals as well as by institutions such as civil rights organizations in various parts of the country and the Canadian Bar Association.

I believe it is generally accepted by hon. members that when the bill of rights finally passes it shall be as comprehensive and all-inclusive as the constitution will permit. Representations and suggestions are being received even now; and while I expressed the view some months ago that there was no necessity, as I saw it then, for a committee of both houses to consider the matter fully in so far as the terms of the suggested bill are concerned, in the light of representations made since I have altered my viewpoint, as I hope I always will when reason demands a change.

I have come to the conclusion that it would be well to have the draft bill of rights submitted to a joint committee of both houses, that committee to consider no other question than the terminology of the bill. As I see it, the question as to the need of a bill of rights would not be a subject for consideration by the committee. Such a committee would provide the fullest possible opportunity for further discussion and consideration, to the end that when the bill is enacted this historic step in the maintenance and preservation of freedom under law will be the most significant that parliament can attain through joint counsel and consideration.

In saying that I want to make clear that from the suggestion I have to offer to postpone the introduction of the bill of rights until the beginning of the next session, no one is to take that postponement as any indication of less allegiance on the part of the government and myself to the paramount need of this legislation being passed. Therefore under the circumstances I am going to suggest that the bill of rights already drafted be brought up at the next session at the earliest possible date, and that a joint committee for the purposes I have mentioned be then set up. Even though my views changed during the progress of the present session as to the benefits that might flow from the setting up of such a committee, I realized that with the number of committees that were sitting it would be next to impossible at this session to set up still another committee.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, while we on this side are as anxious as ever to do everything that is possible to maintain and strengthen human rights and fundamental freedoms to the maximum possible extent, we feel that the procedure outlined by the Prime Minister is a practical one, all the more so because we have thought from the beginning that this matter should be submitted to a joint committee of parliament for full and comprehensive consideration.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this group was very interested to hear the Prime Minister's announcement with respect to the postponement of the introduction of this bill of rights until next session. I must say we were pleased to learn he has responded favourably to the representations made from many quarters for this bill to be referred to a committee of both houses. We are very anxious that this important document be the product of consultation and cooperation among all interested persons in this country.

In conclusion, I hope the Prime Minister has this legislation introduced early in the next session.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank hon. gentlemen for what they have said. So there will be no misunderstanding as to the words I used about the procedure, a draft bill will be submitted, and the plan I have in mind is for the introduction of the bill in this house and after discussion and second reading it will be submitted to a committee, to the end that the objectives that have been mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay West may be attained.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

CONCURRENCE IN TWENTY-THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax) presented the twenty-third report of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, there is just one point I want to raise very briefly about the report, and it is this. I am not clear about the right of the committee to make a report of this nature when it is a standing committee dealing with particular bills referred to it, and only that. This is the only observation I wish to make on the subject. I feel this should be drawn to the attention of the house, because if standing committees are to make reports that go beyond the reference to them we could get into a great deal of difficulty. I am not clear as to whether or not this report goes beyond the reference to the committee, but I question it very much. It may be that the report is within the reference to the committee, but I wanted to raise that question.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the remarks made by the hon. member for Ottawa West, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES

NEW BRUNSWICK—ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONTRIBUTION TO STORM DISASTER FUND

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an announcement with reference to the New Brunswick fishermen's disaster fund. Hon. members will recall that a few weeks ago a terrific storm struck the coast of New Brunswick along the Northumberland strait taking the lives of 35 fishermen and destroying boats and equipment worth in the vicinity of $750,000. Most of those who lost their lives were heads of families, and as a result some 20 widows, 4 mothers and 83 children are left unprovided for and practically destitute.

A fund has been started in the province known as the New Brunswick fishermen's disaster fund, to which I have the honour to report that the federal government is contributing $50,000. I know, Mr. Speaker, that I speak for all those concerned when I say we are very grateful for this generous contribution.

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): I am sure the house and the country will welcome the announcement just made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs. We appreciate the generosity of the government in making a grant of $50,000 to the New Brunswick disaster relief fund. On behalf of the people of Northumberland-Miramichi and, I might say, all the people of New Brunswick, I wish to express their appreciation for the generous gift.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ADVISORY COMMITTEE—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is a fact, as stated by the Canadian Labour Congress, that at a meeting on July 3 between the Prime Minister and representatives of the congress there was an agreement that when consultation with the Canadian Labour Congress is required in appointments of labour representatives to government organizations, this means that if the labour nominee is not acceptable to the government, the Canadian Labour Congress will be so informed and will be asked to submit other nominees?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I mentioned yesterday that there had been discussions with respect to the whole question of appointments with regard to which consultation is to take place. Following discussions in my office the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) met with the president of the organization and, I think, one or two other officials. Unfortunately he is not here today to give the information asked for by the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I have a supplementary question in view of the importance of this matter. Has the Prime Minister taken into consideration the implications of section 86 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, which requires consultation with labour in respect of appointments made to the unemployment insurance advisory commission?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The government has always taken into consideration that section and the tenor of that section. Indeed, so far has this government gone in pursuance of its promises that as to any commission or board set up, entirely apart from any statutory provision it is required on our part that representation of labour be on all commissions and the like in respect of which labour has an interest. The same principle of consultation applies as to appointments made for industry or representatives of industry. The same course has been followed in that regard. Names have been asked for pursuant to the principle of consultation, and following that the decision as to who should be chosen must necessarily, following consultation, be the determination of the governor in council.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Violation of the act.

GRAIN

SASKATCHEWAN—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF C.P.R. TO ALLOCATE BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the apparently impossible has become the inevitable. I am about to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question on box cars. My question arises out of telegrams and letters received this morning from Saskatchewan pool elevator committees protesting the action of the C.P.R. in refusing to supply box cars to Saskatchewan wheat pool elevators for shipment of wheat to the lakehead. This refusal, they state, is a discrimination against the farmer-owned elevator system, which is not getting its share of box cars, and is contrary to the recommendations of both the Bracken commission and the agriculture committee of this house regarding the right of the producer to deliver grain to the elevator of his choice and, I presume, in some cases of her choice.

Will the minister assure the house that he will take immediate action to investigate this situation and have the embargo order rescinded, so that all companies may handle the business earned by them?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I can assure him that the situation will be investigated immediately. I also repeat my assurance of some time ago, that before the house rises I will make an announcement concerning the box car situation and regulations governing the same for the crop year commencing August 1.

SHIPPING

REPORTED PROTEST CONCERNING U.S. PILOTAGE JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. What information and what views has the minister on the protest made to the U.S. state department by United States pilots over the alleged raiding of United States pilotage jurisdiction by the Canadian government in placing a Canadian pilot aboard the steamer Harry Coulby at Cape Vincent, New York, on July 1, 1959?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question, which I received just before coming into the house. I have not seen this report and am not aware of the situation, but I will look into it.

Mr. Fisher: May I ask a supplementary question. Is the minister aware that the great lakes district, international organization of masters, mates and pilots, which is the United States organization, has forwarded a demand to the United States state department that the state department take action to bar Canadian pilots from St. Regis to Wilson island, the Soo locks and lake Michigan in its entirety, as both these are strictly United States waters, no part being Canadian?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING U.S. STOCKPILING OF ATOMIC WEAPONS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he cares to comment on a statement, which appeared in the press this morning, by the assistant to United States defence secretary McElroy before the joint congressional committee on atomic energy yesterday in Washington, that the United States has made it clear that it is ready to stockpile atomic weapons in Canada, but that full control and custody of those weapons must rest with the United States?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to comment on that statement. This is one of those matters which require more than an offhand answer. I have had no notice of it, and therefore cannot go into detail.

LONGUE POINTE, MONTREAL—LAY-OFFS AT ORDNANCE DEPOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, but in his absence I hope the Minister of Defence Production will be able to give a reply. Is the minister aware that hundreds of employees of the ordnance depot at Longue Pointe, Montreal, have been laid off recently? If so, would the minister comment on the rumour that this plant, employing thousands of men, will eventually close?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, this is a question which should be directed to the Minister of National Defence. I am not aware of the circumstances the hon. member has mentioned, but I will bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of National Defence.

DRUGS

INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSITION AND TREATMENT OF ADDICTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I would like to pose a question to the Minister of Justice. On Thursday, July 16, during the minister's absence while with Her Majesty, I asked the question which appears on page 6102 of Hansard with respect to an investigation which is apparently under way in metropolitan Toronto in so far as treatment of narcotic addicts is concerned. I wonder if the minister can give some indication now of the position of the federal government.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I recall it when the question was asked it was dealt with by my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and so I did not prepare a formal answer myself. However, I have been following the matter, and my department has also been following with interest the developments in Toronto. As things stand at present that inquiry is proceeding and I think should proceed on the basis that it is the responsibility of the metropolitan Toronto authorities alone. There are reasons for this which my hon. friend will appreciate, the principal one being that there are other matters being investigated besides drug addiction. While at the moment we are not taking any part in it, I can assure my hon. friend that we will follow with interest the results and findings of that investigation so far as the problem of addiction is concerned.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED PARTIALITY OF MINISTER IN GRANTING OF CITIZENSHIP PAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, in case this should be the last day of the session I would like to give the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration the opportunity to clear her name of a charge which has been circulated in Ottawa, to the effect that she has used her position and her attachment to a certain organization to enable a certain young man to get his citizenship papers in a hurry, whereas another young man from another part of Canada has not been able to get his papers.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the young man who qualified did so under the Immigration Act. The young man who did not qualify was disqualified under the provisions of the Immigration Act.

Mr. Fisher: A supplementary question. So it has nothing whatever to do with the Hamilton Tiger Cats football team?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, I made an error; I should have said the Citizenship Act, not the Immigration Act. With reference to the last comment of the hon. member, the answer is no; but naturally as a fan I cannot help but feel gratified that there was a favourable result.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

CAMP GAGETOWN EXPENDITURES—NEWFOUNDLAND SHARE OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, during consideration of my department's estimates on July 9 the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked two questions, and seeing that we were both in a co-operative mood that night I promised to provide an answer before the end of the session.

His first request was for an estimate of the increased expenditures on general procurement resulting from the establishment of Camp Gagetown. I have now obtained figures for all purchases made in the Atlantic provinces during the fiscal years 1957-58 and 1958-59 which are known to have been destined for Camp Gagetown. For 1957-58 the total was $3,046,479 and for 1958-59, $3,504,354. I have here a table showing the breakdown of these figures by categories, which the hon. member might wish to have incorporated in the record. These figures do not include the value of supplies such as tinned food or clothing and footwear which may have been purchased in the Atlantic provinces for delivery to depots in central Canada and subsequently issued to the camp, since these are not readily identifiable. On the other hand, the figures do include local purchases made directly by the army units stationed at Camp Gagetown.

As the hon. member will notice, the increase from 1957-58 to 1958-59 was slightly less than $500,000, which is only about 7 per cent of the total increase in our purchasing in the Atlantic provinces, as I reported on June 3 and July 9. The ration strength of the camp was, in fact, lower in 1958-59 than in 1957-58. Consequently, although it may be true, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate suggested, that the establishment of the camp had a stimulating effect on the economy of the area, this does not account for any of the increase in our purchases within the Atlantic provinces in 1958-59.

The other question was what proportion of the expenditures for the Atlantic provinces in the last fiscal year was spent in the province of Newfoundland. The answer to this is 4.1 per cent.

I request permission to have this table printed in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to incorporate the balance of his answer in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Editor's note: The table above referred to is as follows]

Purchases in the Atlantic Provinces for Camp Gagetown

	1957-58	1958-59
Barrack equipment and furniture repairs	20,500	16,500
Clothing	1,358	2,636
Communication equipment spares	203	514
Food	1,261,695	1,113,783
Fuel and fuel hauling	520,165	574,240
Heavy equipment spares	8,789	1,165
Laundry and dry cleaning	54,161	68,507
Mechanical transport spares and batteries	45,416	60,033
Photographic and medical supplies	707	2,900
Petroleum, oil, lubricants and associated products	310,524	203,368
Sanitation services and supplies	390,443	567,155
Vehicle repairs	56,851	31,676
Building materials	375,667	861,877
	$3,046,479	$3,504,354

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is quite evident from these figures that the establishment at Gagetown has in fact been a great stimulus to the economy of the region, but the minister suggested in his answer that clothing, shoes and things of that sort might be bought in the Atlantic provinces, transported to a depot in central Canada and sent back to the camp again for issue to the troops there. Surely this government does not indulge in practices of that kind.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member framing a question or making a statement?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport if he has had time to obtain a reply to the question I asked yesterday concerning lay-offs in the districts of Quebec, Charny and Chicoutimi?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I have communicated with the Canadian National Railways but their offices are closed this morning, and we have not received an answer.

[Later:]

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. When he is asking the Canadian National Railways for information in connection with lay-offs in the Quebec district, would he also be good enough to inquire whether in the district of Mirror, Alberta, there have been considerable lay-offs within the last twelve months which have reduced the personnel from 172 to well below 100. Would he inquire from the C.N.R. whether there is any opportunity of taking these men back in some form of employment or other and, if not, whether the government is able to do anything for these men.

Mr. Hees: I shall be very glad to make that inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

SECRETARY OF STATE

PRINTING BUREAU—CONTRACTS FOR ATLAS BINDERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State if he intends to make a statement in connection with one of the matters which was under discussion during consideration of his estimates last night and on which he undertook to give the house a statement, concerning contracts for binders?

(Translation):

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to give the information; unfortunately, the house adjourned so very late last night that I could not get in touch with the officials who could supply me with the required information.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister reply before the end of the day?

Mr. Courtemanche: I shall try, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

NATIONAL REVENUE AND IMMIGRATION STATISTICS, B.C. PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. On July 1, in question No. 484, I asked certain questions with respect to the Department of National Revenue. In view of the fact that I asked the questions in the hope of getting arguments to use on the minister's estimates today, is there any possibility of this information being given to me today, before the minister's estimates are concluded?

(Translation):

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall look into it, and if it is at all possible to table the requested document, I shall be pleased to do so.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF QUEEN'S PRINTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, in all sympathy for the Secretary of State, would the Prime Minister consider giving him the help he needs through the appointment of a queen's printer in the near future?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I believe that question deserves a reply. In other words, when does the Prime Minister, under whose jurisdiction I believe this appointment comes, intend to make this appointment?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have heard the question and the answer is "shortly".

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

LIVERPOOL, N.S.—INQUIRY AS TO COMMEMORATIVE STAMP ISSUE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General. I have just noticed that the town of Liverpool in Nova Scotia this year celebrates its 200th anniversary. May I ask the minister if his department has considered bringing out a special postage stamp to commemorate the 200th anniversary of that town?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman is a little late in making his request.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO POLICY ON DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS ON GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture on this the last or nearly the last day of this session whether the government has yet reached a policy arising out of the demands and representation made by two delegations, one of them a very large one and another a smaller representative delegation from western Canada, asking for deficiency payments on wheat, oats and barley? The house will recall that on June 15 the Prime Minister said that the government had not yet arrived at its policy with regard to this matter.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer of June 15 still stands.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is such an important matter, may I ask a supplementary question. Does that mean parliament will not be given the opportunity of knowing the answer the government makes to these very important delegations of over 1,000 farmers from western Canada?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I can only say that if parliament is sitting at the time the decision is made, the announcement will be made in the house.

FREIGHT RATES

NORTHERN ONTARIO—SUBSIDES ON FERTILIZER AND FARM EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I hope this is in his jurisdiction, but I must confess I am not sure. Could the minister say whether any representations have been made to the federal government requesting a subsidy on freight rates on fertilizer and farm equipment going into northern Ontario? If so, what consideration has been given to this request?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. However, I received it only on coming into the house. I have not received any such representations myself, but I will be very glad to make inquiries in my department.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—

254. General administration, $4,317,418.

The Chairman: This item will be found on page 53 of the blue book, and the details on page 350.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Chairman, this item deals with the Department of National Revenue, customs and excise divisions. The estimates of this department have been before the committee on estimates, and several days were spent in a discussion of them. I do not propose at this time to make any lengthy preliminary statement on the item. The item deals with the employees, the revenues and all the other activities of the department.

I do not propose to make a statement, but I do want to point out at the moment what is known to all hon. members, namely that 95 per cent of the item is for salaries. I also want to point out that this is one department, despite increases in salaries and increasing responsibilities, in the over-all estimate shows a reduction as compared to last year, which I think is possibly some indication of the efficiency of the department and also, I must say, due to the improvement in modern methods of computation, and so on.

We have had reports from the committee, investigating the civil service commission, et al, and as a result certain official practices have been brought up to date. I do not think at this time the committee would be interested in hearing any statement from me. I would be very glad, of course, to try to supply answers to any questions or to reply to comments that come up during the discussion.

Mr. Pearson: As the minister has said, these estimates received thorough and exhaustive examination in the committee on estimates. Perhaps that will make it unnecessary to spend the time on these estimates that would otherwise be required. If there is only a short time devoted to them it should not lead to any misunderstanding, because it should be known that they have already received very careful examination.

Item agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

43. Grant in respect of the net operating requirements of the radio and television services, $58,404,000.

Mr. Pearson: Is the minister going to make a statement on the C.B.C. at this time? Is this the item?

Mr. Nowlan: We are moving along so rapidly that I did not realize we had reached this one. The taxation officials must be out of breath trying to race downstairs before we carried the items of national revenue and taxation.

Mr. Chevrier: I hope they do not break their necks.

Mr. Nowlan: That is a more charitable attitude than probably some taxpayers of this country take.

I have not any prepared statement, Mr. Chairman, in so far as the C.B.C. is concerned. I really did not expect that we would get to this point quite so rapidly in the morning, though I am very thankful that we did.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been the subject of considerable newspaper comment during the past six months. It has been before the committee on broadcasting and had an exhaustive review. I will not say "exhaustive" because I understand the committee has suggested that it still wants to conduct further studies with respect to it; but this has been a year in which the C.B.C.

has probably attracted as much publicity, been involved in as many difficulties and subjected to as much criticism, shall I say, and also as much commendation as any year in the corporation's history. It has been a year of stress and strain. Of the two leading executive officers, one has been stricken with a heart attack and the other one is worn out with exhaustion. It has been a year which certainly will always be remembered, I am sure, by the corporation, and I do not think there is any real purpose that can be served by my discussing the matter at this time. However, there is a statement I do want to make with respect to the C.B.C. and broadcasting which I think should be given to the committee before detailed consideration is given to the estimates.

Hon. members will recall that the previous government in December, 1952 laid down a policy of permitting only one television station in each area, except where there was to be one each in the French and the English languages. This policy was apparently intended to assist in developing and conserving commercial revenue, and also to support an industry which was very expensive and which at that time, at any rate, was in an experimental stage. That policy was criticized by members of the Conservative party then in opposition, and it was criticized as having a monopolistic tendency.

Since the present government took office it has carefully re-examined the situation with a view to changing the previous policy to one of competition and greater freedom. First it was necessary, of course, to establish the board of broadcast governors as an independent regulatory body. This has now been done. It was necessary to assess the general position of both the C.B.C. and private broadcasters in the light of present circumstances and in the light of the whole review made by the royal commission, which reported in 1957. It may be recalled that that commission recommended the abandonment —I want to emphasize this—of the old single station policy and the licensing of competing stations, subject to suitable conditions. In addition, the commission warned of certain problems and difficulties which will no doubt be in the minds of any who seek licences to establish new stations, as well as those who grant such licences.

The establishment of new competing stations in the larger centres of population will no doubt affect the commercial revenues of those now operating there and will, of course, affect particularly perhaps the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation revenues. We are all very conscious of the problems in the financing of the C.B.C. and the difficulties it faces in obtaining commercial revenues. On the other hand we believe competition will be of benefit to the consumers of television services, that is to the Canadian people who pay for the services one way or another. We believe also that it will be a spur to improve the efficiency of both private and public operators.

In that connection I might interpolate in my prepared statement and venture to suggest that there has been a great deal of criticism of the C.B.C. for carrying on a certain type of program service. There are those, of course, who think this type of program should be dropped and that type of program should be dropped, but I suggest to this committee that as long as the government maintains the single station policy, then I would think it is almost essential that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has to carry out this broad basis of programming because no other facilities provide them. Once you do get competing services it is possible—and I emphasize "possible"—that the C.B.C. will be in a position to deal with the new problems which arise.

The government has consequently decided that as from September 15, 1959 it will be prepared to consider applications for additional television broadcasting stations in areas already provided with television service. These applications should be made to the Department of Transport in the normal way for checking all their technical features under the Radio Act. They will then be passed to the board of broadcast governors for hearing and decision under the Broadcasting Act. They will finally require, of course, the approval of the government in accordance with that act. Under the policy I am now announcing the government will now be prepared to give that approval if all those previous requisite conditions are met.

It may well be that the size of the market to be served will not justify additional stations in many of the areas already served, and where people are hopeful of obtaining additional licences. This is a matter which the board of broadcast governors no doubt will wish to take carefully into account in considering the proposals which may be put before it. Nevertheless, as time goes on it may be assumed that more and more areas in Canada will justify a second station.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that is all I wish to say at the moment. I know there will be many queries and comments and I shall be prepared to deal with those later, of course.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the almost spectacular speed which was shown a few minutes ago in completing the minister's estimates will perhaps be less noticeable in the consideration of C.B.C. matters, because even at this stage of the session—and I wish it could have been earlier—some attention must be given to this very important matter. We discuss the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and broadcasting in Canada at a time of great anxiety about the future of a national broadcasting system in this country, an anxiety the responsibility for which, I suggest, should be shared between the government and the C.B.C. itself.

That principle I have mentioned, one national broadcasting system with its public and private sectors, is basic to our approach to this whole matter. I think it is also the approach of the minister, and anything I may say in criticism of recent policies should not be interpreted as suggesting that I do not have confidence in the minister's approach to what I consider to be basic, as I have said, to the problem of broadcasting in Canada. I think we on this side appreciate his views and the way he has tried to carry them out in this fundamental matter.

We think it essential, Mr. Chairman, that the publicly owned and operated sector of this national system, which is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, should be free from every form of unjustifiable influence or pressure, including, indeed, special pressure from government. To achieve the purpose I have mentioned of establishing a strong and independent national broadcasting system, as independent as such a system can be, subject always to parliamentary control of general policy—because I do not suggest for a minute that independence should go as far as to exclude parliamentary control—the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, as the Fowler commission pointed out a few years ago, must have reasonable financial security, some certainty of at least a basic income over a longer time than the period of one year. It must also display administrative efficiency, and that in its turn implies maximum freedom from political pressures. The Fowler commission also stressed that point.

So far as the first matter is concerned, finance, in other days the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation had certain revenues assured by statute though, of course, especially in recent years, they were supplemented by parliamentary votes. That is no longer the case. The minister and the committee will recall that the Fowler commission was appointed primarily to investigate these questions of administration and finance, and it did make a very careful and exhaustive examination into these matters. As a result of that examination the commission report condemned the system of annual parliamentary grants on which the corporation would have largely to rely.

The minister will remember that we joined in that condemnation in the discussion we had of broadcasting affairs last August, when the present act was introduced into the house. The Fowler commission pointed out, as we tried to point out then, the danger of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation being forced to go each year to the Minister of Finance and beg for the means of its existence without having any other source of revenue except that which came from commercial income. We felt then and we feel now that this uncertainty and insecurity should be removed to the maximum possible extent, and that the corporation should be given some assurance of a fixed income over a longer period than one year and told to live within that income.

The present act which was passed last year, in section 35, subsection 1, I think, gives the Minister of Finance more control over the affairs of the C.B.C. than was previously the case. Before the C.B.C. annual budget goes to cabinet it must be approved by the Minister of Finance as well as by the minister responsible for C.B.C. affairs, the Minister of National Revenue. Last year when we were considering this aspect of the matter in the house we pointed out, as will be found in my statement recorded on page 4053 of Hansard:

> We fear that using this system of annual appropriations and nothing else under a government not too enthusiastic about the C.B.C. . . . the activities and the necessary expansion of the corporation could be prejudiced and the power of the purse used annually could impose the views of government in a field where this kind of interference could be damaging to the right of the people to be informed objectively.

Nothing has happened since that time to remove our fears on that score. That leads me to the second important aspect of this problem, how to establish administrative efficiency and that which must go along with it, reasonable political independence; not, I repeat, independence of parliament, because no one desires that, but independence of other forms of political pressure. We felt then and we feel even more today that that objective will perhaps be more difficult to achieve under the new act than under the old.

One reason for that is the change which has been made, a change challenged in the report of the parliamentary committee this year, by which the chief executive officer of the corporation is the chairman of the board. I believe the parliamentary committee has recommended a change in that regard, and in principle we certainly support that change. We also quarrelled last September with the appointment of top officials during pleasure; and though we were not able to convince the minister that a change should be made in that regard, the other place was more fortunate than we were. Fortunately that change was made so that they are now appointed during good behaviour.

Mr. Nowlan: And the minister was very co-operative.

Mr. Pearson: The minister was indeed most co-operative in regard to the recommendation made by the other place, but not quite so co-operative in regard to the recommendation which came from this side in this place. The president and vice president of the corporation are now appointed by the governor in council, the cabinet. Previously I think they were appointed only by the government on recommendation from the board of governors. We thought that was a change in the wrong direction.

We were told last September that the new board of directors of the C.B.C. would be a guarantee of protection against government pressure, and that they would be generally responsible for policy and administration. We criticized the present act, Mr. Chairman, for its inadequacy to accomplish the purpose I have just mentioned, and indeed for other reasons, and we feel that our worries in this regard have been justified by the events of last year.

We criticized the act because we thought it weakened the principle of one national system. We criticized it because we thought it would make increasingly for two parallel systems, one public and one private. We felt there would be perhaps more weakness and confusion in the administration under the present act than previously because of the appointment of two boards. We felt at that time that, perhaps because of that administrative set-up, the C.B.C. board might become less and less influential and less effective. We thought the C.B.C. itself had been weakened under the new act, and under the new act would be more exposed rather than less exposed to political interference. We thought that would be all the easier because of the new and cumbersome administrative set-up.

Perhaps I might be permitted, Mr. Chairman, to quote from Hansard of last August what I said on this matter. I should like to quote from page 4052 where I said this, and I think experience has confirmed the validity of my remarks:

> A third danger to the C.B.C. as a result of this bill is, as I see it, that the new administrative set-up of the corporation will become more cumbersome, and its independence will be somewhat less than that which now exists. It will have its own board, but its activities will be subject also to regulation, at least in principle, by the new board of broadcast governors. It will also have to submit its activities for approval to the responsible minister each year—also to the Minister of Finance, and I will come back to that in a moment—and to the governor in council and finally to parliament. It will readily be seen that in this procedure there will be opportunities to restrict the C.B.C.'s activties, to discourage leadership and enterprise within the C.B.C., and to tamper with its independence which is so essential to the corporation.

Then I went on:

> Under existing legislation the operating personnel of the C.B.C. from the general manager down are insulated, if I may use that word, from direct political pressure and political interference by the presence of a board of governors and a full time chairman of that board. That particular form of insulation has now been removed.

Then there is this:

> Perhaps the minister will say that something else has been put in its place, but I suggest that the new insulation is not going to be as effective as the old. The senior executive of the corporation now will be the president, who will also function as chairman of the board of governors of the corporation, which means that the responsible minister will now deal directly with the senior operating officer of the corporation—the president—instead of with an officer removed from day to day operation, the chairman. The new board will no longer be able to act, as it did formerly, as a protective shield for those concerned with the development, production and broadcasting of programs.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman that these words take on new meaning now in the light of developments. It seems to me that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation may have some difficulty in achieving the objective under the new set-up mentioned by the Minister of Finance when he spoke in this house on March 29, 1957 of the danger of political interference with the necessary independence of the C.B.C., as recorded at page 2827 of Hansard. This is the present Minister of Finance speaking:

> If the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is to function in a manner free of government interference, then there must not be attempts on the part of the Prime Minister or other members of the government to influence the programming activities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and above all opinion broadcasts on public issues.

Those were the words of the present Minister of Finance. In my view, Mr. Chairman, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, partly because of the new set-up, is now under greater ministerial and political influence than before and there is, consequently, more ministerial contact with it than before. The minister when he appeared before the parliamentary committee had this to say, and I quote from page 603 of the committee evidence:

> Mr. Bushnell and I have been very close. We have talked freely and met two or three times a week in discussing the affairs of the corporation—

On the next page, 604, a question was asked by the hon. member for Port Arthur, as follows:

> Did you ever take any of these representations on programming from your colleagues to Mr. Bushnell?

The minister replied:

> Not in any specific way. I may have mentioned, and I undoubtedly have, many programs, sometimes commending him and sometimes criticizing him. I may have given my own personal opinion, and may have said: My colleagues are sore about this or irritated about that, or did appreciate that, or something of that kind. I have no power with the C.B.C. I am in the unfortunate position of receiving a lot of blame and having no responsibility for anything.

I think perhaps the minister is unduly modest about his own authority and influence in this particular matter.

Mr. Nowlan: A historical allusion you may remember.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I remember. What, then, is the position now? Is the C.B.C. independent of political influence and political pressure in the way it should be? Again, I am not talking about parliament, but I am talking about other forms of political pressure. Perhaps I may be permitted to put on the record a paragraph from an article by a well known commentator on parliamentary affairs, Mr. Lynch, which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of July 11 of this year under the title "The Dilemma of the C.B.C." Mr. Lynch had this to say in this article:

> Few members of parliament seem much impressed by talk of the independence of the C.B.C.
> The feeling of the government, as nearly as I can discern it, is that if the C.B.C. cannot be used for government purposes, at least it is not going to be used to defeat those purposes. Hence, top-level sensitivity about critical commentaries on radio and television and the efforts that were made to kill "Preview Commentary".

That is the quotation from the article. There always have been, there are now and there always will be people telling the C.B.C. to do this or that about programs, praising or criticizing and perhaps criticizing more often than praising. There always will be members of parliament who have their own views about C.B.C. programs. I do not think anybody wishes to interfere with their freedom in that regard, and perhaps their freedom as members of parliament to talk about it. But when advice, if I may use the word the minister has used and I think the head of the C.B.C. used, comes from the Prime Minister or a cabinet minister, especially perhaps from the minister responsible for C.B.C. affairs, surely that is in a different category of significance and importance.

Some members of this house will recall the great excitement that was created a few years ago when the prime minister of that day, Mr. St. Laurent, wrote a letter to the chairman of the C.B.C. criticizing one program, not a series but one particular program after that program had taken place. Hon. members will recall the great furore that was caused in the house by that letter and the resulting discussion that extended over two or three days, one result of which was that every member of the cabinet of that day had to stand up and declare himself. The hon. member for Essex East says all except him. He must have been out at the time on agricultural business.

But that particular incident, whatever view we may take about it; did that in fact prejudice the position of the C.B.C.? It might have, even in the circumstances I have mentioned. I admit that. It might have, because of a letter coming from the prime minister of this country; but it did not. That series went on as usual. Perhaps the significance of that episode has been very clearly put by the editor of the Hamilton Spectator in an editorial of June 23, 1959 entitled "Conservatives Putting Pressure on the C.B.C." when he had this to say:

> But the healthy and reassuring part of it—

That is of the incident I am talking about, when the prime minister wrote that letter.

> —was that, whether Mr. St. Laurent could write or had written as a private citizen, he received just the reply that any private citizen would have received. Mr. Dunton had told him that the C.B.C. was a vehicle for free expression of opinion and that was the end of it.

That last sentence is the crux of the matter. That was the end of it. But when the C.B.C. is now told by a minister that he or his colleagues or one of his colleagues or the Prime Minister or any member of the cabinet is "sore" at a program, is that now the end of it? That surely is a question with which we are faced.

All these anxieties, Mr. Chairman, were brought to a head by the cancellation of one program, "Preview Commentary", and the resignation of some 30 officials who believed that this cancellation was brought about by what three of them called clandestine political influence. This matter was investigated by the parliamentary committee and the verdict was that there was no evidence—it was a short verdict—to support this contention.

I ask any member of the committee to read, as perhaps most hon. members have done, that evidence and come to their own conclusions as to whether there is any evidence to justify that statement. The decision to cancel this particular program which brought, as I say, these matters to a head—and they had been simmering in other ways for a good many weeks—was taken by the acting president of the corporation as the parliamentary session was, we hoped, then drawing to an end and as the parliamentary committee set about to discuss broadcasting, especially political broadcasting.

Why was that decision made so suddenly at that time? It certainly appeared to be sudden; certainly it was a sudden decision to the colleagues of the acting president. Mr. Bushnell himself, as reported at page 558 of the evidence, answered that question. He said this:

I must admit that having had a rather busy time—

And he certainly has had in the past year; he has worked, as the minister has said, extremely hard.

—this matter was not brought to my attention until some time, I should think, around the first of the year.

He does not say in his evidence who brought it to his attention at that time. Then he went on to say:

And, then again, I felt we had quite responsible people who would be looking after this—

He meant looking after that particular program. As I shall try to point out later, they were looking after it and they had no reason to believe it was causing any trouble at that stage. Then Mr. Bushnell went on to say:

—and I should think it would be about a month ago that I began to ask for the scripts. It is my personal view—and I think it is only fair to add that a review of the scripts that were read by Mr. Jennings and by Mr. MacArthur, who was our former chief news editor, they found that some of the scripts at least, were not what the C.B.C. might ordinarily expect them to be.

From that statement and other evidence of that kind one would gather that the cancellation of this program was just an ordinary matter of program quality. If that were the case the obvious reaction of anyone looking into this matter would have been, "Why not try to make it a better program, get better commentators, try to get better scripts before the next session of parliament, and let this run on for the few days remaining in this session?"

Mr. Nowlan: It shows there was no political influence.

Mr. Pearson: I will come to that matter later. During the recess the whole matter could have been reviewed by management. Obviously that would have been the normal course.

[Mr. Pearson.]

But another reason was given by management as an explanation for the cancellation of this program, namely that you could not expect this kind of program of analysis and comment on parliamentary activities to be satisfactorily done in a period of five minutes, that it was too much to expect of experienced members of the press gallery to do that sort of thing the morning after. It was not fair to them though they are expected to send dispatches and comments to their own newspapers not the morning after but the moment after something happens in the house.

Another reason was given by the management, namely that this program had ceased to be factual, although I always thought it was a program of analysis and comment. In any event, whatever the reason may have been the program was suddenly cancelled on the decision of the acting president of the corporation, who in the midst of his very heavy duties and responsibilities—and they were particularly heavy at that time—became very much concerned with this one program. Those responsible for that program—under, of course, the head—where not consulted about this cancellation. It was sprung on them to their consternation, as they made clear before the committee. Also they made clear that they had received no complaints about it, at least the officer of the corporation directly responsible states that, and that they had no reason to believe it was not satisfactory. Why then this decision?

It seems quite obvious to me that the decision was not merely or perhaps even primarily based on programming considerations. If that were the case, surely those who were responsible for it and who were still being responsible for it and who were producing it would have been consulted before action was taken. We know they were not consulted. So what happened? Let Mr. Jennings, the controller of broadcasting, answer on June 30 as reported at page 552 of the committee proceedings:

On Thursday, June 11, I was instructed by Mr. Bushnell that the program "Preview Commentary" was to terminate as of Friday, the following week, June 19. I was told at that time I would be given an explanation shortly. Later, the explanation was given to me that both the president and acting president would lose their jobs if the program was not terminated and that the position of the minister would be in jeopardy, and that there could be no change in the decision.

In his evidence Mr. Bushnell attempted to throw some light on this matter. He did not exactly come to the same conclusion, of course—as we know—that Mr. Jennings had come to. But Mr. Bushnell had this to say and I quote from pages 561 and 562 of the proceedings of June 30:

Mr. Bushnell: I made the decision because I felt that the program in itself was not as good as it should be, and I have reason to believe that it was displeasing a great many people; and reports that came back to me through my board and through my association with certain businessmen—if you like—

The "if you like" is Mr. Bushnell's, not mine.

—and certain others, such as school teachers indicated to me clearly that his program was not achieving what I thought it had been created to achieve.

A little later that day the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked Mr. Bushnell this question:

Was there any suggestion from him—

That is, the minister.

—or did he convey in any way to you—

That is to Mr. Bushnell.

—the notion or the feeling that this program was displeasing to the government or to anyone in the government?

Mr Bushnell: He conveyed to me the impression that several programs had displeased a great many people in the government and elsewhere.

Then my hon. friend from Lapointe asked this question:

I would like to ask one more question. Mr. Bushnell has just told Mr. Pickersgill that in the discussion between himself and Mr. Nowlan that the latter conveyed to him the impression that many programs were displeasing to a great many people. I wonder if that precise program, "Preview Commentary", had been mentioned during that discussion?

Mr. Bushnell: I could not truthfully answer that.

Then the hon. member for Port Arthur said:

Mr. Walker—

Mr. Walker was one of the officers in charge, the immediate superior to Mr. Peers.

Mr. Nowlan: The director in Toronto.

Mr. Pearson: Yes; Mr. Peers was the producer of the program.

Mr. Walker reported on a telephone conversation that went from the Celebrity Club—

That is a club in Toronto.

—in which you—

That is Mr. Bushnell.

—spoke to Mr. Ouimet.

The president.

Is it true that in that telephone conversation as reported in substance by Mr. Walker that you told Mr. Ouimet that if the program did not go, your job and his job were in jeopardy?

Mr. Bushnell: Inasmuch as there were two witnesses there, Mr. Jennings and Mr. Walker, I do not think I could categorically deny that.

Perhaps in fairness to Mr. Bushnell I should read the next sentence:

But what I did say, or what I was trying to get at, was this: That if, generally speaking, something was not done to correct some of the errors of our ways, that could be a possibility.

In the face of this—and I could quote, of course, other portions of the evidence—the parliamentary committee said in its report that there was no evidence of any political influence in this matter. The committee, of course, did not complete its examination of this matter. There were certain witnesses who in my view should have been called before the committee to make that examination complete, but that was not done. The reason given to us was that there was no time to hear other witnesses, whose evidence I suggest would have been very important to clear up some of these loose ends. In its report the committee talks about limited time, shortage of time, as a reason for not going more completely into this and perhaps certain other matters.

On that point the Toronto Globe and Mail of this morning, July 18, in an editorial entitled "Only Half the Job", has this to say:

If nothing else, the sorry spectacle—

That is a reference by the Globe and Mail to the report of the committee and the hasty manner in which the Globe and Mail says it was produced.

—should be an object lesson for the government to get its committees appointed and functioning right at the start of the session. There is no need for this undue haste; it can be quite damaging, in fact, as the C.B.C. report has shown. This subject in particular is far too important to be treated so hastily.

The minister will remember that last session when we were discussing this bill we urged that before it was passed it should be sent to a committee at that time to be discussed, and the minister said this could not be done because we were then also in the last days of the session, but that a committee would be set up in the very early days of the next session to go into this matter. "The early days of the next session", which I think began on January 15, did not begin for the purpose of this committee until April 29.

Therefore it is quite true, perhaps, that the committee did not have the time which was necessary for this very important purpose. Because of that—and certainly the government must take responsibility—and perhaps for other reasons, the committee, as far as I can gather from reading its hearings and its report, did not make the effort it should have made to examine in a comprehensive way broadcasting policy as a whole or the new act itself, and how that act should operate. There was certainly an examination at that time, I gather quite a heated examination, of particular programs, and many views were aired about many programs and performances. But that fundamental examination of the new Broadcasting Act and broadcasting policy, and the purpose of such policy, which we were told last session would be carried on by this committee, does not in my view appear to have taken place.

At the moment, as I think the minister pointed out in the remarks he made at the beginning of this discussion, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is the centre of attack from various quarters. I admit at once that in my view the corporation has given some ammunition to its attackers, some of whom certainly wish to destroy it and to put radio and television stations under private ownership in this country. At the same time, there seems to be developing a sudden emphasis in this country on the virtues of private broadcasting, so I ask myself, is there a concerted effort under way now to weaken and eventually destroy a publicly owned and publicly operated national broadcasting corporation? Is all this concerted criticism and attack preparatory to the strengthening and enlarging of the private sector in that national system at the expense of the C.B.C.? Is it preparatory to the granting of rare and valuable public assets in second television licences in metropolitan centres? And is this to be done before the board of broadcast governors has laid down conditions and standards of performance? Perhaps the minister will reassure us on that.

Mr. Nowlan: I can say "No" right now.

Mr. Pearson: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. Nowlan: That is why the decision has been delayed.

Mr. Pearson: I am very glad to hear that. Nevertheless it will be very interesting to see after these regulations are issued who gets these licences. Who are to be the favoured recipients of the potentially most profitable public franchises, perhaps, since the days, shall I say, of the East India Company? When the grants are made and the licences are given, the country will scrutinize most carefully both the people to whom this gold mine has been granted and the terms of public service which will be expected of them.

Let no one have any doubt about the importance of this impending action. Broadcasting, especially television broadcasting, must mean a Canadian system to reach the maximum number of Canadians with Canadian programs of entertainment and enlightenment, and the report of the committee emphasizes that.

There should be an expansion of the activities and services of the C.B.C. into certain areas where those services are not satisfactory or are non-exstent at the present time. That is a very expensive operation, and will perhaps become more expensive as the C.B.C. moves further afield for that purpose. It is bound to be expensive with our scattered population and great distances. Is that a service to be left to the C.B.C., with the few available remaining television channels in the large metropolitan centres left to become lush opportunities for a few favoured individuals with enormous potential for private profit, and incidentally providing a great potential danger to the publicly owned system and its increasing cost to the public treasury?

I am sure the minister must be aware of this danger. If the C.B.C. is to do the job the report says it should do in the public interest, and if it is to do the job that private enterprise will not take on while being given the lucrative franchises, then there is not only a danger of exorbitant profit from some of these franchises but there is a danger of the C.B.C. being unable to do the job it should do in the public interest except at even greater expense, perhaps, than is the case now.

There are only a few remaining television channels available for licensing and they are, as I have said, rare and valuable public assets. I suggest to the minister that if and when they are granted they should be given to those with a well established sense of public responsibility, on terms that will clearly assure that abnormally large private profits will not be made, and that the maximum amount of public service will be provided from their use. On no other basis, surely, can they be made acceptable. Let anyone who receives this public trust know now that he will be required to account to the Canadian people and the Canadian parliament as the representatives of the Canadian people for his stewardship, that his operations and profits will be fully examined, and that there will be no hesitation in revoking a licence improperly granted or badly used.

I do not quarrel for one moment with the idea of the closest possible scrutiny of the affairs of the C.B.C. I am sure that must be done with respect to the C.B.C. If it is not done there will be extravagance, undoubtedly. Once the C.B.C. is given some kind of basic financial security perhaps that will necessitate an even stricter examination into its financial and administrative arrangements. But let the same kind of public examination be devoted to the private sector of the C.B.C. which otherwise might be able to exploit its franchises in a way which would not be consistent with the public interest.

Certainly the views of our party on this matter are well known, but I should like to put them briefly on the record once more.

(1) We regard the C.B.C. as an essential and vital element in our attempt to create a united Canadian nation with a distinct national identity and culture.

(2) We recognize and accept the existence of private radio and television stations, but only as integral parts of a single national broadcasting system, subject to controls and standards of performance designed to provide maximum service to the Canadian people. These private stations must not become a happy hunting ground for a favoured few who have received rare public assets in order to create large private profits.

(3) We have every desire and intention that the C.B.C. should be required to operate efficiently and without waste of public moneys, and within a budget that will be fixed for longer than a year. But, subject to this, we believe that we should be prepared to pay nationally for the national service we wish to have and the national values we are seeking to maintain and strengthen.

(4) We believe that the C.B.C. should be an independent agency, subject only to broad policy controls by parliament, free from political intervention by anyone and free also from stultifying and picayune interference with the details of its day to day programming operations. We believe its management must be free enough and strong enough to reject political interference with its programming, especially with its talks and public opinion programs, for whatever quarter it might come.

(5) We believe that such an independent agency, sufficiently but not extravagantly financed and efficiently but not extravagantly operated, can be a major contributor to the development of a distinctive Canadian culture and to our growing sense of national identity.

I know the minister will agree wholeheartedly with me in that stated purpose of the national broadcasting system. We believe that such a system can help tie together the many scattered elements of Canada into a national unity. It can interpret the skills and aspirations and even the dreams of one part of Canada to other, distant parts. I think the C.B.C. is making a magnificient contribution to that end at the present time.

We also believe that this kind of national system can encourage musicians and artists and thinkers and entertainers and athletes to develop their varied talents and remain here in Canada for our entertainment and enlightenment. It can do much to build a Canadian culture—using that much misunderstood word in its widest and most imaginative sense—and to resist undesirable United States cultural influences which flow across our air waves, pervade our movie houses, and are to be found in books and magazines.

I do not want to be misunderstood in this. In this United States cultural impact there is much which may be and indeed is of very great value and adds richness to our Canadian life and from which we can and do benefit. But we must also have in Canada thoughts and ideas and music and entertainment of our own. Without this—and we cannot have it without a public broadcasting agency maintained at considerable public cost—we cannot have a Canadian nation at all.

Because it has a direct bearing on this point and is very well put, perhaps I should conclude by reading a few lines from an editorial in Maclean's magazine of July 18. After mentioning the differences, difficulties, controversies and anxieties created in recent months about broadcasting, the editorial states:

> All this points to one of two conclusions:
> On the one hand the C.B.C. management may be giving way to pressures that stronger men would ignore—which would be a grave fault in C.B.C. management.
>
> On the other hand political pressures and even pressures from its own employees may be vastly greater than they used to be, too great for men of ordinary strength to resist—which would be a grave reproach to the politicians now in office.
> It is extremely important for Canadians to know which, if either, of these conclusions is correct. For no matter who runs the national broadcasting system, Canada still needs one as much as ever—a system that will be not only genuinely Canadian but also genuinely free.

I state that if it is not genuinely free it will not be genuinely Canadian.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the idea of a nation is a fragile one. It seems to me it has its origin not in forms, legal or otherwise, but in the consciousness of the people. Forms are the clothing of the nation, but the essence of nationality is psychological. It consists in a miraculous psychological transference from the circumscribed conception of family and locality, of deep affection for kitchen and home—the village pump, if you will—to the individual's identification of himself with the whole community.

This immense psychological link would be impossible if the conception of our national entity remained an abstract one. I know it is nurtured by symbols, but also by the continuing assurance of our separateness, our uniqueness. This is the vital and binding function of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to translate the abstract conception of nationhood into something that can be seen, heard, felt and understood. No organization has done more to achieve this high purpose.

An idea like distinctive nationality is not worth 5 cents on the dollar in the market place. You place the C.B.C. at the mercy of hucksters, of deodorant and detergent peddlers, and you wave goodbye to it as a buttress to national identity. If Sir John A. had been prepared to sacrifice the principle of national integrity to the claims of private enterprise there never would have been a C.P.R., nor would there have been that complex of Canadian private business which has managed to shelter itself within the national economic framework that Macdonald built. The vision of the entrepreneur, and of the petty and interested men who are prepared to help him, is limited to the area enclosed by the four corners of the dollar.

It is galling to me, and especially to someone interested in history, that the inheritors of the great Tory tradition of Macdonald have failed so dismally to learn the lesson he taught; that nationality for Canadians is something that must be paid for.

The committee's evidence dealing with the C.B.C. this year, Mr. Chairman, is over 700 pages in length. There were over 30 sittings. There was an agenda with dozens and dozens of points. How much time did the committee have to prepare the report? Over the week end. The draft report was prepared on Monday. A whole melange of ideas was chopped and meshed together, given a certain amount of coherence, a certain amount of balance, and then was put to the full committee in camera the next day. The committee spent somewhere between 2½ hours and 3½ hours sifting that particular melange of ideas into a rather stupid report which was presented to this house.

There were three great diversions at the sittings of this committee. I would like to just touch on them in the order of their appearance. The first diversion to me was the rather vicious destructiveness of those "men of the people" and of Maurice Duplessis who came into the committee and at almost every sitting identified themselves with the people and proceeded to present a form of questioning which indicated that they would like to have some kind of program control, or some kind of control over the appointments, almost a censorship, on one side of our national television and radio.

The second diversion of the committee meetings was the two sessions with the board of broadcast governors and with its head, Dr. Stewart. I say "diversion" because they took us to quite an extent out of the C.B.C. line, and I want to comment later on what we did find out, though it was not complete, about the board of broadcast governors.

[Mr. Fisher.]

The third diversion of the committee was the storm over the charge of clandestine political influence.

In so far as the first diversion is concerned, "les petits Canadiens", the chairman and the committee as a whole I think were rather leery, but they did make a final concession to them, one which certainly disgusted me, and that was the rather measly decision to delete any affirmation of the principles of the C.B.C. that might tie in historically with the fact that we had a Fowler commission and a Massey commission and other reports which were intimately connected with the committees of this house which were denied because, Mr. Chairman, "les petits Canadiens" did not care for them.

In so far as the board of broadcast governors is concerned, the evidence is not complete but there certainly was to me the suggestion that the board of broadcast governors is taking a fairly narrow, cautious way in working up and working out its functions and positions. There seems to be no real rapport yet with either the C.B.C. or with the private stations. So far the board of broadcast governors seems to be a body somewhat detached from the reality of a national, vital means of communication, and certainly so far there seems to be some confusion as to its functions.

So far as the charge of political interference is concerned, your committee investigated the charge that clandestine political influence was responsible for the cancellation of the program "Preview Commentary" and found no evidence to support the charge. Why? Why did they find no evidence? Because Mr. Bushnell denied the purport of what a number of people close to him said he said. Why? Because the Minister of National Revenue felt that he had no accurate recollection of any remarks he may have made about this program, "Preview Commentary".

In the unseemly rush past Mr. Bushnell's most peculiar and paradoxical evidence, we still have no explanation of the odd Celebrity Club phone call; the odd decision of the board of directors to support the management decision to use the axe, then the reversal of that decision. We also have the refusal of the committee majority to go further into these odd aspects.

What did the minister tell us? What stands out is that he dislikes this part of his job. Some commentary that is of the legislative aborting of last session that we produced on broadcasting. He wants out of the responsibility. This is what he said:

I told him—

That is Mr. Bushnell.

—I was going to try to get the Prime Minister to appoint someone else because I was sick and tired of these criticisms coming in from all over the country, from members of parliament, from my colleagues and from the public generally.

Mr. Nowlan: And from the C.C.F.

Mr. Fisher: I continue:

I said that life was too short to be bothered with this thing and that I was going to get out of it.

Later, at page 604, we find the following:

Mr. Nowlan: I may have mentioned, and I undoubtedly have, many programs, sometimes commending him and sometimes criticizing him. I may have given my own personal opinion, and may have said: my colleagues are sore about this or irritated about that, or did appreciate that, or something of that kind. I have no power with the C.B.C. I am in the unfortunate position of receiving a lot of blame and having no responsibility for anything.

So those broad shoulders over there are just not broad enough, Mr. Chairman. What a commentary on the legislation; what an indication that we need the relationship of the C.B.C. to the government put in the way recommended by the Fowler commission; that is, from the C.B.C. to the B.B.G. and then the relationship to the government. Did the committee consider this evidence important, this evidence of the minister? Not at all. Let us tinker with the idea of a chairman distinct from the president. Perhaps that is a good suggestion but it is an evasion of the underlined fact that one of the grievous faults with the C.B.C. is its relationship with a minister who cannot take the C.B.C. in its relationship to him.

So far as political interference is concerned, the minister did give program criticism to Mr. Bushnell; he did mention that it came from his colleagues. Mr. Bushnell either did take this or some more mysterious information seriously enough that he jettisoned a fairly innocuous program without bothering to give those below him anything more than the compelling explanation "heads will roll". So this relatively innocuous program lasting three minutes and 11 seconds five days a week was axed, this nice little pin-money show for the boys in the gallery. We still do not know any more about the reasons for its going than that it was a mysterious aberration of Mr. Bushnell. We are afraid the committee's words that there was no evidence to support the charge has real substance. We are sure that the government members on the committee were none too anxious to search hard, Mr. Chairman. There may not now be anything rotten in Denmark, but there was something rotten in Denmark.

In so far as the C.B.C. budget is concerned, there are a number of ways in which the finances of the C.B.C. could be set up. One of the means we are using at the present time is a parliamentary appropriation. There is the possibility of a special tax—we have had that in the past—to support the C.B.C. There was the old possibility, used in the past, of licence fees supporting the C.B.C. We could have a parliamentary appropriation tied to a formula. It could be tied to the number of sets at so much a set; it could be a fixed percentage of the gross national product that would allow for changes and adjustments in the economy. It could be a fixed ratio to the population or to the population growth.

On this question of a formula or means of getting money for the C.B.C. we have an area where members of parliament do not need evidence so much as their own common sense and instinct as to what their electors and constituents would appreciate, what they themselves would think it is worth. Did we get anything constructive from this committee on that? No; we merely got the recommendation of some formula by which limits may be set on the annual contribution of the federal government to the corporation, plus this very peculiar addenda that increasing effort should be made to ensure the emergence of vigorous commercial policies.

What encouragement to a public corporation. Did socialists recommend this? No, sir; these were private enterprisers recommending that there should be increased effort to ensure the emergence of vigorous commercial policies on the part of a public corporation. This committee would not suggest a formula or possible formulae in an area where the situation was and is most grave, that having to do with the financial needs of the corporation.

But on sponsorship, that obsession of the hon. member for Calgary South, we got quite substantial recommendations. It is said to the C.B.C., "Be vigorous. Ease the taxpayer and belt that other face of the taxpayer, the consumer face, through more bites of the advertising dollar. Rob Paul to pay Paul". It is not the C.B.C.'s function to turn a profit. Where this can be done without impairing the C.B.C.'s prime function as a national service and without diminishing the standard of programming there can be no objection, but it is not the end goal of the C.B.C. to turn a profit. This is precisely the weakness in the proposition that the C.B.C. should cede production rights in sponsored shows. United States experience has shown that this leads to sponsor control of program content.

On that point I should like to recommend to all members, and especially the Conservative members, a speech by Edward R.

Murrow delivered to the radio and television news directors' association last year. It is found in the November 13, 1958 issue of The Reporter. I am sure all hon. members realize that Mr. Murrow has been a prominent figure in United States television. He had this to say:

> I am entirely persuaded that the American public is more reasonable, restrained, and more mature than most of our industry's program planners believe. Their fear of controversy is not warranted by the evidence. I have reason to know, as do many of you, that when the evidence on a controversial subject is fairly and calmly presented, the public recognizes it for what it is—an effort to illuminate rather than to agitate.

He goes on to say:

> The oldest excuse of the networks for their timidity is their youth. Their spokesmen say: "We are young; we have not developed the traditions nor acquired the experience of the older media." If they but knew it, they are building those traditions, creating those precedents every day. Each time they yield to a voice from Washington or any political pressure, each time they eliminate something that might offend some section of the community, they are creating their own body of precedent and tradition. They are, in fact, not content to be "half safe."

Later on Mr. Murrow makes this statement:

> It may be that the present system, with no modifications and no experiments, can survive. Perhaps the money-making machine has some kind of built-in perpetual motion, but I do not think so. . . . Our mass media reflect this. But unless we get up off our fat surpluses and recognize that television in the main is being used to distract, delude, amuse, and insulate us, then television and those who finance it, those who look at it and those who work at it, may see a totally different picture too late.

This is a commentary by a very intelligent man, Mr. Chairman, on the very thing that some members of the house and of the special committee seem to want to drive us toward. The United States system is not working out so well in this field that we can take the private entrepreneurs or private systems there as any great models for programming or sponsorship. It should be the business of the government to ensure that the C.B.C. needs as little sponsorship as possible. Can the C.B.C. be blamed when private corporations quite naturally take advantage of the weak financial position of the corporation? Is it likely that private corporations will be shamed into paying higher amounts merely as a result of the publication of program accounts? I think the answers to these questions are no.

The only way to rescue the C.B.C. is not through facile lip service to practicable formulae, which is sheer escapism, but by improving the bargaining position of the C.B.C. in a ruthless and predatory market by establishing it on the sound financial basis that any great public service requires. I should like to ask those hon. members who are so antagonistic to the C.B.C. this question. Does the government subsidize the Department of External Affairs? In essence they are carrying out the same function.

The most disturbing element in what is going on in the country with respect to C.B.C. criticism is that there is a temptation for any one of us to climb on this band wagon. I say there is a temptation for any of us. There is a temptation to many of the people in my constituency who do not think of this greater entity and the need to preserve its uniqueness. In their desire to have wrestling three or four nights a week or to have canned westerns they are willing to go along. But I suggest that we have always to look at this national need for the C.B.C., and we have to consider the nature of the criticism of the C.B.C. that appears in public media.

I happen to follow the fortunes of the Thomson newspapers very closely. There are over 24 outlets in Canada that week after week pour out a daily dose of poison against the C.B.C. Mr. Thomson, whose progress in Britain I am sure will some day be rewarded by his becoming Lord Thomson of South Porcupine, started in the private broadcasting business and made a great success. There is nothing against that at all, but he has gone on to build an empire of newspapers, radio and television interests that surely makes him or his newspapers less than fair commentators on the position of the C.B.C.

One can say the same thing about the Sifton interests. Those of us who follow what the Siftons and Mr. Bell are doing could become very worried about the situation in Regina or the situation in Winnipeg, where we may be moving toward a private monopoly in newspapers, radio and television. I should like to remind hon. members and the people of the country, if they do happen to listen, that much of the criticism of the C.B.C. in the newspaper medium is of the orientation of the Thomson and Sifton interests, which are about as interested in Canadian nationalism as—well, I don't know what to say to convey their self-interest. Certainly they are much more interested in their connections with their newspapers and their television and radio stations.

On the question of the board of broadcast governors, the legislation produced last year has been most disappointing. To me the evidence given by Dr. Stewart before the committee was most disappointing. He had to be prodded into saying that the board of broadcast governors was anything more than a passive instrument that just waited. From the minister's statement last year we had hopes that the board of broadcast governors would really enunciate a national policy, that it would be the body that would determine the carrying out of this marriage between the C.B.C. and the private stations in one national system, that it would determine how this was going to come about. But we have not much promise in the indications that we get.

Admittedly it was incomplete, but I suggest that in the interval from when this session ends until the next one opens the minister, if he has any influence or any interest left, should try to encourage the board of broadcast governors to give the leadership that it seems hesitant about giving now so far as a national policy is concerned.

Are we going to go on, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Go ahead.

Mr. Fisher: I assume we are going through the lunch hour. The final point in a general way that I should like to make relates to the Prime Minister and the members of the government, I mean members of the government as a whole. I have to be fair to a number of Conservative members with whom I worked on the committee and say I think they have caught that kind of vision the Prime Minister has presented to this country, a vision of Canadianism. However, I am very much afraid that many members in that government group have not caught its meaning.

We have a Prime Minister who makes a point of Canadianism, who makes a point about the commonwealth and its importance. In essence, in two elections he fought campaigns that were based, at least partly, on the statement that we will take a firm stand with the United States. It is no good, in so far as the C.B.C. is concerned, taking a firm stand with the United States in an official way because the need is still there, more than ever before, to see how the C.B.C. fits in with the private stations to stem that influence from the south. The need is perhaps greater than it has been in the past; the need is not less.

The Leader of the Opposition made the point that the Liberal party still stood for the C.B.C. fitting into a system with the private stations, essentially as a national policy. He made the point that the C.B.C. must be efficient, even though it cannot pay its way. He made the point that the board of broadcast governors and the C.B.C. should work within a particular national policy. Well, on every one of those points I think we agree. I do not know how many members of the government agree with this. The Leader of the Opposition made a point about these lucrative plums that are going to be handed out, and how we are all going to be watching whether some of the so-called pals of the government get these plums.

He also made a point in connection with the C.B.C.'s position which he said may be in jeopardy because of the impact of this competition. Well, I believe that is the kind of chore the board of broadcast governors should be carrying out now, examining this sort of problem and planning to give leadership. I can see that in the rich television markets alone which we have concentrated in about four places in Canada we are not going to get the national service that any contribution from those market areas in terms of advertising revenues would warrant.

One of the ironies we always forget in talking about the competitive nature of private stations, that they will get in there and fight, is that there was never a case of which I know in the history of all the applications made to the C.B.C. in the past when it was the regulatory agency where, if there was one private station in an area and some other group wanted to put in another private station, there was a welcome mat put out. This is how free and enterprising these private enterprises are. They never put the welcome mat out. They fought over the application that was made. These are the ones who have been talking about the C.B.C. monopoly and its dangers, but when it comes down to the point of really believing in the principle they merely yap about it. Now they want protection for their monopoly, right down the line.

Some hon. members will say that is the nature of the market. Sure it is, but then don't yap. We have had this history of yapping against the C.B.C. on this point, and this will be a key point in the future. We have a private television station in Port Arthur, and there are a number of them across the country linked with the C.B.C. network, doing a fair to middling job, sometimes a good job. I want to say that if we are going to turn the C.B.C. open to competition, I hope the C.B.C. will take a good, long look at the prospect of firing a few more of their projected television stations into these little empires. Then will we ever hear the yapping.

The whole situation with respect to the C.B.C. may well be determined in the next six or eight months by the kind of mood and attitude that develops daily and is given enunciation by this government. I have so much respect for the minister, both in personal terms and the kind of character he has, that I am still hoping, despite his desire as given in evidence to get out of this chore, to get away from it and give it to somebody else, that he will stay and try to get the C.B.C. back on the road it should be following.

Those who may think they are little Canadians, who think you are going to solve everything by turning it over to the private broadcasters, should look at the evidence given before the royal commissions, should look at the evidence given before house committees, and they will see what kind of service the private broadcasters will give us. There is no doubt, and I think any fair-minded Canadian would admit it, of the need for the C.B.C. If it has had a time of trouble, some of the responsibility rests upon the legislation which was introduced last year by this government.

We would welcome nothing more than a statement, not from the minister but from the Prime Minister himself, on what he believes and thinks about the C.B.C. and its position in the future. I think that would do more to handle what concerns me most within the framework of this house, that is the niggling, nasty desire amongst some Conservative members to junk the C.B.C. I believe there is a great need for the Prime Minister to lay it on the line so that all the members of his party will realize that junking the C.B.C. is not Conservative policy.

(Translation):

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, while we were discussing the business of the C.B.C., I wanted, to express some of my views in order to rectify a few wrong impressions and throw some light upon the principles which, to my mind, should guide that corporation.

I am sorry that the impending conclusion of this session will stop us from dealing at length with the extremely important question of the C.B.C.

I would, as I said before, rectify some wrong impressions resulting from speeches we have heard. As far as I am concerned, I maintain that I never had, and that I have not today any intention of destroying the C.B.C. or of minimizing in any way the prestige acquired by that corporation. I had the opportunity, on some other occasion in this house, to praise the C.B.C. and to mention its excellent achievements. I thought, Mr. Chairman, that this would not deprive me of the right to criticize and to suggest possible improvements in some of the less creditable work of the C.B.C.

[Mr. Fisher.]

During the investigation by the parliamentary committee on radio and television, which I attended as frequently as possible, I tried in every way to obtain information which would help me evaluate properly the former achievements of the C.B.C. and its policy with regard to the future. I had an opportunity during that investigation to express my lack of satisfaction and, in some ways, my discontent, with regard to answers that had been given to me by those responsible for the C.B.C. If I expressed that discontent and that lack of satisfaction, Mr. Chairman, I did not do so in order to minimize the significance of the corporation and to weaken its prestige, but because I thought that my sense of responsibility and the sense of responsibility of the representatives of the people imposed the duty upon us—and a very serious duty at that—of enquiring about everything which goes on in the C.B.C. We should do so, first of all in order to dispel certain misunderstandings, and also to answer the numerous representations received from the taxpayers in the past, and which are still coming in today.

Before the session comes to an end, I did not want to leave hon. members of this house or members of the press gallery under the wrong impression, which the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) tried to create, as did, up to a certain point, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson).

I had prepared some notes of a very moderate character. I tried to apply to my remarks in this house a proper sense of measure. But I feel that, in view of the attacks directed against us, we could not very well limit ourselves to general remarks, but should rather refute, to a certain extent, the false statements made a few moments ago.

Mr. Chairman, at no time during the investigation did the committee, or representatives of the province of Quebec, try to advance a political cause. They simply tried to reply to the public's request that full light be thrown on the C.B.C. operations, not because the people, as a whole, thought there were scandals in the C.B.C., but because they thought that the situation in that state organization was sufficiently serious to warrant an investigation.

It is in that spirit that we undertook to work in the parliamentary committee on radio and television. We never tried, in any way—and I challenge anyone to say the contrary—we never tried, as I say, to advance political views. We strictly adhered to facts, and public facts. And in that connection, I believe it is proper to recall here an incident which occurred during the investigation.

The committee had decided, from the start, not to make any personalities. For my part, I was never opposed to such a procedure in the committee; I do think, however, that such a procedure could not prevent us from referring to responsible persons and mentioning public facts involving the C.B.C. administration in any one of its sectors.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the attitude of Quebec members, during the investigation of the parliamentary committee on radio and television, was one of responsible representatives of the people who, considering the amounts of money engulfed into the C.B.C., are strictly and conscientiously entitled to wonder what the C.B.C. is doing with that money, and I repeat, not with a view to uncovering scandals nor to insinuate that there were misappropriations, but simply in view of establishing that the money entrusted to the people responsible for the C.B.C. is well administered and yields the returns which can be normally expected.

Mr. Chairman, I must say, as I have repeated time and again during the proceedings of the parliamentary committee on radio and television, that I was not satisfied with the replies we were given, because I found them evasive, and I found also that the points we raised were not answered properly.

Mr. Chairman, before going into my remarks to the house, I wanted to make that point, so that there will be no mistake about the attitude of Quebec members who sat on the committee on broadcasting.

I also expressed the view that we should divide the parliamentary committee on broadcasting into two sections, so as to give separate consideration to the problems of both networks, the French and the English, which really have different problems and should be dealt with differently. Such a division was rejected for reasons of procedure, but I think it is too bad, because in view of the tremendous task facing us, we were unable to do a thorough enough job of getting at the information we needed.

Mr. Chairman, I was saying a moment ago that we tried to live up to our true responsibilities. I base this statement on the principles of responsible government. Every year, we are asked to vote money to the C.B.C. This money is provided not by the members of the house, not by members of the C.B.C., but by the people generally. It is supplied by the hon. members, by officials of the C.B.C. and by each and every taxpayer. So we have a legitimate right, Mr. Chairman, to inquire whether this money is being properly used.

We tried to find out how the C.B.C. is managed financially. Other hon. members who are better qualified than I am to deal with the technical aspect of such problems, will discuss that point. The report submitted by the parliamentary committee on broadcasting contains a number of recommendations on this score.

I shall not go into that, however, because it would take too much time, and besides, it is beyond the scope of my humble qualifications. However, Mr. Chairman, I would point out, as I pointed out during the proceedings, that the C.B.C. should not be regarded as just another crown corporation.

The C.B.C. has nothing in common with an administration such as the C.N.R., because the C.B.C. does not deal merely in material things, but must take into account a moral and intellectual content. People with different outlooks take a different stand on this matter. If you restrict the committee's responsibility merely to the financial aspect of the C.B.C., where problems are translated into figures and accounting formulas, the parliamentary committee's discussion should have been restricted to administrative problems, inasmuch as they have budgetary implications.

But if, on the contrary, it is realized that the C.B.C. is not a crown corporation like others, and that it does not deal only with material matters, but that it involves, as I said earlier, a vast and important moral and intellectual content, it cannot be dealt with like a strictly financial organization. Thus, the parliamentary committee which deals with the C.B.C. is entitled—and this without interfering in internal affairs of the corporation—to try to establish a relationship between the cost of the C.B.C. to the taxpayers and what the corporation offers them.

It is in that light that I have tried to contain my remarks, and it is for that reason that, during the inquiry, I have tried to get information on the general policy of the C.B.C., especially in the matter of programming.

Today, Mr. Chairman, right or wrong the C.B.C.'s business is not only informatory but cultural and even goes as far as being educational.

I therefore have the right, as a representative of the people, to ask who are those responsible for educational activities at the C.B.C. today. When, right or wrong, it seeks as I say, to educate the people, I am entitled to wonder what their principles are, their moral standards, and their line of thought in general. I have a right to ask whether those people may, by all sorts of means, reasonably appeal to the judgment of the people with regard to politics, by setting up at the taxpayer's expense political hustings persistently aiming at the destruction of governments. I have a right to know—and I am speaking for myself as a taxpayer—whether those people would necessarily be accepted in our educational institutions. I have a right to ask whether they are qualified to look after popular education, and even education period.

That is the spirit in which I asked my questions at the meetings of the committee on broadcasting. But I wanted to know exactly what future part the C.B.C. would play in the field of public education.

I tried to obtain some information in order clearly to establish what were the intellectual and moral standards of those responsible for the educational aspect of the C.B.C. I was told that the corporation tried to present programs that were morally sound. Isn't that just wonderful, Mr. Chairman? Can it do other than strive to present morally sound programs?

I am saying that, Mr. Chairman, without in any way trying to minimize the significance of the beautiful and valuable programs put on by the C.B.C. What I am saying is that there is, at the C.B.C., an atmosphere—I am more particularly speaking now of the French network—an atmosphere of amorality. During the survey, something was said about immoral shows. For my part, I believe that the C.B.C. has enough decency not to present any shows that are immoral. But I think that there is at the C.B.C., please note that I am indicting nobody whatsoever, but I wonder whether people responsible for those programs are acting deliberately—a certain lack of moral sense, precisely because there is no moral reference which might be a guide with regard to some of the programs.

[Mr. Tremblay.]

I also maintain, Mr. Chairman, that all those who want to call Quebec educational institutions into account are not enough concerned about the national character of C.B.C. programs. There, we have a national institution which has first of all to convey national culture, besides supervising with the greatest care everything coming from outside this country.

The aim would not be to prohibit an access to universal culture to our people, Mr. Chairman, but it must be considered that the public at whom the C.B.C. programs are aimed is not always a discerning one, and is often unable to distinguish what really pertains to Canadian tradition, and what belongs to other cultural expressions.

Mr. Chairman, those issues of a moral and educational character are of capital importance, and hon. members of this house, and particularly members of the parliamentary committee on broadcasting, have no right to feel unconcerned in that respect.

During the convention on radio and television broadcasting, which took place a few day ago in Montreal, His Eminence Cardinal Leger stated the following:

> The convention, he said, does not propose to condemn anything. Rather, it tends to express the views of the people. Radio and television are exerting some influence in every home and the church is therefore interested in those means of expression which, today, have become almost indispensable. Everyone has certainly the right to say what he thinks with regard to those programs.

Mr. Chairman, it is not exerting any political pressure to express one's opinions on C.B.C. programs And I do not think there has ever been a better court in this respect than the committee on broadcasting for finding out about the spirit of a corporation, the responsible executives of which are often not close enough to the people for whom the programs are meant. It would be difficult to know the views of the man in the street, if those who represent the corporation are not in close enough contact with him. Yet, they should take their inspiration from the people for programs pertaining to Canadian culture with French and Christian cultural backgrounds.

There has been talk of political interference, there have ben persistent suggestions of political interference, in an attempt to give the impression that only Conservative members from the province of Quebec were trying to interfere politically.

Mr. Chairman, there are citizens who complain about C.B.C. news commentaries because they feel those commentaries are controlled and that news commentary programs are monopolized by people representing a particular form and school of thought.

I have no objection, Mr. Chairman, to each citizen expressing his views. I have no objection to organized groups being given a chance to express themselves. What I do oppose is that to news commentaries be always entrusted to the same representatives, the same groups of thought.

To any who would charge political interference in C.B.C. news services, I can read a document proving that political interference does not necessarily come from the quarters they think. I have here a C.B.C. document bearing the signature of Mr. Marcel Ouimet. It is addressed to the news editors in Toronto, to the regional director and to several other directors of the French network. The document, dated July 6, 1959 comes from Ottawa, and reads as follows:

> What strikes me is that, as a result of certain circumstances, we seem to be giving special emphasis to statements by ministers of the provincial government. For instance, I do not believe we were justified, last May 24, to give ten minutes of "Camera 59" to extracts from the speech of premier Duplessis at the convention of electricians in Three Rivers.

Those who were attacked by the provincial leader that day did not have, so far as I know, an equal opportunity to defend themselves.

The same could be said of the speech made by Mr. Sauve a few weeks ago in Montreal.

Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to efforts being made to reach what they call, in the C.B.C., a balance of opinions, but I do not believe that a C.B.C. news official should not have the right to object to opinions being expressed during the news by a man who, after all, is the premier of the provincial state.

I should like to refer also, Mr. Chairman, to a document which will be appended in the latest record of the committee on broadcasting, a letter from a parliamentary correspondent of Le Droit, Mr. Chaloult, stating that he had to refuse C.B.C. programs, that he had to refuse to make comments over the air because he had been asked to make comments favourable to the party then in power. If that is not political interference, Mr. Chairman, we might as well do away with the word, and the concept which remains in the minds of people who have charged the government with being guilty of interference.

Mr. Chairman, I come back to the claim made a moment ago that the actions of Conservative members have jeopardized the C.B.C. I do not believe that public opinion, which expresses itself mainly through its legitimate representatives, could jeopardize a body such as the C.B.C. As I said just now, and I have full confidence in the C.B.C. I do believe that the C.B.C. is able to give us excellent services. But I feel that the danger which now threatens the C.B.C. does not lie in attacks by members of the house or by various citizens, but in the lack of ability which, in my opinion, prevails in several administrative departments of the C.B.C. And please mark my words: I am not condemning the C.B.C. as a whole, because there are, on C.B.C. staff, excellent people, people of genuine ability in their field, but I also believe that, in some particularly strategic departments, some people are incompetent. I do not hesitate to use the word incompetent. It is that incompetence which threatents the C.B.C.

At the conclusion of its proceedings, the parliamentary committee submitted a report. That report, Mr. Chairman, includes excellent recommendations. For my part, I believe that all those recommendations are valid, but I also believe that the report, inasmuch as it recommends structural and organizational reforms within the C.B.C., is perhaps premature. I believe that the investigation we just made, and that the crisis the C.B.C. has gone through these last few months, require that we give increased attention to C.B.C. administration. I believe that it calls, on the part of the people's representatives and on the part of all those who are directly concerned with the C.B.C., for much reflection, and for study of all we have learned in the committee on broadcasting; yes a detailed study of the C.B.C.'s general policy as expressed in the documents submitted to us by the C.B.C. itself during the investigation and which could certainly allow us to introduce recommendations covering the whole activity of the C.B.C., its purposes, objectives, and responsibilities to the public.

For my part, I believe it is imperative to revise very carefully, the C.B.C. plans and objectives, in order to determine exactly what the C.B.C.'s responsibility should be in matters of education. I don't say that it must have that responsibility, but it could have it.

Before proceeding to an overall shake-up of the C.B.C., to drastic structural reforms, I believe we should study all those documents we now have on hand, and that we should also study the recommendations which were made by those citizens gathered in convention in Montreal a few days ago. There is talk of a controlling body, a body which, let's call it by its name, would be a censorship body, and which would be responsible for the supervision of the moral and intellectual aspects of C.B.C. programs.

I repeat, for my part, the suggestion I made last year about the competence of those who are responsible for news and cultural programs in the C.B.C. I suggested then that consideration should be given to organizing competitions, as well as to organizing professional schools which would allow all those interested in radio and T.V. business to acquire a reasonable degree of competence, based on adequate culture.

Finally, before I close my remarks, Mr. Chairman, allow me to emphasize once more that the C.B.C. should give young writers all possible help, and remove all dangers of monopoly, in avoiding the maintenance, for years on end, of the same programs, which is obviously a handicap to young writers and a danger also to writers who, for years, have been favoured by the C.B.C.

I also insist that the C.B.C. give Canadian artists all possible opportunities.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I have been listening closely and with interest to the speech just made by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay). He started off by saying he would correct some false impressions that may have been left by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) who spoke before him.

He said, among other things, that the allegations of these two members were untrue. However, I was here during the speeches of those two hon. members and in my view, they said nothing untrue.

Moreover, if they had said anything untrue, the hon. member for Roberval had a right, under standing orders, to rise and raise an objection, and to call for a withdrawal of the statements made by the hon. members.

Mr. Tremblay: I did not have to rise.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I am saying that the hon. member was fully entitled, under standing orders, to rise on a point of privilege when he felt he was being personally referred to. However, in his remarks, the hon. member has altogether failed to prove that an hon. member had in any way made untrue allegations about him.

Yet, the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) indicated, with his slight English accent, that some members who took part in the proceedings of the broadcasting committee were petty Canadians.

Mr. Johnson: Slight accent! He didn't know what he was talking about.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, if the allegations of the hon. member for Port Arthur apply to the hon. member for Roberval, let him accept them. In my view, the speech we have just heard bears the imprint of a petty Canadian. It seems to me that this is not the type of speech that should be made in this house by a broad-minded educator.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to devote more time to the statements of the hon. member for Roberval, because I have other remarks to make with regard to the matter before the house. However, I shall come back to that later.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to repeat what was said by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) concerning the general attitude of the Liberal party with regard to broadcasting in Canada. That policy was established not only by the Leader of the Opposition in this house, but it was set out many times by our party when we sat on the other side of the house. There has been no change in that policy, because we have always favoured protecting this government agency.

However, I wish to recall briefly some statements that were repeated many times by all major groups in the province of Quebec, and particularly at sittings of the Massey and Fowler commissions. Such groups have repeatedly asserted that the C.B.C. was and should remain an essential instrument for the progress and expansion of French Canadian culture, not only within the province of Quebec, but in all parts of Canada where there are important French-speaking groups.

This essential contribution has worked at two separate levels. First, it has enabled our artists and writers to devote themselves more completely to their art, so much so that one might say the fresh impetus noted in the arts, in literature and music, for several years now, in the province of Quebec was indirectly but most surely brought about, to a large extent, by the C.B.C.

Moreover, the C.B.C., through its programs, many of which are broadcast not only in Quebec but throughout Canada, has enabled many people who otherwise would have been unable to do so, to share in this renewal of culture, and to enjoy themselves while so doing.

Mr. Chairman, in recalling the special contribution of the C.B.C., I know I am expressing the majority opinion of those who, in the province of Quebec, are interested in things of the mind. Who would have thought, two years ago, that today we would be faced with attacks of a scope of which we are perfectly aware, against the C.B.C.

In making these remarks, I would not like to give the impression, however, that everything is perfect in the C.B.C., as far as administration and programming are concerned. In such a complex and difficult field, one must admit it is impossible to please everyone at the same time. It is even possible, as it happened recently, that serious mistakes may be made. It is possible that some programs which gave rise to serious attacks on the part of the great majority of the population of Quebec—I am sure—do appear on television, and it is also normal that the competent authorities should vehemently denounce such errors, as they did recently, in order to avoid their recurrence.

What I do not accept, however, is that such errors should give rise to scandals and protests from people who are now trying to sow public immorality in the province of Quebec by every means at their disposal.

Mr. Johnson: Who are they?

Mr. Chevrier: The fact remains that despite some mistakes, the C.B.C. has done a magnificent job—

Mr. Pigeon: Specify.

Mr. Chevrier: —which should be continued and extended. The C.B.C. is one of our main bulwarks against cultural invasion from the United States. Indeed I did indicate in a number of instances, when sitting on the other side of the house—the Leader of the Opposition mentioned this again this morning—that the C.B.C. is our strongest defence against the invasion of our culture by United States programs. Despite the important contributions of our institutions of learning and other instruments of culture, Canada's cultural future would be gravely jeopardized without the existence and continued progress of the C.B.C.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that every member in this house, at least those sitting on this side, will bear this testimony to the C.B.C.

Now sir—

Mr. Johnson: What testimony?

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: Now, sir, to continue to fulfill its vital role and to progress as we think it should, the C.B.C. needs two things. It needs, first of all, money, and it needs independence. Some members of the committee are surprised, and in fact they are even scandalized, at the annual deficits of the C.B.C. I have no doubt—and I am sure the committee is of the same view—that substantial savings could be made by more efficient administration. I want to emphasize, however, that in a country like Canada the C.B.C. would not fulfil its role if it were not incurring substantial deficits. I would go even further and say that I would be against the C.B.C. if it were to become solely a profitable organization, because that would mean that it would not accomplish the purpose for which it was established.

The deficit this year, as the committee knows, is some $51 million. This is, of course, a tremendous amount of money. However, when we look at what we are spending each year to defend our culture and our institutions against possible aggression we should come to the conclusion, it seems to me, sir, that the amounts we devote to our cultural enjoyment and development are very small indeed.

The major threat faced by the C.B.C. at the present time, however, concerns its independence, its freedom from political interference. We are not always conscious of the fact that there are two different aspects to this question and this threat. In the first place there is the manifestation of political interference itself. In the second place, there is the way in which those who are chiefly responsible for C.B.C. management react to that threat.

Political interference is certainly a most undesirable thing. I do not believe there is anyone in this committee who will gainsay that statement, but it is disastrous when C.B.C. management and those associated with it comply with such interference. There is no more effective method of destroying the C.B.C. than by transforming it into a political instrument of the government, and that is what those of us who sit here, as well as those who sit in the small group at the other end, want to make sure will not occur. That is why the most important responsibility of the C.B.C. is to resist that kind of interference.

I admit that it is not an easy matter. I admit that under the circumstances in which we find ourselves sometimes it is extremely difficult to resist pressure. Parliament, however, and the Canadian people have repeatedly decided that the C.B.C. would not accomplish a useful purpose if it were not free from governmental political interference, clandestine or otherwise.

That freedom, sir, and that independence which are so essential to the cultural welfare of the Canadian people have been entrusted by parliament to the C.B.C., and it is the major responsibility of its officials to preserve and maintain those essential requirements of that public service. The independence of the C.B.C. is as important to our democracy as academic freedom in our universities and other teaching institutions. It is as important for the officials of the C.B.C. to maintain the independence of that institution and to fight for it, if necessary, as it is for university authorities and university professors to preserve academic freedom.

To preserve those great democratic values may require at times, from those who are entrusted with the safeguarding of those values, a tremendous amount of courage and even the sacrifice of their jobs and their careers. However, our democracy expects those sacrifices from them because they have accepted those important responsibilities, and they must now live up to them. That is why all the C.B.C. officials who recently decided to resign over the issue of "Preview Commentary" have won our admiration for the courage they showed on that occasion. As far as we are concerned, here in this house, it is our duty to protect and support those people in the C.B.C. who carry these responsibilities and who resist political interference, even risking their careers to do that which they rightfully feel and believe is their duty.

The safeguarding of the independence of the C.B.C. has not been entrusted only to its management. It is also the duty of the government to respect that freedom, and we have good reason to believe that the government has failed in that duty.

There are still widespread rumours that there was direct interference in connection with the radio program "Preview Commentary". Apparently the real story of this dramatic incident has not yet been told. It is widely reported that the Prime Minister himself advised—I use that word because it was used before—the Minister of National Revenue that his head and that of Mr. Bushnell would roll if that program was not dropped immediately—

Mr. Lambert: That is tommyrot.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Irresponsible gossip.

An hon. Member: Where is the evidence?

Mr. Pickersgill: We were not allowed to get the evidence.

Mr. Chevrier: —advice which it is reported was communicated to Mr. Bushnell, who informed several C.B.C. officials of it. Well, Mr. Chairman, there has been a great protest from the other side of the house in connection with that statement, and there has been an endeavour in the report of the committee to whitewash that affirmation completely, notwithstanding the evidence which was given in that respect.

Mr. Lambert: Where is the evidence?

Mr. Chevrier: The least that should be done by those who are in office and those who are responsible for this series of events is to deny that suggestion and put the position of the government clearly before the house.

I want to leave that matter now and deal with the French network of the C.B.C. According to similar reports the independence of the French network of the C.B.C. would appear to be in greater danger than the English network. We all remember, of course, the most unfortunate incidents which occurred in Montreal at the beginning of the year. On that occasion the Minister of National Revenue was quite unfair, I submit with deference, to the employees and especially to the producers of the French network in Montreal. At that time he blamed the producers for the dispute. His statement will be found on pages 775 and 776 of Hansard for February 6, when he said:

> I also want to pay tribute, Mr. Chairman, to the management of the C.B.C. for the way in which they have conducted themselves during this strike. This has been the most unfortunate and unnecessary episode in labour relations in Canadian history, in my opinion. It is something which never should have happened.

He also made other accusations against the producers. However, about six months later, during the course of the committee meeting on July 2, when the minister appeared before the special committee on broadcasting he had changed his mind. As found at page 605 of the proceedings, in referring to the top management of the C.B.C. he had this to say:

Going back over these other occasions, like the Algerian matter, the Mother d'Youville question, the case of the person being brought in from Europe and also the background of the strike, where I was told afterwards if they had exercised any control here, the strike would not have happened, I probably told them, "You had better tighten up this organization or something will happen to somebody around here."

Mr. Nowlan: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister says "Hear, hear", so there is no denying this statement. The minister therefore admitted before the committee that he learned afterwards that if management in Ottawa had exercised any control the dispute would not have developed. The minister was quite wrong earlier and it seems to me that in so far as the producers involved in the Montreal dispute are concerned he owes them an apology and should make amends to them.

In connection with this whole matter concerning the French television network I want to refer to an article by Mr. Mark Harrison of the Toronto Star.

(Translation):

Mr. Tremblay: Why don't you read the pastoral letter from our bishops?

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. member will allow me the time, I intend to put on the record—

Mr. Johnson: Address yourself to the Chairman of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: —what religious authorities have said at a conference which was held not long ago.

(Text):

Evidently, Mr. Chairman, what I am saying is not appreciated by the hon. members who are continually interrupting. They do not like the fact that we have been saying repeatedly that in the province of Quebec they have been interfering with the management of the C.B.C. Why? Because some of the commentators have been disagreeing with statements made by themselves and by other government members. I should like to come back to the article by Mr. Mark Harrison published in the Toronto Star of July 2. It reads in part as follows:

Nowhere is the C.B.C. more exposed to political pressure than in the French network in Quebec. Surrounded by hostile politicians, C.B.C. producers in Montreal have been continually harassed in the past two years by attempts to undermine the independence of the corporation. The pressures have come from old C.B.C. adversaries—Duplessis supporters emboldened by the entrenchment of a Conservative administration in Ottawa. They have also come from the new Quebec Conservative M.P.'s who appear to assume their parliamentary status entitles them to influence policy in the corporation.

How do they apply these pressures against the C.B.C.? Mostly in a covert manner, seeking to make their influence felt through the federal cabinet, primarily through Solicitor General Leon Balcer and Senate Speaker Mark Drouin.

Last winter, for example, two confidential documents, blasting the talks and public affairs branch of the C.B.C.'s French network, were prepared by a group of Quebec Conservatives and submitted to the government. The documents have never been made public but it is understood they contained two major indictments:

1. That the C.B.C. Montreal group was riddled with left wingers.

2. That a few favoured commentators were appearing too frequently on the C.B.C. in Montreal.

The commentators to whom the Conservative M.P.'s objected were men like Jean Louis Gagnon, editor of La Presse, Gerard Pelletier of the Catholic syndicates and Andre Laurendeau, an editor of Le Devoir. The documents were passed on to the C.B.C. and the French network officials were required to submit reports which, in fact, were rebuttals of the charges.

I have not the time to read the questions and answers made by the minister responsible for the C.B.C. concerning this matter, but he did not deny the statement contained in that editorial. We have, therefore, good reason to believe that some of these pressures and some of these representations have been successful. Thus it has been decided to drop the program "Point de Mire", which had been tremendously popular and a tremendous success, by Rene Levesque. What justified that decision? Was it the fact that Mr. Levesque participated actively in the Montreal strike for which the producers and artists were not mainly responsible, according to the minister's new version? Surely this would not be acceptable. Was the program abandoned because some Quebec Conservative members, like the hon. member for Roberval, did not like Mr. Levesque? This would be most unfair.

Personally I do not know what the party affiliations of Mr. Levesque are, and this has nothing to do with the present situation. I do know, however, that Mr. Levesque is an objective commentator. I do know that he is a man who knows international and national subjects, and that he is listened to very carefully by a large part of the population of the province of Quebec. The proof of that lies in the fact that in the survey which was made of French television programs, it was "Point de Mire" which topped the list.

Mr. Johnson: Who made the survey?

Mr. Chevrier: Why then, I ask, was it decided to discontinue this program? We are certainly entitled to a full explanation of this from those who are responsible. Was it because some Conservative members from the province of Quebec complained that he was being seen too often on television? This is a complaint we hear very often, as was stated to us by the hon. member for Roberval.

What is the matter with an individual appearing often on television, provided he is able to entertain and give the public what they want? After all, you cannot take a man off the C.B.C. television network because of the fact that he has a wide and varied experience, and supplant him by another who has little or no experience, until that other has attained such experience. The complaint in itself is no justification whatever. The only acceptable criterion in this respect is whether the commentator is sufficiently interesting to keep his audience, and whether the program is achieving a useful purpose. It would be most regrettable if the C.B.C. had to drop its most popular French programs simply because of asinine arguments made by members such as the hon. member for Roberval.

In the last analysis the public should be the final judge of this question, because the function of the C.B.C. is to serve the public, not to satisfy the vengeance of political parties and members of parliament. I admit the C.B.C. should try, and it certainly did in the past, to develop new talent. However, it would be ridiculous if the C.B.C. had to drop artists and commentators as soon as they have acquired experience. The C.B.C., I am told, has not asked Mr. Levesque to continue his program "Point de Mire". This is unfair not only to him but also to the public who liked his presentation in the province of Quebec. This decision cannot be explained otherwise than by political interference, and I ask the minister to tell the house what has happened in this connection. Such pressures have also resulted in the dropping of other programs and other regular commentators from the French network of the C.B.C.

Mr. Nowlan: Nonsense.

Mr. Chevrier: If it is utter nonsense, as the minister has interjected, why has the program not been reinstated in the same manner as "Preview Commentary" has been? There has, no doubt, been some kind of interference in connection with "Point de Mire" and other programs on the C.B.C., as there was in connection with "Preview Commentary". It strikes me that interference has come from the sources I have just enumerated.

[Mr. Johnson.]

The Quebec Conservative members and their political allies, the Union Nationale, are now trying to destroy the C.B.C.; or at least if not, they are trying to prevent it from discharging the most important responsibilities it has to discharge in the province of Quebec. In order to achieve their purpose they resort to public denunciations of the C.B.C. and employees who are not in a position to defend themselves, and in this way they hope to destroy the morale of these officers of the C.B.C. and spread fear amongst the employees, with the hope that, put in that position, they will remove themselves and go off to other spheres.

They may get away temporarily with these unfair tactics. I want to tell them, however, that if they succeed in destroying the C.B.C., either by fear or through lack of funds or by reducing the C.B.C. to a political instrument of the government, they will be responsible for a major blow to the development and progress of the culture which they pretend to be serving and defending. I want to tell them also that in spite of a few mistakes which have been made by the C.B.C., this public service is still strongly and enthusiastically supported by public opinion.

I repeat that we on this side of the house and the Canadian public generally are entitled to get from the government a clear and complete statement of its broadcasting policy. This has not been forthcoming. This has not been given, either in the committee or here by the minister, and I think the time has arrived for the minister to tell this house that he, as the one speaking for the C.B.C., will not for one moment stand for interference, no matter from where it comes, be it from the members from the province of Quebec or elsewhere, in the programming of the C.B.C.

He and his government have repeatedly stated, not only during the dispute in Montreal but earlier on other occasions, that they will not permit interference in the affairs of the C.B.C. Well, if that is the case, then it appears to me that he should give instructions, in the same way instructions were given that "Preview Commentary" be returned to the air, to the C.B.C. to restore "Point de Mire" and other programs which have been taken off. In the present unfortunate circumstances what is needed to restore confidence and morale is an authoritative statement by the government. I sincerely hope that will be forthcoming.

Then, sir, the hon. member for Roberval a moment ago challenged me to put on the record certain statements in connection with what happened in Montreal recently. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Montreal

Star dated July 8, 1959 entitled, "RC Group Presents Views on TV, Radio". I quote:

It is time to stop wholesale condemnation and negative criticism of radio and television productions, Paul Emile Cardinal Leger said yesterday.

That is just the opposite to what the hon. member for Roberval told us in his 25-minute speech. He went on to be critical and to condemn many of the things that were being done by the C.B.C. None the less the head of the church in the province of Quebec did not hesitate to say that it is time to stop wholesale condemnation and negative criticism of radio and television productions.

At the meeting which took place at that time a series of resolutions were passed. I have not time to put them on the record, but they are there for anyone who wants to see them. I conclude, sir, by saying the time has arrived for the government to make it quite clear that there will be no interference in the programs on the French network of the C.B.C. I hope the minister will not only do that but that he will see to it that, in the same way "Preview Commentary" was restored to the air on the English speaking network, "Point de Mire" and other programs which have been dropped in Quebec will be restored to the French network.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I had intended to make some extended remarks on this item, because I am very much interested in the C.B.C. and all connected with it. But owing to the desire of the house generally to proceed as expeditiously as possible today I am going to deny myself that treat and enjoyment. However, the hon. member for Port Arthur placed before this house this party's position with respect to the C.B.C., and since coming into the house I have heard from a number of hon. members that his presentation was very well received even by members on the government side of the house, and that it was a constructive contribution to this most important subject.

I am going to deal with one or two matters that are of local interest, but before doing so I must say that I have received many letters—and I know a great number of people in my constituency—in connection with C.B.C. news programs and commentaries. These programs are enjoyed and appreciated by a large section of the population, that is to say that section of the population in my constituency which has the opportunity to enjoy those programs. I may say that included in those programs are excellent commentaries conducted by various members of the press gallery whose names have become almost household words in most of Canada because of their commentaries on radio and television.

However, it is because of the fact that the C.B.C. and its programs are appreciated in a large portion of my constituency that those who are still denied even radio reception are becoming more and more vocal in their protests against this continued denial of radio reception. Here we are spending huge sums of money developing television, yet in Canada today we still have sections of this country, such as the northern portion of my constituency where there are about five thousand people at the present time, who are denied the opportunity even to hear Canadian Broadcasting Corporation radio programs.

I have made this protest over a period of 14 years, Mr. Chairman, and we have made some progress. We are pleased to know that low power relay transmitters are going to be established this year at Slocan and New Denver. That is a step in the right direction, and the persons who will be served appreciate it very much. We still have two other areas which are not served by C.B.C. programs and which have extremely unsatisfactory radio reception. I refer to the Arrow lakes area and the area surrounding the Balfour-Procter axis in the Kootenay lake district.

I am not going to take up the time of the house on this matter except to again plead for these people who are denied even radio reception while others are enjoying television. These people who are living to some extent in the hinterland are producing a tremendous amount of wealth. Those in the upper Arrow lakes area produce one hundred million feet of lumber a year. Consider the revenue that comes from the loggers and sawmill operators in that district. Yet at the same time they are denied the opportunity to listen to C.B.C. radio programs, let alone television. The same situation exists with respect to people around the Kootenay lake area. I urge the minister to prod the C.B.C. along in this respect. When he is replying on this item of his estimates I should like him to give those people some information as to when they can expect these services.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer. In June of last year the minister confirmed the fact that a television satellite station was to be established at or near Trail to serve the Rossland-Trail area. Apparently there have been some unexpected delays in acquiring an appropriate site, but here again we find a large industrial section producing a tremendous amount of wealth. Naturally, although they enjoy radio reception—which is something the people about whom I have been speaking still do not enjoy—I have been asked to bring to the attention of the house and the minister the fact that they are looking forward to early action with respect to the erection of this television satellite station to serve the Rossland-Trail district. When the minister is replying I would appreciate it greatly if he would give me some comfort and hope in that direction.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to make a few observations which I intend to base on the report of the committee on broadcasting. I want to say first of all how disappointed I was—this opinion was also expressed by the hon. member for Port Arthur, and I think I reflect the view of all the opposition members—that the committee did not carry out the functions which the Minister of National Revenue told us last year it would be set up to carry out, namely to examine policy and examine the working of the new legislation. Instead of that, in spite of the fact that the minister's words were drawn to the attention of the committee at its opening sitting, the committee was in my view perverted into something that came very close to a witch hunt and persecution of the C.B.C. on the part, I do not say of most of the majority members but of certain of the majority members, who certainly monopolized most of the time of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Johnson: You monopolized most of the time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hear the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville say that I monopolized most of the time. I almost raised a question of privilege in the committee because a very distinguished journalist wrote about me that I merely went into the committee for five minutes, obtained headlines and then left. You cannot have it both ways. The fact of the matter is that I sat patiently through all but one of the sittings of that committee practically from the beginning to the end, all but one of the sittings that were held when the house was not in session. There was one occasion when it was quite impossible for me to be there. I admit that most of those sittings that were held when the house was in session—and I do not blame anyone for it—took place when I felt it was my duty to be here rather than there. I might say that anybody who wants to examine the record of almost any of the meetings will find that the number of interventions by me was relatively small, and that they almost invariably dealt with questions of principle—

Mr. Lambert: Politics.

Mr. Pickersgill: —policy and legislation.

Mr. Lambert: Politics.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was a little politics, that is quite true. There was a little politics when a shocking attack was made upon public broadcasting in Canada by the premier of the most populous province of Canada, and I thought the premier of that province should be invited to come to the committee in order to give us his views. For political reasons hon. gentlemen opposite used their majority to prevent any such thing being done.

Mr. Lambert: There were a great many other occasions when you used them, too.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the only case I can recall offhand.

Mr. Lambert: Don't be so modest.

Mr. Pickersgill: Other hon. gentlemen can give their own testimony on this subject. The Leader of the Opposition was critical; but understandably, since he was not a member of the committee, he was relatively mildly critical of the report of the committee and of some of its deliberations. I agree with everything he said, and I should like to reinforce it a little. I want to examine these recommendations seriatim. The first one does not need much time spent on it, as the hon. member for Port Arthur pointed out. It reads as follows:

> Your committee affirms its support of the basic aims and objectives of the C.B.C. We commend the officers of the corporation for their efforts to further these aims and objectives.

There it is. There is not another thing in that report that indicates that they are trying to do anything to attain those objectives. From there on the recommendations deal with breaking down the capacity of the C.B.C. to do those things, or with matters irrelevant thereto.

The next recommendation is:

> Your committee regrets that it must report its conviction that the administrative structure of the corporation is weak and in need of a thorough revision. There is a lack of clear definition of responsibilities and authority of the various executives and junior executives of the corporation.

I must say that I do not agree at all with that recommendation. I do think there was obvious evidence of weakness at the very top; I do not think anyone could argue that. But for the rest of the officers who appeared, I have very grave doubts as to whether there is any private corporation in this country which could send the number and variety of its officers to be put through the kind of inquisition these witnesses were put through and have them as clear, as candid and as precise about their functions.

It did not seem to me, therefore, that there was any warrant whatsoever for this wholesale suggestion. I think everyone would agree, and it would be silly not to agree, that for reasons perhaps partly stemming from Mr. Dunton's resignation and then the illness of Mr. Ouimet and the extraordinary burden thrown on Mr. Bushnell, there was weakness at the top; but in the corporation generally I found nothing whatever to warrant this, and of course no concrete evidence is cited in this recommendation.

Then the next recommendation:

Your committee believes that the board must assume full responsibility for policy—

Of course I do not agree with that either. The position of our party, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out this morning, is that the policy for broadcasting should be made by the board of broadcast governors for the whole national system, public as well as private, and having a board of directors of the C.B.C. is at best redundant and at worst likely to lead to confusion; and, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out at the last session of parliament, likely to create a divorce between the public and private systems, which would be regrettable.

That does not mean at all that we do not think the private sector of broadcasting—I should have said I do not think—has an important part, and an increasingly important part, to play; but the original conception from 1936 on was that there should be one integrated system with public and private parts complementary, and not two separate systems. It seems to me that already we have had a lot of evidence on this point, including the evidence given by the chairman of the board of broadcast governors, who gave his evidence very precisely and very concisely and who made it very clear that, as things operate now, they have no initiative at all in an effective sense in the field of policy.

Then coupled with this is the recommendation that——the person occupying the position of chairman of the board shall not hold other executive offices in the corporation, and that a chairman of the board be appointed.

I have some doubt as to whether the committee had the power to make that recommendation, because we were not asked to recommend changes in legislation; but perhaps that is a pedantic objection. I must say that in default of anything better I think this would be some improvement on the existing situation. It would provide a little of that insulation which the Leader of the Opposition indicated very clearly this morning was lacking and of which we need a lot and not just a little.

I pass over the next recommendation for the moment, because I want to say something about it later. It is the one having to do with clandestine political influence. The next recommendation I come to is this:

Your committee recommends that a senior officer of the corporation, with headquarters in Ottawa, be vested with the clear authority and responsibility for all supervision of production.

That, and several other recommendations which come later on, struck me as indicating a fundamental weakness in the approach of the majority of this committee to their duties. They seemed to think that this committee was appointed to run the C.B.C. This parliament last year over our objection established a board of directors to run the C.B.C., and this report is filled with administrative directions to that board of directors. The worst feature of that, sir, was that the committee took it upon itself deliberately to usurp the authority of the board of directors.

The Minister of National Revenue came to the committee and reinforced the reasons given by the C.B.C., some of them I admit perhaps not as convincing as they should have been, why certain information of a commercial character should not be given to that committee. Notwithstanding the fact that the minister made a very strong case—I thought it a more convincing case than the C.B.C.'s on this particular point—and notwithstanding the fact that all the opposition members of the committee voted to sustain the position of the minister, the majority of this committee took it upon themselves to disregard his advice and to insist upon asking for this information.

But that is not all; we then have chapter 2. There was a formal meeting of the board of directors, this board of directors which was set up by the whole of parliament, not just this little committee, to carry on the affairs of the C.B.C.; and this board, appointed by this Tory government, a board which one would imagine would not be unfriendly to the government, passed a resolution asking the committee to reconsider this matter. And what happened in the committee? Every supporter of the government voted against what the minister wanted; they voted against what the board appointed by the government wanted, and voted to insist upon overriding parliament. That was the kind of committee we had; and the only members of that committee who voted to uphold what has been, since Mr. Meighen laid down those principles about the C.N.R. in 1919 or 1920, the proper attitude toward the running of a public corporation were the opposition members of the committee.

Now, sir, it seems to me we have to make up our minds one way or the other. Either this parliament is going to show some reasonable confidence in the directors appointed to manage these corporations, or it is going to get rid of them because it has no confidence in them. The idea that we can usurp their functions and set up committees which disregard the advice of the minister who has to answer is, in my view, the negation of our British system of responsible government. It is importing into our system of government the United States system; and I must say that when I heard the Prime Minister's remarks this morning about the committee system I thought the Prime Minister himself was beginning to get worried. The Prime Minister said, as I remember it—I am just paraphrasing—"We are not trying to introduce the United States system." Whether or not the government is trying to introduce it, certainly many of the members of this committee acted as though that were being done.

The committee then went on to say that they gave lengthy attention to the financial operations of the corporation, and that is not a recommendation. They then went on to say something about extending service. That is one recommendation I do agree with. As rapidly as it reasonably can be done I think service should be extended to all Canadians to whom service can be extended. There is one other sentence with which I agree unreservedly, and it is this:

> Your committee was unable to ascertain that there is any intelligible formula or pattern used in determining the annual budget of the C.B.C.

That is exactly what we said about this legislation last year, and that is exactly what the Leader of the Opposition said about it at page 4053 of Hansard of last year. I wish I had time to read what he said, because it was borne out completely by the evidence which was brought before us on the very first day. It was quite clear that what we said at the last session of parliament was true, namely that, as long as they had annual budgets based on no kind of principle except that of asking for as much as they thought they could get, with the Minister of Finance trying to keep the amount as low as possible, it meant that this corporation to all intents and purposes was under the thumb of the Minister of Finance. I am glad the committee recognized at the end of its sessions that what some of us recognized on the very first day was true, but I do not think much of the proposals they have for dealing with the problem.

It seems to me, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out so well this morning, that there is only one way of dealing with this problem, and that is by some means or other, for a reasonable period of years, to permit reasonable planning, to give to the corporation an assured budget based on some automatic formula that cannot be changed by the Minister of Finance, the treasury board or the governor in council; a formula that will be decided by legislation in this parliament, and which will stand until it is changed by parliament. Before any formula of that sort would be changed I should think it would be wise to do what has always been done in the past, have an investigation of the character of the Fowler or Massey commissions.

These other recommendations about commercialism and the other cases where the committee undertook to tell the board of directors how to run the corporation, I am not going to discuss very much. I think this whole conception of commercialism is entirely wrong. That does not mean that I do not think the corporation should get as much out of the advertisers as it can, because I do; but I think it is entirely wrong to talk about subsidizing advertisers. What the corporation is supposed to do is to give the Canadian people the kind of programs that are needed in the national interests of Canada, and to try to get a part of those programs paid for by commercial interests. I am not the least bit in favour of letting commercial corporations go into the field and run programs in place of the C.B.C.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Well, who is?

Mr. Pickersgill: I direct the hon. member's attention to the last of the recommendations, which suggested that this should be taken over by sponsors or advertising agencies.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is a complete misunderstanding of the report.

Mr. Pickersgill: It may be a complete misunderstanding of the report, but it is an understanding shared by most of those who have read it. I come back to the paragraph in the report which I passed over. I refer to this incredible and extraordinary statement:

> Your committee investigated the charge that "clandestine political influence" was responsible for the removal of the program, "Preview Commentary" and found no evidence to support the charge.

Well, we did not find any evidence that did not support the charge; nothing; not a tittle of it. First of all Mr. Bushnell admitted quite frankly that he believed his head would roll unless he did something about that program and did it quickly. He communicated that belief to the senior officers of the corporation. They ended the program in a panic, and then got into a second panic and put it back on the air. We attempted to solve the whodunit, to try to find out what the channel was through which Mr. Bushnell got this impression, which I do not think was an hallucination on his part, though it might have been. We wanted two further witnesses. The steering committee agreed to have one of those witnesses, but the hearings were terminated abruptly before that witness could be heard. We wanted to have another witness, a member of the board of directors, who according to testimony already given really knew something about this matter, but we were turned down by every member of the majority voting against extending an invitation to those witnesses who might have been able to solve this problem.

Why? I do not know why, but it was evident that there must have been a fear on the part of the members of the majority that the evidence would be very damaging politically.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Ridiculous.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman can make his own speech in his own time. I want now to make one or two further observations about this whole question. One thing we know is that this program was cancelled suddenly, precipitately, and we were even told that it ought to have been taken off the air a week before it was. Let me read these words:

> —the fact is that it was cancelled after it had been announced. Why was it cancelled? Who reached the decision to cancel it ?— On what grounds did they make their decision? With what information before them and with what communications before them did they reach that decision?

I ask the minister that. I continue:

> Looking about for the source of this idea to cancel an announced program (an announced series of programs) which to say the least were not always complimentary to (the government), is it not fair to ask this question: Where does the advantage accrue from such a cancellation? To even the most untutored in the tortuous ways of this government it is perfectly obvious that the only advantage that could accrue from the cancellation of that program was an advantage to the (Conservative) party and the government opposite. Hence, Mr. (Chairman) we are left with two alternative explanations.
>
> The first one is that this program must have been cancelled by request of the government. I am not so naive as to suggest that the Prime Minister wrote a letter to Mr. (Bushnell) and asked that this program should be cancelled. Oh, no; I do not make that suggestion. I do not even suggest that the Minister of National Revenue necessarily picked up the telephone and called Mr. (Bushnell) or spoke with anyone representing the (C.B.C. management).

Mr. Nowlan: That is sheer nonsense and you know it. Your conduct is befitting a kindergarten.

Mr. Pickersgill: I agree, Mr. Chairman, that this statement was sheer nonsense when it was uttered by the hon. member for Eglinton on February 7, 1956, as reported at page 947 of Hansard in connection with another incident, but it is not on this occasion. I am interested that the minister should have used the very favourite expression of the hon. member for Eglinton in talking about what he describes as "sheer nonsense". But how well it applies. I am going to read a few more lines, because these words apply so very well to this situation.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): There was some evidence then.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman can deal with that in his own time. It happens that there was absolutely none. Let me continue quoting what was said by the present Minister of Finance who was then the private hon. member for Eglinton. Hon. members may have observed that I am paraphrasing this statement only to the extent of substituting the word "Conservative" for the word "Liberal" and by making other relevant substitutions which no doubt will be indicated in this record in parenthesis. I continue:

> I am not even suggesting that the Minister of Finance necessarily communicated, perhaps by artful stratagem or hint, the feelings of the government in this matter or his personal feelings which would be the same thing. But, Mr. (Chairman), by whatever method the view was conveyed or the hint, it is quite obvious that the feelings of the government were not offended by the cancellation. That is one of the two possible explanations.
> The other alternative explanation is that the (C.B.C. management), in proceeding to cancel this program, was acting in the interests of the government and the (Conservative) party even without direct government intervention.
>
> Sir, of the two alternatives the second would be the worst for Canada because it would mean that—the responsible body in the Canadian broadcasting organization, was anticipating government desires in tihs matter and was showing such a tender solicitude for the partisan interests of the government as would serve the desires of the government. Take your choice, Mr. (Chairman), of those two alternative explanations.
> Suspicion could not fail to be aroused by the method in which this matter has been handled—There was no frank, straightforward statement coming from them.

We remember the answer the Prime Minister gave on June 24. I advise hon. members to refresh their memories by looking at it. I continue with the hon. member for Eglinton in 1956:

> No, it is quite obvious that they felt they had something to hide; they had something to hold back and therefore the (intervention) must be secret.

The Minister of Finance anticipated the kind of situation that would exist with a Tory government in office very accurately indeed, as will be seen from the reading of that passage. But he was not the only one who anticipated that. That is precisely what was said by the Leader of the Opposition in the reference I made a few moments ago to Hansard of last year. That was also said by several hon. members on this side. I could read other extracts to that effect. I do not want to take the time of the committee to do it.

I think the Minister of Finance was right in this, that the greater of the two dangers in this business of voting annual appropriations, the more serious one, is the insensibly, inevitably, because of the corporation's desire to retain its employees, to preserve its status and to continue to grow, if this system of annual appropriations under the thumb of the Minster of Finance is long continued, human nature being what it is, the corporation will try to please, try to ingratiate, try to make sure, particularly in the autumn when treasury board is going to be looking into these matters—and we were given evidence that treasury board did look into them, that there was no question as there is with the C.N.R. of a budget, but there was a fairly detailed examination—we will find that this will insensibly happen, probably for a little while, anyway, for a few months. That may be a greater danger than the danger of direct intervention because of displeasure, perhaps because the government, having had its fingers burned rather badly, may be more cautious for a little while. The whole system is pernicious; it is thoroughly unsound, and it seems to me, sir, we ought to go back to first principles here.

The United States view is that broadcasting is so dangerous—that is, domestic broadcasting within their own country—that the state should not be engaged in it; that it is a danger to freedom. Now, to some degree that is right; to some degree it is true that there is always a danger within a mechanism owned by the state. No matter how great the independence that is given to it, it may become an instrument of the government in office and be a potential danger to our system of free and democratic government, to that proper balance between the government and the opposition which is so essential to the preservation of that freedom. But we have recognized in Canada that if we are to have a national identity side by side with a country so much more powerful than ours we have to have an instrument like this, just as we had to have a transcontinental railway nearly a century ago for the same reason.

Perhaps this is even more essential than the railway was to our preservation, but the only way we can do that is to keep this mechanism divorced as completely as possible, compatible with the parliamentary control over expenditures. That does not mean, sir, that you have to have parliamentary control over the day to day expenditures, and you certainly should not have governmental or treasury board control over them.

My view is—and I feel it even more strongly than I did before—that treasury board control is wrong; that the right system is some kind of ceiling, some kind of automatic one. I do not think, if it is properly calculated, we will need to worry very much about what happens below it because the corporation, as everyone with a limited income will have to choose what is best within that ceiling on income.

Mr. Fisher: There are three brief points that I overlooked. One is that I did not make reference to the service rendered to the committee by the chairman, the hon. member who makes his home in London. I must say that while I disagreed with much of the report and with some of the things that went on in the proceedings, he was a pleasant chairman and one who tried within the limits of all the contentions within the committee to be as fair as possible.

The second oversight is that I failed to mention that one of the recommendations in the committee report was very dear to my heart; that in spite of the service that is given to the metropolitan areas, which are well served, I think it is well to remind hon. members that there are quite a large number of hinterland areas of the country that still very much need the carrying out of the recommendations in this regard.

The third oversight, Mr. Chairman, was brought to my attention by a member of the government side of the house, who suggested that I was less than fair in my comments about them and their behaviour in the committee. In order to rectify that situation, Mr. Chairman, I just want to read from page 610 of the committee's proceedings. I think the committee will gather from the mood and rather confusing position that are revealed by the questions and the answers that this is what I was referring to. On page 610 the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard asked these questions, and I look on this gentleman as a typical member of the government forces on the committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. member for Port Arthur if that is not rather unfair, even to the committee?

Mr. Fisher: No, I think he is a typical member, and this is an example of the confusion that I was talking about. He was directing his questions to the minister. He said:

> As long as you have to answer to parliament for the operation of the C.B.C., and as long as the government subsidizes the C.B.C. to such an extent, I presume there will always be political interference—proper interference—in the C.B.C.?

Mr. Nowlan: There has never been any interference, as far as I know, in any way, shape or form.

Mr. Taylor: Meeting of minds?

Mr. Nowlan: There has been no meeting of minds.

I think that is true, too. I continue:

I have conveyed—as I said—every complaint I received in writing to the C.B.C. I undoubtedly have conveyed some—in general—of the verbal representations that I have received.

Mr. Taylor: I do not mean of an improper kind at all; I mean, there must always be meetings with C.B.C. officials for one reason or another, where the government is subsidizing this corporation to such an extent?

Mr. Nowlan: There are meetings constantly, because we get these representations and recommendations. I have given one—this question of the theatre. I have had a score of them that I have called up about and said, "I want to get more information on this" and asked them to come up and talk to me.

Mr. Taylor: It could not be otherwise, could it?

Mr. Nowlan: It has not been otherwise; and it could not be, unless the minister is simply going to be a rubber stamp and pass things on—which I have not been.

The only point about that question to me is that it supports my earlier contention that very many members—I think here was a typical member—on the government side have really not thought out clearly what the C.B.C. is doing, or what it is supposed to do and what its relationship under the legislation should be with the government.

In closing I would like to reiterate what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said, in so far as some of the recommendations of this committee interefere in the very area that we set up an authority for last year, and that is the authority of the C.B.C. board of directors.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I will take only five or six minutes of the time of the committee. I want to endorse the remarks and the congratulations that the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) has made to the chairman of the committee on broadcasting, the hon. member for London (Mr. Halpenny), who discharged his duties with much dignity and ability in circumstances that were often quite difficult.

Mr. Chairman, while listening to the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay), a few moments ago, I have recalled certain speeches that were made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), the present Minister of Finance. I wonder, however, if the hon. member for Roberval has spoken on behalf of the government. I hope that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), when he speaks in a few minutes, will tell us if it is so, because it is quite important that we know if all the theories which were put forward by the member for Roberval are endorsed by the minister responsible to the parliament of Canada for the administration of the C.B.C.

The hon. member for Roberval spoke at great length about education and culture. I will therefore give him advice which he, in turn might pass along to some people he knows quite well. The Quebec legislature, Mr. Chairman, has adopted an act to enable the provincial government to operate its own radio network in the province of Quebec. If it is indeed felt that the C.B.C. deals rightly or wrongly with education or culture, I believe the best way to relieve the problem, if it is a problem, is for the province of Quebec to apply to the C.B.C. board of directors for a licence to operate a radio and television station. In this way, Mr. Chairman, all those who object to the way the C.B.C. is carrying on, will be able to look after the cultural field in their own way.

Then the hon. member for Roberval referred to a document sent to certain C.B.C. officials in Montreal over the signature of Mr. Marcel Ouimet, and he read some paragraphs from that document. That very reference makes me doubt the purposes of certain members of that broadcasting committee, and I believe the document quoted by the hon. member for Roberval definitely proves that senior C.B.C. officials are doing all they can to give us programs that are balanced in every way.

Mr. Johnson: On one side only.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): The hon. member also referred to a letter from a certain newspaperman, sent along to the broadcasting committee. However, Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member for Roberval told us, we had agreed right from the start to refrain from personalities. But who dragged in the name of that newspaperman before the committee? The hon. member for Roberval knows perfectly well who it is, and I think that it was not fair to quote a letter charging certain C.B.C. officials without giving them the right to appear before us to tell us what they thought of the charge made against them.

The hon. member for Roberval—and I want to close with these remarks—dealt at great length with lack of efficiency in the C.B.C. But, if the government endorses the principles that the hon. member for Roberval has just set forth, and if it takes in consideration the recommendation contained in the report of the broadcasting committee, it could alleviate that lack of efficiency, Mr. Chairman, because the report of the committee recommended that someone be appointed in Ottawa, and that he should be responsible to the minister and to the people of Canada for the production, programming and content of C.B.C. programs.

Personally, I oppose that recommendation because I believe that the administration here in Ottawa, has able men who have the required knowledge to do this work. It would only be a matter of re-allocating the duties of certain C.B.C. officials here in Ottawa. But, I presume that that recommendation has not been made without a purpose, and if the government wants to take it in consideration and wants to get rid forever of the glaring incompetence of certain producers and of all C.B.C. officials, as the hon. member for Roberval has indicated, I hope that the Minister of National Revenue—

Mr. Pigeon: Not all of them.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): —will appoint to this post the hon. member for Roberval. Personally, I would be quite happy about it.

(Text):

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should say a word before the item carries. The hon. member for Kootenay West asked about the installation of a satellite station and expressed the pious wish that I might bring hope and comfort to his heart. All I can say is that the proposal is one of a score or more which C.B.C. engineers are considering. It is on the program, but I cannot assure him just when I will be able to boost his heart to the extent he hopes. It is something which is in prospect in the relatively near future. I think that was the only question of local significance.

One of the gentlemen of the press gallery, who has appeared on this much discussed program, said the other day that at this stage of the session, when there was pressure for the house to finish, the government submitted to blackmail by opposition members who got up and made wild and unrealistic speeches from time to time and the government, knowing they had to get the house through by a certain date or having entered into some sort of discussion to that end or hoping that it could be accomplished, had to sit by and not reply in kind. That is the position in which I find myself this afternoon. I should very much like to reply to some of the statements which have been made.

[Mr. Brassard (Lapointe).]

I might say immediately, in response to the inquiry made a moment ago by the hon. gentleman who just took his seat, that the hon. member for Roberval was of course speaking for himself. He is a member of the house who holds strong views, to which he is perfectly entitled, and as such he is entitled to every respect; but he does not speak for the government of Canada or for any phase of government except that as a member of the house he has the rights which we all have and which we respect.

In his opening remarks the Leader of the Opposition referred at length to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and with all his statements with respect to the aims, objects and purposes of the corporation, its history and its contributions, no one could agree more than myself. There is no question about that whatsoever. No party has a monopoly on affection for the C.B.C. or anything of the kind. In my opinion the C.B.C. is one of the great national organizations of this country. It has made a tremendous contribution to the country and it is an organization of which most, if not all, Canadians are proud. It is one of which I am very proud. I subscribe entirely, as I said, to the views the Leader of the Opposition expressed with respect to the corporation, the contribution it has made to the country and the contribution it can make in the future.

The corporation has a very difficult role to play, as I know full well from the mail I get and the differences of opinion that are expressed. Some people are very critical and some people are complimentary. Some people look forward to getting television programs from United States stations. One thing that has impressed me more than anything else in connection with C.B.C. programs is the number of letters I get from United States citizens who, having lived near the Canadian border, have had to move farther south for business or other reasons and have been removed from direct contact with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Their letters all express regret at missing Canadian Broadcasting Corporation programs, and say how superior those programs were and are to what they are receiving in the particular locality in which they now find themselves. I know there is a divergence of opinion in that regard, but that is one yardstick we can use, and it is surprising the number of letters one gets to that effect.

Much has been said this afternoon about the committee report. I am not here to make any defence of the committee. I do not think defence is necessary. I was very glad to hear the tributes paid by some members to the chairman of that committee. They were well deserved. I think the same tribute can also be paid to the great majority of the committee members. The committee worked hard and sat long hours. I think it did a remarkably good job.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate protested because the committee brought in certain recommendations, and said it was unfair to the management of the C.B.C. Maybe that is a play on words, inasmuch as the recommendations have to do with matters involving management. I can remember a score of committees of the house that have brought in recommendations with respect to specific matters. They are not necessarily binding on the government, but are the opinion of groups of men and women who have sat for long hours, have heard witnesses and have arrived at certain conclusions by a process of discussion and sometimes, of course, by long discussion and modifications before something approaching unanimity was reached.

The report is a good one. I do not know how far the corporation will be prepared to go in carrying out the recommendations of the committee. I am not sure what if any recommendations involve government action. This is something to which the government will give consideration when time permits after the pressures of these immediate days are over.

Much has been said about this program "Preview Commentary". I am not going to rethrash that old straw again. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who is sometimes logical and always political and has a habit of raising his voice higher the weaker his case, this time spoke more loudly than I have ever heard him before. I never heard him make such a poor presentation. I understand he is studying law, and I thought that undoubtedly some day he would be an ornament to the bar of whatever province he chose to join.

This afternoon, when he talked about evidence, I realized he had a long way to go before he became a lawyer. We all know there are books that have to be read during the law course, and if one wants to learn about evidence one of the elementary books one has to read is called "Phipson on Evidence". There are many other books on evidence, and I suggest to the hon. member that he should read a book or two on evidence before he starts trying to describe to the House of Commons or anyone else what evidence may or may not be.

Mr. Pearson: Is a parliamentary committee a court?

Mr. Nowlan: No, a parliamentary committee is not a court. However, one often hears a reference to the high court of parliament, so one is left to draw one's own conclusions.

Mr. Chevrier: Do the rules of evidence apply in a committee?

Mr. Nowlan: The rules of evidence may not apply, but when the hon. member speaks about something being proven, and when he says that things are proven, it leaves the impression that he is referring to evidence.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know the minister does not want to misrepresent what I said, but I did not use the word "prove" anywhere.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member did not use the word, but he made references to this evidence and one draws an inference from that. Apparently there is some suggestion of political interference and some suggestion that political pressure was brought to bear in connection with this program. Well, I have heard this government described in various rough terms by hon. members on the other side of the house, as having failed in this and failed in that and failed in the other thing. I believe most of these charges are not correct. However, I have never heard any description of this government or of any member of the government that was so uncomplimentary as to suggest that if there was any desire or any intention to use political pressure to cancel this program, it would have been done in such a way and at such a time. Certainly no politician with a scintilla or a modicum of intelligence would have done it in that way.

I think that is the best answer. How could anyone suggest that if political pressures were to be used to cancel this program, they would be used when this house was going to close within a week or two, after sitting months and months, and the program having gone on for two years? To do it in such a fashion would be utter nonsense. Just how silly can they get over there? They even have to laugh themselves.

Of course when they make such suggestions they know how little foundation there can be. The program may have been cancelled ineptly and without proper discussion. One can admit in a moment that is a matter for management as to why it was done or how it was done, and in that way management must answer for it. However, I can give assurance, as I have done before in the house and in the committee, that the suggestion that it was done by political pressure, clandestine or otherwise, influence or pressure, is sheer nonsense in every way, shape and form.

The hon. member for Laurier, who usually is very logical and makes able and convincing speeches in this house, I thought was driven to rather unfair limits when he suggested there were questions which should be put and answered. I suggest there may be theoretical questions about everything under the sun. If everyone goes around trying to make up questions and give answers about everything from creation to the hereafter, they will be rather busy indeed.

The hon. member referred to some question about the role of the Prime Minister and the role of someone else. I have been actively associated, as Minister of National Revenue, with this corporation from the day we took office on June 21, 1957. I have been the only one who has been associated with it in any way, shape or form. For anyone to suggest that the Prime Minister, directly or indirectly, interfered with this corporation through me or through anyone else is absolutely untrue and unwarranted; there can be no question on that score whatever.

Much has been said about the budget and the fact that the poor C.B.C. is defenceless because the government, through parliament, prescribes the moneys which the corporation is to receive. Well, what was the situation when we came into office? Where was this formula about which we hear so much now? I will tell you what the situation was. When we came into office the government of the day, represented by some hon. members who have been speaking this afternoon, had only provided the C.B.C. with enough money to keep it operating until October. In order to be fair I should say there was a royal commission and they were awaiting the royal commission report, but the royal commission report was not going to provide the money, per se. You had to go to parliament.

The first thing I had to do, as Minister of National Revenue, was to get a supplementary estimate through this house to keep the corporation from closing down. Something was said, and I think there is a misunderstanding about this—with all due respect I think the hon. member for Port Arthur has a misunderstanding of it because some of his questions would imply this—about my responsibility with respect to money. Not only am I the minister who reports to parliament or who is responsible for reporting to parliament for the C.B.C., but under the act I also have to recommend to cabinet every expenditure which has to come before the cabinet. What was the situation when I took office? I found that the minister responsible for the C.B.C. had to recommend to cabinet every expenditure over $25,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister not just referring to capital expenditures?

Mr. Nowlan: No; for any expenditure over $25,000, under the C.B.C. act the corporation had to get the authorization of the governor in council. Of course this would imply, as I am sure the hon. member will agree, a recommendation by the minister, whoever he might be, to council to get that authorization through. When we drafted this new bill which has been criticized—I am certainly not suggesting for one minute it is a perfect piece of legislation; I said that last year and I say it again—what we did do was to raise that ceiling from $25,000 to $100,000, and we eliminated programming entirely from that consideration.

Under the old act and under the former government, everything over $25,000 for programming had to be approved by the governor in council. Under the present act expenditures over $100,000 have to be approved by the governor in council, but programming is not included. I happen to know of one expenditure for programming that is going to cost $1 million which does not have to have my recommendation or my approval in any way, shape or form. This is a long term program, running over three or four years, but I happen to know about it.

I do not believe there is any basis whatever for this charge that the corporation is under the control of the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue and is weakened in any way because parliament has to vote the money. There is such a difference in the last four or five years. The cocoon has blossomed forth. The days are over when the C.B.C. budget was $4 million or $5 million. Radio was a constant factor, and expansion had ceased. The experimental era was pretty well over. You could plan a budget for a certain period.

We have blossomed forth from a budget of $7 million or $10 million to $60 million in a period of four or five years. What formula could you adopt to cover an expanding situation such as that, I should like to know?

What was the situation when my hon. friends opposite were in power? They had a formula at one time. At one time they had licence fees plus advertising revenues and you had to live within that formula or you had to fire someone. At one time they had a budget and licence fees, and it was not sufficient to run the corporation. Gradually they outgrew the licence fee; there were difficulties of collecting it, and they got a fixed parliamentary grant of $7,500,000 a year for the last three years, I think it was.

Then there was the excise tax. They had no reasonable formula whatsoever; I refer to hon. members on the other side of the house. It is true that the excise tax provided a new source of income, but when the corporation needed less money, compared at least with later years, the amount that came to them was larger because everybody was buying a television set and therefore the excise tax was larger and was far beyond their needs. And when the corporation needed money most less was coming in because people had bought their television sets.

To say they had a formula is a play on words. What our predecessors in office were doing—and what I suggest they would be doing today, or what they were doing up until the day we took over—was voting money by parliament. They had a parliamentary grant. They had the excise tax. They also voted money for the last year's grant and for the last two years we voted money for a deficit just as we are doing now. The only difference is that the deficit is bigger now than it was then.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question at this point?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that not precisely the reason that was given here in this house by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance for the appointment of a royal commission, namely that we believed this was a bad system and we wanted a royal commission to recommend a better one?

Mr. Nowlan: I am not prepared to answer that question; I may say quite frankly that I have not read Hansard. I have not any doubt that the hon. member is giving his recollection and that he probably is correct.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is a fact.

Mr. Nowlan: I am trying to suggest only that there is no difference in our procedure in this matter today from the procedure carried on by the hon. members opposite. Maybe we are low on this; maybe there should be more. But I do suggest that in this expensive area you cannot adopt a formula which will be satisfactory at this time. Theoretically it is fine. When the situation stabilizes I think a formula should be and could be found. But I say that in my opinion and that of my colleagues—because this matter was discussed; the Fowler commission undoubtedly recommended a formula—we did not believe and I do not believe that it is a practical suggestion. Therefore we have not adopted it. When you are dealing with $50 million, $60 million, and $70 million a year coming from the taxpayers of the country I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that some form of parliamentary control and parliamentary vote is highly desirable as a protection to the C.B.C. itself, because there are bound to be these pressures arise and there are bound to be demands from people across the country to know how the money is being spent. Even if you had a formula within which they could operate, I doubt that you would find that it could be preserved in our modern parliamentary practice as it is carried on.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, there are many matters to which I should like to refer. I thought the hon. member for Port Arthur was somewhat critical of the board of broadcast governors and the chairman who, I think, was before the committee twice. However, I think there is a misunderstanding in his mind as to the role of the broadcast governors with respect to the C.B.C. The board of broadcast governors never was intended to have any control over the C.B.C. with regard to programming or anything of that kind. The board of broadcast governors is to lay down general rules and principles for the operation of all radio and television stations in Canada, both public and private. It has no more relationship to the C.B.C., except that it happens to be a government agency and is here in Ottawa, than it would have to a private radio station such as that to which my hon. friend referred in Port Arthur, or to a radio station in Calgary or wherever it may be.

Reports all over this country from persons in the private broadcasting business as well as the public generally are that the board of broadcasting governors have made a remarkable impression, and are doing a remarkably good job and have received commendation from all over the country. I think we are very happy indeed in this government and in this parliament, and that this country is fortunate, in having a man of the type of Dr. Stewart and the other men who are associated with him in the administration and control of licensing of radio and television broadcasting throughout this country. It is because of that fact that the government has announced the relaxation of policy, because I feel confident that we can turn over to the board of broadcast governors the responsibility of deciding where and when and who shall be getting these television licences and know that the very best decision that can be made by human beings subject to human error will be made.

My friend the hon. member for Laurier referred to a certain program. I thought there was a slight lack of logic there. We are accused of political influence or clandestine political influence in connection with the program "Preview Commentary". Yet apparently he was suggesting there should be some overt political interference in order to get a certain program—I did not catch the name of it—which he wanted restored to the French network.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a point of order. I do not want to interrupt the minister, but I am sure he does not want to misrepresent what I said. I thought I made it quite clear, both in the remarks I made in English as well as those I made in French, that if this program "Point de Mire" was withdrawn because of political intereference it should be restored.

Mr. Nowlan: Frankly I may say I had never heard of it being withdrawn until the hon. member raised the matter this morning.

Mr. Chevrier: It is withdrawn.

Mr. Nowlan: I can tell you without any hesitation whatsoever, because I have been so advised by the officials, that the decision to withdraw that program was taken many months ago, and that it was done by the corporation without any suggestion of political interference whatsoever; and the program is not going to be restored in the near future. It is a program that some day may be brought back, but that is a decision of management and the decision will be made purely by them. As I say, frankly I did not know anything about it until I heard the matter raised here this morning.

There are many other matters to which one could refer, but I think I have taken up enough time of the committee at this time. As I said earlier, the C.B.C. has had a very tough season. It has been open season on the C.B.C. Everyone has taken a pot shot at it on the wing or in the bush. Apparently every newspaper felt free to do so, as is its right, as did many individuals. I sometimes wonder whether the advertising dollar and the division of it may not influence to some extent the not entirely friendly criticism which sometimes comes from the press. After all, their share of the advertising dollar will be smaller because as additional stations are licensed there will be greater competition. But as I said at the beginning and say again, I want to pay my tribute to the men and women of the C.B.C. who through very difficult days for the most part—with some exceptions—have been loyal to the corporation and have done a remarkably good job. I emphasize again loyalty to the corporation, because this corporation must exist as a corporation and those who are associated with it must have pride in it and show their loyalty to it. I am sure of that being done.

It has been a most unfortunate occurrence that Mr. Ouimet has had a long and serious illness, but we are all glad to hear that—at least according to the present advice of his doctors—he will soon be able to return to his office. In fact he intends to return to his office some time in August. Mr. Bushnell wore himself out in the interests of this corporation and worked harder for it than any other man I know. After a short rest I hope he will come back. I am confident that this corporation will continue to make in future the contribution to Canada which it has made in the past.

Someone has referred critically to the committee because in its report it referred to matters of administration. I think it was the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Although I am not in a position to judge, I do know that most editorial comment in Canada—I said editorial comment; I am not quite sure whether it was biased—agreed with the criticism of the administrative weaknesses in the C.B.C.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit me to say that I said there was no evidence produced before the committee. I direct his attention to the word "evidence".

Mr. Nowlan: Well, whatever the administrative weaknesses are, I am glad to see that the directors and the executive committee have taken cognizance of them, and I hope that whoever is responsible for piloting these estimates through the committee a year from now will find that next year has been a more stable year than the past year and that these difficulties have been resolved.

Mr. Pearson: May I express the hope that a year from now the minister will still be piloting these estimates, through the commons. However, in order not to have any misunderstanding about the position, a misunderstanding which might be left in view of what the minister has said, may I make it quite clear that when we support a formula for income for the C.B.C. we do not mean a formula which would prejudice parliamentary control of expenditure in any way. We mean by a formula the kind of thing which was recommended by the report of the Fowler commission, which was set up by the previous government and which was the reason no action was taken earlier; a commission which recommended three types of formulae to deal with the changing situation in broadcasting.

Mr. Carter: Before the item carries I want to put one or two questions to the minister. Would the minister inform the committee of the names of the present members of the national religious advisory council, which I believe is a body outside the C.B.C. which advises the C.B.C. with respect to religious broadcasts? My second question is this. Is there a similar body inside the C.B.C., and if so who are its members and how is liaison maintained with the national body? If there is no similar body inside the C.B.C., perhaps the minister could tell the committee who determines the nature and content of religious programs.

My final question, Mr. Chairman, is this. Would the minister draw to the attention of C.B.C. management the fact that a great many Canadians all across Canada would like to have the program "Morning Devotions" restored to its original length and form, particularly since the five minutes taken off is now being filled in with music?

Mr. Nowlan: I will be very glad to draw that matter to the attention of the corporation. I am afraid I have not here the names of the personnel of the religious council to which the hon. member referred. There are one or two officers in the programming department who, in consultation with the the religious council, lay down religious programming.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder if the minister has any information from his officials about the cancellation of a drama from Winnipeg dealing with a political topic, which program has been either deferred or cancelled because of its nature?

Mr. Nowlan: I heard a rumour to that effect last night. I have checked with my officials, and they know nothing about it.

Mr. Fisher: My second question, Mr. Chairman, is this. Can the minister tell us whether he is going to continue to try to get himself relieved of this particular part of his responsibilities?

Mr. Nowlan: That depends. If pressures of work keep on increasing in the Department of National Revenue as well as this department, I may just have to be relieved of something because I cannot carry it.

Mr. Fisher: If the minister does push that in this way he might be able, by following the proceedings in the House of Commons committee on broadcasting, to discover that there were one or two members of his party who seemed to have a real national conception as to what the C.B.C. has to do, and those members might very well be worth recommending to take over this chore that the minister wants to get rid of.

Mr. Nowlan: I can tell the hon. member that out of the 211 Conservative members of the House of Commons at least 200 would have the same idea of the service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that he has, and the hon. member has no monopoly of affection for the C.B.C., or of desire to serve.

Item agreed to.

44. Grant for the capital requirements, including the replacement of existing capital assets, of the radio and television services, $9,197,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would like to ask the minister if the corporation has given consideration at any time during the present calendar year to the acquisition of a television studio in Montreal, by means of an arrangement to have it built for them and leased to them, and if he could give some details about it?

Mr. Nowlan: I have not the details here, Mr. Chairman. The corporation was apparently giving consideration to the construction or acquisition of a building in Montreal to which I referred before the committee the other day. This matter came before me in the regular way as the minister who had to sign the recommendation because it involved an expenditure of over $100,000. I questioned that expenditure, as is now the policy—that was the first time I did so, because apparently I had overlooked it—and I said that I was not recommending any more expenditures unless they were approved by the board of directors. It does not necessarily follow that if I recommended it to the board they would approve it, though I should hope they would. I intended to ask about that matter yesterday, but I forgot to bring the papers down with me. The matter was referred to Mr. Dunsmore, the chairman of the finance committee of the board, but to date I have not heard any further.

Mr. Pickersgill: Might I ask the minister if it is the opinion of the corporation that such a building for a television studio is required in Montreal?

Mr. Nowlan: I know the board has been giving consideration to it and there have been discussions with management and the directors, but I am not sure what decision has been arrived at.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister been advised that there was a definite letter of intent signed by the president of the corporation to a certain corporation in Montreal authorizing them to go ahead with this project subject to approval by the governor in council?

Mr. Nowlan: I was advised, or rather I read that in a letter which I received from a member of the House of Commons who pointed it out to me. I have not been advised in any other way, although I inquired a moment ago and was told that such a letter of intent was sent; but it was stated that it would, of course, be subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister aware whether it is the custom for letters of that sort to be sent and to be acted upon on other occasions?

Mr. Nowlan: I understand it was the standard wording, the letter which was sent out.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister think it is a very wise practice, in view of the requirement that the governor in council must approve, for the president of the corporation to make commitments which would to the average businessman, I think, create the impression that he could go ahead? Otherwise it would not appear to have much point at all.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not know whether my opinion is very important on this matter, Mr. Chairman. Normally I think he would not send out such a letter unless he were assured it would at least be approved by the board of directors.

Mr. Pickersgill: In view of the fact that such a letter was sent and, as I am informed, very considerable commitments were made on that account, would the minister feel or would he not feel that some account should be taken of those circumstances if for example two propositions were before the board which were otherwise of equal or virtually equal acceptability?

Mr. Nowlan: I would hope that the board would give it very careful consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite. Would the minister, the circumstances having been drawn to his attention—I prefer not to mention the name unless the minister wants me to—give an undertaking that if a recommendation to erect a building for television studios comes before him he will look into those circumstances I have mentioned? Will the minister give us that assurance.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister tell the committee whether a site has been chosen for the new C.B.C. central office in Toronto, and what plans have been made for constructing a new broadcasting centre there?

Mr. Nowlan: No decision has been made as to the location. Officers of the corporation have been looking over properties within the last two weeks. The matter is now under close study to the end that a decision may be reached.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Fisher: In the committee we heard evidence from the director of engineering to the effect that there will be nine television relay stations or extensions or satellites and some 20 low power relay stations constructed. The request I wish to make to the minister, to pass on to his officials, is that information of this kind be distributed as soon as possible. In many parts of the country it is important that this information be made available as soon as possible in terms of private arrangements that may be under consideration. I would like to ask the minister if he can ascertain from the officials now before him what will be the earliest we can hope that this information will become public knowledge.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not know, Mr. Chairman. I am not at all certain that some of this information should become public knowledge. These are matters for study and consideration. The corporation would have to give careful consideration to these questions.

Mr. Fisher: I suggest it should become public knowledge, because a number of communities in this country have to consider whether or not to make what in many cases are inordinate expenditures in order to prepare for these radio or television facilities. If the C.B.C. has a five-year program, within the limits of population change it should be able to spell out these projected television stations and low power relay stations and state where they will be located. I understood from the reports we had that this information would be available at some time, and I should like to know at what time.

Mr. Nowlan: I have no idea, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister is not falling into the egregious error that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources did the other day, and suggesting that information about these extensions should be kept secret.

Mr. Nowlan: Oh, no, Mr. Chairman, I did not mean that. I intended to suggest that until decisions are made it would be unwise to have this information become public knowledge. I understand that the matter is under study. Many factors enter into it in terms of population and other things, and only a limited number can be built in any one year. I meant to suggest that until a decision had been made it would be unwise to give publicity to these things. I understand that a decision will be arrived at within the next five or six months.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I trust the minister will not consider it necessary to telephone the premier of Ontario to get permission to make an announcement.

LEGISLATION

The Senate—

The Speaker of the Senate—

174. Allowance in lieu of residence, $3,000.

175. General administration, $722,090.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, as the committee know there are a number of items which are of particular interest to those of us who sit on this side of the chamber. While I know it has been the custom to allow most of these items to go through unchallenged—and I would reassure Mr. Speaker at once that it is not my intention to oppose any of them—there is a matter about which we are somewhat concerned on this side. It has to do with the secretaries normally assigned to some of us during the non-sessional period. Before I launch into any discussion of our position with respect to that, I wonder if Mr. Speaker would be so good as to tell the committee what he has in mind in connection with that situation as far as we are concerned.

Mr. Fisher: Before the Speaker does so I wonder if he could give us a report on the results of the investigation he had carried out by the officials of the civil service commission on the more general topic of secretaries and the facilities offered to members.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I could make both those observations together. First may I say the pool system of secretarial assistance for members of the House of Commons has gradually altered in character over the years. We have come to a system whereby all the secretaries are now assigned to the service of individual members. That is a basic change in the former method of operation.

As hon. members will see, the vote for secretarial assistants provides for five secretaries who are called permanent and who are actually civil service appointees. It provides for 33 full time and for 140 sessional employees. The complement at present is in excess of that number both in so-called full time and in sessional secretaries.

In an effort to meet the requirements of the members for more and better secretarial services we went beyond the estimate and have had authorization for the sessional part of that increase. We have today a total of 192 secretaries of all three categories serving members of the house. Of this number approximately 50 were continued in service during the last recess. That was in excess of the authorized vote. It was warranted perhaps by the fact that the last session continued on into September. There was a shorter interval for holidays, and additional secretarial staff was taken on during that recess to give the full holidays that were due to the secretarial staff. In any event we went beyond our authorized numbers.

The problem I was faced with as this recess approached was to keep within the vote which hon. members have before them, because it was obviously not proper procedure to have on the staff more than the House of Commons authorizes to be paid.

In consultation with all three parties we agreed on a quota basis for each party based on the number of members to be served, and divided the 33 full time positions among the parties, making allowance for some special cases. The agreement was that there would be 24 for the government side, 9 for the Liberal party and 1 for the C.C.F., plus 2 for the office of the leader of the C.C.F. It was my arrangement with the whips that they were to indicate which of the secretaries on the staff would be required during the recess, having regard to the members they were to serve.

That is the basis on which the problem has been met. It obviously means some changes among people who were previously continuous, and it means also the addition of people to the continuous staff who were not formerly continuous, and an adjustment is being made as best can be done within the limits of the funds available.

This is a continuing problem. As all members know, this session we instituted a study not only of the best secretarial arrangement which could be devised to suit our particular needs in the House of Commons, having regard to the recess and members' requirements during recess, but also of the other office arrangements, and that report has been received and is quite interesting. It points in the direction that I have favoured myself, that is reaching the point where we will have a secretary for every member of the house. But we have not reached that stage yet, nor have we enough accommodation; but that I think is the indicated need at the present time having regard to the responsibilities of members.

I should like to read one paragraph of the recommendation which to me affords a reasonable solution in the future of this question with which all members have been concerned. This is the report of the survey of the secretarial services and office facilities of the house provided by the organization and methods service of the civil service commission. It is dated June 1959, and I am reading from the summary of conclusions on page 37, as follows:

> That the plan to provide supervised, small groups of stenographers in offices located close to the members served, and restricted to individual political parties, would be the most effective secretarial system for the House of Commons, and that such a service should include provision for telephone answering, dictation equipment, and allied services.

That confirms the view that many people have expressed that the pool system is antiquated, and that it is desirable now to move to a system for an individual secretarial service close at hand and so arranged that the secretary, when the member is out or when the member is there, can be in a local pool, so to speak, and have facilities for answering the telephone and giving that service as well as acting as a secretary. I think that generally covers the point.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think the committee will be grateful to His Honour the Speaker for the statement he has just given and also for the position as outlined in the survey concerning future secretarial assistance for members of the House of Commons.

There are one or two observations which come to my mind. The first is this. I wonder whether the Speaker would not give consideration to letting the members of the house see the survey from which he has read. I do not mean that it should be a part of the record of Hansard, but I think all hon. members would be interested in getting a copy of the survey. Perhaps it could be mimeographed and circulated, if His Honour thinks that would be proper.

Now let me deal with the other matter to which His Honour referred, namely the meeting which was held by the various groups in order to arrive at a decision that would apply during the non-sessional period. I believe that what the Speaker indicated on the whole is the agreement that was arrived at, but there is one thing as it affects this side of the house which I would like to bring to his attention, and I wonder whether he would give it a little more active consideration. It is this. Following the election of 1957, there was an agreement that the eight members of the former government were entitled, or would be entitled, to a secretary, whom they would take from the offices which they then vacated, the intention being that the secretaries who had been employed in the various departments of the former ministers should be assigned to them in the opposition with a salary to be fixed by the house.

[Mr. Speaker.]

That was confirmed by agreement. It was contained in correspondence between my hon. friend the member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the Prime Minister. That arrangement has been carried out with but one exception. While I am not free to mention names, and it would be my last intention so to do, I think His Honour knows what I have in mind. There is that unfortunate position in so far as we on this side of the house are concerned. I wonder whether the Speaker would be good enough to take another look at that situation, because we feel that here is a person who left permanent employment at a fixed salary and came over with a former privy councillor to the opposition side of the house. Now that person is going to be without employment during the recess unless the Speaker is good enough to see that she is assigned to someone during the recess.

Having said that, there are just one or two other matters that I would ask the Speaker to give consideration to, and they are these. I know—I am sure—that during the course of the recess it is impossible for the Speaker and those responsible with him for this work to find employment for all the secretaries and stenographers who were taken on during the sessional period, but there are some cases which frankly are pretty serious and are of an emergency nature. I have before me here a number of such cases. I would not like to do other than mention them in a very general way because otherwise they could be identified, and I am sure that is the last thing the committee and the Speaker would want me to do in the circumstances. But I would like to bring to his attention the fact that I know of several cases where these stenographers have reached an age where it is not possible for them to find employment during the recess.

Furthermore, I know that all these cases that have been brought to my attention but one are in this position; that if they are not given employment during the recess period they will be in a pitiful position in so far as, first, their children are concerned; second, their mothers are concerned; and, third, their personal livelihood. Having said that, I know I have said enough so that the Speaker realizes what is in my mind.

Knowing, too, the disposition that the Speaker has made in cases such as these, the very sympathetic manner in which he has approached this whole problem from the beginning, I am sure he will want to give it careful consideration. I ask him on behalf of those who have received representations from this side to take another look at this case of the individual who thought she would have permanent employment when she left a government department. Then there are several cases, which unfortunately I cannot identify, of stenographers who will suffer seriously if they are left without employment, particularly when there is no notice given to them that their services are about to end. I understand from the Speaker that there is a 30-day notice in most cases. I know of one case where there has been no such notice, and where it has been indicated that she will have to vacate her position the moment the session is prorogued.

I would draw this final point to the attention of the Speaker. In the United States congress, with which I am sure he is as familiar as most of us, if not more so, the situation is not at all similar to the one here. While I know there are difficulties, it seems to me that no one should be allowed to suffer if that can be avoided. I leave the matter in the hands of the Speaker, content and satisfied that he will want to give it his most careful and sympathetic consideration.

Mr. McIlraith: There is one very brief comment I should like to make arising out of the remarks of the Speaker. I will relieve his mind at once by saying that it is not by way of criticism at all but merely to make a suggestion which I hope will be helpful in dealing with what of necessity is a difficult and delicate problem which must have caused him real concern. It has to do with his statement as to the apportionment of the secretaries among the parties.

There is within that problem a regional problem, and a mere apportionment in the way he described to the committee is capable of being somewhat misleading. Bearing in mind the regional problem that exists in the immediate Ottawa area, and bearing in mind the proportion of members of one party or another within that region at any given time, it could put the balance out of line unless that factor is recognized when arriving at a figure as among the parties. If hon. members will consider the regional representation over the last year, when it has been four to one, they will see how that can distort the results. I put this forward with the intention of it being a helpful suggestion.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of my colleagues I want to express my appreciation for the consideration the Speaker has given to our representations, complaints and requests for adjustments throughout this session. While naturally the Speaker could not always comply with our many requests or correct all our complaints we appreciate everything he has done to try to make our secretarial and staff work as efficient as possible.

I might say before proceeding that I want to support the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier with respect to those members of the staff who find themselves in difficulties at the end of the session as far as employment is concerned, largely on account of age and so on. I listened with interest to the report the Speaker gave with respect to his survey. I was very interested to hear him speak of working toward the objective of each member having his or her own secretary. I think that is very necessary. Indeed, I look forward to the time when each member will have his or her own office and secretary. In my opinion that is the only way we will have efficient functioning of the secretarial activities in this building. I can readily see from the Speaker's report on the survey and his remarks that he has given serious consideration to improving the efficiency of the secretarial work and staff as far as the House of Commons is concerned.

Before I sit down I must express the appreciation of my colleagues for the devoted service of the staff in this building, the protective staff, the public works staff, the secretarial staff and the cleaning staff. I might say that I often meet the ladies of the cleaning staff when I get here about 7.30 in the morning. The hon. member for Ottawa West is accusing me of something of which I could not possibly be guilty. I hear the various complaints of these ladies, and in that respect I suggest that some consideration might be given to changing their hour of arrival, because apparently they have to arrive half an hour or an hour earlier than is necessary to complete their work in the building before the members arrive. I must not forget the nurse who has treated me very satisfactorily on several occasions during the session for minor ailments, and also some of my colleagues as well.

Before leaving that point, I do want to say that we appreciate the work of the Hansard staff, which is particularly trying under these circumstances and has been during the last month. They are kept here for long hours at a type of work that requires concentration and application, which is very tiring indeed. I think we should recognize the good work they do. I remember being told two or three years ago that the Hansard amanuenses do not get any overtime, and that on one occasion the house prorogued at noon on Saturday and they were paid until noon on Saturday, after working until 11 and 12 o'clock several nights prior to prorogation. I hope the Speaker will be more generous in that respect should such a situation arise this session.

Before concluding I do want to suggest that we have to give some consideration to planning our sessions to better advantage. The way our sessions are handled at the present time is most inconvenient for the majority of the members. There may be a few gentlemen of the legal profession who find it more satisfactory, but I do not see why a dozen or so of these gentlemen should influence the handling of the sessions of the house. There are a lot of farmers here and many other people who have to get out and earn their living. I suggest that we should give some consideration to having our sessions commence on October 15, continue until December 15 and adjourn until January 15 with the aim of proroguing around June 15. In that way we could do our work much more efficiently, plan it to better advantage, and leave the summer months for visiting our constituents and things of that sort.

I have one more thought I wish to express before I sit down. We all know the anxiety to conclude this session today. That is one reason I am denying myself the opportunity to speak on a number of things on which I should like to have spoken, as other members are also doing. But I think we could do a great deal toward a better ending for our session if the whips of all parties would get together a month before the end of the session and commence doing then what we have been doing in the last three days. I think that would make for a much more satisfactory conclusion. We would then all know when we would likely be able to leave, and we could make our reservations.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before the Speaker replies I should like to say a word about one precise point made by the hon. member for Laurier. As he indicated I, at Mr. St. Laurent's direction, wrote a letter about this situation to the Prime Minister on the last day he was leader of the opposition. There was one aspect of the letter that may not have been as explicit as it should have been, but that was followed by certain conversations with the Speaker's predecessor and with an official designated by the Prime Minister to deal with the matter.

There was a very clear understanding that the eight secretaries who came here would be not permanent but on the continuing staff, and that treasury board would increase the appropriation temporarily for that purpose and let it run down again as others retired. It would be, I think, very embarrassing—I do not want to use any extravagant language —if any of these eight persons, so long as they give satisfactory service, of course, was prejudiced because they could have had positions in the public service of a continuing nature.

Mr. Speaker: I take it this is probably the only general discussion there will be. I should like to thank hon. members, not only for the kind things they have said, but for the constructive suggestions that they have made. It would be of interest to discuss some of these problems at greater length, but this is not the stage of the session to do so. I am glad hon. members take the opportunity of coming to me with these administrative problems during the session, and I hope most of them can be settled and dealt with in that way. We, unfortunately, have to work within the limits of the estimates which are before us. I appreciate particularly the problems which have been mentioned of the sessional and continuous stenographic staff. I have been personally much concerned about them and I am concerned about them now. I believe hon. members will find the arrangements which are being made satisfactory.

It was, perhaps, an excess of amiability which got us into trouble last year in making the arrangements to which the hon. member has referred for the service of former ministers, of local members, and in meeting the reasonable requirements of the members for assistance during the recess. In this way we got our recess staff 12 above the number which was provided for in the vote. I am hopeful that this problem is a temporary one. The report which has been made, I think, points the way to improvement. I shall be glad to have this report circulated. I am indebted to all hon. members who assisted in the investigation and who wrote letters giving their views. They point clearly to one course, an individual office and an individual stenographer for every member of the house. So far as I am concerned, that is the direction in which we should go and the direction in which I am going in so far as I have to do with it. As I say, we have at this moment to work within the estimates before us and I shall do the best I can within those limits to meet the problems which have been pointed out.

I should like to add a word of appreciation to the staff here. We are well served in this house by our temporary and our permanent staff, sometimes under conditions which we find trying ourselves and I am sure must be even more trying for others. If there are other points to be raised, I shall be glad to consider them.

Mr. Howard: The comments I have to make would more properly come under items 182 and 183, but I understand this is a sort of general discussion period, so I shall make them now. Apparently one of the almost universal questions that is asked, especially by visitors who come here not only from Canada but other countries, relates to the young gentlemen who are our page boys. I have wondered about it for some time, as I am sure other members have. I think it might be most enlightening, certainly to some members of the house and to the general public, if Mr. Speaker were able to relate some of the educational facilities for our staff of young gentlemen who are our page boys, so far as their formal education is concerned.

I would suggest one other thing for consideration of His Honour, if I may. I refer to the difference in salary structure between the protective staff and the messenger staff. If one looks at the items listed in the detailed section of the blue book, one sees that the difference in salary structure ranges somewhere in the neighbourhood of $1,000 a year. I would suggest this might be a matter for consideration, the bringing of the salary structure of the messenger staff more closely in line with that of the protective staff. The question of responsibility is not the one on which we should make a comparison. In so far as work is concerned, the moving about of equipment and things of that nature, the messenger staff performs a prime function in connection with the efficient operation of the house. May I suggest that might be one question taken into consideration, to bring the messenger staff salary structure more closely in line with that of the protective service.

Mr. Speaker: I would just say one word about the page boys. All hon. members know that these young lads who serve us here cannot avoid having their formal education interfered with as a result of the service which they give here for remuneration. I am hopeful that they learn other things here which will stand them in good stead in the future. I have a complete report on our page staff for the present session and I find that all of them are reasonably well advanced in their school year, having regard to their school age, so we are assured to some extent that we are not robbing them of their education. I am afraid that these morning sittings starting in June will have caused some setbacks to some of the boys, but I understand these boys do not intend to continue school in any event.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of legislation, and we shall now take up health and welfare.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

238. Departmental administration, $1,601,785.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, may I start out by suggesting that it would be very kind of opposition members if they were to treat me as kindly as they did Mr. Speaker. Of course, that is probably a little too much to expect. I have a statement, Mr. Chairman, and if hon. members so desire I would be glad to make it on the opening item of the department. I might point out that actually I propose to make a further statement on civil defence when we come to that item. I am in the hands of the committee. If, due to the special situation that seems to prevail today, hon. members do not necessarily wish me to make any remarks on the opening item of this department, I would be pleased to forgo them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I believe the minister has not got a very long statement, and this is a rather important department.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): You should know.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As the minister says, I should know. I think the expenditures involved are so large and so many important matters are involved that some statement should be made.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): As hon. members will note from the blue book, we are budgeting for an expenditure of $1,393,340,528 for the 12-month period ending March 31, 1960. An additional amount of $7,220,817 is provided for civil defence purposes.

Of our over-all expected outlay of roughly $1.4 billion, 94 per cent covers statutory items including $577.6 million to be expended from the old age security fund. Only 6 per cent or $92 million represents items to be voted by parliament.

While our total estimates embody an increase of over $220 million as compared with the past fiscal year, non-statutory items show a decrease for the first time in eight years. Amounting to $1.3 million, this decrease relates chiefly to a reduction in estimated expenditures under the national health grants. I want to emphasize that there has been no reduction—nor is any contemplated—in the funds available to the provinces through the grants. The lower estimate simply represents an appraisal of actual provincial needs during the fiscal year.

The largest increase in expenditures arises from a new statutory item in our estimates, that is, federal payments under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. Running to $160 million, this item represents 72.7 per cent of the total increase in statutory outlays. Other increases in statutory items include: $25 million for family allowances, related primarily to population growth; $22,600,000 for old age security pensions, reflecting the growing number of persons 70 years of age and over; $2,700,000, $2,200,000 and $300,000 for old age assistance, disabled persons allowances and blind persons allowances respectively, reflecting the anticipated increase in persons eligible for benefits under these programs; $8,960,000 for unemployment assistance, related largely to the effects of the removal of the threshold governing federal sharing under this program.

In addition to giving this general outline of our proposed expenditures for the present fiscal year, I might touch on a number of aspects of the department's operations which strike me as particularly significant.

On the health side, there is the hospital insurance plan which has now completed its first full year of operation in five provinces. I know that hon. members will be pleased to learn that this important and complex project is working out extremely well. While certain problems have been encountered, the over-all picture has been one of smooth and orderly development. In fact, as I told the recent biennial meeting of the Canadian Hospital Association, I think it is fair to say that the program has come through its immediate post-natal period with flying colours.

To my mind, what has been achieved in this matter reflects great credit on Canada's health team. In particular I would mention the excellent co-operation that has been extended to us at the federal level by provincial ministers and their officials. This has been a key element in the successful launching of what is probably the most ambitious and far-reaching health measure ever undertaken in Canada.

At the moment, the hospital insurance program covers nearly 12 million Canadians in eight provinces, New Brunswick's plan having commenced on July 1. As I have already announced to the house, we are also ready to sign an agreement with Prince Edward Island but, at its request, this has been put off until July 20. The plan itself is scheduled to go into effect on October 1. In addition, preparations are going ahead in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, and both hope to have plans under way early in 1960.

With respect to costs, I am encouraged by the fact that these have been running about as expected. While final calculations of federal payments for 1958-59 have yet to be made, the pattern of our monthly advances to the provinces has been most favourable, corresponding in large degree to prior estimates. As of March 31, federal advances totalled nearly $55 million as against the estimated figure of $60 million for 1958-59 which appears in the blue book. Since these advances were based on preliminary returns from the provinces, it is likely that final payments will be even closer to our forecast.

Continued progress has also been made in another important federal-provincial health measure. Now in its fourth year of operation, the Salk polio vaccine program has provided protection to nearly 7 million Canadians, both children and adults. Among those covered recently are many members of this house, of the other place, and of the parliamentary staff. In this connection, I should like to express a word of thanks to the doctors in the house for their initiative in setting up and carrying out their own immunization program. My department has, of course, been only too happy to supply the vaccine for this purpose, and I understand that over 900 inoculations have so far been administered.

Turning to the welfare side of the department's operations, the outstanding highlight of the past year was, of course, the completion of the Clark report on "Economic Security for the Aged in the United States and Canada". I am sure all hon. members will agree that it represents a most comprehensive study of the subject. As far as the government is concerned, we consider that Dr. Clark has carried out a very difficult assignment with great distinction, and are gratified at the favourable reception which has been accorded the report throughout the country. At this stage, I can only say that it is being studied closely by the government.

Another development of note is the entry of the province of Quebec into the unemployment assistance program which I announced to the house earlier this month. Under an agreement signed on July 1, Quebec becomes the tenth province to participate in this important social welfare measure. Unemployment assistance has proved of great value in other parts of the country and the dominion government is naturally pleased that the people of Quebec will now be in a position to share in its benefits.

Since this event occurred subsequent to the preparation and tabling of our estimates for the current fiscal period, it may be expected that federal unemployment assistance payments to all ten provinces—including Quebec—will be somewhat in excess of the $20,960,000 figure shown for 1959-60 in the blue book.

I mentioned earlier that I proposed to make a statement on civil defence when the item comes up for consideration.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to express my sincere thanks to the officers and staff of the department. With the passage of time, I am increasingly mindful of what their skill and dedication to duty mean to our very extensive operations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the minister concluded his statement by paying a tribute and expressing his gratitude to the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare. I should like to join him—not that I have any right to do it at the present time except for their collaboration during the period when I was their minister—knowing them as I do, in a tribute to a remarkable group of pubic servants who have made a great contribution in this department both on the health and on the welfare side, and as well as in civil defence.

The minister has suggested that as we were kind to the Speaker who preceded him in the discussion of the latter's estimates—I refer to the discussion of the Speaker's estimates—that he would hope that he would get similar treatment. I can assure the minister that there is no necessary contradiction between kindness and constructive criticism. He can be assured that he will be treated in any event with great fairness.

I want to say to the minister something which I would have said last year if I had been here for the discussion of the estimates of this department, and that is that, as the former minister, I appreciated and I continue to greatly appreciate what I understand from all sides is the generous and fair way in which the minister has treated members of the department, particularly those in my own office.

The minister proposes to make a statement when we come to the civil defence item, and of course I cannot say anything about that at this time except generally to comment on one or two matters which I believe should receive attention. As the minister has pointed out, most of the expenditures in the Department of National Health and Welfare are of an uncontrollable type; that is to say, they are either statutory or they involve services in connection with which there could be no governmental or ministerial interference, certainly in the latter case without causing the greatest hardship and dislocation. In respect of the non-statutory items totalling something in the neighbourhood, I think the minister said, of $92 million, the decrease which he called our attention to arises out of a decrease of around $1 million in the national health grants. This decrease in turn was because the provinces, either collectively or individually, did not require certain assistance which theoretically is open to them under the national health grants vote. The minister has given us the assurance that this did not in any way mean an impairment of the assistance parliament has authorized the federal government to give the provinces to supplement their efforts to maintain the excellent health services which prevail in all of our provinces in varying degrees.

I would be very interested when we come to the particular item to learn exactly in what grant the decrease has taken place. Likewise when we come to that item the minister could possibly give us a more detailed picture of the operation of the health grants which, as he knows, were established, among other reasons, for the purpose of laying down a very necessary foundation for the system of hospital insurance that has now been so successfully undertaken in this country. I am sure the minister with two years of experience now will agree that these grants have greatly assisted the provinces in carrying out work in the field of public health, work that could not fully have been discharged by them but for the assistance that was given to them by the government of the day some 11 or 12 years ago. These grants, which as I say were not necessarily conditional on the establishment of hospital insurance, were a necessary prerequisite to the setting up on a basis of co-operation with the provinces a system of hospital insurance that has now been undertaken so successfully in Canada.

The minister mentioned the Salk polio vaccine of which some 7 million Canadians have now been recipients and who are enjoying the advantage of the discovery of Dr. Salk. If it had not been for the national health program, for the moneys which were available at the will of the federal government, this program would certainly not have been as successful in Canada, and many of the provinces would undoubtedly not have been able to take advantage of the arrangements which were made at the time by the Department of National Health and Welfare. The minister has mentioned that the beneficiaries of this Salk vaccine program are not confined to young children, but that adults may benefit as well. I would be interested at some time during the estimates to know exactly to what extent the federal government participates in the administration of the Salk polio vaccine to adults, and whether the financial sharing formula is the same as prevailed two years ago with respect to young children.

The minister has a research grant under the national health program, and that research grant was able to play its part in the development by Dr. Salk himself of the Salk polio vaccine. I was interested the other night when the estimates of the national research council were being discussed to note that in the annual report of the national research council no reference was made by that body to the participation by the national research council in the assessment and judgment formerly made by the national research council with respect to applications for research projects submitted to the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Am I now to understand that the practice is that with regard to grants made by the federal government through the Department of National Health and Welfare under the national health program for research, the department, in collaboration I presume with outside professional and scientific advisers, makes this decision by itself? Or is it the case that the national research council still participates or collaborates in making awards for research grants to the provincial governments and to the universities and individuals in Canada?

The minister is the administrative head of a department which I am sure will increasingly play a very important part in the development of the health services in our country. It is a matter of the greatest satisfaction to know of the progress that has been made in the development of the hospital insurance program. I need not emphasize my own interest in this program. That must, I take it, be apparent. But I do have a special interest in a program that I know does and I always felt would play a very desirable part in the building up of health services in this country, guaranteeing hospitalization and diagnostic services to many hundreds of thousands of people who would not be able to have these services, at least to the same extent, unless there was a distribution of the cost on an insurance basis shared by a maximum number of the Canadian people. The minister has mentioned that eight provinces are now in the scheme and that we expect on Monday next that an agreement will be signed between Prince Edward Island and the federal government, bringing to a total of nine the number of provinces that will be part of this nation-wide scheme of hospital insurance.

I understand that one of the recent subjects of controversy between the federal government and Prince Edward Island had to do with the question of compulsory coverage. That has now been resolved and I am very happy to join with the minister in noting that the ninth province has come into the scheme. I think this result, now almost universally accepted throughout Canada, is an indication of how groundless the fears were of so many people in this country who said when hospital insurance was proposed that we were embarking on a dangerous adventure in Canada; that we were creating further dangers in a growing, all-powerful state.

The fact that in the province of Ontario within a very short time over 90 per cent of the people willingly subscribed to hospital insurance without any compulsion, and that there is now such a deep satisfaction with respect to this measure all over Canada is, I say, a good indication of how groundless these fears were and how absurd the contentions were on the part particularly of certain great newspapers in this country that alleged this was something that Canada could not afford. They said this was the kind of paternalism or participation by the state in matters that could be well left to the individual.

The great success of this hospital insurance plan will, I am sure, be an indication of what can yet be done to bring further health care in Canada within the reach of a maximum number of our people whether or not they are in a position personally to meet the cost involved in the advantages of scientific and medical progress at the present time.

In this matter I feel there is still great room for further development and for further insurance schemes that will bring not only hospital care but the advantages of the scientific achievements of medical science in our day to a maximum number of our people in co-operation with the provinces.

I would also be interested in hearing from the minister the extent to which provinces not now having committed themselves to the diagnostic services grant under the hospital insurance program for out patients have changed their position. In the province of Ontario I believe there is room for further participation by the government of that province in the financial opportunity for further assistance given under these grants to provinces that are willing to use the moneys that are being made available for diagnostic services for patients outside as well as in hospital. This, as the minister will know, was regarded by some experts in this field, as the first thing that should be done prior even to the setting up of hospital insurance.

I would hope that the participation by the province of Quebec in the unemployment assistance program of the federal government would be an indication of the determination of that province to join with the other provinces of Canada in the participation in this hospital insurance scheme that has now been born and that gives every evidence of the most successful operation. Of course, it is for the province of Quebec itself to decide whether or not it is going to participate. There can be no compulsion on the part of the federal government. Certainly there would be no constitutional justification or opportunity for compulsion on the province of Quebec or any other province. That is a matter the provinces themselves must decide. I have always felt, and I am sure the minister will agree with me, that the closest examination of what the federal proposal means is of such a nature as to be most persuasive in impressing on any province the desirability of participating in this measure. I hope that the minister, consistent with the rights of the province and their constitutional position, will resort to every method at his disposal to try to persuade the province of Quebec to accept this and to make the scheme fully nation wide.

There is nothing more I want to say on the health side at this time. The minister has under his jurisdiction, of course, the responsibility of recommending to the government the broad lines of social welfare policy in Canada on federal account. We have been able, in co-operation with the provinces and in co-operation with private welfare organizations and on our federal account alone to develop in this country a far-reaching scheme of social welfare and social security. In my judgment this has not in any way impaired individual initiative, but recognizes that in this complicated period in which we live certain things cannot be done by individuals alone or by the provinces alone, and that certain great social welfare measures can be achieved only by participation in one form or another by the federal government. We need not take second place to any country in the achievements that we have been able to effect in this country in the field of social welfare. I would hope that the government would share the view held by hon. members of this party that all has not yet been done.

For instance, I believe that sickness insurance—and in that connection there is a resolution in my name on the order paper—represents one of the further fields concerning which we might give consideration. This is a matter which I hope the minister is studying carefully because it is another question closely connected with the health activities of his department.

The minister referred to the fact that the Clark report had been tabled in this house since he last presented his estimates. On this subject I find it necessary to be more critical of the government than I have been in anything I have said up to this moment. It will be recalled that in January of 1957 the Prime Minister announced to the house that the government felt something had to be done to bring within the reach of Canadians the benefits of the United States old age security and survivors program. Much encouragement was given by the Prime Minister before and during the subsequent election in 1958. He gave the impression that the Canadian government was not only going to make certain modifications with respect to existing welfare measures but was going to go further and see to it that this program in the United States was adopted in Canada; giving the impression at that time that the United States program was superior to anything we had in Canada and certainly also giving the impression that whatever merits might attend the existing old age security program in this country it would be well to supplement that program by the system of old age security that prevails in the United States. And so the Prime Minister anticipated this situation when he observed in this house on November 9, 1957:

> We in this government and party intend at the earliest possible date, in addition to the present pension systems, to give full consideration to investigating the insurance system in the United States to the end that we will bring about in Canada a rounded and effective contributory social security system over and above that which already exists.

Two months later he stated:

> I am pointing out that there is a need for early action and I want to see early action in this regard. Consideration of this matter was too long delayed by the former government. We do not intend to have similar delays.

I underline and emphasize the words "early action".

Of course, when he made that statement, the Prime Minister had not taken into consideration that the all-party committee which led to the adoption of the Old Age Security Act had given consideration to this matter. The present Minister of Finance was one of the active members of this committee. The Prime Minister had no doubt that this was a good system. "It must be studied." He wanted it studied quickly. And, then, he emphasized, he wanted early action. Now, we must examine into whether or not we have had early action.

The minister, of course, knows at this time that whatever information has been gathered by competence, skill and research has not revealed basically anything that was not already known to the officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare. If there was any desire to obtain information with regard to this measure prior to the elections of 1958 it could have been obtained without much expense and with little effort from the officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare. In any event, as I said, in 1958, the Prime Minister announced that he had appointed Professor Huson of the University of Western Ontario to undertake the study. Professor Huson could not finish the study within the four months period laid down by the Prime Minister—and, incidentally, that four months corresponded pretty well with the elections of 1958—and so Dr. Clark of the University of British Columbia was appointed. He was appointed to make a quick study, an early study, so that the Prime Minister could bring in early results, as we were told from one end of Canada to another. Well, 13 months after, not four months, Dr. Clark tabled his report and the minister will remember the number of questions that were put to him asking when the report would be tabled. Well, finally, it was tabled in parliament on March 5 of this year.

Once the report was tabled, I asked the minister whether he would not agree that the same urgency from the point of view of time was not exhibited either by him or by the government? Remember the words of the Prime Minister in January of 1958. There must be no delay. The study must be undertaken in four months; the previous government he said had delayed this matter too long. I am not going to delay; we are going to get quick action, he observed. The report is now in the minister's possession. It is a bulky document. It makes no recommendations. I wonder why? Was it suggested to Dr. Clark that he should not make recommendations? Was it thought that if he did make recommendations, these might be embarrassing to the administration, particularly when they now find themselves with heavy government deficits?

In any event, this report has been in the minister's hands for some time. He told me the other day that there is no intention to bring down any legislation at this session. Will there be legislation next session? Has the government abandoned this scheme in the light of the factual presentation made by Dr. Clark? The reference by the minister to the report of Dr. Clark underlines that this is another example of a promise made by the Prime Minister and the members of the government to the people of Canada, a promise that is not being fulfilled, a promise that has been only partially implemented, and implemented only after months had elapsed.

Once the election had taken place there was the supposition, of course, that people would forget all about this; but, unfortunately, people have long memories and they do not forget. There were insistent demands that the report be prepared as early as possible so that parliament and the public could judge whether or not anything further could be done in this field. Nothing is going to be done this session. I am sure that nothing will be done next session. I have great doubts whether it will be done the following session, but I would not be surprised—and perhaps the minister can give us some assurances on this particular—that on the eve of the next election, realizing how—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Such as hospital insurance in 1957.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says "such as hospital insurance in 1957". Hospital insurance was not a pre-election pledge. My hon. friend now has the documents and he knows that hospital insurance introduced by the former government represented hard work on the part of all concerned, provincial and federal officials, and ministers. It represented a sincere desire; it was not a pre-election pledge, and certainly it was never offered in the way in which this United States program was offered.

I say to the minister, a lot of money was spent in the preparation of the Clark report. If there are any advantages to the United States system, this government has the moral responsibility to take steps at the earliest moment to implement the promise made by the Prime Minister. If he does not, this will be one other promise made to capture the support of the Canadian people, a promise made with all of the vigour and the freshness that attended so many other promises but, like all other promises, it will be a promise unfulfilled.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, in view of the spirit of the committee and on such a day as this I am going to make my normally brief comments even briefer than usual today.

I should like first of all to compliment the hon. member who has just taken his seat on two or three matters on which he spoke. I wholeheartedly concur with him in some of these matters and the fact that he has presented his views so clearly today will certainly save me the necessity of repeating them.

Sometimes there is a bit of confusion caused by the two hon. members of the same name. In view of his past distinguished service and of his present very comprehensive criticism of this subject, I might better refer to him as "Doctor" Martin and we can get away from some of the confusion that exists.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Some refer to me as Farmer Martin.

Mr. Harkness: We all have to have our little joke.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I should like to compliment him first on the way in which he presented his case in regard to the great need in this country for and the justifiable expectations of some sort of pension plan similar to what they have in the United States at the present time. I should like to concur in his remarks along that line. I am sure that many of the Canadian people have looked forward to this. I have had the opportunity of travelling across the country from coast to coast in the last couple of years and in many parts of the country I have met with a very strong wish on the part of Canadians that some action will be taken in this field. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that it is far too important a field to be left to just prior to the next election. We have had too much of that in the past. For many years health insurance was promised to the people of Canada. I hope this is one practice that the present government will not pick up from the previous one.

I think, Mr. Chairman, I will confine my comments today to a few remarks about the hospital insurance plan. I should like to stress this particular aspect of it. After a wait of 40 years for the implementation of hospital insurance as the first step toward health insurance in this country, the fact that within one year all the provinces but one have adopted hospital insurance after the federal government took the lead is an excellent example of the need for federal leadership in matters of this kind. The hon. member for Essex East referred to that very point, that the results at the end of one year of the plan show that the many fears that were expressed were in fact groundless. I cannot resist the opportunity to point out that that is exactly what members of this party have said for many, many years. These fears have been demonstrated to be groundless in many other parts of the world and I think that the sooner we proceed the sooner we will find that fears with regard to complete health insurance have no more basis in fact than those expressed with regard to hospital insurance.

I think the federal government should also take the lead in co-operation with the provinces to iron out some of the possible difficulties that may arise from time to time in the implementation of the provincial hospital plans. In the government's position as a sort of co-ordinator for all the provinces I think they can be of terrific assistance in advising the provinces as to what problems may come up from time to time. If the federal government takes the lead in this field I think they can be of considerable assistance to the provinces in carrying out their plans. I think this also points up the need of federal leadership because provincial leadership in this field is definitely not enough.

In the last 14 or 15 years we have had an example of a provincial hospital insurance plan which paved the way toward hospital insurance generally. I think it is very significant that many people whom I have met who have had considerable criticism for other aspects of the Saskatchewan government have been practically universal in their agreement that Saskatchewan today has the best hospital insurance plan in the country. They will also agree that through the implementation of the hospital insurance plan the province of Saskatchewan also enjoys the best hospitals on a per capita basis of any province in this country. I think this is a natural thing that will follow the implementation of hospital insurance.

Before the minister's estimates are finished I should like him to give some indication of when we can expect tuberculosis, mental illnesses and so forth to be included under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. I think he will recall the great number of times that members of the present cabinet have advocated this in the house.

There is one other point I should like to recall to the minister and that is the fact that almost two years have passed since the last increase was made in old age pensions. I think he will also recall that at that time a very definite commitment was made to the old age pensioners that this was merely a temporary matter and that as soon as things got straightened away further consideration was going to be given to this need. I think he will also realize that in these two years the cost of living has crept up considerably and that the need is far greater now than it was when this promise was made to the Canadian people.

In addition, I hope that the department has under consideration the necessary steps to adjust the age limits downward in the face of the situation we have today of more and more people once they reach the age of 50 finding themselves in very difficult circumstances. With the advances in technology, with automation and all the dislocations it causes we have an ever-increasing number of Canadians reaching the age of 60 to 65, being thrown out of employment through no fault of their own and finding it practically impossible to obtain new employment because of their age. One thing that could help this category of people would be the early implementation of a social security plan based on that of the United States because I firmly believe that one of the major reasons why people in this age group are finding it so difficult to obtain employment is the fact that industrial pension plans throughout the country, all in the hands of various private insurance companies, contain clauses barring people after a certain age. That points out all the more clearly the need for the federal government to take the lead in this field.

In view of the circumstances I think that is all I will deal with today. I should like to add once more that I hope the minister will show the zeal in his department that has been shown by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and I hope he will show the industry in his department that has been shown by the Minister of Public Works. This is one of the most important fields of activity in the whole country and I hope that the minister and his department will take the necessary lead.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to congratulate the minister and the government on doing something in connection with civil defence. This is a matter in which I am really interested.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Would the hon. member mind making his remarks on the civil defence item which will come up a little later?

Mr. Regnier: I now have the floor and I am afraid that if I sit down and give it to someone else I will not have a chance again. In any event I will be very brief.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): All right.

The Deputy Chairman: I would advise the hon. member that it was agreed that when we came to item 351 there would be a full discussion of civil defence. Perhaps the hon. member might wish to wait until then?

Mr. Regnier: Yes.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I had intended to touch on the effects of lower and marginal radiation doses. A little less than two years ago the minister announced that some research work was being done by the department into the genetic effects of marginal radiation on humans. I should like to hear his report on that today, and also whether he has any results to report as to the detection of strontium 90 in milk and cereals. Apart from the health effects, I think a fallout of strontium 90 in western Canada could have very bad economic effects for our western farmers. I do not intend to say any more on radiation but I should like the minister to make a report after I am finished.

I should like to refer now to a subject which seems to be contentious in different parts of our country, the fluoridation of water.

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

The salts of fluorine called fluorides are natural constituents of practically all our water supplies. It is never a matter of whether or not the water contains fluorine, it is always a question of whether or not it contains enough. In early childhood it is necessary to have a sufficient intake of the fluorides to make a good hard dentine formation and the good teeth that should be developed.

There is a difference of opinion amongst members of the medical and dental profession as to the quantity of fluorine required to produce a good, hard enamel. It is generally agreed, however, that drinking water should contain not less than one part per million of fluorine in order to obtain this objective. The water of many of our wells in Canada contains considerably more than one part per million, and often as much as two or three parts per million, while the water in the great lakes system from which many of our population centres obtain their water supply contains very much less than one part per million. The point is that caries of the teeth is very prevalent in children who drink water where their source of water supply is the great lakes system and where the fluorine content is lower.

This was very vividly brought home to me some years ago. In my part of the country there is a graded school in which about one-half of the students come from the country and the other half come from an area that is supplied by the Welland water works, and Welland gets its water from the Welland canal shortly after it leaves lake Erie. It was interesting, in examining the teeth of these children to find that those coming from the area supplied by the Welland water works had an incidence of caries practically 70 per cent greater than those who came from the country in which their drinking water was taken from wells where the supply of fluorine was ample.

Caries of the teeth is serious. It is one of the most common chronic diseases. I think it is probably the most common. It has its economic aspects, namely the cost of filling the teeth, which is never satisfactory, and in addition if the enamel is soft we know that the teeth continue to decay and dentures will be required. Then too, the abscess formations which result from caries of the teeth do start many of the degenerating processes in the body to which man is heir. I have seen many conditions such as heart conditions, high blood pressure and joint conditions resembling rheumatism and peripheral pain largely clear up after the removal of infected teeth. Many of these infected teeth have been carried for years and, no doubt, add to chronic ill health and the development of chronic conditions in vital organs which tend to shorten life.

Several municipalities in Ontario have fluoridation. I believe Brantford was the first and I am glad to say that my home town was the second. It was started in my home town in 1952 and already the decrease in the incidence of caries of teeth in children has been cut down by 70 per cent. Unfortunately, in Ontario at the present time, if a municipality votes to have the domestic water fluoridated, it is not allowed by the government of Ontario. In those municipalities already adding fluorine to the water, a few citizens just have to apply to the municipal council and the council is then obliged to submit the question to a vote.

Prior to the vote all kinds of subterfuges are used by the anti-fluoridationists. They put up signs, for example, around the town saying that the water supply is not pure, that it contains rat poison and what not. This has quite an effect on different people living in the town, and particularly those catering to the tourist industry.

In my town, for example, we have been through this and I know that it cost the dentists and physicians in the town money to carry on the campaign. The people voted to continue using fluorine in the water, but I think the question can be brought up again next year if enough people apply to the town. One very important thing was said to me at the time of that vote, and that was that the national health minister had never made a pronouncement on fluorine. Practically all our large universities accept fluorine as being very necessary to prevent caries of the teeth. It is highly endorsed by practically all the American public health associations; the American dental association, the American medical association, and their counterparts in Canada.

The world health organization in Geneva highly recommended fluoridation and Canada, among many other countries, accepted the principle of fluoridation. I realize that matters relating to health come directly under the jurisdiction of the provinces, but this is a matter in which I think our Minister of National Health and Welfare should give leadership. On the occasion of the visit of Her Majesty to Ottawa the Prime Minister announced the establishment of a fund of $1 million for research into the diseases of children. With this I agreed, but it occurred to me how much misery and disease in children the government might prevent by merely spreading knowledge of the techniques already known but not publicized.

I have looked over the press very carefully and can find only one reference the minister ever made to fluoridation. This is contained in a letter written to and published by Mr. William R. Fulton, director of civic affairs, Calgary junior chamber of commerce, in the Calgary Herald of September 30, 1957. I have a copy of this letter here, and I will paraphrase it. The minister goes on to say that he thinks fluoridation is an important landmark in the long quest for control of tooth decay; that tooth decay is an incurable disease and the only real hope lies in its prevention; that fluorine in the amount of 1 to 1.2 parts per million parts of water is harmless and will cut down tooth decay by at least 60 per cent. This is an important matter to the health of the people who drink this water. If the minister believes what he wrote in September, 1957, and I think what he wrote is very strong, why has he kept so quiet about it for a whole year and a half? After all, that statement was put in the press by somebody else to whom the minister had written a letter.

I do not think any member of this house would say that health matters should be political, and yet it seems to me that the minister considers it to be so. Premier Frost of Ontario has not taken any stand on fluoridation except to appoint a commission to inquire into it. The department of health in Ottawa is the senior department in Canada, is a member of the world health organization and has all the very latest information available to it from this world-wide organization. I think Canadians have the right to expect direction from the minister of health. As I said, he has made no official announcement on fluorine, and I hope that it is not because this has not suited Premier Frost politically. I do not think the minister should ever be subservient to any provincial premier in so far as the health of the people is concerned, I would certainly appeal to him to make some pronouncement. Certainly, he has a duty to help our children in Canada, particularly our children living near the great lakes who have a very high incidence of caries of the teeth.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, the best asset that this country has is not the gold in the ground nor the wheat in the bins but it is the people who inherit this fair land of ours. If we see to it that they have informed minds and healthy bodies, tempered with a reasonable amount of religious instruction, I do not think we shall have to worry about the destiny of Canada.

I think it was with this thought of a healthy body in mind that prompted the hon. member for Simcoe East together with other hon. members of this house to follow the medical profession to band together in a house health league to minister to the needs of the other members of this house and staff. I think we would be very remiss in our duties if we did not record our appreciation to these gentlemen, assisted by the efficient nurse on the house staff, for their untiring and great effort on our behalf. I feel that I am not only expressing my own feelings in this regard but those of all the other hon. members of the house.

Mr. Howard: It appears to me that the tendency and effort today is to confine remarks, and to make them brief, something, which is of course easy for me to do and to deal on the first item of particular estimates. While some comments I may have to make will relate to specific items I hope that I may be able to get them in on this first item and that we can rattle through the rest in a sort of machine gun fashion as has been the practice today anyway.

Following the question which I asked of the minister a few days ago I should like to make a few comments about the use and the extremely harmful effects arising from the use of these polyethylene plastic bags that are used quite extensively in the dry cleaning field as covers for clothes and which I understand range in thickness to something less than thousandths of an inch. From reading the newspapers from time to time we all know that these bags unfortunately have caused the death of a number of children both here and in the United States. I have seen the figures of children having been smothered by these polyethylene bags. I have also seen the figures as of the day before yesterday, when another account was given of the death of a child arising out of the same circumstances. Sixty children have suffocated from their use. It is extremely unfortunate that the developers or manufacturers of these particular bags or this particular type of plastic being used for this purpose were not able to foresee the possible detrimental effect they would have. I also read that the industry itself is contemplating a widespread agitational and publicity campaign to bring to the attention of the public, and particularly to that of mothers who have small children, the danger that may result or the harm that could come from the injudicious use of these particular plastic bags.

In this regard I think the Department of National Health and Welfare, not only in so far as polyethylene bags are concerned but as to other items of a similar nature which might be injurious to the health of our people or endanger their lives, should be in a position to take some corrective measures in so far as the use of these bags is concerned. As I understand the situation now, about the extent of the activity of the department in so far as statutory authority is concerned, as was expressed by the minister in answer to my question, was notably one of publicity and hoping to draw to the attention of everybody in the country to be extremely careful in the use of these bags. It is extremely unfortunate that 40, 50 or 60 children—whatever the number is—or even one child should have suffered loss of life because of the use of things such as these. Even if it is necessary to get some broad general powers of inspection or regulation in so far as these items are concerned, I hope the minister will undertake to confer with the justice department and with his own officials in order to see whether in the future the department cannot go more into the field of regulation rather than in the field of publicity after the damage has been done. I hope that even now, with the publicity campaign that I understand is being carried on by the people in the industry itself, will have some effect and that parents of small children will realize the danger that exists in using these bags and allowing them to get into the hands of children. I hope they will take steps to destroy them as soon as they are able to take them off whatever article they cover.

I should also like to mention a few references and comments with regard to the drug industry and the relation between administrators in the food and drugs division and the manufacturers and distributors of the various pharmaceuticals and second with regard to what I consider in many cases to be the unnecessarily high cost of drugs. I believe anyone who has had occasion to have a prescription given to him by a doctor and then has taken that prescription to a pharmacist will agree with this statement. In most cases people have been shocked by the high costs which they may have to pay for certain drugs which are necessary for ailments they may have. It is not uncommon for people to find charges of $10, $15 or $20 for one prescription. This is quite a shock to the patient. In many cases people find themselves in an extremely embarrassing position in not being able to afford to pay that kind of money for some particular drug that is prescribed for them.

I discussed this question with a couple of friends of mine who are medical practitioners. They say that they have not kept track of statistics but they recall a number of occasions on which, when they have prescribed something, the patient has asked them how much it will cost; and that when they gave an estimate of the cost the patient has then said, "Can you not prescribe something cheaper?" An independent survey was made in the city of Toronto. How factual these figures are I could not say. However, it has been indicated to me by a person in the pharmaceutical field that upwards of 30 per cent of the prescriptions written by physicians are not filled because of the high prices. People will go into the drug store and inquire as to the price of the prescription, find that it is unnecessarily high and then say "I do not feel quite that ill; perhaps I will hold off for a while, I just have not the money at the moment". Consequently they do not get the prescription filled and they do not get the drugs which may be of some help and benefit to them.

As to high costs, especially in connection with newly introduced drugs, the argument is used that it is necessary for the manufacturer in the first few months or years of sale and distribution of the drug to attempt to recapture his research costs as quickly as possible because with the advent of new drugs replacing old ones and new names replacing old brand names and so on, he may find that the drug on which he has spent money in connection with research in order to develop it fails with the public because something new has come along. This may be a commendable attitude for the drug manufacturer to take and in keeping with our present understanding of business practices, which operate on a profit. However, I am of the opinion that the prices of some drugs are maintained at an arbitrarily high level long after the research costs have been recaptured by the manufacturer.

There is a group of drugs generally referred to as tetracyclines. The percentage of prescriptions which are written for the tetracycline drugs is a matter of speculation, but I have been told that the United States pharmaceutical industry has estimated that 25 per cent of the total volume of drug sales in the United States involve tetracyclines. So far as Canada is concerned there are five companies who produce and distribute the tetracyclines under different brand names. The five companies are: Leclerle Laboratories, Bristol Laboratories, Pfizer of Canada, E. R. Squibb and Sons and Upjohn Company of Canada. These five companies, because of the uniformity of price and because this price level has been high ever since their introduction on the market, are responsible for some sort of price conspiracy to maintain an arbitrarily high price level. I appreciate that is a question which can be dealt with more appropriately by the combines investigation branch, but I mention it because it is involved in the entire question of drugs.

So far as these brand names which are used by the various companies manufacturing tetracyclines are concerned, this is an indication of the price structure. The price for the manufacture of 16 capsules is uniformly $5.66, and the suggested retail price is $9.44, which represents a 66 per cent difference. I raise this question for two reasons. One is because, as I mentioned earlier, of the total volume of sales of these drugs as indicated by the pharmaceutical industry in the United States; secondly, this particular antibiotic covers a fairly wide range of use and extends to the treatment of quite a large number of ailments. I am sure that any of the hon. members of the house who are medical practitioners would be able to go into more complete detail about the effective use of the various tetracyclines themselves and the type of ailments which they treat.

I would also suggest that there is an arbitrarily high price maintained so far as penicillin is concerned. That is a drug which has also been on the market for quite a number of years. However, as I said that is a question for the combines investigation branch and I only mention it in passing because of its relationship to the administrators of the food and drug division and the industry itself, both the manufacturing and distributing ends of it.

In recent years we have seen, probably in the United States more than in Canada, a pretty wide ranging and I think indiscriminate use of the so-called tranquillizers. Again the United States pharmaceutical industry estimates that the prescription sales which apply to tranquillizers run somewhere in the neighbourhood of 25 per cent. Here in Canada I do not know what the across the counter sales are without prescription, but I have been told that tranquillizers like most other drugs have side effects which were not envisaged when the drug was originally developed. Further, the side effects may develop after a period of use which may change with the individual.

While tranquillizers have been used to quite a great extent in psychiatric work and treatment in mental hospitals, it has been noted with people who use these tranquillizers that they do develop side effects resulting from this use. Some patients might be diagnosed incorrectly by a physician and treated for an ailment which he does not have, and of course that could have very serious consequences to the patient. I am not in any way casting reflections upon the medical profession for not being able properly to diagnose a patient's ailments, but these are opinions expressed by people who have used the drugs, and they have used the classic case of Parkinson's disease, where the continued use of tranquillizers might result in what is called pseudo-Parkinsonism. As one might imagine, that is not a very happy ailment for one to have, and if it is not diagnosed correctly a person may carry on with the indiscriminate use of tranquillizers and find himself in an unfortunate position.

I think as far as this department is concerned steps should be immediately taken so that tranquillizers may be sold only on prescription under the direction of a doctor who is able to regulate the use of the drug and make sure the patient does not get it indiscriminately and possibly develop all sorts of other side effects.

I was going to make some comments about dispensing fees of pharmacists. This is a factor to a degree in the high cost of drugs. To what extent it is a factor it is not possible to say unless one could get hold of a list of dispensing fees established by the various colleges of pharmacy which exist in the country. In many cases the sole function of the pharmacist is just to read the doctor's handwriting and pick up the correct bottle off the shelf and give it to the customer. It does not require now the same degree of proficiency as was required of pharmacists many years ago when they had to mix their own drugs to the prescription of the doctor. This is a field which could bear some investigation.

I am told also that as far as the purchase of drugs is concerned by various governmental departments, there should be a closer check. I suggest that so far as we are able to discover at the moment the Department of Defence Production in its purchases of drugs for the armed forces apparently concentrates on the lowest price quoted for a particular drug. This in terms of quality of drugs could result, and does result in some cases, in the armed forces having purchased for them and having dispensed to them drugs which may be of an inferior quality. I would suggest in this regard that through our own drugs division we might be able to get in touch and establish some liaison with the Department of Defence Production in an attempt to see whether that department will purchase these drugs under the same regulatory control as the Department of National Health and Welfare. I am not suggesting that the drugs are inferior or produced under unclean conditions but some appear not to be produced with the care that goes into the production of others.

Because this is a complex question affecting many, and inasmuch as this is the era of royal commissions which this government delights in appointing, I would suggest that a royal commission be established to deal with the whole field of drugs and pharmaceuticals inquiring into all aspects of research and production and the impact of competition. In other words, the terms of reference should be as broad as possible. I would suggest the appointment to the commission of a highly competent medical practitioner, a pharmacologist, an economist, a lawyer with extensive knowledge in the combines field and a psychiatrist because all these factors are involved in the question.

There are many other subjects one could discuss at this time but they have been dealt with to some extent by those hon. members who have participated in the debate up to this point. In my view the health and welfare of the Canadian people are of prime importance, our most important resource. Every effort should be bent toward preserving, and enhancing the health and welfare of our citizens. Inasmuch as this department is subsidized I hope it will not be accorded the same treatment given to a branch of another department about which we heard today and which some hon. members claimed was subsidized and therefore should be interfered with.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I trust that I will not prove to be a tranquillizer for those on the front benches. I shall be penurious with time and keep my promise in making my remarks as brief as possible. I had prepared a first class speech on the subject but the committee will be denied it in the closing days of the session.

There is a growing concern in Canada, the United States and other countries about fallout. This was the subject of an interesting debate in the British House of Commons recently. I intended to deal with this at some greater length but I shall now leave it for a later occasion.

There is a growing concern in Canada and other countries about a lack of information on the question of fallout and an increasing suspicion that the public are not being told all the facts with respect to the question. From periodicals I have read I know there is a feeling in the United States that the defence department of that country is having some effect on the public being given the information they are seeking in this connection.

To make my remarks brief I shall quote from an article in the July 5, 1959, issue of The Reporter entitled "A Primer on Fallout" which I commend to the attention of all who are interested in the question as being informative and authoritative:

The nation's press gave surprisingly meagre coverage to the second congressional fallout hearings that were held in Washington from May 5 to

May 8. The New York Times, for example, devoted only three inside-page stories to the testimony that was given before Representative Chet Holifield's special subcommittee on radiation of the joint congressional committee on atomic energy; a fourth story headlined "Study Minimizes Fallout Danger" (carried on page 1 and exceeding in length the other three combined) gave details of a reassuring report that was released during the hearings by the atomic energy commission's general advisory committee.

The coverage in most other papers was even poorer than that in the Times. One noteworthy exception, the New York Daily News, carried a concise two-part roundup of the hearings several days after they ended instead of attempting to cover them as "spot news". But in general the press has all but ignored the most complete summary of the fallout situation currently available.

The same applies to the press of Canada with respect to these most important findings and hearings. Another section of the article reads:

Dr. Arthur H. Wolff of the PHS commented on this point as follows:

I think we are generally agreed that strontium-90 as an environmental contaminant certainly deserves the primary attention, because the problem will persist for many years following the cessation of nuclear weapons testing. But I think data collected during the past few years does indicate that some of the shorter-lived isotopes, particularly iodine-131, are not necessarily insignificant—

It is particularly important to look in the young age group . . . Much of the work that has been done in the past has been with adults—

I trust the minister will deal with the question when replying to our remarks because it is important to present and future generations. The people of Canada, the United States and other nations are demanding the truth and the facts with respect to this problem and I trust this government will give the facts to the Canadian people as they are obtained.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, I am happy to answer some of the questions raised during the course of the discussion on the first item. I should like to thank all hon. members who have spoken for their co-operation, advice and assistance. I appreciate that this department is responsible for the expenditure of a large portion of the public money and that careful consideration must be given to the spending of these sums. I fully appreciate the words that have been said.

The member for Essex East was desirous of knowing something about the drop in the health grant. I think it might be pointed out that while the total amount available to the provinces under the 1959-60 health grants program is $62,969,175, it is expected that actual expenditures will not exceed $46 million. An appropriation of this amount only is asked for. However, in order that projects up to the full amount of $62,969,175 may be under commitment, authority must be sought for an amount representing the difference between this gross figure and the $46 million cash appropriation.

The hon. member mentioned Salk vaccine. The vaccine is provided free on a federal-provincial cost-sharing basis. I thank the hon. member for Moose Mountain, who is not in the committee at the moment, but he gave a word of appreciation of the services of the doctors of the house.

The hon. member for Essex East agrees with me or at least, shall I say, I agree with him that hospital insurance is a very important step in the health field in Canada. He asked a question as to whether the Ontario outpatient department of the service was as extensive as in some other provinces. No, I am quite free to admit that it is not but there are indications that this probably will be expanded.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Good.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The hon. member was quite frank as to the approach of the province of Quebec on unemployment assistance. If I may say so, his attitude differed from the attitude of some of the members of his party a year ago when I was putting my estimates through the House of Commons. It seemed at that time that it was completely my responsibility, according to those members; that I should practically be responsible for getting the province of Quebec into unemployment assistance. The hon. member for Essex East said that this is entirely a problem for the province of Quebec, and I quite agree.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What they meant, I think, was that the minister could give public confirmation of his arduous activity in that regard.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Of course; I am always doing that, Mr. Chairman.

I appreciate very much the remarks of the hon. member for Timmins. He was speaking of hospital insurance. I might point out that we do assist the provinces now. Since I have been in this office we have had three or more technical conferences to discuss hospital insurance. We have men in the field practically continuously—they are in the field right now—assisting the provinces and we try to assist them in every respect. I think we are particularly helpful when it comes to hospital design.

I think the hon. member for Welland made some fine remarks. He has had a wide experience in health problems and what the hon. member has to say is certainly worth listening to. He mentioned fluoridation. I think I might refer him to my maiden speech in November, 1953, at which time I pointed out the city of Stratford, my home town, has the best natural supply of fluoride in the water of any community, I believe. There have been extensive experiments and examinations carried on at Brantford, Sarnia and Stratford. I am amazed at one statement he made to the effect that I should ever think of being subservient to any provincial premier. I really did not think he would say that about me.

Mr. McMillan: I did not say that; I said I hoped you were not.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Let me assure him that I am not. However, he also mentioned radiation. I would say that studies have been carried out in conjunction with the national research council to determine the genetically significant dose to the general population resulting from the medical use of X-rays. This project is one phase of the over-all program outlined by the United Nations scientific committee on the effects of atomic radiation and designed to evaluate the various contributions to gonadal dose and therefore the long term genetic effects of radiation exposure. When tabling the report on radiation recently I spoke in the house.

I could say considerably more if required. We are giving it very serious study. We are setting up a total body monitoring unit which will be in use before very long. In the report I tabled some time ago, and in my remarks accompanying the tabling of that report, I pointed out that we are increasing our testing for radiation purposes. I think I can say no more than that we are completely aware of and are examining very carefully the effects of radiation. While I feel that there is no need to panic in respect of this particular matter, we certainly have not lost sight of the fact that it does require very close examination.

The hon. member for Kootenay West was interested in this particular subject and I am sorry that time did not allow him to continue to discuss what had transpired in the British House of Commons. I appreciated the fact that he had discussed this personally with me earlier.

The hon. member for Skeena certainly brought forward some thought-provoking matters for consideration. I quite agree with his thinking on the plastic bag matter. I thank him for bringing it to the attention of the committee today. I feel that, as I said the other day, at the moment the only way we can do very much in this respect is to bring it to public notice, and the fact that he has brought it up here today does contribute to bringing the dangers of this plastic bag situation to public notice. I have also seen in the paper that the association themselves are taking steps to advertise the dangers of this particular article.

As far as the high price of drugs is concerned, I know they are expensive. I have bought a considerable amount in my lifetime. The hon. member himself mentioned that the companies must recover research and development expenses. I think he probably had the idea that maybe the companies continue to collect these development and research expenses longer than is necessarily required. I am not in a position to comment on that. I would suspect, however, that the combines people probably are examining any possibility of a combine in drug prices. I do not think I have anything further to say at the moment, except to agree with the hon. member for Skeena's closing remark that the health of our nation is probably its most important asset. It certainly will be my endeavour, as long as I am in this office, to keep that foremost in my mind.

Mr. Howard: I was called out for a few minutes and I only heard the latter part of the minister's statement with respect to my suggestions and comments. I do not know whether he dealt in his earlier remarks with some of the things I said. I should like him to indicate his thoughts and ideas on the suggestion of the necessity of a royal commission in the drug field in order to ascertain many factors that are unknown at the moment with respect to whether these drug companies are continuing to recoup what they originally classify as research costs beyond a normal period of time and also whether or not there is waste and squandering in research and advertising in an attempt to promote some of the pharmaceuticals that are developed.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, I feel that I must not leave any doubt as to how I stand on this matter. I certainly would not suggest a royal commission in this respect. It think it is an inappropriate undertaking for a royal commission. The hon. member has intimated that some of these research and developments costs may be collected over a longer period of time than necessary. That may be so. I am not in a position to deny such a possibility but I cannot believe that is true of the over-all picture. While some of these drugs appear expensive, I have known of drugs to be particularly expensive when they first came on the market and shortly afterwards, when development and research costs had been partially collected, the drug gradually came down in price. I do not think I could justify the suggestion that a royal commission be appointed.

Mr. Howard: The minister referred to the question of the maintenance of high prices for an unnecessarily long period of time and said that drugs had appeared on the market at high prices and that the price had gradually declined as time went on. Has the minister looked at the matter sufficiently carefully to determine whether the decline in price took place because the product developed was not under patent and other drug manufacturers were able to enter the field, analyse the drug, alter it slightly and reproduce the same thing without becoming involved in research costs to the same extent? Would he be able to say whether it would not be a case of a drug being developed by one company and not being patented and another company entering the field and producing the same thing under another trade name at a lower price, a company which did not do any initial research but merely stole—maybe the industry would look at it that way—or purchased the drug, analysed it and developed a similar product without extensive research costs, thus by competition bringing down the price of the produce? Would that not be the case rather than the company producing the drug having a patent and exclusive rights to market the product with the result that the cost of the product to the consumer would decline as time went on and research costs were recouped?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am afraid I have not examined the situation to the extent that the hon. member has inquired. However, he has raised some very interesting questions and I should like an opportunity to look into the matter.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—

Health services, including assistance to the provinces—

239. Administration, $364,459.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I am rather curious about the matter of fluoridation. I know the minister is in favour of the fluoridation of water supplies. He said so in his maiden speech in 1953.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Have you got it there?

Mr. McMillan: No. The point is that as minister he has never said anything about it. During the campaign in my area it was said that the Department of National Health and Welfare and the minister had never pronounced themselves in favour of it. That is the point I am getting at, not whether he personally is in favour of it. I should like to know whether as minister he will make a statement and let the people know what he thinks of fluoridation.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): While the hon. member did not suggest that I was subservient, that is what I gathered at one stage from his original remarks. I refer him to my maiden speech in 1953. He can send to the library and get it if he wishes. At that time I was rather boastful about the natural qualities of the water of Stratford which does contain fluoride to a most acceptable degree. I think I might point out that Brantford completed 14 years of experience with water fluoridation in June of this year. The study by the department of health in that city was designed for completion this year. The final year's data are now being statistically analysed, but at the close of 13 years of fluoridation the data showed a reduction of 65 to 70 per cent in the prevalence of tooth decay among children born there since fluoridation began. I am simply quoting statistics. Significant reductions were shown even among those who had moved there since it began.

I would say further that largely on the evidence derived from this study the use of water fluoridation has been recommended by the Canadian Dental Association, the Canadian Medical Association and the Canadian Public Health Association.

Item agreed to.

242. To authorize general health grants to the provinces, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory upon the terms and in the amounts detailed in the estimates and under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council including authority, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, to make commitments for the current year not to exceed a total amount of $62,969,175, $46,000,000.

Mr. Cardin: I should like to ask a question on this item. In his opening remarks and in the remarks he made in answer to the hon. member for Essex East the minister referred to the fact that the premier of Quebec had finally decided to permit the people of the province of Quebec to take advantage of the unemployment assistance program.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I did not put it in those words.

Mr. Cardin: I think the minister did say that.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I did not say the premier of Quebec had finally permitted.

Mr. Cardin: Is the province of Quebec not enjoying the benefits of this particular program?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Exactly. They have joined and signed.

Mr. Cardin: Of course we all know that prior to 1957 the premier of Quebec always stated that such legislation was contrary to the principle of provincial autonomy and incompatible with the British North America Act. I wonder whether, in view of the recent visit of the premier of Quebec to Ottawa, although I will admit that the minister cannot and should not try to force the premier of Quebec to enter into any agreement with the federal government—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): You and the hon. member for Essex East had better get together.

Mr. Cardin: We are of exactly the same opinion. We do not believe that the minister should try to force any premier—

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister looking for an argument?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): You started it.

Mr. Chevrier: He will get one if he wants it.

Mr. Cardin: The minister should take advantage of the opportunity, when the premier of Quebec is in the capital, to discuss this very important question with him. I was wondering whether or not the premier may have given any indication as to whether or not he has now decided to permit the people of the province of Quebec to benefit from the great advantages to be derived from the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act which costs the Canadian people, including those in the province of Quebec, some $160 million a year.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The hon. member has taken somewhat the same line as certain members from Quebec took a year ago when my estimates were before the committee concerning the signing of an agreement under the Unemployment Assistance Act which has been achieved. I can only repeat what I said on that occasion, and as the hon. member for Essex East said this afternoon, that this is a matter for the province of Quebec to decide. They are fully aware of the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, and it is up to them to make up their own minds as to whether or not they will come under it.

Mr. Cardin: I think there must be something wrong with the acoustics. I did not in any way suggest to the committee or ask the minister to force or try to coerce the premier of Quebec into entering into an agreement. The point I was seeking to make clear was whether the minister took advantage of the opportunity of the visit of the premier of Quebec to Ottawa to discuss with him, either at that time or any other time, this matter and whether subsequently through correspondence there may be some indication that the premier of Quebec had changed his opinion, as he did in the case of the Unemployment Assistance Act.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I think a year ago now when my estimates were before the house I intimated that there were indications the premier of Quebec at that time was interested in the hospital insurance measure.

Mr. Cardin: How about now?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I think the situation still exists.

Mr. Cardin: More or less?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I think it still exists.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before we leave this item, I think I should intervene briefly on this matter because the minister has been seeking to use my approach to this problem as an argument against what I feel is the meritorious suggestion of the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres. I have said, and of course the member himself has indicated he recognizes that all the constitutional rights of the provinces must be respected in these matters, that there must be no compulsion exercised on any province; we are all agreed on that. What the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres is trying to indicate to the minister is whether the minister has taken, within his constitutional limits, all those steps to persuade the province of Quebec to enter a scheme that obviously is to their advantage, a scheme in which they will share generously in the financial grants which the former Liberal government made available to them.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): After 30 years.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If my hon. friend wants to interject observations that are calculated to make his task a little more difficult, that will be a decision for him to make. Thus far, I have given him no justification to do that.

The Liberal party, which placed hospital insurance on the statute books, regards this measure, as the minister now says, as very beneficial to the people of this country. The hon. member wants to make sure that the minister, and this government, is taking every advantage, within constitutional limits, to bring home to the province of Quebec the desirability of participating in this scheme. The Prime Minister had a 90-minute interview with the premier of Quebec. I do not know what they discussed. Neither the premier of Quebec nor the Prime Minister of Canada take me into their confidence on these matters. I have no way of knowing what they discussed. Can the minister say whether this was one of the matters discussed? Did the minister himself, while the premier of Quebec was here, discuss this matter with him or with any of his ministers?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am very happy to announce right now that I did not discuss the matter with the premier of Quebec.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All right, then. May I ask the minister, whose vigour in these matters is becoming more impressive day by day, if he suggested to the Prime Minister that during the course of this 90-minute interview it would be desirable if he were to ascertain—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —whether the premier of Quebec wanted to insure the health of the people of Quebec through this hospital insurance program; that is the suggestion made by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres. I think it is a reasonable one. If these interventions have no other effect than to cause the Minister of National Health and Welfare to take his holidays this summer in Quebec and take advantage of that holiday to bring home to the premier of this province the desirability of this scheme, then they will be worth while. The hon. gentleman shares the same political views as the premier of Quebec, and if he cannot persuade him of the desirability of this, I do not know who can.

Mr. Howard: In view of the remarks made by the hon. member for Timmins with respect to a national hospital insurance participation plan which would embrace not only doctor and dental coverage but would extend to the question of research in all fields of medicine, and in view of the fact we have had the endorsation of the hon. member for Essex East that this facet of socialism is not to be shunned any longer but is now an acceptable thing—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I never said that, of course.

Mr. Howard: My friend did not say that the socialist principle—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said Liberalism.

Mr. Howard: —was acceptable, but he indicated in his remarks that he was no longer afraid of this type of program. The hon. member for Essex East is very careful in his choice of words, but he did embrace the socialist principle so far as hospital insurance is concerned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are many terms that would be offensive, but I would not want the hon. gentleman to use any word that I would regard, personally, as abhorrent.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps if my hon. friend stuck to agriculture he would get into much less difficulty.

In view of the presentation made by the member for Timmins in suggesting that it is now time for the federal government to provide leadership in the field of an all-inclusive health scheme rather than a hospital insurance scheme, and in view of the fact that within one year of the time the federal government took the initiative we now have eight provinces participating in this scheme, will consideration be given to enlarging this scheme and making it all-inclusive? Can the minister say whether any steps have been taken, in conjunction with the Department of Finance because money would be involved, toward conducting a survey or an investigation into putting such a plan into effect, an all-inclusive health scheme instead of this narrow hospital scheme?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, Mr. Chairman, and I would explain that "no" in this way. When the hospital insurance scheme was introduced in the spring of 1957, and eventually when the provinces began to come into the scheme as of July 1, 1958, I said that this was a big step. I said today in my opening remarks that it is probably the biggest step that has been taken in the health field in Canada.

I am completely convinced that there is only one thing to do at the moment and that is to get the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act operating in such a way that it will be satisfactory across the country. I said also that this act has come into being in a more orderly way, I would think, than we had originally expected. We expected more bottlenecks and more headaches. At the moment my prime concern is to see this act operating as completely to the benefit of the people of Canada as possible. I am afraid I have given no thought to any further extension of the situation at the moment.

Mr. Howard: My friend the hon. member for Essex East and his colleagues, when they were the government, for a period of some 39 years have played on this theme of a national hospital insurance program. Eventually after 39 years they got around to thinking about it.

Mr. Hodgson: They were forced into it by the province of Ontario.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Do not start that argument.

Mr. Howard: I hope the government of which my friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare is a member is not the government of this country for the next 39 years. But in any event I hope it will not take us another 39 years to take the next step and provide some sort of leadership as that which I have suggested.

Mr. Cardiff: I would like to ask the hon. member for Essex East who was the minister of national health and welfare in the last government, why he did not bring in a comprehensive insurance plan in the 22 years he was in power.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should be glad to answer that question. I do not have responsibility at the moment for policy; I wish I had. I can only say that I was not minister for 22 years. But during that time I was minister in a government that brought in family allowance, old age security, old age assistance, pensions for the disabled, pensions for the blind, hospital insurance, veterans insurance and unemployment insurance.

Mr. Fisher: Do not forget the pipe line.

Mr. Cardiff: I might ask the hon. gentleman why that was only in the last 10 years before they went out of office.

Item agreed to.

247. Administration of the Opium and Narcotic Drugs Act, $226,469.

Mr. Howard: This item has to do with the administration of the Opium and Narcotic Drugs Act. This matter is also dealt with to some extent under the Department of Justice, especially in connection with the enforcement agencies and the penalties meted out to people who contravene the laws relating to the possession of and trafficking in narcotics. We have mentioned this matter on a number of occasions. As of recent years, the Minister of Justice has indicated that he is very partial and has been thinking quite seriously about establishing or developing a different approach to the question of narcotic addiction and possession of narcotics.

As to this vote, I assume that the Department of National Health and Welfare would be involved in that sort of study and that sort of investigation which might allow us to move into what I would consider to be a more sensible and more humane approach to people who are addicted to narcotics and with regard to the enforcement of the law and the incarceration of these people in institutions. I wonder whether the minister can give us an indication of the different fields of jurisdiction as between his department and the Department of Justice in this particular field and also an indication as to what his department is doing in order to work in conjunction with the Minister of Justice having regard to the minister's indication of a new approach to narcotic addiction.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The Department of National Health and Welfare supervises the use of narcotics for health purposes. As the Minister of Justice mentioned in answer to the hon. member's question this morning, we are studying this problem together, both departments are co-operating, with a view to coming up with the best possible solution or the best possible assistance.

Welfare branch—
Old age assistance, blind persons and disabled persons allowances—
249. Administration, $114,915.

Mr. Fisher: Under old age assistance I wish to ask the minister about something which I cannot explain very well because I do not know it very well. It is with respect to a problem or two problems of particular persons who were under old age assistance or who were having old age assistance, and who then obtained jobs and there was a hold-up or misunderstanding in their notification to the welfare authorities that they had work. As a consequence payments kept on for a couple of months before they were finally cut off. I understand that in clearing the matter up these people felt that they were prejudiced in the way, let us say, of paying back.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): In the administration of it?

Mr. Fisher: Yes. From the letter I had from the provincial authorities in Toronto I gathered that they tended to agree with those who said there were grievances but that this matter had been put up to the federal authorities and that until the federal authorities changed the regulations there was nothing they could do about the matter. I am sorry to be obliged to give such a woolly explanation but as I say, I have not too much familiarity with the matter.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): My reply will be somewhat woolly also. Incidentally, may I say that I do not agree with the hon. member in his suggestion that his query was woolly. I might say, however, that these cost-sharing pieces of legislation are administered practically 100 per cent by the provinces; and in an old age assistance or disability allowance problem the provincial people make an examination or a study of the situation and we simply come along and are asked for our monetary contribution toward the cost-sharing program. I cannot see where we have been at fault in that we have refused at some stage to allow a certain adjustment to be made and that sort of thing. Actually I would point out that we have called for a conference on September 28 and 29 of all the provinces in respect of these various cost-sharing programs. We hope that out of that conference will come some possibility of better regulations or better understanding of the act so that what we all seek, namely simple justice to the recipients, will eventually transpire.

Item agreed to.

B—Civil defence—

251. Expenses of the civil defence program, $7,220,817.

The Chairman: We will now reconsider items 251 and 303, which were deferred until today. They cover the same subject.

Mr. Fisher: May we have a statement from the minister?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes, Mr. Chairman. I intimated when I started my estimates that I would have a statement to make at this stage. Actually I had rather a comprehensive statement but—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I assist the minister. This is the first statement the minister has made in a long time, particularly since the new arrangement announced by the Prime Minister. There are a number of matters on this important subject, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, that simply have to be discussed; for example, the questions of evacuation and shelter. We have to have some indication from the government about its policy on civil defence. I would hope the minister is in a position to deal with it now.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes, Mr. Chairman, of course I am. I will be very happy to give quite a comprehensive statement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before the minister does that, the Leader of the Opposition makes the suggestion that we might be able to deal with the situation in a manner which will be convenient to the Prime Minister who has at this time other preoccupations. We would have no objection to dealing with item 303 now, provided it is understood, as a result of its overlapping character, that when we discuss the minister's responsibilities we will not be precluded from discussing the implications in vote 303.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, that is satisfactory.

Item stands.

PRIVY COUNCIL

303. Preparatory work, not within the fields of particular departments, on emergency defence measures, $175,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, there was only one question raised and that had to do with the powers under the Defence Production Act. That question was asked by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, and he pointed out that certain of the powers under the Defence Production Act were being allowed to lapse. May I point out that those powers will be lapsing at the end of July and are sections 23 to 31 of the Defence Production Act.

Those particular powers were extraordinary powers, and powers of unusual import. Section 23 provides that any person refusing a contract from the Minister of Defence Production may be ordered to comply, and that any person refusing to comply to a direction would be liable for the loss thereof and for damage thereto. Then section 24 provided that the minister might requisition supplies made by notice in writing, and direct any person who owns or has in his possession or control defence supplies, to have them requisitioned on behalf of Her Majesty. Section 27 says that where the minister is satisfied that a person who has entered into a defence contract has failed or is likely to fail to perform the contract in a businesslike and efficient manner, he may authorize another person to carry on.

Section 28 provides that the governor in council may, by order, direct that a person shall not be bound by any obligation, restriction or limitation imposed on that person by any statute, order, regulation or contract. In other words, these extraordinary powers provided rights and assured authority which was overwhelming in its import, to which of course, when we were in opposition, we took strong objection.

These extraordinary powers will lapse, as I said, at the end of this month because, as has already been pointed out, the government does not intend to continue in days of peace powers which, although properly exercisable in wartime, ought not to be used in days of peace. With regard to what I suggested last evening, I want to say that these powers set out under the Defence Production Act are, in the opinion of the government, not necessary in days of peace and it would be inexcusable to continue them on the statute books beyond the period of their actual existence under the statute.

Hon. members will remember that a period within which these extraordinary powers should continue to exist was asked for on the part of the opposition of that day and accepted by the government of that day. I think the house will generally agree that the step taken in this connection is one that is in keeping with the responsibilities of parliament to ensure that the fundamental rights of the individual shall not be encroached upon by order in council or by parliamentary direction or enactment. We believe that these powers are not necessary any more but that, in the event that the possibility of an emergency arises or in the eventuality of war, the extraordinary powers provided under the War Measures Act are sufficient.

With respect to the plan that I placed before the committee last evening, I do not think there is very much more I can add to that which I have set forth already, except that the use of nuclear weapons is a distinct possibility against the countries of the free world, and while in general free mankind will agree that the possibilities are terrible in their import, governments cannot adopt merely a fatalistic attitude but have a duty incumbent upon them to safeguard the ability of the nation to survive even a nuclear war. All of us realize there are bound to be enormous losses and casualties. The Leader of the Opposition dealt with this matter in general some weeks ago, and in his speech placed before parliament and the country something of the awful potentialities of a nuclear war. What we have tried to do is to plan an organization which will preserve some degree of governmental and economic organization during the initial period of a nuclear war. We have set up through the committee, a special full time working group established in September 1956 under the former government, as we see it, a streamlined and efficient system whereby under a regional structure provincial government organizations will be knit with the military organizations and will thereby assure through decentralization that a national organization will be achieved.

The minister will deal with the question of civil defence. I can simply say that the government has reviewed and revised the organization to deal with civil defence matters and to also avoid a confusion of labour between the federal and provincial organizations in this field. The general nature of the changes proposed were set out in my speech of March 23 and the minister will tell the committee, if required, of the discussions on April 24 between him and other of my colleagues and representatives of the provincial governments.

The provinces expressed no objection to the dominion government proceeding as outlined and thereafter gave their views with respect to the general plan. On May 28 the governor in council approved an order whereby under the Public Service Re-arrangements and Transfer of Duties Act there was a redistribution of civil defence functions, some to national defence, some to national health and welfare and some to the Department of Justice through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, some to the emergency measures organization and the privy council office.

In so far as the emergency measures organization is concerned the redistribution of civil defence duties involved have full regard to the co-ordination of civil defence plans for departments and agencies of the government of Canada. The preparation of civil defence plans in relation to matters that are not the responsibility of any other department or agency of the government of Canada, assistance to provincial governments and municipalities in respect of preparations for civil defence where assistance is not the responsibility of any other department or agency of the government of Canada and finally a general liaison with other countries, with NATO, and with provincial governments on matters relating to civil defence.

The main purpose of the changes and redistribution of civil defence duties was to closely integrate them with the general government organization for war purposes, assigning to national defence those tasks which are akin to operational service tasks; to health and welfare those tasks relating to health, utilization and the welfare of Canadians under war conditions; to the Department of Justice those matters that are essentially police tasks; and to the privy council office those planning and liaison fields of responsibility that are similar to the normal duties of this office.

I believe that in general summarizes the general plans which form the basis of what we hope will achieve on a national scale with provincial and subdivided local organizations a national organization effective for the purposes which I outlined last evening.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I recall, I think almost as vividly as the Prime Minister does, the debate of 1952 on the emergency powers provision of the Defence Production Act. I am not surprised at the decision of the government to let these emergency powers lapse at the end of that five-year period. That will produce a situation in which coercive powers cannot be based on that legislation, if the government desires to use them, and there will have to be some other legislative basis. The Prime Minister has indicated that in the awful contingency he has mentioned, that would be the War Measures Act.

The fact remains, of course, as the Prime Minister pointed out last night and again today that in the contingency of nuclear war extraordinary steps would have to be taken and extraordinary powers would be required. It was never intended under the Defence Production Act that emergency powers would be used except in emergency conditions. I am quite sure that is the attitude of the government now in respect of the plans it is making —and rightly making—for this contingency.

I understand from what the Prime Minister has said that there is nothing of coercion in the plans that are being developed by the government to meet this contingency and that any action to be taken before the War Measures Act could be called into effect or invoked would be voluntary. But I have this to say on that. If those steps ever had to be taken they would be taken in the circumstances of the greatest possible emergency, probably an emergency of a type which we have never had to face in this country before.

There is a difficulty involved in this, one that was very much in the mnd of the previous government when they had these emergency powers under the Defence Production Act. The War Measures Act can only be invoked as a legislative basis for action when there is formal declaration of war or "apprehended war" as I believe the act states. We do not know what form this emergency will take. If it ever descends on us it is difficult to visualize the awful situation that may result. There might indeed be a kind of shadow period between attack, or what seems to be attack, or what might even be a false nuclear attack, and the actual formal declaration of war which would be required on our part, if there were any of us left to declare war. In that shadow period if the government required power for coercive action in the light of the situation that existed, and I am sure it would, the government would have to rely on that clause of the War Measures Act that would permit it to take action in apprehended war until there was a formal declaration of war. That could only be done by order in council. There would however be a gap between the attack or the emergency and the formal declaration of war because it is our constitutional practice, although it is certainly not law, that war can only be declared after parliament has been called and has approved the action of the government.

It is our constitutional practice now, though certainly it is not the law, that war can only be declared after parliament has been called and approved the action of the government; at least, I think it is the accepted constitutional doctrine, though certainly not any part of the law of the constitution, which permits the executive and only the executive to take the formal step. Therefore, it is a very complicated situation in that respect, and I bring these complications to the attention of the government not because I am objecting in any way to the plans they are making. They are essential plans, and it is well to plan in advance, even though we hope the plans will never have to be carried into effect. But if these plans are to be carried into effect, it will have to be done now under the War Measures Act, under that provision of the War Measures Act—and the Prime Minister will correct me if I am wrong; perhaps he has the act before him—which enables the government so to act in a state of war or apprehended war. My colleague from Essex East says it is section 2.

I am not objecting in any way to what the Prime Minister has indicated is necessary, but I am pointing out that there may be steps which will have to be taken, if this awful contingency ever arises, long before we can get together in parliament and take whatever steps are required in connection with a declaration of war, and it might well be that in that shadow period between the loss of peace and a formal declaration of war action by order in council would be required.

I bring these matters to the attention of the Prime Minister and of the government partly as an explanation of the stand we have taken in the past in this party when we thought emergency powers might be required, and partly to assure them that while we do not object to the action which is being planned, there will be perhaps constitutional difficulties against which provision should be made in advance.

This proposal of the government, as I understand it—the Prime Minister will correct me if I am wrong—does not involve a course of action in any respect under which the War Measures Act can be invoked.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of our group the only comment we wanted to make was to welcome these indications that the government is aware of and prepared to move very quickly under provisions which would enable the government to keep going in the event of a real catastrophe. I think my point of view is somewhat conditioned by the fact that any kind of war now is going to be a catastrophe for civil defence in the way other wars have not been in the past. The Leader of the Opposition brought up the question—I think it is an academic question—as to whether parliament could be convened and whether this will leave the government short of powers. This is something on which we can almost take the common sense view of in the light of the kind of war we are going to have. I think the tragedy or catastrophe will be upon us so quickly that there will really be no time even for us to consider the idea of calling parliament.

I have often wondered about that particular point, because anyone reading back in Hansard and back in Canadian history knows that the late Mackenzie King always had the feeling that you could not declare war until parliament was called. I remember at the time many people thought that was a rather doubtful situation; that it was more likely his way of evading certain responsibilities that might have been upon him by the imperial connection at the time.

But the part about the program that is covered by this vote of $175,000, though I do not think any of us wanted particularly to pry into that, what we can worry about is, in the light of the expenditure, that it seems rather small in relation to the gigantic nature of the problem, if we think of the war as a catastrophe in terms that have been explained to the United States congressional committees which seem to indicate that at least 50 per cent of the population, in the event of a full-scale nuclear war, would be knocked out and there would be many dislocations.

I know it seems rather silly to ask for an assurance from the Prime Minister that $175,000 is enough. It does seem like a rather small figure for assuring continuing alertness of organizations at the drop of a hat or a press of the button of an intercontinental ballistic missile, and that they would be ready to go to work.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The point the hon. member makes is obviously a good one, provided that what he says actually represents the situation. The amount that he mentioned is merely one of the items and in respect of the organization as a whole for purposes of security. Those expenditures which will amount to a great deal more than that—and I think it is an understatement when I say that—will be under the head of defence and also in part under the Department of National Health and Welfare. The actual amounts will far exceed, even in the next few months, the actual vote here, but will be expended under other headings so as to assure that degree of security, confidentiality and secrecy of the courses being taken and the actions and constructions that will follow.

In so far as the references made by the Leader of the Opposition are concerned, we concluded that these extraordinary powers under the Defence Production Act ought to be demobilized and that indeed—and I am not going to relive the discussions that took place three years ago—was the stand that we took most strongly. In the light of experience of office we believe that the stand we took was a reasonable one and that the very comprehensive and aggressive powers which have heretofore existed in the Defence Production Act were not in keeping with the parliamentary system of government, or indeed of the concept of freedom which I think is generally accepted without regard to political views or bias.

In so far as the War Measures Act is concerned, the Leader of the Opposition points out—and he is supported in that by the hon. member for Port Arthur—that the day of a declaration of war is past. For generations there were certain courses that were followed. International lawyers set them out in detail, but all of us today have an abiding fear of instant attack launched without notice, the purpose of which will be to attain disorganization, if not immediate victory, by the acceleration of the attack and by concealment of the intent to make the attack. However, in so far as the War Measures Act is concerned, its powers are very wide. I am not going to enter into a legalistic discussion of such powers, but the wording of section 2 is of interest:

> The issue of a proclamation by Her Majesty, or under the authority of the governor in council shall be conclusive evidence that war, invasion, or insurrection, real or apprehended, exists and has existed for any period of time therein stated, and of its continuance, until by the issue of a further proclamation it is declared that the war, invasion or insurrection no longer exists.

When the hon. gentlemen said that henceforth it will be accepted in our country that we are not at war officially without the declaration of parliament I think the experience of the past certainly adds weight to his conclusion. But the fact remains that the executive, the governor in council, will continue to have power to act by a simple declaration under the War Measures Act that a state of danger exists and under that to take the necessary and immediate action which would have to be forthcoming pending, of course, the convening of parliament.

It is to assure that parliament can be convened that in part the emergency organization is set up, for after all none of us, looking into the future, can contemplate parliament in the ordinary sense of the term meeting as we did in this chamber during the darkest days of the last war and in the old chamber prior to its destruction in February of 1916. The powers under the War Measures Act cover every possible eventuality in so far as those measures are concerned which of necessity must be taken without waiting for the convening of parliament and the passing of legislation. That is the reason I say that we felt that the powers under the Defence Production Act were not needed and, indeed, the legislation of an emergent nature passed at successive sessions of parliament from 1949 on was in general based on the decision of the courts to the effect that the executive may at any time declare the existence of an emergency and during that emergency is endowed thereby with powers to act effectively and efficiently without parliament until parliament can give official approbation to the course taken.

Mr. Pearson: May I just ask this question of the Prime Minister. It is a fact, I take it, under the law or will be when that emergency power provision of the Defence Production Act expires that if there is an emergency and if the government wishes to take action in that emergency which requires coercion or compulsion of any kind that could only be done by a declaration of apprehended war by order in council.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not get the question.

Mr. Pearson: I will repeat it. I want to get this matter perfectly clear. I asked the Prime Minister whether it was not a fact that after July 31, when the Defence Production Act emergency power provisions expire, if there is an emergency and if that emergency is of such a character as to require coercive action, compulsive action by the government, that action can be taken only by the government declaring through order in council that a state of apprehended war under the War Measures Act exists.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would not want to give an opinion on that. That is a legal question, one that would require the opinion of the law officers of the crown.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I want to say a brief word on this matter while the Prime Minister is here. I had ministerial responsibility for some of the planning which the Prime Minister observed last night had been prepared when the former government was in office. On this point the Prime Minister said, as found on page 6273 of Hansard:

> As hon. gentlemen opposite who were members of the former government realize, general plans in this connection were considered by the former government and those plans have been considered and advanced in the last two years.

I recognize at once that the leadership given by the office of the privy council in this matter when we were in office is something that one should refer to with gratitude and appreciation. The Prime Minister has stated that the government has decided to allow the lapsing on July 31 of sections 23 to 31 of the Defence Production Act. I would simply point out that this matter, at least potentially, is one of the most important matters parliament will discuss. It is therefore important, I think, that there be some precision both in expression and thought on this matter.

The government takes the responsibility for the lapsing of these pertinent sections in the Defence Production Act. That is a responsibility which the government, after consideration, is prepared to take. As the Prime Minister observed, and he did it in a non-acrimonious way and I am not seeking to reverse that mood, ultimately the renewal of the powers extended was a matter of suggestion by the former opposition and then there was mutual concurrence. The Prime Minister feels, however, that the implications of the War Measures Act, and I take it he had in mind particularly sections 2 and 3, are such as to give the executive the necessary coercive powers to deal with any situation that would arise either from a state of war or pursuant to section 2, as the Leader of the Opposition has observed, from a state that could be characterized by the word "apprehended" which is to be found in section 2 of the act.

The Prime Minister has also indicated in answer to a question by the Leader of the Opposition that the implications of what he said last night involve nothing coercive. It involves voluntary participation by agencies and persons in the country who might, through the Department of Defence Production or the Department of National Defence, be called upon to assist in an operation which is essentially a planning operation. If one could describe the announcement of the Prime Minister last night, it is essentially a planning operation and a very necessary one for the conduct of government in the turbulent stage that would prevail if we ever have an apprehended or actual state of war.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Positive planning and organization.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes—all of which we on this side fully approve. Our main concern last night, certainly the concern of the Leader of the Opposition and myself, was whether or not these powers involved the element of coercion. But it seems to me that the Leader of the Opposition has underlined a situation that is very real and it is only offered for further consideration by the government. That is whether or not in the situation that could prevail before a state of apprehended war it would not be necessary for the executive to resort to certain preparations, the realization and implementation of which could possibly only be effected by the use of powers envisaged at least in principle like those referred to particularly in section 3 of the War Measures Act.

But the government has considered that matter and the opposition will discharge its function at any rate by pointing out this situation to the government. But we do agree that these preparations are necessary. We do agree it is necessary to take steps to put into motion the machinery that would make effective the kind of defence or resistance that Canada would offer in the event of an attack, but this pre-apprehended state is one that I think the government will have to consider in the light of what powers it will have after July 31. As I say, the Prime Minister has said that the government has given careful consideration to that aspect, and we can do no more than point out a situation which can arise.

There is one other point I should like to mention before the Prime Minister leaves, and that is on the general aspect of civil defence. The government has decided to distribute the ministerial functions of civil defence. With the reasoning behind that distribution I have no quarrel, that is to the Department of National Defence, to the Department of National Health and Welfare, to the office of the privy council, to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police through the Minister of Justice. I think one of the dilemmas in all this has been properly referred to in the Ottawa Journal, in an editorial which appeared on June 6 of this year and headed, "Like the Chestnut Tree". It reads:

> Civil defence was formerly the responsibility of the department of health and welfare. Now we are told, it will fall under national defence, health and welfare, justice, and the Prime Minister's office. In effect, this latter makes it an issue to be ruled on by a committee of the cabinet of which Mr. Diefenbaker will be chairman. Whatever may be the reason for the administrative change, the man in the street will fear it as an open door for a monumental mix-up.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that there must be some minister who will be responsible as the first minister in the matter of civil defence. In the cabinet itself, and in the executive relationship with provincial governments, among the ministers who are going to continue to have a responsibility in civil defence, there must be one minister who is, let us say, chairman of all and who will be responsible for seeing to it that consideration is given to the over-all formulation of policy.

When the Prime Minister spoke first he did not deal with this matter—I am not saying this critically—but does he feel that with his responsibilities he is the one to whom should be entrusted the responsibility of co-ordinating these departments?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will answer that immediately and say no; the minister who will be chairman will be the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a definitive answer and I thank the Prime Minister for it.

There is one other aspect of this problem. I understand the Prime Minister's announcement in May or thereabouts suggested that the role of co-ordinator would be undertaken by the office of the privy council. The Prime Minister has indicated that the spokesman, generally speaking, will be the Minister of National Defence. The situation possibly may be a little more complicated because the office of the privy council now has a co-ordinator in the person of a very efficient and capable gentleman. It does seem, unless he is going to be made immediately responsible to the Minister of National Defence or to another minister, his position vis-à-vis the ministers who are heads of departments, is going to be a very difficult one. I would hope the Prime Minister would associate with the reply he has already given, not only that the Minister of National Defence will be the spokesman of and responsibility for policy but would he indicate which minister will be responsible for the work undertaken by the privy council, particularly through Mr. Currie for whom I have the highest regard and whose competence I am not for one moment seeking to belittle. I say it is putting the other ministers in a difficult position, vis-à-vis a public servant. Would the Prime Minister clarify that as well?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as the privy council is concerned, of course, the Prime Minister occupies a position in charge of the privy council. I foresee none of the difficulties mentioned by the hon. gentleman. You will always find these dislocations taking place in the building up of an organization. If in the light of experience the wisdom of the hon. gentleman and the observations he has made make changes necessary, those changes will be effected in the interests of the assurance of the maximum efficiency of the organization set up.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): So far as we are concerned, if the Prime Minister wants to stay and learn something about civil defence he is welcome, but I do not think we are going to insist that he should remain.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is a great spirit here, Mr. Chairman, when the hon. gentleman grants leave to me to absent myself from further discussion on the estimates that come under the authority of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

B—Civil Defence—

251. Expenses of the civil defence program, $7,220,817.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I do not propose to make any extensive statement on the item of civil defence. The Prime Minister has covered the transition from the situation as it has existed to what we propose to do. One year ago, when my estimates were before the committee it will be recalled that General Graham was in the midst of making his survey. The ultimate setting up of a cabinet committee resulted in the Prime Minister's announcement of March 23 in the house, and then this was followed by discussion with the provinces on April 24, at which time they showed complete agreement, most enthusiastic agreement, with our suggestions. Eventually, order in council 1959/656, which was tabled next day, gave instrumentation to these suggestions. It has been proposed now that we hold a further discussion with the provinces in a meeting to be held early in October, at which time the conclusion of these arrangements which we have entered into and the outcome of the committee will show us, we hope, just what further steps should be taken and how we may further co-ordinate the whole civil defence effort.

I should like, however, to make a brief reference to a subject upon which I have been queried in the house by the hon. member for Essex East and which I know is uppermost in everybody's mind. I refer to shelter and evacuation. I would point out, very briefly, that for something in the neighbourhood of five years, that is from about 1948 to 1953 or thereabouts, the scale of probable attack was assumed to be an atomic bomb of 20 to 100 kilotons. This is equivalent to 20,000 to 100,000 tons of TNT. At this stage there was little or no thought of evacuation of the target area population and little stress was placed on the organization of reception areas for those who may leave the larger urban centres.

I think I might point out that the advent of the H-bomb made necessary a drastic revision of this phase of civil defence policy. From about 1953 on, the emphasis began to shift from static defence, where people stayed put to mobile defence, involving the large scale dispersal or evacuation of our urban populations. Moreover, the greatly increased destructive power of the thermonuclear bomb —ranging in size from 1 megaton to 20 megatons, the equivalent of 1 million tons to 20 million tons of TNT—meant that a single bomb, properly placed, could almost completely wipe out any but the largest of our urban target areas.

These greatly increased areas of destruction, together with the newly discovered realization of the great dangers over large areas of radioactive fallout, meant that it was no longer realistic to assume that the population of the average city could survive the blast by taking shelter, and then emerge with its resources and facilities substantially intact to undertake its own rescue and rehabilitation work. Civil defence began to emphasize that distance is the best defence against the H-bomb; and planning for the rapid and orderly evacuation of large urban populations in the event of emergency began to feature the civil defence policies of most of the western democratic countries.

But, Mr. Chairman, times of course are changing. As military science advances we move from the era of the H-bomb and the manned intercontinental bomber to that of the intercontinental ballistic missile equipped with a nuclear warhead. Increasingly in the future we shall be unable to count on any advance warning time. Moreover, the over-all need for the adequate provision of relatively light and inexpensive shelters, if only for shielding from widespread radioactive fallout, emerges as an increasingly urgent problem. While the cost of providing heavy anti-blast shelters on any large scale continues to appear prohibitive, recent United States studies, notably that of the Rand Corporation, and the testimony recently given before the Hollifield committee of the U.S. congress, point to the feasibility of developing light and resonably effective shelters, particularly against fallout, at cost magnitudes considerably less frightening than the estimates previously given. Recent studies have been made by our own defence research board which seem to point to the same conclusions.

All these materials and reports are now being carefully studied and reviewed, and while it would not be wise or proper to hasten unduly the work of the committee which has been established to study and report upon this question, I believe that within the next few months we will be in a position to discuss with provincial authorities some proposals for establishing an appropriate balance between evacuation and shelter, particularly shelter against fallout.

There is one brief word I should like to say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman. As you know, civil defence in essence means preparedness to meet disaster from whatever quarter it may come. While our civil defence preparations are designed primarily to provide protection for our civilian population in the event of war, they really serve a dual purpose. Communities and individuals who are prepared and trained in civil defence are ready to play their part in other forms of disaster as well. Nothing could possibly have illustrated this more graphically than the disaster which struck the town of Lanark on June 15th last. In that disaster trained civil defence workers from our civil defence headquarters at Arnprior did credit to themselves and to the service they represent, and I should like to conclude by reading this brief letter received by the college commandant, which pays a well deserved tribute to the work they did in Lanark. It is addressed to Major General M. H. S. Penhale and reads as follows:

> I have just returned from unfortunate Lanark where the scene of devastation is, as you are well aware, one that till now at least we have comparatively seldom been called upon to face up to in this country.
> While talking to old friends in the village—some had lost all they possessed—I particularly noted their unanimous and unsolicited praise for the work done by the civil defence college group that appeared so promptly on the scene. I gathered that this group, among other accomplishments, gave the shattered inhabitants a feeling that amongst disaster a foundation was being established for them from which to hold on to reality again.
>
> As a rule, I am not a letter writer, but the reaction of these people was so favourable to the work of your organization that I thought that perhaps you, your staff and students might be interested in receiving these comments from a disinterested source when all too frequently your efforts are apparently received with apathy by the public.
>
> Yours very truly

> Ewan R. Caldwell

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope the minister will not resent my saying that this has indeed been a most disappointing statement if this is all that the minister intends to say on the matter of civil defence.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): May I interrupt one moment, Mr. Chairman, before the hon. member goes on further in this particular vein. I did have quite a lengthy statement prepared. But here again, as I expressed myself when my first item of estimates was before the committee I felt that the special circumstances of the situation that exist today call for me to abbreviate my statement somewhat. If there are any questions to be asked I should be glad to answer them and to give a detailed answer in every respect.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Notwithstanding the qualification made by the minister I must say that I think that what he has said so far is extremely disappointing. I was about to observe that it may be that the division of responsibility in four departments of government and the fact that the Minister of National Defence will be the spokesman in the matter of civil defence puts the minister in a rather difficult position. He spoke of shelters and he spoke of some of the achievements of the civil defence college. But not a word was said about evacuation; not a word was said about whether there is to be a co-ordinator in his own department; not a word was said about his own concept of the role of the army or about the extent of the participation by the province. It is true that a reference was made to the necessity of individual citizen participation but there was no indication of where the army would step in whether it would continue to have an over-all authority, whether the civil power would have the over-all authority over the armed forces or whether the situation is as I now believe it to be—although the minister did not indicate it—that in stricken areas the primary responsibility will be that of the army with power to call on the welfare services, hospital services and the like.

All these things are matters which are essential to an understanding of the details of the kind of policy announced by the Prime Minister in May and referred to by him a few moments ago in the adjustments that he made. This government has been in office now for two years. I fully appreciate the difficulty of the problem. It is an extremely difficult one. No matter who is in charge, will not be able to meet all the suggestions that are made as to what should be done in the matter of civil defence.

I know the difficulty of the government and the difficulties of the minister and his colleagues who will be involved in this matter. We are living at a time when we are spending on a national defence something less than $2 billion. We all realize that in the event of war—something that we all hope will not eventuate, but nevertheless having in mind what General Norstad talked about the other day, namely the possibility of mistake—we must think of the effect of this on the civilian population.

Are we now decided that we must take an awful risk? Are we to take the position that nothing really can be done? Are we to abandon the possibilities of evacuation because of the new phase that we are now in as compared with the situation which prevailed in 1953? I would have been happy to know exactly what is going to be the role of the army. I would like to know what would be the relation of the army to the civil power. At the present time the primary authority rests with the civil power who may under the Militia Act call upon the use of the armed forces which could be, through a departmental arrangement, put at the disposal of the civil defence authorities.

These are questions which parliament certainly has not been informed about. The provinces may have been told about them, but we certainly were given no indication of what went on at the meeting with the provinces a month ago. There is to be a meeting in October, and that will follow the transfer of ministerial responsibilities on September 1. What is going to be discussed at that meeting? I believe that it would have been advisable for the government to give to the public at once, or at least at the earliest possible moment, the report which was made by General Graham. The minister at one time indicated, I thought, that he would make that report available, and then he took the position later that it was a privileged document, prepared while General Graham was still serving in some capacity in the government service, and on that account it was not in the public interest to make it known.

There are exceptions to privileged documents, and if General Graham, who had made a tour throughout the country and talked to civil defence people and examined the situation from every angle, had positive views, those views contained in that report should have been made available to this parliament. If the government persisted in not making it available, then I think the minister at some time earlier in the session should have given us the broad outlines of the government's reaction to the recommendations contained in that report. The minister was invited by me on at least four occasions during this session to give a statement to the house on civil defence, but I was reminded every time by the minister that that would be done in due course. I think his favourite phrase was, "High priority is being given to these things." I am sure he will agree with me that "high priority" did not mean high information, and the result is that we do not know tonight any more than we did a year and a half ago what the government's policy in the matter of civil defence is.

We do know that there is going to be a new distribution of functions. We do know there is going to be one minister who will have the responsibility of announcing policy and of playing the role of co-ordination; but beyond that I submit to the minister, with respect and with understanding of his difficulties, that whoever is to blame we are no further advanced as to what the government policy is in civil defence matters. We know that the government will pay a little more to the municipalities, but I am not talking about that. I am talking about the kind of attitude the government takes about the importance of civil defence.

What steps can be taken to protect the individual in the face not only of the manned interceptor but the I.C.B.M. and the like? What can be done to mitigate the dangers of radiation? The minister spoke of shelters and that these are now within the economic reach of the average citizen. I point out to him that there are studies in his department which will show that this was available two years ago. They show that shelters could be built at an economic level which would not be burdensome on a great number of individuals in Canada. Now the minister says that a further study is being made of this phase of the problem.

In the state of New York they have arrived at a decision on this matter. The governor of New York has a definite view as to what can be done by way of individual shelters, and I do not know how valuable this further study is going to be. If the minister feels in the light of his special knowledge that there must be further study made about the uses of private shelters, one cannot quarrel with him; but if there is going to be a study as to the feasibility and economical circumstances attending shelters, what is the government's policy? Is it going to build shelters? Is it going to make these available to the public in certain concentrated areas, or are individuals expected to build these shelters themselves? Is there going to be any requirement made by the government as to shelters in public buildings? Is there going to be any suggestion made to the provinces that in respect of matters coming within their constitutional competence they should take steps to see to it that shelters are provided, perhaps even as a matter of compulsion as is thought of in New York?

These are the kind of matters that the minister has not spoken about to the house. I know he will find it very difficult to give a comprehensive statement tonight because of the great and absorbing interest of all members in this subject at the present time. I fully realize that, but I can say to the minister that if that is the situation it is because the government did not take advantage early in this session of announcing its new look in the matter of civil defence. I hope the minister will not take amiss what I say. I do not blame him entirely for this, but because he is the minister of the moment who is shouldered now with the responsibility in so far as his estimates are concerned, I do not know to whom else I can throw my dart.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, it was my understanding that an agreement had been reached by all parties of the committee on the date of prorogation, and the time. Every member in this committee has the right to speak as often and as long as he wants, and in view of the fact that apparently we are now a long way behind our schedule—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Winch: Yes we are—I would like to suggest that if there are party members who feel they have so many things on their chests which they have to get off, then I would like to ask if perhaps now is not the time to set a new target date unless those who reached the agreement abide by it.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I cannot let the opportunity go by without speaking on the matter of civil defence. The point I am interested in is human survival. I have been listening to the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and I have had a lot of satisfaction in the knowledge that they have been thinking about this problem. According to the Prime Minister's statement we have at least one shelter, and that is the government. But I am a bit surprised by the hon. member for Essex East in the way he talks now about action, shelters and so on, when on August 31, 1955 government experts were here in Canada, one coming from NATO, and a Dr. Alvin Groves from Nevada, and others, when they pointed out to the government of that day that the time to act was now, and now was August 31, 1955. However, when they left office they had done nothing at all.

I am also delighted that the minister talked about shelters and not about evacuation. I do not believe in evacuation, because there will not be time for it. I still remember the occasion of a terrible snow storm in Winnipeg on November 18, 1958 when schools were closed and funerals were cancelled. Where could we have gone that day if an attack had come? There was no way of leaving Winnipeg.

I have in my hand a map of the city of Winnipeg and surrounding district taken from the Winnipeg telephone book. The map outlines civil defence rules and illustrates points of evacuation for each area. The people of the municipality of St. Vital, a community of over 20,000 persons, are directed to go to St. Pierre where there are not more than about 200 homes. How could 20,000 people be accommodated there? This community is approximately 35 to 40 miles away which would not be far enough and is east of Winnipeg, the direction of the prevailing winds.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Following the testing of a nuclear bomb in 1954 it was stated by an eminent professor that radiation contamination would extend 200 miles distant from the central point which would cover an area 20 miles wide. It would be impossible to escape a bomb. A shelter on the site of a dwelling is required. We do not know where the bombs will fall. If you were in a shelter 10 or 15 miles from the point at which the bomb fell you might be safe.

I believe we should encourage every Canadian householder to have his own shelter, and these should be not too expensive. They should be suitable for use in civilian life to store preserves or canned goods or for use as a root house. We may have to live in such shelters for a few days in the event of attack.

Russia may attack in winter. It must be remembered that Russia won the battle of 1812 in large part because of cold weather. Perhaps Hitler's defeat by Russia was due more to cold weather than to Russian arms because frozen soldiers are not capable of fighting with success.

Notwithstanding the great advances made in civil defence I feel a certain degree of apprehension about the situation in the country. Canada should follow the plan adopted by Sweden. That country has spent more than $200 million on shelters and civil defence. Every person in Sweden knows where he is to go in the event of war and even knows the house in which he will be billeted. Civil defence training is compulsory in that country. In view of the danger that is facing us we should resort almost to conscription in order to defend ourselves.

I have received a letter drawing to my attention an article of some interest on this subject entitled "Washington through Canadian Eyes" and bearing date July 7, 1959. It reads, in part, as follows:

> In case you missed it, a congressional committee has unveiled the gruesome details of what a nuclear attack on the United States would mean: 50 million or more dead, fire storms such as the world has never seen, 20 million seriously injured, most cities reduced to rubble, etc., ad nauseum.
>
> But interesting for Canada is the fallout pattern from the southeastern corner of British Columbia, also probably catching Calgary, roaring over the Niagara peninsula and cutting through the industrial heart of Canada, through Windsor, Hamilton, Toronto, hitting Montreal and much of Quebec and swooshing through New Brunswick. Canadian cities close to the United States border, like Windsor, would likely be destroyed.
>
> Presumably the North American air defence would be able to shoot down some of the vehicles (manned bombers or ICBM's) carrying the nuclear bombs, thus having them descend on Canadian cities and towns with unpleasant results for us.
> The one clear point made during the hearing: civil defence measures could save millions of Canadian lives. The human race is not going to be wiped out by a nuclear war, and if there are enough bomb shelters and other civil defence equipment available, several million Canadians might be saved from nuclear death. Public apathy caused by the overwhelming enormity of the concept of nuclear war is the greatest obstacle to overcome.

I agree with that statement. Public apathy is indeed the greatest obstacle to overcome and I might say parliamentary apathy must also be overcome. I have not heard a worthwhile speech from members of the Liberal party or the C.C.F. group on this subject. We must realize the danger confronting us and acquaint the public with the full facts of the situation. The Canadian people require leadership. We must bring home to the people the seriousness of the situation. The money spent on civil defence would then be willingly contributed to by the taxpayers.

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to come in at this time but for some months I have had some comments prepared relating to these estimates and I shall detain the committee as briefly as possible.

In rising to speak on the civil defence items in the 1959-60 estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, I want to compliment the Minister on the progress he has been making since civil defence has been assigned to him and, in particular, on the co-operation he has been able to receive from the provincial governments. Much of this is due, I feel, to the minister's practice of taking provinces into partnership by calling them in for conferences with him. He has had conferences with the provincial civil defence ministers last October and again in April this year, the first time the provinces have been called in to Ottawa on civil defence problems since 1954. My understanding is that a third conference, when the new reorganization is complete, is scheduled for this autumn in a continuation of this general policy of achieving a thorough understanding with our provincial partners.

In reading over the new proposals I note with particular interest that one of the existing peacetime emergency services which the army would direct in such damaged areas where they are commanding re-entry operations is the provincial and municipal fire services. This is of particular interest to me as only a few weeks ago I was at the head table of the annual banquet of the firefighters' union in the province of Ontario which was held in my riding's largest city, Kitchener. I am very proud of the fact that my county of Waterloo has long been one of the leaders in civil defence and particularly in fire civil defence. My home county of Waterloo, which comprises three cities and Preston, was the first county in all of Canada where the fire departments in the entire county are united in one shortwave radio network where the dominant city's fire department can sound the sirens and call out the firefighters in every municipality in the entire county by using their shortwave radio network system, and so unite all the fire departments in any fire emergency to work under one unified radio command. Seventeen fire departments with over 400 firefighters are organized in this Waterloo county mutual fire aid plan. It is so well developed, under the leadership of Fire Chief Kenneth Putnam of Kitchener, who is also this year's president of the CAFC, that they have their own county fire training grounds and an active educational and social organization that meets monthly.

The co-operation that civil defence has received from the county of Waterloo is typical of the co-operation the minister receives from the Ontario government which has developed the largest civil defence organization in any province in Canada.

Let me summarize my views on the reorganization of civil defence as announced in this house a few weeks ago by the Prime Minister, and followed by the recently published civil defence order of 1959, namely 656. I think the new proposal makes sense. Under this Canada should look forward to a sensible and realistic organization of our people to meet an emergency we all hope we will never have to face.

Mr. Peters: I should like to say a few words on this matter as I think it is a very important subject. I was surprised that the minister did not ask for permission to table the full text of his presentation because I think it is very important that we do know exactly where we are going in this matter of civil defence and of the change that has been made in it. I was also surprised to note he said that before 1953 the attitude was against evacuation and now it is toward evacuation. I should like to ask him how he thinks we are going to evacuate even a city the size of Ottawa when we cannot even get the traffic out of the city for several hours at rush hour periods? Therefore, evacuation seems to me to be an impossible situation. I think the civil defence department should work from the knowledge that we cannot evacuate a major city. If anybody doubts that all he needs to do is to go down to Wellington street at 5.30 at night and see for himself or go to Yonge street in Toronto at 5.30 at night and have a look at the situation. I think it is a physical impossibility to evacuate. These are people who are walking out of their offices and getting into cars. Just imagine what would happen if some woman wants to take a budgie bird or someone else wants to take a goldfish, or bedding and other personal belongings. Evacuation is an impossibility, I think.

Civil defence may have worked all right. There has been a great deal of credit given to the leadership that has been supplied at Arnprior in the civil defence school. I know many of the people who have taken the courses and they have been very impressed with the training that they received. The government has failed to give leadership in deciding what civil defence itself is going to do. I know many important people in communities in my area who have volunteered to assist in civil defence and have been very disillusioned and dissatisfied with the opportunities they get for doing anything that is constructive or anything that appears to them to be worth while. Though they are willing to give up their time on a voluntary basis, they are very often, in a very short time, disillusioned with the orders and the multitude of directions and instructions that come from all sorts of places, and they are never sure just who runs it, who is responsible for it and where it is going. Under the system that has been devised and outlined tonight I think they are going to be even more confused because the heads of the various departments from whom they are going to take direction are going to be divided again into a number of departments.

This civil defence matter is much more important to the Canadian people than the defence department itself will be or could be. In case of an attack Canada is not going to be defended. We should face the fact that we cannot defend. If we do this, then we have to face the fact that we should try to do something to help the poor people who are going to be left in what many consider to be a defenceless position. This is going to take a good deal of study if we are to save even that half of the population that the hon. member for Port Arthur said may exist after a bomb is dropped and the radiation has finally settled.

The department should look very closely at some of the other agencies that have been very active and very helpful in cases of disaster. I am referring particularly to the experience that was gained in the city of Toronto at the time of hurricane Hazel. They found there that the civil defence organization, although it was very young, was of very little use. They found that the army was of absolutely no use at all. The other services were in the same category, no use; but they did find that two organizations which were not expected to be involved were of a great deal of value. One of them was the Bell Telephone Company and the other was Hydro. Without going into the details, the officials who were connected with civil defence at that time pointed out that they were operated in such a way that there was an individual responsible for a unit. They could move the unit around themselves; whereas the army was a unit to start with and it was very hard to break it down and to delegate responsibility; once an order was given, then that order was carried out and that was that. But with these other organizations that are built up on a truck unit or a very small unit basis, they could expand into a very large group under the authority of the person responsible for the original unit.

This matter should be given very close consideration. The minister should put out a direction. If he cannot do it by tabling the brief that he had prepared, then he should make available the much more comprehensive document that has already appeared on this subject, so that again the people in the small communities, the leadership that is being given from the civic point of view, will again be enticed into the civil defence organzation and be again in a position where they wll be of some help in this organization and continue to do the work that is going to be absolutely necesary if civil defence is going to be of any success at all.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The committee will now take up the estimates of the Department of Finance.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

General administration—

106. Departmental administration, $2,461,599.

Mr. McMillan: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, I think there is no occasion for any statement on the part of the minister. All questions pertaining to matters of policy related to the Department of Finance, I think, have been discussed during the course of this present session on many occasions; indeed to the point where I think they are—

Mr. Chevrier: Threadbare.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): "Threadbare" is the word. I said that on a previous occasion, Mr. Chairman. Therefore, I will simply content myself with the observation that I am asking the committee to approve estimates of this department totalling $1,261,434,605 in the main estimates and $5,155,000 in the supplementary estimates.

Of this amount the overwhelming bulk is, of course, of a statutory nature, namely $1,172,264,701.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the minister that we have discussed a good many of these items within this fiscal year in one way or another, and certainly I can assure the committee that I want to be brief and I have not the heart tonight to excite the minister to give us another three-hour talk.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You could not even pay me to do it tonight.

Mr. Chevrier: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. McMillan: I just want to say a very few words. I always come back to the conversion loan. At the time of the conversion loan I predicted that the taxgatherer would be around for a generation. The estimates of the Department of Finance are the first evidence that we have had that that is so in connection with federal government spending. There is an increase of $106 million to service the national debt this year and this is bound to be followed next year by another large increase not only because of the increase in debt alone but because of the increase in the cost of money to the government.

The minister has referred to the different talks I have given as doom and gloom, and tonight the references I make to my previous statements will be brief. I will quote some of the minister's statements and I am sure he can take no objection to them as they are quite optimistic.

I want to refer briefly to the conversion loan. Whether or not the government likes it, I think that loan has been responsible largely for shaping the monetary policy of the government since that time. We all know about the conversion loan. I will not pretend to deal with it except to say that I have one vivid recollection of a $10,000 bond being converted and costing the taxpayers of Canada $350 including, of course, $51 in accrued interest to change this one 3 per cent bond to a 4½ per cent bond. We know that at the time $6.4 billion of victory bonds were to be converted into two short term bonds and two long term bonds, but in spite of the greater inducement only a little over half of these bonds were converted into long term bonds and slightly under half into short term bonds. I think some of the short term bonds will embarrass the government in many cases more than if the conversion loan had never taken place.

We all know about the cost of the conversion loan. I made some predictions at that time and I should like to quote one from Hansard:

> Dominion government bonds are the senior security and they set the pattern for other bonds. Certainly our provinces, our counties and our municipalities will have to pay a higher interest rate than formerly for their borrowings for roads, schools and other services.

We all know that interest rates have gone up for the provinces and the municipalities. What did the minister say at that time? He made a long speech on September 4. I have five quotations here but I will just give two of them. As found on page 4598 of Hansard he said:

> As to the provinces and municipalities, in their borrowing operations they will derive the full benefit from these constructive results of the Canada conversion loan.

Again, on the same day he said as found on page 4593 of Hansard:

> Mr. Chairman, I am thankful to say that we have stabilized the Canadian bond market.

I know that the minister made a good many predictions on that day. I think I counted some 20 or 30 and I should like to challenge the minister to name at least one or two that have come true. To help to justify the conversion loan to the committee of supply on September 4, 1958 the minister gave us a considerable list of those who had converted their bonds. He gave a list of the provinces. For instance, he said that Alberta had converted $69 million, Manitoba $25½ million, Ontario $69½ million, Quebec $2 million and Nova Scotia $21 million. Concerning New Brunswick the minister said, as found at page 4600 of Hansard:

> New Brunswick, with various provincial accounts, holds a total of $6,743,000 of victory bonds, and that grand province of New Brunswick converted all of its holdings of Canada victory bonds into the conversion loan.

I wonder what the grand old province thinks about that now with a loss possibly up to 10 per cent of that amount. If we take all these provinces and add the amounts together we find that these provinces are down, so far as market value is concerned, between $15 million and $20 million. I met a person from New York and he said that the market was down so much he was frozen right into the market and could not get out. That is true of our provinces. They are frozen right into the bond market and cannot get out unless they take a loss.

There is just one other thing I want to say and I want to co-operate in getting along with the business of the house. The other day I heard the minister say in the debate having to do with Newfoundland that hon. members on this side of the house should read the press. He emphasized that on two or three occasions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not make any such statement.

Mr. McMillan: I should like to ask him to read the press himself. I have some press clippings here and I am going to read the headlines. I have the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of May 25, 1958, with the headline, "Confusion In Financial Policy"; the Hamilton Spectator of May 2, 1959, "No Easy Path Back to Sanity"; the Financial Times of May 8, 1959, "Does Mr. Fleming Not Know Better"; the Lethbridge Herald of May 5, 1959, "Tight Tory Money"; the Winnipeg Free Press of May 12, 1959, "The Result of Tory Financial Mismanagement"; the Toronto Globe of December 31, 1959, "12 Months of Mystery", and the Toronto Globe of May 15, 1959, "Oh Mr. Fleming". That last headline appears over the column "Looking Into Business" in which the writer, Mr. Fraser Robertson, says:

> The unhappy part about Mr. Fleming's vacillation is that it is all unnecessary. There is no reason for his half-truths about the financial situation.

I have never gone that far. I would not use the word "half-truth" because I know it is unparliamentary. In fact, I would not use it in any event but I have said that in the house he has continually compared apples with oranges. I think the fiscal policy of the government is made up of two phases. The first phase was the conversion loan as a result of which the people lost confidence in the fiscal policy of the government. The second phase concerns the effort of the government to extricate itself from the trouble.

What effort is the minister making to get out of this trouble? He has increased taxes by $352 million. He has issued a lot of short term loans and each successive loan has a higher interest rate than the previous one. We know that some of these loans return to people with incomes taxable at a level of 50 per cent or over at least the equivalent of 8 per cent or more if they have bought bonds at par. That is what the government has done for the rich people. What has it done for the poor people? At Brantford on February 17, 1958, the Prime Minister said:

> The humblest of our people will not be forgotten.

They certainly have not been forgotten. They are being charged more excise taxes, more taxes on their cigarettes and more on their beer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No change on beer.

Mr. McMillan: If they work and pay unemployment insurance they are paying more than their fair share to take care of the depletion in the unemployment insurance account. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

What has been the result of the loss of confidence in our fiscal policy? Our bonds are selling among the lowest of those of the western free world. I said before that they were selling lower than those of Cuba but since the prime minister of Cuba has resigned their bonds have gone down as low as ours. Our bonds are selling lower in many cases than provincial and provincial guaranteed bonds. I put that on record not very long ago. We have a condition in Canada where the farmer and the corner grocery store owner can go to a bank and get money cheaper than the Dominion of Canada on some of its borrowings. This is forcing our provinces and utilities to borrow money in New York, thereby helping to maintain the premium on our dollar, which makes conditions bad for our exporters.

As I predicted, it has raised interest rates not only to the federal government but to the provinces and municipalities. It has increased the cost of living and the cost of production at a time when it is difficult for Canadian producers to get into the markets of the world.

I would appeal to the minister to listen to some of the things in the press to which he should listen. I would appeal to him to take some of the advice of the financial men who this last year have taken the attitude that the best way to help our provinces and municipalities is to help ourselves by getting our finances in better shape here. If we do, we will reduce interest rates in this country and we will thereby reduce interest rates for our municipalities and provinces.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I spent some considerable time preparing what I thought was a rather good 30-minute speech on this departmental administration item. Here is the result of it. Self-sacrificing as I am, I am going to lay it aside. In view of the time factor and our general desire to get through this session this evening, I am simply going to bring to the attention of the committee that our party's policy with respect to finance was presented to the house on January 29 by the hon. member for Timiskaming in which he dealt with the problem of inflation, with which the hon. member for Welland has just been dealing. Again, in seeking supply, the C.C.F. policy with respect to this question was stated.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, I had looked forward to the opportunity of informing the committee and the minister, advising the minister, and I trust everyone will appreciate what we are doing for the sake of advancing our business this evening. Having said that, I will have some comments to make on the various items as they come before the house.

Mr. Pearson: The minister, I understand, said a few moments ago that in the course of this session he has said, everything on these matters that needed to be said. I hope I am not misquoting him. He said a great deal, and we appreciate the information he has given us, but I doubt very much that he has said everything that needed to be said. I do realize, as my hon. friend who preceded me realizes, that this perhaps is not the most propitious time to make a long speech on the financial and economic situation that confronts us now, even though the general item for the Department of Finance is the appropriate occasion to do that.

However, I do not want this session to end without giving the minister one or two further opportunities to interject "Nonsense" or "Rubbish", so I hope he will forgive me if I make a few remarks on the general financial picture. There is no doubt the country is facing serious economic problems: Unemployment still remains high, in spite of the seasonal improvement and the seasonal improvement will soon be coming to an end; increasing prices; the threat, at least, of inflation; a large government deficit and increasing public debt; scarcity at the present time of mortgage money; a reduction in housing construction; tight money, if I may use that expression, with unprecedented levels of interest rates; and a depressed bond market.

I do not want to prolong this discussion by referring to all these serious problems because that would take a great deal of time, but I do express the hope that they will receive and continue to receive most careful and continuing attention of the government, and that some effective solution can be found. Otherwise, when parliament meets again, we on this side will certainly be fully justified in criticizing the government for its failure to meet these problems. However, I do want to refer, and it will only be for a very few minutes, to one or two specific problems with which perhaps the minister might be good enough to deal.

The first is the money supply. The money supply, as the minister knows, reached a peak in October, 1958, I think it was, after the conversion loan and then, for a time, there was a reduction. But recently it has been on the rise again and a new peak has, I believe, been reached. The money supply has increased since May 27 by about $140 million. If that trend continues there would indeed be more than a danger of inflation. There might, indeed, be the reality of inflation especially when we approach a condition of full employment, and it is the prediction of the government that we are approaching a condition of full employment. If this money supply keeps on increasing the inevitable result, I suggest, will be inflation. We will be watching, on this side, very carefully what happens on this front during the next few months.

Perhaps I might say a word about the debt position of the government. The situation in that respect is I believe worrisome and, I think, worsening. At the end of June, 1958 Canada had a record total debt for all time of $4,800 million due in two years or less. That, I suppose, was the real reason for the conversion loan of the summer of 1958, to stretch out that debt. Assuming, Mr. Chairman, there are no cash bond issues, that the October maturity is rolled over into a two-year or shorter bond and that all maturing bills are rolled over and that the current six months bill cycle is completed, we will again, I believe, have a record short term debt at the beginning of next December when $1,021 million in 3 per cents due in December 1961, will become less than two years in term. At that time, next December, if my calculations are correct and on the assumptions I have made the total debt under two years might be of the order of $5,800 million, which would be $1 billion more than that which existed just before the conversion loan.

The question naturally arises, therefore, what is the government going to do about it? Are we likely to have another conversion loan? Perhaps the minister, even at this late moment of the session, will take us into his confidence, at least in a general way, and tell us how the government proposes to cope with this very serious problem.

Then, Mr. Chairman, there is this tight money situation. I often like to call it a dear money situation, but I have been told I should not do that because there is a suggestion of affection about the word "dear". This is a subject on which the minister was very excited when he was in opposition. I have just ventured to point out the dangers of the increasing money supply as we proceed on the road to recovery. I hope the minister will not deny, as it seems to me he has tended to do, that we are now suffering from tight money conditions. All objective and independent observers, it seems to me, have recognized this condition. The minister, more than once, has denied that these conditions exist or that they are comparable to the conditions about which he used to talk when he was referring to tight money in 1957.

Then, it seems to me somewhat illogically, he argued that if they do exist they are not really the fault of the government because they are not matters of government policy; that the government turns the responsibility in these mattters over to the banks.

On this subject, may I bring to the minister's attention—and these will be my concluding observations—an extremely interesting article which perhaps he has already seen and which appeared in a United States magazine entitled Business Week of June 20, 1959. I should like to quote just a couple of paragraphs from that article. The first is as follows:

—interest rates in both Canada and the U.S. are high and trending higher. In both cases it is a reflection of tightening money and anticipation of even tighter money in the future.

Both countries face the same problem. But the "tight money" issue is closer to coming to a head in Canada than it is in the U.S.

Then it goes on to state:

In Canada, where no ceiling prevails,—

That is on interest rates or government bond interest rates.

—few experts think that the government could sell a long-term issue even if the rate was above the market. So the problem facing Prime Minister John Diefenbaker's government is already acute.

Then these two paragraphs:

This week, on Toronto's Bay street—which vies with Montreal's St. James street for the role of Canada's Wall street—financial men were freely predicting that short-term rates would break through 6 per cent. Some pessimists think that rates are sure to break through the height barrier reached in 1920, when Canadian bonds were yielding over 6¼ per cent.

The big question is whether high interest rates and scarcity of credit will impede Canada's remarkable growth rate which, up until 1957, outpaced the U.S. But the 1957-58 recession hit harder and lasted longer in Canada and now, despite the fact that unemployment is over 5 per cent, money is not only expensive but increasingly scarce.

Those are one or two aspects of the financial picture—and they are only a few and I have touched on them very briefly—which even in the circumstances of the closing of the session I venture to bring to the attention of the minister in the hope that perhaps he may give us a word of assurance in connection with them.

Mr. Chevrier: I am delighted that the Minister of Finance indicated earlier that he is in no mood to make a long speech on the consideration of his estimates on what we hope is the final day of the session. In what I have to say I shall attempt to be as non-provocative as possible. I can assure the minister and my delightful friend the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Greenwood, who used to speak from this side of the house with such kindness but also with such effectiveness that I will not attempt at this late hour of the session to interject a note which will at least bring about a heated reply from my hon. friend across the way. However, I feel that there are certain matters—one in particular—which I should like to discuss and I shall do so briefly. It has to do with university grants, a matter with which I am sure the minister is not totally unconversant.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would my friend be willing to reserve his remarks until we reach that particular item? In this way I suggest that we would avoid a discursive debate. We have in the estimates an item dealing specifically with that matter.

Mr. Chevrier: I know there is a specific item which I have read very carefully. I hesitate to refuse to accept the ministers' suggestion but I feel that these remarks, which may perhaps go beyond the scope of the specific item, would be better discussed on this item.

The question of federal grants to universities, as the minister knows, was raised again during the last electoral campaign and the great majority of the Conservative candidates in Quebec stated that those grants were unconstitutional. They went a step further and said that if they were elected such a violation of the constitution would cease.

I should like to analyse for a moment what has happened since then in this respect. The Conservative government, wisely I believe, has not only continued federal assistance to universities but it has increased them and it is still using the formula proposed by Mr. St. Laurent in 1956. Moreover, the Minister of Finance has at no time indicated his intention to change that formula or to abandon that program. He merely stated in the house last year that if the premier of the province of Quebec, Mr. Duplessis, had any suggestions to make or any proposals to make, he was ready and willing to hear them, to consider them and to study them. Mr. Duplessis has never made any precise proposals in the past and nothing happened in this respect during the last year.

As the house knows, federal grants were not discussed at the federal provincial meeting of November, 1957 and, according to the Minister of Finance's own admission recently, that matter was not even mentioned at the last meeting of finance ministers held in Ottawa in July. As far as the government is concerned, therefore, this important matter is considered as being settled. The Minister of Finance is not prepared to take the initiative and try to find an alternative formula —and I cannot direct any blame at him for that fact—and Mr. Duplessis, on the other hand, judging from past experience, will not present new proposals.

The problem remains, however, and the solemn promises made by the followers of the Minister of Finance in the province of Quebec are not yet fulfilled. They are trying their best now to forget the commitments they gave during the last campaign and I am told that they are prepared to support federal grants to universities on the basis of the St. Laurent formula, as they did last year in this house. We all remember very well, of course, that all the Quebec Conservative members who were present in the house last year, including the hon. member for Quebec East and the member for Bellechasse, voted in favour of those grants to universities. To show how inconsistent their position is, most of them refused this year to support federal contributions for the construction of the trans-Canada highway. They voted in favour of federal grants to universities, which not long ago they claimed were unconstitutional, but they do not accept federal grants for the construction of the trans-Canada highway, on the ground that such federal assistance is a menace to provincial autonomy and to the French Canadian culture.

This is not, however, the only inconsistency that they have shown. During the present session the hon. member for Bellechasse, who I am sure would not deny his position as one of Mr. Duplessis's spokesmen in this house, explained his attitude on federal grants to universities. He re-stated his former position that such grants were unconstitutional, that they were a violation of our constitution. For those who want to look at it, it can be found at page 2947 of Hansard. But having said that—and immediately I admit that he is entitled to his own opinion, as is any other hon. member of this house, and he is entitled to place his own personal interpretation on the constitution—he went on to explain why last year he had voted in favour of those grants. He said this and I quote:

(Translation):

To that, as far as I am concerned, I reply that, being a federal member, I could not afford to ignore the nine other provinces which had raised no objection in principle and felt no inconvenience of a regional nature in accepting the grants. I could not afford to ignore the fact that the universities and colleges of those provinces had drawn up their budget and their development projects in the light of the precedent of 1952, which has been firmly established ever since. Nor could I afford to ignore that, in those provinces and within those colleges and universities there are fellow compatriots of mine, of the same origin as my own, who have derived and still are deriving from those grants, unquestionable benefits without which they would have found it difficult to insure the survival of their institutions of higher learning. Nor could I afford to ignore that, among the ten provinces of the confederation, there are some which, unfortunately, are not financially in a position to provide for the maintenance and development of their own institutions of higher learning.

That is the end of the quotation, which may be found on page 2947 of Hansard for April 22, 1959, English version.

(Text):

So, sir, in attempting to explain his attitude the hon. member was also attempting to justify the position of all his Quebec colleagues who like him last year voted in favour of federal grants to universities. This statement is a most inconsistent and dangerous position to take for so-called champions of provincial automony and defenders of the constitution. In effect they say this. What the federal government is doing in this respect is clearly a violation of the constitution, and the province of Quebec is against it and we will support that measure because the nine other provinces are not opposed to such federal assistance.

In other words, the position of those Quebec Conservative members can be summarized by the following proposition: We from the province of Quebec accept and support a clear violation of the constitution of our country if the nine other provinces do not object to that violation. Is this the way the Quebec Conservative members intend to defend what they think is a clear provision of our constitution? If it is, then they are the most dangerous enemies of provincial autonomy and of our constitution.

But this is not the whole story. Having accepted that the constitution might be violated in this respect in so far as the nine provinces are concerned, they ask for a special deal for Quebec which would take the form of an unconditional subsidy to the provincial government in lieu of the present federal grants to universities. The Minister of Finance would find it difficult to refuse such a proposal because of the peculiar interpretation he gave in his budget speech to federal grants to universities. At page 2410 of Hansard he presented a table showing federal contributions to the provinces, and he included university grants in that table. For the Minister of Finance, therefore, university grants are a federal contribution to the provinces.

If this is the purpose of such grants—as far as I am concerned I do not think so—then why not give that kind of assistance directly to the provinces? To say, as the Minister of Finance did, that federal grants to universities are intended to help the provinces, is stating a very dangerous principle. Indeed, if those grants are interpreted in this way, why then should federal assistance be limited or restricted to universities? Why not give additional help to the provinces by offering federal grants to secondary and primary education or to secondary and primary schools? As can readily be seen, as soon as university grants are interpreted as a financial contribution to the provinces, there is then no valid reason to stop there and to refuse federal assistance to the other levels of teaching institutions. The Minister of Finance may not have fully realized the dangerous interpretation of the statement or the table which was placed on Hansard, and also the dangerous implications of the interpretation which he gave to university grants in his budget speech. He has opened the way for federal assistance to all levels of education in Canada, and I hope that he will find it possible today to clarify his position in that respect.

As far as I am concerned, and I am sure not to be the only one on this side of the house to find myself in this position, I cannot accept that interpretation of federal grants to universities. I cannot accept that interpretation because it would justify federal assistance to secondary and primary schools. I want to make it very clear that I am and always will be strongly opposed to such federal grants. The attitude of the Liberal party concerning university grants is very clear and it has been consistent all along the line, not only from the time the formula submitted by Mr. St. Laurent was established, but earlier. We do not say in Quebec that the grants are unconstitutional and in the rest of Canada that they will be continued and increased. Since they were established in 1951 we have always said that such grants were constitutional.

I do not intend to discuss the issue here; I merely want to say to those who sincerely, I am sure, claim that those grants constitute a violation of our constitution that they have only one honourable course to follow, and it is this. They must state their opposition to this budgetary item in most vigorous terms. They must vote against it and they must use every means at their disposal, including a reference to the courts, in order to stop that violation. There is no acceptable alternative available to them if they want to be consistent and to safeguard their honour. They cannot claim that those grants are violating the constitution and at the same time vote for them because nine provinces want them.

However, the Liberal party has never viewed university grants as a federal contribution to the provinces. This system of grants was established as a direct compensation to Canadian universities for the national and international role that they are called upon to play and which greatly benefits the nation as a whole and the federal government itself. This has been and should remain the sole purpose of federal aid to universities, which is to compensate them for the national and international role they exercise and to enable them to fulfil the essential functions in a more efficient manner.

It is most important, it seems to me, to keep this national purpose in mind because it imposes three definite features of federal action in this general field. In the first place it indicates that federal grants to universities should remain a supplement in university budgets compared with provincial grants, because the main function of universities is exercised at the regional and provincial levels. In the second place, while university grants serve a specific national purpose, there is no such specific purpose to justify federal grants to secondary and primary schools. In the third place, there would be no guarantee that this national purpose—that is, the financial compensation for the national and international role of universities—would be served if additional unconditional subsidies were given to provincial governments in lieu of federal grants to universities.

It is quite evident that federal aid to universities is still an unsolved issue in the province of Quebec and that we should all try to find an acceptable solution. By the end of 1959 the national conference of Canadian universities will hold in trust for Quebec universities the large sum of $24 million, or approximately that amount. This is a very important and impressive sum indeed, and while Quebec universities have not yet lost that financial assistance, they have not been able to use that money and their progress and development has been hampered on account of that as well as being delayed. This is, therefore, a very important issue.

In attempting to find a solution, however, we should remember the three features that I mentioned a moment ago and which any federal scheme of assistance in this field should retain in order to preserve the national or dominion purpose which was at the origin of that program.

By the way, the hon. member for Quebec South, in an interview reported by the Montreal Gazette of September 9, 1958 recognized this dominion purpose and the national role played by universities when he said:

> However, Quebec universities, as all other institutions of advanced learning must each year spend large sums of money in scientific research which is useful on a national basis and serves Canadian commerce and industry.

This, of course, if a very sound observation. But then, the hon. member went on to say that the present federal grants—which I want to underline are unconditional—were "an encroachment on provincial rights in matters of education". And he added: "As direct statutory grants to universities, they are not acceptable to Quebec". But he also said "that if federal grants were earmarked solely for research and the construction of laboratories they probably would be acceptable to Quebec on that basis".

This is a most curious and inconsistent position to take. The hon. member says: If federal grants to universities are unconditional, if universities can use that money in any way they like, including research facilities, then they are unconstitutional and unacceptable; but if such grants were conditional, if there were some strings attached or, in other words, if the federal government were restricting the freedom of universities in this respect and allowing them to use the money only for research purposes, then university grants would be acceptable. I admit that I cannot see the logic of that position and I say that this is a dangerous position to take. Perhaps the hon. member is so used to university grants distributed on an arbitrary basis in Quebec by the present provincial government that he would like the federal government to follow the same policy.

As far as I am concerned, I cannot accept that position and I want university grants to remain unconditional. At present Canadian universities are completely free to use that money as they see fit. They may include those grants in their general budget or use them only to finance capital expenditures or research activities. They accept the money this year and refuse it next year. They can also ask for only part of the amounts to which they are entitled each year or which have been accumulated and kept in trust for them by the national conference of Canadian universities. That complete freedom of universities must be preserved at all cost and any scheme involving restricting conditions should be rejected.

We must recognize, however, that the present formula still creates difficulties even if it guarantees the complete freedom of universities. Some people in Quebec are still afraid that it might create in the future an unfair situation for Quebec universities which are in a minority position within the national conference of Canadian universities. Personally, I do not share those fears and I am not alone in showing that confidence and optimism. However, in an attempt to overcome those fears and current difficulties, the Minister of Finance should announce his willingness to modify the present formula in one respect.

According to the agreement between the Minister of Finance and the national conference of Canadian universities, the Department of Finance gives each year to the national conference the total amount of the grants, that is $1.50 multiplied by the Canadian population for that year. From then on, the national conference distributes the grants directly to each university according to a simple arithmetical formula specified in the agreement.

My proposal would be to include in the present arrangement a new provision enabling the national conference of Canadian universities, when requested, to transfer the total grant due in a province to a provincial conference of universities which would then assume the responsibility of allocating that grant to each individual university or college on the basis of enrolment. Such a proposal would not materially disrupt the present system of university grants. On the other hand, it would enable universities in a province such as Quebec to form a group of their own and to have thereby an immediate and complete control over the distribution of grants to each university.

I believe that this proposal has some merit and that the minister should declare his willingness to accept it, if universities in any particular province express their preference for that method of distributing the grants. The implementation of that proposal would be very simple indeed because only a slight modification of the existing agreement between the minister and the national conference of Canadian universities would be needed.

I hope that the minister, in his reply, will express his views on that simple proposal which could perhaps solve an important issue. I trust that the minister will accept this proposal in the spirit in which it is offered and that he will feel that it is offered with but one aim in mind, the solution of a problem which is causing, if not injustice, certainly grave difficulties in one of the provinces of confederation. In the light of what I have said I ask the minister to give it his careful consideration.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the issue raised by the hon. member for Laurier is a very important one.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, might I ask the hon. member to defer his remarks on this subject to item No. 124 because there the matter is dealt with specifically. Otherwise we are going to have a discursive debate on this matter. I do not intend to make my remarks on it until we reach that item. I will have something to say on it then. Perhaps my hon. friend would be assisting in making the debate orderly if our remarks on this subject could be reserved until we reach that item.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be brief and so the minister need feel no concern about the order or length of the debate. As far as I am concerned, I am eager to leave the chamber as we have been sitting here far too long today.

What was recommended by the hon. member for Laurier was a device to take care of the Quebec situation in this particular matter. I think it is a device worth consideration but I suggest to both the minister and to the hon. member for Laurier that devices of this kind do not represent a solution to the fact that Quebec holds a completely different attitude toward education and the federal role from that held by any other province.

If the minister wants to win a reputation for diplomacy which we thought he was going to establish when he was mooted to be the next secretary of state for external affairs he can do one of two things. He can either make Quebec one out of ten, or on the other hand he could work out some system of federal aid to education that would satisfy the requirements that are now recognized in most provinces in this country and that would win the support of Quebec as well.

The other point I would like to bring up has nothing to do with this. I ask the minister whether he has noticed the recommendation of the committee on mines, forests and waters with regard to forests, and what that committee recommends in so far as a study of forest taxation is concerned, and what role he feels he or his department could adopt for carrying out the study that is recommended by this particular committee. I do not mean just a study that will apply to Ontario and British Columbia but to the industry as a whole, and especially to the pulp and paper industry group as a whole.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the minister rises —I am not going to make a speech—I have two questions I want to ask. In the first place, has the minister got the tables for the five provinces on a basis absolutely comparable with the one he tabled the other day in the Newfoundland debate? If so, will he table them and have them put in Hansard so that they are there as available as the other one is?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With pleasure, Mr. Chairman. I will do that right now. I have the tables for all the 10 provinces and the composite table for the aggregate and I have much pleasure in tabling them. If it is the wish of the hon. gentlemen that they be printed in Hansard I am quite in accord with the suggestion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The tables referred to above are as follows:]

STATISTICAL SUMMARY OF FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE PROVINCES FOR THE FISCAL YEARS 1949–50 to 1959–60

MR. FLEMING (Eglinton):

The statistical information for section A, unconditional grants, has been drawn from the public accounts of Canada. The information for section B, conditional grants, has been drawn for the fiscal years 1949–50 to 1952–53 from D.B.S. publication "Financial Statistics of Provincial Governments" and from fiscal year 1953–54 to 1957–58 from D.B.S. publication "Financial Statistics of the Government of Canada" which commenced publication for the former fiscal year. There are minor differences between the two publications occasioned by differing year-end adjustments, as the former publication is based on the public accounts of the provinces and the latter publication on the public accounts of Canada. The figures for 1958–59 and 1959–60 are from various departmental sources and are preliminary. While the information is generally complete, in some cases no provincial distribution has been available and this has then been made on the basis of previous or anticipated experience.

The information in Sections C and D is drawn from the public accounts of Canada, departmental and agency sources.

With respect to slum clearance (section B), this is the net cost. It does not include advances for purposes of land assembly and low cost housing projects some part of which is recoverable. These advances amount to $18.8 million for 1957, $24.27 million for 1958 and $40 million for 1959. Losses on subsidized rental projects are excluded. These losses amounted to $54,000 in 1957–58.

d. 27/5/59

Mr. Pickersgill: I have another question which is precisely the same question I asked the minister in the dying days of the session last year and it is: Is there going to be a federal-provincial conference before the next session of parliament, and is it the intention of the government to make some modifications in the existing tax-sharing arrangements? He knows the act expires on March 31, so far as the 3 per cent is concerned. If not, is he going to continue that 3 per cent for the rest of the currency of the tax-sharing arrangements, instead of making us go through this annual agony, which took about a quarter of the session, to put this statute through. In order to save the minister's time in answering the question I will give him the answer he gave last year. I am sure it will be the same answer. The minister said, as reported at page 4711 of Hansard of September 6, 1958:

> I have dealt with that question. I said that when it is appropriate for the announcement to be made it will be made.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, may I deal with the last subject first. I thank the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate for supplying a very appropriate answer to his own question. At this stage I do not think I can usefully add anything to what I said on this subject in reply to a number of questions on the same point in this house within the past fortnight.

Then, as to the question by the hon. member for Port Arthur in regard to the study that he invites me to make of the report of the committee on mines, forests and waters, of course I shall be examining the recommendations of that committee.

Mr. Chairman, I have already indicated in comment on the subject introduced by the hon. member for Laurier, namely the federal grants to the universities, that I thought the proper place for discussion of that matter was under item 124 when we reach it, and I shall have something to say on that subject when we reach that item.

The other matters were subjects introduced by the Leader of the Opposition and here I think I can be quite brief. The Leader of the Opposition raised questions concerning money supply. Mr. Chairman, he is aware that money supply varies from month to month or week to week. There is no fixed amount. There are bound to be variations at any time and there are, of course, seasonal variations. He seemed to be viewing with some alarm the recent increases in money supply. It has been made quite clear that so far as the Bank of Canada has control over money supply there is no thought of embarking on a policy of increasing money supply. I do think that the Leader of the Opposition was expressing some unfounded apprehensions in this respect.

The high point of money supply in 1958 was reached on October 1. The money supply at that time was $13,213 million. At the latest date for which figures have been issued, namely July 8 during the last week, the figure was $13,350 million. Thus it will be seen that there has been no significant increase in money supply and it has been made quite clear by the Bank of Canada that it has no thought of embarking upon an increase of money supply under existing circumstances.

The next subject introduced by the Leader of the Opposition concerned high interest rates. I think there is nothing new introduced in this respect. I do not intend to repeat things that have been said earlier at this present session. I think hon. members will agree that at any rate I dealt with this subject at some length on previous occasions, and I will content myself by referring to my effort to treat that subject on an earlier occasion. But it is, I think, in the minds of hon. members who have been following what has been happening in the United States of late that the figures at which the United States treasury is borrowing money today have set an all-time record high interest rate for borrowing in the United States. That is a factor that all would do well to bear in mind who are measuring trends in this country.

Finally, the Leader of the Opposition made some reference to debt maturity, particularly debt in the category of two years and under. Mr. Chairman, I have the figures before me in this respect. At June 30, a year ago, the debt, measured in terms of treasury bills and bonds in that category, totalled $4,798 million. At May 31, 1959 the aggregate in the same categories was $4,374 million. Between June 15—

Mr. Benidickson: Are you including Canada savings bonds?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. Between June 1 and July 15 there has been an increase of $100 million in treasury bills, bringing the figure that I gave to a figure of $4,474 million on July 15. Accordingly, there has been in the past 12½ months a decrease of maturities in this category of some $324 million.

It is worthy of note also that if one measures maturities in terms of average term, we have the same interesting comparison. The nearest date to the one on which we came into office was June 30, 1957, and the average term to maturity of federal debt at that time was six years and two months. Today, thanks to the conversion loan which was derided by the hon. member for Welland, the average term of federal debt is nine years and nine months.

Mr. McIlraith: I have one question I would like to ask the Minister of Finance. It is most appropriate to be asked here. It arises out of a sentence in the throne speech and I will read the sentence. The part I want to quote is this:

My government will request your approval of its participation in a contributory plan to provide medical benefits for civil servants pursuant to recommendations of the national joint council of the public service.

Will the minister explain what, if anything, has transpired on that subject and what the position is at the moment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that relates to an item in the supplementary estimates, No. 513. There is an item there of $3,500,000 for the purpose. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would prefer to wait and deal with it when we reach that item.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not want to elaborate on it. Is item 513 the answer to what was intended by that paragraph in the throne speech? That is really my question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister will note that he has an item there for interest on the public debt. We all know that that would be an estimate made last November or December. We also know that since then the cost of borrowing money has increased very substantially. Does the minister anticipate he will require a supplementary estimate in connection with this matter?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has inquired about a statutory item at the bottom of page 22 of the book of estimates. There is really nothing I can usefully say to him on this subject. This is the best estimate and no one can predict precisely what will be the course of interest rates at any measurable projection into the future.

Item agreed to.

University grants—

124. Payments to the national conference of Canadian universities (hereinafter called the "conference"), in accordance with the agreement entered into between the conference and the Minister of Finance on the 19th day of November, 1958, (hereinafter called the "original agreement") pursuant to vote 541 of the Appropriation Act No. 1, 1957, and vote 669 of the Appropriation Act No. 5, 1958; and when a new corporation comes into existence (incorporated for the purpose of receiving and disbursing such payments to institutions of higher learning) to authorize the payments to be made thereto, in lieu of to the conference, in accordance with an agreement to be entered into, with the approval of the governor in council, by the Minister of Finance with the conference and the new corporation, such agreement to provide, in addition to terms and conditions similar to the terms and conditions in the original agreement, including a provision that any amount payable to an institution of higher learning and not paid by the corporation in the relevant fiscal year may be retained by the corporation until such time as the institution to which the money is payable claims the payment from the corporation or parliament provides otherwise for the disposal thereof, for the transfer of amounts in the possession of the conference to the new corporation and for termination of the original agreement, $26,221,500.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On item 124 I should like to say something in reply to the observations on this point offered to the committee a few moments ago by the hon. member for Laurier. No one will question that this is an important matter and that it does present some problems. I propose to say something very frankly in regard to them.

First let me say, Mr. Chairman, that I think the hon. member for Laurier was drawing a long bow when he tried to make an argument out of a reference to an expression used in a table in the budget speech. If he will look at page 2410 of the budget speech, and this is the subject of his earlier reference, he will see that the matter of university grants was one of two subjects listed under the heading, "Payments for the Benefit of Provincial Institutions". Under that heading there are payments of two natures referred to; first, university grants, and, second, grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal government property.

I do not think it is going to be argued seriously by any member of the house that universities and municipalities are not in this sense provincial institutions—

Mr. Pickersgill: They are nothing of the kind.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —because they are created under provincial legislation. Every university that I know of in Canada is subject to provincial jurisdiction. There is no such thing as a university created by federal authority, and the same applies to municipalities.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it is made quite clear that these were referred to as provincial institutions, and I think hon. members will conclude that the hon. member for Laurier was drawing a very long bow when he suggested that this reference to universities as provincial institutions connoted some thought of making federal contributions to the cost of primary and secondary education. Nothing could be further from the truth. Nothing could be further from the intention of the government.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question? Why then in his table on page 2410 did he not make the distinction which he is apparently making now?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not making any new distinction. I placed the matter firmly on the record of Hansard at page 2410 and these two matters were described under the caption to which I have referred. The matter is perfectly plain. There is no new distinction being drawn. It was placed there in the budget speech on April 9. I say that any suggestion that there is any thought of making federal contributions to primary and secondary education is far removed from the mind of anyone in this chamber.

Let me deal with this subject of university grants. University grants were first introduced by the former government and came into effect in the fiscal year 1951-52. The basis of these grants, while it has changed in amount, has not changed greatly in another sense. They began on the basis of 50 cents per capita of population in the country. They were raised subsequently to $1 per capita and then a year ago were advanced to $1.50. The original scheme contemplated the division of the total federal grant among the provinces on the basis of the respective populations of the provinces, and then within the province the basis of allocation was in relation to university population. The division, therefore, was within the defined institutions of higher learning within the province in proportion to their registration of students who came within the definition in the regulations.

At the beginning there was provision made for distribution within the provinces by a so-called dominion-provincial allocation board, and in the one year in which the universities of the province of Quebec accepted these grants the division in that province was made by a committee or panel composed of the then minister of finance, Mr. Abbott, and the then provincial treasurer of Quebec, Mr. Gagnon. But that was the only year in which the universities of the province of Quebec accepted their share of this provision.

Mr. Chevrier: That was 1951-52.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, 1951-52, and consistently in the years since the universities of the province of Quebec have declined to participate in these grants.

Mr. Benidickson: What is the amount standing to their credit?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): At the commencement of the present fiscal year it was, in round figures, $17 million, and out of the figure of some $26 million, which constitutes item 124 now under discussion, the share that would be available to the institutions of higher learning in the province of Quebec this year would be approximately $7½ million.

Last year when the house was discussing this item I made a statement indicating the view that I had of the difficulties of the situation and the rather unsatisfactory nature, to put it in mild terms, of the situation that was developing. May I recall the remarks I made on September 6, 1958, as found on pages 4725 and 4726 of Hansard. I said at the bottom of page 4725:

> I wish to make it clear on behalf of the government that we would wish the institutions of higher learning in Quebec to have the benefit of the provision intended on their behalf by parliament. The province of Quebec has more than a quarter of the population of Canada. Last year it had one-third of the students of all of Canada attending institutions of higher learning. Quebec pays its full share of taxes out of which this vote is made available, and the matter has been the subject of representations made by our members of parliament from Quebec.

Then, I continued, and I repeat this is the fundamental approach of the government. We recognize that education is the exclusive constitutional responsibility of the provinces of this country. I say in most emphatic terms, that as long as this government is in office never will it do one thing to interfere with the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces over education in this country. It was in that thought that I made these remarks last year as recorded on page 4726 of Hansard:

> Let me make it abundantly clear, Mr. Chairman, that this government will always scrupulously respect the terms of the Canadian constitution. It is plainly recognized that education is a field of jurisdiction exclusively assigned to the provinces under the British North America Act. As long as this government is in office there will never be any attempt made to trespass on that jurisdiction exclusively vested in the provinces.

Having made that position abundantly clear, Mr. Chairman, I trust, let me go on to deal specifically with these grants which now have a history of eight years in this Canadian parliament. The situation, as I described it last year on the same page is this:

> Now I say, Mr. Chairman, of this agreement—

That is to say the agreement between the Minister of Finance and the national conference of Canadian universities which at that time had been made the trustee for the distribution of these grants amongst the institutions of learning in Canada.

> —in relation to the attitude of the present government, that while the formula contained in the present agreement has not so far been such as to be viewed with favour in the province of Quebec, if there is any formula or modification of the present agreement which anyone cares to put forward which would permit the institutions of higher learning in the province of Quebec to participate, and which is in keeping with the national interest, we as a government are prepared to give it serious consideration.

This is still the position of the government. I add to what I said last year that as this situation develops, if there is no change of attitude, no change in the basis on which these university grants are payable, it must be recognized by all that the present situation cannot continue. In other words, some way acceptable to the jurisdiction that controls universities in Quebec, some method must be worked out that will make those sums intended for the province of Quebec available to the institutions in that province in some form or other.

The hon. member for Laurier seemed to recognize the necessity of something being done along this line. I can say, Mr. Chairman, I shall certainly devote the best efforts of which I am capable in trying to evolve some modification of this present provision that will make the grants available to all parts of Canada in a way that will be fair and equitable. I say without reservation that the committee cannot contemplate with equanimity a situation under which a large portion of this grant that is earmarked for the institutions of higher learning in Quebec is simply accumulating and is not being made available to be used for the purpose for which parliament intended it.

The hon. member for Laurier made a suggestion that thought should be given to making the money payable to the various provinces or in any province that so desired, to a provincial conference of universities rather than to the national conference of Canadian universities. I question very much whether this will meet the views of the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec has a point of view in regard to education which I think all hon. members of this committee have a duty to recognize. It is patent that a different view altogether is taken of this subject in the province of Quebec from the view that is taken in the other provinces of Canada. Those who know the history of the province of Quebec understand the point of view of that province today and will know that Quebec regards this exclusive jurisdiction over education as something fundamental to the ethnic survival of that province and its people. This has been the view of the people of Quebec down through the years, that its jurisdiction over education is the sheet anchor of the survival of the culture, the language and the institutions of the province.

I am sure it is the desire of all hon. members of this house to approach this problem with proper understanding of that point of view. I do say that that point of view is respected by the government. In connection with the other provinces, it is patent that there is no serious question raised as to the acceptance of their share of these grants by the institutions of higher learning of those other provinces. I feel something more will be required to meet the patent difficulty of this situation than the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Laurier.

I also say to the members of this committee that at this time no modification can be introduced into this item since the item has been known to universities which are free to accept their share and they are counting on it. But, Mr. Chairman, having regard to the fact that nearly all of the universities of one province of this country are not receiving their share of these grants, before such an item or any item on this subject is presented to the house in another year a most intensive effort must be made to grapple with this very great difficulty. For my part, I give the committee my personal assurance that anything I can do to help to resolve this difficulty will certainly be done if effort and understanding can do it.

Mr. Chevrier: May I be allowed just one or two questions following what the minister has said? I have listened with great care to what the minister has said and, in some respects, I must say that I cannot find myself in disagreement with him, other than with reference to some of the suggestions which I made earlier. But I am impressed by the fact that the minister confirms the statements which I made earlier that the present position is a serious one and cannot be allowed to continue indefinitely.

Then, it occurs to me to ask him this, but before I ask the question I may say I appreciate what he has said with reference to the fact that he respects the constitutional position of the provinces in so far as education is concerned and that no proposal having been made to him from the province he feels he should take no further action. Notwithstanding that, the question I now ask him is this. Has any modification of the present formula been considered by the minister or his officials.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. This subject naturally has been given very careful consideration within the Department of Finance.

Mr. Chevrier: Is it the intention, in the light of what the minister has said, to continue the same formula as has been established earlier and has been put into effect by the minister since his party has been in office?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Item 124 contains its own formula, that is to say, distribution at the first stage among the provinces on the basis of population and then, second, within the provinces on the basis of registration at institutions which qualify. There is not any modification that has been developed yet that seems to meet the need or to supply a solution. Therefore I have said that while there is no modification proposed in this item at the present time or no amendment nevertheless parliament still reserves its jurisdiction over the subject.

These sums are paid over to and held by what was formerly known as the national conference of Canadian universities but is now the Canadian Universities Foundation as trustees. Then as to those amounts that are not claimed by or accepted by the institutions which qualify, they are held by the trustee subject to the directions of parliament. Therefore, parliament still retains control obviously over any unclaimed balance and that unclaimed balance will, if there is no change in attitude, rise this year. That is why I have emphasized the fact that I think that is a situation to which parliament can no longer close its eyes. I repeat my own assurance that that is a situation to which I personally am giving the best study of which I am capable.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask this final question? The minister did not seem to view too sympathetically the suggestion I made in connection with the modification of the arrangement made between the Minister of Finance and the national conference of Canadian universities which was that the money be made payable to the provincial conference of universities. If that modification were acceptable to the universities of the province of Quebec would the minister then be disposed to accept it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We may be proceeding on a hypothetical basis here, but I indicated that from what I know of the attitude of the province of Quebec, the suggestion that the hon. gentleman put forward would not, as I understand the view in Quebec, be an acceptable solution. I pointed to what happened back in the early days of these grants when there was a dominion-provincial board that made the allocations within the province of Quebec. But here, Mr. Chairman, for the full understanding of the attitude of the province of Quebec, I think one must also have regard to the source of the money. Here the view is taken by Quebec that money that is intended for educational purposes should be raised by the province. Here is a problem of very serious difficulty. That is why, as I presently understand the situation, I am very doubtful whether the suggestion put forward by the hon. member will provide an acceptable solution in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister's answer mean that even if the universities were willing to accept such a modification of the formula as between him and them, he would still not be prepared to amend it in accordance with the suggestion which was made?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have learned long since—the same as did my hon. friend—not to attempt to give answers to hypothetical questions. I am afraid that at the moment we have gone as far on this subject as we can go because what my hon. friend is putting to me is so clearly a hypothetical question that, frankly, I would not wish to be drawn into an answer on it. We have had no indication at all that the proposal he is making would provide a solution acceptable in Quebec.

Mr. Benidickson: In this context I wonder whether I could ask the minister, as chairman of the treasury board, whether or not he could report to this house any developments in connection with a proposal that was made by our late lamented secretary of state for external affairs, Hon. Sidney Smith, with regard to scholarships. I calculated that this proposal would probably involve $25 million. The proposal came after a suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition in the same election campaign. I wonder, having regard to our discussion, he thinks there are involved constitutional difficulties similar to those we have been discussing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not aware of any such question being before treasury board, that is to say any question of federal scholarships to university students. I am, of course, aware that through the Department of Labour there are some provisions made for joint dominion-provincial scholarships. Of course they have been in effect for some years. The federal government has made contributions for some years to them. But apart from them, no project of the kind the hon. member described, of which I am aware, has been before the treasury board.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister is, of course, familiar with the constitutional position of cabinet solidarity. The late secretary of state for external affairs in the last election campaign advanced a proposal for a large increase in scholarships contributed to by the federal treasury. As I say, that proposal came after a similar proposal from the Leader of the Opposition. Has this proposal not come to the minister's attention as chairman of the treasury board?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Chairman it will come as no surprise to the committee to see me rise following the speech of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). The member for Laurier never fails to interest me, especially when he speaks for the province of Quebec, a somewhat new role for him. I must say that I do have a peculiar feeling when he says: "We from Quebec, we ask and we say—" Everybody knows, Mr. Chairman, that by far the great majority of Conservative members from Quebec hold university grants to be unconstitutional. The hon. member for Joliette - l'Assomption - Montcalm had expressed his view on this subject last year, as we were reminded by the member for Laurier. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) and from Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) spoke along the same lines. The hon. member for Laurier reminded us also of other statements attributed to me by the press, last September. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a correction right away. What I have said—and this was in a telephone conversation—boils down simply to this: that most Conservative members from the province of Quebec were opposed to grants to universities and that, further, thought was being given to a solution of some kind, grants earmarked for research purposes, for instance. I did not voice this opinion as being my own but as being that entertained by some of my colleagues who were looking for a solution. In this respect I have always believed—and I still believe—that federal grants to universities are unconstitutional.

That is why, after the speech made by the hon. member for Laurier, I deem it necessary to explain my views which may coincide with those of many of my colleagues.

First, there is section 93 of our constitution which gives provinces exclusive jurisdiction over education. Universities are certainly an essential part of our education system. Nobody ever questioned this fact, and jurisprudence, in its interpretation of the word education, upholds this view.

The hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge) who boldly said that the fathers of confederation did not perhaps think of the universities when they drafted section 93 because, at that time, Canada had no state university, does not agree with this. His was an extraordinary statement, because, even if no state university existed at that time, at least there were private ones, that is Laval and McGill universities. Anyhow, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) stressed earlier today, when the time came to establish universities in this country, they were established by provincial authorities.

Indeed, we should not forget that section 93 has a particular significance for the province of Quebec. It is recognized that when confederation was being prepared, French-speaking Canadians of Lower Canada considered section 93 essential for the preservation of their culture, their language and their own individuality. They looked upon that constitutional structure as the essence of their survival. At that time, the province of Quebec was the only French-speaking of the four confederated provinces. Today, while it is the only one in ten, it considers absolute control in this field as more than ever necessary, as an essential guarantee for the preservation of its own individuality, which it believes should be preserved and cultivated for the benefit of Canada as a whole seeing, in short, French culture as serving the Canadian nation.

Mr. Chairman, I am otherwise aware it has been said that we could give grants to universities because nothing in the constitution prevents us from taking out amounts of the consolidated revenue fund in order to make donations to universities.

In that connection, it was recalled that the province of Quebec had made gifts to Toronto and Ottawa universities.

I admit that a genuine gift is constitutional. However, I believe that regular, annual grants do not constitute gifts; they are annuities paid to universities. Moreover, when grants are voted each year, it is just as if some legislation were voted which would establish them on a permanent basis. That which cannot be done directly cannot be done indirectly. If parliament introduced some legislation about permanent grants to universities, I would argue that they are illegal. And it is not an annual vote which would change the problem.

Mr. Chairman, reference was also made to a moral obligation on the part of the federal government, because universities are rendering great services to the state. In my opinion, there is no moral obligation in constitutional law, when the legal obligation is fully met. And if universities do not receive from the provinces the money they need, it is perhaps because provinces cannot afford to give it to them. Consequently, must we not come to the conclusion that the federal government is taxing more than it should, and ought to hand back to the provinces higher taxation powers?

Others have claimed that it was a purely technical objection. "Those gifts or grants", they say, "are unconditional. What are you worrying about?"

What have we to worry about, Mr. Chairman? Well, for one thing, the future. If universities get into the habit of receiving those grants, they will not be able to refuse them, should our government be run, for instance, by our leftist friends, and if conditions were imposed on grants to universities—grants which the Quebec province cannot accept. There is no threat from that direction at the present time, I agree; such a danger perhaps did not exist under the former government, but to overlook the dangers which may be in store for the future would be a sign of an almost unbelievable lack of foresight.

For that reason, we consider it essential to find a solution which could be acceptable to the public of Quebec. It is for that reason that the statement of the Minister of Finance is welcome. It is also for that reason that we are confident that this government will find an adequate solution. This is the situation which has been inherited. The hon. member for Laurier who, a moment ago, criticized the government, and tried to interpret the meaning given to such grants by the Minister of Finance, would do well to read again what was said in 1951 by the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, when these grants were instituted.

He stated at the time that these grants were merely supplementary to provincial grants. It is clear, therefore, that the government's intention was to help education. The principle laid down thereby was extremely dangerous, but I am confident that the present government will certainly find that solution which it is sincerely looking for.

As long as I am convinced that this government is looking for this solution, I will continue to have faith in it. My confidence extends also, in this respect, to the Prime Minister, to the Minister of Finance and all other members of the cabinet.

In principle, I hold these grants to be unconstitutional, though, in practice, I have every confidence in the government. I am convinced that, next year, it will come forward with a solution which will be approved by the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec will recognize thereby that, in the present government, there are men capable of recognizing its legitimate aspirations and of understanding why it is so convinced of its exclusive rights in respect of education.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Flynn: Certainly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the hon. member support conditional grants provided they be earmarked for research purposes or for laboratory construction, as was mentioned by a report published in the Montreal Gazette in September 1958?

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Chairman, I thought I had made myself clear in this regard when I said that this was not my opinion—

An hon. Member: Tell him in English.

Mr. Flynn: —but an opinion expressed by someone else. I certainly think that regular and annual subsidy grants for those purposes are unconstitutional.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member let me ask him a second and final question?

If the grants are gifts and are unconstitutional, as he just said, why is he voting in favour of grants to universities?

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Chairman, the fact of voting in favour of an item, or of not voting at all, or of voting against an item, can be interpreted in different ways. If some members felt that the vote requested by the opposition would create division, I believe that they could, in good faith, vote in favour of those grants, while considering them unconstitutional.

I think that we can put our trust in this government as long as it keeps trying to find a solution. This changes absolutely nothing to the opinion that one may express. You can give whatever interpretation you like to votes cast for or against those grants.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous grants—

125. Canadian association of consumers, $10,000.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have been quiescent for some time which perhaps justifies my speaking briefly on this item and saying at short length what I intended to say at far greater length. May I say before proceeding that you will never find anyone in this group voting for an item which we consider unconstitutional.

This item represents a good investment. This organization has done excellent work since its formation in 1947 at which time it was sponsored by leading national women's organizations across Canada. It has several objectives including improvement of living standards of the people; the study of consumer problems; the dissemination of information; the exchange of ideas between the organization and government, the agricultural producers, and trade and industry; the carrying on of a campaign of education and research; and making representations to the government when it sees fit. The organization publishes a bulletin approximately 10 months a year containing much valuable information. In recent months the association has been considering the possibility of attempting to persuade the government to establish a consumer's bureau within some department of government which arises out of the limited funds of the organization which restricts its ability to do research work and because more and more Canadians are interested in the cost of living and standards of quality.

More is done in the United States than in Canada in this direction. In that country there are two non-profit organizations, the consumers' union and the consumers' bulletin organization, which have considerable funds at their disposal which have permitted them to undertake extensive research into standards of quality and in subjects in which the housewife would be particularly interested.

In view of the demonstrated excellent work done by the Canadian Association of Consumers would the government give consideration to the establishment of a consumers bureau within some department of government, even working in co-operation with the Canadian Association of Consumers, with a view to extending the work done by this organization? This could be achieved as a result of some extension of the work done by the national research council. The establishment of a bureau would be a step in the right direction to achieve some of the things we are trying to achieve through legislation such as that which might be brought up at a later stage in this evening's business. Would the minister comment on my suggestion?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances I wonder if my hon. friend would be content if I were to say that I have taken due note of his observations.

Item agreed to.

126. Institute of public administration of Canada, $6,000.

Mr. Peters: Would the minister explain the appropriation not required?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item of $37,500 for 1958-59 was a grant to the national conference of Canadian universities as a contribution toward the cost of holding the congress of universities of the British commonwealth in Canada in 1958.

Item agreed to.

General administration—

511. Comptroller of the treasury—central office and branch offices administration—further amount required, $155,000.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, would the minister give a statement about his views concerning salary increases for the civil service after two years in office?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, in response to the hon. member's question there is really nothing I can usefully add on this subject to what I have said in the house in recent days in reply to questions on this subject.

The matter was reviewed by the pay research bureau, as it is doing constantly. The civil service commission has carried out studies based on the report to date of the pay research bureau. I have had opportunity to discuss this matter with the civil service commission and am still in the course of doing so.

Mr. Benidickson: I believe the civil service commission has completed its report to the minister. Would he be able to summarize the report he has received?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman, I do not think it would be proper to disclose the contents of that report at this point when it is still under discussion between the commission and the Minister of Finance, to whom the commission submits such reports.

Item agreed to.

General items of payroll costs including superannuation payments—

513. Government's share of medical-surgical insurance premiums, determined on such bases and paid in respect of such persons (and their dependents) who hold offices or positions or perform services the remuneration for which is payable out of the consolidated revenue fund or by an agent of Her Majesty or who are contributors as defined in the Public Service Superannuation Act or who are members of the Canadian forces or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as the governor in council prescribes, $3,500,000.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, could the minister tell us if it is intended that this subject matter shall be dealt with by legislation at the next session or will it be continued as an item in the estimates from year to year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can give the hon. member a final answer on the question as to the form, but I may say to him that we have been working diligently on this matter. It is one of tremendous complexities, as I am sure he will readily appreciate. It is our hope that the benefits will be brought into effect on January 1, 1960, for the benefit of the persons in the government service and that, of course, will include not only persons in the civil service, but the benefits of this medical-surgical plan will be available also to the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the armed forces and their dependants.

It is expected the premiums may commence in December because, as I have indicated, we hope to bring the plan into effect with benefits from January 1. The precise form of the plan is in course of being determined at the present time. We have consulted a number of interested organizations as to their suggestions for the specifications of the plan. I can assure the committee that the matter is receiving a great deal of study in the hope that we can make a good plan of this when it is inaugurated.

Mr. Benidickson: What is the opportunity of members of parliament, ministers or parliamentary secretaries, in connection with eligibility under this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): None, Mr. Chairman. The present plan which, of course, is quite limited by comparison has never been extended to include members of parliament or any of those enumerated by the hon. member.

Insurance—

148. Departmental administration, $694,441.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I understand this is the last item that the minister will be dealing with in connection with his capacity of Minister of Finance other than the supplementary estimates. I may say before it passes that we have had the pleasure of witnessing something this evening that I thought I never would see develop in the house. I would like to commend the minister for the admirable attitude he adopted tonight, and hope that he does not cease, now that he has started, continuing this sort of program and that it will carry over to another session.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the same spirit may I thank all hon. members for their co-operation, both those who spoke for the speeches they made, and particularly those who did not speak for the speeches they did not make.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the minister that we on this side forgive him for all that he has said about us.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Finance. There are a few supplementary items to go through yet.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Citizenship—

500. Citizenship registration branch — further amount required, $121,780.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not expect an answer from the hon. lady. I just want to renew the plea I made twice before that there should not be deportations, or the threat of deportations, of the parents of small children who are Canadian citizens.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member surely realizes that this is citizenship registration and has nothing to do with immigration.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite well aware of that, but I am referring to citizens and the parents of citizens.

Item agreed to.

National Gallery of Canada—

547. Administration, operation and maintenance—further amount required for the completion of the permanent Canadian pavilion at the Venice international biennale of art, $10,000.

Mr. Benidickson: Has there been any change in the salaries made available to the chairman of the civil service commission who has been newly appointed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman; he receives the same salary as the former incumbent.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

A—Department—

General administration—

529. Departmental administration, including the expenses of the international labour conferences—further amount required, $11,700.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Labour is not available at the moment and this would seem to be an appropriate occasion to ask the Prime Minister, or perhaps the Minister of Finance, although I think tonight we would prefer to hear the Prime Minister—most of us feel we have heard enough of the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Too much for you?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —as to the government's intentions with regard to the winter works program. The Minister of Labour has not given us satisfactory answers on this question. When we recall the situation that prevailed in this house last summer, when the Leader of the Opposition in particular reminded the government that there was likely to be a high level of unemployment in the fall of 1958 and in the winter of 1959, and on that account it would be wise to take preparatory steps so that any government program designed to put unemployed people to work during those two periods could be taken with a maximum result. In view of that experience we feel, notwithstanding the questions that have been put to the Minister of Labour during the course of the past month, we should take advantage of this last opportunity to ask the Prime Minister whether the government, in the face of certain indices indicating some measure of unemployment next winter, will not take the committee into its confidence at this time so that the kind of situation deplored the other day by the mayor of Ottawa could be obviated and municipalities could be given an opportunity to prepare their budgets for schemes that are designed to put men and women to work.

We were not satisfied, of course, with the results of the winter works program last year, a program that put some 35,000 men to work out of half a million of unemployed in our country. That scheme, inadequate though it was, was better than nothing. It would seem, in order to make it more effective, that advance notice well ahead of time should be given to municipalities and to provinces so that they could be made aware of the government's intention. The result would be, I am sure, that next spring, assuming the existence of unemployment on something like a comparable or even on a lesser level, the problem would have been more effectively mitigated than was the case this year.

It is not good enough to have the government announce its program, as it was announced last year, in the middle of the fall, at a time when the provinces and the municipalities could not take full advantage of the government's proposal. While the economic situation in the country would seem to bear promise of an improvement—and we all hope that is the case even beyond the indications given by the Minister of Finance —there are indices that point to the fact that there will be unemployment again next fall and winter. The level may not be apparent or fully known but that it will exist I think is incontestable. That being the case, I hope on this the last night of the present session the government will take parliament into its confidence and announce its intentions so that the necessary and preparatory steps can be taken.

I am sure the Prime Minister is seized with the importance of this situation and I hope that he will be able to take advantage of the opportunity now afforded to him of announcing to the country what the government's policy in this particular will be.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, certainly these last hours of the session do reveal a tremendous change in the thinking of the hon. gentleman. He started off this session by picturing dire and terrible unemployment and mounting unemployment situations. I presume that these are almost his last words in this session. He says that while the economic situation would seem to indicate improvement there should be some announcement made regarding a winter works program. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, such a material change in the gloomy outlook of the hon. gentleman indicates that he too, in common with Canadians as a whole, has a realization of the tremendous economic upsurge in this country in the last few months. I know that he is just as desirous as everyone else to note this improvement and that he will be very pleased with the economic change that has taken place which we, with becoming modesty, are able to say we contributed to by the policies which we introduced. With respect to the question asked by the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That was what I was interested in.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I must say I have learned from the hon. gentleman because he usually starts off at length regarding matters that are not covered by the question before he asks the question.

Mr. Chevrier: The Prime Minister has nothing to learn in that respect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to say that the Minister of Labour is watching this improvement with the greatest of interest and also with the anticipation that it will continue.

In so far as the winter works program is concerned, we are very proud of the record that was established in employment as a result of the introduction of this plan and as events transpire within the next few weeks a decision will be made in lots of time, in the event that it is decided to proceed with the plan, to assure that the success of last winter will be multiplied and the number employed under the plan during the coming winter.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this tremendous economic upsurge about which the Prime Minister has spoken does not alter the fact that there is still a greater percentage of unemployed in this country than in the United States or the United Kingdom. While seasonal and other considerations have reduced the number during the summer, seasonal factors will soon be moving against employment. What we are asking is that plans should be made now to take care of this situation if this autumn and winter there should be abnormal unemployment. When this matter was brought up a few days ago the Minister of Labour had this to say as found on page 5958 of Hansard:

> We hope the situation will be such that it will not be necessary to have this program repeated.

Also we hope the situation will be such that this program will not have to be repeated. But this government has an obligation to plan against that situation, to plan in advance a winter works program to take care of the situation if we should have abnormal unemployment. It is not good enought for the Prime Minister to say tonight that they are considering the matter. It is not good enough for the Minister of Labour to say, as he did on July 14:

> Whenever further consideration has to be given to this problem because of circumstances which may arise, this government will always look sympathetically on the matter.

It is not good enough to look sympathetically on the matter of winter unemployment. It is more important to plan in advance with the provinces and municipalities so that such unemployment can be reduced, not by 35,000 out of 600,000 as was the case last winter but more effectively than that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to add to the discussion at this time except to say my information is that so great has been the upsurge that at the present moment there are 200,000 more employed in Canada than at any other time in our history.

Mr. Benidickson: Population increase.

Mr. Herridge: Because of the strong concern of this group about this problem I cannot resist saying a word or two. I cannot resist reminding the Prime Minister that when it was raining in the winter months and we were suffering from widespread unemployment the government did not take credit for that but blamed factors over which they had no control, lack of foreign markets, international conditions, and compared our circumstances with those in the United States, but I notice now that he is taking the credit when the sun shines.

I want to join with the other speakers in urging the Prime Minister to plan now for any unemployment that may develop next winter. Not only is it to the advantage of the human beings concerned but it is to the advantage of the country as a whole to avoid the unfortunate waste that goes with large scale unemployment.

Mr. Benidickson: May I just add that I hope the Prime Minister will take into consideration along the same line the winter works opportunities available under the northern affairs votes for picnic grounds and forest access roads. We know that in 1958 the announcement was made in November. The starting date was December and the provinces were not capable of taking advantage of the program until well on into the winter. I hope that some assurance will be given that this will be continued.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

> That towards making good the supply granted Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1960, the sum of $2,509,880,956.37 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-73, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1960.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Herridge: Can the minister assure the house that the language of this bill is in exact terms with the usual bills?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, the bill follows the established form. There are no departures from that established form.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 5, inclusive, agreed to.

Schedule A agreed to.

Schedule B agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the bill be read a third time now by leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

The house resumed from Tuesday, July 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. C-48, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, this matter was before the house on July 14, just four days ago. I hope, for that reason, I can abbreviate these few remarks. The Senate introduced two amendments to the bill to amend the Income Tax Act, Bill No. C-48, and those are to be found on page 579 of Votes and Proceedings of June 18. As I mentioned on July 14, the first amendment is very simple. On page 11, line 16 of the bill, it is proposed, after the word "or" to insert the word "charterparty". As I mentioned on Tuesday, Mr. Speaker, this is purely a drafting matter and there is no question whatever of substance involved. It is suggested, for that reason, that the amendment be accepted.

However, on the second amendment, some discussion ensued when the matter was before the house on Tuesday. By that amendment the Senate proposed to strike out clause 19 of the bill which is found on page 11 of the bill. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that in the debate on July 14 the house expressed itself in firm terms on the principle of amendments by the Senate to money bills. The Leader of the Opposition said, as recorded on page 5982 of Hansard for that date:

> Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that a very important constitutional principle is involved in this matter. I am sure we all feel that we have a duty to ensure that the rights and privileges of this house are not violated, circumscribed or abridged by any action which we might be taking arising out of action taken in the other place. The rights and privileges of the House of Commons are well known in this matter and the limitations on the action of the other house in respect of those rights and privileges are also well known.

Further along, he referred to my remarks to the effect that the government accepted this course, perhaps reluctantly. Then, he said:

> If the government's reluctance was due to the substance of the amendment in question, it seems to me all the more surprising that the government would take this particular course. If the government's reluctance is due to misunderstandings which may be created in the future because of the procedure we are following and because of the possible effect of that procedure on the rights and privileges of this house, then it seems surprising to me that having this reluctance the government would pursue this particular course.

The government made quite clear its view on this matter. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in his intervention in the debate confirmed very plainly the rights and privileges of this house in the matter of money bills, and reaffirmed the established principle, well recognized in this house, that while the Senate may reject money bills it may not amend them. I wish to remind the house that in introducing the matter I said this at page 5978 of Hansard:

> I wish to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that the government does not concede any right or power on the part of the Senate to amend money bills. Had this been a more serious matter, or had this amendment related to something affecting the revenues, I would have considered it my duty to challenge any infraction of the privileges and rights of this house thereby created.

It was made clear that this clause 19 was not introduced into the bill with the object in view of enlarging the revenues. It was introduced with a view to abridging what was regarded as a discrimination or favoured position enjoyed by foreign business corporations under the Income Tax Act here. In the light of the views expressed in the house, the government is pleased to reaffirm, re-emphasize and reassert the principle that money bills passed by this house may not be amended in the other place.

Mr. Benidickson: Even a reduction in taxation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May not amend money bills, is the time honoured reply, and for that reason the government is proposing a somewhat different course on this occasion.

I shall mention only very briefly the background of the amendment itself. I give this merely because the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) asked some questions on this subject on Tuesday. If the house continues to share the view of the principle at stake in the constitutional aspects of this matter then I take it that the house, having spoken on an earlier occasion on this subject, namely May 4, will desire to affirm the position it took at that time and reject the amendment proposed by the Senate in striking clause 19 out of the bill.

Let me very briefly say that the effect of clause 19 of the bill was to close the class of foreign business corporations which under section 71 of the Income Tax Act now enjoy exemption from taxation under that act,

These corporations, by paying a fee of $100 and proving qualification in other respects, completely escape taxation under the Income Tax Act. While this provision goes back actually to 1918, to the very early days of income tax, it was introduced at a time when the position of corporations doing business outside of Canada was very different from the position that is accorded to those corporations today.

This provision of the act allowing corporations to become foreign business corporations dates from a time when there was no provision for a credit for foreign taxes nor any provision for tax freedom on dividends from foreign subsidiaries. Canadian corporations may now obtain a credit for taxes imposed by foreign governments on their operations abroad, or if they own or control subsidiaries abroad to the extent of owning at least 25 per cent of the shares they may bring dividends from those subsidiaries back to Canada free of Canadian tax. In view of these provisions there seems to be no longer any need for Canadian corporations to use the foreign business corporation classification in order to carry on operations abroad.

I do not wish to detain the house any longer than is strictly necessary. In this respect I can, if the house wishes, go into this subject at greater length but I hope that will not be necessary. There is an abundance of evidence that the circumstances which called this type of exemption into being 40 years ago no longer obtain. I remind the committee we are not taking anything away in clause 19 of this bill from any corporation that had qualified up to the night the budget was brought in or was in a position then to qualify, but the effect of the amendment was to close this class so that no more corporations could, under present circumstances, acquire rights under it.

I said at that time that the closing of this class would give us an opportunity to go into this subject at greater length in our studies to determine what value, if any, there was to Canada in allowing corporations which have no assets in Canada or property in Canada to enjoy this particular form of tax exemption. I will therefore not dwell on that subject unless hon. members so choose. But I come back to the principle which I submit is well recognized in this house and which, for my part, I am glad to have the opportunity to ask the house to reassert on this occasion. It is a proposition that is described by Bourinot in his fourth edition at page 285, in these words:

> —the Senate is now practically guided by the same principle which obtains with the House of Lords and acquiesces in all those measures of taxation and supply which the majority in the House of Commons have sent up for their assent as a co-ordinate branch of the legislature.

May I simply close my remarks on this aspect of the matter by recalling the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in this house in a similar situation on September 7, 1917. This is the way in which Sir Wilfrid put it, and I am sure the house will not question the assertion of Sir Wilfrid on a constitutional question. He said this:

> It is a well-known principle that the upper chamber can reject any bill, even though it deals with financial matters, that has been passed by this house. The Senate can reject the supply bill; it can reject a bill adopted by the committee of ways and means of this house, but it cannot amend such bills. This principle has been affirmed over and over again.

On this occasion I am asking that the house reaffirm the principle. I am therefore moving, Mr. Speaker, the following motion, seconded by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

> That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house agrees to the first amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-48, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, being an amendment to clause 18 of the said bill, but disagrees with the second amendment, whereby the Senate would strike out clause 19 of the said bill, for the following reasons:—
> 1. The outright exemption of foreign business corporations from tax under the said act should not be extended to corporations which have not qualified or cannot qualify as foreign business corporations in accordance with the provisions of the said clause 19.
>
> 2. The class of tax-exempt foreign business corporations under section 71 of the said act should be closed pending a review of the position of such corporations and the value to Canada of permitting more corporations to qualify as such.
> 3. The said amendment of the Senate infringes the sole and undoubted right of the Commons to impose taxation; it alters the application of taxes and interferes with the public revenue.

Mr. Speaker: Before the Leader of the Opposition speaks, may I say this. I take it that the Minister of Finance considers that the proposed amendment does not now infringe on standing order 63 by reason of the fact that the remaining amendment does not alter any of the conditions, etc., of the grants involved.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Exactly so, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the government submitted to the house this Senate amendment the other day, the position we took then on this side with regard to the procedure was the position which has been put forward by the minister today and which has been embodied in this motion. We are therefore naturally gratified that the government has taken this position and we will support it. I should like to add, however, an expression of hope that as to the substance of the matter contained in the Senate amendment, which we think had much to recommend itself, the government will give consideration to that matter with a view perhaps to bringing in next year the kind of amendment which the Senate submitted to the house and which we thought was an improvement. However, as far as the procedure is concerned, we think that nothing should be done which can infringed in any way the rights and privileges of this house by Senate action. As I have said, we are therefore gratified that the government has taken the course we recommended the other day.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): On behalf of this group, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that we are very pleased indeed that the Minister of Finance has made this announcement tonight. In so doing, he has shown a willingness to support the argument put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) on behalf of this group, when he first introduced the legislation. It is another illustration of the effectiveness of the opposition.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING REPRESENTATIONS ON PRICES, ETC.—APPLICATION TO FISHING AGREEMENTS

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-70, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill has been the subject of discussion between representatives of the various parties and has also, as you will recall, been the subject of an earlier statement by myself as to our intentions with respect to its disposition. On July 7 I made a statement as to the government's intention and at that time indicated that by leave of the house I intended to divide the bill, leaving over for next session those portions of the original bill which deal with amendments to combines, mergers and monopolies provisions, leaving for consideration at this session only the portions dealing with small businesses and an additional section introduced on that date to take care of a situation arising in the fisheries industry in British Columbia as a result of the report of the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act. Accordingly, our original bill was dropped and a new bill, namely Bill No. C-70 now before the house, was introduced.

This bill consists of four clauses. The first three are those dealing with the situation of small businesses. First, there is a clause to deal with misleading advertising; second, a clause to deal with the situation arising under section 34 of the present Combines Investigation Act; and, third, a clause dealing with unfair pricing practices. Then the fourth clause is the one introduced to take care of the fisheries situation in British Columbia.

Since that time—that is, since July 7 when I made my previous statement—I have to advise the house that I have received a number of further representations, both from members of the house itself and from organizations throughout the country, to the effect that the provisions of the first three clauses, while important and while dealing with an urgent situation, nevertheless require further consideration. I have received representations from such organizations as the Co-operative Union of Canada pointing out that in their view the bill in its present form would confront them with certain problems about which they are gravely concerned. As I have said, other organizations as well as members of parliament have represented that the bill requires a great deal of study and should have further consideration.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the interest and concern which have been shown in connection with this bill are to me an indication of the importance of the subject matter with which it deals. This bill, as it now stands with respect to the first three clauses, is an attempt—and I believe it will be an effective and useful attempt—to deal with extremely grave difficulties now confronting small businesses in this country.

I would have liked to proceed with the bill at this session for the reason which I indicate, namely the urgency of the problem which confronts these small businesses. But by reason of the importance of the situation and of the importance of our economy of maintaining the maximum number of small, independent private enterprises, I consider it is our duty to ensure that the legislation we introduce be in the best, most effective and most workable form.

Therefore, in view of the number of representations I have received—I must say I have had some criticisms, although the criticisms have been outnumbered by the constructive and helpful suggestions—as to the desirability of further consideration of some changes which might be made, I consider that to proceed with the bill at this stage of the session would not be helpful in view of the obvious proximity of the closing of the session, which might indeed mean that we would pass a bill in a form which was not the best form that such legislation could take. While I recognize, therefore, that to delay the bill would be a matter of real concern to the small businesses of this country and the organizations which speak for them, I would ask the house, and will ask those organizations and others concerned in the matter, to believe that their interests may well be better served by giving a little further time for reflection on the legislation which has now taken concrete form, in the hope that in the interim we may receive further constructive suggestions and in the belief that those suggestions will help us to bring in legislation which will be the best we can devise to meet the problems that I have discussed. Therefore I would ask the house for its consent, when we get into committee, to move that the first three clauses be deleted.

I announce it now as the firm intention of the government to re-introduce the legislation at the next session. I do not say that it will be in exactly the same form because we will be considering the suggestions which are made in the interim, as I am sure they will be, by small business organizations themselves as well as by others. But I do announce now that it is the firm intention of the government to re-introduce legislation along these lines at the next session and to proceed with and deal with that legislation at that session.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that a motion to delete clauses 1, 2 and 3 is in effect an expanded negative and would therefore not normally be in order; but it seems to me to be the neatest way to deal with the problem which confronts us, if the house itself agrees with me that it would be a wise course to defer consideration of those three clauses at this time. I will not ask for the deletion of clause 4, because for reasons which perhaps I can discuss better in committee it is, I consider, urgent that we enact clause 4 so as to take care of the situation in British Columbia in the fishing industry which would result if we did not bring in this exemption from the operation of the act for a two-year period. It is on that basis, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that I would ask the house to consent to second reading at this time on the understanding that I will ask one of my colleagues to move in committee that the bill be amended by the deletion of the first three clauses.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the course which has been proposed by the minister seems to us in the circumstances to be a sensible one.

[Mr. Fulton.]

We will agree to second reading on the understanding that that course will be followed in committee.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, that represents our position with respect to the proposal made by the minister, which appears to be a commendable attitude at this stage in view of the importance of the legislation itself. I would suggest, though, that the minister in re-introducing amendments to the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code in so far as combines are concerned, attempt to have the legislation drafted for introduction as early as possible at the next session. I would also ask him to consider having the bill itself referred to perhaps the banking and commerce committee in order that a little more exhaustive study may be given to it than could be given in committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clause 1—Misrepresentations as to ordinary price.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, in accordance with the undertaking I gave on debate on second reading, I would ask one of my colleague to move that clauses 1, 2 and 3 of Bill No. C-70 be deleted, and that clause 4 be renumbered clause 1 of the bill.

Mr. Churchill moved the following amendment:

That clauses 1, 2 and 3 be deleted and that clause 4 be renumbered as clause 1.

Motion (Mr. Churchill) agreed to.

On clause 4 (renumbered 1)—Application of acts to fishing agreements.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a comment or two on clause 1, because of the particular effect it will have on the situation in British Columbia so far as the fishing industry is concerned. I suggest that it has always been the understanding that the present section 4 of the Combines Investigation Act and the particular subsection in one part of the Criminal Code which says this shall not apply to employees or workmen afforded reasonable protection in themselves and always has been construed, in any event to means that fishermen on the west coast bargaining through their union with the fisheries association or with the fishing companies have been excluded from the provisions of the act. It certainly came as quite a shock to the native brotherhood of British Columbia, and to two or three other organizations of fishermen as well as to the companies themselves, that they should have been considered, at least by Mr. McDonald in his statement of evidence, as having operated over the years through what was considered to be a process of normal collective bargaining, and by that collective bargaining to have operated in contravention of the statute itself. This will place, in effect, a moratorium on that suggestion of alleged illegality under the statute for this year and for next year.

It has been suggested that this should be included now, or drafted in such a way as clearly to indicate that the act will not apply to fishermen in the conduct of their affairs, not only on the west coast—I notice this confines itself specifically to British Columbia—but to other parts of Canada. Although there may well be in other parts of Canada similar organizations, unions and collective bargaining processes between fishermen and the employers in the industry, who have been carrying on their collective bargaining processes in precisely the same way as is done in British Columbia, they may yet find themselves not protected by this particular clause inasmuch as it is restricted to British Columbia.

I realize that it is most unwise to attempt to draft legislation in committee because the changes and amendments advanced by hon. members sometimes fail to meet the situation they are intended to meet but for the two reasons with which I dealt I am going to advance a proposal for the consideration of the minister although I do not advance it as a formal amendment. I would propose deleting everything after the word "apply" in the second line and substituting therefor the words "to combinations of fishermen for their own reasonable protection". That portion of the clause would then read:

> Nothing in the Combines Investigation Act or in section 411 of the Criminal Code shall be construed to apply to combinations of fishermen for their own reasonable protection.

The minister may consider that this wording does not adequately meet the problem but I put forward this suggestion to cover the two points I mentioned. Fishermen should not be in a position of wondering whether they have committed an offence, and this should not be restricted to British Columbia because fishermen elsewhere may be engaging in the same type of activities.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, may I state that we on this side do not consider that this kind of collective bargaining represents a combine. We agree with the hon. member who has just spoken that any doubts on that matter should be removed. We would be interested to hear the minister's reaction to the suggestion that has just been made to that end.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the remarks that have been made by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Skeena. There were two questions raised. The first one raised by the hon. member for Skeena was whether the act should be made of more general application. I believe the answer to that is that so far as I can ascertain there is no situation anywhere else in Canada comparable to the situation in the fishing industry in British Columbia, for a variety of reasons. As far as I am aware that is the only place where there is an organization calling itself a fishermen's union that operates in the way this one does with agreements with companies, and so on. Whether I am right or wrong in saying it is the only place where this method of bargaining or price setting takes place, the fact is that this is the only area in which such activities on the part of fishermen and fishing companies are now being investigated.

We considered it very carefully. It was my thought that in making an exemption of this type it would be desirable to confine it as narrowly as possible. We are making an exemption from an act of general application and therefore I believe it is wise to confine the exemption only to those cases where such an exemption is demonstrably necessary.

With regard to the second question as to what should be our attitude toward the bargaining activities carried on between the U.F.A.W.U. and the fish packing companies and as to whether or not such bargaining activities should clearly be exempted from the Combines Investigation Act, I am sure my hon. friends would not expect me to make any definite commitment at this time until I see the report that will be made by the restrictive trade practices commission.

When we receive that report we will have to consider first of all whether it discloses an offence. If so, we will then have to consider whether or not we should institute legal proceedings. I think I should say that possibly our final decision cannot be made until after any legal action which is instituted shall have been determined and we get the decision of the court.

I am quite satisfied that the union will raise the point that it is a union within the meaning of the word as used in the combines act and therefore that its activities do not come under the provisions of that act. That will be a question before the commission and depending upon the finding of the commission it may be a question before the court. The question, as I understand it, is whether in fact this is a union of employees or, rather, an association of independent producers or fishermen.

I am not going to say any word which would indicate that I prejudge that situation or the answer to that question. I would only say that when we have the report of the commission and possibly—if this should be the case and if it should go to court—the decision of the court, then depending on that report and/or that decision it will be necessary for consideration to be given to the question which may be stated in these terms. If it is decided as a matter of policy that this type of bargaining activity is desirable and should be allowed to continue unfettered by the Combines Investigation Act, then consideration will have to be given to the question of whether or not some appropriate legislative action should be taken by either the provincial or federal authorities, as the case may be, to ensure that the arrangements that it is desired as a matter of policy to allow to continue should be allowed to continue under the protection of whatever legislative umbrella may at that time be thought to be appropriate and in accordance with proper policy.

I do not think I could usefully add very much more at this time without being in danger of prejudging the case or of suggesting some commitment which at the present time it would be improper for me to make. I will only say that it seems to us that the wisest course—indeed the sensible course on all counts—is to introduce the present provision by virtue of which whatever has been done in the past may be continued in the present and for the two-year period ending on December 31, 1960, without any possibility of prejudice to any party, whether it be the union or the companies, notwithstanding whatever may be the finding of the commission or the decision of the court, if legal proceedings are instituted. In that way I think we are preserving the status quo without any possibility of penalty or prejudice. This will give all parties, including the governments, time to take a good look at the situation and decide what is the sensible course to follow in the light of the situation that may be disclosed following the finding of the commission.

Another question with which I should deal is that of the proposal which my hon. friend said he would like to have moved as an amendment. I appreciate his intention in this matter, but I think I should point out to him that such an amendment would not answer the situation because it would not take care of the case of the companies; although I am not saying that the case of the companies is right or wrong.

Here we have a situation where there is bargaining between the U.F.A.W.U. and the companies. I do not think we can take care of that situation by saying the unions only are protected because then the unions would have protection, but the companies which have to be parties to the same agreement which may be contrary to the act, would not be protected. So that if we adopted the amendment of my hon. friend, which merely covers the union, it would not protect the companies if they decide to continue those negotiations in the interim period during which we are trying to protect all parties.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, the lucid and detailed explanation and argument of the minister in regard to the two questions I submitted should be considered. However, at this time I should like to deal with the question of confining it to a geographic area. The minister says he has not been able to discover a condition existing in Canada similar to that which exists in British Columbia in so far as the collective bargaining processes are concerned. I do not know. That may be true. I am sure it is correct that such a situation does not exist at the moment.

But there is this possibility which might arise. In as much as the government and the minister are intending to allow certain processes to take place in British Columbia, notwithstanding what they may have been doing in the past, I believe we should consider this possibility. It may arise this year or next year some time that in the fishing industry in some other part of Canada they will develop a union similar to the U.F.A.W.U. which might carry on negotiations under the collective bargaining processes in the same manner as does the U.F.A.W.U. with the fishing association of British Columbia. If that condition does arise then I believe we would be well advised to take cognizance of the possibility of it existing, and perhaps the words "in British Columbia" in the two instances where they appear should be removed. It will not be upsetting anything, and it will be guaranteeing some sort of legislative protection to other people in similar activities in other parts of Canada in case the condition does arise.

Mr. Fulton: I think I can dispose of my hon. friend's concern by saying it is scarcely likely that the combines branch would institute and press another inquiry into a similar situation if one exists, or if one should arise, until this inquiry is finally disposed of. I make that comment as minister. I think it is scarcely likely that such an inquiry would be pressed until this one is disposed of. At that time we will have to decide how to deal with such situations wherever they may exist in Canada.

Mr. Howard: May I express another thought on that, Mr. Chairman. Until this particular investigation started, in so far as the fishermen of British Columbia are concerned, was not that section of the act—I forget the precise part of it—the section which states that any six citizens in Canada can—if they make a statement of evidence to the effect that because of the conditions existing they think there is a combine existing—start the ball rolling in so far as an investigation is concerned, and the director then is duty bound to proceed with such an investigation, as was done in this case. There is the possibility but I do not say it will arise. Suppose the Newfoundland fishermen decided to establish a union, I think it would be a commendable thing for them to do there—

An hon. Member: It would be outlawed.

Mr. Howard: If they decided to do that and if they commenced bargaining under the same process with a company there as was done in British Columbia, could some six citizens—I hope they are not all Liberals—decide to start the ball rolling toward an investigation, and the director would then be duty bound to proceed in so far as the conditions existed at that particular moment. They might fall within this two-year period. Just to cover the possibility I think the minister should undertake to remove the words "British Columbia" which appear in this clause.

Mr. Fulton: I still think, Mr. Chairman, it is sounder to confine the exemption only to those situations that demonstrably require to be covered by the exemption.

I want to reassure my hon. friend that, although he is perfectly correct, if there should be established another union similar to the one in British Columbia and if negotiations between it and fishing companies should take place and if six people formally made representations to the director, he is quite right, the director would then have to institute an inquiry.

We discussed this matter on my estimates in the light of some criticisms then made. These inquiries take a long, long time between the first step taken by the director and the final disposition by the courts, or indeed even by the restrictive trade practices commission. That is quite true. I think, therefore, I am quite safe in saying to my hon. friend that in the situation he envisages we could count on the final disposition of the British Columbia case before an inquiry in some other part of Canada had produced any prejudice to any party who might be involved.

Mr. Howard: One other point. I guess I did not try hard enough. I am going to get a change made in this clause somehow or other. I think I had better do it in a formal way and the minister will see how necessary it is to have some watchdogs over on this side of the house. I would point out to the minister that the last word on the fourth line of clause 1 is "Colombia". It is misspelled. It should have a "u" in there. Accordingly, I would like to move.

That clause 1 be amended by deleting in line 4 thereof the misspelled word "Colombia" and substituting therefor the word "Columbia".

Mr. Fulton: I shall be glad to accept the amendment.

BRIDGES

AUTHORIZATION OF CONSTRUCTION ACROSS NIAGARA RIVER

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-30, to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Niagara river between the province of Ontario and the state of New York.

Mr. Benidickson: Is that a toll bridge?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clause 1—Approval of bridge.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this bill has nothing to do with the maintenance or operation of the bridge. There will have to be legislation next year dealing with that. This bill has two purposes and two only. It is based on the urgent request of the province of Ontario. The first purpose is to permit the construction of a new bridge across the Niagara river between Queenston on the Canadian side and Lewiston on the United States side. The second purpose is to enlarge the powers of the Queenston Heights Bridge Company to make it quite clear that it had the power to sell the present bridge to the Niagara bridge commission.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Leader of the Opposition suggests that I ask this question. Can the minister explain why in clause 3 the lieutenant governor is given the power to designate an authority that might not be a resident of Canada? Indeed, the authority might be an American authority. Would the minister, knowledgeable as he is on this and on so many other matters, give me a reply that would be adequate to the occasion?

Bridges

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thank my hon. friend for his overwhelming flattery. I never thought I would live to see the day, or I should say the night, when I would hear that. It is very agreeable indeed.

Perhaps we are getting ahead of ourselves when we talk about clause 3, but the fact is that the Niagara bridge commission exists under legislation of congress and it is a rather extraordinary thing that the provision that is made for appointment to the membership of that commission of certain representatives of Ontario exists not by virtue of legislation passed in Canada but by legislation passed at Washington. I am informed that following the enactment of the present bill further legislation will be required to be enacted by congress and also by this parliament next year dealing with such questions as the one asked by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. But the purposes of the bill are quite simple and, as hon. members realize, the bridge will connect the New York thruway and the Queen Elizabeth way.

BRIDGES

AUTHORIZATION OF CONSTRUCTION ACROSS PIGEON RIVER

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill S-31, to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pigeon river between the province of Ontario and the state of Minnesota.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Badanai: The Pigeon river is the boundary line between the United States and the province of Ontario. Has an interdepartmental committee gone thoroughly into the question of the size of the bridge to be built and has the location been selected?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member realizes, the purpose of this bill is to provide for broader purposes than the previous bill. This one is intended to provide for the construction, operation and maintenance of a bridge over the Pigeon river to connect highways in the province of Ontario and the state of Minnesota. The bill is introduced at the request of the province of Ontario and it authorizes the province to enter into an agreement with the state of Minnesota for this purpose. It is our information that appropriate legislation already exists in the United States.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-49, to provide for the establishment of a national energy board.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I want to take advantage of the opportunity to ask the minister a question at this point. He will recall that I was critical of the government. I argued that they were responsible for some delay with respect to this matter and I concluded by expressing the hope that the board would be appointed very quickly after the bill passed. I have two questions I should like to ask him now. First, is it the intention to proceed with the appointment of the board as soon as authority is finally granted by parliament? Second, can he give the house any further information as to when we may expect the second report from the Borden commission?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In answer to the first question, the intention is to proceed as rapidly as possible with the appointment of the energy board. With regard to the second question, it is expected that the second report will be presented soon. I cannot give the exact date.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPEAL OF CERTAIN LAWS RESPECTING EXPORTATION OF SALT FISH

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill S-32, to repeal certain fisheries laws in force in the province of Newfoundland respecting the exportation of salt fish.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I say just a word in explanation. The explanatory note in the bill is sufficient, I think, but in order that there shall be no doubt about it may I say that a year ago I gave 12 months notice that the exclusive licence to export fish would be discontinued in so far as it affected Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters Limited. Consequent upon that, it is necessary to repeal the act which required permits for the export of fish. The exclusive right to export fish ends on July 31 of this year. It would be necessary then, and this is in accord with the wishes of the Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters Limited, that the permit system be discontinued. Hence, this legislation which has been introduced.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I do not intend to inflict a speech on the house at this hour of the night, but I do want to say that it seems to me very regrettable indeed that when this announcement was made over a year ago this legislation, which was obviously necessary, could not have been introduced at sometime during the session when it would have been possible to discuss this very important subject. I should like to remind you, sir, and remind the house, that the exportable surplus of salt codfish and codfish generally, in relation to the total production of this country is probably higher than that of any other commodity in the country and very much higher than wheat, as I discovered over 20 years ago when I first came to Ottawa from western Canada and had the view that perhaps many people in western Canada have that this industry is not as important as one finds it is.

For many years the marketing of the fish from Newfoundland was carried on by a lot of individual firms and there was cutthroat competition in the markets, a deplorable state in the markets. In order to overcome this, this system which has many analogies though also many differences with the wheat board system in western Canada grew up. Obviously, when Newfoundland became a part of Canada it was impossible to have a controlled marketing situation indefinitely in one province and an uncontrolled situation in the other provinces producing the same commodity. I have no criticism to make of the decision of the government to end NAFEL's exclusive licence. I think it was inevitable. It was just a question of timing, and I am not even criticizing the timing.

I do not intend to spend more than a minute or two on a point upon which I could have taken a great deal of time under other circumstances, perhaps on the minister's estimates. It does seem to me that a return to cutthroat competition by Canadian producers is going to be suicidal to the industry. We have competition from the Norwegians, the French, the Icelanders and from many other producers of fish in the foreign markets, and all our competitors are subsidized. The Canadian producer has to face subsidized exports from all these countries, and to face them without anything comparable. I wish I knew the answer to this problem, and I would be glad to put it forward, but I am quite convinced that some method has to be found, by some device or other, so that the Canadian producers will not be competing with one another in the markets for any considerable length of time.

I hope the minister and his officials, and the Minister of Fisheries who is so familiar with this problem and his officials, will use their utmost energy in tackling this problem. I know there have been conferences with the producers in some other provinces, and also with the exporters. I know some of the difficulties. I know this is not an easy problem to solve at all, but a decent livelihood for these primary producers depends upon its solution. It should be tackled, and tackled with the utmost vigour and the utmost dispatch, and should be solved so that we will not have any lengthy period of real depression in the industry before there is a solution.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

LEGISLATION RESPECTING ORGANIZATION AND DISCIPLINE—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. C-34, respecting the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the minister if, as I believe it is, this is the amendment he said he would undertake to have made in the other place at my suggestion when we debated this matter?

Mr. Fulton: That is correct. The Senate —I do not like to say at the request of the government, but the matter was discussed with members of the other place—in accordance with the undertaking I gave here the Senate amended the bill to provide that immediately after subclause (2) of clause 20, there should be inserted the following subclause 3:

> The minister shall lay before parliament a copy of every arrangement made under subsection (1) within 15 days after it is made or, if parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first 15 days next thereafter that parliament is sitting.

The arrangements referred to are any new contracts with a province for the R.C.M.P. to carry out policing within the province.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister satisfied himself in that case there was no present obligation to table these under the Regulations Act.

Mr. Fulton: That is correct, yes.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

CRIMINAL CODE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. C-58, to amend the Criminal Code.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

GRAIN

ANNOUNCEMENT ON RAILWAY BOX CAR DISTRIBUTION

Mr. Speaker: I understand the Minister of Trade and Commerce is requesting leave to revert to motions. Is it the pleasure of the house to give such leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have an important announcement to make with regard to railway box car distribution. The government has given careful consideration to the report of the inquiry into the distribution of railway box cars as submitted by Mr. John Bracken and also to the representations relating to this report submitted to the government by the wheat pools, the United Grain Growers Limited and the Northwest line elevators association.

The Canadian wheat board, in allocating box cars to elevator companies, has been operating under an instruction issued to it by my predecessor in office, Right Hon. C. D. Howe, dated July 13, 1954. This instruction was of a very general nature and its administration depended in a large measure on the judgment of the Canadian wheat board. Under this directive the allocation of box cars was based primarily on the proportion of business each company enjoyed prior to congestion developing.

In its administration of delivery quota policy in times of congestion of country and terminal elevators the wheat board has over the years taken the position that available elevator space should be used to the greatest possible extent and that railway cars, as far as possible, should be placed at delivery points which are congested and lagging in respect to delivery quotas, rather than at delivery points where space is available.

I now wish to comment on the main recommendations as submitted to the government by Mr. Bracken. It is noted that Mr. Bracken's recommendations are framed to allow farmers the fullest possible exercise of their right to deliver to the elevator of their choice in times of congestion. While emphasizing the importance of freedom of choice in selection of elevators by farmers, Mr. Bracken states clearly in his recommendation No. 4 as follows:

> It is recommended that no procedure be allowed to impair the wheat board's sales efficiency or to get in the way of bringing forward the kinds and grades of grain most needed to meet market requirements from time to time.

Mr. Bracken indicated the overriding necessity of the board to give primary consideration to the movement of the kinds of grain and the grades of grain required to meet market demand. Whatever else happens, every opportunity should be taken to get grain into export and domestic markets. This has been the policy of the wheat board over the years, and must continue to be the primary responsibility of the board.

The general approach of the inquiry to the problem which it had in hand is indicated by Mr. Bracken's recommendation No. 1, which reads as follows:

> It is recommended that the present box car distribution procedure give way to a more fully competitive elevator operation—both at local points and as between companies—as far as this is practical under present conditions.

I am sure that producers and elevator companies alike share the view that there should be maximum competition in the handling of producers' grain. This recommendation is qualified by the words "as far as this is practical under present conditions". No doubt Mr. Bracken appreciated the requirements of the wheat board as a merchandising organization, the need for some attention to equality in delivery opportunity and the need to utilize as fully as possible available storage space during times of elevator congestion. These are very practical and reasonable qualifications.

Mr. Bracken's recommendation No. 5 is most important, dealing as it does with the concept of a more competitive elevator operation. This recommendation reads as follows:

> It is recommended that, whatever the future policy of banning shipments may be, at points which have one or more full elevators, while others have space available for new business, the practice of embargoing shipments from full elevators at such points be discontinued.

In this recommendation lies the crux of the report of the inquiry. Here Mr. Bracken breaks new ground and departs from the established policy of the board. He is of the opinion that a congested elevator is entitled to relief except, perhaps, toward the end of a crop year when the board is endeavouring to equalize delivery quotas. He considers that over the greater part of a crop year cars should be supplied to congested elevators in order that they may continue as competitive factors on the local market.

This point has been discussed with the wheat board, and the board believes that it is possible to modify its present procedures by giving relief to elevators which are congested, except toward the end of the crop year when an endeavour is being made to equalize delivery quotas. The general approach will be to provide out-of-order cars to elevators which are congested and are unable to receive grain from producers. As recommended by Mr. Bracken such out-of-order cars will be chargeable to a company's subsequent allocation.

Mr. Bracken's recommendation No. 8 (ii) (a) states:

> That the allocation of shipping orders to different elevator companies be on the basis of current business earned by each.

This is a principle that is basically sound and in keeping with the policy of a more competitive elevator system. Mr. Bracken's recommendation No. 8 (ii) (c) is also important. It reads as follows:

> That each elevator at a shipping point be kept in a position to compete fairly with the others by the receipt of sufficient shipping orders from its parent company, and sufficient cars from the railway, to keep it from being "plugged" and thus out of business when others are not.

The wheat board will continue to allocate shipping orders to the head offices of elevator companies which in turn will distribute these shipping orders to their local elevators. This recommendation represents a continuation of the present practice of the wheat board and is in line with the objective of maintaining a more highly competitive elevator business.

These are the main operating recommendations of the inquiry. Other recommendations deal primarily with matters of procedure in relation to the important recommendations which I have already commented upon.

Under conditions of grain surplus, all grain storage capacity in Canada is required if producers are going to continue to market in each crop year a volume of grain in excess of 500 million bushels. Our total storage capacity in Canada is estimated at 636 million bushels, with an actual working capacity of some 550 million bushels. Of this total elevator capacity, approximately 60 per cent is country elevator capacity. To a greater extent than ever before country elevator storage capacity has been used not only for the receiving and shipping of grain but for the storage of grain. Therefore, whatever changes are made at this time, full use will have to be made of our country elevator capacity as well as our terminal capacity, if producers are to continue to deliver as large a volume of grain as they have marketed in recent years.

We are endeavouring to continue the effective use of our elevator storage capacity, and at the same time, to create conditions of more equity for producers in the delivery of their grain, and more competition in the handling of their grain.

The new instructions to the Canadian wheat board will result in a gradual rather than sudden change in the relationship between the board and the elevator companies in so far as shipping orders are concerned. The objective will be to place individual elevator companies in the position where they can earn larger handlings of producers' grain.

I should now like to read the new instruction which will become effective on August 1, 1959. It is dated Ottawa, July 18, 1959. It is addressed to Mr. W. C. McNamara, chief commissioner, the Canadian wheat board, Winnipeg, Manitoba and it reads as follows:

> Dear Mr. McNamara:
>
> The government has given careful consideration to the report of the inquiry into the distribution of railway box cars. In view of the findings of the inquiry, the instruction given to your board under date of July 13, 1954, is cancelled.
>
> It is now the desire of the government that on and after August 1, 1959, your board should be guided by the following principles emphasized in the report of the inquiry. These principles are:
>
> (1) Primary consideration must be given to the movement of the kinds of grain and the grades of grain required to meet sales commitments and to facilitate your selling operations.
> (2) Subject to (1) above and as far as current circumstances and reasonable equality in delivery opportunity permits, it should be your objective to provide:
>
> (a) that producers should have the opportunity of delivering their grain to the elevator or elevators which they wish to patronize; and
> (b) that elevator companies which act as your agents should have reasonable opportunity of competing with one another in the handling of producers' grain.
>
> In implementing the principles outlined above it is the view of the government that you should, as far as practicable, give attention to:
> (1) The need of a congested elevator for shipping orders.
>
> (2) Current grain receipts of each elevator company as a factor in determining the division of board shipping orders.
>
> In carrying out this instruction it is the responsibility of your board to advise each elevator company from time to time of its share of shipping orders.
> In conveying this new instruction to you, I realize that you are dealing with a very complex situation, with overriding factors involved. Therefore, following the completion of the crop year 1959-60, I would like to review this instruction with you in the light of your administrative experience.

That letter is signed by myself. I expect that the Canadian wheat board will issue detailed instructions to the trade within the next few days in light of the broad principles outlined in the directive which I have just read.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I express my appreciation to Mr. Bracken and his colleagues who assisted in this inquiry. They have made a thorough investigation of this important aspect of grain marketing. Their report is the first authoritative study of box car distribution problems in western Canada and will serve as a useful guide in these matters for many years.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think this is the first occasion on which I have ever had to speak on box cars. The circumstances are somewhat surprising in that we are in the last minutes of the last day of the session. I realize that the minister's statement deals with a matter of concern among producers in western Canada, and I hope the information he has been good enough to give us will help to remove some of that concern.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this is the second occasion on which I have had the opportunity of speaking on box cars, but because I am a bit foggy as to the implications of the minister's statement, can he tell me if the statement he has just read will correct the situation which I raised on orders of the day this morning on behalf of several wheat pool committees in Saskatchewan which had complained of certain deficiencies with respect to the distribution of box cars?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister is now in a position to answer the question I asked him about box cars some time ago which he did not answer at that time?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) asked a question in the course of his statement which, with the leave of the house, might be answered. Perhaps he would ask it again.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I was asking the minister this. I am a bit foggy as to the full implications of his statement because I am not very well acquainted with the distribution of box cars. Would the minister inform the house if his statement corrects the situation that I complained of this morning on orders of the day on behalf of the various wheat pool committees in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, it will have that effect.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps by unanimous consent this sitting might be suspended until the messenger arrives from the other place, to be signified by the ringing of the bell.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, while we are waiting for the messenger to arrive, perhaps you will allow me to follow the usual custom which has been pursued in this house now for some years. It is for the opposition to extend to those who are responsible for the business of the house their thanks and gratitude for the manner in which that business has been conducted during the session. On behalf of the opposition I would like to express to you, Mr. Speaker, our thanks for the manner in which you have accepted our points of view. While we have not always agreed with the decisions which you have handed down, and while sometimes we may have felt on this side of the house that they were not in accordance with our liking, none the less I would I think be remiss in my duty were I not to say to you that since you represent constituted authority in this house we always have respected your judgments and your decisions, and I am sure that such will be the case in the future.

I think, sir, too, that I would like to express to the house leader my thanks for the very co-operative manner in which he and I have gotten along during the course of this session. I can say in all sincerity that because the house leader, who is now the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green), will be going on to higher duties and functions, I take it he will not be in a position to carry on in that capacity at the next session, but I would want him to know that I personally have appreciated a great deal working with him during the course of the session. I would also like to express my hope that the Prime Minister will find it possible to appoint in his stead someone with whom I and those of us who sit on this side of the house will be able to co-operate in order to expedite the business of the house.

I think I would also wish to express a word of thanks to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the acting house leader, for the manner in which he has conducted the proceedings in the last few days in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I think there is one thing which these last few days have indicated and it is that when we in the House of Commons, no matter where we sit, determine and decide that we are going to do a thing in accordance with agreement, then we can do it, and it is all to the credit of those of us who sit on both sides of the house that the agreement which was arrived at was carried out and that the business was done with care, efficiency and expedition.

(Translation):

May I also offer a word of thanks, Mr. Speaker, to the Deputy Speaker of the house for whom I have much admiration, I have perhaps more for the manner in which he presides over the deliberations of this house, because he does so with efficiency and with patience.

(Text):

There was one omission, sir, which I made at the last session of parliament which I would not want to make again, and it is that I omitted involuntarily to say a word of thanks to the chairman of committees. I am sure he will take no offence at that omission, and I want to repair it at once. I want to tell him that while I may have had some hesitation at some of the decisions which he has rendered in an earlier session, I have nothing but commendation for him on this occasion, more particularly because of the manner in which he has presided over the deliberations of the committee during the session. He has proven to this house that he understands the rules and that he intends to put them into effect and into practice fairly and equitably.

Finally, sir, I think those who sit with me on this side of the house would wish me to extend in an especial manner our thanks to the house staff, who in these last few days have been hard put, because of the long hours during which we have had to sit in order to fulfil their duties. They have done them well, and to the Hansard reporters and to those who are responsible for the publication of Hansard, which during the sittings has always been on time in the morning, I express our thanks and our gratitude. From all of those who sit in the House of Commons our very best and good wishes for a happy and pleasant recess.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the remarks made by the hon. member for Laurier concerning yourself, the chairman of the committee, the house leader and the staff, I want to say a round amen. Also I trust the period of the recess will be spent by all hon. members of this house to the general advantage of the people of Canada.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join in this festival of brotherly love to thank the hon. member for Laurier for the delicate manner in which he expressed the appreciation of all of us for those he named and to tell him how much I appreciate the thoughts he expressed in reference to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) who is about to vacate his position as house leader and also to say that the example set by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) in the last few days is indicative of the fact that there are others who can hold that position in a way that will be acceptable to the entire house.

To the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) I wish to express appreciation for the manner in which they brought about that spirit of co-operation which assures to the greatest degree possible the achievement of the responsibility that each of us has in his respective place in the house.

To you, sir, the custodian of the conscience of parliament, and to the Deputy Speaker and the chairman of the committees, I extend appreciation and thanks from all of us for the manner in which you have discharged your responsibilities, difficult though they are, to the complete satisfaction of the members of this house.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I am out of order in rising at this time because two have already spoken from this side but may I in a word, as leader of the official opposition convey my best wishes and warm regards to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), his colleagues and hon. members of the house, I express the hope that they will have a happy recess and come back to the next session energetic and even wiser.

Mr. Speaker: It is usually the privilege of the Speaker to have the last word. I thought I had made my one and only speech of the session this afternoon when I had the pleasure of piloting through the committee the legislation estimates, but I am now inclined to comment on the irregular but very pleasant references that have been made to the conduct of the Speaker.

I am deeply grateful to all hon. members who have spoken so generously and I am also deeply grateful to all hon. members of the house for the co-operation they have accorded to me and the other officers of the house.

When my decisions were right, I perhaps expected acceptance of them, but it is a higher compliment to have received such general acceptance when they were wrong. I extend to all hon. members my good wishes for a happy recess.

The Royal Assent

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Speaker, permit me first of all to tell you how much I appreciated working with you during the session which is now coming to a close. May I express my sincere thanks for your wise counsel and understanding with respect to so many situations. May I also tell Mr. Raymond, Mr. Montgomery and Mr. Dubroy how much I valued their assistance in this house. If at times the various decisions which I made were right it was mostly because of their wise counsel, and if at times my decisions were wrong it was because they were not present to advise me.

I also wish to express my thanks to the members of the staff and my special thanks to the hon. members of the house who bore with me while I made what at times must have sounded like very boring statements.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, allow me to express my fullest gratitude both to you and to all the members of the house, as well as to the Clerk and his deputies who have always given me the benefit of their advice.

Let me also thank my colleagues in the house for their understanding which has so much helped me in solving the problems incumbent upon me. I fully appreciate the extent to which this understanding has assisted me in making rulings in committee.

I am especially grateful to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) for his kind remarks about me.

May the period between now and the next session enrich you in wisdom and happiness.

(Text):

Goodbye to all, and I hope we meet again soon.

Mr. C. E. Rea (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, may I say first of all that I am very happy even to be alive at the conclusion of this session. I do wish to thank hon. members for their kind co-operation and their charitable words which are very much appreciated. I wish to add my thanks to those of Mr. Deputy Speaker for the assistance extended to us by the clerk and officials of the house. I want now to say one last word to all: do have a happy, happy summer holiday.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, July 18, 1959

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 18th July, at 11.45 p.m. for the purpose of proroguing the present session of the parliament of Canada.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute
Secretary to the Governor General
(Administrative)

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

In the Senate chamber, the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to incorporate Standard Trust Company.

An act to incorporate Desjardins Mutual Life Assurance Company.

An act to amend the Public Lands Grants Act.

An act to confirm an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of New Brunswick respecting Indian reserves.

An act to confirm an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Nova Scotia respecting Indian reserves.

An act to provide for contributions and loans to the provinces in respect of crop insurance.

An act to provide for the extension of long term mortgage credit to farmers.

An act to amend the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act and to authorize certain amendments to the agreement made under that act with Dominion Coal Company, Limited.

An act to provide for the humane slaughter of food animals.

An act to provide for the payment of additional grants to the province of Newfoundland.

An act respecting the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

An act to amend the Income Tax Act.

An act to provide for the establishment of a national energy board.

An act to amend the Criminal Code.

An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Niagara river between the province of Ontario and the state of New York.

An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pigeon river between the province of Ontario and the state of Minnesota.

An act to repeal certain fisheries laws in force in the province of Newfoundland respecting the exportation of salt fish.

An act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

To these bills the royal assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the following words:

In Her Majesty's name, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General doth assent to these bills.

Then the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed the Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted supplies required to enable the government to defray certain expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1960.

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

To this bill the Clerk of the Senate, by command of the Deputy Governor General, did thereupon say:

In Her Majesty's name, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General thanks her loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this bill.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

After which the Deputy Governor General was pleased to close the second session of the twenty-fourth parliament of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

Canadians have welcomed with profound gratitude the visit of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness the Prince Philip. Her Majesty and the prince are assured of the affection and devotion of the Canadian people and of their deep attachment to the Crown. To mark Her Majesty's visit you have established the Queen Elizabeth II research fund for research into the diseases of children.

It has been gratifying that the President of the United States was able to be present with our Queen on the occasion of the official opening of the St. Lawrence seaway.

Canadians are convinced that every effort must be made to attain and to preserve lasting peace in the world. My government is hopeful that it will be possible at summit meetings of heads of governments to make progress toward the settlement of such important issues as Germany, Berlin, nuclear test explosions and toward agreement on general disarmament.

Meanwhile, it is necessary to maintain the strength of the free world provided by the north Atlantic alliance. To this end an important decision has been reached to re-equip the Canadian air division in Europe with modern and up to date aircraft. You have been informed of the steps being taken for sharing with the United States the production and procurement of defence equipment and have approved an appropriation to support selected development programs related to production sharing.

The government recognizes that the peace of the world cannot be assured by defence measures alone and that economic assistance to less developed countries is a necessity and in Canada's interest. You have authorized an increase in Canada's contribution under the Colombo plan to provide further help for Asian and African nations, particularly those within the commonwealth. You have also voted substantial assistance for the new federation of the West Indies. You have approved a measure to increase Canada's subscriptions to the international bank and the international monetary fund.

It is encouraging to note the strong recovery from the recent recession both abroad and here at home. My government will continue to take whatever steps lie within its power to maintain employment and to sustain sound economic growth.

To improve the lot of those who unfortunately from time to time find themselves unemployed, you have made important amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Emphasis has continued to be placed on national development and financial provision has been made for numerous projects in this field.

Important measures have been approved for the agricultural sector of our economy. You have enacted legislation to provide for loans and grants for provincial crop insurance schemes and a statute has been passed under which long term mortgage credit can be made available to farmers. The new farm credit act provides for substantially larger loans than have hitherto been available.

A national energy board has been established. This important new agency will ensure that, so far as it is within the power of parliament, Canada's energy resources will be conserved and used in the best interests of all our people.

The Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act has been amended to enable a further measure of assistance to this industry on which the livelihood of so many Canadians depend.

You have amended the Export Credits Insurance Act and thus provided a further stimulus for our exports and our trade generally.

Several statutes which go to make up the veterans charter have been amended, broadening the range of benefits to veterans, particularly those who settle on the land.

The Federal-Provincial Tax Sharing Arrangements Act has been amended to extend the increase made last year in the provincial share of personal income tax revenue.

A conference of dominion and provincial ministers of finance and provincial treasurers was held early this month at which it was agreed that a comprehensive study should be undertaken of the problems of intergovernmental financial and economic relations. A further meeting will be held next October. Meanwhile, reports on many of these questions are being prepared by the federal-provincial continuing committee of officials.

You have enacted a measure to authorize the payment of additional annual grants to Newfoundland in accordance with the scale contained in the report of the royal commission on Newfoundland finances appointed in fulfilment of the obligation of the government of Canada under the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada.

You have enacted a measure to alleviate the discriminatory effects of the last horizontal increase in freight rates and an inquiry has been instituted into a broad range of railway problems.

Changes have been made in the Criminal Code, including an important provision respecting obscene literature.

After study of the subject by a committee, you have approved a measure for the humane slaughter of food animals.

You have signified your approval of a new international wheat agreement negotiated within the past few months. The agreement has since been accepted.

You have provided for the appointment of parliamentary secretaries to ministers of the crown.

The supplementary pensions for retired civil servants, members of the armed services and of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, provided by appropriations last year, have been placed on a statutory basis.

Other measures enacted at this session include the act to approve the income tax convention with Finland, the C.N.R. Financing and Guarantee Act, a new Seeds Act, acts to confirm agreements with the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick respecting Indian reserves, an act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Niagara river between Ontario and New York, an act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pigeon river between Ontario and Minnesota, and an act to repeal certain fisheries laws of Newfoundland respecting the exportation of salt fish.

You have also amended the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act, the Northwest Territories Act, the Farm Improvement Loan Act, the National Defence Act, the National Housing Act, the Trans-Canada Highway Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, the Public Servants Inventions Act, the Income Tax Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the New Zealand Trade Agreement Act 1932, the Prime Minister's Residence Act, the Judges Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act, the Length and Mass Units Act, the Weights and Measures Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Public Lands Grants Act, and the Combines Investigation Act.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the provision you have made for the public services in the current fiscal year.

Honourable members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I pray that divine Providence may continue to bless, protect and guide our nation.

This concluded the second session of the twenty-fourth parliament.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.B.C. FRENCH NETWORK—PROGRAMS AND EMPLOYEES

Question No. 236—Mr. Rouleau:

1. What was the amount lost by the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in sponsored programs or otherwise, since December 29, 1958?
2. How many films have been purchased by the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for presentation on television, since December 29, 1958?
3. From whom were such films purchased and for what amount in each case?
4. Who was entrusted with the protection of the employees who continued to work for the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at Montreal?
5. What was the cost thereof?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises as follows:

1. It is difficult to compute the amount lost, if any, to the French network in commercial revenue as this must be balanced against the saving in cancellation of live programs as well as in salaries and other factors during the period of the strike.

2 and 3. See answer to question No. 68, page 1581, House of Commons Debates, March 3, 1959.

4 and 5. See answer to question No. 65, page 4053, House of Commons Debates, May 26, 1959.
